EDITORS' PREFACE

Study of the Bible has experienced a sea change since the Interpreter's One-Volume Commentary on the Bible was originally published in 1971. That is true in the arena of scholarly work, where the methods of study have exploded in recent decades, and in the range and number of scholarly interpreters. Alongside historical critical analysis, scholars now draw on literary analysis, social scientific work, postcolonial studies, and feminist criticism—to name only a few perspectives that inform contemporary biblical studies. Moreover, biblical scholars themselves are a more numerous and diverse group of people than was the case forty plus years ago.

What is sometimes overlooked is that the world of Bible study has also changed significantly for pastors and lay teachers of the Bible. In addition to the major shifts in the academy, serious readers of the Bible confront a vast array of resources, and sorting out the serious from the spurious is not always easy. Publications that purport to be exposés of various elements of early Christian history can muddy the waters, and some immensely popular works of fiction complicate matters further by raising questions about what actually is in the Bible and what is not.

Conscious of these developments, we offer this concise, one-volume commentary, confident that it provides both beginning and experienced readers of the Bible with reliable and accessible guidance. The contributors to this volume, who reflect the aforementioned diversity, were invited because of our confidence in both their scholarly competence and their abilities as communicators. No attempt is made to bring their various commentaries into a restrictive conformity, but we did ask all of them to avoid the jargon that too often mars scholarly work. In addition, we invited them to engage in theological reflection about the biblical literature they were addressing.

We also include articles that should make the commentary especially useful for pastors and teachers. In addition to overviews of specific kinds of literature (e.g., the prophetic literature or letters) and introductions to the cultural locations of biblical texts, this volume contains articles on preaching the Bible, teaching the Bible, the creation of the Bible, and the place of the Bible in the church.

As scholars and teachers of the Bible, we ourselves find it an endlessly fascinating book—surprising, challenging, sustaining. It is our hope that this volume will prove a genuinely valuable resource for others who join us in that study.

OVERVIEW

The book of Genesis brings together stories about the beginning of the world and humanity (Gen 1–11) with stories about the beginning of the particular people of Israel and their earliest ancestors (Gen 12–50). As such, Genesis is important in setting God's interaction and concern with God's specially chosen people, Israel, within the broader universal horizon of God's interaction and concern for all humanity and all creation.

Genesis 1–11 recount God's good creation of the heavens and the earth as well as repeated incidents of humans disobeying God, hurting fellow humans, and being discontent with what they are—human creatures tied to the earth. The several human rebellions are followed by devastating consequences, but also by God's continued blessing of humanity and divine acts of mercy and restraint. However, as the reader reaches the end of Gen 11, it is clear that the world and humanity have not been restored to the harmony and goodness that God had intended for God's creation in Gen 1. God's several attempts to deal with humanity as a whole prove less than fully successful. Thus, God moves to try a new strategy.

In Gen 12–50, God's new venture involves the selection of one special family within all the families of the earth who would become the vehicle of God's blessing of all the other "families of the earth" (Gen 12:3). God focuses on the family of Abraham and Sarah, the ancestors of the people of Israel. Genesis 12–50 is primarily a series of family stories involving Israel's ancestors and their interactions with other nations. The ancestors originate in Mesopotamia (modern-day Iraq), travel to Canaan (modern-day Israel/Palestine), and then move back and forth among the lands of Canaan, Egypt, and Mesopotamia.

Most modern scholars agree that the book of Genesis developed through several stages of collecting, writing, and editing over hundreds of years, sometime between the 8th and 5th centuries BCE. In this period, Israel was forced to reflect on its role as God's chosen nation as it interacted with the successive empires, cultures, and religions of Assyria, Babylon, and Persia as well as other neighboring nations. In particular, Israel's experience of forced migration from the promised land of Judah and the destruction of the holy city of Jerusalem by an army of the Babylonian empire in 587 BCE evoked a definitive reexamination of its core traditions and self-understanding as the people of God among the other nations of the world. The Babylonian exile, however, only solidified and sharpened what ancient Israel had learned earlier and continued to learn at various points throughout its history. God had chosen Israel from among the nations. God would stay committed to God's people, even though Israel was a young nation in comparison to the older and more powerful empires of the world. God would continue to bless Israel's ancestors, even though they often endured severe struggles, suffering, and near death, all of which appeared at the time to contradict God's promises to God's people. In the end, Genesis proclaims, God will be faithful.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Creation of the World and the Beginnings of Humankind (1:1–11:32)

The opening chapters of Genesis describe God's continuing commitment to sustain and bless God's good creation and its inhabitants, including all human beings. God does so in spite of human disobedience and wrongdoing that leads to broken relationships between humans and God (Gen 3), humans and one another (Gen 4; 6), and also humans and non-human creation (3:15, 17–19; 9:1–5). The stories of Gen 1–11 contain elements that are mythic in character and not part of our normal human experience: a talking snake (3:1), human lifetimes that last nearly a thousand years (5:5), divine beings called "sons of God" who come to earth and procreate with humans (6:1–4), a catastrophic worldwide flood (7:17–24), and a time when all people of the world spoke only one language (11:1). Although some of these elements may seem strange and otherworldly, the stories of Gen 1–11 use these and other elements to explore profound and enduring truths about reality and the interactions of God, humans, and the world.

A. Two Stories of Creation (1:1–2:25)

The Bible begins by placing two different stories about the creation of the world side by side in Gen 1 and 2. These two versions arose at different times in Israel's history. Most scholars argue that the date of the composition of the creation story in Gen 2:4–24 is earlier than the composition of the creation story in Gen 1:1–2:3. Indeed, the earlier creation story reflects the first part of an extended tradition that weaves intermittently in and out of the book of Genesis. Some scholars understand this earlier tradition, sometimes termed by scholars as the Yahwist tradition (abbreviated as J from the German spelling Jahweh), as extending not only through Genesis but intermittently throughout much of the Pentateuch (the five books of Genesis-Deuteronomy). Other scholars would deny such a view, arguing instead that this earlier tradition exists only in Genesis. For our purposes, we will refer to this earlier set of traditions in Genesis as the "non-Priestly" tradition, differentiated from the later Priestly tradition which begins in Gen 1 and then extends into Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers.

The later creation story in Gen 1:1–2:3, the Priestly version, likely came together in its present form at a later time than the Gen 2 creation account, probably during or after the Babylonian exile of the sixth century BCE. The key differences between the Priestly (P) creation story and the earlier non-Priestly creation story include the following: the divine name ("God" in P; "LORD God" in non-P); the state of the world before creation begins (watery chaos in P–1:2; dry desert in non-P–2:5–6); the order or sequence of what is created (six days with man and woman created together at the same time as the last of the creatures in P; the man created first, then the animals, and finally the woman in non-P); the mode of God's creating (by divine words of command in P–1:3, 6, 9; by God "forming," "planting," "making" in non-P–2:7, 8, 19, 22); the arena of creation (cosmic with the heavens and the earth in P; a smaller scale and localized garden of Eden in non-P); the portrayal of God (in full control, orderly, and transcendent in P; more intimate, hands-on, and experimental in non-P); and in literary style (a carefully ordered framework of seven days with a litany of repetitions in P; a more haphazard narrative of trial and error in non-P).

This pairing of two different creation stories at the beginning of Genesis illustrates a characteristic mode by which Genesis often renders truth. Genesis frequently sets up a dialogue among a variety of voices and stories that provide different but complementary angles of insight into a given event, theme, or relationship. Genesis thereby invites the reader to see a fuller truth by holding different but complementary viewpoints together at the same time.

1:1–2:3. The First Creation Story—The Heavens and the Earth. The first version of the creation story (Gen 1:1–2:3) begins with the world as a dark and formless void that hangs over primeval waters of chaos ("the deep"). God's "wind" (ruakh), which can also mean "spirit" or "breath," enters into this dark and empty chaos, joined with a divine word of command, "Let there be light" (v. 1). This "spirit/wind" coupled with God's command begins to create out of the earlier chaos an ordered, interdependent, and organic system that sustains life, goodness, and a balance of work and rest. Creation happens in Gen 1 within the framework and structure of a seven-day week. During the first three days of creation, God creates three broad regions into which God will later place their proper inhabitants: light/darkness, sky/sea, and dry land (1:3–13). God then creates the occupants of each region. The sun, moon, and stars inhabit and "rule over" the regions of light and dark (Day Four). Sea creatures (including "the great sea monsters") and birds inhabit the sea and sky (Day Five). Animals and humans occupy the dry land (1:14–31).

The creation story slows down and spends some time on the creation of the human, providing important insights into the nature and vocation of the human within God's creation. First of all, God commands, "Let us make humankind in our image, according to our likeness" (1:26). God is speaking here to other heavenly beings, reflecting the ancient motif of a heavenly community of divine beings (1 Kgs 22, Job 1, Ps 82, Isa 6). God's motivation for creation is not because God is lonely in the universe. Rather, creation involves God's desire for deepening and broadening the community of relationships that already exists in the divine realm. In creation, God's pre-existing experience of community spills over into a new arena and dimension, the realm of time (created by the alternation of light and dark, day and night) and space (the various ordered regions of sky, sea, and land).

Second, the human is created in God's "image" or "likeness" (1:26), reflecting a practice among ancient Near Eastern kings who erected stone statues or images of themselves throughout their realm as an extension and reminder of the king's dominion over the region. Given this background, humans are called to be living images or likenesses of God and extensions of God's dominion over all the earth. God entrusts humans with responsibility to exercise their dominion (1:28) in God's image of care and concern for all creation, including its most vulnerable members (see the model of a good Israelite king's "dominion" in Ps 72:8–14).

Third, humans are created together in community from the very beginning with both genders reflecting "the image of God": "in the image of God he created them, male and female he created them" (1:27). The image of God is neither exclusively male nor female but somehow encompasses both (cf. Deut 4:16).

Finally, the humans are the last in the series of created regions and creatures, all of which God evaluates as being "very good" (1:31). Although each part was pronounced "good" earlier (1:4, 12, 18, 21), it is only when the whole community of interdependent creatures and parts work together to foster life and blessing that God pronounces it all as "very good." Creation is "good," but it is not perfect or without continuing threats of chaos, disorder, and brokenness. The primeval waters of chaos were pushed by God's great dome (1:6–7) to the edges above and by the land below, but the threatening waters do not disappear. The waters of chaos remain as an element of the created order and will return later in the Genesis narrative in the flood narrative (Gen 7:11). God's world does not appear as a perfect paradise but rather as a "very good" creation (1:31).

After six days of work, God "rested on the seventh day" and "hallowed it" (2:2–3). This text is cited as the explanation for one of the Ten Commandments in Exod 20:8–11, mandating that the seventh day of every week be set aside as a day of rest and no work. The Sabbath in the Priestly tradition is anchored in creation so that the requirement of regular sabbath rest is built into every creature, both humans and animals, both Israelites and non-Israelites ("your son and daughter . . . the alien resident in your town . . . your livestock"—Exod 20:10). By resting on the Sabbath, God willingly enters into and becomes subject to the created framework of human time that God has just created. This becomes the first instance of God's gracious accommodation or self-limiting for the sake of God's creation. God's example also becomes a pedagogical model that promotes a healthy balance of work and rest, care of creation, and worship of the Creator.

2:4–25. The Second Creation Story—The Garden of Eden. Genesis 2:4 contains a recurring formulaic sentence that marks the beginning of new sections throughout Genesis: "These are the generations of" (sometimes translated as "these are the stories of" or "these are the descendants of": Gen 2:4; 6:9; 10:1; 11:27; 25:19; 37:2). Here it marks the beginning of a second creation story that has its own additional heading: "In the day that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens" (cf. Gen 1:1).

This second creation account begins with the image of a dry desert or wilderness. Like the waters of chaos that began the creation story in Gen 1, the wilderness is a frequent biblical image of a fearful place of chaos, evil, and death (Isa 21:1–3; 43:15–21). Two things are required to turn this dry desert into a flourishing garden of life: water and someone to till the ground. A stream appears and waters the ground (2:6). Meanwhile, the Lord God "forms" a man ('adam) from the dust of the ground ('adamah). The verb "forms" is a verb used of a potter who molds clay and portrays God's intimate involvement in the creative process. The Hebrew word play between "man" ('adam) and "ground" ('adamah) signifies the bond between the earth and the human earth creature who was created from the dust and who, in death, will return to dust (Gen 3:19). What distinguishes the human is that God breathes into the human lump of clay "the breath (ruakh) of life," and only then does the human become "a living being." Life is an intimately given divine gift with every human breath a reminder of the giftedness of life.

God's hands-on interaction continues in Gen 2:8–9 with God planting a lush garden of beauty and bounty in Eden. Two fruit trees stand at the center of the garden, the "tree of life" and the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil." These two trees will come into play later in the narrative (Gen 2:17; 3:1–7, 22–24). The garden of Eden is not a vacation resort for the human but a workplace in which the human exercises a vocation: to "till and keep" the garden (2:15). Alongside this vocational responsibility is also freedom ("you may freely eat of every tree"—2:16) mixed with one limiting prohibition ("but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat, for in the day that you eat of it you shall [the Hebrew is emphatic—add 'surely'] die"—2:17). This combination of positive responsibilities, negative limits, and wide freedoms sets the stage both for the exuberant joys as well as the deep tragedies of human existence, "the knowledge of good" and "the knowledge of evil."

The Lord God evaluates the garden and its human caretaker and realizes that something is lacking. "It is not good that the man should be alone." God recognizes that the human is an inherently social creature, in need of "a helper as his partner" (2:18). The Hebrew word for "helper" ('ezer) does not imply one of lower status or an inferior assistant. Rather, the "helper" in the Old Testament is often someone of an equal or higher status in comparison to the one being helped. God is often called a "helper" to those in need elsewhere in Scripture (Ps 10:14; 54:4).

God begins by creating all the animals and inviting the human to name them and thereby define their essence or character (2:18–20). God welcomes the human as a co-creator with God. However, the animals fail to address fully the human yearning for community. As a result, God tries another strategy. God puts the human to sleep, takes out one of the human's ribs, and forms the rib into a second human being, a woman (2:21–22). Instantly, the man recognizes in the woman the fulfillment of the deep yearning for relationship as he joyfully proclaims: "This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh . . . she shall be called Woman ('ishshah) because she was taken out of Man ('ish)" (2:23). Bound together in an intimate and trusting relationship, the two humans "become one flesh," naked, open, vulnerable, trusting, and "not ashamed" (2:24–25).

B. Two Disobedience Stories (3:1–4:26)

Without warning, the idyllic scene of human community and love in the lush garden of Eden at the end of Gen 2 is suddenly and irrevocably shattered in the two paired stories of disobedience and murder that follow in Gen 3 and 4. The two chapters contain a number of verbal and thematic parallels that bind them together. Thus, for example, both stories in Gen 3 and 4 portray the lure of sin as a crafty animal (the shrewd serpent in 3:1–5; an animal lurking at the door in 4:7). The woman's "desire" for the man (Gen 3:16) parallels sin's "desire" for Cain (4:7). God asks the humans in both stories, "Where?" (3:9; 4:9). Phrases such as "cursed is/from the ground" (3:17; 4:11), "when you work the ground" (3:18; 4:12), and "east (of the garden) of Eden" (3:24; 4:16) are repeated in both narratives. The father (Adam) and son (Cain) share a number of similarities. Both give in to temptation and sin. Both seek to shift blame to someone else (the woman Eve, Abel). Both in the end try to blame God for their actions (Adam—"the woman whom you gave to be with me"—3:12; Cain—"Am I my brother's keeper?" [implying no, God is]—4:9). The key difference between Adam and Cain is that Adam is overly passive and silent in Gen 3 while Cain is overly aggressive and violent in Gen 4.

3:1–24. Adam and Eve—The First Act of Human Disobedience. The story of the serpent's temptation of Adam and Eve in Gen 3 does not so much explain the origins of sin and evil in the world as depict the enduring realities of the human condition. Genesis 3 explores the humans' yearning to go beyond the limits within which they were created, leading in a series of steps to temptation, transgression, and unforeseen consequences that flow out of such transgressions. All of this occurs within the context of the judgment of God but also the even stronger mercy of God.

The serpent in the garden is one of God's own creatures, excelling in being "more crafty" than any other wild animal (3:1). The serpent is not portrayed as Satan or an alien creature that has invaded the garden. The serpent simply asks questions and makes claims that appeal to the seeds of a yearning or suspicion that seem to be already present in the woman's mind. The serpent assures the woman that she would not die from eating the forbidden fruit. She would only gain knowledge, have her eyes opened, and would become "like God, knowing good and evil" (3:5). The woman is lured by the special fruit, its attraction as "good for food," its beauty as "a delight to the eyes," and its capacity "to make one wise" (3:6). She takes the fruit and then eats it (3:6).

What comes next is a bit of a surprise. She gives the fruit also to her husband "who was with her." The man was presumably present with her all along during the dialogue with the serpent. Without question or comment, the text simply says, "and he ate" (3:7). Here it is clear that the story does not intend to implicate the woman alone as uniquely at fault for the act of disobedience in the garden. Both the woman and the man were present with the serpent, and both are held accountable for their action and receive consequences for their transgression of the limits that God had set for their own good. By eating the fruit, their eyes were indeed opened, as the serpent had promised. However, their eyes were not opened to some glorious knowledge of a divine nature but rather to the mundane awareness that they were naked, ashamed, and now in need of clothing to hide behind.

The intimacy of God's presence in the garden (Gen 2) continues in Gen 3 as God appears, "walking in the garden at the time of the evening breeze" (3:8). For the first time, the humans hide from God. As God often does in the Bible, God comes looking for God's rebellious people. God interrogates the humans and discovers the transgression. The man refuses to accept responsibility, blaming instead the woman but also ultimately blaming God: "the woman whom you [God] gave to be with me, she gave me fruit" (3:12). The woman in turn blames the serpent. God then describes the consequences that will flow out of transgression of human limits. The serpent loses his legs and becomes a creature repulsive to humans (3:14–15). The woman will experience increased pain in childbirth and inequality in her relationship with the man (3:16). The man will find his labor more difficult and his relationship with the land far more complicated (3:17–19).

God curses the serpent (3:14) and the ground (3:17) but not the humans themselves. God's mercy emerges as God exchanges the prickly figleaf clothing that the humans had made themselves (3:7) for softer garments of skins that God makes for them (3:21). Moreover, although God had said that the humans would "surely die" on the very day they ate of the forbidden fruit (2:17), God rescinds the immediate death penalty by allowing them to live. Eve becomes "the mother of all living" (3:20). At the same time, however, God imposes a limit on the length of human life by sending the humans forever out of the garden of Eden lest they eat of the other tree, the tree of life, and live forever (3:22–24). Adam and Eve will live long enough to have children in order that the human race may continue, but they themselves will not live forever. They will go back to the ground from which they came:

"you are dust, and to dust you shall return" (3:19; see 2:7).

4:1–26. Cain Murders Abel—The Second Act of Human Disobedience. The phrase that begins the chapter, "now the man knew his wife Eve," signifies in this case the intimate knowledge of sexual union. Adam had earlier named Eve (3:20), and now Eve takes her turn and names a man, her son Cain whom she acknowledges as a gift from God (4:1). God continues to bless the humans in spite of their disobedience. Eve also gives birth to a second son, Abel.

Abel grows up as a sheep herder, and Cain is a farmer. They offer sacrifices to God, and God accepts Abel's animal offering but not Cain's grain offering. The text is not interested in explaining why God chose the sacrifice of Abel (the younger son) but not the sacrifice of Cain (the elder son). Rather, the text portrays the human reality that human envy, jealousy, and shame often lead to violence. Cain lures his brother Abel into the field and kills him. God appears and interrogates Cain about his brother's whereabouts. Cain claims not to know, asking God, "Am I my brother's keeper" (3:9). The question is a cynical one, implying that God bears the responsibility if anything has happened to Abel because God is traditionally supposed to be the one who "keeps" or "guards" God's people (Ps 121:5; Isa 27:3).

Abel's spilled blood cries out to God "from the ground" (3:10). Human and animal blood was understood in ancient Israel to contain the life force of an individual and thus was considered sacred. Thus, any spilling of blood was a matter that cried out for God's attention (Deut 12:23–24; Lev 17:10–14). The consequences for the farmer Cain are disastrous. The ground from which Abel's blood cried out will no longer produce food abundantly (4:11). Moreover, Cain will be forced to migrate from his land and be a fugitive and wanderer in foreign lands, rendering him vulnerable to attack, abuse and the possibility of blood revenge for his murder. However, in God's mercy, God places a protective mark on Cain that signifies that anyone who kills Cain will be avenged seven times over (3:15). God mercifully spares Cain from the death penalty for his murder, not enforcing the law of equal consequences found elsewhere in the Old Testament: "an eye for an eye, a life for a life" (Exod 21:24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21).

A new generation is born after Cain. Some humans begin to build cities (3:17), some herd sheep (4:20), some make music (4:21), and some become metal workers. The diversification of human culture and vocations is a sign of God's hidden activity of blessing. Lamech is a descendant of Cain who also exemplifies the continuing negative and violent side of the human condition as he boasts of initiating a spiral of violence by killing a man who had wounded him, promising to avenge anyone who tries to hurt him not just seven times (as with Cain) but seventy-seven times over. For him, violence and vengeance have no limits.

C. Ten Generations from Adam and Eve to Noah (5:1–32)

The listing of ten generations in Gen 5 provides a connecting bridge between the story of Adam and Eve (Gen 2–4) and the next major story of Noah and the flood (Gen 6–9). The genealogy in Gen

11:10–26 will trace the line from Noah's son Shem to Abraham. The family tree in Gen 46:8–27 lists in successive generations the descendants of Abraham's grandson Jacob. The listing of generations illustrates the specific working out of God's blessing and human obedience of God's command to "be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth" (Gen 1:28).

D. Breaking the Boundary Between Divine and Human—The Birth of Giants (6:1–4)

Thus far in Genesis, humans have tried to become "like God" (3:5), one human murdered a brother (4:8), and another human pledged an increasing spiral of violence and revenge against anyone who threatened him (4:23–24). The erosion and fracturing of God's "good" creation (1:31) steps up a notch with the short story about the transgression of the created boundary between heaven and earth. Divine beings called "the sons of God" come down to earth and engage in sexual unions with "daughters of humans," creating a super race of giant legendary warriors called "Nephilim" (Heb.: "Fallen Ones"). Later in Israel's story, Israelite spies will claim to have spotted the giant Nephilim warriors fighting for the Canaanites in the land of Canaan (Num 13:32–33). Some later Jewish and Christians interpreters of the Bible expanded on the story of the Nephilim, associating them with the origin of Satan or the devil as a rebellious "fallen angel" who waged war against God's people. In the present text, however, this breach of a boundary between heaven and earth is a sign of cosmic rupture and another threat to God's created order.

This breach of the divine-human boundary causes God to limit the life spans of humans even further, from an average of 800–900 years in Gen 5 to a maximum limit of 120 years in Gen 6:3. Later biblical tradition will speak of a normal limit of 70–80 years (Ps 90:10). The spread of sin and violence in creation correlates with the advancing power of death and mortality in human lives.

E. The Flood Story (6:5–9:29)

The increasing violence, corruption, and breakdown among humans result in God's decision to try a new strategy. God decides to start over with a remnant of all the species of non-human creation along with a man named Noah and his family. Noah will build an ark in which his family and pairs of all creatures will be spared while the rest of humanity and all other land creatures will be destroyed in a worldwide flood.

A number of variations, doublets, and other tensions in the story of Noah have suggested to many scholars that two originally distinct versions of the great flood story in Gen 6–9 have been woven together to form the present combined narrative. The style and elements of these two versions seem to correspond to the Priestly tradition that is evident in Gen 1, on one hand, and to the non-Priestly version that appears in the Gen 2 creation story, on the other. Unlike Gen 1–2 where the P and non-P accounts are juxtaposed and separate, the non-P and P accounts in Gen 6–9 are interwoven. The combination of the two versions of the flood (Priestly and non-Priestly) into one narrative provides a way of preserving the richness of divergent traditions about the flood while also maintaining a single story line, albeit with some tensions. Ancient Israelite writers likely borrowed and adapted some elements of the biblical flood story from an earlier epic tradition of a great primeval flood that had roots in Mesopotamia where major destructive floods actually occurred in ancient times. Archaeologists have uncovered multiple older Mesopotamian versions of an ancient flood story, e.g., in the Atrahasis myth and the epic of Gilgamesh, which contain numerous elements similar to the biblical account of Noah and the flood.

6:5–22. God Reveals to Noah the Plan for the Flood and the Ark. Two separate introductions to the flood story stand side by side, one Priestly version in 6:9–22 and a non-Priestly version in 6:5–8 and 7:1–5. The non-Priestly version emphasizes the "wickedness of humankind" and the "thoughts of their hearts" as "only evil continually" (6:5). Wickedness for the non-P version focused on the inclinations of the human heart. The non-Priestly portrait of "the LORD" is also highly interior, emotive, and regretful: "The LORD was sorry" for creating humankind "and it grieved him to his heart" (6:7).

The Priestly version emphasizes a broader cosmic corruption including "all flesh" and the whole earth: "Now the earth was corrupt in God's sight, and the earth was filled with violence . . . all flesh had corrupted its ways upon the earth" (11:13). God resolves to destroy "all flesh . . . along with the earth" (6:13). Corruption for P infects the whole creation—"everything that is on the earth" (6:17). Corruption is seen not so much in the interior life of humans but in outward acts of "violence" (6:11, 13). In the Priestly portrait of God, there is no mention of God's emotional life. God seems more resolved and in control: "I have determined to make an end of all flesh" (6:13).

God establishes a covenant in which God promises Noah, his family, and all the ark's creatures that God will "keep them alive" (6:18–19). Noah's obligations in this covenant is to build the ark and to collect two of every kind of animal, male and female, onto the ark. The content of the covenant will be expanded in more detail after the conclusion of the flood in 9:8–17.

7:1–8:19. The Great Flood. Two versions of the great flood are combined with one another. In the non-Priestly version in 7:12, the flood is the result of a forty-day rain. In the Priestly version in 7:11, the flood results from the fountains of the deep from under the earth gushing forth from below and "the windows of the heavens" being opened from above, letting in the waters of chaos that God had earlier pushed up and back with the dome that formed the sky in the Priestly creation story (Gen 1:6–7). In the Priestly version, this swelling up of the waters of chaos lasts 150 days (7:24).

The most important verse in the whole flood story occurs in 8:1: "But God remembered Noah" and all the animals that were with him. This divine remembering involves recalling the covenant promise that God had made earlier in 6:18, a promise to save their lives and through them to establish and populate a new creation. The image of God making a "wind" (ruakh, "wind/ breath/spirit") blow over the flood waters recalls God's "wind" blowing over the primeval waters of chaos in the Priestly creation story in Gen 1:2. As the waters recede, Noah sends out a series of birds until one bird does not return, indicating that the bird has found dry land; the flood is over. God then commands Noah and all his passengers to disembark from the ark in order to "be fruitful and multiply on the earth," a reassertion of God's original command in the Priestly creation story in Gen 1:28. A new creation has emerged.

8:20–9:17. God's Promise and Covenant with Noah. The flood story concludes with two accounts of God's promise to Noah: a non-Priestly version (8:20–22) and an expanded Priestly version of God's covenant (9:1–17). In the non-Priestly promise, Noah builds an altar and offers burnt offerings to God of every clean animal and bird that was on the ark. The Lord smells "the pleasing odor" of the sacrifices and responds with a promise to "never again curse the ground because of humankind." The Lord had earlier "cursed the ground" because of Adam (Gen 3:17) and Cain (Gen 4:11). Moreover, God promises never again to "destroy every living creature as I have done" (8:21). God resolves to preserve the life-giving rhythms of seedtime and harvest, summer and winter, day and night that sustain food production and life. God has learned that "the inclination of the human heart is evil from youth" (8:21), and not even a drastic purification of humanity through a flood could erase this evil inclination. God will need to learn how to work with humans whose inner inclinations are "evil from youth," since God has also committed to keep the human experiment alive and to continue to bless it.

The Priestly version of God's promise and covenant at the end of the flood story in 9:1–17 repeats the life-affirming divine command in the Priestly creation account in Gen 1:28: "be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth" (9:1). But this "new creation" after the flood in Gen 9 also bears a shadow side. In the Priestly creation story, humans were granted an exclusively vegetarian diet (Gen 1:29). In Gen 9, humans are allowed to eat the meat of animals and birds ("just as I gave you green plants, I give you everything"—9:3). However, humans are not to eat any flesh with its blood because the blood of a creature is understood to contain the essence of its life (9:4). Thus, later laws will prescribe that the blood of any animal slaughtered for meat must be drained from the animal into the ground before the flesh is eaten as a sign that all life, human and animal, belongs ultimately to God and should be returned to God (Deut 12:23–25). The taking of life, and especially the taking of a human life, is a serious threat to the sanctity of life and the purity of a community "for in his own image God made humankind" (9:6). Thus, the taking of any life is a matter of sacred and divine concern. This idea is related to the Priestly concern for the "violence" of humankind at the beginning of the flood story (6:11, 13). God in effect concedes that humans will continue to be violent and to shed the blood of others even in this new post-flood world.

In spite of this prospect of continuing human violence, God pledges to renew the covenant first made with Noah at the beginning of the flood (6:18). Never again will God destroy the earth with a flood (9:8–12). God places the rainbow in the sky as a sign of this covenantal promise, a visual aid by which God will remember this covenant that God had made "between me and all flesh that is on the earth" (9:17). In this way, God enters into a covenant relationship with all creatures of the earth, marked by the visual sign of the rainbow. Just as human life is precious because humans are made in the image of God, so the life of all the earth's creatures is precious because God is in a covenant relationship with them.

9:18–10:32. The Descendants of Noah. Noah has three sons and from them "the whole earth was peopled" (9:18). Shem is pictured as the ancestor of the Semitic people who will come to include the people of Israel (see 10:21–31). Ham is the ancestor of the Hamitic peoples, including Egypt and other territories under Egypt's control, which included Canaan at some points in its history. Thus, Ham is portrayed as having a son named Canaan (see 10:6–20). Japheth is associated with the peoples who were north and west of Canaan in Asia Minor, Greece, and the coastland of the Mediterranean (see 10:2–5).

There is immediate evidence that the flood was not a successful strategy for eradicating human corruption. Just as the flood story had begun with an enigmatic and brief story about sexual irregularity with sons of God transgressing creational boundaries with daughters of humankind (Gen 6:1–4), so the flood story ends with another enigmatic and brief story about sexual impropriety with Noah and his sons. Noah makes wine, becomes intoxicated, lies naked in his tent, and his son Ham (father of Canaan) sees "the nakedness of his father" (9:22). "Seeing the nakedness" of another person may suggest some form of incest or other sexual taboo (Lev 18:6–8, 24–30). When Noah discovers what Ham had done, Noah curses Ham indirectly by cursing Ham's son Canaan and condemning him and his descendants to become slaves to Shem, an allusion to Israel's eventual conquest of the Canaanites in the book of Joshua. The curse of slavery imposed on the Egyptian/African Ham and Canaan has tragically and wrongly been used by some in the history of biblical interpretation as justification and warrant for American slavery of African Americans and for the oppression of other colonized peoples.

The segmented genealogy in Gen 10:1–32 lists the three sons of Noah and all their children, grandchildren and great grandchildren who represent diverse nations and peoples of the ancient Near East. These segmented genealogies serve throughout the book of Genesis to keep the larger family of all humankind in view as part of God's continuing concern and care even as the narrative will increasingly focus its attention on one particular family line of Abraham and Sarah and their descendants who will become God's specially chosen people, Israel.

One name in Gen 10 deserves special mention. Genesis 10:8–12 describes a legendary warrior named Nimrod of the "land of Shinar," which is another name for the land of Babylon or Babel, the empire responsible for the destruction of the city of Jerusalem and the exile of much of its population in 587 BCE (10:10). Nimrod is also credited with building "the great city" of Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire, which conquered the northern kingdom in 722 BCE (10:11–12; see Mic 5:5–6 where Assyria is described as "the land of Nimrod"). Thus, Nimrod is an ancient figure who represents in Israel's cultural memory the military might of the two highly militarized and oppressive empires under which Israel suffered as a nation, both Babylon and Assyria. This imperial allusion will form important background to the story of the tower of Babel, which is set in Nimrod's "land of Shinar" (11:2).

F. The Tower of Babel and the Confusion of Human Language (11:1–9)

The listing of the spread of nations among the various lands of the known world in Gen 10 sets the stage for the story of the tower of Babel in Gen 11. The opening verse pictures an idyllic scenario: the peoples of all the earth communicated with ease, all speaking the same language (11:1). All the earth's people migrate together and settle "in the land of Shinar," another name for the land of Babylon

(10:10). This is the land associated with the first mighty and legendary warrior Nimrod, an icon of imperial militarism (10:8–12). The world community decides to build a great brick city and "a tower with its top in the heavens" and thereby "make a name for ourselves" (11:4). In a Babylonian context, the tower to the heavens may allude to tall, pyramid-like structures called ziggurats, which ancient Babylonian priests would ascend to offer sacrifices to their gods. In this story, however, the humans do not seek to praise the name of their gods but to make a name for themselves. They fear being "scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth" (11:4); however, what they fear is precisely what will happen to them at the end of the story (11:9).

Ironically, the Lord must "come down" from the heavens to see the supposedly enormous building project that the humans believe reaches to the heavens (11:4–5). The Lord notes that they are all one people with one language, a unified world community, and now nothing they wish to do "will be impossible for them" (11:6). The larger literary context of Gen 1–11 suggests that God does not feel threatened or jealous of the humans' city and tower building. Rather, God's concern is what humans, unbridled by necessary restraints on human inclinations and power, will do to one another. The disobedience of Adam and Eve and their desire to move beyond their human limits "to be like God" (Gen 3:5) led to the next generation's horror of sibling murder as Cain killed his own brother Abel (4:8). The violence spiraled in Lamech's boast of unrestrained violence against anyone who hurt him (4:23–24). The chaotic breaking of boundaries between heaven and earth in the Nephilim story (Gen 6:1–4) created a super race of giants and military warriors, legendary purveyors of violence. God's desire to limit the violence of humans against other humans was a key reason for God's sending of the flood to try to start over with a new world (6:11, 13). In Gen 10, the land of Shinar is the "land of Nimrod," the legendary warrior and fighter associated with the imperial powers of Assyria and Babylon in ancient Israel's past.

Thus in the tower of Babel story, God sees humanity again pushing against its limits toward an imperial consolidation of power. There is nothing inherently wrong with humans wanting to have a name for themselves. God will grant a great name as a gift to Abram in the very next chapter (12:2). However, God knows from long experience with humans that the human yearning and inclination to be something other than human, to be like God, to leave earth and transgress the boundary of the divine, leads inevitably to suffering, abuse of power, violence, and oppression. The land of Shinar, the land of Nimrod, Babylon, and Assyria all represent the potential horrors of unrestrained empires that drain their client states of wealth, dignity, people, and spirit. This is what God fears in Gen 11: with the consolidation of military and political power in one empire, "nothing that they propose to do will now be impossible for them" (11:6). Their imperial unity will only result in the exponential growth of suffering, oppression, and violence.

In response, the Lord proposes to other heavenly beings in the divine council ("let us go down," see Gen 1:26) that they confuse the humans' language and scatter the humans abroad across the face of the earth (11:7–8). Divided now by language, culture, and territory, the humans abandon the building of their great unified city and tower. The place is called "Babel" which in the Babylonian language originally meant "Gate of God." However, the biblical storyteller associates the name "Babel" with a Hebrew verb meaning "to confuse" (balal), "because there the LORD confused the language of all the earth" (11:9). Ancient Israel's long and tortured history with many different empires (Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece) demonstrated the truth of the tower of Babel story. Empires would rise and seek to unify diverse nations and peoples under one purpose and power. However, God would ensure that every empire would eventually fall to ruin as God judged and limited the inevitable tendency of empires to abuse their power, oppress their citizens, and overextend themselves with unbridled military violence.

G. The Family Line from Shem to Abraham (11:10–32)

The genealogy in Gen 11:10–32 begins with Noah's son, Shem, and extends for ten generations (the same number as in Gen 5), ending with Abram and his wife, Sarai. Abram and Sarai will become the originating ancestors of the people of Israel (later called Abraham and Sarah; 17:5, 15). Thus, the genealogy in Gen 11 represents the transition from stories involving all humanity (Gen 1–11) to stories focused on the one family line of Abraham and Sarah and their descendants, who will become the nation of Israel (Gen 12–50).

The genealogy includes notes about two very difficult family circumstances that will continue to haunt the family line of Abraham and Sarah across their generations. In 11:28, a parent (Terah) experiences the death of a son (Haran). The premature death or threat of the death of a son in the line of Abraham and Sarah will reappear at several points in Gen 12–50 (22:2; 27:41; 37:29–36; 38:6–11). The second genealogical note is that Abram's wife, Sarai, "was barren; she had no child" (11:30). Sarai's barrenness will be another major theme and source of suspense throughout the Abraham-Sarah stories in seeming contradiction to God's promise that Abraham would be the father of a "great nation" of innumerable descendants (12:2; 17:6). The motif of the barren wife will reappear with Rebekah (25:21) and Rachel (29:31). These two family tragedies—death of a child and barrenness or infertility—exemplify obstacles through which God must work to remain faithful to the promises that God has made for this family line. These challenges also serve as metaphors for the ongoing struggles and tragedies of the people of Israel throughout its history. National tragedies like the split of the northern and southern kingdoms (1 Kgs 12), the Assyrian conquest and exile of the northern kingdom and many of its people (2 Kgs 17), the Assyrian destruction of many of the villages and cities of southern Judah (2 Kgs 18–19), or the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple and the exile of many of its people (2 Kgs 24–25) often seemed to contradict God's promises of blessing, life, and becoming a great nation, all promises that God will make to Abraham and Sarah and their descendants (Gen 12:1–3).

II. The Family Stories of Israel's Ancestors (12:1–50:26)

Genesis 1–11 related the primeval history of God's interactions with all humanity and all creation, stretching from the beginnings of the heavens and the earth (Gen 1:1) to humanity's failed attempt to unify itself in the tower of Babel story (Gen 11:1–9). In order to protect humanity against itself, God ensures that humanity remains divided into different cultures and language groups with their power and capacity to do harm limited and restrained by being scattered among many different nations and peoples. Beginning in Gen 12, however, God embarks on a new and more positive strategy. God focuses divine efforts to bless humanity by concentrating on one chosen family line, the family of Abraham and Sarah. God will work in and through this one family with the ultimate aim of blessing this family and also thereby blessing "all the families of the earth" (Gen 12:3). The interactions between the family of Abraham and Sarah and the other nations will be mixed, sometimes positive and sometimes quite negative and tragic. But along the way, Genesis will provide glimpses of blessing, peacemaking, reconciliation, generosity, and forgiveness between families and nations that hold out the hope and promise of a longer range trajectory toward which God seeks to bring humanity and the whole of creation (Gen 13:1–18; 18:16–33; 21:22–34; 33:1–11; 50:15–21; see Isa 2:1–4; 11:1–9; 19:23–25; 56:1–8; 65:17–25).

A. The Family Stories of Abraham and Sarah and Their Son Isaac (12:1–25:18)

Two complementary themes weave and in out of the diverse stories that make up the Abraham-Sarah cycle of family stories in Gen 12–25. One theme is the promise that Abraham would become a great nation with a promised land and many descendants, more than the stars of the heavens (12:1–3, 4–9; 13:15–17; 15:5–7, 18–21; 17:1–8; 22:15–18; 23:1–20). A second recurring theme is the alternation between blessing and curse in the many interactions between the family of Abraham and other nations and peoples. The interactions are often positive (12:3; 13:1–18; 14:17–24; 18:16–33; 21:22–34; 23:1–20; 24:1–67), but they are also often tinged with judgment, conflict, or suffering (12:10–20; 14:1–16; 15:12–14; 16:1–6; 19:1–29; 20:1–18; 21:8–21; 23:1–20).

It should be noted that Abram's name will eventually be changed to Abraham, and Sarai's name will be changed to Sarah (17:5, 15).

12:1–9. God Calls Abram with a Promise of Blessing. Abram's father Terah lived in the city of Ur in southern Mesopotamia and had intended to migrate to the faraway land of Canaan with his family. Terah, however, had only reached the city of Haran in northern Mesopotamia when he died (11:31–32). In 12:1–9, God commands Terah's son Abram to "go from your country and your kindred and your father's house" in Mesopotamia and migrate "to the land that I will show you." In effect, God instructs Abram to fulfill his father Terah's failed plan to travel and settle in Canaan. If Abram obeys, God promises to make Abram "a great nation," to "bless" Abram, and to make his name great. Ironically, a great name was what the Babel tower builders had wanted to make for themselves (11:4). In 12:2, God promises to make Abram's name great as Abram responds to God's command and leaves behind his homeland and extended family. God promises to bless other peoples and nations that bless Abram, and God will curse other nations that curse him. These promises to Abram are not only for the benefit of Abram, but they are part of God's plan for the benefit of all humanity with whom God has been working in Gen 1–11: "in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed" (12:3). Abram immediately obeys God's command and travels to Canaan, lured by the promise of great blessing (12:4).

12:10–20. Abram and Sarai in Egypt: The First Wife-Sister Story. Abram and Sarai migrate from Canaan to Egypt in search of food in order to escape the famine in the land of Canaan. Generations later, Abraham's descendants will do the same thing when Jacob's sons go down to Egypt because of the famine in Canaan (41:53–42:3). Abram and Sarai are "aliens" in Egypt and thus do not have the same legal or social protections as natives (12:10). As a result, Abram worries that when the Egyptians see that Sarai is "a woman beautiful in appearance," they will take her as a wife and kill Abram. A fearful Abram instructs Sarai to deceive the Egyptians and tell them she is Abram's sister and not his wife. Abram is willing to endanger his own wife "so that it may go well with me" and "that my life may be spared" (12:11–13). Abram had just received God's promise that God would bless Abram and make him a "great nation" (12:2–3), but Abram seems not to trust fully in God's blessing and protection in this instance.

As Abram had feared, the Egyptian Pharaoh sees Sarai's beauty and takes her into his house. As a result, the Lord afflicts Pharaoh's house with "great plagues," causing Pharaoh to send Sarai out of Egypt after discovering she was Abram's wife (12:17–20). The plagues and flight out of Egypt prefigure the plagues and God's rescue of Israel in the exodus out of Egypt in the time of Moses (Exod 11:1). A similar "wife-sister story" will occur again with Abraham and Sarah in 20:1–17 and with Isaac and Rebekah in 26:6–11.

13:1–14:24. Abram's Generosity and Care for His Nephew Lot. Abram had just endangered his wife, Sarai, as well as Pharaoh and the other Egyptians by telling the Egyptians that Sarai was not his wife (12:10–20). This problematic story about Abram's interaction with another nation is paired with a more positive portrait of Abram and the nations in Gen 13–14. Lot, Abram's nephew, will become the ancestor of the nations of Moab and Ammon; these nations will become neighbors to the Israelites on their eastern border (19:30–38). Thus, Abram's generosity to Lot, Abram's rescue of Lot when he was kidnapped by the kings of Shinar, and the blessing of the Canaanite kingpriest named Melchizedek in Gen 13–14, become examples of Abram being a blessing to "all the families of the earth" (12:3). This close pairing of different kinds of encounters with other nations and cultures, some positive and some negative, will be a recurring literary motif throughout the book of Genesis.

The Lord reaffirms the promise that the land of Canaan in all directions (north, south, east, and west) will belong to Abram and his descendants (13:14–15). The Lord also confirms the earlier promise of many descendants to Abram, specifying that they will be as many as the innumerable grains of dust on the earth (13:16). God will repeat the promise later, using the stars of heaven as the visual aid of the promise of innumerable descendants (15:5).

15:1–21. God's Covenant with Abram: Descendants and Land. The phrase that begins Gen 15, "After these things," occurs in two other places in Genesis, one at the beginning and one at the end of Gen 22 (22:1; 22:20). The two texts of Gen 15 and Gen 22 form a dramatic theological pair within the Abraham cycle of stories. On one hand, Gen 15 emphasizes God's willingness to lay God's future on the line to fulfill the promise of land and descendants to Abraham. On the other hand, Gen 22 emphasizes Abraham's willingness to lay his own life and future on the line in obeying God's command to offer up Isaac, his only son.

The Lord appears to Abram in a vision and reassures Abram that his "reward will be very great" (15:1). The elderly Abram complains that the Lord's earlier and more specific promise of many descendants (12:2; 13:16) has yet to be fulfilled. The Lord reassures Abram that he himself will have a child of his own. The Lord takes Abram outside and invites him to count the stars of the heavens, adding the wry comment, "if you are able to count them" (15:5). The Lord promises that Abram's descendants will be as innumerable as the stars of the nighttime sky.

The scene concludes with a theologically freighted assessment that falls into two parts. Part one affirms that "he [Abram] believed the LORD" (15:6a). This affirmation supports the traditional portrait of Abraham as a person of great trust in God's promises (Gal 3:6–9). The second part is rendered in the NRSV as "and the LORD reckoned it to him as righteousness" (15:6b). This is one possible way of translating the Hebrew text, and reflects the way in which the apostle Paul used this text in his argument that trusting or believing in the promise of God is what makes a person "righteous" rather than works of the law (Rom 4:1–15; Gal 3:6–18). However, the Hebrew of Gen 15:6 is somewhat more ambiguous and reads literally, "he [Abram] believed the LORD; and he [either "the LORD" or "Abram"] reckoned it to him [or "to himself"] as righteousness." In other words, it is possible to understand the verse as affirming that Abram believed the Lord, and that Abram was convinced ("reckoned to himself") that the Lord had acted rightly with him by promising him many descendants.

Although Abram may be satisfied with God's assurance that he will indeed have a child and heir, Abram immediately raises doubts about the Lord's second promise that Abram would be given the land of Canaan. (15:8–9). Abram remains a person of doubt and skepticism, demanding an additional sign of assurance from God. In response, the Lord performs an ancient ceremony of covenant-making, demonstrating how far God is willing to go to fulfill the promise of land to Abram. The Lord instructs Abram to slaughter a number of animals, cut them in half, and lay each half of the animals opposite to the other with a pathway between them. After a terrifying vision of Abraham's future descendants being in slavery for 400 years and the Lord returning them to the land of Canaan, the covenant-making ceremony proceeds with a "smoking fire pot" and "a flaming torch" moving down the pathway between the split animal carcasses (15:17–21). Fire frequently represents the presence of God in the Bible as it does here (Exod 3:2; 13:21; 19:18). The fire and smoke passing between the animals signifies God's oath to Abram that if God does not fulfill the promise of giving the land to his descendants, then God will be split in two like these animals (see Jer 34:18). God lays God's own future on the line as assurance that God's promise will be fulfilled. Whatever act of faith and obedience that Abraham may do in the future (Gen 22:1–19) will be grounded in this prior promise of God, guaranteed by God's dramatic pledge to Abram in Gen 15.

16:1–17:27. The Promise: From Abram-Hagar-Ishmael to Abraham-Sarah-Isaac. Abram had been assured by God in Gen 15 that Abram himself would be the father of a child and that his descendants would one day possess the land of Canaan. In Gen 16–17, the narrative lens widens to determine who will be the mother of this child. Abram's wife, Sarai, continues to be barren (11:30; 16:1). An ancient custom allowed a barren wife like Sarai to choose one of her women servants as a surrogate through whom her husband could have a child to be the couple's heir. Sarai has an "Egyptian slave-girl" named Hagar whom Sarai gives to Abram "as a wife" (16:3). Hagar becomes pregnant and begins to "look with contempt" on Sarai. As Abram had earlier complained to God (15:2, 8), now Sarai complains to Abram about Hagar's lack of respect for her. Abram gives Sarai permission to do to Hagar as she wishes, and so Sarai "dealt harshly" with her. The verb "to oppress" or "deal harshly with" ('anah–16:6) is the same verb that is used for what the Egyptians will eventually do to the Israelites as slaves in Egypt (Gen 15:13; Exod 1:11–12). The story acknowledges, in effect, that God's people are capable of unjustly oppressing an Egyptian slave as the Egyptians will unjustly oppress the Israelite slaves. This is part of the mixed picture of the relationship of Israel's ancestors and other nations, at times positive and at other times less so.

Hagar the Egyptian runs away out of Canaan into the wilderness, as the Israelites will run away into the wilderness in their exodus out of Egypt (Exod 13:3). In this case, however, the angel of the Lord urges Hagar to return from her exodus into the wilderness back to Abram and Sarai. The divine command to return to an oppressive relationship is troubling. However, the Lord gives to Hagar a promise that she will have so many descendants "that they cannot be counted." It is the same promise that God had given to Abram (13:16; 15:5). The Lord promises that she will bear a son whom she will name "Ishmael" (Heb.: "God Hears") because "the LORD has given heed to your affliction" (16:11). Adherents of Islam trace their spiritual lineage back to Abraham through Hagar and Ishmael as the chosen people of their deity, Allah, based on their holy book, the Qur'an. Even though Israel's Scripture is different from the Qur'an in eventually tracing the promised line through Abraham and Sarah and their son Isaac, Gen 16 acknowledges that Israel's God has also made a covenant and similar promise to Hagar and Ishmael. Israel's Scripture affirms that God is at work among other peoples and nations apart from Israel, even though their story may appear only briefly on the pages of the Scripture.

Hagar responds to God's promise by naming the LORD "El-roi" (Heb.: "God Who Sees"). Remarkably, this is the one example in all of Scripture in which a human names God; in all other cases, it is God who reveals God's name to humans (e.g., Gen 17:1; Exod 3:13–15). Hagar thus affirms through her son's name (Ishmael, "God Hears") and through God's name (El-roi, "God Who Sees") that God has both seen and heard her suffering and responded graciously to her plight (16:13). This combination of God hearing the cries of the oppressed and seeing the suffering of the enslaved is repeated again when God "hears" and "sees" the suffering of the Israelite slaves in Egypt (Exod 2:23–25; 3:7). God is concerned for all who suffer, whether Israelite or non-Israelite. God immediately makes good on the promise as Hagar bears a son to an eighty-six year old Abram who names his son Ishmael, as God had commanded Hagar (16:15).

As Gen 17 begins, the Lord appears again to Abram when he is ninety-nine years old. It has been thirteen years since Hagar gave birth to Ishmael (16:16–Abram is eighty-six). Abram has apparently assumed for those thirteen years that Ishmael represents the fulfillment of the Lord's previous promises of a great nation and many descendants (12:3; 13:16; 15:5). Everything in the Hagar story in Gen 16 points to Ishmael as God's appointed child of promise for Abram. Although Abram and Sarai are the ones who conceive the plan to have a child through Hagar, it is God who insists that Hagar should return to Abram and Sarai in order that Ishmael will be raised as the son of Abram. God's own actions thus far suggest that Ishmael is the one Abram has been waiting for all along.

The Lord appears to the ninety-nine-year-old patriarch and reveals a new divine name, "I am God Almighty" ('el shadday, 17:1). God also gives "Abram" (with the Heb. meaning of "Exalted Ancestor") a new name, "Abraham" (understood here to mean in Heb. "Ancestor of a Multitude")

(17:1, 5). The new names of "God Almighty" and "Abraham" mark this moment as an important transition point or milestone in God's relationship with Abraham. God confirms again the covenantal promise to Abraham that he would have a multitude of descendants (17:2) and then adds a new element. In 12:2, God had promised Abram that God would make of him "a great nation" (singular). Here in 17:3–7, God promises Abram for the first time that he will be the ancestor of not just one nation but "a multitude of nations." He will be the father of the wilderness nation of the Ishmaelites through Ishmael (25:12–18), the father of the Israelites through Isaac and Jacob, the father of the Midianites through his second wife Keturah (25:1–6), and the father of the Edomites through his grandson Esau (36:1–43).

God also confirms the promise of the land to Abraham and adds to it a new element involving time; God's covenant shall be an "everlasting covenant," and the land will be a "perpetual holding" (17:8). The covenant with Noah and all living creatures in Gen 9:16 was also an "everlasting covenant" as was God's covenant with King David and his dynasty (2 Sam 23:5; Isa 55:3). Alongside the promises of descendants, nations, and the land, God also promises an enduring relationship with Abraham and his family: "I will be their God" (17:8).

God introduces a new sign of this everlasting covenant with Abraham. As the rainbow was a physical sign of the "everlasting covenant" with all creatures after the flood (Gen 9:12–17), so circumcision or the cutting off of the foreskin of the penis will be the physical sign upon the body of every male that they are part of the covenant people of God (17:9–14). Slaves and foreigners who live with Abraham's family also needed to be circumcised. The ritual of circumcisions was practiced by some of Israel's neighbors where it could function (e.g., Egypt) as a puberty rite (cf. Exod 4:24–26). Here circumcision involves a rite of initiation, intended for eight-day-old babies or new adult members of the community (17:12, 23–27). Jews and Muslims continue to practice the ritual of circumcision. Jews normally perform the ritual on eight-day-old babies. Muslims circumcise thirteen-year-old boys because Ishmael was circumcised at that age (17:25). The role of circumcision may be compared with the practice of baptism as an initiatory rite within Christian communities (Col 2:11–12).

God has one more surprise for Abraham. His wife "Sarai" also receives a new name, "Sarah," to signal God's initiative to provide Abraham a son through her. She will become the mother of "nations" and "kings" (17:15–16). The elderly Abraham falls on his face and "he laughs" as he thinks to himself about a man who is a hundred and a wife who is ninety having a baby together. The Hebrew verb "he laughs" (yitskhaq) is a word play on the name "Isaac" (yits'aq), the eventual name of Sarah's newborn son (17:17, 19; 18:12–15; 21:6–7). Abraham begs God to continue to consider his thirteen-year-old son Ishmael, the son of Hagar, as the primary child of the "everlasting covenant" rather than to transfer the promise to what seems an unlikely outcome, that Abraham and Sarah will have another son at their extremely advanced age. God says "no" to Abraham, insisting that Sarah will indeed have a son who will be named Isaac and who will become the child of the "everlasting covenant" (17:18–19). God reassures the disappointed Abraham that God will richly "bless" Ishmael, make him "exceedingly numerous" and "a great nation," all elements of the promise made originally to Abraham (Gen 12:1–3; 13:16; 15:5). Nonetheless, Ishmael is not given the promise of the land of Canaan and the promise of an "everlasting covenant." Ishmael will become a wilderness dweller (21:20–21). The line of promise and "everlasting covenant" will be established through Sarah with Isaac alone (17:21).

God's choosing of Isaac over Ishmael is the first instance of what will be a recurring theme in the stories of Abraham's descendants: the supplanting of the elder brother through the exalting and favoring of the younger brother (see 25:29–34; 27:30–40; 37:1–11; 48:8–22). In ancient traditional cultures, the eldest son was often the favored one who received the greatest inheritance and carried the greatest authority. God seems to work throughout Genesis in ways contrary to these human expectations, repeatedly choosing the unlikely person as the chosen agent of God's blessing and saving activity. Throughout their history, Israel as a people often saw themselves in this way. The Israelites were the weaker, younger, or more unlikely candidate among the nations, and yet they were God's favored and chosen people as opposed to the seemingly stronger empires, older cultures, and more exalted civilizations of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, and Persia. Ancient Israel believed itself to be God's specially chosen and favored nation (Exod 19:6), even though it was "the fewest of all peoples" (Deut 7:7). Throughout Scripture, God often seems to favor and choose the younger, weaker, or more unlikely ones to be leaders or agents of God's work in the world (Exod 3:9–12; Judg 6:14–16; 1 Sam 2:1–10; 1 Sam 9:15–17, 21; 1 Sam 16:1–13; Jer 1:4–10; 1 Cor 1:26–31).

18:1–19:38. God's Promise Repeated, God's Justice Demonstrated. The Lord appears to Abraham and Sarah at "the oaks of Mamre," a tree shrine and holy place at Hebron where they reside as aliens in the land. It is also the place where Abraham and Sarah will eventually be buried (23:19; 25:9) along with their son Isaac (35:27), and their grandson Jacob (50:13). Abraham sees "three men" standing near him, and he invites them to stop, rest, and wait for "a little water" and "a little bread." The "bread and water" turns into a lavish four-course gourmet feast of tender meat, cakes of flour, curds, and milk for the three visitors who have not yet been identified (18:6–8). Abraham and Sarah welcome these strangers with lavish hospitality (cf. Heb 13:2).

As they eat, one of the three men tells Abraham that when he returns, Sarah will have a son. Sarah overhears the comment from within the tent and "laughs" to herself at the thought of her giving birth at her age, just as Abraham had done when he fell down and laughed when God told him that his elderly wife Sarah would give birth to a son (17:17). Suddenly the text discloses that it is "the LORD" (as one among the three men) who asks Abraham why Sarah laughed. Sarah denies having laughed at what seemed to her an impossible dream, not wanting to provoke God's anger (18:15). The Lord concludes, one might imagine with a good chuckle in the context of this lavish feast, "Oh yes, you did laugh" (18:15). The whole scene is based on the word play between the name of the newborn which will be "Isaac" (yitskhaq–17:19) and the Hebrew verb, "she laughed" (titskhaq–18:12).

The narrative mood quickly turns from lighthearted feasting to somber contemplation of a future death and judgment on the sinful cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. The "three men" set out toward Sodom along with Abraham, who shows them the way (18:16). Somehow the Lord is identical with or somehow associated with the "three men." The Lord reports to Abraham that "the outcry" of suffering from Sodom and Gomorrah has been "great," and so the Lord must "go down" and see if the situation is as grave as it sounds (18:20–21). The "outcry" that stirs God's response is reminiscent of the cry of Abel blood from the ground (4:10) or Hagar's cry of affliction (16:11). God's "going down" to investigate Sodom and Gomorrah reminds the reader of the tower of Babel story when God "came down" to investigate human wrongdoing (11:5).

The "men" turn and go toward Sodom, but "the LORD" remains with Abraham and engages in an extended philosophical discussion about God and justice. Would God forgive the wicked people of Sodom and not destroy the city if God could find a remnant of righteous people among them? "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do what is just?" Abraham asks (18:23–25). God's response is that if there are fifty righteous people, God would forgive the whole city. The principle is established: the righteousness of a few can redeem the whole.

Abraham's probing questions uncover what seems to be God's operative assumption in choosing the one family of Abraham and Sarah to be God's righteous and chosen people in order to bless and redeem "all the families of the earth" (12:3). A remnant of a few righteous people can redeem the whole. But how far can this be pushed? If there were only forty-five, would God still forgive? Yes! How about forty? Yes! Thirty-five? Yes! Thirty? Twenty? Ten? Yes, yes, yes! God would forgive the whole if only ten righteous people could be found (18:23–33). Abraham is engaging in persistent ancient Near Eastern bargaining with God (see 23:1–20). God appears open to being pushed and persuaded toward mercy and forgiveness, especially by the prayers and advocacy of the righteous on behalf of others who are outside the community. This divine readiness to hear and consider the pleas for mercy and deliverance stands behind the long and rich Jewish and Christian traditions of intercessory prayer on behalf of others in need. Abraham is fulfilling his role as an agent of blessing and advocacy on behalf of "the families of the earth" (12:3).

There are limits, however. Ten righteous people must be found in Sodom in order to save the city. God is gracious and merciful, forgiving and slow to anger, but God also does not simply "clear the guilty" without some consequences for their sin (Exod 34:6–7) or, as here in Gen 18, without some few righteous ones who will redeem the whole. Unfortunately, God will not be able to find ten righteous people in Sodom, and so the destruction of the city will eventually go forward (19:24–25).

The "three men" who visited Abraham and Sarah (18:2) and somehow included "the LORD" (18:1, 13) could also be distinguished from "the LORD" (18:22). Thus, the "three men" become "two angels" in 19:1. The "men" enter the city gate of Sodom, and Lot (the nephew of Abraham) offers them gracious hospitality, including a lavish feast (19:1–3; see 18:2–8). The obligation to extend generous hospitality to vulnerable strangers is deeply rooted in Israelite law (Exod 22:21; 23:9; Lev 19:33; 23:22; Deut 10:19; 24:17–21) and in ancient Near Eastern custom more generally.

The tranquil scene of generosity and kindness is suddenly interrupted by an angry mob of the citizens in Sodom, "all the people to the last man" who surround Lot's house with the two visitors inside. The men demand that Lot send the two men (angels) out to them so that "we may know them." The phrase is a euphemism for sexual intercourse and signals their intention to commit the violent act of male rape, a technique of humiliation and torture of vulnerable people (both men and women) common even today in contexts of prisons or war. (See Judg 5:28–30.) The wickedness of Sodom here is not homosexuality. Sodom's sin is the lack of hospitality and the threatened violence by heterosexual men against vulnerable people in the community, those the community considers "aliens" and "strangers" in their midst.

The two men or angels intervene to rescue Lot and his family from the enraged throng. The angels strike everyone outside the house with a disabling blindness, allowing Lot's immediate family to escape and leave the city (19:10–23). Then the Lord rains down "sulfur and fire" upon the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah and all the surrounding territory. Lot's wife famously looks back as the destruction occurs and turns into "a pillar of salt" (19:24–26), likely reflecting a tradition about the origins of a crystalline formation in the region. The area associated with Sodom and Gomorrah is located southeast of the Dead Sea and remains to this day an arid desert with extensive sulfur and other mineral deposits.

The story of Lot concludes with an unflattering tale of drunkenness and incest in which the two daughters of Lot lie with their father, become pregnant and bear two sons, Moab and Ben-ammi. The two sons become the ancestors of the nations of Moab and Ammon, which lie on the eastern border of Israel in the Transjordan area (19:30–38). Israel's relationship with its neighbors Moab and Ammon was mixed over its history. Although a few positive or charitable texts concerning Moab and Ammon appear in Deut 2:9, 18 and Ruth 1–4, negative or hostile views of Moab and Ammon predominate in the Old Testament (Num 25:1–5; Deut 23:3; Judg 3:12–13; Judg 11:4; 1 Sam 11–12; 2 Sam 8; 10; 2 Kgs 3; 2 Kgs 24:2; Isa 15:1–16:13; Jer 48:1–49:6; Ezek 25:2–9; Amos 1:13–2:3; Zeph 2:8–9). This story about the origins of Ammon and Moab reflects this more negative view and also echoes the enigmatic tale at the end of the story of Noah and the flood, which includes a number of similarities to the Sodom and Gomorrah story (Gen 6–9; see 9:18–27).

20:1–18. Abraham and Sarah in Canaan: The Second Wife-Sister Story. As the reader comes to Gen 20, Sarah is scheduled to become pregnant with her son, Isaac, very soon in accord with God's promises (17:15–16; 18:10). Thus, Abraham's willingness to expose his wife Sarah to another man's sexual advances (the Canaanite king Abimelech) in this second episode of the wife-sister story (see 12:10–20) is an even more problematic and serious lapse in judgment because so much is at stake. As Abraham had feared, King Abimelech takes Sarah into his household. God quickly intervenes through a dream and warns the Canaanite ruler Abimelech that he is about to die because he has taken a married woman into his harem. Abraham has endangered not only his wife Sarah but also the Canaanite Abimelech. Once again, Abraham's record in being a blessing to others (12:3) is mixed, sometimes good and sometimes not. The narrator assures the reader that "Abimelech had not approached" Sarah. Thus, there is no possibility that Abimelech could be the father of Sarah's imminent pregnancy (20:4; see 21:1).

Abimelech confronts Abraham the next morning, and Abraham offers a weak defense of his actions. He argues that he was afraid there was "no fear of God at all in this place," but Abimelech's actions demonstrate more integrity and fear of God in his obedience than does Abraham. Abraham adds that, technically, Sarah is his halfsister so he was not entirely deceptive in saying Sarah was his sister (20:12). Telling this halftruth, however, had endangered the wellbeing of both Abimelech and Sarah.

21:1–21. The Arrival of Isaac and the Sending Away of Hagar-Ishmael. The story of Abraham and Sarah builds to a climax with the hope and expectation of the birth of a son to Sarah. That hope began with God's promises to Abraham that he would be the father of a "great nation" (12:2) and innumerable descendants (13:16, 15:5). Later, God promised that the formerly barren Sarah would become the mother of the one promised child of the "everlasting covenant" (17:15–22; 18:10, 14). Now after much waiting and many obstacles, a one-hundred-year-old Abraham and a ninety-year-old Sarah become parents of their promised son, Isaac (21:1–5). Sarah affirms that God has brought "laughter" to her in her old age and everyone who hears this story will "laugh" with her (21:6; cf. 17:17; 18:12). The references to "laughing" are puns on the name Isaac, which means "he laughs" (yitz'aq).

During a feast celebrating the weaning of young Isaac around the age of three, Sarah sees the teenage "son of Hagar the Egyptian," named Ishmael, "playing" with her three-year-old son Isaac. Sarah reacts by wishing to cast Ishmael and Hagar out of their household. The verb "playing" (metza'eq) is another word play on the name Isaac (yitz'aq). The verb can mean "laugh," "play" or "mock/insult." Thus, one could read this scene in two quite different ways. Sarah might have seen the teenage Ishmael playing by himself or in a kindly way with his young brother, but Sarah was spiteful and jealous of this other son of Abraham and his mother Hagar. On the other hand, if the teenage Ishmael were "mocking" or "insulting" the three-year-old Isaac, then Sarah's anger would be more justifiable as protecting little Isaac from a potentially abusive older brother.

Abraham is "greatly distressed" by Sarah's request to cast out Hagar and Ishmael since he remains attached to his firstborn son. God, however, instructs Abraham to do as Sarah wishes, and God reassures Abraham that Isaac will have many offspring and that God will also make a nation of Ishmael (21:13). Abraham rises "early in the morning" to send away his son Ishmael (21:14); Abraham will do the same once again in Gen 22 when God commands him to give up his only remaining son, Isaac (22:3). Abraham gives Hagar and Ishmael bread and a skin of water and sends them into the wilderness where they soon exhaust their supply of water. Hagar leaves her son, Ishmael, under a bush and goes away to cry and lament over her dying child (21:15–16). God "hears the voice of the boy" who apparently was also crying in thirst and pain, and assures the mother Hagar that God has heard and God will make "a great nation" of Ishmael, just as God had earlier promised to Abraham (12:3) and to her (16:10). Moreover, God "opened the eyes" of Hagar, enabling her to see a well of water that provided life-giving water to them. God continued to be "with the boy," giving blessing and protection as he grew up and "lived in the wilderness" (21:20–21). The story of Hagar and Ishmael continues off the pages of Scripture as the book of Genesis will concentrate from this point forward on the story of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and their descendants. However, Hagar and Ishmael will not be forgotten and will continue as part of God's often hidden story of interaction with all humanity and all creation.

21:22–34. Abraham Reconciles with the Canaanite King Abimelech. Abraham encounters the Canaanite ruler Abimelech a second time (see 20:1–18) and enters into a covenant of peace with him, agreeing not to "deal falsely" but loyally with Abimelech and his descendants (21:22–24). Abimelech again demonstrates that he fears God, affirming that he knows that Abraham's "God is with you in all that you do" (21:22). Sometime later, Abraham has a dispute with Abimelech's servants over a well that Abraham had dug but that had been seized by Abimelech's servants. The dispute is resolved between Abraham and Abimelech, offering an example of negotiated reconciliation rather than conflict and violence.

22:1–24. God Commands Abraham to Sacrifice His Son Isaac. Few stories in the Bible are as haunting, distressing, and challenging as this story of Abraham's near-sacrifice of Isaac. The phrase, "after these things," comes at the beginning and end of Gen 22 (vv. 1, 20) and occurs only one other place in Genesis at the beginning of ch. 15 (v. 1). Gen 15 and Gen 22 are linked by this phrase and by the dramatic content that the two chapters share in relating the willingness of one party to lay their whole future on the line in fulfilling the covenant relationship with another party. In Gen 15, it is God who lays God's future on the line for the sake of the promise to Abraham (see the commentary there). In Gen 22, it will be Abraham who will be asked to lay his future on the line in the form of his one remaining son, Isaac.

The narrator begins the story by informing the reader (but not Abraham) that God is "testing" Abraham (22:1). Abraham's trust in God's protection and faithfulness in fulfilling the promises of God has wavered from time to time in the past, most recently in 20:1–18. God commands Abraham to take his only remaining son, Isaac, whom he loves and go to the land of Moriah and "offer him there as a burnt offering" on one of its mountains (22:2). Later in the Old Testament, this "Moriah" is associated with Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple with its sacrifices there (2 Chron 3:1). As Abraham, Isaac, and the servants approach the mountain on the third day of the journey to Moriah, Abraham looks up and "sees the place far away" (22:4). This is the first instance of a series of references to "seeing" throughout the story, the word acting as a keyword in the narrative. Abraham instructs the servants to remain back with the donkey while Abraham and Isaac go up to worship. Abraham reassures the servants that "we will come back to you" (22:5). The story is told in such a way that we do not know what Abraham is actually thinking as he utters these words. Does he believe that he and Isaac will indeed "come back," believing that God would not allow him actually to carry out the sacrifice? Or does Abraham simply not want to frighten Isaac or the servants by telling them what is truly supposed to happen, that is, Isaac will be offered up as a sacrifice and only Abraham will "come back"? The story does not tell the reader what is in Abraham's mind.

Ironically, Abraham gives Isaac the wood to carry, but Abraham himself takes the dangerous implements of the torch and the knife lest Isaac be harmed in any way. Then the narrative reports for the first time what it will repeat again in v. 8: "the two of them walked on together" (22:6). Isaac asks a challenging question as they walk up toward the place of sacrifice. They have the fire and the wood, "but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" Abraham responds, "God himself will provide the lamb for a burnt offering, my son" (22:8). The Hebrew for the verb "provide" plays on the verb "to see"; in effect, Abraham responds that God will "provide/see to" the lamb for the sacrifice. Again, the reader does not know for sure what Abraham is thinking. Does Abraham believe God will indeed provide a substitute animal to replace his son as the sacrifice? Or is Abraham thinking that God has already "seen to" the lamb, and that lamb is Isaac, although Abraham is reluctant to reveal that horrific news to his son? In any case, the narrative repeats again the phrase, "the two of them walked together" (22:8). Abraham and Isaac are joined together as one, parent and child, walking together and exchanging terms of endearment — "father," "my son" (22:7–8). The life and future of one is bound up together with the other.

The narrative's action slows to a crawl as the story reaches its climax. Abraham builds the altar, stacks the wood, and then "binds" (ya'aqodh) Isaac and lays him on the altar (22:9). In Jewish tradition, this story is called the "Binding of Isaac" or simply the "Binding" (the Akedah). Among many elements that are left unspecified in this story is the age of Isaac. We know Isaac is old enough to speak, to carry wood, and to know that sacrifices require animals. But is he very young so that the elderly Abraham could still have the strength to bind the boy if he were to resist? Or is Isaac a young adult, strong and mature, who must have willingly gone through with the sacrifice, since the older Abraham could not overpower him if he struggled and tried to escape? Some early Jewish and Christian post-biblical interpretations assumed that Isaac was older and thus was a willing victim or martyr. In its present form, however, Gen 22 is focused on Abraham and the "testing" of Abraham's faith and obedience, even in the face of a commanded action that seems to contradict all the promises and plans of God.

As Abraham raises the knife to kill his son, an "angel of the LORD" calls out from heaven, "Abraham! Abraham!" At the beginning of the story, God had called Abraham's name once (22:1), but now at this urgent juncture Abraham hears his name twice (22:11). The angel instructs Abraham not to harm the boy because "now I know that you fear God" (22:12). God has apparently gained new knowledge about Abraham: Abraham fears God, trusts in God's promises, and obeys God's voice, even to the extraordinary extent of being willing to sacrifice his only remaining son, his one remaining link to his ongoing life and future through his descendants. Abraham next raises his eyes and "sees" a ram caught in a bush by its horns, which Abraham retrieves and offers as a sacrifice instead of his son. Abraham names the place "The LORD Will Provide" or "The LORD Will See to It," a name that continues in a saying that "on the mount of the LORD it shall be provided/seen to" which can also be translated in Hebrew, "on the mount, the LORD will be seen" (22:14). The Hebrew verb "to see" (ra'ah) may also be related as a word play on the name "Moriah" (Heb.: moriyyah ; 22:2).

Gen 22:15–18 is likely an editorial addition to the story as the angel speaks "a second time." The angel's second speech explicitly links this dramatic story of Abraham's obedience to all of the Genesis promises of blessing (12:1–3) innumerable descendants (13:16; 15:5), and Abraham's vocation as an agent of blessing for all the nations of the earth (12:3): "Because you have done this . . . I will indeed bless you . . . because you have obeyed my voice" (22:16, 18). The theological emphasis in this second speech focuses on Abraham's obedience as an essential element in the blessings that God will give to Abraham and his descendants. The theological emphasis of the whole story in the larger narrative setting of the Abraham cycle as a whole emphasizes Abraham's trust that God will fulfill the promises that God has repeatedly made. Most important was God's promise to stake God's self and future on the line back in Gen 15:7–20 when God promised that God would be split in two like the animal carcasses that had been slaughtered if God did not fulfill the promises of land and descendants that God had made to Abraham. Abraham takes that memory and assurance with him as he obeys God's command to offer his own life and future back to God by sacrificing his only and beloved son in obedience to God's command.

23:1–20. Abraham Buys an Expensive Piece of the Promised Land. At the conclusion of Gen 22, God had reaffirmed the promises of many descendants to Abraham and Sarah. The story of Gen 23 focuses on the other major part of God's repeated promises, the promise that the land of Canaan would one day belong to Abraham's offspring (12:7; 13:14–17; 15:7–21; 17:8). Abraham's wife Sarah dies at the age of 127, and Abraham seeks to purchase a burial cave for her east of Mamre near Hebron. Abraham engages with the native "Hittites" in Canaan in a Near Eastern bargaining session that involves a show of what seems on the surface to be extreme generosity by the "Hittites" who offer Abraham the field with the "cave of Machpelah" as a free gift. Under the rules and custom of Near Eastern bargaining, Abraham must match their extravagant generosity by insisting that he will pay the very high price of 400 shekels for the land that the Hittites mention as the value of their "gift" of the field. Although an expensive purchase in the end, Abraham thereby obtains a small piece of Canaan to call his own in which to bury his wife Sarah. It is a small down payment on God's future gift of the land to his descendants. The cave of Machpelah will also become the burial place for Abraham (25:8–10), Isaac (35:27–29), Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah (49:29–31).

24:1–67. Isaac Obtains a Wife, Rebekah, from Family in Mesopotamia. A very elderly Abraham instructs his chief servant not to get a wife for his son Isaac from among the Canaanites but rather to go "to my country and to my kindred" in Mesopotamia and obtain a wife for Isaac there. Abraham still feels himself to be an alien in Canaan, and "home" remains in some sense still in Mesopotamia (24:4). At the same time, Abraham knows that God will one day give the land of Canaan to his descendants, so he does not want his son Isaac to migrate out of Canaan back to Mesopotamia (24:5–8). The servant travels to Mesopotamia and finds, by divine providence, a wife for Isaac named Rebekah. The servant also meets Rebekah's brother, Laban (24:29–32). It will be this same Laban, uncle to Jacob, who will prove to be equal to Jacob as a con artist and swindler (29:15–30; 31:1–9; see 25:29–34; 27:1–45). Rebekah's father and brother acknowledge that God has brought Abraham's servant to them and that Rebekah should become Isaac's wife (24:50–51). The marriage of the Mesopotamian Rebekah and Isaac back in Canaan (24:59–67) is a sign of a hybrid identity, with one foot still in Mesopotamia and the other in Canaan but not fully at home in either place.

25:1–18. Abraham's Death and the Descendants He Leaves Behind. After the death of Sarah (23:1–2), Abraham marries a second wife or "concubine" (25:1, 6) named Keturah and together they have several children, including Midian who is the ancestor of nomadic tribes called the Midianites who dwell east of Canaan (25:4, 6). It will be Midianite traders who rescue Joseph from a pit but then sell him as a slave to Ishmaelites who take him to Egypt (37:28). Later, Midianites will also welcome Moses into their family, and Moses will marry a Midianite wife (Exod 2:15–22). The Ishmaelites comprise twelve tribes, similar to the twelve tribes of Israel; they dwell in the deserts of Arabia (25:16–18).

Abraham dies at the age of 175. Ishmael joins his brother Isaac one last time to bury their father, Abraham, at the same cave of Machpelah where Isaac's mother, Sarah, was buried (25:9–10; 23:19). Isaac then settles at Beer-lahai-roi, the same place where the Lord had comforted and rescued

Ishmael's mother Hagar when she was pregnant (25:11; 16:14). The genealogies in Gen 25 list the descendants of Abraham from his two concubines, Keturah and Hagar. These descendants are all portrayed as the ancestors of nations and peoples that surrounded ancient Israel, thereby fulfilling God's earlier promise that Abraham would become the father of "a multitude of nations" (17:5).

B. The Family Stories of Isaac's Son, Jacob (25:19–36:43)

The Abraham cycle of stories (Gen 12–25) focused on God's faithfulness in keeping alive the promises of God to Abraham and Sarah in the face of difficult obstacles and near death (such as the barrenness of Sarah in 11:30 and God's command to Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac in Gen 22, respectively). The stories about Jacob in Gen 25–36 will also focus on God's blessing of Jacob in spite of conflict, suffering, and the threat of death. The intersections between Jacob and other nations will also remain as a theme as it was throughout the Abraham cycle (Laban in Mesopotamia, ch. 29–31; Esau as ancestor of Edom, 25:30; 36:1; and the people of Shechem, Gen 34).

25:19–34. The Twins Jacob and Esau: Birth and Rivalry. Isaac's wife, Rebekah, was barren as her mother-in-law, Sarah, had been (11:30), but Isaac prays for her and she becomes pregnant with twins. The two boys are already wrestling fiercely in Rebekah's womb when the Lord reveals to her that these two sons are "two nations" who "shall be divided," the one stronger than the other and "the elder shall serve the younger." Once again, the reader encounters the common Genesis theme of the selection and favoring of the younger sibling over the elder (see the commentary on 17:21). When the twins are born (25:24–26), the first son came out "red" ('admoni), which is a word play on "Edom" ('edom), the nation for which Esau is the ancestor (36:1). The elder Esau's body is "hairy" (se'ar), another word play; it identifies the region of "Seir" (se'ir), which is where Esau eventually will settle (36:8, 20). The younger twin brother came out, "gripping Esau's heel," in effect, hitching a free ride through the birth canal. The younger twin is thus called "Jacob," meaning in Hebrew "he grabs by the heel" or "he supplants." Jacob will gain a reputation for swindling and conning whatever he is able from his older brother Esau and supplanting Esau's privileged status as the eldest son, when Jacob steals his blessing and birthright.

Esau grows up to become a skillful hunter and outdoorsman whereas Jacob is a more "quiet" or domestic man, living in tents rather in the outdoors. The father, Isaac, loves Esau, while the mother, Rebekah, loves Jacob. The division in parental devotion has dysfunction written all over it. The conflict between Jacob and Esau begins early with Jacob at home cooking a red-colored stew. A hungry and weary Esau comes in from the field and demands from Jacob "some of that red stuff" ('adhom), another pun on "Edom" ('edhom), the other name for Esau and the nation he represents (36:1, 8). Sensing desperation in Esau's voice, Jacob strikes a deal and offers a bowl of the red stew in exchange for Esau's birthright as the eldest son. Esau agrees (25:29–34). Jacob is on his way to ensuring that "the elder shall serve the younger" (25:23).

26:1–33. Isaac and the Philistine King Abimelech: Echoes of Abraham. Several episodes involving father Isaac in Gen 26 echo and parallel events in the life of Isaac's father, Abraham. A famine forces Isaac and Rebekah to migrate to another area (26:1), just as a famine forced Abraham and Sarah to migrate to Egypt (12:10). God promises Isaac land and innumerable descendants (26:1–5, 24) as God had done to Abraham (12:1–3, 7; 15:5). Isaac builds an altar for worship (26:25) as Abraham had done (12:7–8; 13:18). Isaac passes his wife Rebekah off as his sister and comes into conflict with the local King Abimelech (26:6–11) as Abraham had done with Sarah with the same king Abimelech (20:1–18). The story puns on the name "Isaac" (yitskhaq—"he laughs") and the Hebrew verb used for Isaac "fondling" (metsakheq) his wife Rebekah (26:8), echoing numerous such word plays on the name "Isaac" and "laughter" in the Abraham cycle of stories (17:17; 18:12–15; 21:6, 9). Isaac digs wells and has disputes over the ownership of the wells (26:17–25) as Abraham also did (21:25–34). Isaac negotiates a covenant of reconciliation with Abimelech (26:26–31) in parallel with Abraham's covenant with the same Abimelech (21:22–24).

This long list of echoes and parallels across the two generations of Abraham and Isaac achieves the rhetorical effect of presenting a number of divinely guided patterns and recurring deep harmonies that are footprints of the same God who works from generation to generation in consistent but also surprising ways. The contemporary reader is thereby encouraged to discern and explore deeper patterns, analogies, and harmonies that may emerge as the Genesis ancestral stories are placed side by side with the rest of Scripture and the stories, events, and concerns of contemporary life, faith, and world.

26:34–28:9. Jacob Steals the Blessing of the Elder Esau and Flees. The story of Jacob and Rebekah's scheme to deceive the elderly, blind father Isaac and steal the blessing that rightfully belonged to the firstborn Esau is a well crafted tale of suspense. Rebekah disguises Jacob by putting on him the rustic-smelling garments of Esau and goat skins to simulate Esau's "hairy mantle" (27:15–16, 27; see 25:25, 27). While Esau had been sent out to hunt game for his father Isaac, Jacob brings Rebekah's specially prepared meat dish to Isaac instead, posing as his older brother Esau. After some close calls of being found out, Isaac in the end blesses Jacob, thinking that he is Esau. Part of the blessing is that "nations will bow down to you" and you will "be lord over your brothers" (27:29). The blessing fulfills the Lord's prediction to Rebekah while the twin boys were still in her womb: "the elder would serve the younger" (25:23). There is a synergy between God's predestined plans for Jacob, on one hand, and the human striving by Rebekah and Jacob to ensure Jacob's wellbeing, on the other. God's predestination does not exclude but works through human decisions and bold actions.

Esau returns and discovers that Jacob has stolen his blessing as the eldest son. An angry Esau resolves that "I will kill my brother Jacob" (27:41). The Jacob-Esau relationship is a replay in many ways of the Cain-Abel story—two brothers, different vocations, an experience of perceived injustice by the elder brother, envy and anger, and a plan to kill the younger brother (Gen 4:1–16). Rebekah intervenes and convinces Jacob that he must flee to Mesopotamia to avoid Esau's murderous plot under the guise of seeking a wife from kindred in Mesopotamia rather than from the native Canaanite women (27:41–28:5; see 26:34–35). One of the overarching questions of the Jacob cycle is whether or not God will be able to work with this family of Abrahamic descendants to bring a new ending to this brother-against-brother hatred that ended with murder in Gen 4. Will God achieve a new way of reconciliation within the family of Abraham?

28:10–22. God's Blessing of Jacob at Bethel. Two dramatic encounters with God bracket Jacob's leaving the land of Canaan on the way to Mesopotamia (28:10–22) and Jacob's return to the land of Canaan twenty years later (Gen 32:22–32). Jacob's first encounter with God involves God's generous blessing of Jacob, all promise and pure gift. The second encounter will involve wrestling and conflict with God and will end with a haggard Jacob defeated, limping, but also finally blessed.

On his way out of Canaan, Jacob stops to sleep at a certain spot and then begins to dream that there was "a ladder" or ramp set up between earth and heaven at that spot with "angels of God" moving up and down the ladder (28:10–13). Jacob has unknowingly stumbled on a portal between heaven and earth, a holy place not built by humans but revealed by God. Although the tower builders of Babel (Gen 11) had been unsuccessful in their human attempt to build a tower with "its top in the heavens" that would link earth and heaven (11:1–9), God here provides such a stairway in Jacob's dream. Dreams in the ancient world were important ways by which the divine communicated with human beings (20:3; 31:24; 37:6–9). As part of the dream, the Lord stands before Jacob and affirms that all the promises of the land of Canaan and of innumerable descendants that God gave to Abraham are now given to Jacob as the chosen carrier of the promised line. God promises Jacob that "I am with you" and "will bring you back to this land." God will not leave Jacob until God has done what God has promised (28:13–15). Jacob awakens and designates the spot as a holy place and names it "Bethel," meaning "house of God" (28:17, 19).

29:1–31:55. Jacob and Laban: Jacob Prospers in Mesopotamia. Jacob sets out on a journey to "the land of the people of the east," or Mesopotamia, both to escape his brother Esau (27:41) and to find a wife from among his kindred in Haran in Mesopotamia (27:46–28:5). Jacob comes to a well and "by coincidence" (or divine predestination) meets Rachel, the daughter of Laban who is Jacob's uncle and brother to Jacob's mother Rebekah. The scene at the well replays the finding of Isaac's wife at the well near Haran in the previous generation (24:1–67). The same theme of God's hidden providence and guidance of events animates the scene.

Laban has two daughters, the elder Leah and the younger Rachel. When Laban asks Jacob what his wages should be, Jacob offers to work seven years for the hand of Rachel in marriage (29:15–20). Jacob's favoring of Rachel over Leah (29:16–18) is yet another instance of the recurring Genesis motif of the younger being favored over the elder (Cain and Abel in 4:1–16, Ishmael and Isaac in 17:20–21, Esau and Jacob in 25:23–26, and Joseph and his brothers in 37:2–8). Rachel is described as "graceful and beautiful" (29:17). Leah is described as having eyes that were "lovely" in the NRSV translation. However the same Hebrew word may also be translated as "weak," so Leah's eyes may not necessarily have been "lovely" but weak and unattractive. Laban tricks Jacob into marrying Leah first after working seven years for Rachel. Jacob is then forced to work another seven years so he can also marry Rachel, the wife he wanted all along (29:21–29).

Jacob's love for Rachel, and not Leah, sets up the potential for another dysfunctional set of family relationships and conflicts, similar to the Sarah-Hagar rivalry (16:3–6; 21:9–11) and the competition between Jacob and Esau (25:27–28; 27:41; 28:6–9). Rachel and Leah and their respective slave girls engage in anguished competition over who will produce the most children for Jacob. Eventually eleven sons will be born with a twelfth son born later to Rachel in Gen 35. These twelve sons will become the ancestors of the twelve tribes of the people of Israel (Gen 46:8–27). The relative status of the mother of each son (Rachel favored over Leah, Rachel's maids favored over Leah's maids), likely reflects the relative status of the corresponding tribe at some point in Israel's history. Thus, the Joseph tribe was likely one of the more powerful tribes at some point since Joseph's mother, Rachel, was the favored primary wife of Jacob. Leah's sons and her maid's sons reflect tribes that were likely of lower status at another time. The name of each son carries with it some significance, typically expressing thanksgiving or delight at the birth.

The Lord compensates Leah as the "unloved" wife by giving her four sons: Reuben, Simeon, Levi and Judah. By doing so, Leah hopes that now "my husband will be joined to me" (29:31–35). Rachel, on the other hand, is barren, and, like the earlier Sarah, Rachel is envious of Leah and her children. In desperation and anger, she gives Jacob her slave-girl Bilhah, just as Sarah had given Hagar to Abraham in order to have a son and heir (16:1–6). After Bilhah gives her two sons, Rachel boasts that she has wrestled with her sister Leah and "prevailed"; God will later describe Jacob also as one who has wrestled with God and humans and "prevailed" (32:28).

Leah's maid Zilpah has two more children with Jacob, Then Leah barter away some mandrakes to Rachel for an opportunity for Leah to spend the night with Jacob. As the primary wife, Rachel has the first rights of sleeping with Jacob, so she trades that right to Leah for the mandrakes. Mandrakes were herbs that were thought to enhance fertility in women. Leah has two more sons with Jacob along with a daughter, Dinah (30:21), who will be featured in a later narrative in Gen 34. The mandrakes apparently work, because Rachel conceives and has her one son, Joseph. Rachel also attributes her release from barrenness to divine help (30:22–24). Rachel will eventually die in childbirth as she gives birth to her second son, Benjamin (35:16–21). Rachel's two sons, Joseph and Benjamin, will be Jacob's two youngest sons and also his most favored sons (37:3; 42:35–38).

Laban had earlier outsmarted Jacob in order to have Jacob work for him fourteen years in order to marry Rachel (29:15–30). Jacob returns the favor and outsmarts the deceptive Laban in an elaborate scheme of genetic engineering and selective breeding involving spotted and black sheep and goats (based in part on recessive genes for hair color being repressed in one generation and reappearing in another generation). Jacob builds up a large herd of strong sheep and goats and becomes "exceedingly rich" (30:25–33). Jacob's human actions and schemes to gain blessing and wealth join implicitly with the hidden working out of God's blessing activity, which God had promised to Jacob (28:13–15). Likewise, the strategies used by Leah and Rachel to have children through their maids or through bartering mandrakes were also ways by which human activity cooperated with God's guidance and work to achieve the blessing and fertility that God had promised. Trusting in God's promises and blessing does not entail passivity but requires persistent human activity and ingenuity alongside the divine guidance of events (see 31:10–12).

Jacob had first fled from Canaan to Haran in Mesopotamia to avoid the jealousy and conflict with his brother Esau (27:41–45). In Gen 31, Jacob flees from Mesopotamia back to Canaan to avoid the jealousy and conflict with Laban and his sons (31:1–2). Laban chases after Jacob, but they eventually work out a covenant of reconciliation (31:43–55). Their reconciliation mirrors the covenants of peace that Abraham (21:22–34) and Isaac (26:26–33) negotiated with the Canaanite Abimelech. The theme of conflict and reconciliation with foreigners as well as within the family of Abraham runs throughout Genesis 32:1–33:17. Jacob Wrestles with God and Reconciles with Esau. Jacob prepares to encounter his brother Esau as he returns from Mesopotamia to Canaan after being away for twenty years (31:38, 41). The last words that the reader has heard from Esau is that he planned to "kill my brother Jacob" (27:41). When Jacob left Canaan twenty years earlier, Jacob had negotiated a contract with God that God would ensure that Jacob could "come again to my father's house in peace" (28:21). That agreement is about to be put to the test. Jacob begins by sending messengers with extravagant gifts of livestock herds and servants ahead of him to give to Esau in order to find favor in Esau's eyes (32:5). The messengers return to Jacob, reporting that Esau is coming with an army of four hundred men to meet Jacob and his family. Jacob assumes Esau's intentions are hostile and so decides to divide his family and herds into two groups so that if Esau destroys one group, the other group may be able to escape (32:3–8). Jacob pleads for God's protection in fulfillment of the promises God had made earlier when Jacob had first left Canaan (28:13–15). Jacob combines his trust in God's protection with his own actions of sending herds upon herds of livestock designed to bribe Esau and soften his anticipated hostility (32:13–21). Again, trust in God's promises is combined with active human intervention on Jacob's part.

God had encountered Jacob in a dramatic way at Bethel twenty years earlier when Jacob was leaving Canaan (28:10–22). God had then been gracious and generous in offering promise and protection to Jacob. Now, as Jacob returns to Canaan, God encounters Jacob again in a dramatic encounter. However, this time God attacks Jacob in a wrestling match that leaves him wounded, limping, but blessed in the end. A mysterious "man" suddenly attacks Jacob at the crossing or "ford of the Jabbok" in an all-night wrestling match after Jacob has sent the rest of his entourage across the river (32:22–24). "The man" sees that he cannot "prevail" against Jacob, and so he touches Jacob's thigh and dislocates his hip, rendering him helpless. Although now defeated, Jacob will not let go his grip on the "man." Jacob demands a blessing from this "man," whom Jacob eventually realizes is actually "God" (32:26, 30).

Changes in names in Genesis signal major transitions and new blessings as in the change from Abram to Abraham (17:5) and Sarai to Sarah (17:15). The "man-God" who wrestles Jacob also blesses Jacob, giving him a new name, "Israel" (meaning in Hebrew, "the one who strives with God") because Jacob has "striven with God and humans" and has "prevailed" (32:28). Jacob's many conflicts and struggles with Esau, Laban, and Laban's sons are intertwined with Jacob's struggles with God. The change in name from Jacob to Israel is a sign that Jacob's life as an individual is also a metaphor for the whole people of Israel and their relationships to other peoples and nations.

The morning after the wrestling with God, Jacob looks up and sees Esau coming with his army of four hundred men. Jacob meets Esau, bowing down to the ground seven times in a sign of humility as he approaches Esau in an effort to save himself and his family from being killed by Esau and his men (33:1–3; see 27:41; 32:7–8, 11). Unexpectedly, Esau's reaction to seeing Jacob is to run and embrace him, kiss him, and then weep together with him (33:4). Jacob introduces his large family to Esau as a gift that "God has graciously given" to him (33:6). Esau asks the purpose of all the herds upon herds of livestock that Jacob had earlier sent ahead with messengers and tells Jacob that these gifts are not necessary, suggesting that Jacob ought to take the gifts back (33:8–9; see 32:3–5, 13–21).

Jacob insists that Esau accept this present or gift with these words to Esau, "Truly to see your face is like seeing the face of God." The encounter with Esau echoes in some way the prior encounter with God ("Peniel" in 32:30 means "Face of God"). Esau had been gracious in embracing and not killing Jacob and his family (33:10). God the wrestler had been gracious in blessing and not killing the weak and defeated Jacob. Now Jacob returns the favor by giving a gift without ulterior motive back to his brother Esau in gratitude for the graciousness that God and Esau have both shown him. The Hebrew word used to describe the "gift/blessing" (berakhah) that Jacob give to Esau (33:11) is the same Hebrew word for the "blessing" (berakhah) of the eldest son that Jacob had originally stolen from Esau twenty years before (Gen 27:35–36, 41).

On the one hand, the reconciliation of Jacob and Esau in Gen 33:4 is a glimpse of another way that enemy-brothers may resolve their mutual hatreds and jealousies, a hopeful alternative to the story of Cain and Abel. On the other hand, Genesis is also realistic. After the reconciliation, Esau suggests that their two family groups should journey together to his homeland of Seir or Edom and live together as one people. Jacob agrees but then promptly heads away from Edom and heads to Canaan, where he settles at Succoth (33:14–17). The welcome reconciliation of Jacob and Esau is tempered by Jacob's continued fear and felt need for some separation between him and his brother Esau.

33:18–34:31. Rape and Revenge: Jacob's Daughter Dinah. Jacob moves his family to the Canaanite city of Shechem and buys there a "plot of land" from "the sons of Hamor" on which to pitch his tent. One of the sons is named Shechem (33:18–20). Abraham had been the first of the ancestors to buy a plot of land in which to bury his wife Sarah (23:1–20). Jacob's purchase of the small plot means that he is the second ancestor who secures a small down payment on God's promise that one day the whole land would belong to his descendants. Jacob erects an altar to God as a theological claim on the land. In the meantime, however, Jacob remains an alien in the land of Canaan and without the protections of native citizenship.

The story of the rape of Jacob and Leah's daughter, Dinah, in Gen 34 wrestles with this alien status of Jacob and his family and how to respond to a violent attack against a member of the family when in a position of vulnerability as aliens in the land. Dinah is raped by Shechem, the son of Hamor and "prince of the region" (34:1–2). This act of violence against Dinah by Shechem incites the sons of Jacob to retaliate violently. Jacob's sons devise a scheme of weakening the males of Shechem and then killing all of them. The relationships between the ancestors of Israel and the Canaanites have been peaceful and positive up to this point in Genesis. Genesis 34 is the first example of violence between the two groups. The narrative is designed to raise a number of moral dilemmas that draw the reader into the story and the moral quandries it presents. Shechem rapes Dinah and then "loved the girl and spoke tenderly to her," seeking to marry her as his wife (34:3–4). Although he is prince of the region and could take Dinah as a wife without consulting them, Shechem generously and honorably offers to pay as high a marriage present to Jacob's family as they demand (34:11–12). Dinah's reactions or feelings are not presented, and thus the reader must consider the possibilities of what is best for Dinah in this case. As a victim of sexual assault by a foreigner, she will bear much shame within her own community and may have difficulty finding a husband. Thus, it is possible that her interests may best be served in this tragic situation by marrying Shechem. And yet Shechem raped her. Could Dinah feel anything but revulsion toward him?

The sons of Jacob deceptively agree to allow Shechem to marry their sister Dinah, but only on condition that every male in the city of Shechem be circumcised. (Circumcision, cutting off the foreskin of the penis, was a sign of belonging to God's covenant people [17:9–14].) Jacob's sons, however, use this religious ritual cynically as a ploy to weaken the males of the city so that they can go in and kill all the males in revenge for the rape of their sister (34:13–24). Two of Jacob's sons, Simeon and Levi, are full brothers of Dinah, with Leah as their mother (29:31–34; 30:21). They are the first to enter the city and kill all the males. Their motivation is focused on maintaining family honor (34:30–31).

The other sons of Jacob "plunder" the city, stealing all their wealth and capturing all their wives and children and making them "their prey" (34:27–29). Did this include raping the women of Shechem in revenge? The phrase made them "their prey" is ambiguous but troubling. These other brothers of Dinah seem more focused on their own self-interests rather than the interests of Dinah and her wellbeing. In 34:26, the reader is informed that Dinah has been staying in Shechem's house all along. Is she there because she wanted to be? Or was she being held by Shechem against her will? This is another of the unresolved issues in the narrative that preserve the complexity and moral ambiguity concerning the use of violence by the weak Israelites against the more powerful Canaanites.

In the end, Jacob focuses on the pragmatic and long-term effects of his son's violent actions. Jacob fears that their violence will endanger his family's welfare in future interactions with the Canaanites because Jacob's family is "few" in number and thus vulnerable (34:30). Simeon and Levi appeal to moral principle and the attack on the family's honor as justification for their act of violence without regard for the consequences. The story rightly ends with a question for the reader to ponder (34:31). Later, in his deathbed blessing of his twelve sons, Jacob will condemn Simeon and Levi for their violence by condemning them to being "scattered" within Israel. The scattering of Levi is an allusion to the Levites' lack of any tribal land of their own in Canaan and their presence in cities scattered among the other tribes (Num 18:23; Deut 10:9; Josh 14:3; 18:7). Simeon's "scattering" included its absorption into the tribe of Judah (Josh 19:9). God had earlier imposed the same punishment of being "scattered" upon the arrogant tower builders of Babel as a limit to the potential violence they might inflict if all the nations continued to join together as one imperial community (see commentary on 11:9).

35:1–29. Jacob's Return to Bethel: Birth and Death. Jacob engages in religious house cleaning and collects all the foreign gods and idols that his wives had taken from their father Laban (31:19, 30–35) and buries them under a tree near Shechem. Jacob and his family then travel to Bethel where he builds an altar and receives again God's promises of land and offspring (35:1–15). The episode seems to be an alternate and briefer version of a story set in Bethel (28:10–22).

Jacob's favored wife, Rachel, suffers through a difficult birth with her second son and then dies in childbirth. She names her son "Ben-oni," meaning "Son of My Sorrow" as she dies, but Jacob renames the son "Benjamin," meaning "Son of the Right Hand" (35:18). Sitting at the right hand of a patriarch or other authority indicates a favored position. Benjamin is one of two favored sons of Jacob, the other being Joseph. Both sons were born to Rachel, Jacob's favored wife (37:3; 42:35–38). Benjamin is favored, although he is the youngest of Jacob's twelve sons. This is another example of the favoring of the younger sibling over the eldest, a recurring theme in Genesis (4:1–16; 17:20–21; 25:23–26; 29:16–18; 37:2–8). Just as Sarah's death accompanied the purchase of a small part of the promised land of Canaan (23:1–20), so Rachel's death accompanies the addition of one more offspring in fulfillment of God's promise to Jacob of many offspring. Throughout Genesis, the partial fulfillment of the promises of God often happens in the context of struggle, conflict, difficulty, and even death.

After Rachel's death, the eldest of Jacob's twelve sons, Reuben, has illicit sexual relations with one of Jacob's concubines or secondary wives, Bilhah, who was also the maid of Rachel. "Israel [Jacob] heard of it" (35:22). In his deathbed blessing, Jacob will proclaim the demotion of his firstborn son, Reuben, because of this incident, yet another example of the Genesis motif of the demotion of the elder in favor of the younger (49:3–4). The recurring theme in Genesis affirms God's favor and election of the smaller and "younger" nation of Israel in relation to the greater and "older" civilizations of empires who rose and fell during the course of ancient Israel's history (Assyria, Babylon, Persia).

Jacob visits his elderly father, Isaac, in his last days. The last recorded encounter between Jacob and Isaac had occurred decades earlier when Jacob deceived his father in regard to Esau's blessing (27:35). Jacob and Esau come together as brothers to bury their father, Isaac (35:29), just as the brothers Isaac and Ishmael had come together to bury their father, Abraham (25:9).

36:1–43. The Family Line of Esau. The momentary reappearance of Esau in 35:29 becomes the occasion for the listing of Esau's extensive genealogy in Gen 36. Esau is the ancestor of the nation of Edom, a country that lies just to the east and south of Canaan (36:1). The land of Canaan will later become the nation of Israel, whose ancestor is Jacob (25:23, 30; 28:13). The long listing of Esau's descendants affirms both the partial fulfillment of divine promises to Abraham that he would be the father of "a multitude of nations" (17:4) and the inclusion of other nations like Edom in the broad horizon of God's concern to bless "all the families of the earth" (12:3). Ancient Israel's interactions with the nation of Edom during its history varied between positive relations at times (Deut 23:7; 2 Kgs 3:1–12) and hostile relations at others (Num 20:20; 2 Sam 8:13–14; 1 Kgs 11:14; Ps 137:7; Jer 49:7–22; Ezek 25:12–14).

C. The Family Stories of Jacob's Sons: Joseph and Judah (37:1–50:26)

The last cycle of stories in Genesis features Jacob's son, Joseph, who is one of two younger sons born to Jacob's favored wife, Rachel (30:22–24). Benjamin, the other son of Jacob and Rachel, is the youngest of Jacob's twelve sons and will also play a role in the story (35:16–20). Joseph as the favored son participates in the repeated theme in Genesis of the younger being favored over the elder (4:1–16; 17:20–21; 25:23–26; 29:16–18; 37:2–8; 48:1–22). Jacob's son, Judah, also plays a prominent role at certain points in chapters 37–50, reflecting the favored status of the tribe of Judah and the southern kingdom of Judah in much of ancient Israel's history. The overall theme of the Joseph story is God's faithful protection and guidance through experiences of great suffering as God works to preserve life and make good come out of evil (45:7; 50:29).

37:1–36. Joseph and His Brothers: Dreams and Schemes. The chapter opens with a superscription or title, "this is the story of the family of Jacob" (literally in Heb., "these are the generations of Jacob"). This is a formula that occurs six times throughout Genesis and marks the beginning of each major new section (2:4; 6:9; 10:1; 11:27; 25:19).

Jacob favors the younger Joseph and provides him alone with a special "long robe with sleeves," a public sign to the other brothers that Joseph was their father's favorite. As a result, the brothers "hated" Joseph (37:4). Sibling conflict and jealousy and the violence that threatens to erupt as a result is a key theme that weaves its way in and out of the chapters of Genesis (4:4–8, 23–24; 16:3–6; 19:4–9; 27:41; 31:1–2; 32:11; 34:25–31; 37:4, 18–20). Joseph adds to the brothers' jealousy and hatred by reporting to them two dreams that imply that all of Joseph's brothers and even his parents will one day bow down before him (37:5–11). Joseph's dreams are literally fulfilled later in the story (42:6; 43:26, 28). Three dream sequences are central to the Joseph story, each sequence containing two paired dreams that reinforce their authenticity as divinely inspired and reliable predictions of the future (37:5–11; 40:5–23; 41:1–36; see 41:32).

Joseph's brothers initially conspire to kill Joseph (37:18–20) but throw him into a pit instead. In the process, the brothers strip Joseph of his special robe with long sleeves (37:23–24). Clothing will mark major transitions throughout Joseph's life (39:12, 15–18; 41:14, 42); here it marks the transition from favored son to a slave (37:23–24). The brothers decide to sell Joseph as a slave to a passing caravan that takes him to Egypt. There he becomes a slave to an Egyptian captain of the guard named Potiphar (37:36). The brothers dip Joseph's robe in the blood of a goat and bring it to their father, Jacob, who is devastated by grief and assumes a wild animal has killed Joseph (37:31–35).

38:1–30. Judah and Tamar: Deception, Death, and New Life. The story of Judah and Tamar in Gen 38 interrupts the Joseph narrative of Gen 37–50. Joseph plays no role as a character; Gen 38 may thus represent a secondary addition to the larger Joseph story. However, a number of motifs and images do intersect with the surrounding chapters of the Joseph story: a goat (37:31 and 38:17, 20), the use of clothing as a source of deception and recognition (37:31–33 and 38:13–17, 26), and a woman luring a man into a sexual relationship (38:14–18 and 39:7–18). On a deeper thematic level, both the Judah-Tamar and the Joseph stories affirm God's guidance and providence through often unusual, irregular, or unexpected means.

The Judah-Tamar story begins with Judah having three sons—Er, Onan, and Shelah. Tamar is married to Er, and Er dies childless. Under such circumstances in ancient Israel, the next oldest brother-in-law (Onan) has an obligation to have sexual relations with the wife of the deceased brother in order to produce a child heir for the deceased brother (see Deut 25:5–10). Onan fails to live up to his obligation, and he also dies. Judah is afraid to allow Shelah to lie with Tamar, fearing the loss of a third son. Tamar takes matters into her own hand, dressing up as a prostitute, having sexual relations with Judah, and becoming pregnant. In the end, Judah must acknowledge his own guilt and negligence and Tamar's righteousness in doing what she did (38:24–26). Tamar gives birth to twins; the younger of the two boys becomes the ancestor of King David and his divinely chosen royal line (38:27–30; see Ruth 4:18–22; 2 Sam 7). Once again, contrary to expectations, the younger is favored over the elder.

39:1–23. Joseph and Potiphar's Wife. Potiphar's wife seeks to lie with the "handsome" Joseph, but Joseph refuses because to do so would betray both his master Potiphar and God (39:8–9). During one attempt at seduction, Potiphar's wife grabs Joseph's "garment" and uses it against Joseph as evidence to her husband that Joseph had tried to sexually molest her (39:10–18). Potiphar is enraged and has Joseph thrown into prison where Joseph rises again as second in command next to the chief jailer, by God's guidance (39:19–23).

40:1–23. Joseph and the Two Dreams of the Prisoners. This scene involves the second of the Joseph story's three dream sequences (37:5–11; 40:5–23; 41:1–36). Joseph interprets a pair of dreams, one for the cupbearer of Pharaoh and the other for Pharaoh's baker. Joseph has shifted his role from being the dreamer (37:5–11) to being the interpreter of someone else's dreams. (40:5–23). The two interpretations that Joseph offers concerning the dreams of the cupbearer and the baker begin with an identical phrase: "Pharaoh will lift up your head" (40:12–13; 40:18–19). However, the implication of the phrase for the two individuals is totally different. For the cupbearer, the phrase means that Pharaoh will exalt the cupbearer and restore him to his former position. For the baker, the phrase means that Pharaoh will lift up his head in a public execution by hanging. The cupbearer will be the one who will eventually tell Pharaoh about Joseph's abilities as a dream interpreter.

41:1–57. Joseph and the Two Dreams of Pharaoh. Two years pass, and Pharaoh has a set of two dreams (the third of three dream sequences in the Joseph narrative). Pharaoh dreams of seven "sleek and fat cows" that come out of the Nile River who are then eaten up by seven "ugly and thin cows" (41:1–4). In a second dream, Pharaoh sees seven plump ears of grain swallowed up by seven thin and blighted ears of grain (41:5–7). None of Pharaoh's magicians or wise men could interpret the dreams, but the cupbearer recalls Joseph as an able dream interpreter from his time in prison. Joseph is called out of prison, and his clothes are changed. As before, clothing signals a change of fortune for Joseph (37:23; 39:12; 41:42).

According to Joseph, the dreams predict seven years of plentiful harvests followed by seven years of severe drought and famine. The dreams are doubled, indicating that "the thing is fixed by God" and will shortly occur (41:28–32). Pharaoh chooses Joseph to oversee a national food storage and distribution program and exalts him as second-in-command to Pharaoh himself. Again, a change of clothing marks the transition to Joseph's new status (41:37–44). Pharaoh gives Joseph an Egyptian wife, Asenath, and Joseph has two sons, the firstborn Manasseh and second born Ephraim. Their names signify that God has made Joseph forget his misfortunes and that God has made Joseph "fruitful in the land of my misfortunes" (41:50–52). A worldwide famine sets in for seven years, just as Joseph had predicted and "all the world came to Joseph in Egypt to buy grain" (41:57). Joseph's distribution of food to starving nations becomes a concrete way in which God's promise that Abraham's descendants would be "a blessing to all the families of the earth" comes to fulfillment (12:3).

42:1–43:34. Joseph and His Brothers: Two Encounters in Egypt. The father Jacob sends ten of his remaining sons down to Egypt to buy food because of the famine. Jacob keeps only his youngest and favored son, Benjamin, home in Canaan. Joseph recognizes his brothers when they arrive in Egypt, but they do not recognize Joseph. The brothers bow before Joseph, unwittingly fulfilling the predictive dream that Joseph shared with them as a seventeen-year-old (37:5–11). Joseph accuses his brothers of being spies as a pretext to demand that they bring their youngest brother, Benjamin (Joseph's only other full brother born to Joseph's mother Rachel—30:22–24; 35:16–20), to Egypt. Joseph keeps one of his brothers, Simeon, in Egypt as a guarantee that the other brothers will return with young Benjamin.

The brothers return to Canaan and report to their father, Jacob, that they must bring Benjamin back with them to Egypt in order to retrieve Simeon, who remains there, and in order to buy more grain. Jacob initially refuses but then relents and allows his favored son Benjamin to go with his brothers to Egypt. When the brothers arrive in Egypt, Joseph sees his beloved brother Benjamin and is overcome with emotion (43:29–31) as he sets out a feast for his brothers. Although the oldest and firstborn of the brothers would be most honored, Joseph ensures that Benjamin, the youngest of the brothers, receives preferential treatment—five times the food and drink of the other brothers (43:33–34). Once again, the younger is favored over the elder, a prevalent theme throughout Genesis (4:1–16; 17:20–21; 25:23–26; 29:16–18; 37:2–8). Joseph also restores Simeon to his brothers (43:23).

44:1–34. The Test: Judah Offers Himself as a Substitute for Benjamin. Joseph sends the brothers on their way back to Canaan, but he has his steward secretly plant Joseph's special silver cup in Benjamin's grain sack. When the brothers have gone some distance, the steward catches up with them and declares that the brother with whom the cup is found shall become a slave and the rest of the brothers may go free. The search reveals that the silver cup is hidden in Benjamin's sack (44:1–13). The brothers return to Joseph. Judah then steps forward, explains how dear Benjamin is to his father, and offers himself as a substitute to remain in Egypt as a slave instead of Benjamin. Judah offers up his own life to preserve Benjamin's freedom and to save the life of his father ("when [my father] sees that the boy is not with us, he will die," 44:31).

Judah's offer to substitute himself as a slave instead of Benjamin redeems his earlier role in selling Joseph as a slave to the Ishmaelites (37:26–28). Judah's willingness to make the ultimate sacrifice and offer his life for Benjamin's freedom in obedience to the agreement he made with his father, Jacob (43:8–10), recalls another episode when Abraham was tested and offered up his life and future in the form of his son Isaac in obedience to God (22:1–19).

45:1–28. Joseph Reveals Himself to His Brothers. When Joseph hears Judah's offer of himself to save Benjamin, Joseph reveals his true identity to his brothers for the first time and weeps uncontrollably as his pent-up emotion is released. The brothers are dismayed, afraid of what the powerful Joseph will do to them. But Joseph reassures them that it was not they who sent him to Egypt, but it was God who "sent me before you to preserve for you a remnant on earth" (45:7). As God had chosen Noah and his family to preserve a remnant on earth in the great worldwide flood (Gen 6–9), so God chose Joseph to preserve life and a remnant in the great worldwide famine (45:4–8).

Joseph invites his brothers to go back to Canaan and retrieve their father, Jacob, so that they can all return to Egypt and live in the land of Goshen: "the best of all the land of Egypt is yours" (45:20). Goshen provided lush grassland in the delta region of the Nile River in northeast Egypt, ideal for grazing livestock (47:1–6).

46:1–47:31. Jacob and His Sons Join Joseph in Egypt. As Jacob sets out with his sons to leave Canaan behind and to journey to Egypt, God speaks to Jacob in a vision or dream at night and assures Jacob that God "will go down with you to Egypt" and God "will also bring you up again" (46:1–4). God had made those same assurances earlier in Jacob's life in another nighttime vision or dream at Bethel when Jacob was on his way out of Canaan to live with his uncle Laban in Mesopotamia (28:15). Jacob will go to Egypt and live there for some time, but Jacob will be brought back to Canaan only after he dies in Egypt. Joseph and his brothers will return their father's body and bury him in the cave of Machpelah, the burial site that Abraham purchased for his wife Sarah (47:29–31; 50:12–14; see 23:1–20).

A census list of all of Jacob's family lists a total of seventy members, a modest but important step toward God's earlier promises of innumerable descendants (46:8–27; see 13:16; 15:5). Jacob sends Judah to confer with Joseph about preparations for his family's settlement in the land of Goshen in Egypt (46:28). The younger Judah has displaced Reuben, the firstborn, as the representative of Jacob's sons and emerges as a favored son alongside Joseph, yet another example of the Genesis motif of the younger being favored over the elder.

After a long separation, Joseph is finally able to see and embrace his father "Israel" (the other name for Jacob, 32:28; 35:10) as Joseph falls on his neck and weeps. The scene recalls a similar emotional reunion of Jacob and his brother Esau after many years of separation (33:4). The poignancy of the moment is captured in father Jacob's words, "I can die now, having seen for myself that you are still alive" (46:30).

Joseph advises his brothers to tell the Egyptians that their vocation is shepherding so that they will be settled in Goshen, somewhat separate from the rest of Egypt. Joseph explains that shepherds "are abhorrent to the Egyptians" so that it would be good for Jacob's family of shepherds to live apart from the other Egyptians (46:31–34). Agriculture in ancient Egypt, with the seasonal rise and fall of the Nile River, primarily involved field-based crops. Egyptian crop farmers were wary of shepherds with grazing animals wandering about their land. The Egyptians' warm embrace of Joseph's family tempered with Joseph's advice that his family remain separate from the Egyptians recalls the similar balance or tension between embrace and separation expressed between Esau/Edom and Jacob/Israel in Gen 33. Moreover, the implied enmity between shepherds and farmers is a distant echo of the rivalry between the two brothers, Cain the farmer and Abel the shepherd. The echo sounds an ominous note for the future in the otherwise upbeat narrative. The shepherds of Israel will eventually experience the wrath of Cain; the Egyptians will become resentful of the favored Israelites and murder their young male babies (Exod 1:8–22). As the reader moves from Genesis to Exodus, the violence of a family will become the violence of an empire against its citizens.

Joseph's brothers and father have an audience with the Egyptian Pharaoh who grants them land in Goshen (47:1–6). The patriarch Jacob blesses Pharaoh when they first meet (47:7) and again when they depart (47:10). By his blessing of Pharaoh, Jacob provides another modest fulfillment of the promise that Abraham's descendants would be a blessing to "all the families of the earth" (12:3).

The increasingly severe famine forces Egyptian families to give up all their money, their livestock, their land, and, finally, their freedom in exchange for the food that Joseph and Pharaoh provide to them (47:13–26). As Abraham and Sarah had enslaved the Egyptian Hagar, so Joseph participates in enslaving the whole Egyptian population. The tables will be turned on Joseph and his family years later when a new Pharaoh who "did not know Joseph" will turn the tables and make Joseph's family of Israelites into slaves (Exod 1:8–14).

48:1–22. Jacob Blesses Ephraim and Manasseh, Sons of Joseph. The patriarch Jacob is ill and near death. Joseph brings his two sons, the elder brother Manasseh and the younger brother Ephraim, to Jacob for a blessing. Just as Jacob himself experienced the preferred blessing from God as the younger brother of Esau at the hands of his blind father Isaac (27:1–40), so Jacob insists on laying the right-handed and preferred blessing on the younger Ephraim and only the left-handed blessing on the older Manasseh (48:10–20). Once again, the younger is favored over the elder, a consistent theme that runs throughout Genesis (4:1–16; 17:20–21; 25:23–26; 29:16–18; 37:2–8; 43:33–34). The recurring theme affirms God's favor and election of the smaller and "younger" nation of Israel in comparison to the greater and "older" civilizations or empires that rose and fell during the course of ancient Israel's history (Assyria, Babylon, Persia)

49:1–33. Jacob's Deathbed Blessing of His Twelve Sons. After blessing Joseph's two sons, Jacob gathers his twelve sons together for a final blessing and description of their future destinies (49:1). The blessing of Jacob's sons is poetry rich in imagery, metaphor, and word play. The blessing of each son reflects narrative events in Genesis or elsewhere in Scripture as well as the histories of the tribes and kingdoms (northern Ephraim and southern Judah) of ancient Israel (49:28).

The demotion of Reuben as the exalted firstborn son stems from the story about Reuben "defiling his father's bed" by sleeping with his concubine (35:22). Jacob's "blessing" of Reuben echoes the recurring theme in Genesis of the demotion of the eldest and firstborn and the raising up of the younger and the unlikely ones (here Joseph and Judah). The condemnation of Levi and Simeon and their "scattering" among the tribes of Israel (Levi—Num 18:23; Deut 10:9; Josh 14:3; 18:7; Simeon—Josh 19:9) results from the excessive and vengeful violence of the two brothers against the people of Shechem when their sister Dinah was raped (34:25–26, 30).

The narrative of Gen 37–50 raises up Joseph (37:5–11; 48:21–22) as well as Judah (44:18–34; 46:28) as favored, virtuous, and exalted tribes. Jacob's blessing provides five verses for Joseph and Judah, and only one to three verses for each of the other sons of Jacob. This highlighting of Joseph and Judah reflects not only narrative dynamics but also political realities in ancient Israel's history. The northern kingdom of Israel came to be identified with Ephraim, the favored son of Joseph (Isa 11:13; Ezek 37:19; Hos 5:9–14; 11:8–9). The southern kingdom came to be identified with the tribe of Judah from which the royal Davidic line traces its roots (Gen 38:27–30; Ruth 4:13–21; 1 Sam 17:12; 2 Sam 7:8–17). Thus, Jacob's blessing prophesies that "the [royal] scepter shall not depart from Judah" (49:10).

Jacob concludes his blessing, charging his sons to bring his body to Canaan when he dies so that he may be buried "in the cave in the field at Machpelah." Abraham bought the field as a burial place for his wife Sarah (23:1–20). Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah are all buried there as well (49:29–33). Jacob had earlier given Joseph the same instructions to bury him in the land of Canaan, not Egypt (47:29–31). The burial plot owned by Abraham represents a small piece of the promised land, a down payment of sorts on God's assurance that one day the whole land would belong to Abraham's descendants (12:7; 13:14–17; 15:7–19; 17:8; 26:2–3; 28:13; 35:12). After delivering the blessings upon his twelve sons, Jacob breathes his last and dies.

50:1–26. Jacob's Death and Joseph's Forgiveness of His Brothers. As their father requested, Joseph and his brothers travel back to the promised land of Canaan and bury their father Jacob in the cave at Machpelah. When they return to Egypt, the brothers of Joseph are afraid that with their father, Jacob, gone, Joseph may decide at last to take his revenge upon them for their treachery in selling him as a slave many years earlier (37:25–28). The brothers tell Joseph that their father, Jacob, had instructed them to urge Joseph to "forgive the crime of your brothers" (50:17). Joseph weeps when he hears their words (50:17). Joseph weeps at several points in the story (42:24; 43:30; 45:2; 45:14–15; 46:29; 50:1). On all of these occasions, only Benjamin among the brothers of Joseph had ever wept alongside Joseph (45:14). However, now all the other brothers join Joseph in their weeping and thereby demonstrate deep remorse for their earlier actions (50:18). They fall before Joseph and offer to become Joseph's slaves, again fulfilling the prophecy of Joseph's first two dreams regarding his brothers bowing down to him (37:5–11; see 42:6; 43:26, 28).

Joseph responds magnanimously, urging his brothers not to be afraid. Joseph asks, "Am I in the place of God?" Joseph's question is rhetorical and implies that he is not in the place of God nor does he wish to be. Joseph's resistance to take on the role of God and judge his brothers in revenge for what they did to him offers a counter-voice to Adam and Eve's succumbing to the serpent's tempting offer to eat the fruit and become "like God" (3:5). The first human couple's desire to be "like God" led to the violence of the next generation in which Cain killed his brother Abel (4:1–16). Joseph's response stops the potential cycle of vengeance and violence and offers another way forward. Joseph looks back over his long life of struggle with the threat of violence, slavery, and prison and sees the hand of God at work: "Even though you intended to do harm to me, God intended it for good" (50:20). Such a response is not appropriate in every experience of suffering. However, Joseph has been richly blessed by God after enduring a life of much adversity. From that vantage point, Joseph has the benefit of hindsight. He sees that God has made good come out of his suffering, preserving the life of his family and many other "families of the earth" (12:3; see 45:5–7). Thus, his brothers need not fear; Joseph will care for them and the "little ones" (50:21). Joseph affirms the theme of the Joseph story that God can be trusted to guide events toward the fulfillment of God's promises, often working in hidden and unexpected ways, even at times turning evil into good. The theme is a fitting commentary on Genesis as a whole. The stories of Genesis affirm God's surprising faithfulness in working toward the preservation and blessing of Abraham and his family as well as "all the families of the earth," even in the face of continuing human evil, violence, and hatred. Throughout Genesis, God has made good come out of evil.

Joseph lives long enough to see his grandchildren and great-grandchildren (50:22–23), but he eventually dies in the land of Egypt. As Jacob had asked to have his body returned to the land of Canaan, Joseph on his deathbed asks his brothers to do the same so that his body would be buried in the land of Canaan. Joseph left Canaan as a young man by being taken out of a pit (37:28), and Joseph desires to return to Canaan in his death by being placed in a cave at Machpelah (50:24–25). The Joseph story concludes without resolution or closure. Joseph's body is embalmed in a coffin, waiting expectantly to be carried back some day to Canaan at a time "when God comes to you" (50:24–26). Joseph's coffin will have to wait for many years before reaching its place of final rest in Canaan (Exod 13:19; Josh 24:32). Similarly, God's promises in Genesis to Abraham, to his descendants and to all humanity continue to await their full completion.

EXODUS

BRENT A. STRAWN

OVERVIEW

Titles. The English title comes via Latin from Greek exodos, literally, "the way out," which is shortened from the longer exodus Aigyptou, "the departure from Egypt." This title nicely captures the central event that transpires in the first half of the book. The Hebrew name of the book, shemot, "names," is abbreviated from we'eleh shemot, "and these are the names . . ." in the opening verse. "Names" too captures something important about the book, given personal names in the book:

- Israel, which becomes a people, not just an extended family, in Exodus. The transition from an extended family of individuals to a large group, a nation, ultimately the people of God, is facilitated precisely by the exodus and within the book that recounts it;
- Moses, who is born in Exod 2, and dominates the rest of the Pentateuch and Israel's legal imagination;
- and, finally and especially, the divine name Yahweh.

The personal name of Israel's God is said to be revealed for the first time in 6:3 (see also 3:14–15; cf. Gen 4:26). The meaning of this name (and how it is given) is enigmatic so that, in one sense, one discovers what Yahweh means and who Yahweh is by reading the book of Exodus itself. God's name is defined by what God does in Exodus and in the exodus. Certain key texts throughout Exodus are central in the definition of the divine name (Exod 3:14–15; 6:2–8; 15:3, 26; 20:2, 5–6; 29:45–46; 31:13; 33:19; 34:6–7).

Significance. Exodus is arguably the most important book of the OT. The exodus itself dominates the narrative history of Israel—again, it represents the starting point of Israel as a people (cf. 1:9; 15:13)—and recurs frequently in poetic articulations of that event. The latter include the Psalms (see Pss 78, 105, 114, 135) and also Second Isaiah (Isaiah is thought to be two books in one with the second book beginning at ch 40), which portrays the return from exile as a new and improved exodus from Babylon (see Isa 43:14–21; 48:20–21; 51:9–11; 52:11–12). These examples, along with references to the exodus elsewhere in the OT (e.g., Lev 19:36; Num 24:8; Deut 5:6; Josh 24:17; Judg 2:1; 1 Sam 8:8) and beyond (e.g., 1 Macc 4:9; Bar 1:19–20; 2 Esdras [5 Ezra] 1:7; [4 Ezra] 3:17) indicate that Exodus and the events it recounts lie very close indeed to the heart of the OT and its faith.

The same holds true for the NT. It is no accident that the passion takes place during Passover. There are deep structural connections between Exodus and the Christ event. While the chronology of the Gospels differs somewhat, the last supper may have been a Passover meal (see Matt 26:17–19; Mark 14:14–16; Luke 22:8–15; cf. John 18:28; Exod 24:8). According to John's chronology, Jesus dies on Passover, the very day when the lambs were slaughtered in the Temple prior to the paschal meal (cf. John 19:14, 29); this connection eventuated in specific Christological titles ("Lamb, Lamb of God"; see John 1:29, 36; Rev 5:6, 8–9, 12–13; 7:10; 21:9, 14, 22; cf. Acts 8:32–35; 1 Peter 1:19) as well as particular creedal affirmations (1 Cor 5:7; cf. Rev 5:6; 12:11; 13:8), and, perhaps, certain details in the passion accounts (cf. Exod 12:46 with John 19:33, 36; cf. also Num 9:12; Ps 34:20).

The NT has thus constructed the Christ event on the foundation laid in Exodus. Three important ramifications follow: first, the exodus is the redemptive activity of God in all of Scripture— even what happens later in the NT cannot be discussed apart from resonances with it. Many subsequent movements for liberation have been similarly inspired by Exodus. Second, the interrelationships between the exodus and Christ events demonstrate that it is the same God who acts in both—the same God, moreover, who acts in similar and recognizable ways in both. Third, the connection between Christ-event and exodus appears to reflect various analogues:

Exodus-event:

Slavery > Exodus > Covenant (Sinai)

Christ-event:

Crucifixion > Resurrection > Pentecost

Such analogues are instructive for both "versions." They suggest, for example, that the deliverance from Egypt is no less about sin than is Christ's death. The exodus is salvation from the sins of Egypt and its oppressive pharaoh. The analogues also suggest that the salvation that comes through the crucifixion is no less real or political than is the exodus from Egypt's tyrannical king.

Such connections and analogues indicate that Exodus is arguably the most important book, not only of the OT, but of the entire Christian Bible. The exodus is the foundational salvific act of God in all of Scripture, providing the root metaphor not only for Israel's subsequent life with God, but also for the NT authors and their attempts to understand God at work in Christ.

Structure and Theology. Exodus can be outlined several different ways, each highlighting something distinctive about the book. That granted, the book divides nicely into two roughly coequal parts, the first detailing the departure from Egypt (Exod 1–18) and the second with the covenant at Sinai (Exod 19–40). These movements of rescue, followed by covenantal relationship, can be correlated with familiar and formal theological categories: grace (or gospel) followed by law or justification followed by sanctification. What is most important about the book's two halves, however, is their theological order. Exodus narrates in large scale the precise movement evident in the prologue to the Decalogue (20:2): namely, from the revelation of who God is and what God has done for Israel (and these two are inextricable) to the giving of the commandments in the Decalogue proper (20:3–17). In a Christian context, it was not Paul who saw this, nor Luther or Calvin or some other; it is built, rather, into the very structure of Exodus itself, in the ordering of the exodus followed by Sinai. Simple observation of this fact might prevent many Christians from egregious misunderstandings of the religion of ancient Israel, let alone contemporary Judaism. No one knows better than enslaved Israel that God's gracious deliverance preceded God's covenant. Prior to both still was God's election of the ancestors (cf. 2:24; 3:6, 15–16; 4:5; 6:3, 8; 32:13; 33:1; cf. Deut 4:37; 7:8; 8:18; 9:5; 29:13). There is no "earning salvation" here. It is given in the ancestors and in the exodus. The covenant with God, which is marked by the gift of torah, follows those prior gifts.

As crucial as this ordering is, there is also some overlap. Instructions concerning Passover, Unleavened Bread, and the Firstborn occur already in the first half of the book (Exod 12:1–28; 12:43–13:16); in the second half one finds the narrative of the golden calf and the renewal of the covenant (Exod 32–34). Such overlap does not contradict the dominant order; it merely underscores the interrelationship and unity of God's work in Israel and Israel's work in God. The work of creating, redeeming, and sustaining are profoundly connected.

Overlap between the two halves of Exodus is also evident in the mixing of genres: narrative dominates Exod 1–14, 16–19, and 32–34; whereas law is the primary genre in 12:1–28; 12:43–13:16; 20:1–31:18. Exodus 35–40 is itself mixed, a narrative execution of the legal instructions in 25–30. Finally, Exod 15 captures the power of the exodus in poetry.

Exodus also appears to be a complex combination of preexisting sources—preeminently Priestly (P) texts and non-Priestly sources. At four key junctures (Exod 3–4, 14–15, 19, 32–34), it appears that the major sources have come together in especially complicated ways. Each juncture concerns a crisis: God's calling of Moses (3–4), God's deliverance of Israel (14–15), God's covenant at Sinai (19), and God's restoration of Israel after a violation of the covenant (32–34).

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Exodus from Egypt (1:1–18:27)

A. Background to Deliverance (1:1–2:25)

1:1–7. The Flourishing of Israel in Egypt. The opening chapters provide background, especially of the problem of Egyptian servitude. At the beginning, however, Israel is flourishing. The opening unit (1:1–7) serves as a bridge to the end of Genesis. All twelve sons of Israel (Jacob) came to Egypt, joining Joseph there. The seventy persons of 1:5 probably counts only Jacob's sons and grandsons; though not an insignificant number, especially when wives, daughters, and granddaughters are considered, this figure is still within the realm of the extended family. But 1:7 makes clear that this large group outgrows the notion of family very quickly. The "sons of Israel" (NRSV, "Israelites") of 1:7a are no longer only the immediate sons (or grandsons) of Jacob (cf. 1:1). Instead they are "the Israelites"—capable of filling the land (1:7b) and able to be called the "people (of the sons of Israel" (1:9; NRSV, "the Israelite people"). This is no accident: the verbs used in 1:7 (being fruitful and prolific, multiplying and growing strong) hearken back to Genesis, either to the Priestly account of creation there (see, e.g., Gen 1:20–22, 28–29) or to the promises to the ancestors, especially Abraham (see, e.g., Gen 16:10; 17:2, 6, 20; 22:17; cf. 26:4, 24; 28:3; 35:11; 41:52; 47:27; 48:4). These links demonstrate that God's purposes in creation and promises in the election of the ancestors are coming to pass. The only problem is that they are coming to pass in Egypt.

1:8–22. The Oppression of Israel in Egypt. Israel's fortunes change when a new king "who did not know Joseph" arises (1:8). Joseph's deeds that put Pharaoh and Egypt in his debt (see Gen 41, 47) are a thing of the past. Worse still, Pharaoh sees Israel's growth with different eyes. Israel's blessing is Pharaoh's bane; Pharaoh lives in a non-Yahwistic world (cf. Exod 5:2). Fearing that Israel might aid his enemies in war, he enslaves them in a preemptive strike, returning them to Joseph's prior state (1:10–11; see Gen 37:25–38; 41:37–45). The tactics of the dictator do not work, however: "the more they were oppressed, the more they multiplied and spread" (Exod 1:12a). The recurrence of the important verbs from 1:7 and Genesis (see 28:14; 30:43) can only mean that God lies behind Israel's resilience. But, again, Israel's blessing is misinterpreted: all the Egyptians now share Pharaoh's sentiment. It is already clear that Israel and Egypt cannot coexist and that Israel's blessings will not be tolerated on foreign soil.

Egypt escalates its oppression. Israel's forced labor is constantly described as ruthless oppression (1:11–14). But Pharaoh is still not satisfied. He attempts full genocide. First, he asks the Hebrew midwives to kill all the male children as they are birthed, sparing the daughters. This would effectively eliminate Israel, which depended on patrilineal descent, as a distinct nation within a generation. Ironically, it is the midwives who begin Pharaoh's downfall. When they disobey because they "fear God" (1:17) and lie to cover it up (1:19), Pharaoh extends the directive to all of Egypt. Daughters may live, but the Nile will run red with the blood of baby boys (1:22; cf. 7:14–25).

This unit raises historical questions, which recur throughout the book. First is the matter of Israel's size. Exodus 12:37 indicates that Israel departs as a group of 600,000 men in addition to children. How could such a large group be served by only two midwives? One must posit that the exchange with the midwives is simply illustrative, or that the figure in 12:37 is exaggerated, or both. While there is debate over the precise meaning of the Hebrew term 'elef "thousand," it is easiest to find in 12:37 another instance of the widespread ancient Near Eastern literary convention of inflating numerical figures.

Second is the placement of the exodus in history, time, and space. None of these matters is uncontroversial in biblical studies with some scholars preferring to see the stories in Exodus as largely late in origin, fictional in genre, or a historicization of a cult legend. The questions are many and are complicated by the fact that both of the pharaohs mentioned in Exodus go unnamed (contrast 1 Kgs 14:25; 2 Kgs 19:9; 23:29; Jer 44:30; cf. also 2 Kgs 17:4). In the absence of a specific name, one must consider other data to identify the "exodus era" and the specific kings involved (if one assumes some measure of historical veracity). While the internal biblical chronology (see Exod 12:40–41; cf. Gen 15:13; 1 Kgs 6:1) would locate the exodus in the 15th century, most scholars agree on a later date in the 13th century. This corresponds with the rise of highland villages in the central hill country of ancient Palestine that are associated with early Israel. It also fits with the only secure reference to Israel in Egyptian records: the stela of pharaoh Merenptah (1213–1203 BCE), which refers to that king's clash with a people called "Israel" (ca. 1209 BCE, see COS 2:2.6:40–41; ANET 376–78). The 13th-century horizon would probably make the pharaoh of the oppression Seti I (1294–1279 BCE) and the pharaoh of the exodus, his successor Ramesses (II) the Great (1279–1213 BCE). At this point, the name of one of the supply cities said to have been built by the Israelites, Rameses (Exod 1:11; 12:37), becomes quite important. It may be the same site known as Pi-Ramesse in Egypt (probably Qantir; the other city, Pithom, may be Tell el-Retabeh).

That the pharaoh goes unnamed remains a significant problem for historical reconstruction, though various reasons have been offered for it. One such reason could be theological: in Exodus the pharaoh has become a larger-than-life figure, transcending the individual who wears the crown. "Pharaoh" is instead an entity that includes the office and those who inhabit it. Exodus' use of the generic term "Pharaoh" may thus indicate that the problem is largely with the royal office—considered divine in ancient Egypt—with the specific person being immaterial (see below on 7:8–13:16). This non-descript ("Pharaoh" can then become a symbol: "the Enemy" par excellence.

2:1–10. The Birth of the Deliverer and His Deliverance. This unit serves as a bridge from Pharaoh's genocidal edict to the event that prompts Moses to kill and flee Egypt. We hear about Moses' parents (named in 6:20) and his Levite lineage (2:1–2). As the previous unit showcased women who thwarted Pharaoh, so also does this one: Moses' mother successfully hides her "fine baby" (2:2); Pharaoh's daughter rescues Moses from the Nile and raises him as her own (2:5–6, 10; cf. Acts 7:22); and Moses' sister (named in 15:20; Num 26:59) successfully reconnects Moses with his true mother, even arranging for her to be paid for nursing her own baby (2:7–9)!

Moses' birth account has been widely compared to the birth legend of Sargon of Akkad (COS 1:1.133:461; ANET 119). Such a comparison highlights Moses' humble origins as well as his "royal" destiny. How these intersect must be worked out in the rest of the narrative. Other scholars have compared 2:1–10 to Egyptian stories about the birth of the god Horus. This comparison underscores the Egyptian origin (or coloring) of the account as well as the high status of Moses, which puts him on par with Pharaoh (see 4:16; 7:1; 34:29–35; cf. also 33:11, 17; 34:5; Num 12:3; Deut 34:10–12). Equally crucial are the links between Exod 2:1–10 and the story of Noah. The term used for basket in 2:3, 5 occurs elsewhere only for Noah's ark (Gen 6–8). This inner-biblical connection is of greater significance than the comparisons with the births of Sargon and Horus insofar as it figures Moses as a new Noah, who will prove instrumental in God's plans of restoration, salvation, and, also, judgment.

2:11–15a. Early Failure: Moses the Murderer

2:15b–22. Early Promise: Midianite Deliverer and Shepherd

These two vignettes demonstrate that Moses has the blood of a deliverer coursing through his veins. In the first unit Moses acts prematurely and too violently (Exod 2:11–15a). Though motivated by compassion for a fellow Hebrew, his act is too much, too soon. The murder cannot be covered up, and Moses is now a wanted man (2:15a). Though Moses' act estranges him from his fellow Hebrews and from Pharaoh, it is clear that he is one to watch: he has an eye for injustice, and he is willing to do something about it. Pharaoh wants someone like that put down; God wants someone like that called up (see 3:1–12).

After fleeing from Pharaoh, Moses finds himself in Midian (2:15b–22). Here too he proves an able deliverer, this time without going too far. In this case Moses' eye for injustice concerns the mistreatment of foreign women. Not only does he come to their defense, he also waters their flock (2:17).

Moses is in between: estranged from Israel in Egypt and from his adoptive family there, he is nevertheless identified as an Egyptian by Reuel's daughters (2:19). He settles in Midian and marries Zipporah (2:21). They have a son, Gershom, which sounds like the Hebrew for "a sojourner there" (2:22). In a word, Moses experiences the same alienation and loss as his fellow Hebrews back in Egypt.

2:23–25. The Turning Point: Israel in Pain, the God Who Knows. Back in Egypt, things are getting worse. The pharaoh who instigated the terrible policies of ch. 1 has now died (2:23a). While his death will facilitate Moses' return (4:19), it also suggests a possible change of fortune for Israel because regime changes were often marked by beneficent acts from the new king. But no. All we hear of is Israel in pain. Four different verbs for groaning or crying out are packed into two verses (2:23–24); these cries emerge from Israel's bondage (2:23). Their cry for help rises up to God (2:23b). And this inarticulate lament is enough to rouse God. Now, four different verbs describing God's attention to Israel are packed into two verses: God heard, remembered, looked, and "knew" (NRSV, "took notice of them"). All of God's perceptions are open to Israel in their pain. This is the turning point and the beginning of the end of Pharaoh and the end of the oppressive politics of Egypt. It all begins with Israel's agony.

B. The Calling of the Deliverer (3:1–4:26)

3:1–12. Encounter at the Mountain of God, Part I. This unit contains the first instance of an important pattern found elsewhere in the OT: the prophetic call narrative (see Isa 6:1–13; Jer 1:4–10; Ezek 1:1–3:15; Judg 6:11–17; Luke 1:26–38). The form comprises six elements: the divine confrontation (Exod 3:1–4a), the introductory word (3:4b–9), the commission (3:10), the objection (3:11), the reassurance (3:12a), and the sign (3:12b). Several aspects of Moses' call are significant. First, God calls Moses in the midst of his regular activities (3:1a) and in continuity with his past history of deliverance (2:5–6, 12, 17). Second, there is much repetition between 3:7, 9 and 2:23–25. What is new in Exod 3 is that God has now decided to do something about Israel's pain; this involves deliverance from Egypt to a good land (3:8; cf. 3:17). It also involves a human agent, creating for Moses a specific and dangerous human responsibility. Third, given this danger, it is not surprising that Moses objects to this call. Objection to God's calling is a standard and expected element in the form. True prophets do not seek their callings and do not want them when they come. And yet, fourth, with the call form the objection is heard and answered in the reassurance and sign. Although Moses ("I" in 3:11a) appears puny when compared to Pharaoh, the Israelites, and Egypt (3:11b), the point is not who he is but, instead, Who is with him (3:12a).

3:13–4:17. Further Discussion: More Objections and More Answers. Despite God's presence, Moses is not satisfied. His call narrative is thus expanded by four more objections (3:13; 4:1, 10, 13). These become increasingly less compelling but nevertheless introduce information about God, Moses, and Aaron that is crucial for the plot. (The expansion is also due to the confluence of several different traditions in 3:1–4:17; this feature marks the unit as one of four especially important loci in the book [see the Overview].) The significant issues in Exod 3–4 include the role of human vocation in God's delivering acts along with God's revelation of the divine identity.

The most important of the additional objections is the first one, in which Moses asks for God's name (3:13). Given the importance of names in antiquity, it may be that Moses is asking not only for insight into the divine nature but even for a measure of control (deities were invoked in prayers, oaths, blessings, and curses by name). If control is what Moses seeks, it is flatly denied. God's "name" is enigmatic at best. The Hebrew 'ehyeh 'asher 'ehy "I AM WHO I AM" (3:14; NRSV) is perhaps better translated "I WILL BE WHO I WILL BE." This latter translation better reflects the verbal aspect employed and ties 3:14 to 3:12. Part of what God "will be" is "with you" (3:12: 'ehyeh 'immak). Juxtaposed, then, are (1) God's unwillingness to be mastered in a way that would make God an object rather than the Subject who calls and delivers; and (2) God's willingness to be known in what transpires in the future (3:14 could even be translated "I will be what I will be"). If there is mystery and hiding in the first point, there is promise of more revelation in the future in the second. In effect: "I am who I will be in the exodus. Wait and see." Further insight into the meaning of the name will be revealed at key junctures throughout Exodus (see 6:2–8; 15:3, 26; 20:2, 5–6; 29:45–46; 31:13; 33:19; 34:6–7).

The divine name is immediately rephrased as "the LORD." This appears to be the third-person articulation of the first-person version in 3:14, both related to the verb hyh "to be". While God can say "I am," humans must say "he is" (cf. the LXX at 3:14, which translates "I am the one who is"), probably a causative form: the one who causes to be—that is, who creates, the creator (note "the LORD of Hosts," i.e., "he who creates the heavenly hosts"). At an early point, out of reverence, the divine name was not spoken; its original vocalization, however, was probably something like "Yahweh" ("Jehovah" is a secondary combination of those consonants with the vowels from the Hebrew word for Lord).

Not unlike the objection in 3:11, Moses' second objection is also met with reassurance (3:18–22; cf. 12:36). In the course of further objections (4:1, 10, 13), God provides Moses with the miraculous signs of his staff (4:2–5), his leprous hand (4:6–9a), water from the Nile that becomes blood (4:9b; cf. 7:14–25), further assurance of divine presence (4:12; cf. 3:12), and, finally, the assistance of Aaron (4:14–16). There is nothing left for Moses to do but take his staff and go (4:17).

4:18–20. Permission from Jethro. First, Moses seeks permission from his father-in-law, now called Jethro (cf. Reuel in 2:18; Hobab in Num 10:29; cf. Judg 4:11). Moses receives Jethro's blessing and returns to Egypt with his wife and sons (note the plural; see 4:20; 18:3–4).

4:21–23. Anticipation of Events to Come. These verses anticipate what will transpire with Pharaoh

(cf. also 3:18–22; 6:28–7:7). Here is the first mention of the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (see 7:8–13:16 below) and a foreshadowing of the tenth plague (12:29–32). As horrific as the latter is, its first reference in Exodus is set within a parentchild metaphor; God figures as a parent who will go to any lengths to rescue his or her child from an abusive, murderous situation (cf. Isa 43:1–7). That metaphor does not make the tenth plague less horrific, but it may make it more understandable—at least at the emotional level.

4:24–26. A Frightening (and Confusing) Episode. The Lord does not pose a threat solely to Egypt, however. In one of the most disturbing episodes in the entire OT, the Lord tries to kill Moses. This passage is difficult in Hebrew as the pronouns are often unspecific (e.g., who is the antecedent of "his feet": Moses, Gershom, God?). Zipporah's quick-thinking action clearly bears some relationship to circumcision but also, apparently, to marriage practices. She now joins the list of key female figures who act in salvific ways in the opening chapters of Exodus. The oddity of Yahweh's assault remains, however. It appears to be connected to Yahweh's claim on the firstborn (see Exod 13:1–2, 11–16; 22:29a–30; 34:19–20), the tenth plague (cf. 4:21–23), and the destructive power of God that can even strike Israel if not for the averting power of blood (12:7, 13, 22–23; cf. 29:19–21). The Lord is not to be trifled with—neither by Pharaoh and Egypt (5:2) nor by Moses or Israel.

C. Moses, Israel, Pharaoh: Prelude to a Conflict (4:27–7:7)

4:27–31. Reunion with Aaron, First Overture to Israel. Moses is reunited with Aaron, who is informed of the plan (4:28) and accepts his intermediary role (4:30; cf. 4:14–16). The brothers meet with success: "the people believed" (4:31). Moreover, once the people learn that God has visited them ("given heed") and seen their misery (cf. 2:25; 3:7, 9), they are moved to worship (cf. 12:27). Israel has a united front with empowered leaders. They are ready to face Pharaoh.

5:1–6:1. The First Unsuccessful Parley with Pharaoh. The first meeting with Pharaoh is unsuccessful, however. The initial request to let Israel go is couched in liturgical language (or disguise?): so that they might worship Yahweh (5:1, 3; cf. 3:12b, 18; 4:23; cf. on 12:43–13:16 below). But if the earlier pharaoh did not know Joseph, the new one does not know the Lord (5:2). He has little respect for what is a minor deity—of slaves no less—compared to the gods and goddesses of ancient Egypt, guarantors of the status quo that kept Egypt on top and Israel on bottom. But here is a great irony because Pharaoh will come to know the Lord in excruciatingly intimate ways (see 7:5, 17; 8:22; 9:16; 14:4, 18; cf. 10:2).

The new pharaoh is as despotic as his predecessor. He does not care if his slave force is diminished by their lack of worship (5:3b). He interprets their desire to worship as laziness (5:8, 17) and requires them to work harder: the same daily quota of bricks but without provision of straw (5:7–8, 10–11, 13, 18). "Thus says the LORD" (5:1) has led to "Thus says Pharaoh" (5:10). Pharaoh's dictum means the people must scour the land looking for straw (5:12) while their supervisors are beaten for reduced productivity (5:14). They "cry out" (tsa'aq) to Pharaoh (5:15)—a term rich with meaning, often used of social injustice (cf. 2:23; 22:22, 26)—but he will not listen, not even when the supervisors state that he is unjust to his "own people" (5:16). Pharaoh does not see Israel as his own people but simply as lazy slaves.

Israel's problems with Pharaoh lead to problems with their leaders (5:20–21). Israel's united front is threatened. But, when Israel's cry to Pharaoh (5:15) proves ineffectual and is turned in anger against Moses and Aaron (5:21), Moses intercedes with Yahweh on Israel's behalf (5:22–23). The cry to Yahweh leads to divine (re)assurance that deliverance will take place. Moses is an effective intercessor (cf. 32:11–14, 31–32; 33:12–17; 34:9), in part because he is a skilled orator. In his prayer he shifts from speaking of Israel as "this people" (5:22) to "your people" (5:23). God responds when it is God's people who are involved (6:1; cf. 6:2–13; 32:11–14; 33:13b, 15–16).

6:2–13. Further Reassurance. The exchange in 5:22–6:1 is subsequently expanded by a lengthy assurance where the divine name Yahweh is said to be revealed for the first time (cf. 3:14–16; Gen 4:26b [both J]; Exod 6:3 is P). Yahweh reiterates knowledge of Israel's plight and memory of the oath to the ancestors, before promising deliverance, relationship, and delivery to the promised land (6:4–8). The entire speech is framed by "I am the LORD" (6:2, 8), indicating that these acts shed insight into the definition of "I AM/WILL BE" and the One whose name that is (cf. 3:14 above). But the Israelites cannot hear this reassurance; they are too broken (6:9).

6:14–27. The Pedigree of Moses and Aaron. The plot is interrupted by a digression concerning the genealogy of Moses and Aaron. It functions to clarify their relationship (6:20; cf. 4:14; 7:1–2; 28:1–2, 4, 41), provides the names of their parents (6:18, 20; cf. 2:1), and establishes their Levitical heritage (cf. 2:1). We also learn that Jochebed was Amram's aunt (6:20; cf. Num 26:59), making Moses and Aaron "illegitimate" according to later legislation (Lev 18:12; 20:19). The birth of many important biblical figures is marked by sexual controversy (e.g., Isaac, Jephthah, Solomon, Jesus). Here the emphasis is probably on the pure pedigree of Moses and Aaron; the marriage legislation in Leviticus, at any rate, had not yet been given.

6:28–7:7. Another Reassurance and Another Anticipation. The narrative resumes with a repetition of 6:10–13 in 6:28–30. The Lord responds to Moses' objection that he is a poor speaker (6:12, 30; cf. 4:10) in a passage (7:1–2) that is very similar to 4:10–12, 14b–16. The two passages are typically ascribed to different sources, but the continuation of the call-objection-reassurance schema in two different places indicates that the called need continual reassurance just as divine revelation is continually ongoing.

This section contains another anticipation of what will take place in the narrative (cf. 4:21–23). This one also refers to God hardening Pharaoh's heart (7:3; cf. 4:21), a particularly complicated topic. While three different verbs are used (all translated by NRSV with "harden" or "hardened") to describe this situation, the total number of instances of the motif is divided precisely in two: in half of the instances the Lord hardens Pharaoh's heart (4:21; 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8); in the other, Pharaoh hardens his own heart (7:13, 14, 22; 8:15, 19; 32; 9:7, 34, 35; some of these latter are somewhat ambiguous, however). The distribution is also important: the Lord does not harden Pharaoh's heart directly until 9:12, in the sixth plague. Prior to that, all hardness is due to Pharaoh's own obduracy. Pharaoh's last self-hardening is in the seventh plague (9:35), after which all hardness is the Lord's work. Both the Lord and Pharaoh are involved in this scenario, even concurrently (plagues 6–7). One must not, therefore, ascribe the hardening entirely to Pharaoh, in some sort of psychological interpretation, or to the Lord, in some sort of theological determinism.

The hardening motif is closely connected to the plague narratives, which follow immediately (see 7:8–13:16 below; cf. 11:9). The plagues make the Lord known—not only to Pharaoh, but also to Israel, Egypt, and the whole earth (9:16; cf. 9:29). This larger function indicates that more is occurring in the plagues and the hardening of the heart than simply setting Israel free. Indeed, especially since Pharaoh no longer hardens his heart after the seventh plague, Yahweh's work is in no small measure a means to "get glory over Pharaoh" (14:4, 17–18), thereby exalting Yahweh and severely undercutting Pharaoh (9:16–17), Egypt (10:2), and the entire religious apparatus of Egypt (see below).

D. War of the Gods: Yahweh vs. Pharaoh (7:8–13:16)

In Hebrew the ten acts against Egypt are regularly called "signs" or "wonders," not "plagues" (see, e.g., 7:3; 10:1–2; 11:9–10). This terminology indicates that the acts are symbolic, reflecting something beyond their immediate content. This includes pointing backward to Pharaoh's genocidal acts (especially plagues one and ten) and forward to what takes place at the Reed Sea (Exod 14–15).

The plagues also symbolize a contest between the Lord and Egypt, especially its religion that guarantees Egypt's oppression of Israel. Some scholars have attempted to tie the plagues to specific gods—e.g., the first plague and gods associated with the Nile (Hapi, perhaps, or Sobek), the fifth plague and the goddess Hathor, often depicted as a cow, or the ninth plague and the sun-god Ra. In 12:12 Yahweh states "on all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgments" (cf. Num 33:4). However, apart from 12:12, the gods are not mentioned by name, perhaps because the Lord will not share the stage with any other deities.

There is, however, another supernal entity that is mentioned throughout the plagues: the god-king Pharaoh. While debate continues as to whether the pharaoh was always considered divine, it seems safe to say that the king was at least semidivine as the offspring of Ra and the incarnation of Horus; the office itself was fully divine. The plague narrative, then, is a cosmic battle of the gods: Yahweh, the God of Israel, vs. Pharaoh the archenemy of Israel, who represents Egypt and its massive religio-economic apparatus. In these chapters, the Lord toys with Egypt, making the Egyptians and their king look like fools (10:2). Pharaoh now knows who Yahweh is (cf. 5:2). In the process, Yahweh demonstrates control over all of Egypt—including not only natural objects that were typically the purview of the Egyptian gods but also over Pharaoh himself. This should not be interpreted "egotistically," so much as revelationally: Yahweh is establishing who he is and who he will be (cf. 3:14) to all concerned—Pharaoh, Egypt, Egypt's gods (12:12), Israel, the whole earth (9:16).

The cosmic nature of the battle between the Lord and Pharaoh sheds light on other matters. First, some scholars have attempted to explain the signs and their sequence as naturally occurring phenomenon, such an interpretation surely misses the point. Ultimately, there is nothing natural about the plagues. Second, the plagues can be understood as signs of ecological disaster. Creation is being unmade, returning to a pre-creational chaotic state of darkness. This means Israel will be re-created in the exodus, especially in the crossing of the sea. Third, the sins of Pharaoh (cf. 9:27, 34; 10:16–17) are shown to be opposed to God's creational purposes in Israel and, through Israel, in the whole world (9:16, 29; cf. Gen 12:1–3; Exod 19:3–6). Since they are cosmic, antilife, anti-creational sins, they must be met with signs that are equally cosmic and deadly. Finally, what transpires in the signs is God's action (see 8:19; cf. 9:20). Moses and Aaron play distinctive roles, but divine power and action are prominent, especially in the most violent strike. This means that, despite the violence of the plagues, they can actually be understood pacifistically: Israel does not fight for itself, does not take up arms, does not kill Egyptian children or damage Egyptian property. Instead all it needs do is sit back, keep still, watch, and learn who the Lord is and see the lengths to which the Lord will go to save them.

7:8–13. Aaron's Rod: Prelude to Battle. The war begins with a vignette about Aaron's staff. Differences from 4:2–5 reflect different source materials (E vs. P, respectively; for an explanation of the documentary hypothesis, see the commentary on creation stories in Gen 1–2), but they may also reflect plot development (the increased role of Aaron) and Egyptian allusions. The term for "snake" in 7:9 (different from 4:3) could also be translated "crocodile"—both animals were important in Egyptian and Pharaonic symbolism (cf. Ezek 29:3; 32:2). Swallowing was a metaphor for control in ancient Egypt, so Aaron's "snake" demonstrates control over Egypt (see also Exod 15:12).

7:14–25. The First Plague: Blood. The first sign is an ominous "flashback" to 1:22. It is as if the Lord is announcing his knowledge of Egypt's past genocidal acts. It also trumps Pharaoh because the king's plan was thwarted; the Lord will succeed.

8:1–15. The Second Plague: Frogs. As with Aaron's rod and the water-into-blood, the Egyptian magicians are able to replicate the sign of the frogs (8:7; cf. 7:11, 22). Hereafter, however, they will be unable to match the power of God. This sign is the first to elicit Pharaoh's request for prayer (8:8). Moses intercedes and the Lord listens—a characteristic aspect of their relationship throughout Exodus (3:1–4:17; 5:22–6:8; 32:11–14; 32:31–33:3; 33:12–34:28).

8:16–19. The Third Plague: Gnats. The "secret arts" of the Egyptian magicians have now failed (8:18). They declare to Pharaoh that this is "the finger of God!" (8:19). The magicians are not the last in Pharaoh's circle to understand exactly with whom they are dealing (cf. 9:20).

8:20–32. The Fourth Plague: Flies. The fourth sign is the first in which the Israelites are not affected, miraculously, by the plagues. This motif will recur as Israel and the land of Goshen, where it resides, are protected from negative effects. Exodus 8:23 says this is "a distinction" (NRSV) that the Lord sets between Israel and Egypt. The Hebrew (MT 8:19) is more accurately translated "a redemption/liberation." While the text here is somewhat difficult, and the LXX, Vulgate, and Syriac's reading "distinction" more understandable (so NRSV), the notion of the Lord's setting "redemption" between Israel and Egypt is evocative, foreshadowing what will take place in the next few chapters and what is already taking place now.

9:1–7. The Fifth Plague: Diseased Livestock. The fifth sign maintains the distinction between Israel and Egypt (9:4), this time concerning livestock. Exodus 9:6 is overstated in light of 9:19. Such hyperbole is part of the totalizing language that pervades the plague narrative (e.g., 7:19–20; 8:4, 17, 24; 9:6, 9, 11, 22, 24–25; 10:6, 12–15, 19, 22; 11:5). The entirety of the land—all of Egypt—experiences the Lord's signs. One expects no less in a battle of cosmic proportions.

9:8–12. The Sixth Plague: Boils. Notable here is that the Egyptian magicians are not only ineffective, they must flee from Moses because the boils affect them (9:11). They are now completely removed from the battle, unable even to attempt replication via their secret arts. Moreover, once Pharaoh's coterie is directly afflicted by the signs, it is just a matter of time before the king himself feels them (note 9:14). Perhaps for this reason the sixth sign is the first to state that the Lord hardens Pharaoh's heart (9:12).

9:13–35. The Seventh Plague: Thunder and Hail. Although thunder and hail may not seem as exotic as the previous signs, they occur in the normally arid climate of Egypt. It rarely rains in Egypt; these climatological phenomena are, in that geographical context, as awesome and unnatural as what has come before.

The Lord threatens that the seventh sign will come upon Pharaoh himself and claims to have preserved Pharaoh's life up to this point. The reason for this appears in 9:16, a key verse in the plague unit: "to show you my power, and to make my name resound through all the earth." The acts of God have creation-wide ramifications and purposes. The acts are working too. Some of Pharaoh's officials are said to "fear the word of the LORD" (9:20; cf. 9:30) and to respond to God's instructions. This language is fraught with theo logical significance. "To fear" is associated with reverence and worship. The Lord and the Lord's word is becoming known in Egypt, even respected, even in Pharaoh's closest circles.

The severity of the seventh sign elicits Pharaoh's first confession of sin (9:27). His repentance, however, is short-lived: After agreeing to let Israel go (9:28), he hardens his heart one last time (9:34–35).

10:1–20. The Eighth Plague: Locusts. In 10:1, the Lord takes credit for what was Pharaoh's selfhardening in 9:34–35. Again we see that the subject and causes of hardening are intermixed. The eighth sign indicates that God has transgenerational purposes in mind (see also 12:26–27; 13:8–9). The Lord has "made fools" of the Egyptians so that children and grandchildren "may know that I am the LORD" (10:2). The (re)formation of Israel that is prominent in Exod 15–24 is at work here as well.

Pharaoh's officials now openly encourage him to let Israel go, stating flatly that "Egypt is ruined" (10:7). But Pharaoh insists on conditions for an exodus (10:8; cf. 8:25; 10:24). His monstrosity— in line with his predecessor (1:16, 22)—is revealed when he swears (by Yahweh, no less!) that Israel's "little ones" will not depart (10:10a). The term used here typically refers to toddlers. The only mind with an "evil purpose" (cf. 10:10b) is thus Pharaoh's. But, after Pharaoh admits his sin and requests forgiveness (10:16–17), Yahweh relents regarding the locusts (10:19). But not regarding Pharaoh's heart (10:20).

10:21–29. The Ninth Plague: Darkness. With the ninth sign, the impact of the plague on the created order is complete: the land returns to precreational darkness, one "that can be felt" (10:21). Miraculously, "all the Israelites had light where they lived" (10:23b). Israel experiences the first day of creation: God spoke light and it was (Gen 1:3). This situation prefigures the re-creational activity that transpires in chapters to come (esp. Exod 14–18).

Pharaoh attempts one final compromise, wishing to keep at least some economic advantage for himself. When this is denied, he threatens Moses with death. Here again this Pharaoh emulates his predecessor (2:15), but his threat is empty: he will summon Moses and Aaron again (12:31). The threat is also ironic, leading directly into the tenth and final sign.

11:1–10. The Tenth Plague Announced. The Lord announces one last plague to Moses, who relays the details to Pharaoh in hot anger (11:4–8). The final strike has been announced, but its enactment is delayed until 12:29–32. This builds tension, with the intervening material functioning as the quiet before the storm.

The Lord will again make a distinction between Egypt and Israel (11:7): while Egypt is wailing (tsa'aq, see under 5:1–6:1), not so much as a dog will bark to disturb the Israelites (11:6–7). Moreover, Pharaoh's officials will come and bow down to Moses, not Pharaoh, and beg the people to leave (11:8; cf. 10:7; also 8:19; 9:20). But again—and not for the last time (cf. 14:4, 8; cf. 14:17)—Yahweh hardens Pharaoh's heart "in order that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt" (11:9).

12:1–28. Instructions for the Passover. The interlude before the tenth plague is filled with instructions for Passover. In the immediate context, Passover provides protection from the plague (12:23), but the instructions envision that Passover is equally about the future. It will function as a ritual reenactment and remembrance of the tenth plague and, thus, the exodus from Egypt. In this way, the exodus is memorialized forever—it will not be forgotten, but taught to future generations in different circumstances (12:24–27a; cf. 12:17). It is even impressed upon the calendar: the exodus marks the first month of the New Year (12:2).

The Feast of Unleavened Bread also commemorates the exodus (12:14–20; cf. 23:15; 34:18). As with the hurried consumption of the Passover lamb (12:11), the lack of leaven is due to the hastiness of Israel's departure. There simply was not time enough to let the dough rise (12:34, 39).

Many scholars believe that both of these celebrations, along with the consecration of the firstborn, may well have had distinct and disparate origins—in agricultural rites of various sorts, for example (cf. 23:14–19a). Regardless, they are now drawn to the foundational salvific act in all of Scripture, the exodus, and made to serve as handmaidens of it.

These verses end on two important notes: first, the people bow down and worship (cf. 4:31). This represents a return to the united front established in the first overture to Israel (4:27–31). Gone is the strife caused by Pharaoh (5:19–21). Nine signs and divine protection have restored leaders and people, people and God. Second, so restored, the people are said to be perfectly obedient (12:28). This unity and obedience will also mark Israel at the end of Exodus (Exod 35–40).

12:29–32. The Tenth Plague: Death of the Firstborn. After the tension-filled exchange regarding the tenth plague (10:27–11:8) and then the interlude in 12:1–28, the tenth plague is narrated tersely. It happens just as Moses spoke (12:29; cf. 11:5); the "loud cry" that results is identical (12:30; cf. 11:6). It is hardly an accident—and more like poetic (better: prophetic) justice—that this cry is the same word as used earlier for Israel's suffering (tsa'aq, see 2:23). The correspondence between sin and judgment is also present in the strike itself. Echoes with 1:16 and 1:22 have long been recognized. Exodus 4:22–23 is also important, but so is the first sign (7:14–25). The current pharaoh reaps what a previous pharaoh sowed. What's more, Pharaoh learns that what his despotic predecessor attempted to do over a period of time—without success—Yahweh accomplishes, with ease, in a single night: "There was not a house without someone dead" (12:30b; cf. 12:33), except, of course, in Israelite houses, protected, as they were, by the blood of the lambs (12:6–7, 13, 23, 27; cf. 4:24–26; also 1 Peter 1:18–19; Rev 7:14; 12:11; Matt 27:25).

The hardening of Pharaoh's heart is over; judgment has been served and all concerned now know the Lord and the power of his might. Pharaoh no longer refuses, no longer attempts compromises. Now there are only a string of commands for Israel to depart immediately (12:31–32a). Pharaoh even realizes that the Israelites' exodus will mean a blessing on him as well (12:32b). This blessing could simply be the cessation of plagues, but the word used and the syntactical construction evoke the call of Abraham (Gen 12:2) as well as the blessings Jacob pronounced on a Pharaoh long past (Gen 47:7, 10). This shows the exodus to be part of God's mission to bless all the families of the earth. It puts that mission back on track (cf. 1:1–7, complicated by 1:8–22); it also represents something of a return to non-hostile relationships between Israel and Egypt—a point continued in the next unit but unfortunately short-lived.

12:33–36. Plundering Egypt. True to prior statements (3:22; 11:2; Gen 15:14), the Egyptians now urge the people to leave and give them jewelry and clothing: "And so they plundered the Egyptians" (Exod 12:36b). In the context of the cosmic battle between the Lord and Pharaoh, this plundering is a sign that the war is over. The Lord has won and his people take the spoils. These spoils will prove both useful (cf. 25:3–7; 35:22–29; 38:24–25) and detrimental (cf. 32:2–4; 33:5–6) in the narratives to come.

12:37–42. The Journey from Rameses to Succoth. For Rameses (Qantir), see under 1:8–22 above; Succoth is often identified with Tell el-Maskhuta in the Wadi Tumilat. Exodus 12:38 suggests that non-Israelites also went up with Israel out of Egypt (see also Lev 24:10; Num 11:4; Deut 29:11; Josh 8:35; Neh 13:3). Perhaps the knowledge of the Lord learned in the signs has proven transformative for some Egyptians (cf. Philo, Mos., 1.147; Exod. Rab. 18.10; Josephus, Ag. Ap., 1.233–235).

12:43–51. Further Instructions for the Passover

13:1–2. Instructions Regarding the Firstborn

13:3–10. Instructions for the Festival of Unleavened Bread

13:11–16. Consecration of the Firstborn

Four sections containing instructions for the feasts of Passover, Unleavened Bread, and the consecration of the firstborn follow. The first two are already familiar from 12:1–28. Indeed, the discussion of Passover/Unleavened Bread brackets the tenth plague and its aftermath:

12:1–28 Instructions for the Passover and Unleavened Bread

12:29–32: The Tenth Plague

12:33–42: Aftermath: Plundering Egypt and the Journey to Succoth

12:43–51 + 13:3–10 Instructions for the Pass over and Unleavened Bread

The violence of the tenth plague is now contained by the ritual celebration of the event. It is no longer enacted, only reenacted in liturgical and ritual mode.

Similarly, though the consecration of the firstborn is new, it is split into two sections (13:1–2, 11–16), interleaved between the Passover/Unleavened Bread instructions even as it bears obvious connection to the tenth plague as those instructions do (cf. also 4:22–23, 24–26). Note:

12:1–28 Instructions for the Passover and Unleavened Bread

12:29–32: The Tenth Plague

12:33–42: Aftermath

12:43–51 Instructions for the Passover

13:1–2: Instructions Regarding the Firstborn

13:3–10 Instructions for Unleavened Bread

13:11–16: Consecration of the Firstborn

Such interleaving signifies that the Lord's claim on the firstborn is related to God's awesome power, manifested in the tenth plague, on the one hand, and to God's profound parental passion mobilized on the part of weak children, on the other hand (cf. 4:21–23).

Consecration of the firstborn is discussed elsewhere (22:29b–30; 34:18–20; Num 3:11–13, 41, 45; 8:17; 18:15–18; Deut 15:19–16:8) where it is clear that, in the case of animals, the statute is closely connected to sacrifice. Animals not suited for sacrifice, like the donkey (Exod 13:13a), are thus "redeemable" (an important notion, used here for the first time with reference to economic substitution) for ones that are. Human children are redeemable as a matter of course (13:13b).

Rituals are a way the exodus is reenacted and made visible, even on the body (13:9). These "incarnated" traces of the exodus serve as reminders (13:9, 16) of what the Lord "did for me when I came out of Egypt" (13:8)—that is, they make the exodus a personal, existential reality. They are also an ideal mechanism by which children are instructed in the faith (13:8, 14–15; cf. Deut 6:20–25). It is as if Exodus knows that its events are singular and unrepeatable. They will only be available, hereafter, in ritual remembrance (or metaphorical reuse; see the Overview). Such remembrance is crucial so that even those who were not present and did not see can nevertheless avow: "the LORD brought us out of Egypt" (13:16b, emphasis added; cf. 13:8).

E. Fire and Flight (13:17–15:21)

13:17–22. The Pillars of Cloud and Fire. Although the Israelites were prepared for battle (13:18b; cf. 12:39), God is apparently concerned that they will lose heart and turn back (13:17). This is evidently what leads to God's accompanying presence in "a pillar of cloud by day . . . and in a pillar of fire by night" (13:21; cf. 14:19; 23:20–23; 32:34; 33:2 on angelic accompaniment). This enables round-the-clock travel not to mention travel on the best, though "roundabout," route (13:18a). The early departure from Egypt is thus marked by the miraculous power of the Lord, as were the plague narratives. This trend will continue because the route God has selected leads straight toward the Reed Sea.

14:1–31. The Crossing of the Re[e]d Sea

15:1–21. The Song of Moses

In chs. 14–15, one finds another place in which multiple sources are present. There are at least three versions of the crossing at the sea—two prose versions in Exod 14 and a poetic version in Exod 15.

The Priestly version is marked by the splitting of the sea when Moses reaches his hand out over it (14:21a, c, 27a); this is in response to the cry of the people (14:10b). The people must go forward (14:15b), walking through two walls of water on dry ground (14:16, 22, 29). The non-Priestly version recounts the Lord fighting for the people; all they must do is "stand firm," "keep still," and observe the Lord's deliverance (14:13–14). In this account, the Lord drives the sea back with a strong east wind all night (14:21b), then throws the Egyptians into a panic, clogging the wheels of their chariots, before ultimately tossing them into the sea (14:24–25, 27b; cf. 15:1, 4). The poetic version in Exod 15, while after the fact (see 14:30–31), nevertheless contains additional details that are at times akin and at times opposed to the prose accounts. In context, this poem, the "Song of Moses," is Israel's doxological response to their deliverance. It is often thought to be among the earliest compositions in the OT, with some scholars believing that the song was originally attributed to Miriam (cf. 15:21 with 15:1; in antiquity compositions were often cited by first lines only)—who is notably called a prophet (15:20)— and only later ascribed to Moses. While it may be early, the poem is not a contemporaneous account, since it appears to know of later realities: God's abode, Philistia, the taking of the land, and, perhaps, even Mt. Zion and the Temple—or, at least, Mt. Sinai and the tabernacle (see 15:13–17).

While it may be impossible to extricate these versions, let alone harmonize them, it is important to note the recurrence of: (1) the hardening motif (14:4a, 8, 17a), correlate with God's "gaining glory" over Pharaoh (14:4b, 17b, 18) so that all Egypt will know "that I am the LORD" (14:4c, 18). This ties the crossing of the sea to the plague narratives, making it God's final sign. (2) The notion that it is the Lord who acts decisively in the exodus such that Israel is largely a passive, observant beneficiary. Any and all violence remains the sole prerogative of the Deity. (3) The re-creation motif. It is hardly unimportant that the people are said to cross the sea "on dry ground" (yabashah), which outside of Exodus occurs in the Pentateuch only in Gen 1:9–10 (note also Exod 14:16, 22, 29; cf. 4:9 ; 15:19). One hears, then, a strong echo of the Priestly creation story: after the destruction of the plagues, Israel is now being re-created. The crossing of the sea is, in a sense, the third day of creation all over again.

But what sea is being discussed? NRSV translates "Red Sea," on the basis of the LXX, though often with a footnote offering an alternative: "Or Sea of Reeds." The latter option is due to the Hebrew (yam suf), and its probable relation with the Egyptian word for "reed." "Red Sea" evokes the formidable body of water by the same name, or, perhaps its western branch, the Gulf of Suez. Given its size, some scholars have argued that "Red Sea" is a later (mis)interpretation of the Hebrew phrase, an attempt, perhaps, to historicize or localize the event from a later period. "Reed Sea," on the other hand, is rather non-descript. On the basis of the term "reed" as well as geographical hints (e.g., 14:2, 9; 15:22), some scholars argue that the sea in question was one of the lakes in the Isthmus of Suez: the Ballah lakes, Lake Timsah, or the Bitter Lakes region (cf. 15:23 on the latter). Yet another proposal should be mentioned: a few scholars have taken suf to be related to sof; this turns the "Reed Sea" into "Sea of the End." Such an eschatological connection, if it is that and if it is valid, may well be secondary—a later pun. But it does pick up on several mythological elements that are evident in the story, especially in the poetic version.

The event at the sea is an ending: the end of Israelite slavery, perhaps even the end of the world in a proleptic or eschatological way (cf. the Passover Haggadah). If so, then "Reed Sea" is analogous to "Pharaoh": in the description and use of these terms, one sees a mixing of historical and mythological elements. There is a king, but his significance goes far beyond a specific name (which in this case is notably absent) or personage. Similarly, there is a sea, but its importance lies far beyond its precise location (cf. Pss 74:12–15; 77:16–20; 114:1–8). What matters for Exodus, ultimately, is that the Lord saved Israel "that day," that Israel witnessed this awesome deed, and that Israel feared and believed in the Lord and "in his servant Moses" (14:30–31). At the sea, Israel learns something crucial about who "I AM/WILL BE" is (3:14): Yahweh is a warrior, Yahweh is his name (15:3).

F. In the Wilderness (15:22–18:27)

Though Israel is liberated, the people do not arrive at Sinai for three months (see 19:1; but cf. 18:5). Moreover, while Israel's liberation is complete, their formation—or perhaps better: reformation or re-creation from slaves of Pharaoh to slaves of Yahweh—is only begun. The material between the crossing of the sea and the arrival at Sinai is especially important with regard to this reformation/creation.

15:22–27. The Bitter Water of Marah

16:1–36. Manna from Heaven

17:1–7. Water from the Rock at Massah and Meribah

In these three accounts, Israel learns that their God can and will provide for them. The first needed commodity is water (15:22–27). As earlier in the book (see Exod 2–3, 5–6, 14), crying out (tsa'aq) to the Lord leads to God's deliverance (15:25a; similarly 16:2–3, 7–9, 12). Israel also learns more about who Yahweh is and will be (cf. 3:14): Yahweh is Israel's healer (15:26b), but Yahweh is also the Lord who instructs; gives statutes, ordinances, and commandments (15:25b–26); and offers the conditional "if" of obedience and covenantal responsibility (15:26a; cf. 19:5–6).

Next, God provides quail for meat and the manna from heaven (16:1–36). This provision is brought on by a more strident complaint (16:2–3; cf. 15:23; 14:11–12); hence, the gift is more extensive. Like the water at Marah, the manna is connected to Israel's ethics (16:4; cf. 15:25b). It is a trial run in covenantal obedience, especially the observance of the Sabbath (see 16:28; cf. Deut 8:2). The gathering of manna evokes the gathering of straw in Exod 5; the only difference is the master Israel now serves. The current one is trustworthy to provide enough for each day, double for the Sabbath (16:22–26), from this point forward until they reach Canaan (16:35; cf. Josh 5:12). So, a jar of manna is to be kept as a perpetual memorial. It reminds Israel Who it is that provides food, as well as that hoarding is not a way of life endorsed by Yahweh (Exod 16:18; cf. 2 Cor 8:1–15).

17:1–7 contains a third provision—another one having to do with water. In this instance, the people "quarrel" with Moses (17:2). Moses interprets this as testing the Lord (cf. 16:7–8); indeed, the Israelites' question seems to forget who brought them out of Egypt in the first place (17:3). Moses cries out (tsa'aq again) and this again leads to God's action (17:4–5). Seeing water gush from the rock gives Israel an answer to their question: "Is the LORD among us or not?" (17:7).

In addition to providing insight into the divine nature, these three units attest to re-creational themes. In the plagues, nature was out of control, as it moved to "uncreation" and the nadir in the ninth and tenth plagues. Now, Israel experiences the re-creation of nature: bitter waters are made sweet, meat and bread rain down in the wilderness, and water bursts forth from a rock.

Israel again complains about food and drink, later, after they depart from Sinai (Num 11; cf. 20:1–13). In Numbers, their complaint is met with provision but also with the Lord's anger, fire, and plague (Num 11:1–3, 10, 20, 33–34). What might explain the difference in divine response there versus in Exodus? One insightful possibility is that Yahweh acts with great patience in Exod 15–17 because Israel is still being formed or reformed— learning to see themselves (and their God) as a loved and cared-for child (with nurturing parent) rather than as an abused slave. But Num 11 follows Sinai. In a real sense, Sinai is Israel's bar mitzvah. At Sinai, Israel grows up, becoming not only Yahweh's firstborn (Exod 4:22) but a "son of the commandment." After Sinai, then, complaints are not tolerated as they are prior to Sinai—no doubt in part because they reflect a much more profound lack of trust in the God who not only delivered, but who has come near in covenant (cf. Deut 4:7–8).

17:8–16. The Attack of Amalek

18:1–27. Interlude: Jethro and Jurisprudence

These two narratives concern two paradigmatic but contrary non-Israelite responses to Israel and its deliverance. First, negatively, comes Amalek, an Edomite tribe (Gen 36:12), that dwelled in the Negev (Num 13:29). Without provocation or explanation, Amalek attacks Israel. Joshua and others fight back, triumphing as long as Moses' hands are upheld. Joshua is victorious, and Israel again learns more about "I AM/WILL BE" (cf. 3:14): "The LORD is my banner" (17:15): both that the Lord's might is efficacious outside of Egypt and Joshua's efficacy as war-general prefigure things to come. The paradigmatic nature of Amalek's response to Israel is signified by 17:16 (cf. Deut 25:17–19).

But non-Israelites can also respond paradigmatically to Israel in positive ways. Jethro reappears in Exod 18:1–27 (cf. 2:18; 4:18). His is a non-Israelite response that hears of God's deliverance (18:1, 8) and rejoices over it (18:9). Indeed, Jethro's subsequent doxology (18:10–11) is nothing short of an affirmation of faith (cf. 18:11 with 15:11) accompanied by requisite sacrifices (18:12). It is not surprising that he was often treated as a convert in later interpretation. What is surprising is that Jethro is the impetus behind a major change in Israelite jurisprudence (18:13–26). Jethro advises Moses to delegate judicial matters and tells him how to pick suitable judges. Jethro even speaks of and for God (18:19, 21, 23). Moses listens and obeys (18:24). Jethro, then, offers a second, more positive option for how the non-Israelite world can receive, interact, even join in with God's people.

II. The Covenant at Sinai (19:1–40:38)

A. The Theophany and the Commandments at Sinai (19:1–24:18)

19:1–25. Encounter at the Mountain of God, Part II. With ch. 19 Israel arrives at Sinai. Here, the second half of the book of Exodus commences. Israel will be at Sinai for the rest of the book—indeed, until Num 10:11. The first chapter of the Sinai pericope, Exod 19, is another place where multiple traditions have come together (cf. Exod 3–4, 14–15, 32–34). Priestly and non-Priestly traditions are here, as, perhaps are two distinct versions (J and E) of the latter and even a few touches from a final redactor (R). The confluence of at least two if not four different sources attests that the contents of Exod 19 are of great importance. The issue that attracted such attention is the (re)formation of Israel. This (re)formation has already been initiated in Exod 15–17, but it is especially pronounced beginning with Exod 19 and running through Exod 24, at least, but really all the way through Num 10:10. Israel will forever remember that what took place at Sinai was foundational and unrepeatable (cf. Deut 4:9–20, 32–40).

The covenant that is enacted in Exod 19–24 is nicely encapsulated in 19:3b–6. God's gracious acts are followed by a conditional "if": if Israel obeys, then Israel will be God's treasured possession, a priestly kingdom, and a holy nation. While this is a unique relationship, Israel is reminded that the Lord claims ownership of everything (19:5b). This claim chastens Israel's election; more importantly, it highlights the intercessory, even missiological, role that Israel serves in the divine economy vis-à-vis "the whole earth." Israel answers the "if" with a resounding "yes" (19:8), and the people made ready "to meet God" (19:17) and receive the Lord's commands. The encounter is nothing short of volcanic (19:16–19).

The introductory matters in Exod 19 are concluded by the ceremony in Exod 24:1–18. In between comes Israel's most important and most ancient law.

20:1–17. The Decalogue

20:18–21. The People's Response

Israel hears the Ten Commandments—or "ten words" (see Exod 34:28; Deut 4:13; 10:4)—directly from God. After that, they are afraid and ask Moses to intercede for all that follows (Exod 20:18–21). This underscores Moses' import but also sets the Decalogue apart as the most important piece of OT law. Its primary position, its place in the ark, and its repetition in other parts of the OT (e.g., Exod 34:11–26; Lev 19; Deut 5:6–21; further Deut 6–11; 12–26) all make the same point. In one sense, all of the law that follows can be seen as dependent on, related to, and/or an explication of the Ten Commandments.

One cannot do justice to the Decalogue in a short space. Only a few comments can be offered. First, the Decalogue includes a condensation of the entire narrative of liberation that has transpired in Exod 3–15. The so-called prologue to the Decalogue reminds Israel about who "I AM/ WILL BE" is (cf. 3:14)—namely, the God who delivered—and thus about what God has done for Israel (20:2). The law-giving and the law-keeping that follow are predicated on the prior grace of the Lord. The Jewish tradition counts this "prologue" as the first commandment. Thus, before all else, one must remember what God has done for us.

The first commandment (in Christian enumeration) forbids other gods priority before Yahweh (20:3). This is not a monotheistic statement so much as a monolatrous one. There may be other gods—indeed there are other gods (cf. 12:12)!—but Israel is not to traffic with them. The only monotheism that matters, ultimately, is an ethical one. The second commandment (in Reformed enumeration) concerns the prohibition of images (20:4–6). In Hebrew, this commandment is closely tied to the first (the "them" in 20:5 refers back to "other gods" in 20:3), hence their combination in Jewish, Lutheran, and Catholic numerations. At one point, this commandment may have prohibited images of Yahweh. Now it refers to created things, which are not to be worshipped as the Creator.

The third commandment prohibits wrongful or trivial use of God's holy name. The verb used here (literally, "take up") may specify wrongful use in public contexts. That could relate to court scenarios (cf. 20:16), use in oath formulae, or even—more broadly—in any way that brings the name into ill repute. At issue, then, is hypocrisy.

The Sabbath commandment was given and narrated in the story of the manna (Exod 16). Here it is tied to the Lord's rest in creation (cf. Deut 5:15, where it is tied to Egyptian servitude). The fifth commandment regarding parents may relate to the fourth insofar as it probably concerns aged parents. As the Sabbath commandment demonstrates, there is more to life than work, so the parent commandment dictates proper treatment for elders who are no longer viable economic producers.

The remaining commandments are especially terse and concern treatment of other people (so also the fifth commandment). The terseness of these directives—and, indeed, of the whole Decalogue—means that much of Israel's legal corpus will contain case law explicating the "constitutional law" of the Decalogue. "You shall not kill" (Exod 20:13, author's translation). But what does this mean? Does it apply to war? Unintentional homicides (see 21:12–14)? These questions are taken up in subsequent laws.

Finally, the tenth commandment includes interior states as well as outward action—perhaps interior affects that lead to external action (cf. Micah 2:2). This prompts one to reread the entire Decalogue and consider how it might apply to the internal world as well as the external one. This too is apparently how Jesus understood matters (see Matt 5:22, 28)

20:22–23:33. The Book of the Covenant. The "Book of the Covenant" (see 24:7a) is widely thought to be among the oldest parts of OT law. It is introduced in 20:22–21:1, a passage detailing laws about worship and specifying that what follows are "ordinances" (21:1)—a term used extensively for law based on but distinct from the Decalogue (cf. Deut 12:1). It concludes in Exod 23:20–33, a passage describing what God will do for Israel if the people obey (23:22). By framing the central laws of the Book of the Covenant, this introduction and conclusion indicate that Israel's observance of these laws is both an act of worship and a measure of their covenant fidelity upon which their future success in Canaan and subsequent relationship with God will depend.

As a collection, the Book of the Covenant is disparate, containing laws that run the gamut from religious to civil matters. In addition to the introductory laws on worship (20:22–26), one finds laws pertaining to personal injury (21:12–27), property (21:28–36), compensation for wrongdoing (22:1–15), and so on. This is not a "collection" marked by obvious coherence or unity. "Collection" also signals that this unit may not have functioned as a law code proper. Many legal issues are not discussed in the Book of the Covenant; even punishment for violation is often left unmentioned. The Book of the Covenant may have been a compilation of legal wisdom or a compendium of principles for judges as they made decisions about related matters.

A few points about the Book of the Covenant should be underscored.

1. Although it may be an early collection, it contains pieces that obviously stem from later periods.

2. Laws concerning slavery (21:2–11, 20–21, 26–27, 32; 23:12; already in 20:10, 17) are a case in point. They are also odd considering the dominant liberative thrust of Exodus. How could Israel enslave others, playing the part of Pharaoh to another, especially given the Sabbath command (20:17; cf. 5:6–9; Deut 5:15)? Do these slave laws indicate that Israel failed to live up to a life marked by exodus? One might first reply that these laws surely come from a later point in Israel's history. Second, in most cases, the kind of slavery discussed in these laws is intra-Israelite and is of a different kind than Egyptian slavery. Most laws about slavery in the OT concern persons who work to pay off economic debts; the laws typically insure a limited period of service (Exod 21:2; cf. Deut 15:12–18), except in very rare circumstances (Exod 21:5–6). This is quite different from Egyptian slavery, which was ethnically demarcated and indefinite in duration. Most, but not all (see, e.g., Lev 25:44–46), Israelite slave practices thus do not undercut the primary liberative thrust of the exodus. Indeed, some have argued that even the slave laws are marked by humanitarian concerns (e.g., limiting the length of servitude, circumscribing the power of the slaveowner).

3. If so, and certainly in others places in the Book of the Covenant, Israel begins to model within its community something of God's redemption of the people (see esp. 22:21–27; 23:6, 8–9, 11–12). This is clearly a process, though, and not yet complete. Israel is still very much in the process of (re)formation. It is left to a later law collection to abolish Israelite slavery (Lev 25) and a still later writer to come close to abolishing slavery altogether (Gal 3:28; Philemon).

4. Insofar as the ordinances concern the good of the community and its life, they become part of God's (re)creative work in the world. Law in the OT thus becomes a picture of the way in which the community should live.

5. The lex talionis, the so-called "eye for an eye" law (21:23–25), deserves brief comment. In its ancient context, this law is not a vindictive prescription. To the contrary, the talion law is a measure of proper justice, making sure that punishment matches the crime.

24:1–18. Sealing the Covenant. The people respond to the ordinances (24:3; cf. 21:1) as they did at the very start: with full agreement (24:3; cf. 19:8). The covenant is marked by a written document (24:7a), the building of an altar, and sacrifices (24:4–6). After hearing the Book of the Covenant, the people again reiterate their commitment (cf. 19:8; 24:3), adding "and we will be obedient" (24:7b). Moses then sprinkles them with "the blood of the covenant" (24:8).

As a final act of covenantal agreement, Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders ascend the mountain, see God, and share a meal (24:1–2, 9–11). Despite some confusion about who is present (cf. 24:1–2 with 9–11, 12–13, 15), perhaps due to the blending of different sources, the statement that these individuals saw God (twice, with two different verbs) is remarkable. Despite the fear that is often associated with seeing God (see, e.g., 33:20; Deut 18:16; Judg 6:22), people do frequently encounter God in the OT and survive (see, e.g., Gen 16:13; 32:30; Judg 13:22). In Exod 24, seeing God signals the proximity of the Deity and the people in the unique bond of covenant (cf. 25:8; 29:45–46).

Exodus 24:12–18 provides a transition to what follows. It mentions the tablets of stone that Moses will receive from God and states that Moses remained on the mountain for forty days and forty nights—a generic number that designates a lengthy and full period. Much will happen during this time.

B. Instructions for the Lord's Tabernacle (25:1–31:18)

Moses receives extensive instructions for the tabernacle (for a reconstruction see fig. 1). The tabernacle is critical because it serves as the physical sign of God's presence and movable center for worshipping the Lord in the wilderness (cf. 2 Sam 7:6). (The ark of the covenant plays similar functions, functioning as the mobile throne by which God goes into battle [cf. Num 10:35; 1 Sam 4:3–5] and from which the Lord delivers additional commandments [Exod 25:22].) The tabernacle also provides a model for the Temple (1 Kgs 5–7). The importance of the tabernacle as the physical habitation of the Deity explains the detail that marks Exod 25–31. Little is left unspecified; the style of the chapters is fulsome. Care for God's tabernacle includes special attention to those who serve therein (Exod 28–29; 30:17–30). Also of great import are the specific practices that take place in the tabernacle (29:38–46) and provisions for its ongoing maintenance (30:11–16). These details concerning the tabernacle, along with its personnel and rituals, are all repeated, in virtually identical form, in Exod 35–40. This repetition is of crucial theological importance, since it follows the report of Israel's violation of the covenant and God's renewal of the covenant (Exod 32–34, on which see below).

Fig. 1. Plan of the Tabernacle (from N. M. Sarna, Exploring Exodus: The Heritage of Biblical Israel [New York: Schocken, 1996], 192).

This repetition also signals something about the larger structure and meaning of Exodus. Exodus 25–31 and 35–40 may be seen as parallel panels, the first planning a place for God's presence, the second preparing that place. Exodus 1–24 and 32–34 may also then be construed as parallel panels, each having to do with God's acts to facilitate the people's arrival at this place of presence as well as to deal with the problems that complicate the achievement of that goal. A two-act outline of Exodus results (Janzen):

A 1–24: Oppression, Redemption, Covenant

B 25–31: Planning a Place for Presence

Act 2

A' 32–34: Sin, Redemption, Covenant

B' 35–40: Preparing a Place for Presence

In each act, God delivers Israel from evil to enable the move to B/B'. In the first act, the evil is Egyptian oppression. In the second, it is the evil of Israel's own sin in the golden calf episode. This structure suggests that Exodus focuses on God's redemption—the salvation (or justification) of the people—so as to bring them into intimate relationship (6:7; 19:5–6; Lev 11:45; 22:33; 25:38; 26:12; Num 15:41; Deut 26:17; 29:13)—the covenant with God (or sanctification of the people). The latter is the special emphasis of Exod 25–31. Here Israel receives two additional insights into the nature of "I AM/WILL BE" (3:14), first, in 29:45–46: "I will dwell among the Israelites . . . I am the LORD their God, who brought them out of the land of Egypt that I might dwell among them"; then in 31:13: "that you might know that I am the LORD, who sanctifies you" (author's translation).

C. The Covenant Violated and Renewed (32:1–34:35).

Exodus 32–34 is the fourth place at which various sources that make up the Pentateuch have come together in particularly complicated ways (cf. Exod 3–4, 14–15, 19). The crucial issue in this case is restoration: can Israel be restored after violating the covenant in such a devastating way and at the worst of times—immediately after the covenant has been made? Given the seriousness of this question, it is not surprising that several traditions offered responses to it.

32:1–35. The Golden Calf Debacle. Chapter 32 returns to the foot of the mountain, where Israel has been waiting for Moses since he disappeared into the cloud (24:18). While "forty days and forty nights" is a generic term, it is nevertheless a considerable time for Israel to be without its leader. The people's request that Aaron make them "gods for us, who shall go before us" is directly related to Moses' delay (32:1).

The narrative that follows is not without some ambiguity. Is Aaron's declaration of a festival to the Lord (32:5) an attempt to set things right after the people's idolatrous definition of the calf (32:4b)?

Or is his declaration the worst kind of syncretism? On balance, Exod 32 as a whole presents Aaron in a distinctly unfavorable light (32:21–24, 35b).

Several issues seem to lie just beneath the present form of the chapter. One of these concerns the calf itself. Only one calf is made, but the Israelites designate it with a plural: "your gods" (contrast Neh 9:18). Is the calf envisioned as an animal mount—perhaps a divine one—with a god riding upon it? Such iconography is common in the ancient Near East. Or is the plural form of Exod 32:4 a not-so-subtle polemic against Jeroboam, who speaks virtually identical words (1 Kgs 12:28b) after making two calves of gold, one for Dan and one for Bethel (1 Kgs 12:29)? And why a calf or young bull? Bull imagery is largely eschewed for the Lord in the OT, probably because it was frequently associated with both El and Baal—gods of the Canaanite pantheon. Is the calf a Canaanite motif? Alternatively, bovine imagery is used extensively in Egypt, especially of the cowgoddess Hathor (note also Apis and Mnevis, who have been proffered as possible referents). In this reading, does the calf evoke a desire for things Egyptian, perhaps even an attempt to "marry" the goddess Hathor to the god Yahweh?

These questions permit no firm answers. What is certain, however, is that the calf violates the first and second commandments (20:3–6). This serious violation happens at the very moment place of covenant-making. Adding further to this irony is that the people apparently want proof of divine accompaniment (32:1). At the very moment of their apostasy, Moses is receiving instructions for how God's presence will accompany Israel in the tabernacle (recall 20:18–19; cf. 28:35)! Perhaps worst of all, Israel takes a key aspect of the divine name—"I am the LORD who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (20:2)—and applies it to the calf. This, too, violates the Decalogue (20:2, 7), but is equally at profound odds with the entire revelation of Yahweh throughout Exodus.

It is no wonder that God immediately disowns the people (32:7) and plans to start again, with Moses as Abraham redivivus (32:10; cf. Gen 12:2). Destruction is only narrowly averted by Moses' intercession (32:11–14; cf. 33:12–23). He reminds Yahweh that Israel belongs to him, no one else (32:11a; cf. 32:7), and he restores the epithet "bringer out of Egypt" to Yahweh, to whom it belongs (32:11b). Moses suggests that Yahweh consider the divine reputation in Egyptian eyes (32:12), and, failing all else, remember the ancestors (32:13; cf. 2:24). Remarkably, God does exactly what Moses asks and foregoes the planned destruction (32:14; cf. 32:12b; Jonah 3:10).

Though the people are spared, the covenant is declared null and void by the breaking of the tablets (32:19; cf. 32:15; 31:18; 24:12). Moses destroys the calf thoroughly (32:20), reprimands Aaron (32:21), and calls those still faithful to Yahweh—the Levites—to fight the apostate, whomever they may be (32:25–29).

The "great sin" (32:21, 31) of the golden calf, therefore, threatens to undo all that has come before. The parallel structure of Exod 1–24//32–34 shows that evil and sin can be theological (32) as much as socio-political (2–5). Evil and sin can be individualized (cf. 32:26) and systemic (a la Pharaoh's sin). Both types must be redeemed; both require atonement and forgiveness (6:6; 10:17; 32:30; 34:9).

Following the re-creation of Israel in Exod 15ff., Exod 32 can be seen as "the Fall"—Israel's primal sin. The remainder of Exodus considers if and in what way that Fall can be countered in (new) recreation. Already in Exod 32, it is clear that not all of Israel will survive the process (32:28, 33, 34b–35).

33:1–6. The Command to Leave Sinai Without God's Presence

33:7–11. The Tent of Meeting Outside the Camp

33:12–23. Moses' Intercession

In 32:4 Yahweh commanded Moses to lead the people on, saying that the angel would accompany them. No mention is made, however, of the Lord's own presence (contrast 13:21; 29:45–46). What was just a hint in 32:4 becomes explicit in 33:1–6. Yahweh returns to distanced speech about Israel, attributing them to Moses (33:1a; cf. 32:7, 11). Although Yahweh does mention the ancestors (33:1b; cf. 32:13), the first element in Moses' intercession has apparently failed. Instead, the Lord declares that he will not go up in Israel's midst (33:3a); their rebellion would lead God to consume them (33:3b).

After the people react appropriately to "these harsh words" (33:4–6) and an aside about Moses' tent of meeting, a kind of precursor to the tabernacle (33:7–11; cf. 27:21), the narrative resumes with Moses interceding yet again (33:12–25; cf. 32:11–13). Here too he proves a skillful orator by first discussing himself and his role (33:12–13a)—which is not under negotiation—and only then, quickly and briefly, reminding Yahweh that Israel is "your people" (33:13b). Again, Yahweh listens to Moses (cf. 32:14), promising his presence—at least with Moses ("you" in 33:14 is singular). But Moses presses for Israel, speaking of "us" and stating that only God's presence will make him favored and Israel (again described as "your people") "distinct" (33:16)—an important aspect in the plagues (see 8:22; 9:4, 26; 10:23; 11:7; 12:23). Yahweh accedes, apparently solely because of Moses (33:17): Moses has again proved instrumental in redeeming the people, now from their own sin. But still Moses presses for more: not satisfied with seeing God's ways (33:13), he now asks to see the Lord's "glory" (33:18). Exodus 33:11 already stated that Yahweh and Moses spoke "face to face, as one speaks to a friend," but Moses seeks more: insight into the divine nature. Like his earlier attempt to know God's name (3:13), Moses' current request will be partially granted and partially denied. Moses will not see God's glory but only God's "goodness" (33:19) and "back" (33:23) "for no one can see me and live" (33:20, author's translation, cf. 24:10). And Moses receives further insight into the meaning of the divine name: "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy" (33:19). This is quickly revised in 34:6–7.

34:1–9. The Revelation of Yahweh

34:10–28. The Covenant Renewed

As a sign that the covenant is renewed, Moses again ascends the mountain, bringing new tablets to be reinscribed (34:1–4). Yahweh then passes before Moses and proclaims the name "The LORD" (34:5). But what seemed to be capricious in 33:19—giving grace and mercy however God saw fit—is now clarified and extended into a creedal statement that is repeated in various parts of the OT (34:6b–7; see Num 14:18; Jer 32:18; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Nah 1:3; Pss 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Neh 9:17). This is the final and fullest clarification of "I AM/WILL BE" (3:14). At crucial points, the book of Exodus has offered insight about the nature of the Lord. Here, at the most crucial point of covenant renewal, we hear of the Lord's mercy, grace, patience, steadfast love, and forgiveness (contrast 20:5–6). To be sure, there is also punishment and requiting, but the divine scales are decisively tilted toward grace and mercy: thousandth generation to fourth. Moses bows in worship (34:8). But even the model leader, he also capitalizes on God's mercy and grace to intercede again for Israel. For the first time, Moses himself admits that Israel is stiff-necked, but he knows that the Lord will pardon (34:9; cf. 34:7a).

The Lord agrees by reinstating a covenant (34:10, 27), which includes a reiteration of several of the covenantal laws that have come before (cf., e.g., 34:17 with 20:4, 23; 34:21 with 23:12; etc.). Contrary to 34:1 and 28, however, 34:11–26 are not identical with the Ten Commandments. Scholars often call 34:11–26 the "ritual Decalogue" since it focuses primarily on worship. While this ritual Decalogue has a distinct origin from the "ethical" one, in the literary context, its emphasis on worship makes sense because the threat to the covenant has been posed precisely by and within a liturgical context (the calf). Moreover, the fact that the ritual Decalogue begins with the prohibition of worship of other gods like 20:3–4, and ends with a law that parallels the last one in the Book of the Covenant (34:26b//23:19b), suggests that this unit is meant to stand in as a summary of in continuity with 20:1–23:19.

34:29–35. Moses' Visage. At the conclusion of his second stay on the mountain (34:27), Moses returns and his face "shone" (34:29). The verb used here (qaran) is a denominative from the noun "horn" (qeren). While most ancient versions translated the verb with words meaning "shine" (so also NRSV), the Vulgate understood that Moses' face was horned. Such an interpretation was memorialized in art by Michelangelo's famous statue. Other perspectives are possible, but the horned one is intriguing given the long-standing practice in ancient Near Eastern iconography to depict divinities with horns (the motif is neither restricted to bovine deities nor to just one type of god). Moses' being horned, in this light, would be a sign that he has been exposed to divinity, even taking on some of those characteristics himself. Alternatively, it might be noted that pharaohs in Dynasties 18–19 frequently wore a ram's horn on their face representing, apparently, their deification. Whether this depiction derived from general ancient Near Eastern or Egyptian iconography or simply designating an unusual radiance, Moses' close encounter with God is now physically manifest, visible to all. He has become, more than ever before, God's stand-in. Not surprisingly, the people are afraid (34:30; cf. 20:18–19). But Moses, like Yahweh, calls to them nevertheless and tells them everything (34:31–32). Subsequently, when Moses speaks with Yahweh and delivers Yahweh's words, his face is seen shining (or horned); otherwise, he veils his face, not unlike Yahweh himself (34:33–35; cf. 33:20).

D. Israel at Full Stretch (35:1–40:38)

The final six chapters of the book of Exodus are often undervalued. This is undoubtedly due to the repetitive nature of these materials: the instructions laid out in chs. 25–31 are enacted in chs. 35–40 in close detail. On the face of it, there is little new here, and so scholars often give the final unit short shrift. This practical result is that many treatments end with an exposition of chs. 32–34, which are then touted as the theological climax of Exodus. In point of fact, chs. 35–40 are of equal or greater theological significance.

The Sabbath regulations in 35:1–3 pick up where 31:12–17 left off, almost as if ch 32 never happened. In light of the extensive work to follow, the Sabbath command reminds Israel of the importance of rest. After this comes preparation for the construction, including offerings for the tabernacle's materials (cf. 35:4–9 with 25:1–7), an overview of what will be constructed (35:10–19), response to the instructed offering (35:20–29), and mention of Bezalel and Oholiab (35:30–36:2; cf. 31:1–11). The request for offering is open-ended (35:5: "whoever is of a generous heart"), but the response is overwhelming, moving quickly from all whose heart was stirred and whose spirit was willing (35:21) to "both men and women; all who were of a willing heart" (35:22a) until finally it is simply "everyone" (35:22b, 23, 24 [twice]) or "all" (35:25, 26, 29). The offerings brought exceed the need (36:3–7). These Israelites have been reformed: from Egypt, through the wilderness, into the covenant and out of it through the calf debacle, only to be brought near again in chs. 33–34. They no longer have stiff necks (32:9; 33:3, 5; 34:9) but willing hearts and spirits (35:21–22, 26, 29; cf. 25:2).

In contrast to the order in chs. 25–31, the tabernacle is constructed before the ark (36:8–38; cf. 26:1–37), probably because the structure that houses the ark should be built before the ark itself. The construction of the ark follows immediately (37:1–9; cf. 25:10–22), then the table for the bread of the presence (37:10–16; cf. 25:23–30), and the lampstand (37:17–24; cf. 25:31–40). For some unexplained reason, 37:25–28 then moves to the altar of incense—a major dislocation vis-à-vis chs. 25–31, which doesn't discuss the incense altar until 30:1–10. As part of this dislocation is another: 37:29 briefly recounts the making of the anointing oil and incense (cf. 30:22–37). It may have simply made sense to associate the incense with the incense altar so that chs. 35–40 present a streamlined version of chs. 25–31. With Exod 38 we return to the order of chs. 25–31, discussing the altar of burnt offering (38:1–8; cf. 27:1–8) and the courtyard and its hangings (38:9–20; cf. 27:9–19). Exodus 38:21–31 is a brief digression, "the records of the tabernacle" (38:21), after which 39:1–31 parallels 28:1–43 regarding the priestly vestments. The ordination of the priests (29:1–37) is delayed until Lev 8 and the sacrifices of Exod 29:38–46 are discussed extensively in Lev 1–7 and inaugurated in Lev 9. The half-shekel offering (30:11–16) is taken up in 38:25–28, where it directly contributes to the decoration of the tabernacle. The completion of work is recounted in 39:32–43 with the erection and consecration of the tabernacle coming in 40:1–33. Yahweh then fills the tabernacle (40:34–38), one year after the Israelites departed Egypt (see 12:2). Yahweh now dwells with the people (cf. 29:45–46), and the tabernacle assumes the role formerly played by the pillar of cloud and fire (13:17–22).

The strong similarities between chs. 25–31 and chs. 35–40 are significant. Both sections derive from the Priestly source; detailed and precise instructions for ritual practice are important. Although the dating of "P" is debated, there can be no doubt that P was important in exile and beyond—during times when the proper tools or locus of priestly worship were inaccessible. At such times, the repetition of chs. 25–31 and chs. 35–40 could function as a kind of visionary experience, even something on which to meditate; one could compare mystical developments known later in Judaism which focused on the Temple (Hekhalot mysticism; cf. Ezek 40–43; Pss 48, 122), heavenly worship (the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice from Qumran), or God's throne (Merkabah mysticism; cf. Ezek 1). Perhaps Exod 25–31 + 35–40 stands as a precursor of such mysticism.

If chs. 32–34 represent Israel's fundamental sin, then the repetition of chs. 25–31 in chs. 35–40 plays another important theological function. The "creation" that began in chs. 25–31 and threatened by the "fall" in chs. 32–34 is set back on the right course (re-creation) in chs. 35–40. The way this repetition is presented is crucial. Everywhere the repetition underscores exact obedience in a precise command-execution format. This obedience marks all involved in the work and all that the Lord commanded (39:42–43). "As the LORD had commanded Moses" occurs eighteen times in two chapters (39:1, 5, 7, 21, 26, 29, 31, 32, 42, 43; 40:16, 19, 21, 23, 25, 27, 29, 32). Some of this obedience is Bezalel's and Moses', but the work culminates in a three-fold citation of the people's obedience (39:32, 42, 43a), which leads directly to Mosaic blessing (39:43b). The repetition at work in chs. 35–40, then, is far from redundant, but literary proof of complete obedience, which is in turn proof that God's second act of redemption worked and that the second attempt at covenant "took." Israel's vows in 19:6; 24:3, 7 are proven, in the end, not to be delusional but true—thanks to the forgiveness of God. That forgiveness-empowered-obedience leads directly, even inevitably, to the indwelling of the tabernacle and God's presence—in many ways the goal of the book of Exodus—now fully realized (40:34).

This is how Exodus ends, then, in human obedience and in divine presence—indwelling—with Israel. So, much later, when John 1:14 describes God's word becoming flesh and living (literally, "tabernacle-ing," eske⁻no⁻sen) among us, it is not simply the vocabulary but the very thought itself that is rooted in Exodus. The tabernacle-ing of God in Exodus is facilitated, if not actually caused, by human obedience. Humans can and do disobey—in the worst of ways and at the worst of times (Exod 32)—but they can be restored. That restoration can in turn become manifest in precise obedience to the Lord's commands. To use later theological vocabulary, such a movement is one of sanctification. That is how Exodus ends.

There is another sense, however, in which the book of Exodus refuses to end. Disobedience remains a lively issue, as is clear in Lev 1–7 (also Lev 16), which contains extensive instructions regarding sin and impurity. And there are numerous texts narrating further disobedience (e.g., Lev 10; Num 11, 13–14, 16, 20, 21, 25). The issues raised in Exod 32–34 are thus not yet definitively settled; Israel's sanctification is ongoing.

Additionally, the Sinai pericope runs through Num 10:10. Only then do the Israelites finally depart from God's mountain (see Num 10:11–13). It is within this large block that Israel placed her most important law, even if much of that is now obviously anachronistic in such a context. By means of this extension of the Sinai pericope into Leviticus and Numbers, Exodus has a hard time ending in ch 40.

Even after Numbers comes Deuteronomy, which does not advance the movement from Egypt into Canaan but instead circles back, reiterating much of the story and much of the law—in revised fashion —for a new generation camped in the plains of Moab opposite Jericho. In its distinctive way, Deuteronomy situates that second generation (or any subsequent reader) over and over again at the seminal moments: as beneficiaries of the Lord's deliverance (e.g., Deut 6:21–22) and recipients of the Lord's commandments (e.g., Deut 4:10–20; 5:2–4), but also as worshipers of the golden calf (Deut 9:8–21) and rebels in the spy disaster at Kadesh (Deut 1:19–45; see Num 13–14). This strategy constantly presses the question of covenantal obedience upon the reader. Even (maybe especially) here, then, Exodus has not ended but is repeated, re-appropriated, and reapplied for a new generation facing new circumstances in a new land. Deuteronomy's "upgrade" becomes foundational for much of the rest of the OT, especially the Deuteronomistic History of Joshua–Kings, all of which, in this light, traces itself back to Exodus. But this should come as no surprise. Exodus is, after all, arguably the most important book in the Bible, recounting the foundational salvific act of God in all of Scripture. One never finishes with or "ends" something that important.

LEVITICUS

BARUCH J.SCHWARTZ

OVERVIEW

The name Leviticus derives from the Greek Levitikon, "things pertaining to the Levites," expressing the fact that much of this book has to do with the laws of worship and purification, for which the priests in ancient Israel, who were of the tribe of Levi, were primarily responsible. The Hebrew equivalent, torat kohanim "instruction of (or 'for') priests," is the standard name for Leviticus in Talmudic literature. The book is also called wayyiqra' ("and [the LORD] called"), the Hebrew word with which the book opens.

Leviticus must be read as part of the larger literary complex extending from Exod 25 to Num 10. According to that literature, when the Israelites' arrived at Mount Sinai, God instructed Moses to supervise the manufacture of a tabernacle, a portable abode for the divine Presence (or Glory), and to consecrate his brother Aaron and the latter's sons to serve there as priests. The tabernacle was also to be the place of lawgiving, where God would meet with Moses and convey all of God's commands (Exod 25:22); thus it is also called "tent of meeting." After the tabernacle and all its appurtenances were completed, the Glory of the Lord took up residence, the priests were consecrated, worship commenced, the laws were conveyed, the tribes were mustered and arranged, and instructions for the journey to Canaan were given. Then the Israelites finally departed from Sinai and began their journey to Canaan.

All of these events are said to have taken place in just under a single year. The portion of the narrative that constitutes the book of Leviticus covers precisely one month of that period: the first month of the second year after the exodus. It comprises (Lev 1–7; 11–23; 24:10–27:35) a detailed report concerning the commandments conveyed to Moses in a series of meetings with the Lord in the tabernacle. Only two passages refer to events other than the lawgiving itself (Lev 8–10 and 24:1–9), and they are intimately connected with it.

The first laws given are those pertaining to sacrifice (chs. 1–7). These are followed by the account of the consecration of the priesthood and the inauguration of the tabernacle service, culminating in the crime of Aaron's sons and the consequences thereof (chs. 8–10). The law-giving then continues with the commandments concerning permitted and forbidden foods (ch. 11), the purification and atonement following physical defilement (chs. 12–15), the annual Day of Atonement (ch. 16), the prohibitions of profane slaughter and blood (ch. 17), sexual crimes (chs. 18 and 20), miscellaneous regulations assuring Israel's holiness (ch. 19), the sanctity of the priests (ch. 21) and the qualifications for sacrificial animals (ch. 22), the annual holy days (ch. 23), the oil for the tabernacle lamp (24:1–4) and the bread of presence (24:5–9). The account of the crime of the blasphemer follows (24:10–16, 23), after which the concluding laws are given, pertaining to the sabbatical and jubilee years and to slavery and property rights (25:1–26:2). These are followed directly by God's promises of reward for compliance and his threat of dire measures if compliance is not forthcoming (26:3–45). The laws about vows and tithes (ch. 27) are then appended.

The tabernacle narrative, including the entire book of Leviticus with all of the laws it contains, belongs to the Priestly document, or P, the largest of the four narrative strands that were woven together to create the Pentateuch. This portion of the Priestly document narrative is an independent and autonomous account of the Sinai events and cannot be harmonized or reconciled with the three other accounts of how Israelites received their laws. (For a brief explanation of the other traditions in the Pentateuch, see the commentary about the creation stories in Gen 1–2.) Similarly P's version of the laws themselves constitutes a complete and independent law code that neither complements nor supplements the laws contained in the other sources. In P's view, only the events recounted in its own narrative took place, and only the laws contained in its legal passages—a large portion of which are in Leviticus—were commanded. For this reason, no attempt will be made here to explain P's laws in conjunction with the laws in J (the Yahwist document), E (the Elohist document), or D (the Deuteronomist document); rather they will be considered on their own terms, with the legal traditions reflected in the non-Priestly sources serving for the purposes of contrast. The aim of the interpretation is thus to demonstrate the uniqueness of the Priestly legal tradition.

The Priestly document (P) achieved its final form after the Holiness Legislation (H, see the introduction to ch. 17) was added to it. Biblical scholars once unanimously embraced the idea that P is the latest of the sources and assigned it to the exilic or post-exilic period, and many critics still adhere to this view. However, a significant number of scholars now assign the Priestly literature to the pre-exilic period, adducing weighty literary, historical, and linguistic arguments in favor of this. According to this view, which seems preferable, the Priestly source was the product of learned scribes of the Jerusalemite priesthood during the last centuries of the Judean kingdom, and it took shape in two phases, the Holiness Legislation being added to the earlier Priestly work in the final years before the exile. However, the dissemination of P took place only much later, when P was combined with the other sources to create the Pentateuch, in the post-exilic period. For this reason, the widespread influence of Priestly law on Israelite religion did not begin in earnest until a relatively late date. The division of the Pentateuch into five scrolls, or "books," became necessary when the sources were combined, since the resulting text, the Pentateuch, was so lengthy that it could not be written on a single scroll; that is how the book of Leviticus, like the other four books of the Pentateuch, came into existence.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Laws of Sacrifice (1–7)

The Book of Exodus concluded with the Lord's Glory, i.e., the fiery cloud encasing his manifest Presence, taking up residence in the Tabernacle (Exod 40:34–35). Immediately thereafter God begins to issue his commands—just as had been announced in advance (Exod 25:22). In the speeches that comprise the first seven chapters of Leviticus, he commands how to perform each of the five types of sacrificial offering, detailing the materials required, outlining the procedure to be followed, prescribing the manner in which the portions are to be consumed or disposed of and, where appropriate, indicating the result thereby accomplished. Two sets of commands are given (1:1–6:7 and 6:8–7:38); each set relating to all five types of offering. In the first set, the main focus is on the altar ritual and what precedes it; in the second, further instructions are given, pertaining primarily to how the offering is to be apportioned and handled thereafter.

The offerings are prescribed here as occasional offerings made by individuals. However, they are mandated frequently in other texts as well, either as individual offerings to be made in certain circumstances (e.g., 12:6–8; 15:9–20; Num 6:10–17; 8:8) or, in the case of the first four of the five, as sacrifices to be made on behalf of the Israelite people, either in connection with the dedication of the tabernacle and the inauguration of the priesthood, in which context they have actually been mentioned earlier, in anticipation of this passage (e.g. Exod 29:14, 18, 28), and will also be mentioned again (see 8:2, 14, 18; 9:2–4 etc.) or as part of the statutory regimen of worship to be carried out on regularly occurring, prescribed occasions (see Exod 29:38–42 and Num 28:1–30:1).

A. The Five Types of Offering (1:1–6:7)

The five types of sacrifice divide into two distinct groups. In the first group (chs. 1–3) are gift offerings, of which there are three types: burnt offerings, grain offerings and sacrifices of well-being. When offered by individuals, these are expressions of the worshiper's spontaneous desire to present something to the Lord and are thus essentially voluntary. In the second group (4:1–6:7) are expiatory (or "atoning") sacrifices, of which there are two types: the "sin" or purification offering and the "guilt" or reparation offering. These are required in consequence of specific circumstances and are thus obligatory.^{1–3} Gift Offerings. An "offering" in Hebrew is literally "that which is brought near," i.e., presented to God. Any Israelite, male or female, may make a gift offering at any time. Typical occasions might be the fulfillment of vows, moments of distress, gratitude for recovery from illness or deliverance from danger. Beyond this, any time a person is simply moved to pay homage to God, the private visit to the sanctuary and the sacrifice of a gift offering is the accepted expression of piety.

The section outlining the three types of gift offering begins with the stipulation that animal sacrifices are to be made "from the herd or from the flock"; i.e., of domesticated livestock: cattle, sheep or goats (1:2). It then goes on to delineate how this is to be carried out, if the worshiper has decided to make a burnt offering (1:3–13), and how it is to be performed, if the worshiper has decided to make a well-being sacrifice (3:1–16). Sandwiched in between these two sections, which actually form a continuous text, are two additional laws: the provision for a burnt offering from fowl (1:14–17) and the law of grain offerings (2:1–16). These have presumably been inserted in order to enable those without access to herd and flock animals to perform acceptable acts of devotion.

The burnt offering (1:1–17) is the gift offering par excellence; the Hebrew term means "that which goes up [in smoke]." The flesh of the animal is consumed on the altar in its entirety; all of it, so to speak, becomes God's food, and the person who makes the offering derives no personal benefit from it. Leviticus does not explain what might move a person to make a burnt offering; it is simply taken for granted that a wholly consumed animal sacrifice is the most elementary form of devotion. For this reason, the burnt offering was also the central, indispensable component of public worship: two sheep were offered daily as a perpetual burnt offering (Exod 29:38–42; Num 28:1–8) and this number was duly augmented on Sabbaths, New Moons, and festivals (Num 28:9–30:1).

The person making the offering places his hand upon the animal's head as an act of presentation. The Hebrew indicates that the worshiper also performs the slaughter, which was done by slitting the throat, and the flaying of the animal. As for the priest, his task is to receive and present the blood, dashing some of it round about the altar, and to place the flesh on the altar fire—which the priests were to stoke and keep burning constantly—so that it is consumed completely, entrails and legs included. Thus the worshiper is responsible for transferring ownership of the animal to God and for transforming it from a living animal into food fit for divine consumption; the priests, as God's palace servants, are responsible for the sacred tasks of dashing the blood and offering the flesh as a gift to the Lord.

The references to "acceptance" in vv. 3 and 4 express concern about the worshiper's need to know that his offering has been accepted. According to 22:17–20, if the worshiper sees to it that the animal is without any disqualifying blemish, acceptance is assured. The significance of the statement that the burnt offering secures "atonement" (v. 4) is uncertain; the sense may be that it is accepted as a sort of payment, which some have taken to mean as a substitute for the worshiper himself. However, it is neither the death of the animal nor the dashing of the blood that results in "atonement"; rather, in this case, the presentation of the animal as an offering to God provides for "atonement."

The expression "an offering by fire" (vv. 9 et al.) is now known to be a mistranslation; the Hebrew word actually means "gift." Only burnt offerings, grain offerings, and sacrifices of well-being are thus in view; the expiatory sacrifices are not gifts but rituals of purification. As for the oft-recurring statement that the smoke rising from the altar is a "pleasing odor to the LORD," the Priestly legislation is perfectly comfortable with depicting God as inhaling the fragrant odor of roasting flesh and deriving pleasure from it.

Just as the quadrupeds acceptable for sacrifice are the domesticated livestock, so too the birds that may be offered as burnt offerings, turtle doves and pigeons, are the two types of domesticated fowl used for human consumption.

The second type of gift offering is the grain offering (2:1–16). The Hebrew term for this offering means "tribute," expressing the basic idea that God is Israel's suzerain and that the Israelites are expected to pay him that which is his due. In the Priestly sacrificial texts, this general term has received its specialized sense of "offering made of grain." The two ingredients needed to make such an offering, "choice flour," i.e. semolina, and olive oil, would be available even to the poorest Israelite, suggesting that the law was introduced so that even persons of humble rank might visit the sanctuary and pay "tribute," i.e. perform a respectable act of devotion. The grain offering also plays an important role in the regimen of statutory public offerings, accompanying the burnt offerings made each morning and evening (see Exod 29:40; Num 28–29).

The individual who has decided to present a grain offering has several options regarding its preparation. He may present the mixture of flour and oil uncooked (v. 1); this is the simplest to prepare, but, because it requires the addition of frankincense, it is quite costly. The remaining types, which require no frankincense, compensate for the smaller financial investment by involving some exertion in preparation of unleavened cakes: oven-baked (as loaves or wafers, v. 4), griddle-toasted (and crumbled, vv. 5–6), and pan-fried (v. 7). Only a representative, or "token," portion of the grain offering is consumed on the altar (if the offering is offered in its uncooked form, this includes all of the frankincense, since this is God's alone); the remainder is eaten by the priest (see 6:18; 7:9). For the rationale behind this, see 6:17. Before the priest places the token portion upon the altar, the entire offering is presented by the worshiper. Analogous to the placement of the hand on the animal (see 1:4), this serves as an indication that the cakes, loaves, or wafers are not from the worshiper's everyday pantry but have been prepared specifically for use as an offering to God.

The grain offering too is called a "gift" and is said to be "of pleasing odor to the LORD." Outside of the Priestly laws, it is assumed that the addition of fragrant spice is what renders the offering pleasing (see Isa 1:13; 43:23; Jer 6:20; 17:26; 41:5; Ps 141:2), but in Leviticus this is not stipulated; here the Lord's food gifts are intrinsically pleasing. The grain offering is also referred to as "most holy" (vv. 3, 10); for the significance see 6:24–29. In the Priestly system for worship, offerings are classified according to precisely defined ascending grades of sanctity, as are the sections of the tabernacle and all its appurtenances.

Neither leaven (sourdough) nor honey (the nectar of dates and figs) may be used in any grain offerings (vv. 11–12). To be precise, these may be offered but not placed on the altar, suggesting that it is specifically the fermentation of the grain offering, but not these substances per se, that is to be avoided—probably in order to ensure that the preparation, offering, and eating all take place within a brief time period and in proximity to the altar. The requirement to salt the grain offering (v. 13) is a corollary of this condition, since salt was thought to be an anti-fermentation agent. The expression "the salt of the covenant with your God" should not be over-interpreted; it simply means that the salting of grain offerings is a solemn obligation to be observed for all time.

In what reads like something of an afterthought, the possibility that one might bring a grain offering "of first fruits" is mentioned (vv. 14–16). The English word "fruits" is used here in its general sense of "produce of the soil"; the text actually refers here too to grain, grain that has not fully matured so that flour cannot be made from it. It is prepared and offered in the same way as the uncooked grain offering mentioned above. Thus the law provides a means for an Israelite to visit the sanctuary and present tribute to God from the very first moment his grain begins to ripen.

The third and final form of gift offering (ch. 3) is the sacrifice of well-being (an approximate translation): the sacrifice of an animal from the herd or flock of which the worshiper partakes in the form of a festive meal; this is performed as an expression of joy, gladness, gratitude, or relief. According to Priestly law, this is the only way domestic livestock are permitted to be eaten (see 17:3–8).

Ownership of the entire animal is transferred to God, but only the blood and "fat," i.e., the suet, which is the hard, subcutaneous fatty tissue surrounding the internal organs, is actually consumed on the altar; the remainder of the animal is eaten by the priests and the worshipers. This constitutes a sacrificial meal because the celebrants eat it in the Lord's presence, i.e., as subjects privileged to be hosted in the palace of a ruler, and because the portions eaten by the priest and the worshiper are understood to have been given to them by God.

The command follows the form of the burnt offering law (1:2–13), first stating the procedure for an animal from the herd (vv. 1–5) and then for an animal from the flock (vv. 6–15)—this time keeping sheep and goats separate, since the heavy broad-tail characteristic of the former is included among the portions placed upon the altar (v. 12). The worshiper's role is similar to that for a burnt offering; the altar ritual, in which the blood is dashed against the sides of the altar as a libation and the fatty portions and suet are turned into smoke as a "pleasing odor to the LORD," is then performed by the priest.

Burning suet provides a dense smoke of rich and meaty fragrance, suggesting that the deity to whom it is offered derives pleasure from it. In biblical ritual, therefore, the suet of sacrificial flesh is offered to God, along with the kidneys and the "appendage of the liver" or caudate lobe (and, in the case of sheep, the broad-tail; see above). The blood of gift offerings is also thought of as reserved for God so that "suet and blood" make up the divine repast (see Ezek 44:7, 15). The Priestly legislation prescribes further that these substances, since they belong to the Lord alone, are not to be eaten by humans; all blood and suet are therefore prohibited (v. 17); see 7:22–27 and 17:10–16. The words "all fat" (correctly: "all suet") in v. 16 are a scribal error; the verse should conclude "a foodgift of pleasing odor to the LORD," cf. vv. 5 and 11.

4:1–6:7. Expiatory Offerings. There are two types of expiatory sacrifice. The first, treated in 4:1–5:13, is traditionally referred to as a "sin offering," but the Hebrew term should properly be translated as "purification offering." The second, detailed in 5:14–6:7, has usually been called a "guilt offering"; this too is a misnomer and should be replaced by "offering of reparation." Offerings of expiation are not voluntary, spontaneous acts of adoration; rather, they are required rituals, occasioned by specific circumstances. Unlike the laws pertaining to gift offerings, therefore, the rituals are prescribed along with the circumstances that give rise to them. The focus is on expiation necessitated by cases of a person's wrongdoing; other situations in which similar expiation rituals are required, for individuals as well as in the public cult, are described elsewhere.

Expiation, or "atonement," in the Priestly legislation is not a means for making amends, either by appeasing God—such as by paying him a sort of fine— or by inflicting some deprivation upon oneself as a form of penalty. Nor is the sacrifice of the animal a substitute for one's own death. The Hebrew word translated by "expiate" or "atone" conveys none of these post-biblical ideas; rather it means "wipe clean." The purifying act consists of the application of the blood of the slaughtered animal to the tabernacle and objects within its confines. As in Mesopotamian ritual texts, where the same verb is used to refer to the ritual cleansing of temples, "atonement" in P is thus a ritual by which the divine abode is purged of unwanted substances said to have accumulated there. These consist of the Israelites' bodily impurities, as explained in chs. 12–15, and certain acts of wrongdoing that they commit—as described in this section. If this contamination is allowed to accumulate, it threatens the community's survival. Thus its removal, or "atonement," is of critical importance (see 15:31).

The commands concerning the purification offering are given first (4:1–5:13). This offering is required when an Israelite becomes aware of having unwittingly transgressed a prohibition. Inadvertent acts are not ignored in Priestly law, and, when errors are made, atonement is necessary. In order for this to occur, the offending parties must come to realize their wrongdoing; it must either be brought to their attention by another person or dawn on them somehow.

The details differ according to the identity of the person, the main distinctions pertaining to the animal required (the higher the rank, the larger the animal), and the precise location within the tabernacle at which the blood is to be applied. The first two sections speak of offenses committed by the "anointed priest," i.e., the high priest (vv. 3–12), or by "the whole congregation of Israel" (vv. 13–21), thereby bringing guilt upon the community. The contamination having entered the tabernacle, purgation of the outer sanctum is required; this is done by sprinkling blood towards the curtain (see Exod 27:31–24) and daubing blood on the horns of the incense altar (see Exod 30:1–10). The next three sections pertain to offenses committed by a "ruler," i.e., a person of exalted status within his tribe (vv. 22–26), or an ordinary Israelite (vv. 27–31 and 32–35). These generate a less powerful contamination, and therefore require only the purgation of the tabernacle's exterior. The blood of the animal is thus applied to the horns of the sacrificial altar that stood in the courtyard. In all cases, the assigned portions of the sacrificial animal are consumed on the altar; on the disposal of the remaining flesh see 6:24–30 and 10:16–20.

The sixth section (5:1–10) adds four very specific cases of wrongdoing by an individual. These are all acts of omission rather than violations of prohibitions. The offender, though initially aware of his neglectfulness, has subsequently put it out of mind. When realization and remorse finally occur, the purification is to be performed in the tabernacle court as prescribed above. Unique here is the requirement that the guilty party supplement his remorse and sacrificial expiation with verbal confession. These four cases refute the idea that obligations evaporate with time, asserting instead that one's culpability for negligence intensifies the longer it lasts. The references to being "guilty" in vv. 2–4 are inaccurate translations; the Hebrew conveys the sense of realizing one's guilt, as in the opening phrase of v. 5.

The laws of the purification offering (5:7–13) conclude by prescribing how persons of limited means are to comply with the obligation to make expiation when required. The sacred precincts must be decontaminated—remarkably, even by means of a grain offering, if that is all the person can afford. There are no exemptions.

The second expiatory sacrifice is quite similar in its ritual to the purification offering. Its name comes from a word meaning "to incur liability," and as a noun it denotes the payment of damages. It is mandated in cases of trespass against sacred objects and the sacred domain (5:14–16), in cases of undiscovered violations, presumably involving trespass as well (5:17–19), and in cases of fraud accompanied by false oath, i.e., trespass against the sacred name of the Lord (6:1–7). The term "reparation offering" is thus preferable to "guilt offering." This sacrifice embodies the crucial importance that Priestly laws attach (as do Mesopotamian ritual texts) to the need to guard the sacred sphere from unauthorized access and to prevent the misuse of items believed to be sacrosanct—the tabernacle and its furnishings, offerings and gifts that have been brought to it, and the name Yahweh—the most widely accessible sacred "object," and the most susceptible to misuse. When these are mistreated, the ritual purgation is not sufficient; some form of restitution is needed. The value of the ram that is offered, to which one-fifth is to be added as a payment of damages beyond the restitution itself, is viewed as symbolic compensation for that of sacred property. In the final section, the case of fraud accompanied by false oath, the restitution and fine are paid to the injured party; see also Num 5:5–8.

The recurring refrain throughout 4:1–6:7 states that the parties "shall be forgiven." Forgiveness in the Priestly sacrificial system is not an act of grace for which one can only hope and pray; it is the stated outcome of the prescribed expiation rituals.

B: Additional Instructions Pertaining to Each Type of Offering (6:8–7:38)

In this section, further regulations are provided regarding each of the five types of sacrifice prescribed in chs. 1:1–6:7. Each new topic is introduced by the phrase "this is the ritual of . . .", or better: these are the instructions regarding etc. (6:2, 7, 18; 7:1, 11). With a few exceptions, these instructions relate primarily to how each sacrifice is to be apportioned and disposed of following the altar ritual.

First (6:8–13) are the instructions for the burnt offering. Complementing 1:3–13, this paragraph adds the requirement that the flesh may burn on the altar throughout the night, but by morning the ash must be removed. Linen vestments are required of the priests in close proximity to the altar, but upon exiting the holy area, non-sacred clothing is donned. As for the altar fire itself, once ignited (see 9:24) it must be kept burning at all times, a perpetual sign that God's worship continues without interruption. These regulations are the counterpart of the corresponding instructions for distribution and consumption given below for the remaining types of sacrifice, parts of which are eaten.

These are followed by the instructions for the grain offering (6:14–18). Pursuant to 2:1–13, they add what comes next: how the priests are to prepare and consume their portion of the grain offering, as well as a warning that the offering may not leave the sacred precincts and may not come into contact with the laity. Direct contact communicates dangerous, contagious holiness (see v. 20; Exod 29:37; 30:29; Num 17:1–4). Most significant is the statement that priests do not receive their share of the sacrifice from the person who presents the offering. Rather, the worshiper gives the entire sacrifice to the Lord; he then "shares" it with the priests in recognition of their service (see 2:1–8; cf. 7:34).

The text goes on (6:19–23) to describe the personal grain offering required of "Aaron and his sons," i.e., the high priests: Aaron and all of his successors. This offering is consumed in its entirety on the altar so that the priest does not receive a share of a gift that he himself offers. The words "on the day when he is anointed" (v. 20) mean "from the time of his anointment [onward]," i.e., in perpetuity. Lesser priests, too, receive no share of any grain offering they make on their own behalf.

The next instructions (6:24–30) pertain to the purification offering; see 4:1–5:13. The paragraph stipulates where it is to be slaughtered, defines its degree of sanctity as "most holy," prescribes who may eat of its flesh and where (offerings so defined are to be eaten only by priests within the tabernacle confines), and sets forth the ramifications of lay contact with the flesh (7: 20–21). It concludes by spelling out a crucial distinction between purification offerings whose blood has been used to decontaminate the interior of the tabernacle (4:2– 21) and those whose blood has been applied to the outer altar (4:22–5:10). The flesh of the former may not be eaten and must be burned; the flesh of the latter must be eaten—by the officiating priest, who may share it with other priests (7:26 and 29). Thus are severe and minor impurities, respectively, disposed of and the purification process made complete (see on 10:16–20). Flesh and blood that have not been disposed of communicate impurity to objects with which they come in contact, requiring the latter to be cleansed.

Next (7:1–7) come the instructions concerning the reparation offering; these are predicated on 5:14–6:7. Most of the details correspond with those given in the laws pertaining to the other sacrifices. As with the purification offering (6:29), only priests are eligible to eat the flesh; here too the officiating priest receives the flesh and is given the option of sharing it with other priests.

A short conclusion (7:8–10) follows the instructions pertaining to the four "most holy" sacrifices, filling in the remaining details regarding the distribution of the priestly portions of each one.

The instructions for the well-being offering (7:11–34) are to be read in conjunction with the ritual described in ch. 3. There are three types of well-being offerings (see 19:5–8 and 22:29–30): the sacrifice of thanksgiving, designed to demonstrate to all present the beneficence of God enjoyed by the worshiper, and consumed, along with "cakes," i.e., baked loaves, within a single day (vv. 12–15); the votive offering, made in fulfillment of a vow; and the freewill offering, a spontaneous feast of joy (vv. 16–18). In the latter two cases, no loaves are offered and two days are allowed for the consumption of the flesh. Violating the time restriction (presumably in both cases, although this is made explicit only with regard to the second) invalidates the sacrifice retroactively and brings severe guilt upon the offender. Sacrificial flesh may not be eaten once it has come into contact with a source of physical impurity; an impure individual who actually eats sacrificial flesh is "cut off from his kin" (vv. 19–21). This threat recurs numerous times in Priestly law; it is not excommunication but rather extirpation, i.e., the eventual total extinction of one's line, by whatever means God sees fit to cause this to happen (see 20:2–9).

Verses 22–27 elaborate on 3:17. The "fat"—i.e., the suet—and blood of permitted animals, whether sacrificed or not, may not be eaten (see 17:10–16). An exception is domestic animals that have been killed by beasts or died of themselves. Their flesh may be eaten (see on 11:40, 17:15–16 and 22:8) and household use (but not consumption) of the suet is permissible.

The section concludes with the instructions for distribution of the well-being sacrifice. The altar portions are presented by the worshiper to be turned by the priest into smoke on the altar. The priests' portion is given to them by God, not by the worshiper, as remuneration for their service (see also Num 18:8–24). In Priestly legislation, this portion consists of "the breast of the elevation-offering," referring to the custom of elevating the offering in order to present it, and "the thigh that is offered"; according to Deuteronomic law they are to receive "the shoulder, cheeks and the stomach" (Deut 18:3). At the temple in Shiloh, they received "all that the fork brought up" from the cauldron of boiling flesh (1 Sam 2:14)—yet another way of indicating that the priest's portion is allotted to him by God alone.

Verses 37–38 summarize the whole of chs. 1–7 and close the account of what was communicated to Moses on the day that the divine Glory entered the tabernacle (see 1:1). Mention of the "the offering of ordination" (see 8:22–29) is something of a discrepancy, since this offering was not referred to in these chapters. The words "on Mount Sinai" (7:38) should be translated "at Mount Sinai"; i.e., "[in the tabernacle that stood] at [the foot of] Mount Sinai" (similarly 25:1; 26:46; 27:34).

II. The Inauguration of Worship (8–10)

Having imparted to Moses the instructions needed to perform all of the types of sacrifice to be offered henceforth, God now commands that the inaugural rituals commence. First comes the "ordination," or consecration, of the priests, without whom the regimen of worship cannot begin (ch. 8); this is followed by the first sacrificial service and dedication of the tabernacle, climaxing in the public appearance of God's Glory.

A. Consecration of the Priests (8)

Several months earlier, when God announced to Moses that his brother Aaron and his sons were to become his priests (Exod 28:1), he outlined the details of this ceremony (Exod 29). Now he informs Moses that it is to be carried out, in the presence of the whole people, and Moses complies. Most of ch. 8 thus consists of a repetition, with minor differences, of Exod 29, with the actions related in the past tense and the recurring refrain "as the LORD had commanded Moses."

The ceremony consists of five elements: 1. Investiture: the priests are clothed for the first time in the garments required to perform their service (vv. 7–9 and 13). 2. Invocation: the priests present a burnt offering (vv. 18–21). 3. Consecration: the blood of a ram of offering is smeared on the priests' bodies (vv. 22–24a). 4. Ordination, literally, "filling the hands," so called because the priests receive for the first time their assigned share of the sacrifices; they offer a portion to the Lord (vv. 26–29) and eat what remains (v. 31). This ordination offering resembles a well-being offering (3:1–16, 7:29–34) of the thanksgiving type (7:12–15). 5. Anointment: the priests are anointed (the extremities of the body representing the whole) with the sacred oil, later mixed with blood from the offering, infusing them with holiness (vv. 12, 30). Until such time as the induction is complete, Aaron is in the role of the worshiper while Moses assumes the role of priest, receiving on this occasion the "priest's share" of the sacrificial flesh.

Before their investiture, the priests must be bathed (v. 6); before the first sacrifices are made, the tabernacle and its furnishings must be anointed (vv. 10–11); in order for the altar to be used, it must be purified (vv. 15–17) from the impurities that have collected there. Thus, the consecration of the tabernacle itself takes place while the priests are being purified. Following these ceremonies, the priests remain within the tabernacle's confines for seven full days, strictly avoiding all contact with the non-sacred. With this their consecration is completed (vv. 31–36). According to Exod 29:35–37, on each of the seven days another purification offering is to be made, the altar is to be cleansed and anointed, and the ordination ceremony is to be repeated (cf. Ezek 43:25–26). Exodus 29:30 also mandates that the same ritual is to be repeated whenever a new high priest is installed.

B. The Initial Worship and God's Appearance; the Calamity and Its Ramifications (9–10)

The narrative continues with the events of the eighth day (9:1–10:19 is a single unit in the Hebrew text). Moses orders the priests to emerge from their seclusion and to perform their first sacrificial service (9:1–6). This consists of a purification offering (to decontaminate the tabernacle once again) and each of the three types of gift offering: a burnt offering (to invoke the presence of God), a grain offering, and a well-being offering in celebration of the great event—a rare well-being offering made on behalf of the public in Israelite ritual (see also 23:19). Moses has Aaron instruct the people to prepare the communal sacrifices; thus the high priest performs, for the first time, his task of informing the Israelite people of their cultic duties. The stated purpose of these rituals is "for today the LORD will appear to you" (9:4; see 9:6), i.e., they are carried out in order to prepare for a theophany. The instructions are carried out in logical sequence, and Aaron blesses the people. He and Moses then enter the tabernacle and invite the Lord to emerge, after which they bless the people again, this time apparently praying that God favor them with his manifest presence. Finally the glory of the Lord shines forth from the inner sanctum. Flames emerge, igniting the altar fire and consuming the sacrificial portions. Thus the Lord signals that he is pleased with his people's homage and will indeed reside in the abode they have built for him.

At this, the people burst into rejoicing (9:23b–24), but the celebration and sacred meal that were naturally to follow are sadly aborted. Suddenly, two of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abihu, take up censers—metal utensils with handles used for offering smoking incense—place unlit coals in them, and sprinkle incense upon them, intending to attract the divine fire. The term "fire" (10:1) refers to the kindling material, and the word rendered "unholy" actually means "alien" or "unauthorized" (10:1). In the public institutions of worship, ritual crimes are dire. Only what is prescribed is legitimate, and what is not commanded is sacrilege (for the acceptable uses of incense see Exod 30:7–8 and Lev 16:12). The Lord thus sanctifies his name by striking them down on the spot (10:2–3): fire emerges again from the Holy of Holies and incinerates them.

The surviving members of the priestly family are forbidden to engage in any of the mourning rituals (10:4–7); feelings aside, their task as priests is to carry on with the day's ceremonies (10:12–15). Moses becomes agitated upon learning that they have deviated from the normal manner of disposing of the sacrificial flesh (10:16–18), but when Aaron assures him that what has occurred is not a reform but a one-time exception to the rule in light of the tragic circumstances, his fears are allayed (10:19–20).

A parenthetical section (10:8–10), which would serve well as the introduction to the next passage, cautions the priests to refrain from alcohol when engaged in their ritual duties or in giving instruction, since drinking alcohol might diminish their ability to make precise distinctions "between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean."

III. The Laws of Purity and Purification (11–16)

God continues to communicate his laws to Moses. In Priestly thought, the distinction between prohibited and permitted is not identical to the distinction between "clean and unclean," but the two are not entirely unrelated. Thus, before proceeding to the laws of purity and purification (chs. 12–16), God issues commands regulating prohibited and permitted food.

A. Forbidden Foods from the Animal Kingdom (11)

According to Gen 9:1–4, humans may eat all vegetation and the flesh of all living beings, but they must abstain from eating blood. The Israelites, however, are under additional restrictions. These pertain to each category of the animal kingdom. a) In addition to domestic livestock, which are fit for the altar and therefore obviously permitted, Israelites may eat the flesh of large non-domestic land animals (vv. 2–8) only if they have true (NRSV, "divided") hoofs and cloven feet and chew their cud, i.e., only if they possess the features most characteristic of cattle, sheep, and goats; see Deut 14:5. b) They may eat the flesh of beings that populate the waters (vv. 9–12) only if these have the markings peculiar to fish, i.e. fins and scales. c) They may not eat the flesh of the birds listed (some of the translations are uncertain); the list enumerates all known fowl that are dissimilar in their appearance and habits to the fowl used in sacrifice, i.e., the turtle dove and the pigeon (vv. 13–19). d) Among the "winged insects" (vv. 20–23), they may eat only those that have "jointed legs above their feet, with which to leap on the ground" (v. 21), i.e., that diverge from their class, resembling birds more than insects. e) Last, all "creatures that swarm upon the earth" (vv. 41–42, the direct continuation of v. 23), i.e. small land animals, are prohibited. Thus, Israelites may only eat domestic livestock and fowl, wild animals that resemble them, and a few species of flying insects.

While impurity is properly the subject of the next portion of Leviticus (chs. 12–16), its implications for the law in this chapter are given here in a parenthetical section (vv. 24–40). Prohibited land animals are not only forbidden as food; their carcasses also communicate impurity when humans touch them. The impurity is minor, only a brief time, until sunset, followed by laundering (and, presumably, bathing). Since the carcasses of small land animals may occasionally come into contact with foodstuffs, vessels, utensils, seeds, and the water supply, the text describes how each of these is affected and how the impurity is to be dealt with. The translation of v. 34 is misleading; water does not make food unclean! Rather, like seeds and grain (v. 38), food becomes susceptible to impurity only if, prior to coming in contact with the unclean object, it has been moistened at any time.

In Priestly law, Israelite lay persons may eat the flesh of an animal that has died by itself rather than being slaughtered, as long as the animal is one of a permitted species. Impurity results and must be remedied, but no sin has been committed. Leviticus 17:15–16 and 22:8 provide further details about this issue. Verse 39 probably means that the carcass of a permitted animal communicates impurity only if the animal has died on its own or been killed by a beast, whereas if it has been slaughtered, no impurity results.

The Israelites are commanded to regard as "detestable" the animals that they are forbidden to eat. This may imply that while these animals are not intrinsically loathsome, the Israelite is to cultivate an attitude of abhorrence toward them simply because they are prohibited. By maintaining a set of dietary restrictions corresponding to distinctions present in the natural world, the Israelites, in Priestly thought, are kept holy, that is, separate from the remainder of humanity (vv. 44–45; see also 20:25–26) and closer to the divine.

B. Bodily (and Related) Impurities and Their Disposal (12–15)

In these chapters God commands how to dispose of the several types of impurity (NRSV, "uncleanness"), an approximation of a Hebrew term meaning contamination or defilement. In the Priestly law, this is something like an atmospheric layer, enveloping and coating persons or objects. It is believed to emanate from human corpses, carcasses of animals, genital fluids, and a specific skin condition treated in chs. 13–14, all of which involve the escape of a person's life force. Defilement, once produced, behaves like a vapor, expanding to fill available space and contaminating persons and objects with which it comes into contact, communicating to them various degrees of impurity, which in turn need to be eradicated.

This impurity is a simple fact of life. The phenomena that produce it are neither evil nor sinful; people and objects routinely and unavoidably contract it at all times. The only sin involved is that of allowing impurity to come into contact with sacred objects and sacred space, and these are considered especially vulnerable to its effect. In Priestly thought, if impurity is allowed to penetrate the divine abode and to accumulate there, the Lord's presence will depart and Israel will not survive (15:31). For this reason, priests, who are in constant contact with the sacred sphere, are explicitly cautioned to shun all but the most unavoidable impurity. Moreover, since all unchecked impurity, no matter where it may be, is believed to contaminate the sanctuary, even from afar, the lay Israelite, while he is under no obligation to avoid impurity, is warned not to remain unclean, i.e., not to neglect his solemn responsibility of doing away with impurity once he has contracted it, for this would inevitably allow it to contaminate the divine abode, posing a threat to everyone.

Three elements participate in the disposal of impurity: the elapse of time, cleansing (usually in water), and the purification offering (see 4:1–5:13). The first two purify the individual; the third, required only in cases of major impurities, purges the sanctuary of the impurity that the affected individual has inevitably caused to accumulate there.

12. Women after Childbirth. The woman who has given birth needs to be cleansed "from her flow of blood" (v. 7), i.e., the discharge of dark fluid that typically lasts for a few days and is followed by a lighter flow that may last for a number of weeks. These two phases correspond to the two stages of the mother's purification. Two uniform periods, defined by the stereotype numbers seven and forty (33 + 7) used throughout the Bible, are prescribed. No reason is given for doubling the length of each phase when a female child is born. The ancients may have supposed that the post-partum genital flow was of longer duration after the birth of a girl, or they may have noted that there is occasionally vaginal flow from the infant girl herself and seen this as conferring an additional measure of impurity.

During the first phase, the mother is severely unclean: she communicates minor impurity by contact ("as at the time of her menstruation"; see 15:19–24), and her impurity affects the sanctuary from afar. During the second phase, the impurity is less intense. It no longer contaminates persons or mundane objects, nor does it spread aurally to the sanctuary, but direct contact with the sacred must still be avoided. Only at the end of the second phase can the woman attend to the purification of the sanctuary; this she must do whether she is a person of means (vv. 6–7) or not (v. 8). The expiation is carried out by means of the purification offering (see Lev 4). A burnt offering too is required (see ch. 1); the reason for this is not stated. Circumcision (v. 4) is not a stage in the purification process; it is mentioned here by association (cf. Gen 17:9–14).

13–14. Scale Disease and Related Conditions. The next set of commands prescribe how to dispose of the impurity caused by the condition known as tsara'at. The translation "leprosy" (or "leprous disease") is misleading, since the disease currently called by this name was not known in biblical times and the description given in the Bible is not consistent with it. Biblical tsara'at is said to afflict not only humans but also fabrics (13:47–59) and building materials (14:33–47), so it cannot be identified with any single known medical condition.

With regard to humans, the word tsara'at refers to certain scale-like eruptions of the skin stemming from a number distinct causes, while tsara'at in fabrics and building materials may be identified as certain types of mildew. Before microbiology, conditions sharing similar outward manifestations were referred to by a single name.

Disease per se does not produce impurity; those suffering from ailments other than tsara'at (and abnormal genital fluxes; see 15:1–15, 25–30) are not considered to be impure. Only tsara'at, because the person afflicted with it is looked upon as potentially dead (see Num 12:12; Job 18:13), is viewed as a manifestation of the gradual escape of the life-force, which is the definition of impurity in the Priestly legislation.

The priest has no role in the healing process; throughout biblical tradition, the onset, progress, and cure of disease are believed to be outside of human control. The priest's only task is to determine if the lesions that appear are indeed tsara'at, and this is the sole reason for the lengthy, detailed instructions given in this passage. If tsara'at is not present, the priest's task is over: the person is evidently suffering from some other ailment, and the priest declares him pure. If it is found, the patient is declared impure and placed in quarantine until his disease is healed. This is not in order to arrest the spread of the disease but rather to check the spread of the potent impurity that it is believed to produce, lest this have an irreversible effect on the sanctuary. If a conclusive diagnosis cannot be made, a seven-day waiting period ensues (involving isolation, to be on the safe side), after which the condition is examined again. After the person's healing is complete, the priest is to supervise the person's purification and, because the potent impurity of tsara'at has inevitably affected the sanctuary, expiation as well (see 14:19).

Indicative of the unique severity of the impurity associated with tsara'at is the fact that no other impure individuals are instructed to remain "outside the camp" (13:46), or in later periods, outside the city (2 Kgs 7:3). During his quarantine, the afflicted individual is to "wear torn clothes and let the hair of his head be disheveled" and to "cover his upper lip"; these are the outward signs of distress. He is also required to cry out, "Unclean, unclean" as a warning to others that his impurity is contagious. The Priestly legislation passes no moral or religious judgment on the afflicted individual; he is accountable only if he fails to attend to the prompt eradication of his impurity as soon as his disease has disappeared.

Mildew that causes the erosion and eventual disintegration of fabrics (vv. 48–58) is deemed a manifestation of the very same leakage of life-force as tsara'at in humans. The fabric suspected of having tsara'at is subjected to a diagnostic procedure similar to that used with human patients, but confirmed cases of tsara'at in fabrics cannot be "cured," and no purification rituals are prescribed. Only the prompt disposal of the impurity, accomplished through the destruction of the affected fabric, is required.

The next section, resuming 13:47, prescribes how the person cured of tsara'at must rid his person and his environment of the impurity generated by his disease. This indispensable safeguard against the threat posed to the community by the accumulation of impurity is the responsibility of the person who has suffered the affliction; the priests' role is to see that it is carried out and to perform the necessary rituals. The purification and expiation take place in three stages. The first, occurring as soon the priest pronounces the afflicted person cured and while he is still outside the camp, drives off the impurity that envelops his physical person. The purging agent is the blood of the first of two birds. This is the only instance in the Priestly legislation in which purifying blood is actually applied to a human. The second bird is set free to carry off the impurity; this is similar in some ways to the scapegoat ritual described in ch. 16. Cedar wood, crimson yarn, and hyssop are agents of purification throughout biblical and ancient Near Eastern traditions (see, e.g., Ps 51:9).

Stage two, on the seventh day, consists of the final cleansing of the individual. In stage three, on the eighth day, he makes his offerings. The need for a purification offering (v. 19) is perfectly obvious; this rids the sacred sphere of the impurity that has accumulated there. But the reparation offering (v. 12) is incongruous since no evident trespass against the sacred has taken place. No satisfactory explanation for this requirement has been given. The application of consecrated oil (vv. 14–18) apparently adds a measure of sanctification to the purification process, while the burnt offering and grain offering are acts of homage. The section concludes with the provisions for the person of modest means (vv. 21–32; cf. 4:7–13; 12:8).

The final section of the law confirms that certain types of mildew or rot in the walls of a house were sufficiently evocative of tsara'at in humans to be equated with it and were taken as manifestations of the very same deadly leakage of life. The measures taken depend on the reexamination of the house after a seven-day quarantine; if the condition has spread the affected stones and plaster are removed and replaced. Thereafter, if it returns, it is considered incurable and the house must be demolished. If it does not, the condition is said to have run its course and the priest pronounces the house clean. Clearing the house of foods and other objects in advance of the priest's visit so that they are not pronounced impure is a legal fiction designed to prevent undue economic hardship. To eradicate the impurity that has accumulated, a ritual similar to the first stage in the purification of the affected human (vv. 3–7) is performed (vv. 49–53). No purification of the sanctuary is prescribed; the phrase "make atonement" in v. 53 is used anomalously, to refer to the decontamination of the house.

3. Genital Impurities (15). This chapter deals with defilement caused by the flow of life fluids from the genital organs: semen, menstrual fluid, and the discharge accompanying gonorrhea or other genital or urethral infection. None of these is considered sinful, nor are they thought of as punishments; they are simply facts of nature: some normal, some pathological. It is taken for granted that impurity and contact with impure persons will occur in the normal course of everyday life. The only sin connected with them is failure to purify oneself from them.

The first section (vv. 2b–15) deals with abnormal discharge from a male. The symptoms are indicative of various urethral infections. In ancient times, these were not known to be sexually transmitted. This is paralleled by the fifth section (vv. 25–30), which speaks of abnormal discharge from a female, also taking into account menstrual flow of abnormal duration. These are severe impurities, lasting for seven days after the condition has passed, after which the final cleansing of the person takes place and purification offerings are made to decontaminate the sanctuary. Inexpensive animals are prescribed—by analogy, for males as well as for females—since prolonged menstrual flow or irregular discharges in women are relatively frequent.

The second section (vv. 16–17) speaks of normal discharge from a male, i.e., the emission of semen; this parallels the fourth section (vv. 19–24), which deals with normal discharge from a female, i.e., menstruation. These are lesser impurities; they require only the cleansing of the individual, which, if performed promptly, arrests any possible contamination of the sanctuary. They differ in that the impurity resulting from the emission of semen, which is momentary, lasts only until nightfall, while that resulting from menstruation, which continues several days, lasts a week. The third section, at the center of the chapter (v. 18), deals with the impurity contracted during sexual intercourse by both males and females. This minor impurity, after cleansing, lasts until nightfall.

Unclean individuals are not "off limits," but since direct or indirect contact with them communicates minor impurity, appropriate measures must be taken to rid oneself of it. This chapter provides the details relating to this communication of impurity to persons and to objects. These regulations apply, by appropriate analogy, in other cases of bodily impurity of similar degree (see, e.g., 12:2; 13:46). Such secondary impurity is less severe than that borne by the affected person himself; after washing and laundering it dissipates by nightfall and does not spread to the sacred sphere. One exception is sexual intercourse with the menstruant: it communicates a more severe impurity lasting seven days (v. 24). Nevertheless it is not prohibited here; if the necessary purification takes place no sin has been committed. The law in 18:19 thus directly contradicts ch. 15 on this issue.

The laws of purity and purification in Leviticus conclude with a warning that includes a clear statement of their rationale (v. 31). Failure to adhere to the laws of purification brings about death, i.e., the collective destruction of the Israelite people, since when impurity accumulates unchecked in the Lord's abode, he will leave and Israel will not survive (cf. 16:16; Num 5:3; 19:13, 20).

C. The Annual Purification of the Tabernacle and the People (16)

Verse 1 indicates that in the narrator's reconstruction of events, this law was communicated to Moses immediately after the events described in vv. 9–10. The laws in vv. 11–15, he thus informs us, were actually given somewhat later and have been placed here in order to delineate the types of impurity and to explain the crucial importance of sanctuary purification, before proceeding to the command that serves as the culmination of the purity laws.

A certain amount of tabernacle defilement inevitably remains despite all of the purification rituals prescribed thus far. Regular, public rituals of purification are therefore required; these are calendrical and are prescribed in Num 28–29. In addition, and especially because deliberate crimes, which contaminate the inner sanctum, are not expurgated by these rituals, once a year it is necessary to decontaminate the inner sanctum along with the rest of the tabernacle and to see to the final removal of all sins and impurities from Israel's midst. This annual ritual is the subject of ch. 16. It is to be performed on the tenth day of the seventh month (v. 29). Elsewhere (23:27,28; 25:9) this date is referred to as the "Day of Atonement," with "atone" once again meaning "cleanse [the sacred precincts] of sin and defilement" (cf. Lev 23:26–32; Num 29:7–11).

The chapter begins by prescribing the thorough purification of the tabernacle, focusing on the inner sanctum (vv. 3–22). Since this is the spot where God's Glory resides, egress is fatal and must be avoided. The need to cleanse the entire sanctuary once a year is the one exception (v. 2). To avoid death, the priest creates a cloud of incense as he enters, preventing himself from viewing the Glory (v. 13). Since these rituals essentially amount to a large-scale clean-up operation, the priest wears simple linen garments, which are easily laundered (v. 4).

The ritual includes two purification offerings: a bull on behalf of the high priest and his household (cf. 4:3–12) and a goat on behalf of the Israelite people. Aaron thus enters the inner sanctum twice, sprinkling the blood of these offerings in order to decontaminate the sacred space; this is followed by the cleansing of the outer sanctum (v. 16b) and then by the purging of the courtyard altar (vv. 18–19), first with the blood of the bull and then with that of the goat.

The procedure also requires a live goat; a lottery (vv. 8–10) determines at random which goat is to be used for which purpose. The live goat is needed to carry away the deliberate transgressions of the Israelites; v. 21 makes it clear that unlike the impurities, which have been destroyed by the purification ritual, these have been removed from the tabernacle but still need to be disposed of. This is accomplished by transferring them—manually and verbally—onto the goat's head and then driving the goat into the wilderness (vv. 20–22). There it will be received as an offering by Azazel (literally: "fierce god"), a demon or deity believed to inhabit the wilderness, and thereby eradicated once and for all. Remarkably, this is not seen as the worship of another god but rather as an act of obedience to Yahweh.

Two burnt offerings are also prescribed, one on Aaron's own behalf and the other on behalf of the people.

In addition to decontaminating the sanctuary, the annual Day of Atonement also brings about a sort of purification of the Israelite people, since the removal of their sins and impurities serves as a catharsis; thus the text says "you shall be clean" (v. 30). The people play a role in this process: vv. 29–34a prescribe that they must observe a fast (the phrase "deny yourselves" in v. 29 literally means "deprive your throats," i.e., fast) and a cessation of labor. Without the active participation of those whose impurities and offenses are being purged, the ritual would be ineffective.

IV. The Holiness Legislation (17–27)

Up until this point, the Priestly work has conveyed the sense that the commandments given at Sinai had to do only with the worship of God and the purity of his earthly abode. By inference, at least, P seems to be saying that proper conduct in other spheres is a matter of common sense and universal morality, not of command. Chapters 17–26 correct this impression by supplying civil and criminal legislation pertaining to social behavior as well as ritual activity. These chapters report that at Sinai God's will in these areas also became explicit in the form of commands and prohibitions, and, moreover, that failure to adhere to them also has a negative effect on the sacred. Most scholars see this as a progression, even a transformation, in Priestly thought, and as an indication that these chapters were composed by Priestly authors later than those responsible for the bulk of P. This conclusion seems to be confirmed on stylistic grounds as well. By inserting their legislation here (and at a few other points in P), these authors thus expanded the pre-existing Priestly account of lawgiving in the tabernacle.

The most characteristic feature of the laws in these chapters is their concern for holiness. Here alone it is maintained that holiness of persons is not restricted to the realm of the tabernacle and the priesthood but is rather attainable, in some measure at least, by the Israelite people as a whole (chs. 19–20). As well, one hears explicitly about the holiness inherent in the slaughter of certain animals for food (ch. 17), the holiness of the priests and of sacred offerings (chs. 21–22), the annual "holy times" (ch. 23), the holiness of the name of Yahweh (ch. 24) and the holiness of the fiftieth year (ch. 25). Implied also is the holiness of the land of Canaan (chs 18; 26). For this reason, scholars refer to this portion of Leviticus as the Holiness Legislation (or Holiness Code) or H.

A. The Sanctity of Slaughter and Prohibition of Blood (17)

The next three laws communicated to Moses are concerned with the proper disposal of the blood of slain animals. Formally these laws are not expressed as prohibitions ("you shall not...") but as threats, pronouncing that those who commit certain acts are condemned to be "cut off" (see 7:19–21).

The first law (vv. 3–8) prescribes that Israelites may not simply slaughter animals from the herd and flock for food. They must be offered as sacrifices of well-being (see 3:1–17 and 7:11–34), after which the worshipers may partake of their share of the flesh. Failing to comply is tantamount to having slain the animal in the antediluvian period when such an act was considered murder (see Gen 1:29–30), i.e., it is a capital crime. This law rests on the postulate that whereas, prior to the establishment of the Israelite cult at Sinai, slaughter of domestic livestock was devoid of sanctity, from that time forth it became a sacrificial act. Once the tabernacle is in operation, however, the slaughter of domestic livestock at any other location is a sacrifice to the "goat-demons" believed to inhabit the wilderness and is strictly prohibited.

The unambiguous statement that this is "a statute forever to them throughout their generations" (v. 7b) cannot be reconciled with the more practical law in Deut 12:15, 20–27, according to which non-sacrificial slaughter of livestock would eventually become permissible. In the Priestly view, no such relaxation of the law was ever given.

The second law (vv. 8–9) outlaws all sacrifice that is not offered at "the entrance of the tent of meeting," i.e. the tabernacle. The clear implication for the future is that Israelites are to worship the Lord only where he resides: at the one legitimate sanctuary. The Priestly legislator thus agrees with Deut 12 in its demand that all sacrificial worship be centralized in one location, but disagrees on whether non-sacrificial slaughter may be practiced after the centralization has been accomplished.

The third law forbids the "eating" of blood, i.e., the eating of flesh without first draining the blood. The Priestly writer has already recounted that after the flood all humans were commanded to refrain from blood (Gen 9:4) and that the same command was later given to the Israelites (3:17; 7:26–27). By recounting here that this law was now repeated, H is able to supply it with a unique and highly complex rationale. It may be paraphrased thus (v. 11): the life-force of every living being is contained in the blood (observable from the fact that loss of blood brings about death), and it is this that God has assigned to the altar (in expiatory sacrifices; see 4:1–6:7), there to serve as ransom (NRSV, "atonement"), i.e., as a symbolic, "blood-for-blood" (or life-for-life) exchange for one's own life; therefore the blood of all flesh is strictly forbidden. Deuteronomy also records this prohibition, explaining it somewhat differently (Deut 12:16, 23–24; 15:3).

This law draws in its wake two corollaries: the requirement to drain the blood of wild animals hunted and killed for food (vv. 13–14; see 11:1–19) so that it becomes mixed with earth and therefore inedible, and the need to dispose of the impurity contracted by eating carrion (vv. 15–16). The latter point too was mentioned earlier (see 11:40); it is repeated here because it constitutes an exception to the blood prohibition: blood that has coagulated is no longer thought to contain the animal's life force, so the flesh may be eaten. The non-Priestly law codes, in contrast to this, expressly forbid eating such flesh (i.e., Exod 22:30; Deut 14:21). In P, only those belonging to the innermost sphere of sanctity, namely the priests, must observe this restriction (22:8) while lay Israelites are not so obligated; this is Ezekiel's view as well (Ezek 44:31).

B. Avoiding the Abominations of Canaan and Their Consequences (18)

In ch. 18, the Israelites are warned not to practice the "abominations" of the Egyptians and Canaanites (vv. 2–5 and 24–30) so as to avoid suffering their fate. Incorporated in this address is a list of prohibited sexual unions (vv. 6–23), including incestuous relationships (vv. 6–18), to which the prohibition of sacrificing children to Molech (v. 21) is also added. Refraining from these, no less than the scrupulous maintenance of the divine abode as emphasized earlier in Leviticus, is the key to Israel's national survival. In addition, the individual perpetrator is punished by being "cut off" (see 7:20–21).

Biblical tradition assigns to the Egyptians and Canaanites a reputation for sexual licentiousness and perversion. It is unlikely, however, that this reflects reality; the biblical writers, who had little or no firsthand knowledge of Egypt and Canaan, seem to have attributed these abominations to Israel's long-extinct enemies as a means of stigmatizing the cultural "other" and as a means of condemning the behavior itself—since the fate supposedly suffered by these nations served as an obvious cautionary lesson. This tradition also provided a morally plausible explanation for the apparent disappearance of the "Canaanites," the peoples who, the biblical authors assumed, must have occupied Israel's land before they did.

The phrase "uncover nakedness," which means "uncover the sexual organ," is used throughout vv. 6–19 (see also 20:11) to express the ignominy of engaging in sexual relations with a family member despite the revulsion that viewing the genitals of a close relative was supposed to arouse. The statement that the nakedness of one's mother is the nakedness of one's father (v. 7), like similar statements that follow, conveys the idea that a woman's sexual organs should be accessible only to her husband.

The list of prohibited sexual unions with "anyone near of kin" (an expression for the extended family; see 25:49 and compare 21:2) covers four generations, with the male addressed in the text placed in the second generation. In this way, all female relations who might be the object of his sexual desire at some point during his adulthood are named. Directly related women: in the generation preceding him, his mother (v. 7) and stepmother (v. 8); in his own generation, his sister (v. 9); in the vertical line, his granddaughter (v. 10). (The daughter should have been included between vv. 9 and 10; she has accidentally been omitted.) The step-sister too is considered of the same degree as a true sister (v. 11). Indirectly related women: in the generation preceding him, his true aunt (vv. 12–13) and his aunt by marriage, said here to be of the same degree (v. 14); in the next generation, his daughter-in-law (v. 15); in his own generation, his brother's wife (v. 16; this in direct opposition to Deut 25:5–9). Women related to each other—mother and daughter, grandmother and granddaughter (v. 17) sisters (v. 18)—are all forbidden. This is a stringent view; the non-Priestly sources relate that Abraham was married to his half-sister (Gen 20:12) and that Jacob was married to two sisters (Gen 29:16–28). Even P reports that Amram was married to his aunt (Exod 6:20)—presumably an act of the sort that these laws sought to remedy.

Additional sexual prohibitions are intercourse with one's own wife when menstruating (v. 19; cf. 15:19–24—this is one of H's most significant divergences from P); intercourse with another's wife, i.e., adultery (v. 20); non-procreative intercourse, i.e., with a male (v. 22), an animal (v. 23a), and between a woman and an animal (v. 23b). The mention of sacrificing children to Molech (see on 20:2–5) indicates that H, like D (see Deut 12:31 and 18:9–12), sees child sacrifice as one of the abominable practices for which the Canaanites were expelled from their land. He therefore adds it to the list of sexual offenses, which he believes are comparably heinous.

Biblical and ancient Near Eastern cultures were not familiar with homosexuality as a sexual orientation or lifestyle; it took notice only of the occasional act of male anal intercourse (see Gen 19:4–5 and Judg 19:22). Among the law codes, only H mentions it (see also 20:13), apparently viewing as aberrations all sexual acts that are not potentially procreative.

The imagery in the concluding section (vv. 24–30) depicts the land of Canaan as so sensitive to the behavior of its inhabitants that when abominable acts are performed, "defiling" the land, it ceases to yield its bounty and its population is forced to emigrate. This idea is unique; elsewhere it is presumed that the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan were either destroyed or expelled by the conquering Israelites.

C. "You Shall Be Holy" (19)

This collection of commands teaches that there is no such thing as a divine law that pertains only to ethics; every commanded or prohibited action affects the realm of the sacred and is thus in the category of ritual law as well. The text expresses this idea by mixing together laws touching upon various areas of life—sacrifice, commerce, legal institutions, the Temple, idolatry, family relations, oaths, alms, first fruits, theft, fraud and more— thus placing all of them on a single plane. For example, the legislation in the chapter (vv. 3–36) begins by juxtaposing reverence for parents with observance of the Sabbath in order to convey the idea that all laws are in a single category: obedience to the divine command. Almost every paragraph concludes with the same refrain "I am the LORD" (or "I am the LORD your God"), essentially a way of saying "Do this/refrain from doing that because I, Yahweh, say so." Taken together, the opening and closing verses (vv. 2, 37; 20:7–8) of this miscellany imply that only through the faithful observance of God's commands can the Israelite fulfill his sacred charge of being holy. The opening words "You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy" (v. 2) are thus a caption and not a separate command. God's holiness is his quality of "otherness," of being separate from all that is not him, whereas holiness in humans is a matter of belonging to God and being designated his "personal" property. While outside of P, Israel is holy simply by virtue of having been chosen (see Exod 19:5–6; Deut 7:6, 14:2, 21), here Israel's holiness is a goal to be accomplished through obedience to the laws and statutes of God.

Some of the topics of the legislation in the chapter are mentioned elsewhere in the Priestly account of the lawgiving, while others are mentioned only here. After citing parents, Sabbathobservance (see Exod 31:12–17; 35:2–3; Lev 23:3; 26:2 and v. 30 below) and idolatry (vv. 2–3; see 26:1), the text returns to the well-being offerings of the votive and freewill types discussed in 7:16–18 and 22:21–23 (for the third type of wellbeing offering, that of thanksgiving discussed in 7:12–15, see 22:29–30). The added statement that the offender has "profaned what is holy to the LORD" (v. 8) provides the connection to the theme of holiness. This is followed by two pairs of prohibitions to be observed in the field and vineyard respectively (vv. 9–10). The first in each pair is observed while reaping, the second in each pair during ingathering. The concluding command "you shall leave them for the poor and the alien" is thus fulfilled by inaction, cf. Deut 24:19–21.

The next four sets of laws (vv. 11–12, 13–14, 15–16 and 17–18) share a common theme: decency and honesty in what appear to be interpersonal affairs are concerns of the deity. All four paragraphs deal with matters of conscience: since all of the crimes mentioned are in some measure committed in secret, the offenders think they are undetected. The progression is from the crimes most difficult to conceal to those that can never be proven and whose victims have no remedy, leaving punishment in the hands of God alone. When false oath follows theft and cover-up (vv. 11–12; 6:1–7), God becomes a party to what began as a civil matter. Unknowing victims of exploitation (vv. 13–14) may never find out that they have been mistreated, so fear of God is the only real sanction (see also v. 32; 25:17, 36, 43). The perversion of judicial proceedings follows (vv. 15–16—the second verse refers to making unjust charges against one's fellow), and the final set (vv. 17–18) also forms a unit, relating to pent-up hatred and its consequences. As v. 18 explains, bearing of grudges results ultimately in vengeance; but by refraining from such behavior one treats his fellow with the same "love," i.e., understanding and forgiveness, one normally extends toward one's own shortcomings. In later Jewish and Christian interpretation, of course, the words "love your neighbour as yourself" were generalized to serve as a blanket command covering all ethical duties.

Next comes the injunction to uphold the boundaries fixed by God in the natural world (v. 19; Deut 22:9). Wool and linen are, however, woven together in the priestly vestments (Exod 28:6, 39:29) and in the fringes (Num 15:37–40). What is used in sacred garments is taboo for mundane use. This is followed by a case law relating to sexual relations with a female slave who is "designated" for marriage to another man (vv. 20–22). Since the woman is technically not yet free, she is not strictly "betrothed," but the offense against God needs to be expiated. The translation "an inquiry shall be held" is not certain.

The fruit of a tree is off limits for the first three years and is offered to the Lord in the fourth; only then may it be eaten (vv. 23–25). The expression "set apart" is actually a translation of "sacred"; thus this law too is connected with the theme of holiness (see also Judg 9:27).

The prohibition of eating "anything with its blood" (v. 26a; see 17:10–14 and 1 Sam 14:32–35) refers to an act probably associated with augury and witchcraft (v. 26b). The next two verses forbid extreme expressions of grief and mourning (see Deut 14:1–2, 1 Kgs 18:28), as they are associated with conjuring up the dead and communicating with gods of the nether world (see on 21:5). This section closes with the command not to "profane" one's daughter (v. 29) by consigning her to harlotry; the term "profane" indicates that this is the opposite of holiness.

The main body of the chapter (vv. 3–32) closes with three verses that develop themes with which the chapter opened. Conjuring up mediums and wizards (v. 31, NRSV; others "ghosts" and "familiar spirits"), while it is admitted to be an effective method of gaining hidden knowledge (see 1 Sam 28:3–25), is strictly off limits for Israelites; see 20:6, 27 and compare Deut 18:9–14.

The concluding section (vv. 33–36) makes up an appendix, extending to the resident alien two of the laws mentioned in the main body of the chapter: love of neighbor (v. 18) and fairness in "judgment" (v. 15), here reinterpreted to mean "correct measure." The law in vv. 35–36 probably refers to the fact that the non-native is unlikely to be familiar with local weights and measures, cf. Deut 25:13–16. Thus the Israelite is expected to treat the alien with the same decency he is required to show his countryman. The prohibition of exploiting the non-Israelite is grounded in Israel's own experience, cf. Exod 22:20, 23:9; Deut 10:19.

D. Penalties for Offering to Molech, Consulting Spirits, and Sexual Crimes (20)

Sacrifice to Molech and sexual crimes were treated in ch. 18. There, however, the laws are direct prohibitions, whereas those appearing here are phrased conditionally and prescribe specific penalties. The lack of correspondence between the two chapters with regard to the specific crimes enumerated, along with the fact that ch. 18 actually does include a penalty clause (v. 29), shows that this chapter should not be read as providing the punishments for the crimes enumerated in ch. 18. The existence of two separate chapters devoted to one theme, with an entire chapter standing between them, indicates that ancient compilers had enormous reverence for the texts that they inherited from earlier bearers of tradition.

Sacrificing to Molech is a capital offense (vv. 2–5; see 18:21). Molech is the name of a deity associated with the world of the dead. The worship of Molech consisted of the sacrifice of children; there is evidence that this was occasionally practiced in Israel, sometimes in the false belief that this was Yahweh's will. In addition to requiring death by stoning, the law states that God will attend to the eventual extinction of the perpetrator's line (see 7:20–21). This is extended to the criminal's family if those charged with prosecuting the crime neglect their duty. The contamination of God's sanctuary results from this crime wherever it is committed.

Verse 6 deals with those who consult "mediums and wizards" (see 19:31), and v. 27 below prescribes the penalty for the practitioners themselves (on vv. 7–8, see the discussion at the beginning of ch. 19).

Now follows a series of prescribed penalties for sexual and other crimes (vv. 9–21). For those in vv. 9–16, the death penalty is prescribed, with burning mentioned as the method in one case (v. 14). The remainder are under the threat of being "cut off" (see 7:20, 21), either explicitly or by implication. No reason for this distinction is given, nor is there any clear indication of why only some verses contain characterizations of the crime (such as "they have committed perversion" in v. 12 and "it is a disgrace" in v. 17) and others do not. The expression "their blood is upon them" (e.g., v. 9) means that the guilty parties have justly incurred the death penalty and the executioners are not accountable.

Adultery (v. 10) is defined as sexual relations between any man, married or single, and a woman betrothed or married to someone else. Both parties to the crime are guilty, cf. Deut 22:22. Being cut off "in the sight of their people" (v. 17) occurs only here; it is probable that the penalty is carried out by God, cf. 7:20, 21. On relations with the menstruating woman (v. 18), see 15:19–24 and 18:19. The style of v. 19 is inconsistent with the conditional formulation in the rest of the chapter; no explanation for this is apparent. Dying childless (vv. 20, 21) is a specific form of being "cut off" since the person's line is thereby made extinct.

The concluding exhortation (vv. 22–26) returns briefly to the themes of 18:24–30, and introduces the motif of distinction: as God has distinguished Israel from the other nations, so the Israelites must distinguish clean from unclean foods, and thus be holy—since "holy" means designated or set apart. The final two verses appear to be loosely connected to this chapter, cf. 11:43–45.

E. Requirements and Disqualifications for Holy Persons and Sacrificial Animals (21–22)

God now addresses the issue of holiness in the tabernacle cult (chs. 21–22). All persons and objects that have become "holy," that is, have the status of belonging to the Lord, are subject to desecration, either through contact with impurity, by disqualifying blemish, or by unauthorized use; these must therefore be avoided so that Yahweh's earthly abode and holy name are not desecrated in turn.

The first topic is the holiness of the priesthood (21:1–15); priests are charged with preserving the boundaries between holy and profane (see 10:10). Since they enter the sacred precincts and must handle and eat sacrificial flesh, they must avoid impurity and refrain from approaching the sacred when they do become impure. Lay Israelites are not subject to the former prohibition, but they too must observe the latter. The priests must also abstain from observing the rituals of mourning detailed here (see 10:6–7), as they too are considered to desecrate their bodies (in 19:27–28, similar acts are also forbidden to lay Israelites). Further, since the holiness of the priests is genetically transmitted, they may marry only women about whom there is no suspicion of the presence of another man's seed. And while lay Israelites too are forbidden to allow their daughters to engage in harlotry (19:29), the priest's daughter's prostitution is a capital case, since her father's sanctity—and through it, God's—would thereby be desecrated.

The high priest is subject to even greater restrictions: he must refrain even from benign expressions of grief, must avoid contact with the corpse of even his closest relations, and must marry a virgin: even a widow is off-limits.

The next topic is the prevention of desecration resulting from priests (21:16–24) who have disqualifying physical defects. The priest, as God's palace servant, profanes the abode of the deity if he cannot adequately embody the divine form in whose image humans are made (Gen 1:26–27; 5:1). The absence, or permanent malformation, of external characteristics distinctive of the human species thus disqualifies a person born into the priesthood from officiating. He, of course, remains a priest and is, therefore, entitled to eat the priestly portions of the sacrificial flesh.

Another measure to be taken in order to avoid desecrating the sanctuary and the sacred offerings is to prevent their coming into contact with impure priests and, in the case of the offerings, their consumption by ineligible persons (22:1–16). Allowing impurities, even minor ones, to come into contact with the sacred profanes the divine name, since Yahweh's abode and the gifts presented to him are thereby treated as though they were common. The specifics, including the procedures required for cleansing and disposal of each type of impurity, are treated in chs. 11–15. Sacrificial portions that may only be consumed by priests are "most sacred" (see 6:24–29); contact between them and a lay person leads to their desecration. Non-priests who are formally a part of the priest's household may however share in them. On unwitting desecration of the sacred (v. 14) see also 5:14–16.

The physical defects that render animals unfit for the altar (vv. 17–25) are analogous to those that disqualify priests from officiating, but deformed animals do not cause desecration; they are simply not accepted (see 1:3–4; 7:18; 19:5–8) and the person's sacrifice is deemed not to have been offered. What is placed on God's table must be without defect (cf. Mal 1:6–14). From vv. 21–23 it may be deduced that the offering made in fulfillment of a vow is of a greater sanctity than the freewill offering, since the deformities mentioned in v. 23 are acceptable in the latter case. Together with 7:12–18, whence it is learned that the thanksgiving offering is the most sacred of the three, these verses thus confirm the hierarchy of the three classes of well-being offering.

The final section (vv. 26–30) deals with offerings that are not accepted due to time factors. The law in vv. 26–27 is based on the idea that an animal is not considered fit for the divine table until it is viable, i.e., has safely gotten beyond the stage of a newborn and is a creature in its own right. The law in v. 28, in contrast, seems to be motivated by humane concerns (see Exod 23:19; 34:26; Deut 14:21; 22:6–7). The law in vv. 29–30 must be read along with that in 19:5–8; together they restate the law in 7:12–15.

This passage concludes with a general exhortation (22:31–33). Just as compliance with the commandments enables the Israelites to absorb the holiness of God (19:3, 37; 20:7–8), failure to obey the commandments desecrates the name of God. In Priestly thought, Israel exists in order to sanctify God's name, and their failure to do so has the opposite effect: God's name is profaned, that is, God's fame is diminished and his reputation tarnished.

F. Sacred Times (Sabbaths and Festivals) (23)

The laws in this chapter provide a glimpse into the unique Priestly vision of the annually occurring special occasions. The word translated as "festivals" means, in fact, "times" or "dates," and the term translated "holy convocations" means simply that these dates are to be proclaimed as holy; no convocation or gathering is implied. Thus in P these annual dates are conceived of not as celebrations but as "sacred times." Like sacred objects, persons, areas and utterances, they may not be treated as common, and this is accomplished by observing them, like the Sabbath, as days of cessation from daily activity. This is unique to P. As the Lord's dates, they are envisaged in P primarily as days on which the Lord is worshiped in a manner exceeding the daily routine. The focus of the chapter is almost entirely on rituals on those days performed by the priests in the Temple, while the participation of the lay population is incidental. Only two of the sacred times, the unleavened bread observance (v. 6) and the days of dwelling in booths (v. 34 and vv. 41–42) are also days on which the laity is expected to make a pilgrimage to the Temple; this too is obscured by the translation where the word for "pilgrimage" is rendered as though it too meant "festival." An important distinction between this and the non-Priestly law is that in the latter there are three pilgrimages, and they are incumbent upon all males (Exod 23:14, 17; 34:23–24; Deut 16:16), whereas here no such obligation is stated.

Another Priestly calendar of sacred dates appears in Num 28–29. The main difference between the two passages is that Lev 23 elaborates on the distinctive observances connected with each occasion whereas the passage in Numbers provides a full listing of the required offerings for each day. The full impact of the unique Priestly view of Israel's so-called festivals can only be appreciated if this chapter is contrasted with the non-Priestly calendars in Exod 23:14–19; 34:17–26 and Deut 16:1–17.

Following the caption (v. 2), the chapter opens with mention of the weekly Sabbath (v. 3), consecrated according to P at Creation (Gen 2:1–3) but instituted only when the tabernacle was built (Exod 31:12–17; 35:1–3; see also Lev 19:3, 30; 26:2; Num 15:32–36). Only Priestly law mentions it alongside the festivals, and in Lev 23 it may be secondary; note the repeated caption (v. 4).

The sacred times per se (vv. 5–43) begin with the annual passover sacrifice (v. 5), which is not a sacred occasion but which immediately precedes the first of these, the Pilgrimage of Unleavened Bread (vv. 6–8). P provides details concerning these in Exod 12; here only what pertains to the calendar of sacred occasions is mentioned. P nowhere provides the rationale for the Unleavened Bread; it thus preserves a more natural, agricultural origin of the practice as associated with the beginning of the barley harvest in early spring. The observance of the first and last days of the two long pilgrimages as full holy days is also peculiar to the Priestly tradition (see vv. 36 and 39; Exod 12:16; Num 28:25; 29:35).

Next come the elaborate instructions for the Temple rituals performed by the priests, commencing on the first day of the week after the Unleavened Bread pilgrimage and culminating seven weeks later. A first sheaf of the new barley harvest (NRSV, "first fruits" is misleading), with its accompanying offerings, is presented each year in order to secure divine blessing for the new crops. The new grain may not be partaken of until the ceremony has taken place. Seven weeks are then counted so that the sacred occasion observed at their conclusion, elsewhere called the Day of the First Fruits and Weeks (Num 28:26), will coincide with the Temple rituals to be observed thereon—since in P this date is not marked by a pilgrimage. On this date, the priests are to present two leavened loaves called the "bread of first fruits" (see v. 20), offered in thanks for the new grain harvest and accompanied by appropriate additional offerings. The partial quotation from 19:9–10 appearing in v. 22 is added here because of its association with harvest time.

On the first day of the seventh month, i.e., at the approach of the fall equinox, when the agricultural year closes and recommences, P ordains a sacred date for "remembrance by shouting" (NRSV, "commemorated with trumpet blasts") (vv. 23–25). This is only one of several observances in P designed to call God's attention to the Israelite people and their needs (Exod 28:12, 29; 30:16; Num 31:54). The day seems to be envisaged as a day of crying out to God—presumably by the priests in the Temple—so as to beseech his aid in the new agricultural year.

In later tradition the "shouting" ordained here was deemed to be the sounding of the ram's horn, and with the eventual adoption of the autumnal New Year, the first day of the seventh month in the vernal calendar became New Year's Day.

The Day of Atonement (vv. 26–32), also unknown outside of P, is explained in ch. 16. The cessation of labor, which serves (along with the fast) to effectuate the purification and atonement rituals performed, marks this day too as a sacred occasion; Lev 23 thus incorporates it into the annual cycle of such dates.

Last are the laws for the Pilgrimage of Booths (vv. 33–43). The name of the annual fall pilgrimage refers to the huts that serve as temporary shelters from the elements, because the duration of the pilgrimage necessitates the erection of such shelters for the many pilgrims staying in the Temple city for seven days. In vv. 39 and 42, as well as Num 29:12, this is referred to as "the pilgrimage of the LORD"—the pilgrimage par excellence. The eighth day, known only to the Priestly tradition, is observed as day of abstaining from labor (NRSV, "a holy convocation" interprets otherwise, v. 36) but not as a "pilgrimage." Still it is a "sacred occasion," and a cessation from labor is to be observed by all, those who make the pilgrimage, those who do not, and those who do so but return home for the eighth day.

Since the additional observances of the Pilgrimage of Booths are not sacrificial rites performed by the priests but are rather observed by the public at large in the course of their week-long visit to the Temple-city, they are not included in what comes before the caption in vv. 37–38.

Taking branches and boughs (v. 40) is evidently a ritual of joyous acknowledgment of the current year's agricultural abundance. The rationale suggested here for the obligation to dwell in booths (vv. 42–43) seems to be a retrojection: just as Israelites gather to live in makeshift huts on their annual visit to the Temple, the text seems to be saying, their ancestors dwelled in proximity to the Lord's portable abode, the wilderness tabernacle, living in temporary dwellings until they reached the promised land.

G. Oil for the Lamp and the Bread of Presence (24:1–9)

This section contains two brief laws. The first (vv. 2–4), providing the instructions for the oil to be used for the tabernacle lampstand, is an almost exact repetition of Exod 27:20–21 and provides the explicit connection between it and Exod 25:31–40. The second (vv. 5–9), detailing the procedure for the loaves to be displayed (thus: "showbread" or "Bread of Presence") on the table in the tabernacle without ever being sacrificed on an altar, completes the legislation of Exod 25:23–30 by elaborating on its last verse. The twelve loaves represent the tribes of Israel and suggest their constant devotion. Conceptually, the loaves are a gift made by the Israelite people to the Lord, who in turn bestows it upon the priests in recognition of their service (see 6:10–11). Both of the rituals mentioned here pertain to the complex of acts performed by the high priest inside the tabernacle. These constitute a perpetual, symbolic pageant of worship. The daily lighting and tending of the lampstand is also mentioned in Exod 30:7–8, in the context of the high priest's incense offering, which is the other component of this complex of rituals. In the Priestly tabernacle, Yahweh is enshrined in the inner sanctum, but all acts of devotion are performed in the outer sanctum, and the partition dividing the two is never breached. The mention here of laws relating to the perpetual tabernacle routine may serve as a supplement to the preceding chapter, which details the calendar of regularly recurring special occasions.

H. The Crime of the Blasphemer and Laws Conveyed in Its Wake (24:10–23)

The incident recounted here appears unrelated to the laws that precede and follow it. It is, however, connected intimately with the theme of holiness that pervades these chapters, since the divine name is the one sacred "object" that can be used by anyone at any time (see on 6:1–7); it is only logical that misusing it is the sacrilege par excellence. The crime of blasphemy described here consists of cursing God (see Exod 22:28; 1 Kgs 21:10–13), that is, maligning God or uttering an imprecation against God in which his name is included.

Thrice more in the Priestly literature (Num 9:1–14; 15:32–36 and 26:1–11), one reads about Moses' inability to render a decision before consulting God (probably by means of the urim on Aaron's breastplate; see Exod 28:15, 30). Each time, the remedy pronounced becomes a permanent law applicable for future generations as well.

As the author imagines it, the only non-Israelites present in the wilderness period would have been the offspring of Israelite women and Egyptian men, conceived and born while still in Egypt. Since he wishes to extend his legislation to "aliens as well as citizens" (vv. 16 and 22) and thus to stress that the desecration of Yahweh's name is a capital offense by definition, whether performed by an Israelite or not, he casts such a person in the central role of the narrative.

The short collection of additional laws (vv. 17–22) is parenthetical. It has a simple theme: as opposed to the obligation to worship Yahweh, which rests upon Israel alone, the measure-for-measure ("eye for eye") rule in crimes and damages is incumbent upon the resident alien precisely as it is also required of the citizen (v. 22). The similar statement in the law of the blasphemer (v. 16) accounts for this section being added here. The narrative flow of vv. 10–16 continues, and concludes, in v. 23.

I. Concluding Commands and Exhortation (25–26)

Leviticus 25–26 is a single divine speech, indicating that the author intended for them to be viewed as a single rhetorical unit. It is communicated to Moses at Mount Sinai (25:1; 26:46; see also 7:38; 27:34), that is, in the tabernacle, which stood at [the foot of] Mount Sinai—precisely as were the rest of the laws in Leviticus (NRSV, "on" Mount Sinai is misleading). The first section, the laws of the sabbatical and jubilee (25:1–26:2), leads uninterruptedly into the second, the speech of promise and threat (26:3–45). The connection between the two sections is in the theme of the Yahweh's ownership of the land of Canaan. The first explores the legal ramifications of the Israelites' status as indentured servants on Yahweh's estate, and the second details the wages promised to the tenants if they comply with his demands and the measures he will take in order to compel them to do so if they are unwilling. The legal section thus flows directly into the concluding exhortation, and the division into two chapters during the medieval period is not warranted.

25:1–26:2. God's Lordship over the Land of Canaan. Only in Priestly legislation is the seventh year (25:2–7) referred to by the name "Sabbath." Further, only here is it forbidden to work the land in the seventh year, even though its produce may be gathered and eaten. Whereas non-Priestly law commands the Israelite to "release and abandon" the produce of the seventh year (Exod 23:11) so that the poor may gather it, Priestly law provides for the poor in other ways (19:9–10; 23:22). The seventh-year "release" in Deuteronomy pertains only to the annulment of debts (Deut 15:1–6). The law as envisaged here is wholly sacral in character: since the land of Canaan is Yahweh's estate, it is, in a sense, sacred. The Israelites are thus required to enable it to observe a "weekly" (in terms of agricultural years) cessation from productive activity, just as they themselves are obligated to do in their own lives. The prohibition pertains to normal, wholesale sowing, reaping, and harvesting only. As much food as needed may be gathered from what grows on its own, and livestock may graze.

The law of the jubilee (25:8–55) concentrates on its two central features: the land release and the release of indentured persons. The fiftieth year, which, unlike the seventh, is referred to as holy (25:10, 12), follows the seventh sabbatical, entailing a two-year cessation of agricultural activity. It commences in the seventh month which is the beginning of the annual agricultural cycle. The name "jubilee" has no connection to Latin jubilare "shout for joy" (cf. English "jubilation"); rather, it seems to be derived from a root meaning "bring" and to mean "homebringing," i.e., liberation (see 25:10).

The underlying idea of the jubilee is that the division of the land of Canaan among the Israelite tribes, clans, and families (see Num 33:54) is to be permanent. The land of Canaan is not the Israelites' property, it is rather a "holding" (see 25:24)—not theirs to buy, sell, and reapportion. "Buying" and "selling" of land in Canaan is actually a matter of leasing it until the jubilee. The jubilee is thus primarily an affirmation of God's exclusive dominion, designed to demonstrate that the Israelites are God's indentured servants (25:42, 55). Once again, the lawgiver expresses the idea that social legislation is included among God's commands only insofar as it impinges on the sacred.

The text responds to the anxiety the jubilee law arouses (25:20–22) by ordering the Israelite to do as commanded and trust in God, promising that the produce of crops sown in the fall of the sixth year will suffice as long as necessary.

"Redemption" in the Bible refers to the obligation to enable one who has lost his property or liberty to regain it. This obligation rests both upon the buyer, who must allow the person in question to repurchase his property or liberty as soon as his means suffice, and upon the kinsmen of the person in question, who must assist him if his means do not suffice. The laws of redemption in 25:23–55 demonstrate that the jubilee is actually the remedy of last resort, and that, prior to its advent, society must provide for the restoration of property and liberty whenever possible; otherwise the jubilee, when it arrives, affects the redemption by default.

An exception is the "sale" of urban property (25:29–34). The seller and his kinsmen have only a year to pay the redemption fee; if they cannot, the sale is final. If the property is in an unwallled town, or is in one of the Levites' designated cities that include the surrounding fields (Num 35:1–8), the jubilee is in force.

The prohibition of interest (25:37), which outside of the Priestly law applies in all circumstances (Exod 22:24; Deut 23:20–21), is restricted here to the specific case of the live-in relative attempting to redeem his property or liberty.

In contrast to the picture emerging from the non-Priestly law codes (see Exod 21:2–11; Deut 15:12–18), where Israelite slavery is recognized, in the Priestly legal tradition an Israelite forced to "sell" himself to another Israelite has the status of a hired laborer and must be treated as such. His servitude is temporary, and the option of electing to remain in perpetual servitude does not exist (25:39–43). Israelites, like land holdings in Canaan, are Yahweh's property. He took them out of Egypt not in order to make them free but to make them slaves: his slaves. Only non-Israelites may be enslaved, and they and their progeny become the permanent property of their master (25:44–46). As with land holdings, the redemption price for indentured persons is a function of the number of years remaining until the jubilee (25:47–54), since at that time any Israelite will be released.

Although the chapter division views 26:1–2 as the introduction to what follows, it is preferable to take these verses as a caption to the preceding material. By expressing three of the basic concerns of the Holiness Legislation (see 19:4, 30), the text thus signals the end of the Priestly body of laws, after which it precedes to the concluding oration (26:3–45).

26:3–46. Reward and Threat, and Conclusion of the Lawgiving. This oration describes the rewards for compliance (26:3–13) and the divine response to failure to comply. If the Israelites agree to adhere to the commands as given in all of the chapters preceding, God will provide peace, prosperity, safety, population increase and swift and decisive victory over all enemies. The aim of the exodus will be accomplished: Israel will become God's people, and God will take up residence in their midst and reign over them. Thus God will maintain the covenant (16:9)—which in Priestly tradition means that God will uphold the commitment made to Abraham (Gen 17:4–8) and repeated to Moses (Exod 6:2–8)—to make Israel numerous and to give them the right to use the land of Canaan as a "holding" (see above).

Much more space is given to the threats than the promises (26:14–45). In contrast to the Deuteronomic tradition (Deut 11:13–17; 28:15–68), the disasters threatened here are not punishments but warnings. They appear as a series of successive attempts to "chastise" (NRSV, "punish" [e.g., 26:18], which does not convey this) the Israelites, i.e., to coerce them into submission if they refuse to accept his yoke. Even the final stage, expelling the Israelites from Canaan (26:27–39), is not aimed at bringing Israel's national existence to an end (as in Deuteronomy); rather it is the ultimate means to force Israel into line. The misery of exile will lead to remorse, following which Yahweh will remember his covenant and implement his original plan once and for all. Yahweh thus appears here not in the role of the offended tyrant getting even for each infringement but rather as a determined ruler who realizes that severe measures may be necessary in order to achieve his end—and who will not shirk from using them. God is pictured here not so much as willing to give repeated second chances as compelled to do so, since, in Priestly thought, the covenant cannot ever become null and void.

If the Israelites refuse to accept God's terms, his first attempt to coerce them will consist of diseases and enemy incursions (26:16–17). If this fails, it will be followed by the withholding of rain and the resultant crop failure (vv. 18–20); the expression "sevenfold for your sins" signifies that the coercion imposed will be unimaginably greater than the offense they commit by spurning God. If this too is unsuccessful, the third attempt (vv. 21–22) will follow: an onslaught of wild beasts, the precise reverse of v. 6. The word translated "hostile" here and below is of uncertain meaning; it may mean "uncaring, indifferent." The fourth attempt (vv. 23–26) will consist of sword, pestilence, and famine. These, along with wild beasts, are God's four weapons of destruction in Ezek 14:12–23. This makes the total number of measures employed by God to pressure God's people into compliance add up to seven, the typical way of expressing completeness in the Bible.

If all of these prove ineffective, the final stage will ensue (vv. 27–38). Israel's land will be overrun by an invading enemy; all the local shrines and cultic objects (whose very existence is an anathema) will be destroyed, the land will become a ruin, and the population will flee fearfully into exile where they will all but cease to exist. In an ironic aside (vv. 34–35), God points out that although, during Israel's long refusal to obey God's commands, many cycles of seven years will have gone by and the land will not have observed its Sabbaths, when Israel goes into exile and its land is deserted, it will be repaid the rest it was denied.

Those who go into exile will become fewer and fewer with the passage of time. At last, the remaining survivors, moved by their misery to consider its cause, will realize it was their own (and their ancestors' own) fault and will acknowledge their guilt and that of their ancestors. When they finally commit themselves to comply fully with God's demands, the slate will be wiped clean of the accumulated guilt. The expression "uncircumcised heart" (v. 41) refers to their obduracy. The phrase, along with the entire process predicted here, expresses the notion that the refusal to accept the yoke of God's commands was immediate and unrelieved. Thus it is incorrect to speak of the final stage as repentance, since repentance consists of the return to former righteousness.

The Priestly history of Yahweh's active relationship with the people of Israel began when he heard their cry in bondage and was moved to remember his covenant with the patriarchs (Exod 6:5; see Gen 17:4–8; 28:1–4; 35:11–12). Thus its ending, as envisaged here (26:42–45), is an appropriate one: in the predicted future, Yahweh will hear their confession of guilt, will recall again his promise to the patriarchs, and will finally succeed in implementing his plan. The expression "the covenant with their ancestors whom I brought out of the land of Egypt" (v. 45) indicates that the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was indeed communicated in P to the generation of the exodus as well, and this is confirmed by Exod 6:6–9.

The text does not tell us what is expected to happen if the predicted remorse and confession fail to materialize; the prophecies of Ezekiel address this issue when it arises.

The caption in v. 46 indicates that this is the end of the Priestly account of the lawgiving in the tabernacle and that the laws in the next chapter are an added appendix.

J. Appendix: Pledges and Their Valuation, and Repeated Conclusion (27)

A person may make a monetary donation to the sanctuary by a procedure called consecration. In the first type (vv. 1–8), the Priestly legislator preserves the notion of self-consecration without requiring a person actually to sacrifice himself; rather one may contribute the monetary value of oneself or a member of one's household. What is otherwise a purely fiscal matter thus becomes a sublime act of devotion. The values are fixed; but if a poor person wishes to consecrate himself or a member of his family the scale is flexible (v. 8).

The second type of consecration (vv. 9–13) pertains to animals. Those fit for the altar (vv. 9–10), once consecrated, must be offered and no substitutions are to be made. Those that may not be sacrificed (vv. 11–13) may be consecrated only in order to be sold by the sanctuary for their monetary value. Unlike persons, animals have their values determined on the spot by the priest. One who opts to make his contribution and also keep his animal may redeem it for silver, but must add a 20% surcharge.

The third type of consecration is that of houses (vv. 14–15). One may actually donate one's house to the sanctuary for sale, or one may consecrate the house and then redeem it for silver, again adding 20% to the value. The redemption fee goes to the sanctuary, and the house returns to its owner.

The final type of consecration is that of real estate (vv. 16–25). Fields and ancestral lands may be donated for sale, the proceeds going to the sanctuary treasury; or the donor may redeem them, again at a 20% surcharge. Here, however, proper adjustment must be made for the number of years remaining until the jubilee. The sum of fifty shekels mentioned in v. 16 probably means one shekel per year, maximally fifty, if the jubilee is 50 years away. A homer of barley seed is an amount equal to the normal load carried by an ass.

Such voluntary contributions are an important source of revenue for the Temple, and they are also the only way that individual Israelites can participate in the regimen of public worship performed by the priests on their behalf. The complicated procedure by which one must consecrate and then redeem the object, instead of simply donating the monetary value up front, is something of a legal fiction, designed to impart the sense that one has given to God a portion of one's tangible wealth.

The remainder of the chapter (vv. 26–33) deals with objects that cannot be consecrated to the Lord since they belong to him already. Firstlings of the flock and herd (vv. 26–27; see Exod 13:2; Num 3:40–51) must be sacrificed and cannot be redeemed; firstlings of non-sacrificial animals may be redeemed or sold. The term translated "ransomed" in vv. 27, 29 is used to express the fact that the item in question is the property of God to begin with, so the person is not actually regaining ownership.

Next are objects that have been "devoted to destruction" (vv. 28–29). This seems to mean objects that have been proscribed, i.e., become taboo, as the result of a pledge that no use would ever be made of them and that they would become the permanent property of the Lord, never to be sold, redeemed, or exchanged. These are to be destroyed, and if they are humans, this means that they are destined for death. It is difficult to imagine that one may sentence oneself, one's slave, or a household member under one's authority to death as a consecration to the Lord, and that once this is done, there is no reprieve; but there may have been times when such a law was implemented.

Finally, tithes, which belong to God already, cannot be consecrated (vv. 30–33). The crop tithe mentioned here may be in addition to the one in Num 18.21–32. As for the tithe of herds and flocks, it is unique, not mentioned elsewhere in the Torah; from Samuel's words in 1 Sam 8:15–17, however, one may deduce that kings were in the practice of imposing such tithes as a form of taxation.

Since a section of this chapter (vv. 16–24) depends upon the laws of land tenure, it would have been unclear if the chapter had been placed before ch. 25, while placing this chapter between chs. 25 and 26 would have interrupted their thematic continuity. This explains why this chapter appears after the conclusion of the Priestly lawgiving, after which the caption of 26:46 is repeated in abbreviated form (v. 34).

NUMBERS

THOMAS B. DOZEMAN

OVERVIEW

Title. Two titles are associated with the fourth book in the Pentateuch. The title, "Numbers," derives from the Vulgate (Vg, Numeri) and the Septuagint (LXX, Arithmoi). A second title, "In the Wilderness," comes from the Masoretic Text (MT, bemidbar), in which pentateuchal books are named either by their opening word or by a significant word in the first sentence. These two names imply separate themes and divergent literary structures. "Numbers" accentuates the two accounts of the census taken of the Israelite people, which divides the book between the first (Num 1–25) and second (Num 26–36) generation of Israelites to leave Egypt. "In the wilderness" focuses instead on the theme of journey with God, which yields a three-part structure to the book: Num 1:10:10 contains revelations in the wilderness camp; 10:11–21:35 narrates the tragic wilderness journey of the first generation; and 22:1–36:13 describes the second generation of Israelites on the plains of Moab as they prepare to enter the promised land.

Composition. Statements reporting divine revelation frame the book of Numbers. Numbers 1:1 introduces the book with the statement: "The LORD spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tent of meeting." The closing verse of 36:13 states: "These are the commandments and the ordinances that the LORD commanded through Moses to the Israelites...." The opening and closing verses emphasize the authoritative nature of the literature as law, which is composed by Moses. A careful reading of the book, however, reveals a wide variety of literary genres and a number of distinct authors. The book of Numbers includes poetry (e.g., the song of the ark, 10:35–36; an excerpt from the Book of the Wars of Yahweh, 21:14–15; the song of the well, 21:17–18; the ballad over Heshbon, 21:27–30; and the oracles of Balaam, 23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–24); liturgy (e.g., the Priestly blessing, 6:24–26); travel and inheritance records (e.g., the itinerary list, 21:10–20; 33; the inheritance of the land, 32); Priestly law (e.g., the law of restitution, 5:5–10; the law of sacrifice, 15:1–31; the law of the red heifer, 19; the law of homicide, 35:9–15); and prose tales about the wilderness journey (e.g., the selection of the seventy elders, 11–12; the story of the failed conquest, 13–14; the battle against Sihon and Og, 21:21–35).

This diverse literature has been fashioned into a larger narrative of the wilderness journey from Egypt to the promise land, of which there are at least two versions, the non-Priestly (NP) and the Priestly (P) histories. The P history is the most prominent in the book of Numbers, including the camp legislation in Num 1–10 and nearly all of the literature on the inheritance and cultic laws in Num 26–36, as well as conflict stories of the wilderness journey in Num 11–25 (e.g., the departure from Sinai, 10:11–28; a version of the loss of the land, 13–15; conflict over the priesthood, 16–19; the sin of Moses and Aaron, 20:1–13; the death of Aaron, 20:22–29; and the sin at Baal Peor, 25:6–18). The NP history is concentrated in the story of the wilderness journey in Num 11–25, including an account of the departure from Mount Yahweh (10:29–36), conflict over the leadership of Moses and the selection of the seventy elders (11–12), a version of the loss of the land (13–14), further conflict over the leadership of Moses by Dathan and Abiram (16), the wars of conquest east of Jordan (20:14–21; 21:1–20; 21:21–35), the story of Balaam (22–24), the sin at Baal Peor (25:1–5); and the summary accounts of the wilderness journey and the inheritance of the Transjordanian land (32–33).

Central Themes. The central themes of the book of Numbers include the purity of God and its influence in cultic practice, the formation of community and ethical behavior (1–10, 15, 19), the wilderness journey as a place of testing and a model story of how the people of God live out their faith in this world (11–21), and the promised land as the goal of the religious pilgrimage (22–36).

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Tabernacle Camp (1:1–10:10)

The central theme in the description of the Israelite camp and the divine sanctuary is the holiness of God and how it transforms human society. The layout of the camp (1:1–6:27) in relation to the tabernacle (7:1–10:10) introduces degrees of holiness, depending on how close a person or place is in relation to the tabernacle. There are degrees of holiness among priests, Levites, and people as well as among the tabernacle, the camp, and the wilderness area outside of the camp. The closer to God, the holier. The authors describe how holiness emanating from the tabernacle creates a new social, political, and environmental order for Israel. The arrangement of the camp, the order for marching, and the role of the priests and the Levites outline the ethics of holiness.

A. The Camp and Community (1:1–6:27)

These chapters represent divine instruction to Moses within the tent of meeting, which outline the effects of divine holiness on Israel's social organization in the camp of the tabernacle. The holiness of God creates separation between the sacred and the profane worlds. God is holy; humans are not. Thus care must be taken in bringing the two together. Humans must conform to divine holiness. The concern for order in the Israelite camp represents the desire to conform to holiness.

1:1–47. Census of the First Generation. The deity demands a census of all Israelite males, twenty years of age and older, by tribe. The description of the census in v. 3 as "enrolling" (Heb.: paqad) the males means it is a census for military purposes. Verses 4–16 indicate that leaders are chosen from each tribe. The tribes are listed with Reuben as the first. The tribes are listed in a stereotypic manner, beginning with the name of the tribe, the chosen leader, and his father's name. Verses 17–47 provide the summary of the census by tribe, excluding the Levites. The total number of males over twenty years of age is 603,550, which repeats the number from Exod 38:26. The number most likely has symbolic value for the ancient authors, but that meaning eludes modern interpreters.

1:48–54. Separation of the Levites. The Levites are not included in the census. Verses 48–50a provide the reason. The Levites are not to be numbered because they are assigned special duties in caring for the tabernacle. Verses 50b–54 state three duties of the Levites: they perform service for the tabernacle, they carry the tabernacle and its vessels, and they provide a protective buffer around the tabernacle by pitching their tents between the sanctuary and the Israelite camp. Verse 54 concludes the account of the census by stating that all of the divine commands were completed. The Levites will also be separated out from the tribes in the promise land, where they will dwell in cities rather than receive an inheritance of land (Num 35).

2:1–34. Arrangement of the Camp. Once the Israelites are numbered, the divine instructions shift to the arrangement of the campsite. The tabernacle is situated at the center of the Israelite camp with the tribes distributed evenly on its four sides in the following manner. The tribes camping on the east side of the tent of meeting are Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun (vv. 3–9); on the south of the tent of meeting, Reuben, Simeon, and Gad (vv. 10–16); at the center closest to the tent of meeting, the Levites (v. 17); on the west side of the tent of meeting, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (vv. 18–24); and on the north side of the tent of meeting, Dan, Asher, and Naphtali (vv. 25–31).

This geographical distribution of the tribes highlights the status of certain tribes, with those on the east side of the camp receiving the highest honor. The first tribe listed in each group is assigned a leadership role over the "regimental encampment," which has its own insignia or banner. The arrangement of the camp indicates the primary position of Judah, with the tribe of Reuben as leader of the second regimental encampment. The arrangement of the campsite also provides the order for marching. Verse 17 reports that the tabernacle is at the center of camp and that it is surrounded by the Levites. According to Num 2 the sanctuary is located at the holiest place on earth. It becomes the center of all life for the Israelite tribes, which are organized around the tabernacle. The role of the Levites to safeguard the sanctuary reflects both the power and the danger of holiness in the midst of the people of God. Thus the Levites both serve the sacred for the Israelite people and also protect the holiness of God from the danger of the people's impurity.

3:1–10. Genealogy of the Levites. The section begins with the genealogical phrase, "This is the lineage of Aaron and Moses," known as the Toledot formula. Most instances of the Toledot occur in Genesis, where the story of creation and the ancestors is read as an evolving genealogy, first of the world (Gen 1–10) and then of the Israelite nation (Gen 11–50). The reference to the Toledot in 3:1

narrows the focus of the biblical narrative even further from the nation of Israel to the priestly family of Aaron. Verses 5–10 return to the topic of the relationship of the Levites to the Aaronide priesthood and to Israelites in general. The Levites are positioned between the priesthood and the congregation for the purpose of serving both groups in front of the tabernacle (vv. 6–7). The description of the Levite's work as "to perform duties," likely indicates guard duty, in which the Levites protect the sacred space of the tabernacle from encroachment. The Levites also transport the tabernacle, when the Israelites journey through the wilderness.

3:11–13. Levites as Substitutes for Firstborn. God states that the Levites are substitutes for all Israelite firstborn. The command indicates the divine claim on firstborn males. Exodus 22:29 provides the rationale, when God states: "The firstborn of your sons you shall give to me." The few passages that mention the divine claim on the firstborn do not explain the reason for the holy status of the firstborn or the cultic implications of the law. The divine claim on the firstborn may have been associated with first fruits (Exod 23:14–17) or the role of the firstborn in ancestral worship (Deut 26:1–14). Whether there was a special ritual, redemption, or even sacrifice of the firstborn is difficult to determine. (The story of the sacrifice of Isaac in Gen 22 is a polemic against child sacrifice, suggesting some form of child sacrifice may at one time have taken place.) Verse 13 roots the holy status of the Israelite firstborn in the exodus, when the Israelite firstborn were spared death on the night of Passover.

3:14–51. Census of the Levites. The role of the Levites as substitutes for the Israelite firstborn requires that they be counted. All Levitical males from one month of age and older are to be numbered according to their three ancestral houses, the house of Gershon numbers 7,500 males (vv. 21–26), Kohath has 8,600 males (vv. 27–32), and Merari 6,200 males (vv. 33–37). Verses 38–39 locate the Aaronide priests in the camp as dwelling on the east side of the tabernacle, while also contrasting their labor within the sanctuary from the Levites who work outside it, before noting that the total number of Levitical priests is 22,000. Verses 40–51 return to the topic of Levitical substitution for the Israelite firstborn. In cases where there are more firstborn than Levites, the redemption of the firstborn is achieved through a Temple tax.

4:1–49. Tasks of the Levites. The chapter begins with a second census of the Levites, who are between the ages of thirty and fifty years. All the Levites are placed under the direction of the Aaronide priests. Eleazar supervises the Kohathite Levites (v. 16), while the Gershonites and the Merarites are under the oversight of Ithamar (vv. 28, 33). The Kohathites carry the most holy objects of the tabernacle on the wilderness march, including the ark, the table of showbread, the lamp stand, the golden altar, and all the utensils (vv. 5–15). The Gershonite Levites carry the curtains of the tabernacle (vv. 21–28), and the Merarites carry the frames, bars, and pillars of the tabernacle with its court (vv. 29–33).

5:1–4. Purity Laws for the Camp. The holiness of God requires not only the separation of the sacred and the profane but also involves the distinction between health and disease. Holiness is the source of human health and purity. It must be protected from human infection, contamination, pollution, and impurity. Verses 1–4 state three forms of impurity that threaten the camp: (1) a skin disease described as sara'at, sometimes translated as leprosy; (2) abnormal bodily discharges from the genitals; and (3) contact with a corpse. Each of these conditions represents a form of death, which stands in conflict with the life-giving power of holiness centered in the tabernacle. These laws are designed to protect holiness from defilement and thus safeguard the presence of God in the camp; they are not to protect humans. Any male or female with these conditions threatens the purity of the camp and must be expelled.

5:5–10. Law Regulating Community Relationships. These verses deal with the breakdown of communal relationships that create impurity and threaten holiness. The focus of the law is not secular crime, but the violation of the sacred. Verse 6 states that cheating and stealing "break faith with the LORD." The Hebrew verb, "to break faith" (ma'al) when used with the prepositions with/against (be) indicates some form of sacrilege. The sacred character of the law is further reinforced when the offender is described as "incurring guilt." Guilt in this instance describes a state or condition incompatible with holiness. The imagery is medical. Such a person infects the camp with pollution and thus must be cured through confession and repayment of the offense.

5:11–31. Law Regulating a Woman Accused of Adultery. The concern for social relationships (vv. 5–10), which may defile the camp, focuses here on marriage. The law is aimed at a wife who is suspected of "going astray" (sata), meaning to commit adultery. Verses 15–31 outline a judicial procedure for determining the guilt or innocence of a suspected adulteress. The rationale for the ritual is that adultery is sacrilege. A woman guilty of such an action threatens the camp with contamination, not because she is ritually unclean from sexual intercourse, but because she is ethically unclean from violating her marital relationship. The aim of the ritual is not to assuage the husband's jealousy but to avoid defilement of the camp.

The magical character of the ordeal described in vv. 15–28 for determining the guilt or innocence of the woman underscores the sacred dimension in which the law is meant to function. The priest is instructed to take the accused woman before God (v. 16), mix holy water with dust from the floor of the tabernacle (v. 17), loosen the woman's hair, and place an offering of jealousy and remembrance in her hands (v. 18). Verses 19–26 stipulate an oath, which functions as a self-curse upon the woman, should she be found guilty. The priest writes the oath on parchment in the mixture of water and dust as a potion named "the water of bitterness," which the woman must drink. Verses 27–28 indicate that the woman's reaction to the potion will determine her guilt or innocence, suggesting a trial by ordeal. The closest parallel in the Hebrew Bible is Exod 32:20 where Moses makes the Israelites drink water mixed with powder from the destroyed golden calf. If guilty, the curse will take effect causing the woman's uterus to drop, most likely indicating the aborting of a fetus; if innocent she will conceive the child.

Interpreters have struggled with the technical language of the ritual and its larger meaning. The various descriptions of the offering such as "offering of jealousy," "offering of remembrance," "bringing iniquity to remembrance," and "holy water" lack precise parallels in the Hebrew. The setting of the sanctuary for the ordeal places the law of adultery within the realm of sacred law as compared to civil law, perhaps protecting the wife from the rage of her husband. The law is intended to protect the holiness of the camp from the impurity of sexual defilement.

6:1–21. Law of the Nazirite. The name Nazirite comes from the Hebrew verb nazar, meaning "to separate." A Nazirite is potentially any woman or man from the congregation who makes a vow to be separate or dedicated to God for a period of time, resulting in the holy status of the person for a set period of time. The law of the Nazirite appears in three parts: vv. 1–8 describe the restrictions that apply to the Nazirite; vv. 9–12 focus on cleansing from accidental defilement; and vv. 13–20 outline proper procedures for ending the vow. Verses 1–8 describe three restrictions on Nazirites, while they are in their holy state: Nazirites cannot drink wine (vv. 3–4); cut their hair during the period of the vow (v. 5); nor touch a corpse, since holiness and death are incompatible (v. 6). Should a Nazirite accidentally break his or her vow, vv. 9–12 outline the procedures for decontamination so that the person can begin the vow anew. A contaminated Nazirite must undergo a seven-day period of purification, at the end of which his or her hair must be shaved. On the eighth day, two turtle doves or pigeons are presented to the priest for sacrifice, followed by a guilt offering of a one-year-old male lamb, which expiates the person, allowing that person to begin the Nazirite vow anew. Verses 13–20 outline the proper ritual for leaving the holy state of the Nazirite. Self-removal from the sacred is a dangerous procedure, requiring a complex series of sacrifices, including a burnt offering, a sin offering, an offering of well-being, and grain and drink offerings.

6:22–27. Priestly Blessing. A Priestly blessing on the congregation concludes the section of laws concerning camp defilement, which began in Num 5. The act of blessing is deeply rooted in Israelite culture, perhaps even protecting humans from the contamination of the dead. The Priestly blessing consists of three poetic lines (vv. 24–26), each of which contains two verbs: bless-keep; shine-grace; and lift-peace. The name Yahweh appears once in each line, as the subject of the first of the paired verbs. The first verb in each line summarizes an activity of God upon the worshiper (bless, shine, lift), and the second describes the results of God's actions (keep, grace, peace).

Verses 22–23, 27 provide the literary context for the poem. Verses 22–23 indicate that the blessing functions as a concluding benediction to the instructions about purity in the camp. Verse 27 clarifies that it is God, rather than the priest, who blesses. The blessing provides a safeguard against defilement by infusing the camp with the power of divine blessing. It also provides a portrait of the ideal camp, where God pays attention to persons, where blessing and security drive out the power of death, and where the achievement of wholeness and peace is possible.

B. The Tabernacle (7:1–10:10)

The scope of the laws narrows in this section from the effects of holiness on the camp to the tabernacle at its center. The subject matter also changes from the social organization of Israel and their ethical relationships to the cultic rituals associated with the care and dedication of the sanctuary.

7:1–88. Offerings of Dedication. Verse 1 refers to Moses' dedication of the tabernacle (cf Exod 40:1, 16, where Moses also dedicates the sanctuary). The repetition suggests a suspension of time from Exod 40 to Num 7, before the twelve days of dedicatory offerings in 7:2–88. The central theme in the chapter is sacrifice, which in the present context constitute dedicatory gifts to God. Verses 2–9 describe the dedicatory offerings as spontaneous gifts from the laity. The initial gifts include six wagons and twelve oxen for the transportation of the tabernacle. Verses 10–88 offer an extensive account of gifts presented by each tribal leader over a twelve-day period. The order of the gift-giving follows the sequence of tribes, in which Judah rather than Reuben is first. Each tribe brings identical gifts including grain offering on 1 silver plate and 1 silver basin; incense offering in 1 gold dish; burnt offering of 1 bull, 1 ram, and 1 male lamb; sin offering of 1 male goat; and well-being offering of 2 oxen, 5 rams, 5 male goats; and 5 male lambs. The sacrifices are presented to the priesthood as resources for the cult.

7:89. Moses in the Tabernacle. God speaks to Moses in the most holy place of the tabernacle. The iconography within the tabernacle and the actions of Moses reflect the Priestly theology of divine presence. The voice of God is heard from between the two cherubim that frame the mercy seat and form the top of the ark of the congregation. The word cover is a more accurate translation of the Hebrew word (kapporet) than "mercy seat."

The translation mercy seat may derive from the rite of atonement that takes place at the ark in Lev 16. The iconography of the tabernacle represents the cherubim and ark from the Jerusalem Temple of the monarchical period now used to describe the ways in which God was present with Israel even during the exile. In the Jerusalem Temple, God was described as being enthroned upon two cherubim (Ps 99:1–5), massive winged statues ten cubits in height (1 cubit = 18–22 inches), each with a single wingspan of five cubits (1 Kgs 6:23–28; 8:7). Their wings stretched the width of the inner chamber of the Temple, providing a throne for God, with the ark in front of the wings of the cherubim as a footstool for the enthroned deity (Ps 99:1–5). The tabernacle retains the cherubim, but they are smaller and function as guardian angels of divine law within the ark. No mention is made of the royal imagery of divine enthronement.

8:1–4. Menorah. The lamp stand or menorah is described in Exod 25:31–40. Its shaft is called a stem, and its receptacles for the lamps are branches. The imagery may represent a stylized tree of life, which symbolizes both fertility in nature and the life-giving power of God. Verses 1–4 focus on the location of the menorah within the tabernacle. The lights on the menorah must burn toward the altar, accentuating the presence of God in the tabernacle.

8:5–26. Dedication of the Levites. The Levites were distinguished from rest of the Israelites in 1:48–53. Numbers 3–4 recounted their separate census, service to the tabernacle, and role as substitutes for the Israelite firstborn. The present section focuses on the purification and dedication of the Levites. In contrast to the consecration of the Aaronide priests, the Levites undergo a process of purification. The process includes sprinkling with water, shaving their entire bodies, and washing their clothes (vv. 5–8). Rites of sacrifice follow the rituals of purification (vv. 9–13). The Levites lay their hands on two bulls, who are then sacrificed as a means of atonement for the Levites, one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering. Verses 14–18 make clear that the ritual process of purification and sacrifice results in the Levites becoming a divine possession, thus fulfilling their role as substitutes for the Israelite firstborn. Verse 19 notes that the Levites also atone for the Israelites through their position in the camp, where they protect the people from the danger of holiness by creating a buffer between the sanctuary and the tribes.

9:1–14. Passover. The law of Passover frames the story of the exodus, appearing first during the exodus when Israel is in the land of Egypt (Exod 12) and again at the conclusion of the revelation at Mount Sinai (Num 9). Passover functions as the Israelite's constitutional festival: it saves the firstborn from death in Egypt, and it defines Israel as a nation. Participation in Passover creates the congregation as the people of God, whether native Israelite or resident alien. Verses 1–14 presuppose the earlier instruction on Passover from Exod 12. This passage addresses problems that might arise with observing the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month. Israelites who are not able to observe Passover on its designated day because of issues of impurity are allowed to observe the festival one month later. All Israelites must observe Passover.

9:15–23. Cloud and Wilderness March. The section describes the cloud that is associated with the tabernacle and that symbolizes the presence of God. The cloud is a common symbol throughout the ancient Near East to indicate the presence of the divine. It often appears as a halo or bright disk, most likely symbolizing the sun, which would surround a god or person with divine power. Verses 15–16 state that when Moses set up the tabernacle, a cloud covered it continually, day and night. During the night the cloud appeared as fire. The cloud first appears on the day that Moses sets up the tabernacle (Exod 40:1, 16). Verses 17–22 provide a detailed summary of the way in which the cloud guides Israel in the wilderness march. The cloud signals when Israel must march and when they must camp. The periods of marching and camping vary, according to vv. 19–22. Rest periods may include one night (v. 21), days, a month, and even longer periods of time (v. 22). The periods of rest may reflect the Priestly ritual calendar (Num 28–29), according to which feasts require diverse periods of rest.

10:1–10. Trumpets. God commands Moses to make two silver trumpets, which were likely narrow tubes, roughly eighteen inches in length with a bell-shaped end. The trumpets, blown by the Aaronide priests, were used to summon the congregation and to prepare the camp for travel in the wilderness. Once the people reach the promise land, the trumpets would summon the people to war and to observe feast days. Verse 10 concludes with the divine promise that God will remember the Israelites upon hearing the trumpet blasts. The instruction concludes with the phrase, "I am Yahweh, your God," which reveals the divine name. This phrase, known as the selfintroduction, appears throughout the important events of the exodus (Exod 6:2, 7; 7:17; 10:2; 14:4, 18) and the wilderness journey (Exod 29:46; Lev 19:11, 13, 16; 18:2, 5; 25:17–38).

II. The Wilderness Journey (10:11–21:35)

Israel departs from Mount Sinai. This section depicts the journey of the first generation of Israelites as a tragic story leading to death. The section is dominated by conflict between God, Israel, and Moses in the wilderness. Conflicts over leadership focus on Moses, whose authority is challenged twice. The prophetic leadership of Moses is central to Num 11–12 whereas chs. 16–17 address his priestly leadership. Resolution of the conflicts through divine judgment defines more clearly these distinct leadership roles. Chapters 13–14 describe the failure of the first generation of Israelites to secure the promise land. Their failure provides guidelines for success by a future generation (15, 18–19). Chapters 20–21 provide transition from the failed journey of the first generation of Israelites to the second generation.

A. Leaving Sinai (10:11–36)

There are two accounts of Israel's departure from Mount Sinai. Numbers 10:11–28 is the Priestly version of the departure, which incorporates the language, characters, and tribal organization from 1:1–10:10. This account highlights the Israelite nation as a whole. Numbers 10:29–36 is the first portion of the NP history. It describes Israel's departure from Mount Yahweh, with the ark of the covenant leading the people three days in advance. Here the focus is on God leading the people rather than on the journeying of the people.

10:11–28. Organization of the Wilderness March. The date for the departure from Mount Sinai is month 2, day 20 of the second year after the exodus, allowing for the completion of the second Passover prescribed in 9:1–14. The cloud guides Israel as was described in 9:15–23. Verse 12 describes the travel route of the Israelites as a journey "by stages" from Sinai to Paran. The P history repeats this information in Num 12:16. The location of Paran is unknown. It is described as a desert site between Midian and Egypt in 1 Kgs 11:18. The location bears theological significance in ancient poetry as the desert home of Yahweh, who is described as "the Holy One from Mount Paran" (Hab 3:3). Verses 13–28 depict the organization of the wilderness march with military imagery, which consists of four standards. The first standard includes Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and the tabernacle transported by the Gershonites and Merarites. The second standard includes Reuben, Simeon, Gad, and the Holy Objects carried by the Kohathites. The third standard consists of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin. And the fourth standard, forming the rear guard, includes Dan, Asher, and Naphtali.

10:29–36. Leading of the Ark. These verses constitute a second account of the departure, this time from Mount Yahweh rather than from Mount Sinai. Verses 29–32 report an exchange between Moses and his father-in-law, Hobab the son of Reuel (also named Jethro in Exod 3:1; 4:18; and 18:1). Moses requests his guidance and promises him a share in the goodness that Yahweh promises Israel. Hobab refuses, prompting Moses to repeat the request for leadership. Moses receives no response from Hobab, but the ark immediately begins to guide Israel following this exchange (vv. 33–36), suggesting that God replaces Hobab as a leader of Israel on their wilderness journey. Verses 33–34 describe the departure of Israel from Mount Yahweh, with the cloud of God traveling in front for the three days journey in search of a resting place. In a short poem, vv. 35–36 characterize the ark as a guide in the wilderness. In contrast to the Priestly account of travel in Num 10:11–28, where the ark traveled in the midst of Israel, the poem places the ark ahead of the people in their journey, while also emphasizing the role of the ark in holy war. The first line of the poem describes Yahweh's ability to attack the enemy, while the second line envisions the successful return of Yahweh from battle. The ark is one of the most significant cult objects in Israel's history, appearing in a number of different roles throughout the Old Testament. 1 Samuel 4–7 follows the imagery of this poem, narrating the role of the ark in war. Psalm 99:1–5 reinterprets the ark as the footstool of the enthroned God in the Jerusalem Temple. Deuteronomy 10:8 reinterprets the ark once again as the container for the Ten Commandments, which form the basis of covenant between God and Israel.

B. The Prophetic Spirit of Moses (11:1–12:15)

Numbers 11–12 explores the leadership of Moses through a series of complaints. The stories of complaint (also described as murmuring stories) organize the wilderness journey of the first generation of Israelites. The complaint stories begin immediately when the Israelites leave Egypt and continue through the entire wilderness journey (Exod 14:11–12; 15:22–26; 16; 17:1–7; Num 11:1–3, 4–35; 14; 16–17; 20:2–13; 21:4–9). The murmuring of the Israelites arises during threatening situations in the wilderness: the lack of food and water, disease, or the fear of the inhabitants of Canaan, all of which cause Israel to protest their present condition. Their complaint is accompanied by a longing to return to slavery in Egypt, which represents a lack of faith in the leadership of Yahweh and Moses and eventually leads to the death of the first generation. The murmuring stories intensify from episodes of testing (Exod 14–18) before the Israelites receive the law at Mount Sinai (Exod 19–Num 10) to instances of disobedience after the revelation of law (Num 11–21).

Numbers 11–12 consists of three stories of conflict. Numbers 11:1–3 introduces the section with a general story of complaint by the rabble in the camp, who are destroyed by fire. A second story of complaint in 11:4–35 focuses on the lack of food, prompting Moses to complain to God. Numbers 12 recounts the challenge of Aaron and Miriam's challenge to Moses as a unique prophetic leader. The stories describe the nature of Moses' charismatic leadership. The word charisma means "gift" in Greek. Moses is presented as a gifted leader, someone filled with the divine spirit, who speaks with God face to face, conveys the divine word to the people, and intercedes on behalf of the people. The section explores the nature of Moses' charismatic leadership from different perspectives. Numbers 11:4–35 explores the way in which Moses' charismatic spirit can be transferred to other leaders, while Num 12 emphasizes the unique quality of Moses' prophetic spirit.

11:1–3. Complaint at Taberah. The first incident after the departure from the divine mountain is reported in a story of complaint, for which the reader is unprepared. The story signals a change of mood in the book of Numbers—from the formation of the community at Sinai (Num 1–10) to conflict in the wilderness journey (Num 11–21). The complaint in 11:1–3 lacks specific details, stating simply that people rebel and God responds by sending down fire to destroy the rebels. The location of the story, Taberah, meaning "burning," identifies the story as an etiology, since the geographic setting is meant to provide commentary on the event. The sequence of events provides the pattern for many of the murmuring stories in Numbers: (1) complaint by the people; (2) divine punishment; (3) the cry of the people; (4) the intercession of Moses; (5) and the end of the divine judgment.

11:4–35. Moses and the Seventy Elders. Two themes are interwoven in the second murmuring story, the complaint of the people about the lack of meat in the wilderness (vv. 4–9, 13, 18–23, 31–34) and Moses' protest about the burden of leadership (vv. 10–12, 14–17, 24–30). The distribution of Moses' charismatic spirit to others, first to the seventy elders and then to Eldad and Medad, involves both themes. The story is made up of three scenes: the murmuring of the people and the protest of Moses over leadership (vv. 4–15), the divine response to Moses (vv. 16–23), and the selection of the seventy elders to assist in the leadership of the people (vv. 24–35).

11:4–15 provides the setting and circumstances of the story. Verse 4 states that certain members of the camp, described as "rabble," have a strong "craving" (ta'awa) for meat. The description of this group as craving meat provides the location of the story, Kibroth-hattaavah ("graves of craving"). The craving for meat is a rejection of manna, the wilderness food given to Israel in Exod 16. The literary relationship between the stories is underscored when manna is described in Num 11:7–9. What begins as a murmuring story, takes an unexpected turn when Moses complains about the burden of leadership (vv. 11–15). The burden of Moses' leadership was first introduced in Exod 18, when Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, advised him to select more leaders to govern the people. The divine promise to Moses (Exod 33) of guidance in the wilderness journey provides further background for the complaint of Moses. Moses' complaint, "Why have I not found favor in your sight?" repeats the divine promise to him found in Exod 33:12–23. In this way, Moses accuses God of abandoning him in the wilderness, which prompts his request for death (v. 15).

11:16–23 contains the divine response to the Israelite's craving for meat and to Moses' complaint about the burden of leadership. God instructs Moses to select seventy elders who will share his spirit and thus aid him in leadership (vv. 16–17). The transfer of Moses' spirit will take place at the tent of meeting, a sacred tent pitched outside of the Israelite camp, as compared to the Priestly tabernacle, which is placed at the center of the camp. God responds to the request for meat (vv. 18–20), repeating the complaint of the people by quoting their earlier words as an indictment: "You have wailed in the hearing of the LORD, saying 'If only we had meat to eat. Surely it was better for us in Egypt.'" Yahweh states that the people will eat meat for one month until it becomes repulsive to them. Moses responds to the divine prediction by reminding God that there are not less than 600,000 Israelites (see Exod 12:37) who will need meat. The deity responds with the rhetorical question: "Is the LORD's power limited?"

11:24–35 narrates the resolution. Verses 24–30 recount the selection of seventy elders at the tent of meeting outside of the camp, where God takes a portion of Moses' spirit and places it in them, prompting the leaders to prophesy. Verse 25 reports that the seventy elders become ecstatic prophets upon receiving the spirit of Moses, but only momentarily as they take on the role of scribes. The episode involving Eldad and Medad, who unexpectedly received a portion of Moses' spirit even though they were not part of the seventy elders, underscores the uncontrollable character of charismatic power. The spirit blows where it will, and it is not always possible for the community of faith to control it. The complaint of Joshua, that Eldad and Medad should not be allowed to prophesy, represents the community's attempt to control the charismatic power of the spirit (v. 28). Moses' response affirms the unpredictable nature of the spirit throughout the community: "Are you jealous for my sake? Would that all the LORD'S people were prophets, and that the LORD would put his spirit on them?" (v. 29). Verses 31–35 describe the feeding of meat to the people as an act of divine judgment. Quails drop from heaven all around the camp, but not in it, until they are piled up over three feet deep. The people who leave the Camp to eat the meat collect not less than eighty-nine bushels of quail per person. But they die, eating the feast at the "Graves of Craving." Those who remained in the camp live and are able to journey on with God in the wilderness.

12:1–16. Conflict Between Moses, Miriam, and Aaron. The charismatic leadership of Moses remains the central issue in the controversy between Miriam, Aaron, and Moses. But the story moves in the opposite direction of ch. 11, where the central problem was how the spirit of Moses could be passed on to the seventy elders and even influence all the members of the camp (11:29). The central message in Num 12 qualifies the previous story. Miriam and Aaron claim the same prophetic authority as Moses, which sets in motion a story about the unique character and status of Moses.

12:1–3 isolates the three leaders of the exodus—Moses, Miriam, and Aaron—in a controversy over prophetic authority. This controversy is underscored by the fact that Aaron (Exod 7:1) and Miriam (Exod 15:20) are designated as prophets during the events of the exodus. Aaron and Miriam challenge Moses' prophetic authority with two arguments: (1) he is married to a Cushite woman and (2) they doubt that God only speaks through him. The marriage of Moses to a Cushite woman stands in uneasy tension with the tradition of Moses' marriage to Zipporah, the Midianite, suggesting a range of folklore about Moses. The combination of intermarriage and prophetic authority likely reflect debates in the Second Temple period surrounding intermarriage (see Ezra–Nehemiah). The marriage of Moses to a Cushite woman, the biblical reference to Ethiopia, stands in tension with the authoritative teaching on intermarriage that emerges in the post-exilic period. It challenges the prescribed boundaries of the community. Their challenge concerning the special status of Moses as the authoritative voice for God (v. 2) cannot be separated from their complaint concerning his marriage to the Cushite (v. 1). The two reinforce each other. By arguing that God also speaks through them, Miriam and Aaron are adding authority to their criticism of Moses' intermarriage. Verse 3 sets the stage for refuting the challenge to Moses' authority, stressing his special quality as a devout person.

12:4–10 describes God's response to the challenge, summoning the three characters to the tent of meeting outside of the camp. God responds in an oracle (vv. 6–8), defending the incomparable nature of Moses and stating that prophets receive messages in dreams and riddles (v. 6). But to Moses, God speaks "mouth to mouth" (v. 8). The phrase is unique to this story. Yet similar language is used to describe Moses in Exod 33:11, where God speaks to Moses face to face as a friend, and in Exod 34:29–35, where the divine light invades the face of Moses. Moses' direct communication with God is different from the way that God interacts with prophets, thereby placing Moses in a special category. Consequently, prophets like Miriam and Aaron should fear Moses and not challenge his charismatic authority or his actions, including his intermarriage with the Cushite woman. God strikes Miriam with leprosy as a result of the challenge to Moses' prophetic authority.

12:11–15 illustrates the special status of Moses as a charismatic leader. Aaron requests special intercession for Miriam, whose leprosy threatens to make her like that of a stillborn baby (v. 2). Moses responds, interceding for Miriam, and prompting divine healing, which illustrates his special relationship with God.

C. The Story of the Spies and the Loss of the Promised Land (13:1–15:41)

Chapters 13–15 are pivotal in the book of Numbers. They tell the story of why the first generation of Israelites to leave Egypt lost the gift of the promise land (chs. 13–14). The story concludes with legislation concerning the sacrifices that Israel must offer when the next generation eventually enters the land (ch. 15).

13:1–20. Selection of the Spies. The section begins with the divine instruction to Moses that he send out men into the land of Canaan. The NRSV translates the activity of the men as "spying out the land." The NIV translation, "to explore," is closer to the meaning of the Hebrew word. Verses 4–16 provide a list of the leaders from each tribe who are sent into the land. Most names on the list are unique to this passage. Noteworthy is the listing of Caleb and Hoshea (= Joshua), who emerge as heroes in the story.

13:21–33. Mission and Report of the Spies. Verses 21–24 describe the mission of those sent into the land. Verse 21 states that the men must explore Canaan and provide an evaluation of the land, which requires the group to travel to the northernmost boundary of Lebo-hamath. Verses 22–24 limit the travel of the group to the southern border of the land for the purpose of reconnaissance in preparation for conquest. Two points are emphasized in the latter version. First, the land is rich, producing lush grapes. The region is even named as the Wadi Eschol, meaning "grape-cluster" (v. 24). Second, the land is populated by a race of fearful giants descended from Anak (see also Deut 1:19–46; Josh 14:12, 15; 15:13–19). Goliath, the giant slain by David, is a descendent of this race (1 Sam 17).

13:25–33 contains two versions of the spies' negative report. In the first version (vv. 27–31), the spies declare the land rich in resources. It even "flows with milk and honey." But they also note the fearful character of the giants, as well as other indigenous nations, who will prevent the Israelites from conquering the land. Verses 32–33 provide a second report in which the land, itself, is declared so bad that it eats its inhabitants. Taken together the two reports reflect a rejection of the goodness of the promise land and a fear to follow God by engaging in holy war against the inhabitants.

14:1–45. Response to the Report of the Spies. This section recounts various responses to the report of the spies. The people react by murmuring (vv. 1–4). They complain about divine leadership in the wilderness, fear for their children's lives, and wish that they had remained in Egypt. Moses and Aaron fall on their faces (v. 5), which in this context signifies anger against the Israelites (cf. the similar action in Num 16:4). Joshua and Caleb counter the complaint of the people by reaffirming the goodness of the land (v. 7), the power of God to fulfill the promise of land (v. 8), and the need for people to engage in holy war (v. 9).

God provides two responses to the murmuring of the people in vv. 11–38, which are signaled by the repetition of the statement of disgust to Moses: "How long . . ." (vv. 11 and 27). In the first response (vv. 11–25), God complains that the people have rejected divine leadership and do not believe in divine power, even though they have seen signs of it in Egypt and in the wilderness. As a result, God decides to destroy all the adult Israelites except for Caleb and to make a new nation from Moses. Moses intercedes for the people (vv. 13–19), repeating many of the same arguments that he used to rescue the people from divine destruction after the sin of the golden calf (Exod 32). First, he cautions God that killing the Israelites would lead the nations to conclude that Yahweh is unreliable and unable to fulfill God's promise of land. Second, Moses calls upon the merciful character of Yahweh to forgive sin, which was revealed to him on Mount Sinai (Exod 34:6–7). God agrees to forgive, as Moses requested (vv. 20–24). The entire nation is not destroyed instantly, although they are denied the gift of the promise land. The divine gift of the land is transferred to their children, while the first generation of Israelites is commanded to travel back into the wilderness on the Red Sea road (v. 25). In the second response (vv. 26–38), God provides greater detail about how divine punishment will be enacted, stating that persons will be punished according to what they actually said (v. 28). The divine speech accentuates individual responsibility for sin instead of the collective guilt of the people. Those who murmured and were over the age of twenty will die in the wilderness (v. 29). Joshua and Caleb are the only exceptions. The children will inherit the land instead of their parents (v. 31). And the length of the punishment is determined by the offense. Thus, the forty days in which the land was explored is translated into forty years of wilderness wandering (vv. 34–35). Finally, the leaders who provided a bad report of the land will die instantly (vv. 36–37).

14:39–45 concludes the story of the loss of the promise land with a failed account of holy war. When Moses tells the people of the divine decision to defer the gift of the land, the people panic, confess their sin, and decide to invade (v. 40). Moses condemns this decision as yet another transgression against God, which can only lead to the slaughter of the people, since God will not fight for them (vv. 41–43). The closing scene of the story pictures the people entering the hills for battle, while the ark of Yahweh remains in the camp (v. 44). The inevitable consequence is recounted in v. 45: the people are destroyed all the way to the city of Hormah, a location south of Hebron.

15:1–41. Legislation for Israel's Future Life in the Land. The loss of the land is followed by a series of laws that point ahead to the Israelite's future life in the promise land. The chapter offers two sets of laws concerning the future life in the land, vv. 1–16 and 17–31. Each one is introduced by the phrase, "the LORD spoke to Moses, saying: Speak to the Israelites and say to them" (vv. 1–2a, 17–18a). The chapter closes with additional laws (vv. 32–41) that pertain to the wilderness march.

Verses 1–16 provide instruction on the ingredients for sacrifices. Similar laws occur in Lev 2 and Ezek 46:5–14. The law in Num 15:1–16 differs from the other law codes in that it extends the law of sacrifice to the non-Israelite, resident alien, should such an individual choose to participate in the sacrifice cult.

Verses 17–31 include two types of laws. Verses 17–21 state the requirement for a donation from the first batch of dough whenever anyone eats "bread in the land." Verses 22–31 shift the topic to forgiveness according to three distinct types of transgression. First, if an act of transgression is committed without the people's knowing it, corporate forgiveness of both native Israelites and resident aliens is possible, requiring the sacrifice of a bull for a burn offering and a male goat for a sin offering (vv. 22–26). Second, the sacrifice of a female goat is able to atone for unintentional individual sin (vv. 27–29). Third, there is no forgiveness for intentional sin (vv. 30–31). Such a person must be "cut off" from the people, meaning excommunication or execution.

15:32–41 turns to a case set in the wilderness: a law concerning a person who collects sticks on the Sabbath. The law is presented as a narrative, in which a person from the wilderness camp is caught in the infraction and taken to Moses, who lacks legal precedent. There is Sabbath law in the Decalogue (Exod 20:10–11) and in the revelation of the tabernacle (Exod 31:12–17; 35:1–3). But these laws do not address the setting of the wilderness. Thus, the story requires a special revelation, in which God states that Sabbath law applies both to the Israelites' future life in the land and during their wilderness journey. The Sabbath law is universal in scope regardless of the setting. Violation of the Sabbath law requires the death penalty. Verses 37–41 contain the divine instruction that the people sew blue tassels to the corners of their garments as a reminder of the law that all Israelites must remember and obey (see the same law in Deut 22:12).

D. The Conflict over Priestly Leadership (16:1– 19:22)

The section explores priestly leadership in the wilderness community through a series of challenges to the authority of Moses and Aaron. The theme of priestly leadership provides a counterpart to Num 11–12, where charismatic, prophetic leadership was at stake.

16:1–40. Conflict with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The central conflict in the story is between the Levite, Korah, and Moses and Aaron over priestly leadership, specifically over the nature of holiness and who has the power to approach God in the sanctuary. Korah and 250 followers state that the entire congregation is holy, because God dwells in its midst, and therefore all the people should be allowed to approach God in the same manner as the Aaronide priests (v. 3). A second conflict between Dathan, Abiram, and On over the leadership of Moses in the wilderness is also woven into the story, although it assumes a subordinate role to the dispute involving Korah (vv. 1–2).

16:1–17 establishes the setting of the conflict over priestly leadership. A group charges Moses and Aaron that "they have gone too far" in "exalting themselves above the assembly of the LORD" (v. 3). The expression signifies oppression when it is exercised for self-gain (Ezek 29:15). The response of Moses (vv. 4–17) is separated into two parts. First, vv. 4–11 are directed toward Dathan and Abiram, where the charge of the abuse of power concerns civil authority. They accuse Moses of abusing his role of leadership by proclaiming himself leader and, in the process, "lording it over" (sarar, v. 13). Rather than executing judgment on his own, Moses turns the matter over to God and provides evidence that he has not abused his leadership office (v. 15). He has not taken a single donkey from any of his accusers, nor has he harmed them in any way. Second, the challenge of Korah dominates the present form of the text (vv. 4–11, 16–17), shifting the theme from civil to religious leadership. Although the theme changes, Moses responds as he did to Dathan and Abiram. Moses does not adjudicate the conflict, but turns the matter over to God. A ritual with cultic censers and incense is devised to determine who will achieve holy status and thus be able to draw near to God.

16:18–35 describes the divine execution of Dathan, Abiram, and Korah. The confrontation between Moses and Dathan and Abiram takes place at their tents, rather than at the sanctuary (vv. 24– 34). Moses states that if Dathan and Abiram have made a just complaint, they will die of natural causes; but if their complaint is unjust, the ground will swallow them up. The divine execution follows immediately with the ground consuming the households of Dathan and Abiram. The confrontation between Moses and Korah occurs at the sanctuary (vv. 18–23, 35). The performance of the ritual act with censers (v. 18) prompts a theophany of Yahweh's glory before the entire congregation (v. 19). The deity commands Moses and Aaron to separate from the people so that all Israel can be destroyed. Moses and Aaron intercede for the people so that God only destroys the guilty, thus emphasizing the theme of individual responsibility. Moses is successful in this intercession, leading to the death of only the guilty parties.

16:36–40 concludes the episode with a cultic etiology concerning the origin of hammered plates on the altar. These plates are made from the censers of the 250 participants in Korah's company who challenged the special status of the Aaronide priesthood. The censers are a warning about non-authorized persons encroaching upon the holiness of God.

16:41–17:13. The Authority of Aaron. Two stories underscore the special status of Aaron as priest, his ability to atone for the people (16:41–50), and his magical staff (17:1–13). The story of priestly atonement (16:41–50) begins when the conflict over priestly leadership from 16:1–40 spills over into the following day, with the congregation murmuring against Moses and Aaron at the sanctuary, accusing them of murdering the "people of Yahweh." Yahweh appears in response to the complaint and advises Moses and Aaron to separate from the people so that their opponents can be consumed instantly with fire. As in the preceding story, Moses and Aaron intercede for the people, but not before God launches a plague in the camp. Moses directs Aaron to perform a ritual of atonement for the people against the divine plague. Aaron takes his censer, puts fire on it from the altar with incense, and appeases the avenging wrath, which reinforces his special role as priestly mediator, but not before 14,700 Israelites are killed. The authority of Aaron is underscored in 17:1–13, through a ritual concerning the staff of each of the tribal leaders. God commands Moses to collect the staff from each leader and to place them in the sanctuary. The next day only Aaron's staff has budded with ripe almonds, signifying his special status as priest, which warns the Israelites about the danger of encroaching on the sacred and the need for priestly representation.

18:1–19:32. Guidelines for Approaching God. The stories of conflict over priestly leadership are followed by detailed guidelines of how God is to be approached in the sanctuary. The guidelines provide a response to the statement of the Israelite people at the conclusion of the conflict stories in Num 16–17, when they express their fear to approach God with the words, "We are perishing" (Num 17:12).

Verses 1–7 are a divine speech to Aaron, rather than Moses. The speech outlines the safeguards that will protect the Israelite people from perishing in the presence of God. The deity states that priests protect the Israelites from divine holiness. By performing their duties at the sanctuary and at the altar, divine wrath will not strike the Israelite people. Verses 8–20 outline the compensation that Aaronide priests will receive for performing their sacred duties. Priests receive compensation from the most holy offerings (vv. 8–10), holy offerings (vv. 11–14), and from a Temple tax on the redemption of first born humans and animals (vv. 15–18). Priests are not allowed to own land (v. 20). Levites receive a tithe for their service of maintaining the sanctuary and performing guard duty (vv. 21–24), but they are also required to pay a separate tithe to the Temple (vv. 25–32).

19:1–22. Corpse Contamination. Death represents the most potent form of impurity and thus must be kept separate from the holiness of God within the sanctuary. Those contaminated by death through the handling of the corpse of a family member are banished from the camp. The background for this teaching may be the rejection of ancestral worship, known as the "cult of the dead." Thus, rather than worshipping the dead, Num 19 declares the dead to be a danger to divine holiness. The chapter outlines procedures to purify Israelites from corpse contamination in the ritual of the "water of cleansing" and thus to reenter the camp and the worship life of the community of faith.

19:1–13 describes the ritual that decontaminates persons from defilement through contact with the dead. The ritual requires a red cow without blemish, which has never been yoked— used for profane labor. The high priest must slaughter the cow and burn it in fire outside of the camp. The blood of the cow must be sprinkled seven times in the direction of the sanctuary. This is an unusual ritual for several reasons. It suggests a sacrifice, even though the actions do not take place at the altar. The blood of the cow is burned in the fire along with the skin, flesh, and dung, none of which is permitted at the altar. The presence of blood in the ashes of the cow is a ritual detergent, along with cedar wood, hyssop, and crimson, aimed at purifying those contaminated by death. The ingredients create the "water of cleansing," which allows the contaminated Israelite to reenter the camp, even while it contaminates those who perform the ritual. Verses 10–13 state that the ritual requires seven days of purification and that both Israelites and resident aliens must undergo purification from corpse contamination.

19:14–22 clarifies the circumstances under which someone becomes defiled from contact with the dead (vv. 14–16), and it provides more detailed instructions for using the water of cleansing (vv. 17–22). When a person dies within a tent, all persons and objects in the tent become contaminated for seven days. Contamination in the open field results from direct contact with the corpse. Purification requires that ashes from the red cow be mixed with running water, meaning water that is spring fed and not stagnant. A ritually clean person is required to apply the ingredient to the contaminated person, making the ritual celebrant unclean until evening. Failure to follow proper procedures leads to an individual being cut off from the assembly.

E. Leaving the Wilderness (20:1–21:35)

Numbers 20–21 contain a loose collection of stories that provide a transition from the wandering and death in the wilderness to holy war in the Transjordan. The stories trace of the death of the first generation and the emerging leadership of the second generation.

20:1–13. The Sin of Moses and Aaron. The section begins with a report about Miriam's death in the first month (v. 1). Reference to the same event in Num 33:38–39 indicates that it is the fortieth year of wilderness wandering. Verses 2–13 recount a story of disobedience by Moses and Aaron, which results in their not being able to enter the promised land. The story opens with a report about drought, prompting the people to murmur (vv. 2–5). God responds to the complaint by instructing Moses to (1) take the staff that is in the sanctuary, which is likely the budding staff of Aaron (see Num 17); (2) assemble the people; and (3) speak to the rock in order to bring forth water for the Israelites and their cattle. The story is set at Meribah, a name meaning a legal dispute. The absence of divine punishment against the people suggests that their complaint is not an instance of disobedience, but a legitimate dispute with the deity. Moses sins in that he judges the complaint of the people to be an instance of disobedience, accusing the people as being "rebels," and, as a consequence, he does not follow the divine instructions. He strikes the rock rather than speaking to it, and thus fails as a leader. God describes the disobedience of Moses as a lack of trust in the deity, which prevents the holiness of God from being displayed for the entire people. Moses and Aaron are thus excluded from entry into the promise land.

20:14–21. Conflict with Edom. The story recounts diplomatic correspondence between Israel and Edom, in which the Israelites request passage through Edomite land. The request for passage is couched in the language of brotherhood (v. 14), recalling that the eponymous ancestor of the Edom is Esau, the older brother of Jacob (Gen 25:19–33:20). The Israelites describe their salvation from Egypt, before requesting passage on the King's Highway (v. 17). Edom refuses the request and even threatens war (v. 18). Israel responds by offering to pay for water (v. 19), an offer also refused by Edom. The story concludes with the Israelites forced to travel around the land of Edom, which stands in conflict with another version of this same story (Deut 2:3–13), according to which the Israelites travel through the territory of the Edomites.

20:22–29. Death of Aaron. Aaron dies when the Israelites arrive at Mount Hor, which prompts significant rites of mourning. Like Moses (Deut 34:1–8), Aaron dies on a mountaintop, which is followed by thirty days of mourning, as compared to the normal seven-day period of mourning the dead (Job 2:13). The death of Aaron provides the occasion for the Priestly author to model the transition of leadership in the high priestly office. There is not transfer of a prophetic spirit or even the laying on of hands. Instead, Eleazar, the son of Aaron, becomes high priest by taking the vestments of Aaron and putting them on. The full ritual of investiture is described in Exod 29:29–30.

21:1–3. War Against the King of Arad. This story narrates divine deliverance and a successful holy war against the Canaanite king of Arad in the Negeb at Horman. The king of Arad is described as having successfully attacked the Israelites and taken captives. Israel asks God for help, vowing to place all the cities of Arad under the ban (herem), which means that all property would be given over to God through destruction, rather than becoming booty for the warriors. God hears the request and aids the Israelites in the defeat of the king of Arad. The story reverses the negative account of war at Horman in Num 14:39–45, when the first generation of Israelites disobeyed the deity and waged an unsuccessful war. The story of the successful holy war marks a transition from the wilderness wandering to the conquest of the promise land.

21:4–9. The Serpent of Bronze. The final murmuring story occurs when the Israelites leave Mount Hor and journey south around Edom on the Red Sea road (v. 4). The story recounts a general and incoherent complaint by the Israelites against Moses and God, about both the absence of bread and water and the miserable quality of the food in their possession (vv. 4–5). God responds (v. 6) by sending poisonous serpents to bite and kill many of the people. The serpents are described as "seraphs," suggesting supernatural agents of divine punishment. The same creatures are described as protecting God in the call of the prophet Isaiah (Isa 6). The point of the story is not so much the deadly bite of the seraph snakes, but their healing property. Once the people confess their sin, God instructs Moses to make a seraph and to place it on a pole or banner as an antidote to the snakebites (v. 8). Moses makes a bronze replica of the seraph, called Nahash Nehoshet, "the serpent of bronze," which has the power to heal anyone who looks at it. The story is related to the cultic icon of Nehustan in the Jerusalem Temple, which was destroyed by King Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:4). The theme of divine healing in the final murmuring story is important, because it fulfills the promise of God in the first wilderness story (Exod 15:22–26), when Yahweh promised to be a God of healing for the Israelites.

21:10–35. War Against the Amorite Kings, Sihon and Og. Verses 10–20 recount the final stages of Israel's wilderness march to Mount Pisgah, a location in the fields of Moab (see also Num 33 and Deut 2). Two songs are embedded in the travel notices. The first song (vv. 14–15) is a fragment of poetry from an anthology of war poems, entitled The Book of the Wars of Yahweh. The meaning of the poetic fragment is obscure. The title suggests a war poem, but the text highlights place names, without a clear reference to holy war. The second song (vv. 17–18a) is about water. The location of the song is Beer ("well"), shown as a divine gift.

21:21–35 narrates the defeat of the Amorite kings Sihon and Og. The story also appears in Deut 2:26–3:7 and Judg 11:19–26. The story begins with the Israelite people requesting to pass through the kingdom of Sihon (vv. 21–22), pledging to stay on the King's Highway and to eat no food, drink no water, nor trespass in the fields. Sihon attacks the Israelites in the wilderness Jahaz (v. 23). Verses 24–25 and 31–32 describe the Israelite conquest of Sihon. The central location is Heshbon, the city of King Sihon. The Israelites also conquer the northern kingdom of Sihon to the city of Jazer, which leads to the defeat of Og of Bashan (vv. 33–35). Og is mythologized in Deut 3:11 as one of the last of the Rephaim giants. The author of Deuteronomy informs the reader that his bed was sixteen feet long and on display at the Ammonite city Rabbah. The accounts of conquest frame a poem about Heshbon (vv. 26–30). The song may be an Amorite poem, celebrating Sihon's defeat of the Moabites, now taken over by the Israelites as a taunt against the king of Heshbon. Verses 27–29 recount the defeat of the Moabites, identifying Heshbon as the city of King Sihon.

III. Preparing for Canaan on the Plains of Moab (22:1–36:13)

This section is the third and final portion of the book of Numbers. The central theme of preparation for entry into Canaan builds upon the two previous sections and involves a change of setting—from the wilderness to the plains of Moab. In this new section external threats to the community from other nations replace the problems of internal conflicts within the wilderness camp over leadership and the challenge of following God on the journey. The first threat is the danger of being cursed by another nation (chs 22–24). The second external threat is the danger of worshiping the gods of another nation

(25:1–18). Chapters 26–36 conclude the book by looking ahead to Israel's future life in the land. It includes a new census of the second generation (ch. 26), followed by a series of inheritance laws (chs. 27, 32, 36), guidelines for worship (chs. 28–30), and instructions for holy war (chs. 31).

A. Balaam and Baal Peor (22:1–25:18)

The focus of tension in Num 1–21 has been on the internal life of the Israelite people. Numbers 1–10 probed the life of Israel within the camp. The danger of holiness within the tabernacle gave rise to the layout of the camp as a means to protect the Israelites as they lived in proximity to God. The journey of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num 11–21) continued to focus on the Israelites' relationship with God, highlighting internal conflicts over leadership, faith, and the promise of land. The internal threats in Num 1–21 give way to external challenges to the community in 22:1–25:19. These chapters explore two external threats to the religious life of the Israelite community. The first is the danger of being cursed by another nation (Num 22–24). The story of Balak and Balaam probes the protective role of God outside of the boundaries of the Israelite community. Israel plays no active role in this story. The second external threat is the danger of worshiping the gods of another nation (Num 25). In contrast to the threat from Balak and Balaam, Israel plays a central role; their sin at Baal Peor illustrates how other nations might defile the community through intermarriage and syncretistic worship.

Balaam is an ambiguous character in the Hebrew Bible and in the New Testament. The commentary will illustrate that the story of Balaam in Num 22–24 portrays a non-Israelite seer positively. He knows Yahweh independently of Israel's history of salvation and rescues the nation from the threat of Balak, the Moabite king. The story of Balaam demonstrates that the power and revelation of God cannot be limited to one people or one religious tradition. This insight rests uneasily in the Bible as is evident in the tendency to reinterpret Balaam negatively as a threat to the worship of Yahweh (Deut 23:1–6) and as a human who is greedy for divine power (Rev 2:14; Jude 11; and 2 Pet 2:15).

22:1–14. First Mission of Balaam. The story opens by describing the nature of the Israelite threat to Balak and the Moabite nation. The Moabites "dread" the Israelites and are "overcome with fear." Both words describe the fear that overcomes people at the threat of holy war. The king of Egypt is described with the same reaction to the Israelites in Exod 1:12 as a result of their rapid population growth. The same reason for fear also influences Balak. He too fears the size of Israel and the impact that they will have on his country.

22:5–7 introduces the character of Balaam, who is presented as a well-known diviner whom Balak wishes to hire in order to curse the Israelites. Balaam is identified as the son of Beor, whose home is Pethor located on the Euphrates River. Pethor may be Pitru a city in Syria, south of Carchemish. The location is unclear and may be intended for literary purposes now lost to the reader. The discovery in 1967 at Tell Deir 'Alla of a text about a diviner named Balaam son of Beor has provided unexpected information concerning the significance of Balaam. The text recounts Balaam's vision of a natural disaster brought on by Shagar, a fertility goddess, and the Shaddai-gods.

In Num 22:1–7, Balak sends messengers to Balaam stating his fear of the Israelite nation, which has come out of Egypt and whose population growth threatens the surrounding nations. The reader is told that Balaam possesses the power to curse and to bless, and Balak hopes that the diviner will curse the Israelites (v. 6). Balaam's power to bless and to curse is described in v. 7 as "divination" (qesem), a practice condemned in the Hebrew Bible (Deut 18:9–14), making Balaam an ambiguous character, since "diviner" is not a title that Balaam claims for himself.

Balaam's intercession with God (vv. 8–14) to discern whether or not to curse Israel further complicates his character. Balaam states to Balak's messengers that he is unable to make a decision without instruction from his God, Yahweh, whose direction he seeks during the night (vv. 8–11). Balaam's reference to Yahweh is surprising, since his nighttime exchange with God makes it clear that he has no knowledge of the Israelites. Thus he knows Yahweh and has a relationship with the deity independent of the salvation history of Israel. In fact, Balak has no knowledge of the Israelite people; he simply refers to "a people" that has come out of Egypt. The divine response to Balaam reinforces Balaam's special and independent relationship with Yahweh. Yahweh never refers to the Israelites by name, but simply instructs Balaam not to curse "the people," because they are blessed (v. 12). The episode concludes with Balaam denying the request of the messengers of Balak. Throughout these events, the Israelites remain unaware of the external threat posed by Balak and the role of Yahweh in their protection.

22:15–35. Second Mission of Balaam. The second mission of Balaam includes two stories. Verses 15–21 recount the second request of Balak for the assistance of Balaam. Verses 22–35 comprise a separate folktale about the confrontation of Balaam and the messenger of Yahweh and the clairvoyance of Balaam's donkey.

The language intensifies in the second mission of Balak to request the aid of Balaam in vv. 15–21. The messengers plead and even demand the assistance of Balaam, assuring him that no price is too high (vv. 16–17). Balaam's response is equally emphatic, stating that no amount of money could make him act contrary to the command of Yahweh, his God (v. 18). Thus, the portrayal of Balaam remains positive in the second request by Balak. As in the first story, Balaam leaves the messengers to consult God during the night for an answer to Balak's request (vv. 19–20). This time God instructs Balaam to return with the messengers of Balak, but to speak only the words that God commands him. The narrative concludes with Balaam saddling his donkey and accompanying the messengers to meet Balak (v. 21). At an earlier stage of composition, the narrative likely progressed immediately to 22:36–38, where the arrival of Balaam is noted and the seer repeats his message to Balak that he can only speak what God puts in his mouth.

22:22–35 is a separate story in which Balaam journeys with his servants to Moab, but not with the messengers of Balak. The separate character of the narrative is evident in the anger of Yahweh (v. 22) at Balaam's decision to travel to Moab, which contradicts the divine instruction in v. 20. The unexpected response of God is accompanied by a new divine figure, the messenger of Yahweh. The portrayal of Balaam also changes significantly in this tale—from a diviner who carefully discerns the will of Yahweh to a blind and impatient seer, whose donkey is more clairvoyant than he. The story that is critical of Balaam is part of the larger negative reinterpretation of Balaam throughout the biblical literature noted above. The tale narrates a confrontation with the messenger of Yahweh (vv. 22–27) and the interpretation of the message (vv. 28–35).

22:22–27 describes the messenger of Yahweh blocking the road and functioning as Balaam's adversary (satan), an opponent who is seeking to kill him. The messenger of Yahweh often functions in stories of holy war (Exod 23:20–33). The messenger of Yahweh confronts Balaam three times, all seen by the donkey (vv. 23, 25, 27), but not by Balaam. The encounters are increasingly intense. First, the messenger of Yahweh forces the donkey from the road (v. 23). Then he forces the donkey against the wall (vv. 24–25). Third, he blocks the donkey's path causing the animal to lie down (vv. 26–27). In each case, the donkey saves Balaam's life, while the seer is blind to the rescue and responds with increasing violence toward the donkey.

22:28–35 provide an interpretation of the event to Balaam. First, the donkey addresses the seer, asking why Balaam has beaten it three times (vv. 28–30). Balaam misinterprets the actions of the donkey as ruthless, stating that if he had a sword, he would kill the animal. The donkey replies with common sense, asking if he has ever acted ruthlessly in the past toward the seer. The implication of the question is that Balaam should trust the animal based on past experience, even if he is unclear about the present circumstances. Then, the messenger of Yahweh addresses the seer (vv. 31–35), explaining the nature of the threat to Balaam. The messenger of Yahweh reinforces the statements of the donkey, noting that if the animal had followed Balaam's direction, the seer would now be dead. The story concludes with Balaam confessing his sin, claiming ignorance, and offering to return to his home.

22:36–23:12. First Oracle of Balaam. Verses 36–40 narrate the meeting of Balaam and Balak at Ir-Moab. Balak asks why Balaam has been delayed and whether the seer understands his power to honor him. Balaam dismisses the comments of Balak and repeats that he can only speak the words that God puts in his mouth.

The first oracle of Balaam in 22:41–23:12 is made up of three parts, the location of the seer at Bamoth-baal (vv. 22:41–23:6), the oracle (23:7–10), and the concluding dialogue between Balaam and Balak (23:11–12). The ability of Baal to see the Israelites is important for effective divination. 22:41–23:6 locates Balaam at Bamoth-baal, where he is able to see only a fraction of the Israelite nation. The process of divination requires the sacrifice of a bull and a ram on seven altars, after which Balaam departs to a barren height to meet Yahweh (23:3–5). 23:7–10 contains the oracle of Yahweh to Balaam as a poem. The poem occurs in three parts. Verses 7–8 state that Balaam is unable to curse if it is not God's will. Verse 9 describes the distinctive character of the Israelites, while v. 10 makes reference to the fertility of the Israelites instead of cursing them. 23:11–12 concludes the first oracle with Balak complaining that instead of cursing Israel, Balaam has blessed them.

23:13–26. Second Oracle of Balaam. Verses 13–17 introduce a new location for the next oracle of Balaam—the top of Mount Pisgah in the field of Zophim. Once again a bull and a ram are sacrificed on seven altars before Balaam departs from Balak to receive a divinatory word from God. Upon his return Balak asks, "What has Yahweh said?" Verses 18–24 contain the oracle, which Balaam delivers as a response to Balak's inquiry. The oracle comprises three stanzas. First, vv. 18–19 emphasize that human attempts to manipulate the future as Balak desires are useless, because God fulfills all divine promises. Second, vv. 20–22 recount Israel's history of salvation as an outgrowth of divine blessings. Third, vv. 23–24 move from the past events of salvation history to the present by comparing Israel to a lion that eats its prey. Balak is angry and prefers that Balaam say nothing at all, to which Balaam responds that he can only say what God tells him (vv. 25–26).

23:27–24:14. Third Oracle of Balaam. Balak takes Balaam to a new location, Peor, where seven more altars are constructed with the appropriate sacrifices of a bull and a ram. It is not clear that Balaam is initially able to see the Israelites from the new location of Peor, which overlooks the wasteland. The introduction of the "spirit of God" (24:2) suggests that Balaam achieves a new level of clairvoyance in the third oracle (vv. 3–9). The content of the oracle supports this interpretation, with its repetition of the technical word for "oracle" (ne'um), which often accompanies prophetic discourse in the Hebrew Bible. Balaam identifies himself as clairvoyant, whose eyes are opened, who has a vision of the Almighty, and who hears the words of God (vv. 3–4), before describing the Israelite nation with fertility imagery of palm trees, gardens, the aloe tree, and cedars. He concludes ominously that those who curse Israel will be cursed and those who bless Israel will be blessed. Verses 10–13 conclude the unit with an angry exchange between Balak and Balaam. Balak repeats his demand for a curse against Israel, while Balaam repeats his constraint that he can only speak what God tells him.

24:15–25. Fourth Oracle of Balaam. The final scene contains an oracle against Moab (vv. 15–17) and Edom (vv. 18–19), as well as an additional series of oracles against the nations that will surround Israel (vv. 20–24). The vision of Moab is eschatological in nature, including Messianic motifs. The destruction is "not now," nor is it "near." The vision contains royal imagery of a star coming from Jacob with a scepter. This figure will destroy Moab along with the Sethites, perhaps a reference to all humanity, since Seth is the third son of Adam and Eve (Gen 4:26; 5:1–8). Verses 18–19 predict the future destruction of Edom. Verses 20–24 are not related to the poetry in vv. 15–19. The section begins with a new introduction, which broadens the scope of Balaam's final oracle to include judgment on Amalek (v. 20), the Kenites (vv. 21–22), and an unnamed nation (vv. 23–24). The Amalekites are remembered for attacking the Israelites on their wilderness journey (Exod 17:8–16). The reason for the judgment on the Kenites is unclear, since they are remembered for showing kindness toward the Israelites as they came out of Egypt (1 Sam 15:4–9). The story of Balaam ends in v. 25 with the seer returning to his home.

25:1–18. Sin of Israel at Baal Peor. There are two versions of Israel's sin at Baal Peor. Verses 1–5 are a story of idolatry involving the Moabites, and vv. 6–19 are an account of intermarriage with the Midianites.

25:1–5 comprise an account of Israelite idolatry with Moabites at Shittim. The idolatry is anchored in sexual imagery: "The people began to have sexual relationship with the women of Moab"

(v. 1). The Hebrew is less explicit about the role of sex in the story, since the verb, halal, means, "to pollute." Biblical writers often use the imagery of sexuality as a metaphor to describe false worship, which may be the case in this story. Verse 2 introduces the theme of false worship, which results in the Israelites becoming "yoked" to the Baal of Peor (v. 3). The deity responds angrily. All of the chiefs of the people are singled out for judgment by the God (v. 4). Their punishment is to be hanged in the sun, suggesting a public execution. Such execution without burial indicates divine curse (Deut 21:22–23). Moses executes the divine command, but limits the punishment to the guilty, rather than all of the chiefs. Moses' departure from the divine command has caught the eye of interpreters. It suggests that Moses is following legal precedent from God's earlier instruction in Num 14:11–25, where punishment was reserved for the guilty.

25:6–18 describes a second incident at Baal Peor, which threatens the purity of the Israelite camp. An Israelite man, Zimri son of Salu from the tribe of Simeon (v. 14), marries a Midianite woman, Cozbi the daughter of Zur (v. 15). The couple enters the camp in the sight of the entire congregation, while the people are still in mourning before their tents. Phinehas, the son of Eleazar and the grandson of Aaron, kills the couple in the tent by stabbing the woman through her belly while also piecing the man. The Hebrew word translated tent (qubba) may specify a marriage tent, since the description of the execution of the couple suggests the act of intercourse. The execution of the couple halts a plague, which has already killed 24,000 Israelites. The divine speech in vv. 10–13 commends the action of Phinehas by giving him a "covenant of peace." The covenant of peace may indicate either health in general or the protection of Phinehas from bloodguilt and revenge by Zimri's clan. God also establishes a second covenant with Phinehas, in which the deity promises that his family will be priests forever. The story concludes (vv. 16–18) with the divine command to Moses that he show hostility toward Midian, because of the deceit of the Midianites in the intermarriage with Israel. The command is paradoxical, since Moses is also married to the Midianite, Zipporah, the daughter of the priest Jethro (Exod 2:15–22), who functioned as Moses' advisor in Exod 18 and in Num 10:29–35. The divine command points the reader ahead to the war against Midian in Num 31.

B. Instructions for Inheritance (26:1–36:13)

Chapters 26–36 signal a change in the book of Numbers from the wilderness wandering of the first generation to the preparation for conquest by the second generation of Israelites. The central theme, inheritance, provides a new beginning to the Israelites' quest for the promise land, an issue repeated throughout the book. The census of the second generation (Num 26) repeats the first (Num 1). There is also a change of leadership. Eleazar replaces Aaron as high priest (Num 26:1) and Joshua succeeds Moses to lead Israel into the promise land (Num 27:12–13).

26:1–65. Census of the Second Generation. The reference to the plague in 25:19 ties the introduction of the census to the story of the sin at Baal Peor, where God unleashed a plague on the Israelites, killing 24,000. The story of the second census occurs in three sections: the divine command and setting (24:1–4), the record of the census (24:5–56), and the conclusion (24:57–65).

26:1–4 loosely parallels the divine command for a census in 1:1–4. In each case, the census is presented as a divine command; the command focuses on males, twenty years of age and older, who are able to go to war. The divine command in 26:1–4, however, is directed to Moses and Eleazar, signaling progression in the story from the first to the second generation.

26:5–56 records the census. A literary relationship exists between the list of tribes in Num 26 and Gen 46. However, the list in Gen 46 is about individuals, while Num 26 is about clans. The census in Num 26 follows a two-part pattern in which each tribe is identified by clan, followed by the total number of able-bodied fighting men over the age of twenty years. Commentary concerning the tribes of Reuben, Judah, Manasseh, and Asher is interspersed throughout this pattern. The order and number of male warriors in each clan is as follows: Reuben, 43,730; Simeon, 22,200; Gad, 40,500; Judah, 76,500; Issachar, 64,300; Zebulun, 60,500; Joseph, including Manasseh, 52,700 and Ephraim, 32,500; Benjamin, 45,600; Dan, 64,400; Asher, 53,400; Naphtali, 45,400, Levi, 23,000. The total number of the census is 601,730 (26:51). The census is intended to determine the proportion of inheritance for each tribe, of which two methods are presented: land will be determined by the size of the tribe (26:52–54) and by the casting of lots (26:55).

The genealogy of Reuben (vv. 4–7) departs from the structure by extending the genealogy down three generations to include Dathan and Abiram, the central characters from the episode concerning conflict with Moses over leadership (Num 16).

The numbering of Judah (vv. 19–22) departs from the expected format in two ways. First, the death of Er and Onan in the land of Canaan is noted. Second, the genealogy extends through the line of Perez. Both additions tie the census of Judah to the story of Judah and Tamar in Gen 38, which explores the significance of the levirate law for inheritance rights. The levirate law requires that when a husband dies without leaving offspring, the dead man's brother must produce children with his sister-in-law in order to carry on the clan of the lost brother. The literary relationship between the census of Judah and Gen 38 suggests that the author of Num 26 affirms the continuing practice of the levirate law for purposes of inheritance.

The splitting of Manasseh (vv. 29–34) and Ephraim (vv. 35–37) with reference to Joseph is unique among the census of the tribes. It relates the census to Gen 48, where Manasseh and Ephraim are introduced as sons of Joseph. Noteworthy is the reversal of order between Manasseh and Ephraim, which places Manasseh in the special seventh position within the census. The number seven tends to mark moments of transition in the Priestly history including the completion of creation (Gen 2:1–3), the construction of the tabernacle (Exod 24:15–18), and the law of Jubilee (Lev 25). The transitional role of Manasseh as representing something new in tradition is reaffirmed by the linear depth of the genealogy, which also extends to seven generations: Joseph, Manasseh, Machir, Gilead, the six offspring of Gilead, Zelophehad, and the daughters of Zelophehad. Manasseh is the seventh tribe, and the daughters of Zelophehad are the seventh generation of Manasseh. They are the ones who represent something new in Israelite tradition, the right of daughters to inherit apart from levirate law.

The genealogy of Asher (vv. 44–50) is the last to depart from the standard format of the census. The new feature in his genealogy is the listing of Serah as the daughter of Asher. She is the only recorded daughter of an eponymous ancestor; her place in the genealogy of Asher is also noted in Gen 46:17 and 1 Chr 7:30. The purpose of her status in the genealogy is not immediately clear. But it likely also relates to inheritance law, perhaps illustrating the rights of daughters to inherit independent of the levirate law.

26:57–62 reports the separation of the Levites from the other tribes as was also the case in the first census.

26:63–65 states that, with the exception of Caleb, the entire first generation of Israelites, who rebelled against God in the wilderness, are now dead,

27:1–11. Daughters of Zelophehad. This section recounts a legal claim by the daughters of Zelophehad from the tribe of Manasseh (see 26:28–35) for the right to inherit. They present their legal case at the door of the tent of meeting before Moses, Eleazar the priest, the leaders, and the entire congregation (vv. 1–2). The daughters describe their problem in vv. 3–4. Their father died in the wilderness leaving no sons to inherit. The daughters explain that he "died for his own sins," suggesting the principle of individual responsibility—neither entire families, nor successive generations should be punished for the sins of a single member of the family. Thus, in order to perpetuate the family name, they request the right of inheritance. There is no legal precedent for adjudicating the claim of the daughters of Zelophehad, which forces Moses to seek a ruling from God (vv. 5–11). First, God concurs with the legal claim of the daughters and instructs Moses to transfer the inheritance of Zelophehad to his daughters. Verses 8–11 extend the claim of the daughter in four general case laws. The first codifies the present situation: If a man dies without sons, then the inheritance is passed on to his daughters (v. 8). The next three laws underscore the right of male inheritance in a patrilineal society: (1) if a man dies without sons or daughters, then his inheritance would pass on to his brother (v. 9); (2) if there are no brothers, then the father's brothers would inherit (v. 10); and (3) if there are no uncles, then the nearest kinsmen of his clan would inherit (v. 11).

27:12–23. Leadership of Joshua. Verses 12–14 contain the divine announcement to Moses of his impending death. God commands Moses to ascend the Abarim mountain range, located on the northern end of the Dead Sea. From there he will be able to see the promise land before he dies. The inability of Moses to enter the promise land is a result of his sin (20:1–13). No specific dates are given for the divine announcement to Moses. The announcement of the death of Moses is repeated in Deut 32:48–52 before it is fulfilled in Deut 34:1–8. This structure of divine announcement and fulfillment demonstrates that the book of Numbers is meant to be read within the larger context of the Pentateuch. The present literary structure suggests that Num 27–Deut 34 contain the final address of Moses to the Israelites before his death on Mount Nebo. The remainder of Numbers focuses on inheritance law, while in Deuteronomy, Moses recounts the exodus and wilderness journey (Deut 1–11) to the second generation, as well as the content of the private revelation that he received from God (Deut 12–26).

27:15–23 describes the transfer of Moses' spirit to Joshua. Moses addresses Yahweh as the "God of the spirits of all flesh," in requesting a new civil leader for the Israelites (vv. 15–17), who can lead the people in war and fulfill the role of a shepherd. The divine response appears in the selection of Joshua (vv. 18–21). The reference to the spirit of Joshua and the notice that only a portion of Moses' spirit is transferred to him recalls the selection of the seventy elders in Num 11. The transfer of Moses' spirit to Joshua is accomplished through the laying on of hands under the supervision of the high priest Eleazar, who must discern the character of Joshua by consulting the Urim. The Urim and Thummin are divining stones used by the priest to inquire judgment from God (Exod 28:30).

28:1–29:40. Priestly Sacrifices and the Cultic Calendar. The priestly duties for public sacrifices during "appointed times" are outlined in Num 28–29. The "appointed times" refer to sacred moments in the day, week, or month, as well as seasons of the year. A similar cultic calendar with a focus on the role of lay Israelites occurs in Lev 23. The cultic calendar is arranged by the frequency of sacrifices, beginning with daily sacrifice (28:2–8), progressing through Sabbath or weekly sacrifice (28:9–10), and continuing with monthly sacrifice (28:11–21), before concluding with the list of yearly festivals (28:16–29:38). The section concludes by noting that private sacrifices must be performed separately from the public sequence of sacrifices (29:39–40).

28:3–8 describes the daily sacrifice or "the regular burnt offering." The daily offering of the priests was also known as the tamid, from the Hebrew word meaning "regular." The daily offering was performed twice each day, once in the morning and again at twilight. The sacrificial victim was a one-year-old lamb without blemish, which was offered with a grain and drink offering.

28:9–10 outlines the special requirements for the sacrifice on the Sabbath. The amount of offering on the Sabbath was equal to the daily offering, which meant that the Sabbath sacrifice consisted of a double portion of two lambs.

28:11–15 describes the monthly offering of the priests. The sacrifice was to take place on the first day of the month or new moon. The offering included two bulls, one ram, and seven lambs, as well as grain and drink offerings.

28:16–29:38 outlines the yearly sacrificial festivals. The festivals are concentrated in the first and seventh months, with the only exception being the Festival of Weeks or Fruits, which occurs between these months.

28:16–25 describes the festivals in month one, which includes the Festival of Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The Passover offering is observed on month 1, day 14 (28:16). The details of Passover are absent because there are no separate offerings by priests during this festival, which is the focus of the text. The Passover is described in detail in Exod 12 and Num 9:1–14. The Feast of Unleavened Bread was observed on month 1, days 15–21 (28:17–25). A convocation of all Israelites was required on the first and last days of the feast. In addition, priestly sacrifice was required on all seven days. The sacrifices are the same for new moon, although no drink offering is mentioned. They include two bulls, one ram, and seven lambs.

28:26–31 describes the Feast of Weeks, an agricultural festival that is not fixed in the calendar. Calculations for determining its date are not provided. Lev 23:9–22 states, however, that the feast was determined by counting fifty days, seven Sabbaths from the day on which the sheaf of the first fruits was presented to the priests. The Feast of Weeks required a convocation of all Israelites and the cessation of work. The amount of the burnt offering required by priests includes two bulls, one ram, and seven lambs.

29:1–21 lists the festivals in month seven, which includes the Blowing of the Horn, the Day of Atonement, and the Feast of Booths. The Blowing of the Horn was on month 7, day 1 to separate the new moon of the seventh month from the other months of the year (29:1–6). The priests were required to sacrifice one bull, one ram, and seven lambs on this day. The Day of Atonement was observed on month 7, day 10 (29:7–11). The name of the festival does not appear in these verses, but is derived from Lev 23:27. The ritual is outlined in Leviticus 16. The purpose of the Day of Atonement is to purge the sanctuary of the defilement accumulated through human use. The contamination from human sin is transferred to a goat, which is then sent out into the wilderness (Lev 16:20–22). 29:7–11 stipulates the day to be one of rest and fasting. The priests are required to sacrifice one bull, one ram, and seven lambs. The Feast of Booths was celebrated on month 7, days 15–21, with an extra day of sacrifice on day 22 (29:12–38). Once again the name of the festival is absent in these verses, but is derived from Lev 23:34. The reference to "booths" (sukkot) is meant to recall Israel's wilderness travels (Lev 23:43). The priestly sacrifices were extensive, which occur in a descending number of bull sacrifices— from thirteen on day 15 to seven on Day 21, while on each day there are also sacrifices of two rams and seven lambs. On day 22 the priestly sacrifice includes one bull, one ram, and seven lambs.

29:39–40 underscores that the list of sacrifices are meant to be public. The section closes by indicating that Moses fulfilled the divine instruction by relaying the information concerning public offerings.

30:1–16. Vows by Women. The chapter contains instruction by Moses concerning vowing. Vows are promises in which a person invokes God's name, making a binding covenant with God. Vows were most likely accompanied by private offerings, since they included dedication to God at the sanctuary. Two words are used to describe the ritual process. The first word is neder which is translated as "vow" and the second is issar, "pledge." The word vow indicates a situation in which a person promised to do something for God in exchange for divine help, while a pledge involves an action of self-denial. Nazirites make a pledge to enter their special state of service. Jacob makes a vow, when he promises to construct a sanctuary for God at Bethel in exchange for divine protection (Gen 28:20–22).

The central topic in the chapter is vows by women. The legislation describes situations in which women are able to make and to fulfill vows. The primary concern is the financial obligations that accompany vows and the conditions under which either fathers or husbands are able to annul them. The legislation is made up of two parts, vv. 2–8 and vv. 9–15, with each section divided into three parts. Verses 2 and 9 describe binding oaths by men (v. 2) and by widows and divorced women (v. 9). Verses 3–5 and 10–12 describe vows by women that can be annulled either by a father (vv. 3–5) or by a husband (vv. 10–12). Verses 6–8 and 13–15 address specific situations in which a husband might desire to annul a vow of his wife after a period of time. Verses 6–8 address a situation in which a husband might wish to annul a vow that was made by his wife and approved by her father prior to their marriage. In this case the husband may annul the vow without penalty. Verses 13–15 states that if a husband does not act immediately to nullify a vow of his wife, he must bear the guilt for any future action on his part to annul the vow.

31:1–54. War Against Midian. The chapter is a fictional account of the destruction of the entire Midianite nation by the Israelites, without their losing a single casualty. The story provides the Priestly writer's version of holy war. Joshua is not the leader. Instead Moses and the priests oversee the event, Eleazar the high priest determines acceptable booty from holy war, and Phinehas the son of Eleazar actually leads the troops.

31:1–18 focuses on the actual holy war. God instructs Moses to take vengeance on the Midianites as a response to intermarriage at Baal Peor (Num 25:6–18). One thousand soldiers are chosen from each tribe. Verses 5–12 describe the battle, anchoring the institution of holy war in the cult, under the leadership of the priest Phinehas, who takes the vessels of the sanctuary into battle. The battle results in the death of all the Midianite males (v. 7); the five kings of Midian, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba (v. 8); and Balaam son of Beor (v. 8). The booty includes all Midianite women and children, all cattle and flocks, and all goods (v. 9). Moses responds angrily in vv. 13–18.

He commands that all male children and nonvirgin women must be killed, but that virgins are acceptable booty, meaning that the male warriors may marry them. The focus on intermarriage reinforces the close tie between this story and the account of Israel's sin at Baal Peor (Num 25:6–19).

31:19–24 describes the procedures for purifying humans and objects from the pollution of war. War pollutes according to the Priestly writer. (It does not sanctify its participants as is the case in Deut 20–21.) Purification is necessary because death defiles all participants and threatens the purity of the camp. Soldiers must undergo a seven-day ritual of purification outside of the camp, with cleansing taking place on the third and seventh days. Objects must also undergo purification with fire and water, while all clothing must be washed. The purification process is similar to the instruction concerning corpse contamination in Num 19.

31:25–47 reports the inventory and distribution of the booty. The booty is divided equally among warriors and all other Israelites. The booty from the war with Midian is exceptionally large: 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, 61,000 donkeys, and 32,000 virgins.

31:48–54 closes the account of the war against Midian with a census of the warriors. Not a single soldier is killed in the battle with Midian. The warriors bring a gift of gold and jewelry to Moses, weighing 16,750 shekels, that is intended to make atonement for themselves to God. The gift is a ransom to God in order to avoid divine wrath, perhaps associated with the census, or from their participation in war, in which case there is no such thing as "holy war" according the Priestly author.

32:1–42. Inheritance East of the Jordan. The story opens with the tribes of Gad and Reuben requesting land east of the Jordan, because it is rich for grazing and they own a great number of cattle. The tribes petition Moses, Eleazar, and the entire congregation for the land of Jazer and Gilead (vv. 3–5). Moses interprets the request as a desire for the two tribes to inherit land without participating in holy war (vv. 6–15). He angrily recalls the story of the spies and accuses the two tribes of discouraging the entire nation from waging holy war (v. 7) and of instigating disunity (v. 6). Reuben and Gad forge a solution (vv. 16–19). They will first fortify cities in the Transjordan region in order to provide for the security of their families and livestock. Then they will join the other tribes in waging holy war west of the Jordan River. Moses accepts the solution and restates it as law (vv. 20–24). If Reuben and Gad fulfill their obligations, they will be free to live in the Transjordan. If they do not fulfill the agreement, they will incur guilt, but no punishment is stated. The agreement is ratified in vv. 28–32 before Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the heads of the tribes.

33:1–56. Wilderness Journey. This chapter creates a transition in the book. It looks back to Yahweh's leading Israel in the wilderness by listing stopping points on the march (vv. 1–49), and it looks ahead to the conquest of the promised land, with an admonition that Israel continue to engage in holy war after crossing the Jordan (vv. 50–56). The reason for identifying stopping points in the wilderness locations is unclear. A comparison of Num 33 with other ancient Near Eastern texts suggests that the list may be a record of military campaigns, or, perhaps, of pilgrimage sites. The toponyms differ significantly from the travel account of Exodus-Numbers, which creates further questions about the role and meaning of the text.

33:1–11 emphasizes the military nature of the chapter. Israel is envisioned as an army under the command of Moses and Aaron. The exodus is described in vv. 3–8 and Israel's wilderness journey in vv. 9–11. The description of the exodus distinguishes the death of the Egyptian firstborn (vv. 3–4) from the confrontation at the sea (vv. 5–8). The accounts tend to follow the story of the exodus in the book of Exodus, with the exception of v. 4, which states that the exodus took place in full sight of all the Egyptians, who are still burying their firstborn dead. The account of Israel's entry into the wilderness (vv. 9–11) diverges from that in the book of Exodus, since the Red Sea is not associated with the crossing of water. It is rather a campsite that Israel reaches only after several days of travel from Elim.

33:12–37 describes twenty-four stopping places on the march of Israel from the Wilderness Sin (v. 12) to the Wilderness of Zin (v. 37). Only five of the locations occur in Exodus-Numbers (the Wilderness of Sin, Rephidim, the Wilderness of Sinai, Kibroth-hattaavah, and Hazeroth).

33:38–56 narrate Israel's travels from Kadesh to the Plains of Moab. These verses accentuate the theme of holy war. The death of Aaron at Mount Hor begins the section. His death notice (vv. 38–39) includes information that is lacking in Num 20:22–29 concerning the date, Year 40, month 5, day 1 from the exodus, and he is 123 years old. Verse 40 provides commentary on the Canaanite king of Arad, against whom the Israelites wage a successful holy war (Num 21:1–3). The story is followed by instruction (vv. 50–56) about Israel's need to wage holy war in Canaan. The theme of holy war continues in vv. 50–56 with commands that Israel exterminate the indigenous population.

34:1–29. Boundaries to the promised land. Verses 1–12 contain the description of the promised land, which does not correspond to the boundaries of the land of Israel at any time in its history. It is an idealized vision of the land as a divine gift. The description of its borders progresses in a circle that moves in a clockwise direction from south (vv. 1–15, wilderness of Zin along Edom, Dead Sea, Akkrabbim, Zin, Kadesh-barnea, Hazaraddar, Azmon, and the Great Sea)) to west (v. 6, the Great Sea), to north (vv. 7–9, the Great Sea, Mount Hor, Lebo-hamath, Zedad, Ziphron, and Hazar-enan) and to east (vv. 10–12, Hazar-enan, Shepham, Riblah, Sea of Chinnereth, Jordan, and Dead Sea). The circle begins and ends with the Dead Sea. The boundaries of the promised land exclude the Transjordan. The eastern boundary indicates as much, since it runs along the Jordan River.

34:16–29 names ten tribal leaders who are to assist Eleazar and Joshua in distributing the land. The order of the tribes follows the direction of the boundaries from vv. 1–15, moving from south to north. The tribes who will settle in the south include Judah, Simeon, Benjamin, and Dan. The Joseph tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim, will settle in the central portion of Canaan. The northern tribes include Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali. Similar descriptions of Canaan's boundaries occur in Josh 15:1–12 and Ezek 47:15–20.

35:1–15. Levitical Cities of Refuge. The Levites are separated from the other tribes in the promised land, just as they were in the wilderness camp. The Levites were counted separately in 1:48–53, they camped in a separate section (2:17), they were given special tasks in caring for the tabernacle (Num 3–4), and they atoned for the Israelite firstborn by acting as substitutes for the divine claim on the firstborn (Num 8). In vv. 1–8, God states that the Levites will receive no land, because they are a divine possession. Instead, they receive specific cities located throughout the land. Verses 2–8 describe the boundaries of each city, the size of its pastureland, the numbers of cities, and the process by which they will be selected from each tribe's territory. The relation of Levites to specific cities stands in conflict with the account in Deut 18:6, which suggests that Levites are scattered throughout all of the cities of the promised land and Ezek 48:3–22, which states that the Levites do in fact inherit land. Num 35:6–8 states that there are forty-eight Levitical cities, with six of the cities having the status of a "city of refuge."

35:9–15 focuses on the Levitical cities of refuge, stating that they will be places of asylum or refuge. The six cities of refuge are not named in this chapter, but they are listed in Deut 4:41–43 and Josh 21:21. The crime for which the cities of refuge are intended to provide asylum is homicide. Verse 12 reports that asylum is granted to protect someone from the avenger, or next of kin, who is responsible for redeeming the debt of blood that is created by a homicide. The law of asylum does not eliminate the role of the avenger, but it does transfer the execution of justice surrounding homicide from the family to the state.

35:16–34. Laws of Homicide. This section explores the distinction between intentional and unintentional homicide. Verses 16–21 provide criteria for determining intention and the procedure to be followed in executing punishment. Guilt can be determined in two ways. First, the object used to kill indicates motive. The use of an iron object, a stone, or piece of wood indicates motive since these objects are considered to be weapons. Second, motive can also be discerned by the emotions. If someone kills another out of hatred, then that person is guilty of murder. Verses 22–28 describe instances of unintentional homicide. Accidental death through pushing or while working with stone requires a trial. Absence of motive still leaves the problem of bloodguilt, which requires the one at fault to seek out a city of refuge. Only the high priest can atone for the guilt of shedding blood unintentionally. Upon his death, all persons guilty of unintentional homicide are atoned and allowed to leave the city. The section concludes by articulating the rules surrounding homicide. Verse 30 states that no person can be convicted of murder on the basis of only one witness. Verse 31 reports that no ransom is possible for convicted murderers under any circumstance; they must be executed. Verse 32 mandates that no person guilty of manslaughter is able to ransom an early release from a city of refuge. Verses 33–34 offer the rationale for the laws regarding homicide: the shed blood pollutes the land, which is able to drive the deity away.

36:1–13. Daughters of Zelophehad. The original claim of the daughters of Zelophehad from the tribe of Manasseh was that they be able to inherit land, because their father died without leaving any sons (Num 27:1–11). The claim is supported by God and codified into case law by Moses. The elders of the tribe of Manasseh present Moses with a new problem embedded in the earlier ruling— intertribal marriage. Under the present law, the possession of land by the daughters of Zelophehad would be transferred to their husband upon marriage, which would diminish Manasseh's territory. The elders state that according to the law of Jubilee (Leviticus 25), the land will permanently transfer to the husband's tribe.

36:5–12 presents the response of Moses. He agrees with the elders and writes an addendum to the previous ruling (see 27:8–11), maintaining the inalienable right to possession of land by the tribes. The section concludes by naming again the daughters of Zelophehad and by stating that they have fulfilled the new law, since each married within the clan of Manasseh.

36:13 concludes the book by stating that the commandments within it are of divine origin and were delivered to Moses on the plains of Moab.

DEUTERONOMY

MARK BIDDLE

OVERVIEW

Deuteronomy or "second law" takes its name from the title provided in the Septuagint. The title does not suggest that Deuteronomy contains a different law from that given at Mt. Sinai. Instead, the title recognizes its central nature as a restatement and reapplication of the one law formulated for a new generation facing new circumstances.

Deuteronomy insists that there is but one covenant and that each generation, like the second generation since Mount Sinai, which is addressed in this book, must apply the requirements of that covenant to concrete circumstances of its life. In so doing, Deuteronomy offers a warrant and a model for interpreting scriptural tradition. Only a fixed covenant with unchanging principles can provide continuity and identity for God's people. At the same time, no statement of particulars can anticipate all the challenges that may arise over time. How could Moses have anticipated the need to apply the central principles of God's covenant to the demands and challenges facing modern medical practice, for example? Each generation must faithfully interpret the principles of the covenantal relationship with God in new settings.

This insight about the ongoing need to interpret covenantal principles may account for the seminal influence that the book exerted on the development of the Bible itself and on the traditions that view Deuteronomy as Holy Scripture. Second Kings 23–24 report the discovery of a "scroll of the law" (Torah) during the renovation of the Temple under King Josiah (623/622 BCE). In response, Josiah undertook an extensive reform that reflects Deuteronomy's focus on cultic centralization, in particular. The description even involves language characteristic of Deuteronomy. Together, the nature of the reform and evidence of Deuteronomy's style and vocabulary have prompted scholars to refer to Josiah's Reform alternatively as the Deuteronomistic Reform. Deuteronomy's influence seems to have extended to the major historical narrative in the Bible, the former prophets, or as modern scholarship terms them, the Deuteronomistic History (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings). The language and central thesis of this account of Israel's history clearly derives from Deuteronomy's understanding of God's relationship with Israel. Beyond the Old Testament, Jesus debated the Pharisees, not over the validity of the Law, but over the principles of its interpretation, demonstrating his own preference for a Deuteronomy-like extension and radicalized notion of the principles of covenant fidelity.

Given all this, the churches' neglect of Deuteronomy is difficult to understand. It offers a nuanced theology of grace and obedience, calling for the people of God to live out their identity and modeling ways to move from principle to practice.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Moses' Introductory Speech: On the Journey (1:1–4:49)

A. Introduction (1:1–5)

Deuteronomy begins with a geographical puzzle. Apparently, the place names represent the itinerary for the last leg of Israel's journey in the wilderness and provide the immediate background to the exposition of the Torah that begins in 1:6; i.e. Moses began to expound the law "after smiting Sihon, etc."¹ Moses appears here as the unique divine spokesman, the first, and perhaps most authoritative, interpreter of the Torah. The pregnant verb translated "to explain" (v. 5) anticipates Moses' fundamental concerns in the series of addresses in Deuteronomy, namely, not merely to restate the covenant but to explicate it for a new generation—to offer its members the opportunity to "sign on" to the ancestral covenant—and to launch and define a tradition of faithful but adaptive interpretation.

B. Events on the Journey (1:6–3:22)

1:6–18. Moses Appoints Assistants. The first unit in the historical preamble, marked by the parenthetical phrase "at that time" (vv. 9, 16, 18), begins with Israel's departure from Mt. Horeb (Sinai). Immediately, Moses recognizes the scope of the task he faces leading a people so numerous (v. 10, cf. Gen 15:5; 26:4), blessed (v. 11, an allusion to the ancestral promise), and destined to occupy such a vast territory (v. 7). As in related passages in Exodus (18:13–26) and Numbers (11:10–25), although with significant differences (i.e., whether Moses appointed judicial aids before or after departing from Horeb, whether Jethro was involved, who selected them), Deuteronomy records the measures Moses took to alleviate the burden of leadership. Even Moses was subject to fatigue, ill-temper, and disappointment. In comparison to the versions in Exodus and Numbers, Deuteronomy reveals a special focus on the qualifications (v. 13) and responsibilities (vv. 16–17) of Moses' assistants. Moses instructed Israel to choose competent ("wise"), perceptive ("understanding"), and experienced men. Such judges and arbiters will bring insight, wisdom, and life experience to resolving disputes. Moses defines the tasks of these judicial assistants in terms of four principles: their jurisdiction extends even to the resident alien; their jurisprudence must be impartial (v. 17); their authority derives from God; and, their task requires humility in the face of challenges beyond their competence.

Deuteronomy discusses this incident because it signals two features central to its message that Israel's covenant relationship with God will continue in ever new circumstances. First, soon after God made a covenant with the people at Horeb, Moses required skilled and wise assistance. In its earliest days, Israel established a tradition of leadership that would survive Moses' death. Second, Deuteronomy argues that the implementation of the covenant will require skilled and wise interpretation, especially as generations pass and circumstances change.

1:19–46. Rebellion at Kadesh-barnea. Deuteronomy 1:19–46 recounts the events that brought Israel to Moab, poised to enter the promise land. The passage is notable particularly for its puzzling relationship to Num 13–14, a relationship characterized both by differences of emphasis and Deuteronomy's brevity. The two accounts differ about who first suggested the reconnaissance (Deuteronomy—the people; Numbers—Yahweh), its extent (Eshcol; all the way to Syria), whether the people's rebellion motivated Yahweh to prohibit Moses' entry into the land (yes; no, cf. Num 20:12), the hero (Joshua; Caleb), the potential enemy (Amorites; Canaanites and Amalekites). Deuteronomy abbreviates significantly (it offers no list of the spy party, no reference to the grapes of Eshcol [Eshcol means "(grape) cluster" in Hebrew]), even omitting details necessary to follow the storyline (a summary of the spies' report, reference to Caleb's speech, the people's consideration of a return to Egypt, their threat to execute Joshua and Caleb). These features suggest that Deuteronomy assumes its readers' knowledge of Numbers. Deuteronomy's synopsis results in a version with distinct emphases—not etiology as in Numbers, but Israel's remarkable mistrust, its disingenuous repentance, and the close identity of leader and people.

Deuteronomy's account divides neatly into six sub-sections: 1:19–21 (Horeb to Kadesh-barnea), 1:22–25 (espionage), 1:26–28 (Israel Refuses entry), 1:29–33 (Moses' exhortation), 1:34–40 (Yahweh's anger), and 1:41–46 (Israel's untimely repentance and obedience). The first sub-section begins with a travel notice (cf. 1:6b, 19; 2:1, 3, 8, 13, 24, 34; 3:1, 4, 29; 31:1; 32:44; 34:1), which constitutes the narrative structure for the "outer framework" of Deuteronomy. Israel moves from one stop to the next, Kadesh-barnea (possibly modern Tel el-Qudeirat) along the King's Highway from Syria to the Arabah. Here, on the southern border of the promised land, Moses encourages the people to take possession of Yahweh's gift, the objective of their journey and the consummation of Yahweh's deliverance from bondage. Moses' encouragement (v. 21), however, hints at a problem: the inhabitants of the land are powerful; Israel, on the other hand, is a band of wandering refugee slaves. The people propose a reconnaissance mission; Moses agrees and appoints a representative from each tribe. The spies return from the Valley of Eshcol with ample evidence of the bounty awaiting them (vv. 22–25), but, unlike the account in Numbers, do not mention the might of the current inhabitants. Deuteronomy's omission highlights the shocking character of Israel's response to the spies' report (vv. 26–28). Their fear quickly becomes outright disobedience and rebellion. The people "murmur" that Yahweh has tricked them, promising deliverance while, all along, intending to abandon them to destruction (v. 27). Moses quickly points out that their mistrust is all the more astonishing based on what Yahweh has just accomplished on their behalf (vv. 29–33). Surely the God who delivered Israel from Pharaoh's hosts can bring them into possession of his promise (v. 30). Surely the God who has carried them in the wilderness "as a man carries his son" will not forsake them in the land (v. 31). Surely the God who guided them from camp to camp will guide them as they take possession of his promise (v. 33). Yet, Israel does not believe (v. 32) and, in response, Yahweh angrily metes out three limited penalties (vv. 34–40): first, none of the rebellious generation, excepting the faithful spy Caleb, will be permitted to enter the promise land (vv. 35–36); second, Moses' must share the fate of his people—Joshua will lead the people into Canaan (vv. 37–38); third, the current generation will wander until its extinction, but their children will receive the benefits of Yahweh's promise in full (vv. 39–40). To modern sensibilities, Moses' fate seems wholly unfair. One can speculate that Moses' agreement to the spy mission opened the door for or even encouraged the people's disobedience. In response to God's harsh sentence, the people facilely reverse their course (vv. 41–46). In typically belated, human semi-honesty, they express regret, not apparently over their disobedience, but over its consequences. Despite God's warning that the opportunity has passed, that he will not accompany them in battle (v. 42), they persist in charting their own course, only to face an enemy comparable to a hive of angry bees. Defeated, they return the Kadesh-barnea sorrowful. In the ultimate judgment against their inconstancy, Yahweh ignores their weeping (45).

2:1–23. Passage Through the Transjordan. Deuteronomy's historical retrospective shifts between succinct statements such as the remark that Israel wandered near Mt. Seir for "many days" (2:1; cf. 1:46) and longer descriptions of events it considered particularly important. Deut 2:1–23, for example, provides an expansive treatment of Israel's migration through and conquest of areas east of the Jordan river (Israel's passage through Edom, vv. 1–8; Moab, vv. 9, 13; and Ammon, vv. 17–23; and the "passing" of the rebellious generation, vv. 14–16), apparently in order to develop the theme of Yahweh's involvement in human affairs beyond his covenant relationship with Israel.

Two puzzling phenomena in this section merit mention. First, an extended section (vv. 1–8a) parallels materials found in Numbers (20:14–21; 21:4) and raises the question of literary relationship and dependence. Deuteronomy portrays Israel's uneventful passage through Edom whereas Numbers depicts a hostile confrontation in which the king of Edom succeeded in repelling Israel's incursion, compelling Israel to circumnavigate southward (Num 21:4) and eastward (Num 21:10–12). The argument that Deuteronomy and Numbers relate independent traditions here fails to account for the clear commonalities. Instead, it is likely that Numbers was the source for Deuteronomy since Deuteronomy's silence on Israelite-Edomite hostilities conforms with its favorable stance regarding Edom (see 23:7).

Second, and related to Deuteronomy's sympathies with Edom, Deuteronomy narrates encounters with Moab and Ammon not recorded elsewhere. Just as Yahweh had instructed Israel simply to pass through Edomite territory without designs on conquest (2:5), he commands them not to "harass Moab/Ammon, etc." because their lands are their inheritances from Yahweh through Lot. Evidence suggests that the Edomite passage served as the model for these Deuteronomic expansions (2:5 employs second person plural forms while 2:9, 19 employ singular forms [this singular/plural shift occurs throughout Deuteronomy]; vv. 9, 19 add the reference to harassment; vv. 9, 19 omit certain key phrases found in 2:5; vv. 18–23 interrupt the sequence).

These two features point to an important theme in this passage, namely, that Israel's God is also God of all humanity. Just as Yahweh gives Canaan to Israel in fulfillment of a promise and recognition of a relationship, Yahweh has given possessions to Israel's "relatives"—Edom, Moab, Ammon—and even to the entirely unrelated Philistines (= "Caphtorim"). Yahweh's removal of the original inhabitants of the territories of Moab and Edom (vv. 10–12) and of Ammon and Philistia (vv. 20–23) provides an important additional clue. By dispossessing one people in favor of another, Israel's God manages the course of human history with an efficiency of agency. In one act, God punishes the guilty nation and meets the obligation of his promise. While Israel inevitably views God's relationship to human affairs through the single lens of the covenant, Deuteronomy 2:1–23 reminds Israel and the reader that the special character of Israel's relationship with God neither limits God's capacity to nor relieves God from managing the whole economy of human affairs.

C. Conquest of Israel's Transjordanian Territories (2:24–3:22)

In contrast to Israel's passage through the territory of its kindred Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, its encounters with the Amorite kingdoms of Heshbon (2:24–27) and Bashan (3:1–11) and their kings Sihon and Og, respectively, were openly hostile. These accounts exhibit Deuteronomy's characteristic perplexing shift in person and number (cf. v. 24), manifest the problem of Deuteronomy's relationship to Numbers (vv. 26–33 parallel Num 21:21–25 and Judg 11:19–26, the simpler and therefore probably earliest version), and continue Deuteronomy's emphasis on international relations as a mechanism for administering justice. Theologically, this section raises two new issues for readers: the fundamental question of human free will in the face of statements that God "hardened" Sihon's heart and the Israelite institution of "holy war" with its apparent insistence on the total eradication of Israel's enemies. The passage grounds Israel's claims to the upper Transjordan in its earliest days in the land.

2:24–37. Heshbon. The relative length of this section suggests that the author has used the opportunity to expand the brief tradition concerning victory over Heshbon by attention to two issues: God's engagement with Sihon (vv. 28–29) and holy war (vv. 34–37). The account describes God's instruction to challenge Sihon (vv. 24–25) after first offering peace (vv. 26–29) and then the defeat of Heshbon (vv. 33–37) after Sihon refuses the offer (vv. 30–32). In contrast to the instructions concerning the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, Yahweh delivers Sihon, the Amorite conqueror (Num 21:26; Josh 12:2) of the region, into Moses' hands, charging Moses to treat Sihon according to the provisions of holy war (vv. 24–25; cf. v. 25 and Exod 15:14, 16). Nonetheless, Moses' overture to Sihon offers essentially the same terms made to Edom and Ammon (cf. 2:6 and 2:28), promising that Israel would not stray from the roadway (apparently the north-south "King's Highway"; cf. Num 21:22) and citing Israel's peaceful encounters with Edom and Moab as evidence of their irenic intentions. Sihon's reaction, then, was entirely unprovoked and unfounded, but, from Yahweh's perspective at least, not unexpected. The Amorites' guilt has reached critical mass and Sihon's reaction only gives an opportunity for Yahweh's judgment administered by Moses and Israel.

Sihon's stubbornness parallels Pharaoh's. Sihon is "not willing" to accede to Moses' request (cf. Exod 8:15, 32; 9:34; 10:27) "because" or "so that"—both translations are plausible—"Yahweh hardened his spirit and made his heart obstinate" (cf. Exod 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8, 17). Do such texts mean to suggest that Sihon exercised no volition or that, when Sihon chose to resist, Yahweh "cooperated," as it were, in Sihon's self-condemnation? At any rate, Yahweh has long since anticipated the outcome of Sihon's interaction with Moses, namely, Israel's victory at Jahaz (Deut 2:32).

Indeed, Israel's victory was, more precisely, Yahweh's victory (vv. 34–35). Holy war regulations require that enemy women and children be spared (20:13–14), yet the text apparently reports that Israel annihilated the entire population of Sihon's major cities. Verses 34–35 (and 3:6–7), may be translated, alternatively, "we . . . utterly destroyed the male population of every city; we allowed none of the women and children to flee; only the cattle we took as spoil," thereby aligning Israel's actions with the requirements for holy war.

The section concludes with a description of the conquered territory (v. 26) and Israel's caution not to involve the Ammonites (v. 37). The people's boastful claim that there was no city "too high" for them stands in tension with their timidity at Kadesh-barnea (cf. 1:28).

3:1–11. Bashan. Deuteronomy abridges the tale of Israel's encounter with Og, the king of Bashan, (cf. Num 21:33) since it closely paralleled the encounter with Sihon. It offers, instead, a detailed list of the conquered towns and villages and reports that Og was a giant, a descendent of the legendary Rephaim.

3:12–22. Allocation of Territory. Having led Israel to conquer these territories in the Transjordan and having brought the people to the threshold of the promise land, Moses takes the opportunity to apportion this territory to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (half of Gilead) and the half-tribe of Manasseh (the other half of Gilead and all of Bashan), at their request. Since these tribes now have a possession acquired before Israel's entry into the promised land, Moses also stresses the notion that Israel is one people (cf. Num 32, which reports that the now-settled tribes request exemption from further military duties, and Deut 3:19). Just as their brothers assisted them in the conquest of Gilead and Bashan, Reuben and Gad must assist their brothertribes in the conquest of Canaan until God gives all Israel rest from its enemies in the land (cf. Deut 12:10; 25:19; Josh 1:13, 15; 22:4; 23:1; 2 Sam 7:1, 11; Neh 9:28; Esth 9:16–22).

The conquest of Canaan has been anticipated, indeed, even performed as a prelude, with the conquest of Gilead and Bashan. Now, Moses turns to Joshua, who will lead Israel in the actual conquest, to encourage Joshua in that task. Since Joshua has witnessed God's intervention on behalf of Israel in the conquest of its Transjordanian territory (v. 21a), Joshua can expect God to continue to fight with and for Israel (v. 21b). Joshua must not fear (v. 22a) because Yahweh "himself fights for you" (v. 22b).

D. Moses' Death Presaged (3:23–29)

Hearing that he will not enter Canaan (cf. 1:37–38), Moses responds with an exemplary and moving prayer begging God to reconsider. Moses' strategy hinges, not on his own faithfulness, but on Yahweh's greatness. Word play propels the unit. Moses asks only to "cross over" and "see" the land "over" the Jordan. Yahweh becomes "cross" (v. 26). Joshua will lead the people as they "cross over" (v. 28). God will allow him to "see" the land, but only from a distance. Joshua will lead the people into the land that Moses had only "seen." What was the source of God's displeasure with Moses? Numbers points to a specific sin Moses committed in a moment of pique (Num 20:10–13; 27:12–23). Deuteronomy offers only the ambiguous phrase "on [Israel's] account." Israel's sin is, in some sense, his responsibility.

The final travel notice reports Israel's stop in Moab. The narrative suspends accounts of Joshua's commissioning, anticipated in 3:21, and Moses death, anticipated in 3:23–28, to resume them later (vv. 31–34). First, Moses will discuss the nature of Israel's covenant responsibilities (vv. 4–11) and specify examples of its application (vv. 12–26).

E. A Sermon Interpreting the Sinai/Horeb Experience (4:1–40)

Deuteronomy 4 opens with an extended instruction (vv. 1–40) reflecting on Israel's obligation to the Horeb covenant. Two concluding sections (vv. 41–43, cities of refuge, and 44–49, which offer a transition to Deut 5) function as largely unrelated appendices. In turn, Deut 4:1–40 is loosely related to Deut 1–3. The former is historical narrative, the latter a rather loosely structured and a far-reaching, covenantal exposition. In character, Deut 4 resembles theological reflection more closely than prophetic preaching, drawing implications from experiential data garnered at Mt. Horeb/Sinai. For the first time, the otherwise confusing interchange between plural and singular forms of the pronoun "you" seems to reflect a rhetorical strategy. The reader must distinguish between the plural "you" addressed to Moses' presumptive original audience, the plural "you" addressed to the ancestral generation actually present at Horeb (vv. 9–24, 34–36), and the plural "you" of the generation that will later face a profound national crisis and even exile (vv. 25–31), and, finally, the "you" of the readership, itself. This subtlety conflates the generations into a single trans-historical Israel, which stands before God.

Moses' opening admonition to Israel differentiates between "statutes" and "ordinances" that Moses will "teach," presumably in contrast to the "law" that God "commands" Israel to obey. The Hebrew term translated "statutes" describes the collected wisdom of "rulings" issued by authorities in interpreting the "law" (cf. Num 35:12; 2 Kgs 25:6; Jer 1:16; Prov 16:10)—analogous to modern "case law." Similarly, the etymology of the word translated "ordinances," which refers in its most simple use to "boundaries" (cf. Jer 5:22; Job 38:10), can describe the "principles" applicable in a system (i.e., the created order [Jer 31:35–36]). Although the Decalogue articulates the "law," Moses' recognizes that, as a statement of fundamentals, it requires interpretation and application. With Israel facing the promised land and Moses facing his impending death, Moses thought it wise to instruct Israel in the "case law" and "principles of application" necessary for bringing fundamental norms to bear on real-life circumstances. As the so-called "canonical formula" (v. 2) makes clear, however, this need to interpret the Decalogue does not involve changing the fundamental principles.

At Mt. Horeb, God had commanded Moses to instruct Israel about the principles for interpreting the law. Among the purposes, according to vv. 6–8, was that Israel's neighbors might be impressed with the superiority of Israel's covenant, its unparalleled access to its God (v. 7). and its unsurpassed laws (v. 8).

What, precisely, are the fundamentals Moses teaches Israel to interpret? How will Israel have access to them? First, Israel must remember its experience, actively preserve that memory, and propagate it in subsequent generations (v. 9). Israel's God reveals himself to Israel experientially. Even though the generation Moses addresses was not present at the foundational moment, through memory and tradition it too can stand at the shore of the Reed Sea and at the foot of Mt. Horeb! It too can hear Yahweh's very voice (4:11–12, 33, 36; cf. Exod 19) and view the tablets (4:13).

Deuteronomy 4:15–20 develops a syllogistic deduction about God derived from their foundational experience at Horeb. (1) Israel witnessed no perceptible figure at Mt. Horeb (v. 15); instead, Yahweh spoke "from the midst of the fire." (2) Therefore, Israel should not depict its God visually (v. 16–19). (3) Israel should remember that the creator God—acting majestically but unseen, and not a component of creation—delivered Israel from Egypt (v. 20).

Unlike their literary context, vv. 21–24 state the principle that obedience is necessary (v. 23) after the case in evidence (vv. 21–22), which does not allude to what happened at Mt. Horeb, but to some unspecified instance involving idolatry (perhaps Beth-Peor, v. 3) and somehow implicating Moses. Verses 25–28 return to the themes of memory and theophany, warning that the collective memory of Horeb may wane and the people may turn to idolatry, thereby "provoking" (Jer 7:18, 19; 8:19) God's wrath. This term, together with the abrupt transition between vv. 24 and 25, suggest that this unit may be a Deuteronomistic addition. If so, it recalls the central theme of the Deuteronomistic History: Israel's history was a long series of "provocations" that ultimately bankrupted even God's patience. Indeed, vv. 24–28 sound like a historical retrospective on the Babylonian crisis.

The reference to exile elicits a promise of restoration, if these exiles "seek" Yahweh (note the very close parallel with Jer 29:13), if they "return" to him and "heed his voice" (again, with close parallels in Jeremiah), then God, who is merciful (v. 31), will bring them home again.

Deuteronomy 4:32 returns suddenly to Horeb (probably further evidence that vv. 25–31 are a later insertion) and God's voice to draw yet another theological conclusion, namely, that Yahweh is the sole God. Yahweh's voice (v. 32), the people's survival after the encounter (v. 33) and Yahweh's act to deliver Israel from Egypt are all without rival or parallel. The God who authored these unique events is also unique, the only God (v. 35). Yahweh's act of deliverance implies Yahweh's dominion over human history. Pharaoh's gods proved to be no gods at all. Yahweh's ability to dispel the Amorites and bestow Canaan upon Israel also implies that Yahweh is no mere national deity. Yet, lest God's revelation in the theophany at Horeb be confused with evidence for a local deity, v. 36 in particular makes it clear the Yahweh was not located at Horeb, nor present in the fire. Instead, from heaven, he spoke through the fire. Finally, the text extrapolates a familiar conclusion from this inference of Yahweh's uniqueness: Israel must obey the terms of its covenant with its God; after all, Yahweh is the only God.

F. Cities of Refuge (4:41–43)

This transition from historical retrospective (1:1–4:40) to the preamble (5–11) of the Deuteronomic Code (12–26) includes Moses' designation of three Transjordanian "cities of refuge" (vv. 41–43, anticipating 19:1–13) and offers a final introduction to the upcoming treatment of hermeneutical principles. Four passages deal with the cities of refuge (Num 35:9–15; Deut 4:41–43; 19:1–13; Josh 20:1–9). They disagree somewhat as to who founded the Transjordanian cities (Moses or, as Josh 20 maintains, probably Joshua). Scholars differ concerning the interrelationship. Deuteronomy 4:41–43, in contrast to the other three texts, pays little attention to procedures regarding refuge, presumably because it can rely on one or more of the other texts to supply that information.

II. Moses' Second Address: Covenant (4:44–28:68)

A. Introduction (4:44–49)

Finally, Moses' exposition of the law (1:5) can begin. A double introduction (vv. 44 || 45) identifies what follows, alternatively, as the "Torah" or as "testimonies, statutes, and ordinances." Testimonies, a technical term for the memorial to the covenant, occurs only here and in 6:17 and 20. The compound phrase may point forward to the Decalogue (Deut 5) as this "testimony" and to the "commandments, statutes, and ordinances" that begin in Deut 6:1–2. Verses 45–46 give the impression that Moses taught the content of Deuteronomy immediately upon Israel's departure from Egypt. They may be evidence of an early form of Deuteronomy minus the historical preamble.

B. Sermons on Key Covenant Themes (5:1–11:32)

5:1–33. The Sinai/Horeb Covenant. A hermeneutical preamble (chs. 5–11) to the law code (chs. 12–26) follows the historical preamble (chs. 1–3[4]). This hermeneutical preamble begins with the Decalogue, before discussing the methods and motivations for interpreting it.

Moses emphasizes three essential issues: his role as mediator (vv. 4–5; cf. vv. 25–31), the transgenerational nature of this covenant (v. 3), and the distinction between the Decalogue and its explication in the Deuteronomic Code. Several general observations concerning the Decalogue set the boundaries for its interpretation. First, although it states the fundamental principles of Yahweh's covenant with Israel, it does not constitute the basis for that relationship. Yahweh delivered Israel from Egypt before establishing this covenant because Yahweh meant to be faithful to his promise to the ancestors. Canonically and theologically, then, "grace" precedes "law." Second, the Decalogue does not consist of "laws." Just as the Hebrew term torah derives from a verb "to point out, to indicate" and therefore refers to "instruction, guidance," the "laws" in the Decalogue lack the formal elements of genuine laws—they include no clear definitions, no statement of penalties, no assignment of enforcement authority. Instead, these "laws" constitute the fundamental principles of the covenant relationship (e.g., "apodictic" law). Third, a few cases include so-called "motivational clauses"—rationales for observance of a particular commandment. Fourth, as long noted, the Ten Commandments constitute two groupings: four commandments deal with the people's relationship to its God and six deal with relationships between persons. Biblical faith knows no distinction between religion and ethics.

The Decalogue begins (v. 6) with a reminder of the essential foundation for the covenant relationship: Yahweh delivered. The principles given in the Decalogue do not constitute the relationship, they configure it. The configuration on two tablets suggests the proper relationship between worship and ethics: both are grounded in the community's relationship to God.

The first commandment (5:7) describes the nature of relationship to God in terms of exclusivity. Yahweh delivered Israel from Egypt. In return, Israel owes Yahweh exclusive allegiance. Similarly, because God is jealous, the second commandment (in the Jewish enumeration; 5:8–10) warns Israel against the manufacture and worship of any representation of God. Although no Scripture passage provides a concise rationale for this prohibition, it probably reflects a concern for maintaining God's priority in the relationship. Idols can be localized and controlled, but God will not be manipulated. God's prerogatives continue as the theme of the third commandment (5:11). Yahweh insists that his proper name be used properly, not "emptily," "vainly," or "lightly." The commandment implies a proper use of the divine name in oath-taking (see Jer 4:2; 5:1; 13:25–27). The converse, then, would be to invoke God as witness to an oath made rashly or deceptively, thereby involving God's name and reputation in a sham or deception. The fourth commandment (Sabbath), in three sections (the commandment proper, 5:12; an expanded "motivational clause"; and a definition of the precise intention of "keeping" the Sabbath, i.e., the total cessation of work), emphasizes, once again, that God delivered Israel from Egyptian bondage. Deuteronomy understands (cf. Exod 20), the Sabbath as a weekly commemoration and celebration of God's gift of freedom. Israel must celebrate the gift of rest and further emulate its God by granting rest, in turn, to its servants and resident aliens of both genders.

The fifth commandment (v. 16) states a subtle rationale for trans-generational loyalty. If adult children care properly for their parents, the example they set will ensure that they too can expect to be honored in their advanced age. The commandment does not state what "respecting" one's parents involves.

Subsequent tradition will have to elaborate the application of the sixth commandment. This apparently categorical prohibition against killing cannot be easily harmonized with other biblical attitudes toward capital punishment and war. The simplest suggestion that "kill" means "murder" conflicts with evidence concerning the most ancient biblical usage of the verb to denote killing that requires tribal or family revenge (cf. Num 35:27, 30). Interpreters wrestle with whether to understand the commandment as a prohibition against feuds and vigilante justice or to expand it as a principled statement about the supreme value of human life.

A hermeneutical challenge also arises with respect to the seventh commandment prohibiting adultery since the modern conventional definition of marriage as involving "one man and one woman" did not pertain in ancient Israel. In effect, only sexual relations between a married woman and someone other than her husband were defined as adultery. The Deuteronomic Code recognizes the need for refinement and deals with a number of related cases in the effort to broaden the application of the principle of sexual purity.

Not surprisingly, perhaps, a similar dynamic manifests itself in relation to the eighth commandment (v. 19). Based on the use of the verb, translated here "to steal," in Exod 21:16, where it means "to kidnap" (i.e. "to steal" a person), many scholars hypothesize that the commandment must have also originally referred to kidnapping. In this interpretation, the eighth commandment involves crimes against the worth of persons. The Decalogue regularly focuses on relationships, not ownership. Thus, the ninth commandment (v. 20) deals with the serious damage that can result from dishonesty in the law court. Only the tenth commandment (v. 21) addresses an attitude instead of an overt action and focuses on property instead of persons. To deprive a person of property, especially of livestock in an agrarian society, is to mount an attack on the person's very livelihood. The warning against improper desire, however, stands in the Decalogue as a unique recognition that volition and action are intimately intertwined.

A report of the people's reaction to events at the foot of Mt. Horeb/Sinai follows the Decalogue proper. First, Yahweh spoke audibly to Israel, appeared to them in fiery darkness, and with his own fingers wrote the Decalogue for all of those gathered (5:22–23). They were witnesses. Second, this encounter with Yahweh was so terrifying that the people immediately sought to place distance between themselves and God, filling the gap with Moses' mediation (vv. 24–28). Third, their eyewitness experience of the revelation of God's will and their dependence on Moses' as mediator of the covenant highlights the central theme of Deuteronomy, obedience to the covenant. 6:1–25. "No Other Gods." Situated between the Decalogue (5) and its explication (12–26), Deut 6–11 concentrates on the first commandment as the statement of the essence of Israel's relationship with its God. This theological reflection on Yahweh's claim to exclusive relationship occurs in four sections: vv. 1–3 introduce Moses' teaching, vv. 4–9 formulate the "Shema," vv. 10–19 catalogue the blessings of fidelity to Yahweh and the curses of infidelity, and vv. 20–25 explain the extreme importance of transmitting the covenant tradition to the next generation.

Obedience to the covenant brings benefits (vv. 1–3): reverence for Yahweh, long life, individual blessings, and Israel's numeric growth. Key Deuteronomic themes echo in the statements concerning Moses' "teaching" the covenant tradition and in the encouragement to "teach" subsequent generations.

Named for its incipit, the "Shema" (vv. 4–9) paraphrases the first commandment and extends it to radical limits. The Shema calls for radical, total, whole-hearted, full-bodied devotion. This radicality finds expression in the Shema's insistence on Yahweh as Israel's only, not merely first God. Israel's devotion, therefore, must be total, involving the whole heart (the seat, not of emotion, but of volition and decision making in the Hebrew understanding; cf. Prov 27:19), the whole self, and the whole of one's strength. Yahweh demands a radical decision ("heart") affecting all of life ("all one's soul") without restriction ("all one's might").

The Shema constitutes such a quintessential statement of the covenant that steps must be taken to locate it at the center of the individual Israelite's life. Its words are to be recited to begin and end the day, at home and abroad; they are to be worn on one's hands and forehead; they are to be inscribed on the doors of homes and the gateposts of cities; they are to be taught each new generation.

The covenant principle embodied in the Shema comprises the chief criterion for gauging the health of Israel's covenant relationship with its God. Radical devotion to Yahweh brings blessing; violation brings curse. In vv. 10–19, the statement about God's plan to fulfill his promise to Israel's ancestors by displacing the Canaanites (vv. 10–11, 18–19) surrounds the focal injunction to obey the covenant (vv. 12–18a), which focuses, now, on the ironic danger that Israel's initial blessing may seduce it to forget that these blessing were the unmerited gift of God's grace (6:15). This recognition will motivate Israel to serve Yahweh only, swearing oaths (authentically) in Yahweh's name (v. 13). Put negatively, Israel should not serve other gods (v. 16) lest Yahweh, who is "a jealous God" (cf. 5:9), replace blessing with curse.

Incidentally, Moses' admonition in v. 18 employs, not the technical language of covenant, but the everyday language of "right" and "good." Deuteronomy may acknowledge here that the standards of decency, which are the common heritage of all humankind, form a foundation for the specific requirements of Torah/covenant. In other words, even when the Torah fails to address a particular life situation, Israel knows right and wrong and is without excuse.

This sermon concludes with a so-called "didactic question" (v. 20) found throughout Deuteronomistic/Deuteronomistic literature (see Exod 12:26–27; Deut 29:24–28; Josh 4:6–7; 1 Kgs 9:8–9; Jer 5:19; 16:10–13). In response to a child's inevitable question concerning the importance of the covenant, parents should recall Yahweh's act of deliverance from Egyptian bondage as the foundation for the covenant relationship (vv. 21–23) and describe its redemptive and salutary purpose (vv. 24–25). Characteristically, the parent employs first-person plural forms: "By redeeming our ancestors, Yahweh redeemed us."

7:1–26. The Threat of Syncretism. Good leaders not only admonish their followers to pursue their core principles but to anticipate possible threats. In Moses' view, the chief danger awaiting Israel consisted of the temptations presented by the Canaanites. The biblical witness attests that, throughout its history in the land, Israel often failed the test of maintaining cultural and religious integrity, regularly turning aside, instead, to "follow after other gods." Moses offers three specific suggestions: avoid assimilation, avoid arrogance, and avoid anxiety.

Deuteronomy 7:1 lists seven Canaanite tribes awaiting Israel. They were more numerous with a highly developed society and fortified city-states. Now that the Canaanites' sin had reached maturity, however, Yahweh would deliver them into Israel's hands in "holy war" (cf. 3:1–7 and, especially, 20:1–18). Israel was to annihilate the Canaanite population, to eschew treaties and intermarriage with them (a provision suggesting that the injunction to annihilate them was either hyperbole or later proved impracticable), and to eradicate all Canaanite culture and religion.

Does the call to remain separate, distinct, "holy" somehow imply Israelite superiority? No, Israel's holiness derives entirely from Yahweh's free choice. Israel did not earn its status. The danger, of course, is that Israel could come to regard itself as inherently superior. Neither Israel's size nor strength motivated Yahweh's decision to choose Abraham and his descendants (v. 7). Yahweh's choice was entirely unmotivated. Israel's success in the land will depend on Yahweh to keep his promises (vv. 8–9, 12). While Israel's election had no basis in Israel's merit, the biblical witness clearly indicates that it had a purpose: Israel's calling to be God's holy, covenant people (vv. 9–12). Again, vv. 12–16a stress that fidelity to the covenant will bring fertility, both human and agricultural. Grown strong and numerous, Israel will be able to expunge the Canaanites, removing the threat to Israel's holiness.

Interpreters must place this passage in the context of the biblical witness to Israel's role as the mediator of blessing to the nations. The specific challenge of resisting Canaanite religious and cultural influence called for extreme measures, apparently. This text's call for holiness expresses God's universal will; the call to eradicate strangers does not.

The reminder that Israel did not earn God's attention was meant primarily as a warning against self-importance. It could have almost the opposite effect, however. If Israel is so insignificant, then it has good reason to fear its more powerful enemies (cf. 1:19–33). Just as Israel becomes holy before God (v. 6), so also its strength is solely the product of its relationship with God. This encouragement to trust in Yahweh's protection is more than deductive logic. Israel's brief history as the covenant people was already replete with examples of God's intervention in Egypt (v. 18) and during the exodus (v. 19ab). Yahweh will continue so to act when Israel confronts the Canaanites (v. 19c–20). Fear, then, would be entirely unfounded (vv. 21–25), so long as Israel remembers not to take possession of any of the "abominations" they may find in the land, being careful to destroy "the idol images of their gods," in particular, and refraining from illicit plunder (v. 25).

Verse 22 presents a special problem—or opportunity—for interpreters. Although Deut 7 calls for the eradication of the Canaanites, v. 22 describes a process that will be phased. The text offers an inventive rationale: should the eradication be immediate and instantaneous, given Israel's insignificant population, the countryside would soon be overrun with wildlife. This tension between the radical program and its phased implementation suggests that Deut 7 may best be understood as a hyperbolic statement of the urgent priority of maintaining distinction from corrupting cultural influences and not as an endorsement of genocide.

8:1–20. Poverty and Prosperity. Deuteronomy 8, a warning against apostasy in conditions of extreme lack (vv. 1–10) and rich abundance (vv. 11–20), is the third sermon expounding the first commandment. Its two sections, indicated by the new beginning in v. 11, the transition from past to future, the reflection of the first half in the second, and the focal significance of a hymn in each section (vv. 7–10 and vv. 14–16), highlight the balanced construction of the sermon.

After a standard summons to obey the commandments supported by the promise that obedience brings blessing (v. 1), the summons to recall the wilderness experience (v. 2) announces the topic of the sermon. Normally understood from the perspective of punishment for Israel's rebellion at Kadesh-barnea (cf. 1:19–46), this sermon regards the wilderness experience as a period of education when Yahweh "humbled" and "tested" Israel to determine its willingness to obey. Yahweh sought to teach Israel a fundamental lesson, namely, that in a situation of extreme want, when mere survival demands one's total attentions and energies, Yahweh provides. In the wilderness, Israel did not enjoy fine cuisine in abundance. Yahweh met its fundamental needs, sufficiently (and no more) and daily (but only so). Their clothing lasted for the entire journey. God preserved them alive and healthy; God did not, however, lavish upon them extravagance and luxury.

It is important always to remember that even the basics of life are God's provision (v. 3). In extremis, even an everyday loaf of bread signifies God's sustaining provision. How much more so, then, will the abundance and plenty of the promised land signify God's abundant provision? Having learned the lesson of desert dependence on Yahweh, Israel should now be eager "to obey his commandments, to walk in his ways, and to fear him" (v. 6). In the land, Israel will know no lack, it will "eat and be satisfied."

This very abundance presents a new danger. "Watch yourself" (v. 11) the sermon warns. Complacency can quickly develop when one forgets the desert, when one comes to presume that one's wealth is the product of one's own hands, when one neglects to express gratitude in obedience. The hymn-like section in vv. 14–18 celebrates the history of Yahweh's provision. Prosperity cannot be allowed to obscure Israel's memory of the God "who brought out" from Egyptian bondage (v. 14), "who led in the wilderness" (v. 15). In the desert, water and bread are clearly God's gifts. In the rich promised land, it becomes easy to deceive oneself: "My strength and the might of my hand have gotten me this wealth" (v. 17). Such a claim is tantamount to rejecting God's essential role in bestowing the land upon Israel and in sustaining its plenty; it is tantamount to idolatry; it brings the loss of blessing, the painful reminder that, in fact, Israel is not the source of its own prosperity.

9:1–10:11. Election and Presumption. Deuteronomy 9 supplements the treatment of the election theme in Deut 7:6–11 (Yahweh's unmerited choice) and, in a way, in Deut 8:11–20 (Israel's unearned prosperity). Just as Israel had not attracted God's attention because of its strength or skill, Moses explains in Deut 9, it did not distinguish itself for its exemplary righteousness either. In fact, Israel demonstrated a contrary trait from its earliest days. Before Moses could return with the tablets of the Law, Israel had committed one of the most egregious acts of idolatry and rebellion in its entire history. Indeed, similar acts of infidelity would come to characterize Israel's history.

This discussion of Israel's rebellion with the golden calf (Exod 32) does not, as one might expect, issue in a call to covenant obedience (but see 10:12–11:32). Deuteronomy 9:1–10:11 focuses, instead, on the danger of self-delusion concerning Israel's propensity to wander. Israel is God's chosen people only by virtue of God's free choice, not because of Israel's merit. Indeed, God continues in relationship with Israel despite its behavior, not because of it.

After the familiar summons to hear, the issue of Canaanite opposition facing Israel across the Jordan raises once again the specter of weak Israel falling victim to Anakim, a fear immediately dismissed by the promise that Yahweh will be "a consuming fire" annihilating Israel's enemies (v. 3). Why, however, the text asks, should Yahweh act on Israel's behalf? The Canaanites have earned the punishment coming to them (v. 4); Yahweh's intervention on Israel's behalf reflects faithfulness to the promise made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (v. 5). Israel should remember its history of rebelliousness whenever it is tempted to vaunt its own character.

The evidence of Israel's unrighteousness is so strong that Deuteronomy elaborates the warning. Israel must always "remember" (v. 7) its historical propensity to rebel against its God. In a confused retelling of the golden calf incident (cf. Exod 32), Deuteronomy 9 narrates how Yahweh gave the tablets of the law to Moses (vv. 8–11), told Moses to descend the mountain to see the people's rebellion (v. 12) and announced his decision to annihilate Israel and substitute Moses' descendants (vv. 13–14). At the foot of the mountain, Moses shattered the tablets and interceded for Israel, and for Aaron, over a period of forty days and nights before destroying the golden calf (vv. 18–21). Deuteronomy omits reference to the violent aftermath. Clearly, Deuteronomy has little interest in the details. Instead, for Deuteronomy, the raw fact of Israel's idolatry at the foot of Mt. Horeb while Moses is receiving the tablets of the Law once and for all refutes any claim to inherent righteousness Israel may ever make.

The theological import of this event in Israel's history should not be overlooked. Within days of Yahweh's theophany and Israel's acceptance of God's covenant offer, they violate the quintessential principle of that relationship. Moses broke the tablets of the law just as Israel had broken the covenant, violating its exclusive devotion to the God who delivered from Egyptian bondage. Yahweh's anger was justified, as was Yahweh's readiness to accept the people's de facto decision to end the relationship. Similarly, the theological import of Moses' intercession should not be overlooked. Without it, Israel (and Aaron) would have been lost (v. 20). The high stakes involved account for the extremity of Moses' intercession: fasting for forty days and nights "prostrate before Yahweh." Understandably, Deuteronomy sets aside the content of Moses' prayer for special attention (9:25–29).

Between the narrative (vv. 7–25) and the content (vv. 25–29) of Moses' intercession, this comment listing other incidents of rebellion in Israel's history underscores the gravity of the warning against pretentious claims of righteousness. At Kadesh-barnea, Israel refused God's charge to take possession of the promise land; at Taberah ("Fire," cf. Num 11:1–13), Israel murmured; earlier, at Massah ("Proof") and Meribah ("Contention"), Israel faulted Moses' leadership; at Hibroth-hataavah ("Graves of craving," cf. 11:4–32), the Israelites complained about their diet of manna. These incidents illustrate not only Israel's propensity for disobedience but also Israel's petty habit of complaining. Like spoiled children, rather than express gratitude that God had liberated them and met their basic needs, they whined for more exotic foods!

Since Israel has broken the covenant even before it could be documented, a question may now arise: why, then, did God not discontinue the relationship. Moses' intercessory prayer (vv. 25–29) answers this question in a theologically profound appeal, not to Israel's character, but to God's. In four phases, Moses develops an argument that Yahweh must spare Israel: (1) Israel is the elect because God made the choice freely, without regard to Israel's merits (v. 26). (2) In order to be true to God's nature, God must honor God's promise (v. 27). (3) Otherwise, God risks God's reputation (v. 28). (4) Ultimately, the relationship between Yahweh and Israel depends, historically and existentially, not on Israel's obedience, but God's promise (v. 29). Israel's status as the elect, covenant people has nothing to do with Israel's righteousness and everything to do with God's grace!

Moses' appeal to God's very nature succeeds. God reconsiders, replacing the broken tablets of the covenant and resuming the relationship. Israel continues on its journey, now provided with the Ark of the Covenant as the symbol of God's continued presence and a forgiven priest (10:6–9) as the founder of a priestly line of intercessors.

10:12–11:32. Covenant Obedience. The paraenetic introduction to the Deuteronomic Code (12–26) concludes with a series of brief exhortations and admonitions. Thought by some to reflect the outline of an ancient Near Eastern treaty (declaration of principles, 10:12–11:1; historical summary, 11:2–7; blessings and curses, 11:16–17, 22–31), it summarizes the major points already annunciated in the preceding chapters, especially in the Shema. The two chapters provide a catch-all repository of Deuteronomic preaching.

The first "unit" consists of a sequence of exhortations and statements linked in a chain of clauses introduced by the Hebrew conjunction and. The Shema serves almost as the text for this "sermon," which reiterates the notion that Yahweh chose weak Israel as an act of grace and extrapolates the requirement that Israel imitate its God by "loving" (v. 19) the weakest and most vulnerable persons: widows, orphans and resident aliens (v. 18). The opening rhetorical question (v. 12) expects that the hearers/readers can easily and quickly respond. God expects neither mysteries nor particular difficulties. God simply anticipates that Israel will live out its covenant relationship, wholeheartedly and vigorously respecting ("fear") God, "walking" in God's ways, "loving" and "serving" God (see on 6:4–5). Israel's God can claim this level of devotion because, as the Creator and Lord of all, God chose Israel. Therefore, Israel must "circumcise the foreskins of their hearts" (v. 16; cf. Jer 31:31–34; Ezek 11:19; 36:26), and prepare the seat of the will, the heart, to obey. Israel, that is, must end its rebellion against God's will. Typical for Deuteronomy, the implications of Yahweh's claim to exclusive and wholehearted devotion culminate in an ethical obligation. Since Israel's God intervenes on behalf of the downtrodden, Israel's devotion to its God will take the form of intervention on behalf of those who need protection. God watches over them and so should God's people.

This "unit" reprises the Shema's focus on Yahweh's uniqueness and exclusivity. Yahweh is to be the focus of Israel's service, devotion, ethics and worship (vv. 20–21) because, simply put, "He is [Israel's] God" (v. 21). Evidence that God has and will fulfill God's obligation in the relationship includes the wonders and horrors God performed on Israel's behalf (v. 21), and Israel's prosperity and fertility even in Egyptian bondage (v. 22). The unit ends with the refrain charging Israel to love Yahweh and obey his commandments (11:1).

Normally, Deuteronomy stresses that, even though later generations of Israel may not have actually been present in Egypt, God's grace persists across generations. Effectively, all generations of Israel were present in that one generation (see commentary on Deut 4). Deuteronomy 11:2–7, consisting of a single, complicated sentence, departs from this normal pattern. It insists that Moses' hearers "know" that their sons "did not see" (v. 2); they did (v. 7). Their "vision" includes a standard series of phenomena, "Yahweh's discipline, greatness, mighty hand, outstretched arm, and signs and wonders," which reflect different places and persons, e.g., "in Egypt, to the Egyptian army, in the wilderness, to Dothan and Abiram." In the context of Deuteronomy's otherwise consistent contention concerning the generational solidarity of Israel, this assertion defies explanation.

The land represents perhaps the most tangible fruit of Israel's relationship with Yahweh. As God's gift (vv. 9, 17, 21), it is the means of God's blessing (vv. 9–12, 14–15, 17, 21), but also the medium of God's punishment for Israel's disobedience (v. 17). This unit (11:8–31) deals with a number of circumstances involving the land: (a) vv. 8–15 describe the advantages the land affords, contrasting the labor intensive irrigation of Egyptian crops with the rain-watered produce of Israel; (b) vv. 16–17 warn against apostasy and describe the effects on life in the land brought about by disobedience, namely, severe drought; (c) vv. 18–21 reiterate parts of the Shema, encouraging Israel to focus on the centrality of the covenant in order to prosper in the land and confronting Israel with a clear and obvious choice; (d) vv. 22–25 promise Yahweh's assistance in taking possession of the land, driving out the inhabitants in fear before Israel—if Israel keeps the covenant; (e) vv. 26–30 summarize, employing key Deuteronomic concepts of blessing and curse, reinforcing the notion that Israel has a clear choice to make (see 27:1–14); (f) vv. 31–32 offer a concluding exhortation for Israel to "keep" and "do" the commandments of the covenant.

C. The Covenant Elaborated: The Deuteronomic Code (12:1–26:19)

Scholars have identified Deut 12–26, termed the "Deuteronomic Code" in contrast to the "Covenant" (Exod 20–23) and "Holiness" (Lev 17–26) Codes, as a more-or-less self-contained collection of case law ("statutes and ordinances") meant to illustrate the principles of interpreting and applying the fundamental ideals of the Decalogue. Deuteronomy, the more comprehensive of the three, shares with the Covenant Code an interest in civil and criminal issues and with the Holiness Code an interest in cultic matters. Such similarities and differences between these codes call attention to the development of Israelite case law and to their respective theological perspectives. For Deuteronomy, the hermeneutical principles exemplified in the Code are more important than the specific laws. Given the primacy of the injunction to "love" Yahweh wholeheartedly, in view of the urgency actively to transmit the covenant tradition to successive generations, and with an awareness that, although the principles of covenant relationship may be enduring, conditions of life change, the Code should be understood as offering early documentation for Israel's interpretation of the covenant. It establishes precedent much in the same way modern American jurisprudence involves case law in determining the application of constitutional and statutory law to specific cases.

This observation also accounts for the outline of the collection. The first century CE Jewish interpreter Philo of Alexandria argued that Deut 12–26 arranges its material according to the structure of the Decalogue. Calvin and Luther argued similarly. Recent scholarship has identified structural and verbal features that call attention to the parallels. The commentary that follows will treat this arrangement as of central importance to the interpretation of the Deuteronomic Code.

12:1–13:18. "No Other Gods." The first section of the Deuteronomic Code explicates the first commandment. The principle operative throughout this material, based on the centrality and priority of Yahweh's claim to Israel's exclusive devotion, concentrates on two measures designed to protect Israel from any possible contamination by foreign religion. Cultic activity is restricted to a central supervised location (12:2–28); and Israel is charged to eradicate, without mercy, all idolatrous influence (12:29–13:18). Orthodox worship is so vital that Deut 12 offers three forms of a law requiring its centralization (vv. 2–7, 8–12, and 13–28]). They agree that the sacrificial cult may only be practiced at the central sanctuary; they differ only about the rationale for this requirement. The first version (vv. 2–7) contrasts centralization with the practices of Israel's neighbors, the second (vv. 8–12) concerns Israel's practice during the wilderness wandering, and the third (vv. 13–27) deals with a potential unintended consequence.

Israel must maintain its distinctiveness over against the Canaanites (vv. 2–7). The danger of assimilation is so great that Israel must wholly eradicate Canaanite religious sites and objects (vv. 2–34). Specifically, Israel must destroy the "high places" associated with the fertility cult ("every green tree") and the "pillars" and "asherim" (= "sacred trees"?) sacred to it. Absolutely no room can be left for confusing or identifying Yahweh with Baal (cf. Hos 1–2). Positively, Yahweh will choose a place for Israel to establish its own cult.

Centralization of the sacrificial cult is an innovation (vv. 8–12). During the wilderness period, the Israelite sanctuary was mobile; and during the judges period, Israelites sacrificed at a number of local sanctuaries. Indeed, the mobile sanctuary embodied a key element of Israel's theological witness, namely, that Yahweh cannot be bound to a place. Centralization therefore requires a rationale (cf. 1 Sam 4–6; 1 Kgs 8:27). Deuteronomy emphasizes, first, that Yahweh is not, in fact, tied to the sanctuary in any way. Rather, Yahweh allows his "name" to dwell there; the central sanctuary symbolizes God's presence amid Israel, it does not constitute it. Second, because Yahweh chooses the site of the central sanctuary, the people have no control in the matter. Ultimately, the centralization of Israelite worship manifests a tension present throughout biblical theology: Israel's God is both immanent and transcendent.

The innovation of centralized worship also raised an unintended practical difficulty (vv. 13–28). Owing to Israel's understanding of the sacredness of blood (see Gen 6:11; 9:2–6), it did not distinguish between profane slaughter and sacred sacrifice. Any act of taking an animal's life was a sacred act. Centralization of sacrifice would mean, however, that a person could not consume meat unless an animal had been slaughtered sacrificially, that is, by a priest at the central sanctuary. Obviously, this would be impractical for Israelites living significant distances from the central sanctuary. The provision occurs in a negative (vv. 13–14) and two parallel positive forms (vv. 15–19 and vv. 20–27). Deuteronomy permits the consumption of meat slaughtered away from the central sanctuary so long as the sacred blood is treated with the proper respect (vv. 16, 23–24). In addition, vv. 18–19 admonish Israel to treat the Levites properly. Obedience to these stipulations in these verses will create trans-generational benefits (v. 25).

Although the destruction of Canaanite cultic objects and the centralization of Israelite worship should greatly diminish the threat of apostasy, Deuteronomy (12:29–13:18) recognizes that people may still be tempted. A second category of four provisions supplements the explication of the first commandment by addressing the threat posed, not by material objects but by human choices. These provisions envision someone contemplating or advocating the worship of other gods: an individual (12:29–31), a false prophet (12:32–13:5), a family member or confidant (13:6–12), or a whole city or community (13:13–18).

An individual may become curious about the religious practices of those who preceded Israel in the land (v. 30). Although the Bible rarely identifies the features of Canaanite religion that make it so abominable, it refers occasionally to an obscure ritual involving "passing [one's children] through fire." This has been understood as a reference to child sacrifice, although some scholars have recently proposed that it may refer to a ritual of dedication or purification. In either case, it clearly violated the requirement to worship Yahweh only and, as biblical history attests (2 Kgs 3:27; 16:3; 17:17), continued to represent a temptation for Israel centuries after Moses. Individual Israelites must, therefore, at all costs, distance themselves from it.

Deuteronomy encourages Israel to keep its covenantal tradition alive, ever interpreting it and adapting it to meet new demands. Moses stands as the model interpreter; further, Deuteronomy embodies one stage of this interpretation. The fact that the fixed statement of the covenant requires interpretation raises a danger, however. How, in the future, will it be possible to discern the authenticity of diverse voices claiming to offer valid interpretations of the tradition? Later, Deuteronomy (18:22) and the prophets (Jer 23:18, 22; 28:8–9; Amos 3:7; cf. Ezek 13:9) will develop a series of criteria for this problem. Deuteronomy 13:1–3 offers the first, very practical and applicable, test: If a prophet contradicts the basic principles of the covenant, he is manifestly a false prophet. No true prophet of God will advocate violation of the first and central commandment of the covenant, "teaching rebellion against Yahweh" (v. 5)!

If the false prophet hails from a distant village or city, it may be easy to recognize his apostasy; if a close family member or intimate friend should advocate apostasy, however, emotions may cloud judgment and weaken resolve (13:7–12). Nonetheless, violation of the first commandment represents such a threat that even these intimates, who may have spoken in confidence (v. 6), must be treated with the same severity as the stranger. Obedience to the first commandment may even require that one ruthlessly take the lead in executing an apostate so that news of such horror may deter others (v. 11).

The progression from an individual's curiosity to private discussion among intimates culminates in the public act of an entire community (vv. 13–19). Should "certain base fellows" (RSV; Heb.: "sons of Belial") convince the population of a city to engage in idolatry, Israel must treat that city as though it were no longer in Israel, waging "holy war" against it as against a Canaanite city, but not before a careful consideration of circumstances. Apparently imagining a situation in which rumor and innuendo could result in catastrophic injustice, Deut 13 requires that any such case be carefully investigated. The punishment prescribed is of such severity and irreversibility that it can only be executed should the charges be proven.

14:1–21. Misuse of God's Name. First impressions of Deut 14:1–21 seem to challenge the assumption that the Deuteronomic Code explicates the Decalogue. How do habits of personal grooming and diet relate to the commandment against employing the divine name "lightly" or "falsely" (cf. 5:11)? In Deuteronomy's view, one "takes the name of Yahweh," not just when pronouncing it, but also by the physical identity of God's people (cf. vv. 1–2, 21). To be set apart as "a people holy to Yahweh" involves the testimony of lives lived in accordance with the will of God. As God's children (v. 1) who bear the family name, all of life, including dress and diet, becomes a (true or false) statement in God's name.

In contrast to Deut 12–13, this passage closely parallels texts in Leviticus (14:2a || Lev 21:5; 14:3–21a || Lev 11:2–45; 14:21a || Lev 17:15, compare Exod 23:19; 34:26). Deuteronomy 14:1–21 explicates the commandment concerning God's name by categorizing existing traditions and, in so doing, offering creative theological interpretation. Deuteronomy shares with Leviticus a respect for life and the divine order reflected in classes of animals. Genesis 9:3 suggests that God originally intended that human beings, and probably animals too, be herbivores. As a result, the killing of animals for food creates tension. Despite generations of efforts to find some hygienic rationale (e.g., pork is the source of trichinosis) or religious polemic (e.g., prohibited animals were holy to pagan deities), careful analysis of these dietary regulations reveals that the animals classified as improper for consumption fall into two broad categories, reflecting concerns for the holiness of life and of the created order. First, all the animals permitted for food are herbivores, while many prohibited are either raptors who take life (cf. 11–18), scavengers who benefit from death, or carrion (v. 21a). In all these cases, proper respect for the lifeblood of the (original) victim demands abstention. The otherwise enigmatic regulation against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (v. 21b) extends this respect for life by prohibiting a culinary practice that must be viewed as perverse from the Priestly perspective: cooking an animal in the substance that once sustained its life. Second, all other animals unsuitable for consumption betray characteristics suggesting mixture of species. Animals that chew the cud normally have cleft hooves; any animal exhibiting only one of these characteristics occupies a marginal place in God's created order and must not be eaten (vv. 7–8). Fish have fins and scales; animals that live in water but have none or only one of these characteristics exists as an anomaly in God's order and are therefore off-limits for human consumption (vv. 9–10).

If Israel is to bear God's name authentically, it must respect the sanctity of life and the boundaries established between life and death. Israel reflects its own status as a people "set apart" to God by honoring the boundaries and categories, as understood by a pre-scientific culture, that God established in the created order.

14:22–16:17. The Sabbath. Both versions of the Decalogue (Exod 20; Deut 5) relate the Sabbath to a positive theological principle: either God's hallowing of the day of rest in creation (Exod) or God's liberation of Israel from slavery (Deut). Both emphasize the blessing of liberation and rest. Indeed, Deuteronomy's interpretation exhorts Israel to engage in a wide variety of restful, liberating, and celebratory behaviors. Deuteronomy achieves this interpretation by classifying disparate materials under the Sabbath heading, thereby expanding and deepening the principle of Sabbath rest and celebration.

The editors clearly indicate that this material relates to the Sabbath. Units of seven (15:1, 9, 12, 18; 16:3–4, 8, 9, 13, 15) and three (14:28–29; 16:16–17) dominate; worship is a central focus (14:22–27); the so-called "motive clause" from Deuteronomy's version of the Sabbath commandment, "Remember that you were a slave," recurs (15:15; 16:12) and echoes in regulations concerning the Passover (16:1–8). The Sabbath commandment's requirement that it apply to all (Ex 20:10; Deut 5:14) surfaces in the determination that even, or especially, those on the fringes of society should enjoy Sabbath rest and freedom (cf. "sojourners" in 14:22–27, 28–29; 15:1–6, 7–11; "slaves" in 15:12–18; and even "livestock" in 15:19–23). Finally, all celebrations of God's provision of bounty and freedom involve a Sabbath element (15:19; 16:8). Rest is possible only because of God's blessing on Israel's work during the week (14:29; 15:6, 10; 16:15). Good, honest work, God's blessing, and Sabbath freedom and rest constitute a grand harmony.

It is difficult to construct a coherent model of the Old Testament system of tithes and offerings (compare, e.g. 14:22–29 and Num 18:8–32). Difficulties arise in part because Deuteronomy does not understand itself to be a procedural handbook but a hermeneutical guide. Deuteronomy focuses on the central requirement that the tither share with the disenfranchised that portion of the tithe not burnt in sacrifice or reserved for the priests. A key feature is the joy the tither expresses in worship. The worshiper, his household, and his guests are to celebrate extravagantly ("whatever your soul desires"). Furthermore, Deuteronomy insists that, since Israel's God is a liberator, Israel must also liberate. Sabbath, a weekly commemoration of freedom, must be an opportunity for extending freedom to others. The most horrible perversion imaginable of God's intervention on Israel's behalf would be for Israel, itself, to become an oppressor.

Every third year the distance from the central sanctuary is to be transformed into an opportunity for extending Sabbath liberty (vv. 28–29). Rather than traveling to the central sanctuary, Israelites should share their tithes with the underprivileged, the landless Levite, the disenfranchised immigrant, and widows and orphans without means of support. By extending Sabbath liberation, Israel ensures God's continued blessing (14:29).

Deuteronomy's treatment of the Sabbath establishes connections between the celebration of Israel's God, who frees slaves, and a wide range of apparently unrelated circumstances. Economic debt, which could drive one into slavery, appears prominently (Deut 15). Every seventh year is to be a year of Sabbath "release (from debt)." Exodus prescribes a fallow year for crops so that poor people may glean freely (23:10–11); Deuteronomy goes much farther, prescribing the forgiveness of all debts. Apart from the somewhat illiberal and inconsistent attitude toward foreign debt (vv. 3, 6) and a contradictory effort to mitigate the image of Israel implicit in a need to forgive debts, Deuteronomy's version of the Sabbath is a radical economic implementation of fundamental theological insights.

Although Sabbath forgiveness offers hope to debtors, creditors have reason to fear it. Crafty lenders may refuse to make a loan immediately prior to a Sabbath year since they may not recover their investments. In contrast to Lev 25, Deuteronomy focuses on the lender's attitude. Cold calculation and hard-hearted stinginess are the polar opposites of the joy and freedom celebrated in the Sabbath. The proper Israelite response to need emulates God's response. To behave otherwise is to risk becoming an oppressor, one against whom the oppressed may "cry out" as the Israelites cried out against the Egyptians (15:9). Ancient Israel practiced "debt slavery," repayment by indentured servitude for a period limited by the Covenant (Ex 21:1–11) and Deuteronomic Codes to six years (15:12–18). Four features highlight Deuteronomy's concept of Sabbath freedom in relation to debt slavery. First, female slaves must be treated equally. Second, whereas the Covenant Code specifies that wives given to men during their servitude and any children born of these unions remain the property of the master, Deuteronomy's silence suggests that wives and children are subject to the rules that apply to their husbands and fathers. Who would choose to go free if to do so meant to abandon a beloved wife and children? Third, Deuteronomy omits any reference to a sacral setting for the ceremony that establishes permanent servitude. Fourth, only Deuteronomy requires that a slave be freed with ample provisions for starting a new life (vv. 14), reminding the erstwhile master that he too was once a slave.

The regulations concerning the sacrifice of firstborn males of herd and flock (15:19–23) do not appear to recall the Sabbath commandment. However, key phraseology (cf. v. 19 and Exod 20:8 || Deut 5:12) employs the language of the Sabbath commandment; and Deuteronomy's familiar emphases confirm the relationship between Sabbath and sacrifice: celebration, centralization, profane slaughter, and respect for the life-blood.

Israel's earliest ritual calendar included three annual festivals: Passover-Unleavened Bread, Harvest-Pentecost, and Booths-Ingathering. By discussing them here (Deut 16), including language that recalls the Sabbath commandment ("to keep," v. 1; the number seven, vv. 3, 4, 8, 9, 13; the prohibition of work), and linking these inherently agricultural festivals to the exodus event (16:3, 12), the Deuteronomic Code maintains that they too embody the Sabbath principles of rest, joy and liberation.

Deuteronomy's provisions for Passover (vv. 1–8) differ significantly from those in Exodus. Exodus (12:5) specifies a lamb or a kid for Passover; Deuteronomy also allows for larger cattle (16:2). Exodus views Passover as a family holiday observed at home (12:3–4, 7, 21–24); Deuteronomy prescribes the observance of Passover at the central sanctuary (16:2, 5–6). Exodus (12:9) specifies that the meat for the Passover meal be roasted, not boiled; Deuteronomy (16:7) explicitly requires the opposite (perhaps to allow the preparation of larger animals). These details have little significance, however, in light of Deuteronomy's association of Passover with the Sabbath. Just as Passover is the annual commemoration of God's deliverance from Egyptian bondage, the Sabbath is the weekly commemoration of Israel's freedom.

Deuteronomy's unique treatment of the Feast of Weeks (16:9–12; cf. Exod 23:16; 34:22; Lev 23:15–16; Num 28:26) expresses Deuteronomy's program: the relationship between blessing, bounty, and commemoration (v. 10), joyous celebration (v. 11), extension of Sabbath rest, liberty, and joy to dispossessed and disadvantaged Levites, aliens, orphans, and widows (v. 11), centralization, and, above all, the fundamental link between the Feast of Weeks and the exodus.

Although Deuteronomy does not specifically relate the Feast of Booths (16:13–15) to the exodus, the periscope includes three of the book's central emphases: rejoicing (vv. 14, 15), sharing, and centralization. In Post-biblical Judaism, the Feast of Booths celebrated the reception of the Torah.

Deuteronomy concludes its discussion of the major festivals with a summary of the essentials (16:16–17). These three festivals are obligatory for Israelite males; further, the rites are restricted to the central sanctuary; above all, they celebrate God's freedom and bounty.

16:18–18:22. "Honor Your Parents." What is involved in honoring parents? Deuteronomy answers by gathering probably once-independent material under the rubric of authority and its exercise. Deuteronomy both supplies the notion of "honoring parents" with content and extends the principle stated in the commandment to apply to other figures in society who exercise authority worthily and within proper limits.

Deuteronomy 16:18–17:13 combines several distinct sub-units into an extended treatment of the limits and duties of judicial authority. Deuteronomy does not focus on judicial structures (e.g., qualifications, appointment, and terms of office) but rather on the dangers of the misuse of authority. The first such danger, corruption, invalidates the authority of the judge because it influences judges to render false judgments. Judges must not "pervert" justice by taking into account the status and social class of parties or by taking a bribe. Israel's present and future prosperity depends, in part, on its judicial integrity (16:18–20). Deuteronomy 16:21–17:1, which reiterate prohibitions against idolatrous practices, may allude to the first commandment, reminding readers of the relationship between legitimate human authority and its ultimate origin. Alternatively, this subsection may serve as the preamble to the following unit, citing the statute before outlining the suitable judicial treatment (17:2–7). In either case, 17:4–7 bring the issue of judicial authority to its apex. Given the gravity of the punishment for idolatry, the valid exercise of authority demands the highest standard of circumspection on the part of the judge(s). They must disregard hearsay, investigate diligently, require multiple witnesses, and, finally, require the entire community, starting with the star witness, to perform the execution (forcing everyone involved to face the awesome finality of the outcome). Finally, vv. 8–13 explicitly state the notion that underlies the preceding material, namely, that all human authority confronts limits. A local judge may occasionally hear a case that exceeds his expertise (v. 8). He must admit his limits and turn to "the Levitical priests and the judge" for assistance. Their ruling must be honored without exception or omission. Verse 12 reminds readers not to take the concern with the abuse and limits of authority as license to denigrate or disregard properly exercised judicial authority; any who legitimately exercise authority in the service of Yahweh, the supreme authority, deserve honor and respect.

Deuteronomy turns now to the monarchy; one of only three texts in the Old Testament to describe that institution (Deut 17:14–20; 1 Sam 8:11–22; 10:25). The book stresses the limits of royal authority in four sections (qualifications for selection as king, vv. 14–15; prohibited actions, vv. 16–17; the king's subjection to the Torah, vv. 18–19, and a concluding admonition, v. 20). Acknowledging that sometime in the future the people may wish to establish a kingdom, Deuteronomy establishes guidelines for any future monarchy. Israel's king must not be an absolute despot: Yahweh will choose for the people from among the people (v. 15). Further, this fellow Israelite should exercise only limited power (vv. 16–17): he must not succumb to the temptations of military might (horses) acquired with the fruits of forced labor (apparently "Egypt" as a symbol of servitude), of diplomatic entanglements (perhaps many wives as a tool of statecraft), or of wealth (v. 17b)—all measures designed to demonstrate Israel's reliance, not upon worldly power but divine guidance and protection. These three temptations parallel precisely Solomon's errors (cf. 1 Kgs 5:13; 9:15–22; 12:18; Exod 1:11; and 1 Kgs 11:1–13). Finally, to ensure that the king remember that his authority derives from and is subject to the superior authority of Israel's true king, Deuteronomy requires that a personal copy of the Torah be prepared for the king upon his assumption of the throne and that he study it daily and thus "learn to fear Yahweh" (v. 19). In short, the king must guard against arrogance in relation to his brother and sister Israelites and in relation to God and the requirements of God's covenant.

It is unclear whether 18:1–8 means to comment on the relative authority of kings and priests, especially since it does not address expressly the limits of priestly authority, but concentrates on providing food for the landless Levites. It may be, of course, that the landlessness of the Levites itself constituted a limit to Levitical authority. In any case, owing to their special status among the tribes of Israel, the Levites deserve the same respect owed one's parents. At a minimum, the Levites merit provision for their basic needs (vv. 3–8; cf. Lev 7:28–36; Num 18:18). Perhaps as a concession to the impact cultic centralization may have on Levites serving in regional sanctuaries (now deprived of their means of livelihood), Deuteronomy stipulates that these priests be admitted to the priesthood at the central sanctuary with equal rights and responsibilities and an equal share in the priest's portion (vv. 6–8).

Among those who exercise authority in the context of Israel's relationship with its God, Deuteronomy reserves pride of place for prophets (Deut 18:9–22). Prophets may exercise authority abusively or without authenticity. Deuteronomy prohibits various forms of magic ("divining," "soothsaying," "hydromancy," "sorcery, astrology," "spellcasting," "necromancy") because magic perverts the proper relationship toward the Lord of all creation. Prophets serve God; God cannot be coerced by technical mechanisms. True prophets speak on God's behalf only when God commissions them. God's people need prophets since the fixed/ canonical tradition cannot anticipate all the circumstances in which they may need God's guidance (vv. 16–17). When the need arises, God will commission a prophet like Moses who must be respected because of his God-given authority (vv. 18–29). Thus, the community will encounter two categories of persons claiming prophetic authority: those speaking for themselves (whether in Yahweh's name or in the names of other gods) and those speaking based on their divine commission. The community may safely dismiss any prophet who speaks in the name of a god other than Yahweh. Such a prophet has transgressed the foundation of the covenant, devotion to Yahweh only (v. 20). Prophets who speak a false message but do so in the name of Yahweh are more difficult to identify. If a prophet speaks in Yahweh's name but his prophecy does not come to pass, he is a false prophet (v. 22). As later biblical tradition will demonstrate, this criterion offers little help in certain circumstances when, by the time the prophecy has come true, it may be too late to respond (see Jer 18:26–29).

19:1–22:8. No Killing. Deuteronomy interprets the prohibition against killing through a wide variety of case studies. Three "transitional" sections (21:10–14, 15–17; 22:5) divide the macrounit into four sub-units: the protection of innocent life (19:1–21), limitations on taking life in war (20:1–20), situations that obscure the boundaries between life and death (21:1–23), and the demand, inherent in the commandment against killing, to enrich life (22:1–8). Thus, Deuteronomy defines the prohibition against killing quite broadly to include prophylactic measures, limits on revenge and retribution, protections for non-human life, and, finally, destructive measures short of actual killing.

Three categories of persons deserve protection. Cities of refuge provide sanctuary for those who have accidentally caused another's death (19:1–13). Fraudulent real estate dealings can deprive small farmers of their sole livelihood (v. 14). Lying witnesses can use the system as a weapon (vv. 15–21).

Deuteronomy 19:1–13 requires that cities of refuge be dispersed equitably throughout Israel (vv. 1–3), defines accidental manslaughter (vv. 4–7), provides for the addition of cities should Israel acquire new territory (vv. 8–10), and defines murder (vv. 1–13). Manslaughter and murder must be distinguished so that people involved in accidents can be protected from clan vengeance. Clan law obligated one's nearest kinsman, or the "kins man-redeemer-avenger," to protect clan honor and property (cf. Lev 25:25, 39–55). Chief among his obligations was revenge. The system of cities of refuge, based on the distinction between accident and intention, were designed to restrain the inevitable feuds, or cycles of blood vengeance. The central problem involves the subjective nature of intent. Two tests of the killer's actions can suggest his intentions. Motive, indicated by previous animosity between the parties (vv. 4–7), suggests intention. Absent motive, one can assume accident. Premeditation, suggested by preparations ("lying in wait," v. 11), clearly indicates intention. Verse 13 should be seen as a restriction on clan vengeance. Any retribution must be equitable and must be exacted only of the actual offender.

Deuteronomy 19:14 ingeniously applies the commandment against killing to property theft. Since, according to Mosaic law, land—God's perpetual trust—could not be transferred; no legitimate reason could account for moving boundary markers (cf. Prov 22:28; 23:10). Any such movement could only be interpreted as theft (cf. Amos 2:6–8; 4:1–3; 5:10–13; Mic 2:1–3). Since, in an agrarian culture, land is the principle source of livelihood, property theft was tantamount to robbing a subsistence farmer of the very source of life. Any offense against the essentials for living or even, as Jesus argued (Matt 5:21–26), against a person's character, differs from murder only in degree.

Similarly, Deuteronomy regards error or deceit in the judicial system as a threat to the life of an accused innocent and enumerates several steps to protect against wrongful conviction (19:15–21): (1) The testimony of a single eyewitness—who could make an honest error or intentionally deceive—is insufficient (v. 15). (2) Judges must beware of "violent" (i.e., intending to do harm, the motive, v. 16) and "lying" (i.e., with intent, not in honest error, the means, v. 19) witnesses who may seek to usurp the court as a weapon. (3) Israelite authorities must be diligent, assuming nothing, examining all witnesses carefully (vv. 17–18). (4) As a deterrent, the penalty for perjury is the same assigned to the charge brought against the accused (vv. 18–21). The presumption of innocence must be protected. The second cluster of cases (20:1–20) deals with conflict between competing demands. Nothing in the Bible seems to contradict the bias toward preserving life as fundamentally as does the concept of "holy war" discussed here. Ancient Israel's perceptions of the will of God were necessarily contextbound. Since Deuteronomy treats holy war in the context of the interpretation of the commandment against killing, the editors must, themselves, have recognized the conflict between war and respect for (all) life. The rules propounded here limit lifetaking in martial contexts in four subsections: the theological basis for holy war (vv. 1–4), deferments from service (vv. 5–9), and rules of engagement (vv. 10–18), including regulations against slash and burn techniques (vv. 19–20).

Holy war presents a special case. Yahweh wages war against his enemies; the battle, the victory, and the spoils are Yahweh's (cf. Josh 7:1, 23–24; 9:1–3; Judg 7:1–23; 1 Sam 7:10; etc.). Theologically, then, holy war is one of Yahweh's tools for executing justice on the international scale. Holy war is not an act of Israelite aggression but of divine judgment.

The initial restriction on warfare (5–9) dismisses from military service new homeowners, owners of newly planted vineyards, those engaged to be married, and those who are simply afraid. Deuteronomy supplies a clear rationale only for the final exemption (v. 8). The explanation given for the first three categories emphasizes the folly of risking one's life instead of enjoying its benefits and pleasures.

Two interpretations of vv. 10–18 are possible. One views vv. 10–15 as rules governing holy war with distant cities and vv. 16–18 as those governing neighboring cities. Israel could sue for peace with remote enemies, but not neighbors. In war, Israel could kill only males among distant enemies, but must exterminate neighboring populations. It could plunder distant enemies, while nearby cities must be totally destroyed. Another interpretation, found in the Talmud (y. Shevi'it 6:1), understands vv. 10–11 to refer to all enemies whereas vv. 12–15 and vv. 16–18 apply to distant cities and nearby cities, respectively, who reject the peace offer. The second interpretation not only represents a less bloodthirsty approach, it also reflects Israelite practice recorded elsewhere (Deut 2:26–30; Josh 11:19–20; 1 Kgs 9:20–21). Still, the requirement to eradicate total populations under certain circumstances seems harsh.

In the context of surrounding cultures, however, Deuteronomy's effort to limit war reflects its view of the sanctity of life. Ancient Near Eastern invaders commonly demolished their enemy's resources, destroying crops and cisterns (cf. 2 Kgs 24). Deuteronomy prohibits such tactics (vv. 19–20). Israel must spare trees, especially fruit trees, in war. Israel may eradicate human populations, but must spare apple trees. Deuteronomy understands that the prohibition against killing extends to the protection of the ecology that sustains human life. Sometimes, the sanctity of life and the reality of death clash, making it difficult to act appropriately (21:1–23). Five specific situations model such dilemmas: unsolved homicides (vv. 1–9), captive wives (vv. 10–14), paternal favoritism (vv. 15–17), an incorrigible son (vv. 18–21), and the treatment of the corpse of an executed criminal (vv. 22–23).

The blood of an innocent victim pollutes the land (Num 35:33; cf. Deut 19:10) and cries out for justice (Gen 4:10). Only the guilty party can expiate for the crime. What can the community do? First, since the corpse was found in the countryside (v. 1), the leaders of the two nearest towns determine which is nearer (v. 2). That community then sacrifices an unworked heifer near a running wet-weather stream by breaking its neck (shedding no further innocent blood). Before priests, the leaders then wash their hands over the heifer with water from the running stream, pronouncing themselves innocent of bloodshed and seeking Yahweh's absolution. The priests then grant absolution because the leaders have done "the best they could" (v. 9). The procedure recognizes the mysterious organic connection between human ethical behavior and the health of the ecosystem.

The text regulating marriage to women captured in warfare (21:10–14) begins by reporting details of the situation (vv. 10–11). It then calls for the woman to engage in ritual mourning for her parents for one month (vv. 12–13) before the marriage. The regulation culminates in the prohibition, should the man later divorce her, against returning her to slave status. She must be released as a freedwoman.

In a dual sense, this man has forced this woman against her will into the borderland between death and new life. The regulation, apparently more suited to the treatment of slaves or the conduct of holy war, explicates the commandment against killing by insisting that the husband respect both the captive woman's need to mourn her loss and her new status. He may not further diminish her.

In ancient Israel, the firstborn son inherited an additional share and assumed the responsibilities of patriarch. The regulation propounded in 21:15–17 prohibits the violation of this practice in favor of a younger son. The text is not concerned with fairness but with the father's attitude toward the first born as the assurance of the family line. At the extreme end of the spectrum from the negative "do not kill" to the positive "promote life," this celebration of the first born represents an affirmation of life.

Deuteronomy 21:18–21 deals with the incorrigible son, not in relation to the commandment to honor parents, but here because both the son's actions and the prescribed penalty involve life and death. The circumstance envisioned involves an adult son, a rebellious, incorrigible, drunkard, whose profligacy threatens the estate and the welfare of his aging parents. His behavior endangers them all. In antiquity, the public display of corpses of executed criminals and prisoners of war was considered a deterrent against crime and a means of humiliating enemies (see 1 Sam 31:8–13; 2 Sam 2:4–7). Deuteronomy 21:22–23 acknowledges the practice, but severely limits it, requiring that the corpse be taken down and buried by the end of the first day. Deuteronomy frowns upon depriving even a criminal of a proper burial, without which, in the ancient view, the deceased could find no rest. The Talmud (Sanh. 46b) warns against an "affront to God" because such disdain for a human being created in God's image implies disdain also for God.

The explication of the commandment against killing culminates in a series of cases that convert the negative into a positive requirement to promote and protect all life (22:1–8). Life is so precious that one must nurture it however and whenever possible.

Ancient Israel's "Good Samaritan Law" (22:1–4) requires one to take positive steps to aid another in distress. One may not stand by while another suffers injury or loss (v. 1). Rather, one must assist (v. 3) whenever needed (v. 4). Oxen were the tractors of the ancient world. Sheep were the sources of milk and wool. Loss of or injury to these animals brought hardship, threatening the owner's ability to provide for himself and his family. One must not kill by disregarding the interconnection between life and the conditions necessary for sustaining it.

Deuteronomy 22:5 is virtually impossible to translate, much less interpret. The key term describing something prohibited to women can best be translated "thing." Men, in turn, may not wear a woman's "wrapper." Parallelism suggests that the prohibited "thing" is some article of men's clothing. The term translated "man" here is not the generic noun, but a term for "warrior, champion," prompting the suggestion that the "thing" is some instrument of warfare. Neither of these translations is assured (in the ancient world, both genders wore robes), nor is a conceivable relationship to the commandment against taking life readily apparent. It is better to acknowledge the limits of knowledge than to press speculative interpretations.

The biblical concern for life extends beyond humans. Deuteronomy 22:6–7 prohibits taking a mother bird and her young. Mother birds can lay more eggs. One may take the young and the species can survive. While animal life is not of equal value with human life, animals are living beings, created by God, deemed good, and commissioned to multiply and fill the earth (Gen 1:22, 28). Biblical reverence for the sanctity of life includes respect for God's creation.

Finally, just as the principle underlying the cities of refuge depends on intention, the macrounit on killing ends with an admonition dealing with recklessness (22:8). In fact, the two circumstances may constitute an inclusio, bracketing this unit. Lest a reader conclude that lack of intent to kill completely exonerates one from responsibility in the accidental death of another, Deut 22:8 holds that recklessness, the failure to take reasonable precautions, violates the regard for life inherent in the prohibition against killing.

22:9–23:18. No Adultery. Marriage fixes boundaries of relationships. Adultery represents disregard for these boundaries. In keeping with Deuteronomy's propensity to explicate a commandment by extrapolating applications inherent, but not expressed, in the commandment, the Deuteronomic Code extends adultery to include a wide range of boundary transgressions or intermixtures. It deals with sexuality and gender and, more broadly, with an overarching respect for order in nature (22:9–12), in human sexual relationships (22:13–30), and within the community (23:1–18).

The English word adulterate aptly describes the issue concerning mixtures in nature (22:9–12): mixed crops, a mixed brace of draft animals, clothing made of a mixture of fabrics (cf. also Lev 19:19). Judging by a similar text (Num 15:37–41), tassels on the fringes of one's garment (absent in Lev 19:19) aided memory, reminding the Israelites of their holy status, i.e. of the boundary between them and other nations. The tassels symbolically warn against cultural "adulteration."

Patriarchal Israel defined adultery proper in terms of the (future or actual) husband's confidence that his wife's children are his offspring. The double standard offends moderns. Yet, Deuteronomy also represents an advance in its broader cultural environment. Deut 22:13–30 seeks to protect women against predatory or manipulative men. Still, male sexuality was relatively unrestricted.

Seven cases illustrate the spectrum of rules concerning female sexuality: (1) the slandered bride (13–19); (2) the guilty bride (20–21); (3) adultery with a married woman (22); (4) adultery with an engaged woman (23–24); (5) the rape of an engaged woman (25–27); (6) the rape of a single woman (28–29); and (7) the prohibition against marrying one's (widowed?) step-mother (30 [Hebr. 23:1]). The order generally reflects descending magnitude both regarding the woman's status (wife, fiancée, single woman, widow) and the pertinent penalty (death, fine).

(1) To retain her dowry, a disgruntled husband may falsely accuse his new wife of adultery rather than simply divorce her. If her parents, with both reputation and estate at risk, can produce "evidence" of her virginity "in the gate" (v. 15), they can expose the groom's lie. Community elders "correct" him (by flogging?, cf Deut 25:2–3), he must pay his father-in-law, who "controls" his daughter's virginity, 100 shekels of silver or twice the normal bride-price (see v. 29), and he may never divorce the slandered bride. Notably, the woman finds little solace; the crux is the value of her virginity.

(2) Should, however, a groom's charges prove true, the bride is to be stoned at her father's door. The dowry and the father's reputation are forfeit. The bride pays with her life. Her husband's sexual history is not an issue. Her lover goes free.

(3) Clear cases of adultery present no difficulty for Deuteronomy. If a man and another man's wife have consensual sex, both are guilty of a crime punishable by stoning.

(4) An engaged woman who has consensual sex with a man other than her fiancé in a populated area, on the other hand, raises two legal questions. First, is she married? She is considered married since her fiancé has paid the dowry. Second, what is the criterion for determining consent (cf. v. 22)? The regulation relies on the "cry for assistance." In a populated area, the woman could have cried out if she were non-consenting and, presumably, someone would have come to her aid. The attacker would have been guilty of rape. The woman's silence signifies consent. She is an adulteress and both are guilty. The interpretive tradition recognizes that a rapist may coerce silence and adds additional tests of consent.

(5) A similar incident in a rural setting does not allow for the silence test. The man is assumed to be a rapist. This situation involves a unique case of the double standard working to the disadvantage of the male involved.

(6) The first case involving a single woman concerns rape (v. 28). The rapist must pay the bride-price and marry his victim. Apparently, a man may either "buy" the woman's virginity either before or after taking it. Even more troubling is the lack of provision for cases in which the attacker escapes discovery (cf. v. 28).

(7) The final regulation prohibits one category of "post-marital" adultery in which the injured party is not the potential, but the deceased husband. Treated elsewhere in the context of incest (Lev 18:6–30), marriage between a man and his step-mother ("his father's wife") is forbidden. Although she is not directly related to the man in question, his relationship to his father accounts for the impropriety.

"Adultery," i.e., the violation of boundaries, surfaces in yet another class of circumstances: the purity of God's people. The cases gathered in Deut 23:1–18 examine (1) the identity of the cultic community (vv. 1–8 and vv. 15–16), (2) the purity of the camp (vv. 10–14), and (3) the exclusion of prostitution and its wages from the community and its sanctuary (vv. 17–18).

(1) Six categories of people may not become members of the community: mutilated or emasculated men (vv. 1–8; either because mutilation is associated with pagan cults, because it blurs gender boundaries, or because it renders one unable to fulfill the injunction to procreate); those of mixed ancestry for ten generations; Ammonites and Moabites, also for ten generations, because they did not show Israel hospitality en route to Canaan (cf. 2:8–30); and, for three generations, Edomites and Egyptians (vv. 7–8). This interpretation of adultery contradicts passages such as Isa 56:3–8 and, thus, represents another example of the context-bound nature of sections of the Bible. Surely the people of God must maintain its purity, but surely too the loving God welcomes all who would worship him. The interpreter is challenged to balance two principles: purity and inclusivity.

(2) The camp is holy (v. 14) and must be kept pure. Nocturnal emissions and open latrines are, therefore, problems. Since, in Israel's view, all aspects of reproduction involve holiness, an individual who has experienced "a chance occurrence in the night (v. 10; cf. Lev 15:16–18) must be "set apart" for a period. After washing, he may return to the camp. A latrine outside the camp and a spade for each warrior not only provides for hygiene, but respect God's presence in the camp. Israel ought not to expose Yahweh to such indecency (Heb. lit. "nakedness of a thing," v. 14). The prescription concerning the universal offer of asylum for escaped slaves sounds a noble tone. Or, perhaps better, it echoes a note of thanksgiving for God's gift of freedom. Notably, the placement of this regulation underscores the notion that the acceptance of such escapees does not threaten the purity of the cultic community, rules concerning Edomites and Ammonites notwithstanding. (3) Finally, God's holy people must not include prostitutes (compare Lev 19:29) nor should their earnings be accepted in the Temple treasury. The connotation of the phrase "wages of a dog" is unclear. Literally, dogs were carnivores and scavengers and therefore unclean. Dogs were associated the certain pagan gods among Israel's neighbors. The phrase, probably an idiom, most likely refers to prostitution.

23:19–24:7. No Stealing. Two pairs of cases dealing with theft form a parenthesis around this section; three laws at the core expand the application of the commandment against stealing. Without the framework, the relationship of these cases to theft might go unnoted. They apply the commandment to abstractions, identify God as a potential victim, focus on the harm to victims generally, and exemplify the close interrelationship between the several commandments.

In contrast to its parallels (Exod 22:25; Lev 25:35–38), Deut 23:19–20 widens the restriction against charging interest to exclude all Israelites and, specifically, interest on necessities, illustrating the close relationship between stealing and killing. In Deuteronomy's view interest is theft.

Vows are promises to do something in the future, usually contingent upon the deity's fulfillment of a request. In contrast, oaths are affirmations with the deity as security. Unfulfilled vows are tantamount to stealing from God.

The situation described in 23:25–26 was common in ancient agrarian cultures. Roads were few and a direct route is always preferable. To refuse bypassers hospitality is theft. Instead of protecting the farmer from loss, Deuteronomy requires him to share his bounty. The conversion of the negative into a positive typifies the Deuteronomic Code. Not giving is stealing!

Deuteronomy 24:1–4 contains the most comprehensive information available concerning ancient Israelite divorce law. While the prohibition is straightforward, the rationale is entirely unclear, as is its placement. A man may not remarry a former wife who has since remarried. Apparently, fearing that the couple may have continued to have feelings for one another, the law intends to guard the second marriage against the influence of the first husband. If he were to sabotage the second marriage in order to remarry his wife, he would, in effect, be stealing.

The bridegroom must not risk his life in military service, stealing from himself the blessing of marriage and family (24:5–7). One must not steal from oneself God's gift. Israelite creditors may not claim as collateral (cf. Exod 22:25–27; Lev 25:35–38) any of life's necessities or the means for procuring them. Finally, kidnapping and enslaving a fellow Israelite is a capital offense. It is "stealing a life."

24:8–25:4. No False Witness. Lying, either through speech or action, can damage another, impugning the fundamental honor due one who bears the image of God. The eight brief cases examined here (cf. Lev 13–14; Exod 22:26; Lev 19:9, 13; 23:10, 22) involve, in descending order of status, virtually every social class known in ancient Israel—including even foreigners, criminals, and oxen. No one is so lowly as to deserve dishonest treatment.

(1) Against the background of Miriam's leprosy resulting from her slanderous accusations against Moses (v. 9; cf. Num 12), this admonition to respect priestly teaching warns against slandering—speaking falsely of—priests. As Moses' successors, they hold positions of particular responsibility and authority.

(2) Collateral for loans (cf. Exod 22:25–27) may not be seized lest the debtor be publicly dishonored. Rather, the creditor must wait until the debtor produces the collateral. Poor persons' only valuable possessions may be articles of clothing. The text mentions an outer garment used as bedding by night. The creditor must return it each day before sunset so that the poor person may sleep in warmth. Clearly, Deuteronomy has shifted the focus along a continuum—false witness to slander and now to humiliation. The dignity, even of the poorest, must be preserved. To denigrate the poor is to lie.

(3) Day laborers fall just below poor homeowners in Israel's social hierarchy. Only those with no patrimony or trade would resort to hiring themselves out. Employers sometimes capriciously withheld wages. Deuteronomy (24:14–15; cf. Lev 19:13; Mal 3:5) demands that workers, regardless of nationality, be paid at the conclusion of each day's labor—otherwise, they go to their families empty-handed. If employers fail to meet this simple requirement, their laborers may cry out to God as Israel did in Egyptian bondage. Promising without paying is bearing false witness.

(4) Deut 24:16 explicitly forbids executing one generation for the crimes of another. The argument hinges on the notion that it is dishonest to judge one generation by the behavior of another.

(5) At the bottom of the Israelite class structure one finds foreigners, orphans, and widows. Deuteronomy 24:17–22 prohibits maltreatment of these persons (vv. 17–18); it enjoins providing for their basic needs (vv. 19–22). The rationale for respecting the lowliest is the reminder that Israel once sojourned as foreigners in a foreign land, so it owes foreigners fundamentally just treatment. (6) Similarly, it is impermissible to take advantage of widows. To treat individuals as though they did not deserve fundamental respect is to bear false witness concerning a child of God. Indeed, more prosperous Israelites must make efforts to meet the basic needs of these needy persons—without unnecessarily humiliating them. Deuteronomy calls upon Israelite farmers not to harvest thoroughly so that underprivileged classes of people can support themselves with the fruits of their own labor. Deuteronomy converts the requirement that no harm be done into a requirement to do good.

(7) Deuteronomy 25:1–3 further radicalizes the principle that bearing false witness is a form of attack. Even criminals must receive appropriate and proportionate penalties (not to exceed 40 lashes), and the judge responsible for the sentence should be present for its execution. These measures not only spare the criminal undue humiliation, but protect the community from coming to despise a fellow human being.

(8) To be as clear as possible concerning the extent to which the prohibition against bearing false witness applies equally to everyone, Deut 24:4 concludes with the case of a laboring animal that must be permitted to graze as it works. Even members of the animal kingdom deserve fundamental respect.

25:5–12. No Coveting Another's Wife. Toward the end of the Deuteronomic Code, treatments of individual commandments become shorter and interpretations become more innovative. Deuteronomy regards the commandments against coveting the neighbor's wife and coveting the neighbor's property as distinct commandments (nine and ten). The two cases examined here constitute an exemption (25:5–10) and a limitation on that exemption (25:11–12).

In "levirate marriage" (Lat.: levir, "brother"), the oldest surviving brother of a man who died childless marries the widow and fathers a child in the name of the deceased, preserving his memory and heritage. The practice borders dangerously, however, on incest and, in terms of the Decalogue, "coveting" another's wife. The extreme importance of family lineage and the preservation of estates outweigh these dangers. Death without an heir was so horrendous that it simply must be avoided. With no heir, rights to the deceased's estate would become legally unclear. The text is silent on an equally important benefit of levirate marriage, namely, the widow's status. Technically she would continue as a member of her husband's family, but with no male responsible for caring for her. Deuteronomy understandably disdains a brother who refuses the levirate. His squeamishness or selfishness endangers his brother's memory, estate, and widow. The ritual involving a sandal described here has parallels in nomadic divorce rites.

It is difficult to imagine a woman becoming involved in a fight between her husband and another by grasping the opponent's genitals. The punishment is equally absurd and any possible connection with coveting is puzzling. The solution may involve the phrase "a man and his brother." Literally, this text may warn against understanding the power to defend a deceased husband's memory to extend to such overt aggression. While symbolic attacks may be suitable in some cases, such physical threats to an offender's ability to procreate go beyond the pale. Ironically, her actions could render her brother-in-law unfit to act as a levir.

25:13–26:15. No Coveting Another's Property. The final two commandments deal not with objective acts but subjective intentions. Since intentions can only be discerned through the actions they motivate, the explication of the final commandment focuses on acts that arise from "covetousness." It involves cases, first, in which covetousness can motivate one to deceive others (25:13–16) or take advantage of their weakness (25:17–19) and, second, in which the negative prohibition against coveting is converted into positive injunctions of gratitude (26:1–11) and generosity (26:12–15).

The reasoning for the first regulation (vv. 15b–16) follows the statement of the situation (vv. 13–15a). Each of these sections occurs in two sub-units arranged in an ABB'A' structure. A prohibition (negative) against false measures is restated as an injunction (positive) to keep only true measures. The promise that observance of the law will bring long life (positive) precedes a statement of its opposite (negative). Notably, the regulation does not deal with using two sets of measures but with possessing them. Possession of false measures suggests an intention to use them.

The Bible reports the genesis of Israel's historical animosity toward the Amalekites (Gen 14:7) in the period before Israel came to Mt. Horeb (Exod 17:8–15) when the Amalekites attacked Israel at Rephidim in an opportunistic attempt to gain advantage over a weaker opponent (25:18). Covetousness can motivate aggression.

Deuteronomy 26:1–15 deals with the offerings of first fruits and tithes and focuses not on the procedures for the ritual, but on the confessions of faith to be offered on these occasions. The thrust of the passage, together with the unit that follows, concerns Israel's reaction to God's generosity and recalls the emphases found in Deuteronomy's exposition of the Sabbath law. Israel is to celebrate God's gifts in God's presence (vv. 5, 13). The so-called "historical confession" ("A wandering Aramean was my father...") links salvation history with the agricultural cycle, recalling the fact that the redeemer of the exodus is the Lord of creation. It identifies the Israelite farmer with his patriarchal ancestor, Abraham. Verses 5–10 unfold the history of Yahweh with Israel in simplest terms, recounting Israel's slavery in Egypt (v. 6) and celebrating God's deliverance and guidance on the journey to Canaan (vv. 7–9). The summary consistently refers to its speakers in the first person plural "we" or "us" in another example of Deuteronomy's insistence that the one covenant made with Yahweh applies to Israel in all its generations (cf. vv. 6, 7–8, 15), an insistence underscored by the shift to the individual speaker in the moment of offering the first fruits. In the third declaration accompanying the "poor tithe" (see 14:22–29), the worshiper stresses another aspect of solidarity—not across time with ancestral generations, but across Israelite society with less fortunate Israelites. The worshiper affirms that he has shared God's bounteous gifts with Israel's disenfranchised (v. 13; cf. the commentary on Deut 10:12–19; 14:28–29) and denies that he has been involved in the cult of the dead. The banquet associated with the "poor tithe" may have externally resembled the banquets held annually in honor of the dead (cf. 1 Sam 28:3–25; 2 Sam 18:18; 2 Kgs 21:6; Isa 8:19–20; 28:15, 18; Jer 16:5–8; Amos 6:7; Ps 106:28) forbidden by the Torah (Lev 19:31; Deut 14:1; 18:9–11) have been confused with them. Deuteronomy's transgenerational emphasis must not be mistaken for such idolatry. A petition to Yahweh (v. 15), which includes a request for God's blessing, concludes this section.

A brief, but pregnant, conclusion (vv. 16–19) alludes to the Shema (v. 16; cf. 6:5) and to Moses' instructions dealing with Mt. Ebal (cf. 11:29–30). This text exemplifies the importance of understanding the Deuteronomic Code within the context of the book's overall focus on loyalty to Israel's one God. Further, Deuteronomy continues to insist that there is only one Torah by clearly alluding to the original establishment of Yahweh's covenant with his people (Exod 19–20). The phrases "treasured people" (Exod 19:5; Deut 26:19) and "holy people" (Exod 19:6; Deut 26:19) establish this connection beyond question. The same God who offered a covenant relationship to the ancestors gathered at the foot of Mt. Horeb now offers the same covenant in the same key language to a later generation. As the phrases "this very day" (v. 16) and "today" (vv. 17, 18) intimate, the vitality of this covenant relationship depends, not on the historic relationship, but on present realities. The current generation, and every subsequent one, must maintain the tradition, keeping it fresh and realizing it in the community.

D. Covenant Curses and Blessings (27:1–28:68)

Deuteronomy concludes with a series of units that witness to the covenant: instructions regarding a rite of witness (Deut 27) involving the recitation of covenant blessings and curses (Deut 28), a renewal of the covenant by the second generation (Deut 29–30), Moses' farewell (Deut 31–32), his final blessing (Deut 33), and the account of his death (Deut 34).

These materials focus on the historic transition faced by Israel at the shift from the wilderness to settlement in the land, from Moses' leadership to Joshua's. The second-generation will confront situations unimagined by its ancestors. Deuteronomy, addressed as a book to even later generations of readers, concentrates on the notion that such transitions, which each subsequent generation will face, are times of crisis fraught with danger and ripe with opportunity at the same time. Deuteronomy encourages generations of readers to maintain covenant traditions while adapting and extending them in the face of new challenges.

Moses' third major address deals with rooting Israel's new life in the land by adherence to Torah. Three disproportionate sections, each indicated by an introduction (vv. 1, 9 and 11), constitute a framework (vv. 1–8 and 11–26) of ceremonial instructions surrounding a restatement of the Shema (vv. 9–10). Deuteronomy 27 describes four rituals in a loosely structured composition (reflecting a complicated tradition history?) that emphasizes the importance of ceremonial (re-)affirmation of the covenant at such times of transition.

27:1–10. Stone Memorial and Altar. For the first time in the book, Moses is no longer the sole speaker; now he speaks as one of "Israel's elders" (v. 1) or of the "levitical priests" (v. 9). Moses prepares to transfer authority. The theme of transition is central to the conclusion of the book. Following reminders to "keep all the commandments" (v. 1), Moses and the elders restate (see 11:19–23) instructions to erect monumental stones immediately upon entry into the land (vv. 2, 4) inscribed with "all the words of this Torah" (vv. 3, 8) on Mt. Ebal (v. 4). These stones stand as permanent reminders of the centrality of the Torah to Israel's public life. Covenant is a public matter. A somewhat redundant (cf. vv. 2 and 4 and vv. 3 and 8) addition deals with the parallel erection of an altar of unhewn stones where Israel is to sacrifice in thanksgiving (cf. Deut 14). Stele and altar remind Israel of the public nature of Torah as a gift from God. Finally (vv. 9–10), Moses and the levitical priests, who will assume responsibility after him for interpreting the Torah, call on Israel to hear and obey commandments and the statutes explicating them. These statements are directly related to the Shema.

27:11–26. Covenant-Making Rituals. Editors combined elements from instructions concerning two rituals. According to one ancient tradition (vv. 12–13), after Israel has crossed the Jordan, six tribes each will take positions on Mt. Gerizim and Mt. Ebal to declare the covenant blessings and curses, respectively. According to the other (vv. 14–26), Levi—now not merely one of the twelve tribes, but priests for the entire people—is to lead them in a litany of curses. How can Levi be two places fulfilling two roles simultaneously? Mt. Ebal, the location of the covenant stele and altar, is not suitable as the site for the annunciation of covenant curses. The tension probably arose as the result combining originally independent sources.

The litany of curses is complex. First, it does not, in fact, contain formal curses but instead oaths. They do not so much invoke disaster as elicit the people's assent. God will both ascertain the appropriate consequence and enforce it. The people agree that the offenses listed merit such an outcome and submit themselves to the regime. Second, the list of offenses corresponds largely to the Decalogue so that scholars sometimes refer to it as the "Shechemite Dodecalogue." Third, the structure of the list highlights the first and tenth items—actions done "in secret," although, in fact, virtually none of the actions described in the litany would likely be committed in public. In other words, these oaths assign to Yahweh's direct oversight those crimes that might go unnoticed by the community.

The contents deal with five categories of offense: idolatry (v. 15), four instances of the abuse of power (regarding v. 16, see the commentary on Deut 5; regarding the neighbor's landmark, see the commentary on Deut 19:14), four instances of sexual misconduct (bestiality, v. 21; three varieties of incest, vv. 20—with one's father's wife, 22—with one's sister, either whole or half, and 23—with one's mother-in-law; cf. Lev 18:6–23 and the commentary on Deut 5:18 and 22:13–30), two cases of secret aggression against a fellow Israelite (physical violence, v. 24; conspiracy to commit such violence, v. 25), and a final general curse (v. 26) designed to cover any accidental omission.

The language of the eleventh item deserves comment. It employs a term sometimes erroneously translated "soul" (cf. NRSV, "person"). Clearly, Deut 27:25 cannot refer to an instance in which someone accepts money to smite another Israelite's eternal soul. Instead, in the Hebrew conception, a human being is a psychosomatic whole, a person.

28:1–68. Covenant Blessings and Curses. To underscore the covenantal character of Yahweh's relationship with Israel and particularly the role of Deuteronomy as an adumbration of the covenant's terms, the editors of the book add to the Deuteronomic Code a collection of blessings and curses similar to those found at the end of ancient Near Eastern vassal treaties—similar, but not identical, since, strictly speaking, only vv. 28–33 and 38–42 are true "curses" and only vv. 3–6 and 16–19 true "blessings." With curse and related materials outnumbering blessing and related materials three to one, this section—dealing with virtually every area of life from nature to international relations, and calling for the most horrendous outcomes—clearly emphasizes the costs to Israel should it forsake its covenant. The composition possesses an intricate, almost baroque, structure. It is divided between blessings (vv. 1–14) and curses (vv. 15–68), with frameworks delineating the two major sections (cf. vv. 1–12 and v. 13 and vv. 4 and 11 surrounding the blessings), although these designations do not include vv. 47–68 of the curses (cf. vv. 15 and 45–46 framing the curses) suggesting that they may be later insertions in the composition. A series of sometimes parallel, sometimes chiasmic citations and allusions across the two major sections up to v. 46 (cf. vv. 1–2 with 15, 3–6 with 16–19, 7 with 25, 8 with 20–21, 9–11 with 36–37, and 12–13 with 43–46) complements the framework, sets the curses and blessings in an inverse relationship and confirms suspicions regarding the secondary character of vv. 47–68. Three sections within vv. 15–46 have no parallels to the blessings and, consequently, may also be secondary.

The blessings (28:1–14) contain four familiar themes: (1) the charge to heed Yahweh and do his commandments, (2) the promise that, in view of such obedience, Yahweh will elevate Israel on the world stage (cf. vv. 9–13a), (3) the admonition against straying either "to the right or to the left," and (4) the excoriation of idolatry. The blessings offer something new, however, Yahweh's offer of bounty and security. Verses 3–6 seem to be a coherent, probably liturgical, collection of blessings that probably predated the larger composition; it may have been the seed that gave rise to the larger unit. Their offer of bounty in every aspect of agrarian life resurfaces in the more general promise of v. 8. Yahweh also promises Israel security against attack. The promise of international prominence differs in perspective. This Israel does not reside at home, secure from attack, but steps onto the international stage as the aggressor. Its enemies will fear. Israel's bounty will be the envy of the world and the source of the capital that will permit it to lend without borrowing (v. 12).

The covenant curses (28:15–46) appear as inversions of the blessing (cf., e.g., vv. 3–6 and 16–19). The themes of bounty, security, and prominence are both inverted and reordered. The "Yahweh will smite" sayings and the futility curses interrupt this structure and take up novel themes, "madness" and "pestilence," suggesting that they represent editorial insertions in their current context.

Whereas the blessings promise bounty, the curses threaten that infidelity will bring natural disasters that will turn bounty into deprivation, ultimately resulting in Israel's demise (vv. 20, 21, 22, 24). Illnesses, weather disasters, and plant diseases (v. 22) will ensue. While obedience motivates Yahweh to open his "storehouse" (v. 12), infidelity moves him to withhold the rains. In a striking metaphor, he will turn the heavens to bronze so that the earth below will become iron (v. 23). Obedience brings Israel security; infidelity subjects Israel to the fate that should pertain to its enemies. Israel will flee in chaos; Israelites will die in battle to be left unburied on the battlefield (cf. 21:22–23).

Verse 27 begins a series of interruptions and displacements. First, it introduces material that does not mirror, as expected, the "prominence" theme, but deals instead with "pestilence," specifically various skin ailments and lesions that will befall disobedient Israel. Second, it stands apart from vv. 28–34, which deal, instead, with "madness." The motif of "pestilence" reappears only in vv. 35–42, which may have been the original context for v. 27. Disregarding v. 27, vv. 28–34 represent a coherent and cohesive exposition of the madness that will come upon unfaithful Israel. Blind and bewildered, confused and disoriented, Israel will become easy prey for its enemies (v. 29). A sequence of futility curses depicts circumstances certain to bring madness (v. 34). A range of apparent blessings become void before Israel's eyes—brides will be raped; houses and vineyards abandoned.

Verse 27 departs from the "madness" theme, but fits well in the discussion of physical destruction and deterioration in vv. 35–42. In contrast, vv. 36–37 seem to belong better with vv. 43–44. The verses depicting "madness" reflect situations involving human agents that cause Israel's suffering, those recounting "pestilence" materials deal with natural pests and decay. "Yahweh will smite" sayings are coupled with futility curses describing hope disappointed by decay and destruction.

The counterpart to vv. 12b–13a also views Israel's fate in local terms whereas the interpolation in vv. 36–37 takes a much grander view. Israel becomes the victim of an aggressively expansionistic world empire. This interpolation succinctly anticipates the Babylonian crisis, employing key features of the dominant theology of the Babylonian period (sixth-century BCE): Israel's kings will have misled their people; Israel's infidelity will result in exile where Israel will be compelled to worship strange gods; Israel will be scattered among the nations. Disobedience will threaten Israel's national survival.

A reprise of v. 15 in v. 45 is coupled with the statement that the covenant curses will function forever as a "sign" for Israel. This statement participates in the overall structural scheme for Deut 27–34. Deuteronomy describes each of the institutions and offices discussed in this section in turn as "signs," "testimonies," or "witnesses" to the nature and purpose of God's covenant. Moses will cease to lead God's people, but they will not be left without guides: Joshua and his successors, the Song of Moses, the memorial stones on Gerizim and Ebal, the tablets of the covenant. The people cannot plead ignorance of the covenant.

Nothing of the intricate structure that shapes vv. 1–46 continues into vv. 47–68. Whereas the topics of vv. 1–46 are natural phenomena and Israel's fate among its neighbors, vv. 27–68 describe very specifically the fates of a nation besieged and exiled (cf. the allusions to bondage in vv. 60, 68). The tone becomes much more acrid, threatening not correction but annihilation. Notably, the mood shifts from the conditionals of curses and blessings to a narrative unmistakably mirroring the crises when the Assyrian and Babylonian armies attacked Israel in the eighth and sixth centuries, respectively. Finally, vv. 47–68 seem to be aware of Deuteronomy as a book (vv. 58, 61), suggesting that an earlier form of the book already existed when this interpolation was added. These observations strongly suggest that vv. 47–68 constitute an expansion to the curses material intended to draw the connection between the warnings voiced in vv. 16–46 and the horrors Israel/Judah actually experienced at, especially, the hands of Babylon.

While vv. 1–46 follow a thematic arrangement, vv. 47–57 narrate, in great and graphic detail, a linear plot: (1) Ungrateful (instead of the expected disobedient) Israel fails to serve Yahweh wholeheartedly so that God hands them over to an enemy (vv. 47–48). (2) This enemy (described much as sixth-century authors described Babylon; cf. Jer 4:13; 5:15) comes from far away, swooping like an eagle, speaking a foreign language, and showing no compassion (vv. 49–50). (3) The enemy will burn, pillage, and destroy without restraint (vv. 51–52). (d) Israel's reaction will be even more horrendous than the invader's tactics. Under siege, the nobility will be reduced to cannibalism, eating their own children and refusing to share the flesh (vv. 53–57; cf. 2 Kgs 6:24–32 and Lam 2:20; 4:10).

The final section (vv. 58–68) offers theological commentary on the preceding materials and introduces the topic of exile (vv. 64–68). A number of features suggest that it represents the final stage in the literary growth of Deut 28: (a) The commentary seems to have in view the book of Deuteronomy, which it describes as "this book of the Torah" (v. 61). (b) Similarly, the reference to the patriarchs seems to reflect knowledge of the written patriarchal tradition. (c) It seems to assume that its readers are already in the land (v. 63).

The memory of Egyptian bondage hovers over both of the two sub-sections of the unit (vv. 58–62, the contents of the book of the Torah; vv. 58–63, exile). The first subsection admonishes Israel to observe the provisions in the book lest God bring upon them every calamity described, and even some "not recorded in this book" (v. 61), resulting in total destruction. The book is the key to Israel's survival. The text then turns to a renewed description of exile. Methodically, it describes the experience of banishment from the land, of dispersal among the nations, of coerced idolatry, and, ultimately, of despair. Disobedience will, in essence, result in a return to slavery from which there will be no redemption, because Israel will have chosen this course.

III. Moses' Third Speech: Succession and Farewell (29:1–34:12)

Deuteronomy 29:1 may introduce Moses' third major speech or conclude Deut 4:1–28:68. Regardless of one's judgment about this issue, the material in this section depicts a Moab covenant, distinct from the Horeb covenant. The notion of a covenant made in Moab is complicated for two reasons: first, Deuteronomy has consistently maintained the exclusivity of the Horeb covenant (see 4:10–14), and second, Deut 29–32 contains a collection focused around the theme of decision in transition, not a covenant. Its three subsections (Deut 29–30, a covenant sermon; Deut 31, Moses' parting address and the transfer of leadership; and Deut 32, the "Song of Moses") summarize and reprise the great Deuteronomic ideas.

A. Covenant Renewal in Moab (29:1–30:20)

The reference to a covenant ceremony stands alone, serving a solely homiletical purpose, calling upon Israel to choose life! Even its structure points to its homiletical nature: It discusses the covenant past (29:2–8), present (29:9–15), and future (29:16–29; 30:1–10) as the motivation for a call to decision (30:11–20).

The retrospective (past) briefly recalls events discussed earlier (to v. 2 cf. 4:34; 7:19–20; 10:21–22; etc.; to v. 3 cf. 4:34; 7:19; etc.). Such retrospectives, which characterize Deuteronomistic literature (e.g., Josh 24:1–13), rehearse the basis for Israel's confidence in Yahweh's gracious favor. The long history of Yahweh's benevolence contrasts with Israel's historical failure to understand (v. 3 [4]).

The text shifts to the narrative present (cf. v. 8 [9]), reprising a number of themes: obedience and prosperity (v. 9), the all-Israel character of the covenant (vv. 10–11, 14–15), and the "voluntary" nature of Israel's participation in the covenant relationship (v. 12). The dialectic implicit in vv. 12–13 expresses a key biblical polarity: the legal, contractual nature of covenant and the free, unmerited nature of promise (see above on 7:6–16).

The discussion turns from present to future, promise to pessimism. It assumes that Israel will inevitably stray from the covenant. Alternatively, this section may constitute an editorial on Israel's actual history of unfaithfulness. Regardless, two cases of disloyalty form the focus: secret individual or group disloyalty (vv. 16–21) and national apostasy (vv. 22–29). As early as the wilderness, Israel became familiar with "detestable things," idols of wood and stone, gold and silver (vv. 16–17). Even an individual or a small group attracted to worship these idols can poison the entire nation (v. 18). Should such apostasy occur, the text warns, Yahweh will take severe action. It violates the very foundation of Israel's relationship with Yahweh—Yahweh's absolute claim to Israel's devotion. Infidelity will invoke "every curse recorded in this book" (v. 20).

The second subsection contemplates the reaction of post-catastrophe generations (and foreigners) to the total destruction of the land as the result of such apostasy. The tone reflects either an assumption that Israel will inevitably fail or historical knowledge that Israel has, in fact, failed. The result will be or has been a desolate land and an exiled people. In the future (from Moses' perspective), Israel will lie smitten, unproductive, like Sodom and Gomorrah, devastated. In response to the question, "Why?" passers-by will formulate Deuteronomic/Deuteronomistic theology: This desolation occurred "because they abandoned the covenant of Yahweh, . . . they followed after and served other gods . . . and Yahweh's anger burned against this land. . . . Yahweh sent them away from their land" (vv. 25–27). The proverbial conclusion unites the sub-sections: private apostasy cannot be hidden from Yahweh; it will eventually have public ramifications.

Deuteronomy does not grant finality to the assumption that Israel will inevitably stray and suffer Yahweh's displeasure. Even beyond that future horror, it argues, will lie a future restoration. One day, exiled Israel will "return to [its] heart" (v. 1), initiating a process of return and restoration. Links to earlier sections demonstrate such events will constitute Israel's return to life in covenant with Yahweh (e.g., citations of the Shema in vv. 2, 6, 10) including return from exile (v. 5). The word-play manifest in vv. 1–10 on the Hebrew word that can be translated "to repent," "to return" or "to restore" is theologically significant. When Israel repents, Israel can return because Yahweh will restore. At the core of the term is the image of turning around. In the Hebrew Bible/Old Testament, repentance is not an emotion or a feeling (i.e., "regret") but an action, a change of direction: Israel will one day "return to its senses" (v. 1), choosing to direct its step solely toward Yahweh and according to his will (vv. 2, 8, 20); in response, Yahweh will reassert his intention to bless Israel (vv. 3, 9). At the very center of this discussion of repentance (v. 6), one finds a fundamental question. Why must Israel repent? Why has Israel so long been stiff-necked and rebellious? Deuteronomy asserts that something has been amiss with Israel's "heart," its organ of decision and volition. The problem has not been ignorance; Israel knows the Decalogue, the revealed will of God. The problem has not been capability; Yahweh's principles for living are not beyond humanity's abilities. No, the problem seems to have been intention, desire, volition. Israel knew what was right; Israel could easily have done what was right; Israel did not want to do right, however. The solution? Yahweh will "circumcise" Israel's heart, enabling repentance and return.

Like all good sermons, this unit concludes with a call to decision. The options have been laid before the reader. In a final effort to anticipate possible objections, vv. 11–14 make two significant claims: first, the covenant does not make impossible demands and, second, God's expectations are not mysterious. Christian theology, emphasizing the universality of human sin, is sometimes uncomfortable with Deuteronomy's claim that keeping the covenant is not that difficult. One stream of Christian theology has even suggested that human beings, after the Fall, are so depraved that doing right is impossible. Deuteronomy argues, rather, that human beings are capable, but unwilling to do right. Further, the basic principles of life in relationship with Yahweh have been clearly announced and carefully explained. God, in God's grandeur, may be mysterious, but God's will for humankind is, or should be, "on your lips and in your heart" (v. 14).

Deuteronomy has presented ancient Israel and all subsequent readers with a choice. They can choose faithful relationship and life or infidelity and, cut off from the source of life, death. The most profound matters are often that simple.

B. Moses' Successors (31:1–32:47)

Deuteronomy turns attention to pragmatic concerns at this moment of transition, in particular, to questions surrounding Moses' departure. Stylistic features (e.g., first person divine speech) of this section reveal its complex compositional history (repetitions such as vv. 6–7 and 23 and discontinuities such as those between vv. 15–16 and 22–23; etc.). The narrative recounts and interprets events from Israel's distant past, continuing the account broken off in 3:23–29. Together with Deut 1–3, this material forms the framework to the book, probably representing the last stage in its growth and integrating Deuteronomy into the "Deuteronomistic History."

The structure of the narrative highlights the ways in which Israel can think about a time after the death of Moses: Joshua will succeed Moses (vv. 1–8, 14–15 and 23), the Torah scroll will bear witness to the covenant with Yahweh (vv. 9–13, 24–29), and the Song of Moses will bear witness to Moses' wisdom long after his parting (vv. 16–22). The resulting structure (ABACAB) calls attention to the interrelationship of these three "successors" to Moses.

31:1–8. Joshua. Ancient manuscripts offer conflicting testimony about whether this unit continues the speech recorded in Deut 29–30 or marks the beginning of a new one. In either case, its substance revolves around Moses' health (v. 2) and the fact that he will not enter the promised land. How can they go on without Moses, their only leader, the covenant-bringer, an intimate companion of God? First, even during Moses' lifetime, Israel's true guide was Yahweh. This relationship will neither end nor alter. Second, in principle, Moses has been Yahweh's spokesman. Joshua and others after him will now fill that role.

31:9–13. The Torah Scroll. The biblical texts that discuss Joshua's commission imply one difference between Moses and Joshua, however. None mention that Joshua will succeed Moses as the chief interpreter of the covenant. Instead, he is to be Israel's military leader. After Moses, it seems, "this Torah," Deuteronomy, the record of Moses' principles of Torah interpretation, will be the foundation for Israel's tradition of Torah interpretation. While priests will bear particular responsibility for studying and applying the principles in "this Torah," it will, nonetheless, be the heritage of all Israel, to whom it will be publicly read on a sevenyear cycle. Moses insists that the study of the Torah results in obedience. All future generations of Israel must take great care that knowledge of the Torah be perpetuated.

31:14–22. Moses' Song. In this second sequence, Yahweh addresses Moses directly concerning the urgency of this transition (v. 14). The mood is unprecedented in Deuteronomy. This is the only reference to the tent of meeting in the book. Here only does God appear in the book. Moses' death is near; God is present; leader and successor stand in the divine presence. The stage is set.

Yahweh interrupts the commissioning of Moses to compose a song (vv. 16–18). Every indicator marks vv. 16–21 as an insertion. It interrupts; it describes the Song in terms usually reserved for the Torah (to vv. 19, 21–22; cf., e.g., 4:1, 5, 10, 14; 5:31; 27:3, 8; 30:14); the sequence of events remains unclear; the Song, itself, will appear only later. Nonetheless, the rhetorical purpose of the Song is clear (vv. 19–22). It calls attention to the fact that, like Joshua, Moses' personal successor, and the Torah scroll, Moses' authoritative principles of interpretation, the Song will bear witness to the covenant's central claim: Israel's fidelity is to Yahweh alone.

31:23. Joshua. Verse 23 offers the content of Yahweh's commission stated in vv. 14–15. Yahweh's statement repeats vv. 7–8. Now, however, Yahweh does not speak through Moses, but directly to Moses' successor.

31:24–29. The Torah Scroll. The sequence of events has become wholly confused. Has Moses already written the Torah (v. 9) or does he do so now (v. 24)? Because Moses expects Israel to rebel soon and severely, he accentuates the roles of the Ark of the Covenant, the Torah, and the Song as "witnesses" against them in that rebellious future. The Torah scroll, bearing the commandments and Moses' model for interpreting them, will leave them without excuse. Invoking even heaven and earth to witness his admonitions, Moses offers the Torah as the instrument for interpreting not only God's will but Israel's history.

31:30–32:47. Moses' Song. One of the most intriguing passages in the Bible, it is redundant (vv. 48–52; 44–47) in its context. It exhibits affinities with non-Deuteronomic material (cf. Num 20:1–13 and 27:12–14); ancient manuscripts offer significantly different readings; its language intermixes archaic and late biblical Hebrew, first and third person speech, and an array of theological stances—all with parallels in several similar didactic Psalms (esp. 78 and 82); references to Israel's history entice historians, but are vague enough ultimately to frustrate attempts to clearly identify places and times (e.g., the unnamed enemy). Nevertheless, this Song transforms the book of Deuteronomy into a key for understanding Israel's history.

The Song functions on many levels: as Moses' address to the people (31:30), as a witness to the covenant (32:1), as Moses' teaching (32:2), and as a summons to praise (32:3). This interplay of law, instruction, and praise is pregnant theologically. It reminds readers of the instructional purpose of the law and of the ultimate objective of both law and instruction, namely, life lived in worship of God.

The Song's basic thesis is that, despite Yahweh's fidelity, Yahweh's people repeatedly and ineluctably break faith. It begins as a hymn in praise of "the Rock," a relatively common epithet (1 Sam 2:2; Isa 17:10; Hab 1:12; Ps 19:15[14 Eng]) accentuating God's constancy and reliability. "The Rock" always acts with integrity, justly, and without caprice. These statements focus on observable behaviors. Yahweh has been and ever will be faithful in relationship to his people. Israel, on the other hand, behaves corruptly; with twisted, blemished motives, it is altogether unreliable (v. 5). Israel breaks faith with a parent (v. 6) whose love and loyalty are rock firm.

Rather than merely assert Yahweh's loyalty, the Song documents it: in Israel's election (vv. 8–9), during the wilderness period (vv. 10–12) and in the upcoming fulfillment of the promise of the land (vv. 13–14). Indeed, God's fidelity has roots before history when "God Most High" chose not to assign Israel to any of his assistants (v. 8–9). God's fidelity reaches back to the beginning of their national existence when Yahweh discovered them in the harsh desert (cf. Hos 2:16–17 [14–15 Eng]; Jer 2:2–3; Ezek 16) and guarded them as a most cherished possession. God taught fledgling Israel to fly, always vigilant to guide and protect (v. 11). Finally, Yahweh's provision and protection manifest themselves in the rich abundance of the promised land. Yahweh's steadfastness is sure.

Israel did not respond to Yahweh's provision with gratitude and obedience, but with arrogance and a sense of entitlement. Israel should remember Yahweh's deliverance from Egyptian bondage, Yahweh's guidance and provision in the wilderness, Yahweh's gracious gift of the land. Yet, prosperity will obscure their memory. The Song compares this unfathomable behavior to that of a wild animal (v. 15). "Jeshurun" is an infrequent term for Israel with obscure roots (v. 15; see also Isa 1:3). The final form of the Song represents the awareness that the book actually addresses generations of readers. An aside abandons narrative to confront directly these readers who "grew fat" and rebelled. Of course, Israel's ingratitude expressed itself as idolatry. Israel turned to novelties, turning its back on Yahweh. To emphasize adequately the horror of Israel's behavior, the Song likens it to that of an ungrateful child who neglects his or her parent. "The Rock" (Yahweh) has been steadfast, Israel has wavered like a spoiled child. The final verse comes very close to applying maternal imagery to Yahweh. Significantly, "father" is a theological metaphor; this text, at least, suggests that God also behaves toward his children as does a "mother."

"Yahweh saw" all this apostasy and was moved to turn away, hiding his face, allowing Israel to experience what it seems to want—life apart from Yahweh's provision and protection. Exposed, Israel will experience the full force of Yahweh's absence: no rain, famine, illness, infestation of vermin. The whole cosmos will suffer (v. 22) and Israelite society will collapse (v. 25).

Yahweh's deliberations take a new turn (v. 26). Thinking beyond just what Israel deserves, Yahweh anticipates that Israel's enemy will likely have no greater understanding (v. 28) than does Israel, and may misinterpret events as evidence that Yahweh was impotent to provide for his people. The enemy's arrogance, moreover, suggests a comparison with Sodom and Gomorrah!

How can Yahweh's profound love for Israel, Israel's ingratitude, and the arrogance of Israel's enemies be reconciled in the course of human history? Yahweh announces in vv. 34–35 that he will mete out "vengeance" and "repayment" when the time is right. But upon whom? Israel or its equally deserving enemy? One might expect Israel to be the target, but situated immediately following vv. 26–33, which turn attention to Israel's enemy, the likeliest interpretation is that Yahweh will not allow the enemy's arrogant assumption that Yahweh is powerless to go unchecked. Indeed, the opposite is true; the enemy was only able to prevail over Israel because Yahweh allowed it! Yahweh will indeed "vindicate" Israel—but not before visiting upon it the consequences of its apostasy.

The ambiguity that continues to surface (vv. 37–38, 41–42) concerning the identity of Yahweh's "adversaries" (v. 41) accentuates the overall theme of Yahweh's lordship over human history. Yahweh holds both Israel and the foreign nations accountable. Any nation can become Yahweh's enemy by failing or refusing to recognize his exclusive sovereignty over human history (vv. 39b–42). Yahweh "will repay those who hate [him]," whether the haters be Israel or Babylon! The ambiguity concerning the targets of Yahweh's anger that runs throughout the second half of the Song is integral to the message of the Song. Who are these enemies of Yahweh? Everyone is a candidate.

The manuscript evidence for the text of v. 43 suggests a complicated historical problem. The likely earliest reading found in a Qumran manuscript and supported by the Septuagint, depicts Yahweh at the head of the heavenly council whose members bear responsibility for guiding the affairs of the nations. Again, the underlying theological assumption is that Yahweh cannot rule the world as though Israel, his chosen, alone can claim Yahweh's justice. Yahweh cannot favor Israel to the disadvantage of the other nations of the world. Indeed, Israel's role in human history is that of mediator (cf. Gen 12:1–3).

At last, the Song, and with it the Torah, come to an end (32:44–47). The conclusion returns to narrative. Moses and Joshua conclude the public reading of the Song and admonish the audience to consider it and to obey the Torah, therein lay life and prosperity (v. 47). Joshua appears as "Hoshea" here (cf. Num 13:8, 16; 32:44).

C. Moses' Death (32:48–34:12).

32:48–52. Predicted. Yahweh informs Moses of certain details concerning his impending death. Moses is to ascend Mt. Nebo where he will die, just as Aaron had died atop Mt. Hor (Num 33:38–39) and for the same reason (cf. Num 20:1–13). From the vantage point of Mt. Nebo, Moses will be permitted to survey the promised land, but not to enter it. The material is repetitive, but significant because of its affinities with Priestly perspectives on Moses' death (cf. Num 27:12–14).

33:1–29. Moses' Farewell Blessing. Moses' final address contains his blessings for the individual tribes (cf. Gen 27:27–29, 39–40; 49:1–28); in effect, the whole book represents Moses' parting words to Israel. Together with Moses' Song, these blessings replicate Deuteronomy's blessing and curse pattern. The framework surrounding the Deuteronomistic Code subsumes the law code into a larger context of teaching, admonition, promise, and warning.

Much suggests that Moses' blessings derive from a period late in the book's growth: historical references reflect the monarchial period; it has a psalmic framework (vv. 2–5, 26–29); Moses is spoken of in the third person; and the theology and diction are uncharacteristic of Deuteronomy ("man of God," v. 1; Sinai, v. 2; Jeshurun, v. 5; etc.). The blessings mirror particular moments in Israel's history. Further, many of the tribes addressed had already virtually ceased to exist well before the exile. The psalmic framework, finally, recontextualizes these blessings, and the whole composition has been further recontextualized: the law code concludes with a psalm of praise!

Deuteronomy 33:1 offers no narrative setting. Yahweh "shines forth" from Mount Paran "with myriads of holy ones at his right hand." The Hebrew is replete with obscurities, translation difficulties, and interpretive challenges. The unexpected, but not unique reference to Sinai, Seir, and Paran (see Exod 15:15; Judg 5:4–5; Hab 3:3; Ps 68:8) reflects ancient traditions. Who are the "holy ones"? Israel as in v. 3 or the heavenly hosts as in Num 10:36; Ps 3:6; Dan 11:12? Who are "the peoples" whom Yahweh loves? Israel's tribes (vv. 2, 3; cf. v. 5) or the nations of the world? The psalm concludes with a clause that celebrates Yahweh's rule over his people (cf. v. 26).

In contrast with Jacob's blessings (Gen 49), Moses' blessings generally focus on some undertaking of the tribe instead of a salient characteristic. Hence, they sometimes provide tantalizing data for the task of historical reconstruction.

Moses' blessing for Reuben exemplifies the contrast between Deut 32 and Gen 49. Jacob condemned his firstborn for the Bilhah incident (Gen 35:22). Moses offers a limited pardon. Reuben will survive, at least. Similarly, whereas Jacob emphasized Judah's role as leader, Moses prays for Yahweh's assistance against Judah's enemies, which may reflect hopes for the restoration of the united monarchy ("one people," v. 5). The contrast between Jacob's and Moses' blessings for Levi could hardly be sharper. Jacob refers to the dangerous revenge taken against Shechem (Gen 34) when he foretells the dispersal of Levi (and Simeon—Moses' blessing omits Simeon altogether). Moses views this scattering as a function of Levi's priestly role and relates Levi's reputation for revenge to the annihilation of idolaters after the golden calf affair (Exod 32:26–29). Again, Moses' blessing for Benjamin contrasts sharply with Jacob's focus on his son's "ravenous" appetite. Moses echoes the status of Benjamin's eponymous ancestor as his father's favorite, depicting the tribe as dwelling "between his hills/shoulders." The most direct blessing goes to Joseph who will know agricultural bounty, military success, and political supremacy (v. 16, the northern kingdom, also known as Ephraim). Zebulun and Issachar commonly appear together. In the far northwest, they faced significant challenges. Zebulunites, neighbors of the Phoenicians, alone among Israel's tribes, went to sea while Issacharites (note the etymology of the name, Gen 30:14–18) were hired laborers. The thrust of Moses' blessing, however, deals with the sanctuary the two tribes shared in the north (v. 19; perhaps Mt. Tabor, see Hos 5:1). Given Deuteronomy's insistence on cultic centralization, this affirmation ("right sacrifices") surprises, as does the statement that this sanctuary will attract worshipers from the nations. Gad's territory in the Transjordan was the object of territorial wars throughout Israel's national existence. Syria, Ammon, Israel, and, sometimes, Judah all claimed the territory (see Judg 3:12–14; 1 Sam 11:1–11; Amos 1:3). Dan set out from its original home between Judah and Ephraim for more space, capturing Laish near Mt. Hermon (Josh 19:40–48; Judg 18:1–31). Moses' blessing involves a play on words with the meaning of Laish, "lion." Dan is a lion's whelp. Moses affirms Naphtali's expansion from south of Hermon toward the Sea of Galilee as Yahweh's blessing. Although Asher held prime agricultural land, it was also situated along a path often traveled by campaigning armies. Its name may be etymologically related to words for "blessed/fortunate" or for "foot." Moses' blessing plays on all these circumstances: blessed, foot, (olive) oil, with bars of iron as protection against invading armies.

A psalm (33:26–29) completes the poetic frame. Israel's God is incomparable. Israel is incomparably blessed (asher) with protection and bounty.

34:1–12. Moses' Death. Deuteronomy ends enigmatically, combining Deuteronomic tradition (cf. 34:1b–6 and 31:23–29) with material (vv. 7–9) akin to the "Priestly" tradition (cf. Num 27:18), juxtaposing the two major traditions concerning Moses' prohibition from entering the promised land with a unique tradition defending Moses' reputation (vv. 10–11).

Atop Mt. Nebo, Moses commanded a view of the promised land, according to the text, thereby at least symbolically taking possession of the land. Still, he was not permitted to enter. As important as Moses may have been, not even he, accompanied Israel to its final destination. Moses' life is complete, but the story of Yahweh's relationship with Israel is not. When Moses had earlier ascended a mountain and did not return quickly, the insecure people resorted to idolatry. What will they do now that Moses will never return?

Deuteronomy first reports Moses' death (120 years old, still strong and healthy, v. 7; but contrast 31:1–8). He was not sick and had not been injured. He had simply completed his task. Israel mourned his passing for the extraordinary period of a month (v. 8) before Joshua took the reins of leadership (v. 9). The foundation for Israel's future had been firmly established. Now, a new generation with a new leader would face new challenges of life in the promised land.

Always, however, Deuteronomy bears witness to the covenant, to a tradition of covenantal interpretation, to covenant blessings and curses, and to the call to choose life over death. An editor concluded Deuteronomy with an evaluation of Moses' unique stature. As prophet, friend of God, and mediator of Yahweh's power, Moses was absolutely unparalleled (vv. 10–12).

JOSHUA

RICHARD HESS

OVERVIEW

The book of Joshua is named for its dominant human character. The name Joshua derives from the Hebrew root "to save" (Heb.: yasha'). The figure of Joshua first appears in Exod 17, where he leads the Israelites in their battle against the Amalekites. Joshua is Moses' assistant and qualified to assume the role of his successor. From the perspective of plot, the book moves Israel from its wilderness wanderings to its victories in Canaan and its allotment of that land.

From the perspective of textual criticism, the Masoretic Text and the Septuagint texts of these books have several important differences. Chief among these are the different positions of the Mount Ebal altar account. In the MT it appears in Josh 8:30–35, while in the LXX it occurs at the beginning of ch. 5. The Qumran evidence, chiefly 4QJosa and 4QJosb, share the position of the altar story with the LXX. 4QJosa adds an additional and otherwise unattested paragraph after the altar account and before Josh 5:2. The MT and LXX also differ in many details of the place names in chs. 13–21. For example, after Josh 15:59, there is an additional district (that includes Bethlehem) in the LXX not present in the Judean districts of the MT. The LXX has a note after Josh 21:42 that does not appear in the MT. In Josh 24:29–31, the sequence of the leader's death and the note concerning Israel's faithfulness appear in different order in the two versions, with the LXX following the order of Judg 2:6–9. While recognizing the importance of the LXX, the MT text will be used throughout this commentary.

Given the close similarity in language and theology with Deuteronomy, this book has sometimes been understood as a seventh-century BCE composition that Josiah created in order to justify his plans for the expansion of the Judean kingdom. Some scholars have spoken of the first six books of the Hebrew Bible as a Hexateuch that existed as a single unit until the danger of such a propagandistic book as Joshua in the period of the Persian Empire (with its emphasis on the divine gift of land on both sides of the Jordan River that included much more territory than the small province of Yehud) caused it to be separated from the Pentateuch and hidden or at least de-emphasized. The book forms a part of what has been termed the Deuteronomistic History; i.e., the narrative sections of Deuteronomy followed by Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings.

Despite clear linguistic indications that the final edition of Joshua dates to the late Monarchy, there are hints in the text of greater antiquity than the seventh century BCE. Among these, the following may be noted. The descriptions of the borders of Canaan match those of Egypt's New Kingdom Empire in the second millennium BCE, but do not occur later. The Hivites, the Perizzites, and the Girgashites of Josh 3:10 have all been identified with proper names or elements of such names found in second millennium BCE extrabiblical texts, but which do not appear in later periods. Specifics surrounding the stories of Rahab (a woman managing an inn on the city wall), Jericho (the divinely caused collapse of the walls), and Achan (the wedge [literally "tongue"] of gold) all have parallels found in Hittite and Babylonian texts of the second millennium BCE, but not later. The names of the Canaanite and Amorite kings in Josh 10 and 11 (as well as the name Rahab), and of the sons of the Anakim (Josh 15:14) all have their closest parallels with personal names of the second millennium BCE but not later. Some of these, such as Piram, Sheshai, and Talmai, seem to be Hurrian; a language and culture for which there is no evidence after the tenth century BCE.

Modern literary methods have appreciated the tensions within the text at numerous places, e.g., the apparently repeated crossings of the Jordan River in Josh 3–4 and the observations that all the land was subdued versus the lists of unconquered territories and cities in Josh 13–21. Comparative approaches have noted the similarity between the book as a whole and early West Semitic land grants. Indeed, one grant of the city of Alalakh is particularly important. This city is located north of ancient Israel, near to the New Testament site of Antioch. It shared Israel's West Semitic language background and culture. The cuneiform tablet discovered there dates from the early second millennium BCE. It parallels the book of Joshua with a history of a war necessary to acquire the territory, a list of towns so obtained, and a covenantmaking ceremony that formally ratifies the gift from the greater king to his vassal in exchange for the exclusive loyalty of the vassal. This same pattern occurs in the book of Joshua. Chapters 1–12 describe the war that resulted in the acquisition of the land. It constituted a battle led by "the greater king," in this case the God of Israel. There follow town lists and boundary descriptions that define the gift of the land and the places in it. This material appears in chs. 13–21 of Joshua. Finally, there is the covenant renewal in which the people pledge their exclusive loyalty to God and, in return, they receive the land as a gift for that loyalty. This occurs clearly in Josh 24, but is anticipated in Josh 8:30–35 and in chs. 22 and 23.

Theological emphases in the book include the importance of obedience to God's instructions, the danger of division and loss of unity, the gift of the land as God's covenant blessing to the people of Israel, and God's holiness that will allow for no compromise. Probably the chief theological issue in the text of Joshua is the question as to how a loving God could command Israel to commit genocide against the people of Canaan. While part of this problem concerns texts outside of Joshua, such as Deut 20, a few observations should be made here regarding what the text actually says as opposed to what is often assumed. Israel does indeed attack Jericho and Ai. The absence of archaeological evidence for Canaanite occupation of these sites is well known. However, this absence may also suggest that these sites were not civilian population centers but rather military forts, perhaps constructed in part from preexisting walls. This may explain why nowhere in the text are specific noncombatants mentioned aside from Rahab and her family. Indeed, the lists of slain in Josh 6:21 and 8:25 may be stereotypic rather than intended to specify particular groups such as non-combatants. Beyond this, the remaining wars of Israel in Josh 9 and 10 are defensive. In both cases, either Israel or its ally is attacked and Israel must defend itself to survive. Even in the sequence of attacks on the various Canaanite cities in these chapters, it is important to keep in mind that they took place after the major battles. The civilians, with their armies decimated, would not have been likely to seek shelter in the fortress cities. Instead, they would have fled into the rural hills and have hidden. This view is supported in its context by the subsequent generation where plenty of Canaanites appear for intermarriage and contacts (Judg 2:10–12). That is not to say that no civilians were killed. However, the narrative of Joshua can be read without explicit evidence of widespread genocide.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Israel's Victories Against the Canaanites (1–12)

A. Joshua Establishes His Leadership (1:1–18)

The first chapter of Joshua is sometimes ignored as a mere collection of phrases gathered from Deuteronomy. However, it provides the crucial story of the transition from the death of Moses to the establishment of a new leader for the nation of Israel. As such, it is unique in biblical literature. The text represents one of the finest collections of exhortations on leadership found in the OT and one of the most important sources for a study of the subject. Within a narrative describing the transition of leadership, these eighteen verses depict the key features of leadership as understood by the OT in terms of God's sovereign choice, the privileges and responsibilities that accompany that call, and the manner in which Joshua establishes the recognition of such leadership at a crucial moment in Israel's history.

The first five verses of the chapter also form a Table of Contents for the whole book of Joshua. The divine speech lays out the manner in which God will work for the people of Israel to bring them into the land and to give it to them. The remainder of the chapter places its emphases on the call for faithfulness to God's Word and on the enlistment of all the tribes of Israel, even those who already possess their inheritance. This section foreshadows the unity of Israel and its faithfulness before God throughout its battles, its allotments of land, and its covenant renewal.

1:1–9. God's Appointment of Joshua. Verse 1 establishes the death of Moses as a given fact, which emphasizes the need for a new leader to fill the power vacuum left by the death of the former one. The "servant of the LORD" describes Moses for the first time in Deut 34:5, at the death of the leader. In the same manner, Joshua will receive this accolade only at his death (Josh 24:29). The epithet measures the life of service of a person who receives it only after the life has been lived. Later OT literature uses it more generally. Jesus raises the relationship of his disciples from servants to friends (John 15:15), but apostles such as Paul continue to apply it in a spirit of joyful service (Rom 1:1).

Verse 2 outlines chs. 1–5 as it describes the crossing of the Jordan. The verb, "to cross" (Heb.: 'avar) refers to crossing the Jordan River and is a keyword repeated several times in the first five chapters (Josh 1:11; 2:10, 23; 3:1, 2, 4, 6, 11, 14, 16, 17; 4:1, 3, 5, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 22, 23; 5:1), tying together all the movement into this one great event. Likewise, the emphasis on "all this people" establishes the theological importance of the unity and totality of the nation in their loyalty to God and Joshua. When they are united, they know only victory. When they are divided, they experience only defeat.

Verse 3 promises victory "every place" that Israel goes. It anticipates the victorious battles of chs.

6–12. The "every," like the "all" of v. 2, translates the same Hebrew word, kol, and cor relates the unity of the people with the complete fulfillment of the promise of the land. Although the promise was originally given to Abram (Gen 12:1–3 et passim), it is here ascribed to Moses, which recalls Deut 34:4. God gives all that was promised to Moses to his successor, Joshua.

Verse 4 describes southern Canaan (the wilderness), northern Canaan (the Lebanon), the north-eastern border of the Euphrates River, the Egyptian (and later Mesopotamian) term for northern Canaan (Hatti or Hittite land), and the western boundary of the Great Sea or Mediterranean. This forms the outline of Canaan as known to Egypt in the second millennium BCE and to Israel (Gen 10:19; Num 13:17, 21–22; 34:3–12). It summarizes the boundary descriptions of Josh 13–21.

Verse 5 emphasizes "all the days of your life." It looks forward to the final years of Joshua as outlined in chs. 22–24. This verse forms a hinge between the promises of vv. 1–5 and the responsibilities of vv. 5–9. The promise of God's presence here and in v. 9 enable the mission that Joshua and all Israel have received. If they are to enter and acquire the land, it will occur only because God is present with them to lead them to this goal. In fact, this phrase frames a chiasmic literary construction in vv. 5–9. Within this envelope lies the twofold command, "Be strong and courageous." This exhortation appears before a great task, whether the pursuit and defeat of the southern coalition (Josh 10:25), the construction of the Temple (1 Chr 28:20), or the defense of Jerusalem against Assyria (2 Chr 32:7). Between the second and third of these charges lay the threefold reference to the torah or instruction of Moses in vv. 7 and 8. Meditation and obedience lead to success. But within this chiasmic context, Joshua will not succeed because he obeys God's Word. Joshua will succeed because God is present with him to enable him to obey God's Word. Thus the mission and its success depend on God's presence in the same manner as the Great Commission of the New Testament that Jesus gives to his disciples depends on Jesus' presence with his disciples (Matt 28:18–20).

1:10–18. Joshua Recognized as Leader by Israel. Verses 10–11 describe Joshua's response to all Israel. The "officers of the people" are the civil counterparts to the priests, charged with administrative responsibilities (Exod 5:6–19; Deut 20:5–9). Joshua's practical implementation concludes with a recollection of God's promise in v. 2.

The unusual focus on the two and a half tribes in vv. 12–18 provides an example of Joshua's assumption of leadership at a point when he was most vulnerable. Moses had given these tribes their land and so they could expect no personal gain in following Joshua across the Jordan River and in risking their lives. Yet if Joshua could not command their allegiance in this matter, the unity of the tribes would fracture. This would politically compromise Joshua's leadership and theologically end the unity of Israel emphasized in v. 2. Joshua plays his "trump card" by calling upon Moses' own words from Deut 3:18–20. Moses placed a condition on the gift of the land to these tribes; they promised to follow Israel and fight with it west of the Jordan River. The tribes affirm their loyalty in an elaborate oath (vv. 16–18), an oath probably taken by the other tribes just as the Canaanite princes took an oath to each new pharaoh who gained power during the New Kingdom Empire. The Hebrew root for "rebels," mrd, occurs in Deuteronomy for crimes that carry the death penalty (Deut 1:26; 9:7, 23, 24; 21:18–21; 31:27). Thus the oath includes a curse so that the enemies of Joshua become the enemies of these tribes. The final phrase, "be strong and courageous," ties this incident with the earlier charge by God to Moses and confirms its place in the establishment of Joshua's leadership over Israel. Thus, God's leader is appointed by God and also recognized by all the people. The leader obeys God, and also identifies key areas of potential problems where proactive confrontation diffuses potential rebellion.

B. Rahab's Faith (2:1–24)

Rahab forms the Canaanite counterpart to Joshua, as the representative of her people who responds in faith to the divine message, and leads her people to salvation. The juxtaposition of this chapter immediately after ch. 1 demonstrates the grace of God made available to those of Canaan as well as Israel. The story begins with an assignment to spy out the land and ends with a tale of redemption for the spies as well as Rahab and her family.

2:1–8a. Rahab Hides the Spies. Joshua initiates this action just as he exercised leadership in 1:10–18. The word translated spies (Heb. meraggelim) appears in 2 Sam 15:10 to describe agents of Absalom who spread information, rather than those who gather it. The spies of Josh 2 do both, examining the land around Jericho and seeking supporters. Thus, they come to the house of Rahab the prostitute, most likely a hostel or inn for travelers. Here they might make contact with any who would ally with Israel. Obviously, they made their purpose known, for the king receives a report and searches for them. Rahab, however, has hidden them. Repetitions in the story emphasize the great risk that she takes: "search out the land," which describes the known purpose of the spies and clarifies that any aid would constitute aid to the enemy (vv. 2 and 3); "I did/do not know" demonstrates Rahab's willingness to lie to protect the spies and thus to risk her life if discovered (vv. 4 and 5); "the gate" closed or shut identifies how the only means of escape for the spies has been cut off, requiring the spies to rely completely on Rahab (vv. 5 and 7); and "on the roof" describes how thoroughly Rahab opened up her house to hide the spies (vv. 6 and 8).

2:8b–13. Rahab's Confession. Rahab begins what may be the longest prose speech by a woman in a biblical text. She asserts the positive statement beginning with "I know." This contrasts with what she did "not know" in conversation with the agents of the king. Her confession of faith in vv. 8–11 forms a chiasm framed by God's gift of the land and God's sovereignty in heaven and on earth. Within this envelope, the fear of the Canaanites appears in vv. 9b and 11a. In particular, the phrases "dread of you has fallen" and "melt in fear" recall the Song of the Sea's prophecy that this would happen to the Canaanites when they learned of Israel's defeat of Egypt (Exod 15:15b, 16a). Rahab's confession of this fulfillment introduces the heart of the chiasm, v. 10 and God's historic acts of redemption toward Israel at the Red Sea and with Sihon and Og, east of the Jordan River. Thus at the heart of Rahab's faith lies God's historic acts of redemption, just as in the New Testament Jesus' death and resurrection are the historic acts of redemption that form the basis for believers' faith (Rom 10:9).

In the second half of her monologue (vv. 12–13), Rahab turns to her request for aid from the spies. Her observation that she has "dealt kindly" with the spies uses a phrase consisting of the common verb, "to do, make" (Heb. 'asah) followed by the important noun for "love, covenantal loyalty" (Heb. khesed). This phrase appears in Gen 24:12 when the servant of Abraham searches for a wife for Isaac and prays that God may show her to him. It occurs in Exod 20:6 and Deut 5:10 where God "shows kindness" to thousands of generations of those who are obedient and loving. Thus, the phrase implies that "dealing kindly" points to the preservation of the family for future generations. This occurs with Rahab. She seeks a "sign of good faith" that the spies will preserve her family from death when Israel attacks Jericho. She explicitly mentions the members of her immediate family but not herself in the list of those to be saved. Her concern for her family outweighs matters of self-preservation.

2:14–21. The Negotiations. The spies' speech is recorded here for the first time. They seek from Rahab the guarantee that she will not tell Jericho's officials of their presence in the city or the region. They also indicate that Rahab's family must be in her house at the time of Israel's attack. Anyone outside will lose his or her life. Finally, they require a red cord to be tied to her window to identify her house. The presence of the family together in the house and something red at the door or (here) the window recalls the Passover that Israel will celebrate before it attacks Jericho. The original celebration of this festival required that all the family be together in their home and that they place the blood of the lamb on the doorposts of the house (Exod 12:1–14). Verse 15 describes how Rahab let the spies down from her window on the wall. However, to avoid the odd appearance of the spies negotiating (in vv. 16–20) while dangling on the wall or shouting from the ground below, it seems best to understand v. 15 as a summary statement that is followed by the details of the negotiations. Verse 21 concludes with the actual act of the spies' departure from Rahab's house.

2:22–24. The Spies Return to Joshua. Following the advice of Rahab, the spies remain hidden in the steep ascents to the west of Jericho, a source of innumerable hiding places. The "three days" of their remaining hidden may be a general length of time, or it may correspond to the three days of Josh 3:2. During this time, the camp of Israel prepares to cross the Jordan River. The spies cross the Jordan River (see comment on 1:2 for this verb) and return to Joshua. Their report does not consist of details concerning geography or of the defenses of Jericho. Instead, they quote the first part of Rahab's confession (Josh 2:9). One may compare the majority report of the ten spies at Kadesh Barnea who felt the land could not be taken due to the strength of the enemy (Num 13:28–33). The victory at Jericho will not be one of military strategy but rather one of faith in divine leadership.

C. Israel Crosses the Jordan (3:1–4:24)

For Israel to occupy the land, the nation needed to enter it. This required them to journey westward from Abel Shittim, where they had been camped since Num 25:1 (33:49), across the Jordan River and onto the plains of Jericho. God chose to mark this first passage of the nation into the promised land by a miracle corresponding to the crossing of the Red Sea (Exod 14—15). As there, the waters would "stand aside" and allow God's people to pass through on dry ground. This would happen in springtime when the Jordan River was at its widest and deepest, wider than its average of ninety to one hundred feet and deeper than the average three to ten feet. The current would then be at its strongest. However, unlike the previous generation, this one was not running from an enemy.

Instead, they organized and proceeded in a careful, ceremonial order. For this reason, the priests who carry the ark of the covenant took the place of priority in the crossing. Literarily, this account occupies a series of "panels," each of which focuses on a different group, that goes through two cycles: Josh 3:1–6, the tribes of Israel; Josh 3:7–13, Joshua; Josh 3:14–17, the priests; Josh 4:1–9, the stone bearers; Josh 4:10–13, the tribes of Israel; Josh 4:14, Joshua; Josh 4:15–18, the priests; Josh 4:19–24 the meaning of the stones. As in Exod 26–40 and the construction of the tabernacle, so here in this holy ceremony, divine instructions are given and there follows a word-for-word narrative that describes how these instructions were obeyed.

The "three days" of preparation (Josh 3:2) correspond to the three days that the spies remained in the region of Jericho (Josh 2:22). This anticipates careful coordination of time, festivals, and miracles that will continue into chs. 5 and 6. The distance of "two thousand cubits" that the people kept between the ark and themselves would equal three thousand feet or more than half a mile. This emphasized the holiness of the ark as the symbol of God's unique presence among the Israelites. The command for the people to "sanctify yourselves" recalls similar words at Mt. Sinai in Exod 19:10–15, where washing one's clothes and abstaining from sexual intercourse formed physical signs of the obedience. Consecration and preparation are key aspects of all ministry on behalf of God (Eph 6:10–18).

The miracle of the crossing serves to "begin to exalt" Joshua (Josh 3:7), so as to further confirm his position as successor to Moses, already discussed in ch. 1. Here Joshua will instruct the priests through whom the miracle will take place. The priests who bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord must march directly into the Jordan River. When they touch the water, they shall stand in it and the waters will cease to flow. This miracle will also assure the people that God will drive out the inhabitants of the land (Josh 3:9). Theologically, it demonstrates that God, symbolized by the ark, will not be thwarted in the divine plan by powerful forces of nature, such as the Jordan River in full flow. Thus, Israel will understand that, as it follows the presence of God, no barrier, natural or human, can stand in its way. Rivers dry up and walls collapse before the ongoing movement of the ark, of God, and of God's people. The priests regularly represent the people before God in presenting sacrifices (Lev 1–7, 16) and they represent God to the people in teaching about the divine will (Lev 10:10–11). Thus, the people see their ministers going before them in leadership and risking their lives as they plunge into the rushing current of the Jordan River. The people follow at a distance and, through the obedience and courageous leadership of their ministers, they come safely to the other shore.

The Adam of Josh 3:16 lies almost seventeen miles north of Jericho. Zarethan lies farther north. This miracle affected nearly thirty per cent of the Jordan Valley, a dramatic example of the "wonders" that God promised to do for Israel. Twelve stones symbolized the twelve tribes of Israel (Josh 4:2–3) and became a marker at Gilgal (the name means "circle," perhaps describing the circle of stones) where Israel first entered the promise land. They serve as a pedagogical tool to explain to each new generation the significance of the miracle at the Jordan River. In a similar fashion Christians undergo baptism and receive the bread and wine of communion to remember and to teach the meaning of their salvation to each generation of believers (Luke 22:19–20; 1 Cor 11:24–26; Rom 6:4; Col 2:12; 1 Pet 3:21). Israel will celebrate Passover at Gilgal in the next chapter. The Passover will take on new meaning, enhanced by the miraculous crossing of the Jordan River by this new generation.

D. Israel Celebrates Passover (5:1–12)

As the first Passover in Egypt, Israel celebrated deliverance from its enemy, the Egyptian king and his army. The Passover for this new generation anticipates the victory over the enemies who will gather against the new nation. The fear that these enemies experience is described with the same language as that used by Rahab in Josh 2:9. Joshua prepares knives, made of obsidian and potentially sharper than the metal blades of that time, to circumcise Israel. Just as the crossing of the Jordan imitates Israel's previous generation who crossed the Red Sea, so this generation needs to be circumcised as the previous generation was. The previous generation "perished," literally "completed" (Hebrew root tmm) in the wilderness just as this generation remained where they were until the circumcising "was done," literally "completed" (Hebrew root tmm). God instituted circumcision in Gen 17:8–14 along with the promise of the land that Israel had now entered. Circumcision brought upon this generation all the responsibilities of the covenant, as seen in the Passover they were about to celebrate. It also brought upon the people all the promises and blessings of the covenant; chief among these was the inheritance of the land. The "disgrace of Egypt" (Josh 5:9) describes the rebellion of the generation of the exodus and their subsequent loss of access to the promise land. The circumcision of the new generation replaced rebellion with obedience at Gilgal; the root of whose name, "circle," can carry the sense, "to roll (away)."

The Passover forms the key celebration. In Exod 12:1–13:16 Israel celebrated the Passover when they began their journey into the wilderness. Here the nation concludes that journey by keeping the festival. Early in the wilderness journey, God provided manna for the people to eat (Exod 16:1–36). With the end of this journey, the manna ceases and the people eat from the firstfruits of the land. The "parched grain" or roasted grain consisted of the barley that Israel found growing near Gilgal and whose harvest time coincided with the Passover and Days of Unleavened Bread (Lev 23:10–14). These firstfruits constituted the "down payment" that God gave to Israel at this point, a literal foretaste of the blessings of the fullness of the land. In a similar manner, the resurrection of Jesus Christ becomes the firstfruits of the resurrection of all Christians who have died (1 Cor 15:20–23), and the gift of the Holy Spirit forms the firstfruits of the fullness of Christian redemption (Rom 8:23).

E. The Victory at Jericho and the Salvation of Rahab (5:13–6:27)

The scene of Josh 5:13–15 introduces the assault on Jericho as Joshua meets his heavenly counterpart, the leader of the heavenly army. A heavenly messenger with a drawn sword commands serious attention because it indicates that God has come to bring judgment (Num 22:23; 1 Chr 21:16). The "commander of the army of the LORD" receives Joshua's worship. As in Gen 18 and 22, the distinction between an angel and God fades. It is truly God whom Joshua addresses. The reference to "holy ground" recalls God's command to Moses that inaugurates his mission to lead Israel out of Egypt (Exod 3:2–5). Joshua stands at the beginning of his mission to lead Israel into the promised land. Such demonstrations of divine holiness regularly precede the bestowal of a mission (Isa 6; Ezek 1; Luke 1:26–3:8; Matt 17:1–13), as the saving presence of Christ comes before the call to Christian discipleship (Rom 5–6; Eph 2:8–10; 4:1–16).

Joshua 6:1 reaffirms the important imagery of the gate and of access to the fortress of Jericho (see Josh 2:5, 7). The "shut up" posture positions Jericho as an obstacle in the ongoing advance of God and the mission of Israel, just as the literary position of this verse "obstructs" the call of Joshua and the following success over Jericho. The daily march around the site for seven days corresponds to the seven days of Unleavened Bread following Passover. As in the first Passover, Israel will see the defeat of its enemies. This is a holy time when the presence of God in the form of the ark accompanies the warriors to "march around the city." This verb (Hebrew root, nqp) occurs in Ps 48:12, when the pilgrim walks around Jerusalem to admire its defenses; and in 2 Kgs 6:14, when a king surrounds a city with his army in order to capture its occupants. Thus, the march constitutes a ceremonial inspection of the defenses to see if there is any opening or willingness to negotiate entrance. It also suggests a martial intent toward Jericho. The procession of the ark of the covenant began at Mount Sinai. The story of Jericho forms part of the ongoing movement of the ark until it reaches its resting place in Jerusalem (2 Sam 6). The people of God are led by faith in their Lord into the promised rest (Heb 13:7–16). The details of the march, the commanded silence on the seventh day, and the times of shouting and horn blowing all attest to a disciplined force following the divine commands through Joshua.

On the seventh day, Joshua promises the people that, after circumnavigating Jericho seven times and shouting as the trumpets blow, the Lord will give Jericho to them. However, they are warned not to take any booty for themselves. Everything is "devoted to destruction" (Heb. kherem; Josh 6:18–21). All living things are to be destroyed and all property belongs to the treasury of the Lord. This edict anticipates the disobedience of Achan and the story of Josh 7. It also fulfills the command of Deut 20:16–18 in which those who have resisted the Lord, in this case Jericho, are forcibly repossessed. Nothing remains to tempt Israel to follow the gods and ways of the Canaanites. From this perspective, the seven days of marching become one final and direct opportunity for Jericho, its king, and its soldiers to turn to God as Rahab had done.

Joshua 6:16–25 describes the fall of Jericho just as Joshua had promised. It also details the salvation of Rahab and her family. By one count of the Masoretic text, eighty-six Hebrew words recount the story of Rahab's salvation whereas one hundred two words tell of the destruction. For the writer of this chapter the story of God's mercy toward Rahab was virtually as important as the account of God's judgment on the fortress. Rahab and her family live among the Israelites and eventually become part of Israel and part of the promised line that leads to Jesus (Matt 1:5). In the midst of divine judgment, Rahab corresponds to the Good Shepherd's search for the one lost sheep (Matt 8:12–14; Luke 15:4–7). Joshua curses Jericho and his words are fulfilled when it is rebuilt (1 Kgs 16:34). Joshua's "fame was in all the land" because "the LORD was with Joshua" and he was successful in his first military conflict.

F. The Sin of Achan (7:1–26)

If Rahab corresponds to Joshua as a leader of her people who acted in faith, Rahab contrasts with Achan. She represents a Canaanite coming to faith in Israel's God and acting to assist that nation, whereas Achan depicts an Israelite acting contrary to that faith and putting the community in jeopardy. In the end, Rahab and her family join God's people while Achan and his family are excluded from the covenant community. Having Abraham for one's father does not guarantee divine favor (Luke 3:8).

7:1–5. Defeat at Ai. Israel "broke faith" (Heb. m'l), a verb always used to describe faithlessness toward God. The unique genealogy of Achan in v. 1 (only here in the book of Joshua are four generations described) connects his transgression with his family, clan, tribe, and ultimately with the whole nation of Israel. Ai guarded the central one of three Iron Age roads from Jericho into the hill country. The planned movement into the central area of Cisjordan could occur only if Israel gained access to the plateau region of Benjamin. Ai, like Jericho, may well have served primarily as a fortress guarding these routes of access. The focus in both is on the soldiers and on the king, a term whose Semitic root (mlk) can designate civil or military officials in fourteenth century BCE Amarna letters from Palestine. Unlike the spies' report of ch. 2, where faith in God's work was key, these spies describe the strength of the military force and recommend a small contingent of Israelite warriors. The decision to send part of the army may have seemed to be a good strategy. However, it divided the whole people and thus compromised the important theological consideration that the nation as a whole would take possession (Josh 1:2). The loss of life and humiliating rout of this force led to a reversal of fortunes. In ch. 5 the Canaanites feared Israel; now Israel becomes afraid of Canaan (Josh 7:5).

7:6–21. Identification of Achan. The acts of tearing clothes, falling on one's face, and putting dust on the head describe mourning (1 Sam 4:12; Job 2:12). The refocusing on God, with the extended question of why God would do this, brings Israel back into the proper attitude of consulting God for every concern. The concern that this would encourage the Canaanites was a real one (Josh 7:9). Until this defeat, Israel had not lost a battle since they attempted to invade Canaan a generation earlier (Num 14:45). Now the nations of Canaan would know that this generation of Israelites could be defeated. They would no longer fear as they had.

God communicates to Joshua that some of the kherem (see Josh 6:18–24) has been stolen by one of the Israelites. Joshua's identification of the perpetrator begins with the sanctification of the people, something that took place before the Israelites crossed the Jordan River (Josh 3:5). This becomes the first step in the process of reversing the manner in which Israel has become kherem in the eyes of God (Josh 7:12–13).

The identification will take place according to tribe, clan, and household. This reverses the order of the genealogy at the beginning of the chapter. These groups form the major social divisions of ancient Israel. Joshua's verdict concerning the perpetrator and all related property consists of consigning everyone and everything to destruction by fire (Josh 7:15). This penalty corresponds to the original command to burn all Jericho by fire (Josh 6:18–24). The identification of Achan, probably by means of the high priest casting lots (especially the Urim [and Thummim]; Num 27:21), leads to his admission of guilt. It begins with a general confession of sin and moves to the specific action. Achan "saw" something "beautiful" (Josh 7:21). Using the same Hebrew verb and adjective, Eve also "saw" something "beautiful" (NRSV has "good"; Heb. tov) in Gen 3:6. Both Eve and Achan coveted and this led to the additional sin of taking what God had forbidden.

7:22–26. Achan's Punishment. They brought Achan, his family, and all his property to a valley, perhaps the Buqeah, about eight miles south of Jericho, i.e., in the opposite direction from where Israel was headed. Capital punishment was required. Stoning may have provided a more merciful death than burning alive. It may also have involved all of Israel in the execution. Israel burned the bodies with fire, an application of the kherem (see Josh 6:18–24), and covered them with a pile of stones (Josh 7:26). This memorial reminds Israel of the need to eradicate sin in its midst, just as the stones at Gilgal commemorate God's salvation of the people. God's "burning anger" threatened to destroy Israel when it worshiped the golden calf (Exod 32:12), when it engaged in immorality at Baal-Peor (Num 25:4), if the Transjordanian tribes refused to assist Israel west of the Jordan River (Num 32:1), and—especially in this case—if Israel did not do away with all the things devoted to destruction (Deut 13:17). The name, Achor (Heb. root 'kr'), derives from a term meaning to bring trouble. It forms the basis for Joshua's question in Josh 7:25. Christians learn from this example concerning the terrible effect of sin, which elicits a particularly strong judgment from God here and in the early church's story of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11).

G. The Second Assault on Ai (8:1–29)

The second attack on Ai differs from the first. It begins with God's word and promise of success, rather than someone else's speech. It emphasizes the whole army acting together (and thus all Israel; Josh 1:2) rather than one faction of a divided force. It also involves a ruse rather than a direct attack. This last point prevents additional loss of lives among the Israelites. The Israelites position their main force in a ravine north of Ai. They place a smaller ambush to the west of the fortress, at a hiding place between Ai to the east and Bethel to the west. The traditional site of Ai, Et Tell, fulfills these topographical requirements. The problem of the absence of evidence of occupation at the traditional time when these events would have taken place may argue for their legendary nature, or it may suggest that Ai was a makeshift fortress used to defend one of the main roads from Jericho to Bethel and the highlands of Palestine. Such a fort would leave little evidence of occupation based on the finer (and datable) pottery that occurs in domestic sites. The defenders could have made use of the older walls at the site. The figures of "thirty thousand warriors" and "five thousand men" (Josh 8:3, 12) could actually represent smaller numbers. The Hebrew word for "thousand" ('elef) can mean a squad or unit, especially in military contexts. Thus, here and elsewhere in Joshua, the thousands could refer to squads each containing far fewer numbers than one thousand.

At daybreak, the king of Ai and his forces leave Ai to confront Joshua and his army. They appear to give way before Ai's army and flee eastward just as in the first assault (Josh 7:4–5). This action draws out all the forces of Ai and leaves it open to the Israelite ambush hiding to the west. At the proper moment, Joshua responds to God's command and holds up his sword (Josh 8:18). Perhaps the gleam of the sword in the morning sun provided an adequate signal for the ambush to recognize that the time had come to enter the fortress and set on fire whatever would burn. The ambush now comes behind the army of Ai and thus catches them in a pincer movement as Joshua turns his soldiers to face their enemy. With the ambush to the west and the main Israelite force to their east, the army of Ai loses all will to fight and Israel easily puts them to the sword. Only the king is left alive. Joshua brings him to Ai's gate and hangs him in front of the burning mound. As with Achan (Josh 7:26), they raise a pile of stones over the king's body. Ai means "ruin" and this describes what remains after the victory. The smoothness of the operation and the total defeat of the enemy contrasts with the events of ch. 7 and demonstrates for the people of God the importance of removing sin from among the people and of following the will and the word of God.

H. The Altar at Mount Ebal (8:30–35)

The Septuagint and the fragments from the Dead Sea Scrolls place this section in ch. 5 where it fits better as part of the ceremonies completed at the time of the entrance into the promised land. However, the geographical understanding of the events would suggest that Israel could not celebrate at Mt. Ebal until it reached the hill country. This did not happen before the victory over Ai and Bethel (Josh 8:17). On Mt. Ebal they constructed an altar of field stones (Exod 20:25) and "offered on it burnt offerings to the LORD, and sacrificed offerings of well-being." According to Lev 1:3–17, burnt offerings provided for atonement. By virtue of the fire consuming everything, the burnt offerings become an illustration of total dedication of the offerers to God. The offerings of well-being were the only sacrifices in which some of the meat could be eaten by the offerers (Lev 7:11–34), symbolizing their fellowship with God. The altar and Joshua's writing of the law of Moses on (plastered) stones is understood to fulfill the divine command of Deut 27:1–10. The blessings and especially the curses that are pronounced recall the remainder of Deut 27. The unique stone structure on Mt. Ebal, dating to c. 1200 BCE, remains an enigma that some have related to the altar described here. However, that claim remains unproven. These verses emphasize the obedience of Israel to God's word and their desire to hear that word and to renew their covenant with God.

I. The Gibeonite Alliance (9:1–27)

Has the sin of Achan and the resultant defeat at the first assault on Ai changed the attitude of fear in Canaan (Josh 2:10; 5:1) to one of courage to attack Israel? The text does not say, but the first two verses do demonstrate a change of attitude to one of aggression. The results of sin may have far-ranging effects, whether with the first human couple (Gen 3) or with Israel under Joshua. Like the kings "beyond the Jordan," "the inhabitants of Gibeon" also "heard" of God's work in Israel. However, their response differed. Gibeon (el-Jib) lay north of Jerusalem and southwest of Bethel. Like all the other Cisjordan events in the first nine chapters of Joshua (except Josh 8:30–35), this site lay in the later tribal territory of Benjamin.

The action of a people offering themselves as slaves in exchange for their lives forms a common theme in ancient Near Eastern accounts of victorious kings. However, in the story of Joshua, Israel had nothing about which to boast. Gibeon's ambassadors disguised themselves so as to appear to have come from a long distance. According to Deut 20:10–18, God commanded Israel to treat their enemies differently, depending on whether they came from outside the promised land or from within it. The former were subject to labor and servitude whereas the latter were doomed to extermination.

The Gibeonites knew of this. They disguised themselves so as to make it appear that they did not come from Canaan. As with Rahab, the heart of their confession of faith has to do with God's historic acts of redemption for Israel against Egypt, Sihon, and Og (Josh 2:10; 8:10). Apparently the Gibeonites were ruled by elders (Josh 8:11) since no king is mentioned. Their Hivite origins (Josh 8:7) may suggest a background within the Hittite sphere of culture, where a council of elders handled local affairs. Without any mention of consulting God, Joshua and the Israelite elders make a treaty, so they are all held responsible for this transaction (Josh 8:15). When the Israelites learned that their treaty partners were Gibeonites, they obeyed the commands regarding the responsibilities of aliens living in the land, forcing them to become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" (Deut 29:11). This responsibility would connect Gibeon with the tabernacle and later the Temple, and the sacrifices that required wood and water. Israel "murmured" against their leadership when they learned how they had made a treaty contrary to God's will. This verb, "to murmur" (Heb. root lwn), appears in Exodus and Numbers to describe the murmuring of Israel against God and Moses in the wilderness. However, here the Israelites would not violate the treaty they had made, although the lesson not to swear hastily needed to be learned (cf. Matt 5:33–37; Jas 4:13–17). Joshua's question and the Gibeonites' response (Josh 9:22–25) exonerated Israel from knowingly allowing Canaanites to live. Ironically, the only people whom the Bible records that Joshua "saved" were the Gibeonites (Josh 9:26), despite the fact that the name Joshua derives from the same Hebrew root for "to save; salvation" (Heb. yasha').

J. Victory Against the Southern Coalition (10:1–43)

As in the crossing of the Jordan River (chs. 3–4) and in the story of Ai's capture (ch. 8), here as well the author writes with a series of literary panels that enable descriptions of both the work of God and of Israel simultaneously taking place. Unlike the previous victories, this one considers an entire region with only a few verses devoted to each of the places mentioned. Thus, the speed of the action increases. More than any other chapter in Joshua, this one parallels Egyptian, Hittite, Babylonian, and Assyrian annalistic conquest narratives. Especially in vv. 28–42, the text presents a repetitive description of a king moving his army from one city to another in conquest. Similar verbs and phrases occur with reference to each city, despite minor variations. Even the formation of the rebellion (vv. 1–5), the nighttime march and the divine miracles (vv. 6–15), and the fate of the kings (vv. 16–27) have direct parallels in comparative ancient battle narratives. This is not the genre of an account that would have been developed by pacifistic, egalitarian villages in the highlands of early Israel. Instead, it derives from a context of warfare, common to other ancient nations. Theologically, the Christian is reminded of Eph 6 and the description of the disciple's life as one of spiritual warfare. Success requires divine assistance, and a knowledge of and obedience to God's word.

10:1–5. Formation of the Southern Coalition. An alliance with Gibeon gave Israel control of the Benjaminite plateau of the central highlands. This also included the Beth Horon pass westward to the coastal plain. This pass formed the most important route to the hill country and to cities such as Jerusalem. Thus the king of Jerusalem, the first city to the south of Gibeon, was threatened with the loss of his ally to the north, "a large city." The leader, Adoni-Zedek, turned to his remaining friends to the south and west. He contacted four major city-state forts. The names of the leaders and of their cities represent the strength of the region that will unite to fight the perceived Israelite threat. By making this first move, the Canaanites threaten Gibeon and its ally, Israel. Thus, Israel's response in what follows is a defensive one.

10:6–15. Response of Israel and God. The Gibeonite request for Israel's aid based on the aforementioned treaty and their response recalls the corresponding dependency of God's people upon their (treaty) covenant relationship, whether Old Testament or New, and the need to claim that relationship by means of prayer (e.g., Matt 6:9; 26:41; 2 Cor 13:7). Like Joshua's ambush at Ai (Josh 8), this all-night march created another ruse that surprised the enemy and enabled Israel to drive them westward into the Shephelah (low hill country) to Azekah, and then to Makkedah (Khirbet el-Qom). Azekah is close to Jarmuth whereas Makkedah would be nearby the remaining three cities of the coalition. The names of these two sites summarize the battle. They also indicate places from which the coalition survivors might seek refuge in their hometowns (an option that v. 19 seeks to close). While vv. 6–10 summarize the human part of the battle, vv. 11–15 outline the divine role. God fights for Israel with "huge stones" from heaven and by stopping the sun at Joshua's command. The former anticipates the "large stones" (the same expression in Hebrew) that seal the five kings in the cave (vv. 18, 27). The "standing" of the sun has evoked much controversy. It has been variously identified as a miracle where the sun did not move, a solar eclipse, and an omen. Whatever took place, the text emphasizes the divine decision to grant Joshua some control over the heavenly bodies. God's participation in the battle, with (hail?) stones and the standing of the sun, results in victory. As at Jericho, Israel seems to follow behind and to have little to do to complete the work (cf. v. 11).

10:16–27. The Five Kings. The capture of the five kings of the coalition took place in the cave in which they were hiding at Makkedah. This itself was a humiliation, as was the loss of their army. The coalition's army perished on that day, except for a few survivors who escaped to their towns and would be exterminated in the remainder of ch. 10. The kings of southern Canaan faced further humiliation as "the chiefs of the warriors" in Israel put their feet on the necks of these leaders. This display, like the hanging of the kings after their execution, was intended to proclaim publicly their defeat and to encourage Israel's army for future battles. As noted above, the same expression identifying the hail stones that God sent from heaven also identifies the "large stones" used to seal the tomb and to provide yet another memorial for Israel to remember these important events in the creation of the nation in Cisjordan (Josh 4:8–9, 19–24; 7:25–26; 8:29).

10:28–39. Defeat of the Southern Fortified Centers. Those who survived the first day's conflicts and escaped to the fortified cities in the area now become objects of a hunt through virtually seven major city fortresses in the south. Indeed, this seems to comprise largely a sweep from the northwest southward and eastward and then to the northeast of the southern areas (Hebron) before returning westward. Using a variety of repeated phrases—took, fought against, the Lord gave it, its king, he struck it with the edge of the sword, he utterly destroyed every person in it, he left no one remaining, he did to its king as he had done—the text describes the destruction (but not burning; cf. Josh 11:13) of each fortified center. The manner in which no two cities are described with an identical set of phrases suggests variation in tactics. At the center of the city list lies Gezer, which was not attacked. Its king and his army were defeated. Yet its central position suggests that this was a key victory. Gezer was one of the three major Canaanite cities defeated by pharaoh Merneptah according to his 1209 BCE account; and it was remembered as an important city controlled by Egypt during the time of Solomon (1 Kgs 9:16). This repetitive style for the seven cities resembles the annals of ancient Near Eastern kings throughout the second and first millennia BCE.

10:40–43. Summary of the Southern Campaign. Verse 40 summarizes the victories in the south by region and v. 41 by boundaries. Phrases such as "he left no one remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed," may reflect hyperbole characteristic of the annalistic genre. Here it emphasizes the complete obedience of Joshua. Verse 42 gives the credit to God who "fought for Israel." Verse 43 marks the end of this episode with the return to the Israelite camp at Gilgal. Neither here nor elsewhere in the first twelve chapters does Israel occupy the defeated cities and regions. They fought a defensive battle for their survival, and then returned to their home.

K. Victory Against the Northern Coalition (11:1–11)

Unlike the southern coalition, the northern one appears to have a clear leader, the king of Hazor (Tel el-Qedah). This site expanded to cover an area of more than 170 acres, the largest Old Testament site in Palestine. As in ch. 10, the basic themes of a coalition that initiates the attack, Israel's successful response, and the destruction of the cities and regions involved in the attack all appear. The narrative is shorter, however. There are no lengthy chases, details of miracles, or gory descriptions of the execution of the leadership. Instead, one has the sense of a speedy completion to these events. The region stretches from the Sea of Galilee and the Huleh basin westward to the Mediterranean Sea. Although the focus of the towns lies around the Galilee, it is not clear how far north Mizpeh may reach, perhaps into the Beqa Valley of Lebanon. The "very many horses and chariots" (Josh 11:4) describes the most advanced military technology available. These armies were beyond the strength of the smaller and poorer southern coalition. The battle takes place at the "waters of Merom," identified either as Tel Qarnei Hattin west of the Sea of Galilee or as Tel Merom in the upper highlands of the eastern Galilee. The Israelite chase proceeds in a counter-clockwise fashion. From the battle site they moved westward in the Jezreel Valley and then north across the Plain of Acco and past Tyre to Sidon. From here the army turned southeast and passed along the Marj 'Ayyun Valley and along the Litani River. From there it entered the Huleh Valley and continued south to Hazor. In this manner, all the rebels and their fortified sites would have been attacked. Only the destruction of Hazor is described, however. Using the same expressions as found in Josh 10:28–39, this town experienced the same assault by Israel, as had those in the southern coalition. The additional description of Hazor as at "the head of all those kingdoms" is an accurate description of the (extrabiblical) textual and archaeological record of the site before its destruction in the thirteenth century BCE. It may also explain why Joshua "burned Hazor with fire" (Josh 11:11). It forms an inclusio or envelope with Jericho and Ai, as places devoted to God at which nothing was allowed to remain. As Israel defended itself from these forces who attacked it, so the narrative emphasizes the terrible consequences of resisting God's will; something that can appear in the forms of war and other types of oppressive conduct (Rom 1–5).

L. Summary of the Battles (11:12–23)

The passage begins with a statement that summarizes all the towns and their leaders that Israel defeated. The text emphasizes the obedience of Joshua to Moses. As God recognized Joshua as

Moses' successor, so they have now acknowledged Moses' will. Joshua's obedience occupies v. 15 as well. In between, Hazor's distinctive treatment forms the conclusion to the battles. Elsewhere Israel killed the people and took the property as their booty, but they did not burn the towns. Only Hazor was burnt. Verse 15 emphasizes Joshua's obedience with a chiasm:

A As the LORD had commanded his servant Moses, so Moses commanded Joshua,
B and so Joshua did;
B' he left nothing undone
A' of all that the LORD had commanded Moses.

The second part of the section (vv. 16–20) begins with another summary of the battles, describing the land taken by noting the extremities from the Negeb in the south to the Lebanon valley (the Beqa) in the north. Verse 18 mentions that the war lasted a long time. This may include some of those conquered entities mentioned in ch. 12 that do not appear elsewhere in the first eleven chapters of the book. The report highlights the kings. It was the elite that opposed Joshua and the Israelites; repeatedly little or nothing is said of the citizenry who seem not to have participated in the battles. If Hazor was the central concern of the first part of the summary, the peace treaty with the Gibeonites seems to be the concern of this second part. As opposed to the kings who fought Israel (v. 18), the citizens of Gibeon (who did not appear to have a king; cf. Josh 9:11) made peace with God's people (v. 19). The towns of these other kings were destroyed according to God's will.

Verses 21–23 describe the defeat of the Anakim. The Anakim were a social group, elsewhere called by the name of the Nephilim (Num 13:33) and the Rephaim (Deut 2:11). These were legendary warriors slain early in Israel's history. Mention of Hebron and Debir anticipates the remaining two battle narratives, those of Caleb (Josh 14:6–15) and of Othniel (Josh 15:13–19). Verse 23 explicitly looks forward to those allotments in chs. 13–21. While "Joshua took the whole land" (v. 23), some of the Anakim "remained in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod" (v. 22). This suggests that not all the land was captured and anticipates the descriptions of unconquered areas elsewhere in Joshua and in Judg 1. The "rest from war" indicates that the battles have now ended, if only for a while. The writer of Hebrews contrasts this temporary rest (Heb 4:8) with the eternal rest promised in Christ (Heb 4:9–10; cf. 1 Pet 1:4–5).

M. Summary of Lands and Cities Defeated by Moses and Joshua (12:1–24)

Verses 1–6 provide an overview of the lands and cities acquired by Israel's victories over Sihon and Og, while vv. 7–24 do the same for the victories over the kings west of the Jordan River. Joshua's work as recorded in the first eleven chapters thus becomes part of the larger purpose of God's plan in giving the land east as well as west of the Jordan. The regions described by vv. 1b–5 include the region east of the Jordan River from the Wadi Arnon that empties into the Dead Sea in the south to Mount Hermon in the north. Sihon ruled the southern half of this and Og the northern half. Generally speaking, the Jabbok Valley formed their common border. For Og's connection with the Rephaim (v. 4), compare Josh 11:21 and the associated Anakim, all of whom were legendary heroes.

The towns of the Ashtaroth and Edrei are mentioned in the Ugaritic myths of the thirteenth century BCE and associated with a deity Rapiu (cf. Rephaim). Moses received the credit for the acquisition of these lands and for the allotments to the two and a half tribes (Num 21:21–30; Deut 1:4; 2:24–37; 29:6–7; Josh 1:12–18), in a verse that appears again in Josh 13:8 and 32.

Verses 7–8 repeat the listing of regions where victories occurred, beginning in the north in the Lebanon and moving south as far as the Negeb. Verses 9–24 list thirty-one kings, as noted in the summary. This literature recalls the itineraries of Egyptian pharaohs who recorded campaigns into Canaan from the sixteenth to the tenth centuries BCE. These itineraries do not necessarily assume that every city was destroyed; only that the armies were defeated. The sequence initially follows the first ten chapters of Joshua. However, from v. 13 onward additional towns appear that had not been mentioned previously. Only Bethel has no king listed. Perhaps the king of Ai governed both places. The text demonstrates God's faithfulness and presence with Israel to give them "every place that the sole of your foot will tread upon" (Josh 1:3).

II. The Allotments (13–21)

A. Allotments East of the Jordan River (13:1–33)

Verses 1–7 form an introduction. Joshua's advanced age appears again after the end of this major section (Josh 23:1). As elsewhere (Gen 18:1; 24:1; 1 Kgs 1:1), this description anticipates a major responsibility that the aged person(s) will still need to accomplish. In this case, it is no longer the acquisition of the land. Rather, it is to allot the land. The division begins with what has already taken place; the land not yet conquered and the areas already allotted. Those areas not yet conquered create a tension with the remainder of these chapters that describe the land as a whole that is allotted. This culminates in the expression of complete fulfillment in Josh 21:43–45, a passage that seems to allow no alternatives. The text appears to develop God's promise that "I will myself drive them out from before the Israelites" (v. 6) and thus act as though the land is fully conquered even though these verses record that such is not the case at this point.

Verses 8–33 begin with a definition of Israel's territory east of the Jordan. It resembles the lands of Sihon and Og from Josh 12:1–6. From south to north, the towns listed identify the tribes of Reuben (vv. 15–23), Gad (vv. 24–28), and half of the tribe of Manasseh (vv. 29–31). At the beginning and end of this description, in vv. 14 and 33, as well as in Josh 14:4, readers learn that the Levites had no inheritance in the allotted land. Like the land given to the tribes east of the Jordan, the lack of a physical inheritance for the Levites goes back to Moses (Exod 32:25–29; Num 18:20–24; 26:62; Deut 10:9; 14:27; 18:1–2). The Levites represent all Israel, on both sides of the Jordan, before God. They will receive towns in which to live (Josh 21) but they will not possess the lands on either side of the Jordan River. Here at the beginning of this most materialistic of sections, the distribution, the constant reminder of the status of the tribe of Levi emphasizes the point that the most important values lie beyond the success of this world.

B. Allotment of Judah (14:1–15:63)

Verses 1–5 introduce the allotments that Joshua and Eleazar, the high priest of Joshua's generation, would distribute. They had seen this land defeated and now they would distribute it by lot, according to divine command (Num 26:5, 56; 33:54; 36:2). Although consideration was given to the size of the tribe (Num 33:54), the casting of lots was the key. By expressing God's will, this act determined the allotment for each tribe (Prov 16:33). In place of an inheritance for the Levites (see comment on Josh 13:14, 33), the tribe of Joseph would receive two portions, one for Manasseh and one for Ephraim. Verse 5 caps the introduction with a statement observing the obedience of God's people in this matter.

In Num 13–14 Caleb, along with Joshua, had delivered a favorable report. He believed that God would give Israel the land. Israel did not follow him and lost forty years in the wilderness. Caleb had faithfully waited all that time for his inheritance. Now at 85 he was given his inheritance at Hebron in southern Judah. He is a model of patience and faithfulness. As a Kenizzite, perhaps related to the Kenites, he was not originally an Israelite. The Kenizzites were apparently incorporated into the tribe of Judah (Num 13:6). As in the case of Rahab, so Caleb formed a model of another non-Israelite who received the promises of God. Thus, Caleb models the acquisition of one's inheritance for the rest of Judah and for all Israel, just as his patience, faithfulness, and courage remain virtues for Christians today.

Joshua 15:1–12 provides a summary of the boundary description and vv. 20–63 set forth twelve districts of Judah with their town lists. This is the largest and the most complete boundary description and town list of any tribe. It would appear to indicate the greater importance of the tribe of Judah as well as its conformity to divine order and organization. The text portrays Judah as the most blessed of the tribes in its allotted lands.

Verses 13–19 form an interlude that returns to consider the story of Caleb. Despite Caleb's age, the account describes how God gave the fearful Anakim (Josh 11:21–22; 15: 13–14) into Caleb's hand and how he received his inheritance. He also promised his daughter in marriage to the one who would conquer Debir. Othniel captured the town and received Achsah as wife. She then negotiated from her father additional springs, an invaluable resource in a desert. This story, repeated in Judg 1:13–14, anticipates the era of the judges, for Othniel becomes the first judge and a model one (Judg 3:9–11).

C. Allotments of Ephraim and Manasseh (16:1–17:18)

Ephraim and Manasseh are the two sons of Joseph. Their tribal territory will form the center of the northern kingdom. They are bounded on the south by the tribes of Dan and Benjamin, and on the north by the Jezreel Valley. The Archites and Japhletites, inhabitants of this region, are otherwise unknown, except for the observation that Hushai, David's diplomat, was an Archite (Josh 16:2–3; 2 Sam 15:32; 1 Chr 27:33). Ephraim was the southernmost of the two tribes. Its boundary list appears first (there is no town list), followed by the unconquered towns (Josh 16:5–10), as occurred in the Judean allotment.

Chapter 17 records the allotments of Manasseh, west of the Jordan River. Unlike other tribes whose territories are defined by towns and districts, this distribution is based on the sons of Manasseh. The firstborn, Machir, received two regions to the east of the Jordan River (see Josh 13), Gilead and Bashan. The remaining six brothers received allotments that are preserved as places named in the eighth century BCE Samaria ostraca. The one exception among these was Hephher, whose son Zelophehad had no sons. Instead, he had five daughters. They received a special dispensation from Moses to preserve their father's inheritance (Num 27:1–11). The five sons inherited districts in the southern and western regions of Manasseh's territory; while the five daughters of Zelophehad received areas in the northern and eastern parts of the tribal lands. As with Ephraim, Manasseh has a boundary description. However, in light of the evidence from the Samaria ostraca and elsewhere, the sons and daughters already mentioned function as town lists. The same is true of the list of Manasseh towns within the territories of Issacher and Asher.

Joshua 17:14–18 provides a note on the development of the upper forest region of the hill country for the excess population of Manasseh. They could not settle in the neighboring Jezreel Valley or the valley of Beth-shean due to the iron chariots of the Canaanites. These would apparently describe chariots that had some sort of simple iron plating attached; but they would provide a significant military threat for any people not possessing these expensive and advanced weapons. Although the day would come when Israel had superiority over the Canaanites, for the present they are to clear the thick undergrowth and other obstacles in the highlands, and to settle there. The necessary terraces that would allow for farming in these ecosystems are scattered throughout the region. Some from sites such as Ai and Raddana have been dated to c. 1200 BCE and the time of the explosion of a village culture throughout the region. These more than three hundred villages, not present in the previous centuries, may be identified with the settlement of earliest Israel.

D. Allotment of Benjamin (18:1–28)

The remaining allotments are mapped from Israel's new center at Shiloh, which will remain the religious center for Israel until the time of Eli (1 Sam 1–4). The land is a gift of God's blessing. Mapping it corresponds to the writing and observance of the law of Moses. Both form essential books of the covenant. One contained the promises and the other provided details of the fulfillment of the promises. Joshua will cast lots for the distribution of the seven remaining territories. Israel continued to seek God's direction through the casting of lots. The centrality of the sanctuary at Shiloh reflects the central location of Josh 18:1–10 in chs. 13–21 of the book. Central in the lives of the people of God is the regular practice of meeting for worship and instruction (cf. Heb 10:25).

The territory of Benjamin is described first. Benjamin was Joseph's full brother in the stories of Genesis. Here they remain tied together by receiving adjacent territories and by their allotment descriptions following one after the other. Although some of the boundary information was given earlier (e.g., the southern boundary of Benjamin coincides with the northern boundary of Judah in ch. 15), the full boundary description is provided along with lists of towns in the eastern (Josh 18:21–24) and in the western parts of the territory (Josh 18:25–28). Again, this comprehensive and orderly account suggests a tribe organized according to God's will.

E. Remaining Allotments of the Land (19:1–51)

These remaining allotments include the town list of Simeon (vv. 1–9), the boundary description and partial town list of Zebulun (vv. 10–16), the town list of Issachar (vv. 17–23), the (partial?) boundary and town list of Asher (vv. 24–31), a boundary description and partial town list for Naphtali (vv. 32–39), and a town list for Dan (vv. 40–48). The report about this last tribe includes a note about the migration of the tribe away from their divinely allotted territory northward to the city of Dan. All these texts preserve incomplete descriptions and ones that are much smaller than Judah and Benjamin. The text depicts a lack of orderliness and completeness; something that does not correspond to God's will.

The tribal allotments west of the Jordan River began with the example of Caleb for Judah in Josh 14:6–15. The other hero of faith from the wilderness generation, Joshua, concludes the allotments with his inheritance in his tribal territory of Ephraim. Not only do the stories about Joshua and Caleb form an envelope for the whole allotment of the land, the story of Joshua also demonstrates the virtues of true kindness, sacrifice, and humility in leadership (cf. Gal 5:22–26). Joshua waits until all the others have received their allotments and then he receives his own share. He does not seek to claim the best or the most choice of these lands for himself. Nevertheless, this minister of God's people does receive a fair share for his own family (cf. 1 Tim 5:17–18).

F. The Towns of Refuge (20:1–9)

The principle of sacrifice and of the Sabbath teaches that while God has given Israel bountiful harvests and all the days of their lives, they recognize this by returning to God the firstfruits and one day in seven as a token of what Israel has received. This applies to the promise land as well. As God had given Israel its land in fulfillment of the divine responsibilities of the covenant, so Israel would now return back to God certain towns for divinely mandated purposes. Towns of refuge for the inadvertent killer of another person had been described earlier (Exod 21:12–14; Num 35:9–15, 22–28; Deut 4:41–43; 19:1–10); three were designated west of the Jordan River and three to the east. Deuteronomy 19 affirms an additional three towns on the west side. Their absence here may reflect the lack of a complete conquest. The killer stands at the city gate and sets forth his/her case. That person remains in the town of refuge until a trial where the incident occurred (Num 35:22–28). Even if the killer is acquitted of premeditation at this point, the blood avenger, a family relation of the victim, is obligated to seek redress. So the killer lives in a town of refuge where protection is guaranteed "until the death of the one who is high priest" (Josh 20:6). The high priest symbolizes all Israel in its sin before God (Lev 16). The death of the priest is accepted in place of the killer and blood vengeance is satisfied.

G. The Levitical Towns (21:1–42)

The second manner in which Israel returns to God a portion of its inheritance takes place with the setting aside of towns as a gift to the Levites, who otherwise have no land (Num 35:1–8). This principle of God's people returning to God a portion of their material blessings remains active in the New Testament (Acts 2:44–47; Rom 15:26–27; Phil 4:10–18). The Kohathites who were descendants of Aaron's line would function in a priestly capacity. Their location in the south, near to the tabernacle and the later Jerusalem Temple, seems reasonable (Josh 21:4). The remaining Kohathites, the Gershonites, and the Merarites each had different functions related to the care of the things of God (Num 1:47–53; 3:1, 25–26, 33–37; 4:15–33; 7:9), and each received inheritance from different tribes. The forty-eight towns that the Levites would occupy were spread throughout Israel and formed the foci for Levitical and priestly duties of teaching their fellow Israelites the instructions of God (Lev 10:11). The towns included former Canaanite strongholds and those near the frontiers of Canaanite lands so that all the inhabitants of the land might have the opportunity to learn of God.

H. Conclusion to the Allotments (21:43–45)

These verses emphasize the fulfillment of God's promises. Three times this realization is repeated. The Hebrew for "all, every," kol, appears six times in this passage, highlighting the completion of God's blessings to Israel. Is this not a contradiction of Josh 13:1–7, where the lands remaining to be captured were listed? Israel had realized victory over the nations round about them as a group; however, there remained the need to deal with specific towns and areas among the allotments. God's power has accomplished redemption for the land, just as it will ultimately bring full redemption to Christians. However, towns and regions remain unconquered just as sin and suffering remain in the lives of Christians.

III. Proper Worship of God (22–24)

A. An Altar East of the Jordan River (22:1–34)

Joshua discharges the Transjordanian tribes to their inheritances, with commendation as to how they fulfilled their agreement to fight for Israel (Josh 1:13–18; 22:1–4). He recognizes that these tribes are fully part of the covenant community. The tribal identity now becomes the pressing issue of this chapter. The Transjordanian tribes built an altar in Canaan but one that was apparently visible across the Jordan River in their homeland (Josh 22:10). The remaining tribes saw this as an affront and gathered for war. They sent the new generation's priest, Phinehas son of Eleazar, accompanied by ten representatives from each of the tribes west of the Jordan River, to negotiate with the Transjordanian tribes. They accused the Transjordanian tribes of turning away from God by building this altar and they feared that God's wrath would fall on all Israel, as had happened at Peor (Num 23) and with Achan (Josh 7). The tribes east of the Jordan began their response with a repeated confession of the Lord as the "God of gods!" They thus recognized no other deity nor did they wish to compromise their faith in any way. They wanted the altar to function as a memorial, rather than as a place of (false) worship. Future generations would remember that the tribes east of the Jordan built it to express their unity and identity in religious as well as political matters with the other tribes of Israel. The explanation satisfied Phinehas and the tribal representatives, and then all Israel. The name of the altar, "Witness," signified its role as "a witness between us that the LORD is God" (Josh 22:34). Just as with this story of early Israel, so in the life of the church the maintenance of unity (John 17) and holiness (2 Cor 6:14–18) before God become essential elements of the church's mission on earth (2 John 7–11).

B. Joshua's Farewell Address (23:1–16)

As with Moses in the book of Deuteronomy, so here Joshua presents a farewell address in which his focus concerns Israel's future and the choices it has. Little occurs here that has not already appeared in Deuteronomy or elsewhere in the Pentateuch. Joshua thus does not announce new ideas but rather repeats time-honored truths. The note that "Joshua was old and well advanced in years" recurs here, as it first appeared in Josh 13:1. There it preceded the allotments; here it precedes the people's agreement to follow God and the actual habitation of the land. As in Josh 13, so here there is a recollection of what remains to be done and a promise that "God will push them back before you" (v. 5). Repeated items in the address of this chapter emphasize aspects of concern to Joshua: "it is the LORD your God who has fought/fights for you" (vv. 3, 10); "those nations that remain / these nations left here among you" (vv. 4, 7, 12); and "be very steadfast/careful" (vv. 6, 11). God will fight for Israel, but the nation has a responsibility to participate as well (v. 5). As in Josh 1:7 so in Josh 23:6, "the book of the law of Moses" plays a key role in guiding Israel to live faithfully. Verses 9–10 connect God's faithfulness in fighting for Israel with the ability of Israel to defeat superior forces. The theme of wholehearted commitment and devotion to God remains a key one for Christians as well (Rom 12:1–2).

The blessings of victory come with faithfulness. As in the covenant of Deuteronomy (ch. 28) there follow the curses for disobedience. Specifically, Joshua envisions three aspects of covenant violations: alliance and intermarriage with Canaanite survivors who will then destroy the Israelites (vv. 12–13); just as God has been faithful in blessings so God will be faithful in bringing judgment upon the nation for its sins, and this will continue even after Joshua's death (vv. 14–15); and idolatry leads to God's anger and Israel's destruction (v. 16). As with the covenant of Moses and Joshua, so also for the Christian there are judgments associated with departing from faithfulness (Heb 6).

C. Joshua's Covenant Renewal with Israel (24:1–28)

This last formal gathering under the leadership of Joshua recounts a covenant renewal ceremony. The covenant bore a resemblance to the political treaty, especially the Hittite suzerain-vassal treaty discovered among the Hittites and found as late as the early twelfth century BCE. As a narrative report of the event, this chapter does not explicitly contain all the elements of this structure but some do appear. The titulary identifies the suzerain to the vassal. In this case, Joshua begins, "Thus says the LORD, the God of Israel" (Josh 24:2). This historical prologue follows and serves to motivate the vassal to continued loyalty and obedience by pointing out how much such obedience benefits the vassal. In Josh 24:2–13, the historical review begins with Israel's ancestors who worshiped other gods east of the Euphrates River. God's deliverance of Abraham from this and the lives of his successors in Canaan develop the theme of divine providence. The sojourn in Egypt ended with the divine choice of Moses and Aaron. There followed the deliverance from Egypt and its destruction in the sea, the wilderness wanderings, the failure of Balaam who tried to curse Israel but could only bless the nation (Num 22–24), and the victories over Jericho and all the peoples of Canaan. Throughout this description, emphasis remains with God's deliverance of Israel from its enemies. Thus the drying up of the Red Sea mentioned by Rahab (Josh 1:10) and the manna in the wilderness do not receive mention; nor, of course, do the events at Mt. Sinai. Israel defeated Amorites east and west of the Jordan River. God's sending of "the hornet" symbolizes the terror that has manifested itself in fear throughout the book of Joshua (Josh 2:9, 24; 5:1; 9:24; 10:2; 14:8). This hornet fulfills the promise made in Exod 23:27–28. In a similar manner Josh 24:13 fulfill the promise of Deut 6:10–11. It emphasizes God gracious gift for Israel, just as Eph 2:8–10 does for Christianity.

Joshua 24:14–24 corresponds to the legal stipulations of the covenant and treaty documents. As in ancient treaties and in biblical covenants such as Deuteronomy, the basic legal element is grounded in exclusive loyalty to the suzerain, in this case loyalty toward God. The dramatic challenge that Joshua gives to Israel to put away the gods of Israel's ancestors across the Euphrates and the deities of the nations surrounding them concludes with Joshua's own example of serving only the Lord. The people of Israel respond with a similar reflection of their God's deliverance from Egypt, guidance in the wilderness, and victory over the Amorites. They conclude with a similar affirmation of loyalty to God. Not content with giving Israel a choice, perhaps because he knows their hearts so well, Joshua challenges them directly, "You cannot serve the LORD, for he is a holy God" (v. 19). He wants them to count the cost, to realize how dangerous it is for them to make this commitment and then turn their backs on it. Implied in v. 20 are the covenantal blessings and especially cursings. If they do not obey, then Israel will lose their lives and their identity. Israel's response and insistence that they will follow God leads to Joshua's reference to the one remaining element that regularly occurred in Hittite suzerain-vassal treaties; the witnesses. Usually the witnesses were the deities of both nations. Here, however, the invocation of other gods would violate the basic command of loyalty to God alone. Therefore, Joshua identified two witnesses: the people themselves and a large stone that he set up at Shechem (vv. 22 and 27). At this point, Joshua wrote the words of the covenant requirements in the book of God's law. Like the stone and their own words, it would remind them of what they had promised.

All may seem well as Joshua sends Israel to their homes. However, two ominous elements remain. First, when Joshua charged the people specifically to "put away the foreign gods that are among you" (v. 23), the people's general response to obey God alone omits any mention of agreement with this specific element. Second, the text does not record that the people of Israel made any effort to put away their gods. Unlike their ancestor Jacob and his family, who buried their images at Shechem (Gen 35:2–4), these people do nothing. James' assertion that actions must accompany faith (Jas 2:14–16) comes to mind. Judges 2:11–13 suggests that it did not take long for Israel to fall into the sin of idolatry after the death of Joshua and his generation.

D. The Deaths of Joshua and Eleazar (24:29– 33)

As with Moses (Deut 34:5), so Joshua at the end of his life received the accolade, "the servant of the LORD." Joshua and Joseph both died at the age of 110 (Gen 50:26). Since Joshua's inheritance was the last one (Josh 19:50), his death and burial closed the era of the allotments. Verse 31 reflects how the generation of Joshua and the elders was one of faithfulness to God just as it was one that had witnessed God's miracles. The reports about their final resting place match and enhance the connection between Joseph and Joshua in terms of age (Josh 24:32). Joseph's burial recalls his death (Gen 50:24–26) and Jacob's purchase of the burial ground (Gen 33:18–20). Thus, the deaths of Joshua and Joseph connect the beginning of Israel's history with its final settlement in the land. The death of Eleazar brings to an end the priestly generation of Joshua and anticipates the next generation with reference to his priestly son, Phinehas. The importance of the death of the high priest has already been noted (Josh 22:14). The conclusion of the book reflects on faithfulness in leadership and ministry, not unlike the apostolic testimony found in 2 Tim 3:7–8.

The concluding verses of Josh 24:29–33 are virtually repeated in Judg 2:6–9. They not only summarize the great story of Israel in the Pentateuch; these words also prepare for the next generation by anticipating the death of the generation of Joshua and dramatic apostasy that arises (already noted in Judg 2:10–13) after the passing of this godly leadership. The theological message forms a bridge with the beginning of the book of Joshua as well. There the focus was on God's will for the leadership of the people of God as represented in the figure of Joshua. Here, the importance of that leadership is remembered for its positive influence. The book of Joshua in many ways reflects the ideals of this godly leadership and the faithful obedience of the people. This is true despite the clear imperfections of that people, as for example in the account of the Gibeonites in Josh 9. The book of Judges will contrast this ideal with the reality of a settled people struggling with the daily temptations of seeking after other gods and becoming like the surrounding peoples. God's plans for leadership will adjust to meet these new challenges.

OVERVIEW

The book of Judges receives its name from the statement in Judg 2:16 that, when Israel suffered at the hands of enemies, "the LORD raised up judges, who delivered them out of the power of those who plundered them." As this verse indicates, the judges are primarily military leaders. Nevertheless, those individuals said to have "judged" Israel (2:7; 15:20; 16:31) do lead Israel in other ways as well. For example, Deborah acts as a judge in the traditional sense of the term (4:5, "the Israelites came up to her for judgment") and as a prophet (4:4).

Judges is set in the time between Israel's exodus and wilderness wandering (led by Moses and Joshua) and the establishment of the monarchy. Many historians once thought Judges provided significant information about a definite historical era, 1200 to 1020 BCE. As the theory goes, the Israelites during this time organized as a league of tribes with the judges leading them in war. This portrait of early Israel now seems difficult to maintain. Most of the stories in Judges involve local heroes and a small number of Israelite tribes. Such a portrait of "all Israel" appears to be a creation of writers and editors from a later time. Nevertheless, the period of the judges remains very important theologically in the biblical narrative. It represents a time in which the Israelites struggled to live into the promises of the land Joshua had conquered. Whereas the time of Joshua is remembered as a period of obedience and the realization of divine promises (2:7), the time of the judges is marked largely by disobedience and decline. The main sign of Israel's failure is its inability to secure the land God gave (2:20–21).

Some scholars propose that Judges portrays Israel's disobedience in order to prepare the reader for the Davidic monarchy, introduced in 1 and 2 Samuel. This idea is thought to be supported by the recurring refrain, "In those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (17:6; 18:6; 19:1; 21:25). But Judges' understanding of Israel's sinfulness and the leadership of the judges is more complex than this argument allows. Some of the judges are portrayed as heroic and honorable, but they do not take up the mantle of kingship. The one figure who declares himself king (Abimelech in Judg 9) is sharply criticized for the ruthless means by which he gains power. The note that Israel had no king seems to have a more subtle meaning that is related to God's role as sovereign. That is, Judges contains narratives about an Israel that does not recognize the king it does have, namely the God who has given Israel the land (see 8:3).

The book of Judges is closely related to Deuteronomy in its theological interests. In fact, Judges seems to be part of a literary complex (excluding Ruth) that runs from Deuteronomy through 2 Kings (called the Deuteronomistic History). One of the major Deuteronomistic interests in Judges is the concern for Israel to separate itself from those living in the land and to avoid worshipping their gods. Judges presents Israel's experience in terms of a recurring pattern of apostasy, defeat, and deliverance (2:11–19). As the book unfolds, however, it becomes apparent that the cycle of rebellion, oppression, and salvation reveals the larger picture of Israel caught up in a world of lawlessness and violence.

Many modern interpreters have been concerned about the portrayal of violence in Judges. Portions of the book seem to glorify the violent acts of Israel's judges. The exploits of Ehud (3:12–30), Deborah (4–5; cf. the act of Jael [4:17–22; 5:24–27]), and Samson (16:28–30) are prime examples. When the book gives tacit approval of such violence, however, it seems to recognize Israel as a victim in the grips of an oppressive and powerful enemy. In other situations, however, violence is a primary sign of Israel's deterioration. Indeed, Judges depicts Israel in a downward spiral in which violence is a sign of Israel's disorder. The final section of the book (chs. 17–21) shows the outbreak of violence and warfare as evidence that Israel failed to acknowledge properly God's sovereignty (see 17:6; 18:6; 19:1; 21:25).

The declining status of and violence done to women signifies Israel's deterioration as narrated in the book. Near the beginning, Caleb's daughter Achsah seeks a blessing from her father and he grants it (1:14–15). Deborah appears early in the cycle of judges as one of the most influential leaders in Israel (4–5). As the book progresses, however, women suffer more and more. Jephthah sacrifices his daughter (11:34–40). The men of Gibeah rape and murder a Levite's concubine (19:22–30). At the end of the book Israel traffics in women in an effort to restore the tribe of Benjamin (21). In other words, the violent treatment of women symbolizes the way in which Israel has lost its way during a time when "there was no king in Israel."

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. After Joshua, the Canaanites Remain (1:1–3:6)

Judges begins with a two-part introduction (1:1–2:5; 2:6–3:6) that draws attention to the failure of the Israelites in the period following Joshua's death. The first part focuses on military failure: Israel cannot drive out the Canaanites. This section ends with Israel weeping over its inability to secure the land (2:4–5). The second part deals with religious or covenantal failure. It introduces a pattern of apostasy, judgment, and divine deliverance that structures much of the rest of the book (2:11–19). The two panels cannot be sharply separated theologically. Israel's efforts to secure the land symbolize its obedience to the covenant; the land represents God's blessings on an obedient people (2:20–21).

A. Israel Fails to Secure the Land (1:1–2:5)

Judges 1:1–2:5 begins with the death of Joshua (1:1) and picks up where the book of Joshua left off, with the Israelite tribes going out to secure the territories assigned to them by casting lots (see especially Josh 15:1; 16:1; 17:1, 14, 17). Whereas Josh 1–12 suggests God's people acquired the land easily and quickly, Judg 1:1–2:5 presents a more complex picture. For this reason some scholars have characterized Judg 1:1–2:5 as more historically accurate than Josh 1–12 (and more in line with Josh 13–19, which differs from the prior chapters).

Judges 1:1–2:5 highlights the importance of Judah above the other tribes, which suggests this first section was written at a time when Judah was the dominant tribe and Jerusalem (1:8) was centrally important (perhaps after 722 BCE when the northern tribes were in exile). When the Israelites inquire as to which tribe should go up to take the allotted territory, God appoints Judah. He is initially successful (1:1–10), but the section as a whole portrays the progressive failure of the Israelites. Although Simeon is presented positively, he succeeds only under the auspices of Judah ("Judah said to his brother Simeon, 'Come up with me,' " 1:3). The rest of the tribes falter: the tribe of Benjamin, though represented well by Caleb (1:20), is not able to drive out the Jebusites (1:21); Joseph's tribes (Ephraim and Manasseh) are endowed with divine presence just as Judah ("the LORD was with them"; 1:22; cf. 1:19), and experience some success (1:22–26), but their achievements are qualified by the assessment that they "did not drive out" the residents of their territories (1:27, 29); the same is said of Zebulun (1:30), Asher (1:31–32), and Naphtali (1:33). The summary of the tribes' accomplishments and failures ends with the wholly negative portrait of Dan: "The Amorites pressed the Danites back into the hill country" (1:34).

Judah and Simeon defeat and capture Adonibezek (1:5–7), known in Josh 10:1–5 as leader of a royal coalition against the Israelites. Verses 6–7 depict the king as sub-human (like a dog beneath the table), typical treatment of a conquered enemy. Adoni-bezek's confession in v. 7 ("as I have done, so God has paid me back") is a warning about the ultimate punishment of one who uses power to practice cruelty (it is God who pays him back).

Judges 2:1–5 is linked to 1:1–3:6 by the theme of driving out the residents of the land (2:3). This section begins with "the angel of the LORD" going from Gilgal to Bochim. Gilgal was the place Joshua's army camped upon crossing the Jordan (4:19–24), the place Joshua circumcised those who were born in the wilderness (Josh 5:2–9), and the place the Israelites first celebrated Passover in Canaan (Josh 5:10–12). The identity of Bochim is uncertain, but it may well be another name for Bethel (see 21:2). The move from Gilgal to Bochim represents failure and disobedience. The angel declares that God will not abandon his covenant (2:1), but the Israelites have been unfaithful by making covenants with the people of the land (2:2). With such an indictment, the people weep (2:4) and the place is called Bochim, meaning "weeping" or "weepers."

B. Apostasy, Defeat, Deliverance (2:6–3:6)

This second introductory panel seems out of place. It begins with the final acts of Joshua, though 1:1 already reported what happened after his death. This may mean that 2:6–3:6 was the original beginning to the book of Judges. In any case, Judg 2:6–3:6 begins much like the book of Joshua ends, but with important differences that reflect the context of Judges. Like Josh 24, this section of Judges includes references to Joshua sending the people away to their inheritance (2:6; Josh 24:28), to Joshua's generation being obedient (2:7; Josh 24:31), and to Joshua's death and burial (2:8–9; Josh 24:29–30). Judges 2:6–10, however, focuses on the rise of the disobedient generation after Joshua. Judges 2:10b notes that the new generation "did not know the LORD," a line reminiscent of Exod 1:8 ("a new king arose over Egypt, who did not know Joseph").

Judges 2:11–23 then presents a pattern that highlights Israel's sinfulness on the one hand and God's graciousness on the other hand. The Israelites "did what was evil in the sight of the LORD" by worshiping other gods (2:11). Specifically, they followed after the Baals, local expressions of the Canaanite storm god, and the Astartes, representatives of a fertility goddess, the consort of Baal (2:13). As a result of this unfaithfulness, the Lord gave the Israelites over to their enemies (2:14–15). But God raised up judges to deliver them (2:16–17) because God was "moved to pity" by their suffering (2:18). Despite God's graciousness, however, the Israelites reverted to their unfaithful ways whenever a judge died (2:19).

The introduction to the book ends with a theological explanation for why the nations remained in Israel's midst; namely, God refused to drive out the nations because of Israel's disobedience to the covenant (2:20–21). Hence, God left the nations to test Israel's faith (2:22–23; 3:1–2). Israel would live among the nations (listed in other texts such as Deut 7:1). The final word of the introduction concerns Israel's failure to abide by the covenant in this context, as signaled by intermarriage with the people of the land and the worship of their gods (3:6; see Deut 7:3–4).

II. The Judges (3:7–16:31)

A. Othniel (3:7–11)

The report of the work of the first judge (known already from 1:13), though brief, includes the entire pattern introduced in Judg 2:11–19: the people did "what was evil in the sight of the LORD" (3:7); the "anger of the LORD was kindled" against them and the Lord gave them over to enemies (3:8); the Israelites cry to the Lord and he raises up Othniel as a deliverer (3:9); the spirit of the Lord is upon Othniel and he is successful (3:10); as a result, the land "had rest forty years" (3:11). The judges who follow may be evaluated by how their work follows or departs from this sequence.

B. Ehud (3:12–30)

The account of Ehud in Judg 3:12–30 makes for a great story: an intriguing hero, a suspenseful plot, and a mysterious murder. The story is set when the Moabites, led by King Eglon, oppress the Israelites and demand tribute from them. Ehud is chosen to deliver the yearly offering as a sign of Israel's loyalty. The intrigue begins with Ehud's tribal identity and his mode of operation as a soldier. As a Benjaminite he is literally a "son of the right hand." Judges 3:15 notes, however, that Ehud is "a left-handed man." The reference to his use of the left hand bears practical military importance. Literally v. 15 reports Ehud was "bound concerning his right hand." Judges 20:16 uses the same language to report that the Benjaminites had 700 soldiers specially trained as left-handed slingers. This perhaps means the Benjaminites restricted their soldiers' right arms in order to produce left-handed (or ambidextrous) fighters. This ability gave them a distinct advantage against other soldiers who assumed and were equipped for righthanded opponents. In the case of Ehud, use of the dagger with his left hand (which meant he placed it upon his right thigh; 3:16) allowed him to pass through King Eglon's security with the weapon undetected and to attack King Eglon without him suspecting foul play.

Judges 3:17 depicts Eglon as "a very fat man." Fat here is both a description of Eglon's physical appearance and a statement about his opulent lifestyle. The story is about the disadvantaged underdog, Israel, who defends itself against one of the biggest "fat cats" of the day.

Another key element of the story is the place King Eglon receives state visitors. The account seems to imply Ehud meets Eglon in a two-storied palace with a portico and public reception hall on the first floor and private chambers for the king on the second floor. The king's chamber includes a bathroom with a toilet (the "cool roof chamber" in 3:20). Such buildings have been discovered in northern Syria.

When Ehud returns (3:19) to seek a private audience with Eglon, he apparently meets the king on the second floor. The "secret" Ehud has for Eglon is perhaps news of another vassal's unfaithfulness, sensitive enough that it required a private conversation. Ehud reaches for his dagger with his left hand and drives it into Eglon, whereupon "the fat closed over the blade" (3:22). Then v. 23 reports that Ehud went out, closed the doors, and locked them, presumably from the outside. But at least two questions remain concerning the murder. One question is how Ehud escaped unnoticed. The sequence of events in v. 23 may indicate that the doors featured a tumbler lock accessible from the outside through a fistsized hole (as described in Song 5:4–6). The door would have been secured by means of a bolt that was released by raising the pins that held the bolt in place with a key that fit over the ends of the pins. Or Ehud may have exited through the toilet by lowering himself to the floor below, and then gone out through an access door used by royal janitors. However, this interpretation fails to take seriously the order of events in v. 23 and it ignores the lock system just described, which allows an easier explanation.

Another question is the meaning of the word rendered "dirt." This translation follows the Aramaic and Latin versions, which attempt to interpret a Hebrew word that they did not fully understand. There is a similar word in Akkadian that means "excrement" and the first three letters of the word form a Hebrew noun that does clearly mean "the contents of the intestines" (Lev 4:11). So apparently when Ehud's weapon goes into the belly of Eglon it ruptures his intestines, thus causing feces to emerge from the wound.

The story of Ehud concludes with him rallying the Israelites against Moab, thus giving the land "rest" for eighty years (vv. 26–30). The reference in 3:29 to the 10,000 Moabite soldiers all being "strong" could also mean "fat" (see the use of this word in v. 22 ["fat closed around the blade"] and see Hab 1:16 where this word is paired with the term used to describe Eglon in v. 17). Hence, the entire Moabite army is like King Eglon. This portrait enhances the idea that underdog Israel triumphs over a more wealthy and powerful enemy.

C. Shamgar (3:31)

Based on Shamgar's name (which is nonsemitic) and his identification as "son of Anat," some scholars have proposed he was a Canaanite warrior devoted to the goddess Anat (Baal's sister) and who may have served the Israelites as a mercenary. Such a claim is also strengthened by the pairing of his name with Jael (5:6); Jael was also a non-Israelite. All that can be said with certainty, however, is that Shamgar is presented as a mighty warrior who, like Samson, kills a multitude of Philistines with an unconventional weapon. Perhaps that similarity to Samson caused the report about Shamgar to appear at the end of ch 16 in some Greek manuscripts.

D. Deborah (4:1–5:31)

Judges 4–5 describe Deborah and her general Barak defeating Canaanite forces at Mount Tabor and then celebrating with a victorious hymn. The hymn in Judg 5 is one of the oldest passages in the OT, likely dating to the twelfth century, close to the events it recounts. Judges 4 is a later narrative account that appears to use the poetic version as its main source. However, the hymn now appears at the end of the narrative as a celebrative song performed by Deborah and Barak (note the way in which the two sections are linked by the comment in 5:1, "Then Deborah and Barak son of Abinoam sang on that day, saying").

It is important to assess the differences between Judg 4 and 5. The differences can be explained largely by considering how the writer of ch. 4 interprets and sometimes expands ch. 5. One may identify two primary tendencies: (1) the author of Judg 4 sometimes reads the poetic parallels in Judg 5 as though they are narrative and not poetry (hence, the writer treats them literally); (2) the writer of the narrative fills in the gaps of the poetic version by drawing upon other traditions that seem relevant (see below). As a result, it is appropriate to read ch. 4 both as a derivative account that has used ch. 5 as a source (noting how the author interpreted and supplemented the existing account) and as a coherent narrative.

4:1–24. Narrative Account. Verses 1–3 provide an introduction to the work of Deborah like that given for Othniel (3:7–9) and Ehud (3:12–14): Israel "did what was evil in the sight of the LORD" (4:1); the Lord "sold them" to their enemies (4:2); then the Israelites "cried out to the LORD for help" (4:3).

Judges 4:2 presents two figures who oppose the Israelites—Jabin and Sisera—though Judg 5 mentions only Sisera (5:20, 26; cf. 5:28–30 in which Sisera's mother awaits his return with the spoil). The addition of Jabin is likely influenced by the note in Judg 5:19 that Sisera led the forces of the "kings of Canaan." Joshua 11:1 identifies Jabin as king of Hazor, whereas Judg 4:2 knows him as the king "of Canaan."

Judges 4:3 reports Jabin's forces were formidable because they had "chariots of iron" (v. 3); the actual places iron was used on such vehicles is uncertain; perhaps the wheels were iron-covered or the poles at the front were made of iron. Chariots were important since they allowed infantry to move swiftly into position against an enemy. There is no record of the Israelites having chariot forces before the time of David (2 Sam 8:4).

Verse 4 introduces the unlikely hero Deborah. Translations of v. 4, however, may actually conceal some of the radical nature of Deborah's leadership. The label, "wife of Lappidoth," identifies her in a domestic role. The expression, however, could also be translated, "woman of Lappidoth" (thus identifying her with a place rather than with a husband) or perhaps "woman of fire." If understood this way, the focus is on Deborah's charisma. She is a fiery figure, one chosen by God and endowed with extraordinary gifts. As such, she is far different than the domestic figure one might expect.

Deborah's roles of prophetess and judge are a remarkable sign of God's favor. As with Greek oracles, Deborah is identified with a tree where the Israelites seek her for "judgment." They come for "decisions" (as JPS renders), that is, for divine judgment that she gives by virtue of her role as mediator between God and humans (the basic role of prophet).

Barak acknowledges Deborah's special status when he responds to her request that he lead in battle, "If you will not go with me, I will not go" (4:8b). Deborah affirms her prophetic gifts when she declares that Barak will not win glory for himself; instead, Sisera will fall to the hand of a woman (4:9). Ironically, however, the woman to whom he will fall is not Deborah the warrior but Jael, the tent-dwelling wife of Heber (4:17).

Although Deborah is identified as a judge for "Israel," the story of her battle with Sisera includes only two northern tribes, Zebulun and Naphtali (4:6, 10). Judges 5:14–18 hints at the involvement of other tribes, but their role is not clear. Hence, Judg 4's listing of only two tribes likely reflects the author's conservative approach to the original source.

Mount Tabor, where the battle takes place, is in the Lower Galilee, just to the south of the territory occupied by Zebulum and Naphtali. The Israelite troops are presented as militia fighters, summoned when needed, pitted against Sisera's standing army. The battle itself is described much like the defeat of Pharaoh at the Red Sea. Just as God did to the Egyptian troops, the Lord "threw Sisera and all his chariots and all his army into a panic" (4:15a; Exod 14:24). Indeed, the victory is attributed to divine action: "the Lord will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman" (4:9a); "the LORD has given Sisera into your hand. The LORD is indeed going out before you" (4:14); "So on that day God subdued King Jabin of Canaan before the Israelites" (4:23).

The account of Sisera's death and the defeat of his army begins with a brief explanation of why the tent of Heber the Kenite might seem to Sisera a hospitable place to escape from Barak (4:11). The Kenites were descendants of Moses' father-in-law and thus might be friendly to the Israelites. Heber, however, had separated from the other Kenites and migrated far to the north near Kadesh. This focus on Heber also paints Jael as a domestic figure (the wife of Heber), just as many translations of 4:4 present Deborah (as "wife of Lappidoth"). It is worth noting, however, that the tent in 4:17 is identified with Jael, not her husband.

Verses 12–16 portray Barak routing the forces of Sisera. Sisera escapes on foot while Barak pursues Sisera's chariots in another direction.

Sisera's retreat to the "tent of Jael, wife of Heber the Kenite" assumes a world dominated by tribal chieftains (v. 17). Sisera believes Heber is sympathetic to him and Jael confirms that impression by welcoming Sisera into the tent (v. 18). Jael here is portrayed either as Sisera's mother who dotes over him or as his lover, or perhaps as an ambiguous mixture of the two. She feigns affection for Sisera by giving him milk to drink when he asked only for water (v. 19). When he falls asleep beneath the cover Jael places over him she approaches him "softly" (v. 21), a statement that has sexual overtones (see Ruth 3:7 in which Ruth comes "softly" to Boaz at the threshing floor). She then takes in her hands a tent stake and mallet and drives the stake through Sisera's temple. The language here too has sexual overtones, but it reverses the typical aggressor (male) and victim (female) roles. The woman, who is often vulnerable to sexual assault by the soldier, becomes the aggressor and pierces the soldier.

5:1–31. Song of Deborah and Barak. Chapter 5 is a song that recalls the victory of ch. 4 and attributes the victory to God (see the same pattern of victory hymn following narrative in Exod 15). The song is addressed to God ("to the LORD I will sing," v. 3); twice the singer calls for participants to "bless the LORD" (vv. 2, 9); and the victory is cast as the outcome of God's mighty rule over cosmic forces (vv. 4–5). Even when human agents such as Deborah, Barak, and Jael appear, the hymn recognizes that heavenly forces assured the victory ("The stars fought from heaven, from their courses they fought against Sisera," v. 20). The hymn, which celebrates God's justice and judgment over oppressive forces, presents the deity as a divine warrior.

The song is attributed to Deborah and Barak (v. 1), but the verb "sing" is feminine singular, which implies that Deborah voices the hymn. Deborah's leadership of the celebration is understandable in light of women's roles in such rituals (see Exod 15:21; 1 Sam 18:6–7). Verse 7 also seems to identify Deborah as the speaker. Although NRSV renders "you arose" the verb is actually first-person singular, "I arose."

"When locks are long" (v. 2a) may refer to willing service in warfare (see v. 2b), though the exact inference here is debated. Free-flowing hair can be a metaphorical expression of the warrior's lack of restraint. Indeed, ancient Near Eastern iconography often depicts warriors with long and sometimes disheveled hair. But the long locks could also refer more specifically to Israel bursting free of oppression. This language (and the expression, "offer themselves willingly" in 2b) may be related to the nazirite vow not to cut the hair (see 13:5, cf. the free-flowing locks in Num 6:5).

Verses 4–5 describe a theophany (God's appearance in natural phenomena) typical of other victory hymns (Ps 68:7–10). The Lord's appearance from Seir/Edom in the Transjordan is present elsewhere (cf. God's appearance from Sinai in Ps 68:17 and the association of God with Sinai here).

Verses 6–9 set the battle in a time of social upheaval and relate the event to specific human characters (Shamgar; see 3:31; and Jael; see 4:17–22). Concerning the former, the time of the fight is marked by the prosperity of the "peasantry" under the leadership of Deborah. The label "mother" for Deborah refers to her authority and may apply to her prophetic role, just as Elijah and Elisha were called "father" (2 Kgs 2:1–2; 13:14). The plundering activity may reflect Robin Hood-like action against rich traders. Choosing "new gods" may refer to the rise of the Israelites under Deborah. Treaties were typically sealed by recognizing the deities as witnesses. Verse 8b indicates the miraculous rise of the Israelites who operated without the conventional military weapons (see 4:13).

Throughout vv. 10–13 there are hints that Israelites exist outside the typical power structures. They dwell in rural areas beyond the power of cities; hence, they march "down to the gates" (that is, to walled settlements), not from them (v. 11b; see also v. 13b, "they marched down for him against the mighty").

Verses 14–18 are often thought to distinguish those who answered the call to battle from those who did not, i.e., Ephraim, Benjamin, Machir (western part of Manasseh), Zebulun, and Issachar fought with Barak (vv. 14–15a), while Reuben, Gilead (not one of the tribes, but listed here), Dan, and Asher did not. Though vv. 15b–17 are often interpreted as statements of non-participation, however, the verbs translated "tarry" and "sat still" (vv. 16a, 17b) and "stayed" (v. 17a) typically mean "sit" or "dwell," but not "stay behind." Furthermore, the question about Dan (which is identical in form to that about Reuben) includes a verb that simply means "sojourn" or "live temporarily." The only clear statement about non-participation concerns Meroz (v. 23), an otherwise unknown group. Therefore, it cannot be determined with certainty what vv. 14–17 (and especially vv. 15b–17) say about these tribes. Perhaps for this reason the author of ch. 4 only named Zebulun and Naphtali as those who fought with Barak. Verse 18 praises them as those who "scorned death."

Verses 24–27 recount how Jael killed Sisera, albeit with strikingly different details than in 4:17–24. Verse 24 pronounces blessing on Jael in a poetic line that begins and ends with the expression, "May you be blessed" (NRSV, "Most blessed"). The expression "wife of Heber the Kenite" could also be translated "woman of the company of the Kenites" (see comment on 4:17 above). The poetry of vv. 25–27 suggests a very different sequence of events than those in the narrative in 4:19–21. The parallel expressions in v. 25, "he asked water"/"she gave milk"/"curds in a lordly bowl" do not suggest she provided something more than requested. Rather, this is a poetic device used to heighten and intensify the statement of what she provided (the substance provided becomes richer and more calorie-laden as the poetic line moves from start to finish, a common technique in Hebrew poetry; see Ps 51:5). Similarly, v. 26 suggests Jael hit Sisera with a blunt object, probably while he consumed what she had given him. Tent pegs could be substantial (Isa 33:20) and might well have been an object tent-dwellers would have grabbed in an act of selfdefense (as some have proposed, Jael might have been fending off a rape). At any rate, the parallel expressions, "her hand to the tent peg"/"her right hand to the workmen's mallet" do not suggest that Jael used two objects to kill Sisera. Rather, this is a poetic way of saying Jael used something available in the tent. This picture of the event is confirmed by v. 27, which reports Sisera fell at Jael's feet after she hit him. Verse 27 uses another technique common in Hebrew poetry to describe Sisera's end; it presents a miniature narrative in short parallel units: "he sank/ he fell/ he lay still at her feet/ at her feet he sank/ he fell/ where he sank, there he fell dead."

The song's penultimate section (vv. 28–30) portrays Sisera's mother waiting for her son to return from battle with the spoil. She is presented as the mirror opposite of Deborah. Both are "mothers" (v. 7), but Deborah represents the weak and oppressed Israelites (as prophet and warrior) while Sisera's mother is the picture of aristocracy (pampered and at leisure).

E. Gideon (6:1–8:35)

The name Gideon means "hacker." The title indicates his role as religious reformer, one who hacks down the idols of foreign deities (6:28–32). Despite his zeal for the purity of worship, however, his last act is the making of a cult object, an ephod, that leads Israel into idolatry (8:22–27). Hence, he is an ambiguous leader.

6:1–32. Call of Gideon. Judges 6:1–10 is an extended prelude to the call of Gideon. This section expands the pattern of activity in 2:11–23: Israel sinned against the Lord; the Lord gave them over to enemies; Israel cried to the Lord; the Lord sent a judge to deliver them. This lengthy prelude develops the basic pattern in three ways. First, the nature of the enemy's oppression is described in greater detail: The Midianites and the Amalekites decimated Israel's crops and impoverished them (6:3–6). Second, Israel's rebellion against God is characterized specifically as idolatry (6:10); Israel is tempted to pay heed to the deities of the peoples who oppress them. Finally, these verses describe an elaborate provision of a deliverer. God first sends a prophet who reminds Israel of how God delivered them in the exodus. Then the prophet indicts them for their disobedience (6:7–10). Only later does the narrator identify Gideon as the deliverer. This prophetic word hints at one of Gideon's main tasks, namely to rid Israel of its idol worship. The lengthy call of Gideon (6:11–32) implies that he bears great responsibility.

The commissioning of Gideon takes the form of other such stories in OT and is especially similar to the story of the call of Moses (Exod 3:1–4:17). Such accounts typically include the appearance of God or an angel. In this case "the angel of the LORD" appears to Gideon when he is threshing grain (6:11). As the story proceeds, however, the one speaking to Gideon is alternatively identified simply as "the LORD" (6:14, 16). The uncertain identity of the visitor is reminiscent of Jacob's nocturnal encounter with "a man" (Gen 32:22–32). The angel's visit also includes fire as a sign of his presence (6:21); hence the scene echoes that of Moses at the burning bush (Exod 3:1–6).

Such stories also include a divine address to the one being called and a specific task to be performed (Exod 3:7–10). In Judg 6:14 the angel says, "Go in this might of yours and deliver Israel from the hand of Midian; I hereby commission you."

Judges 6:11–32 is also like other commissioning stories in that the one being called expresses doubts about the mission, whereupon the divine visitor provides a sign of assurance that the mission will be successful. Gideon expresses repeated doubts, asking for multiple signs. In this way, Gideon is just like Moses who continued to object to the mission until God became angry with him (Exod 4:14). Gideon first questions the angel's address to him, "The LORD is with you, you mighty warrior" (v. 12). Although Gideon does not mention it directly, he might have questioned the label "mighty warrior." At the time of the angel's appearance, Gideon is doing the unassuming work of a farmer and hiding the produce from the enemy. What Gideon questions, however, is the notion that God is present. Gideon complains that God has "cast us off," language common in the Psalter (Pss 74:1; 88:14). Typical of such exchanges, the Lord then commissions Gideon to deliver the people (6:14). To this, Gideon objects that he is from a clan with no power or influence (v. 15; see the similar objection of Moses in Exod 3:11). But Gideon's unassuming family and his own low status as youngest child put him in the company of others like Jacob and David. The truth communicated here seems to be what Paul would later say to the Corinthian church, "God chose what is low and despised in the world, things that are not, to reduce to nothing things that are" (1 Cor 1:28). Indeed, the point is not that Gideon is strong, but that God is with him (v. 16; see 1 Cor 1:29).

After the Lord commissions Gideon, Gideon then asks for a sign, another typical feature of commissioning stories. The sign that follows, which involves Gideon setting up an altar at the place of the Lord's appearance, associates Gideon with Israel's patriarchs (Gen 12:7, 8; 13:18; 26:23–25). The sign of God's presence is a fire that springs from the rock of the altar when Gideon places his sacrifice there.

After the scene of commissioning, God instructs Gideon to tear down his father's altar to Baal. His father, Joash, is a member of Canaanite society and thus adheres to the idea that Baal brings fertility to the earth and economic prosperity to the people. Baal's altar is flanked by a "sacred pole" or Asherah. The sacred pole may represent a goddess associated with Baal. Gideon's action is a sign that his altar to the Lord has replaced the altar to Baal and that the Lord is in fact superior to the Canaanite deity. The ultimate sign of this transfer of allegiance is that the wood from the sacred pole by the altar to Baal is to be used as wood for the fire on the Lord's altar (6:25).

Gideon's destruction of his father's altar amounts to a complete rejection of the Canaanite worldview. It challenges strongly held ideas about the forces that control the world and what allegiance to such forces means. It is not surprising, therefore, that Gideon performs his act at night and in secret. After Gideon is determined to be guilty of the iconoclastic act (perhaps by the people inquiring through a prophet; see v. 29), the people of the town call on his father to bring him out to be killed. Joash recognizes, however, that power rests with Gideon's God. He therefore responds with legal language, let Baal "contend for himself" (v. 31). This expression thus explains the origin of Gideon's other name. He is called Jerubbaal which means, "let Baal contend" (v. 32). Although the story presents Jerubbaal as a name given when Gideon contended with Baal, it may have been his original name since the rest of the story refers to him primarily by this title (see 7:1).

6:33–8:3. Defeat of Midian and Amalek. After Gideon's initial success in destroying the altar of Baal, the enemies mentioned in 6:3 appear again (6:33). As before, the foe is portrayed as a group of allies consisting of the Midianites, Amalekites, and the "people of the east." Gideon seems prepared to lead the Israelites against the enemy since "the spirit of the LORD took possession of Gideon" (6:34). When the spirit came earlier upon Othniel (3:10) he delivered Israel from its enemies. Now, however, the divine spirit seems to have little effect upon Gideon, even though the tribes respond to Gideon's call to battle (6:34–35). Instead of leading the troops with confidence he instead asks for another sign of assurance.

Gideon's second request for a sign (6:36–40) suggests a lack of faith that might engender God's anger (6:39). Gideon asks two times for God to give a sign. The first request involves Gideon placing a fleece of wool on the threshing floor and asking God to fill the material with water from the dew, while the ground around remains dry (6:36–38). This sign may not have been that difficult to accomplish. It is a common practice to acquire fresh water in places without fresh-water streams. But then Gideon asked for the sign to be reversed, with the ground being wet with dew but the fleece remaining dry (6:39–40). God provides the miraculous signs that Gideon requested.

The subsequent account of Gideon's battle with the Midianites (7:1–8:3) reinforces God's support of and presence with Gideon, but it also subtly portrays Gideon's misplaced trust. The story begins with God ordering Gideon to reduce the number of troops going to battle in order to make clear that God alone would deliver Israel from its enemy. The warriors are not to say, "My own hand has delivered me" (7:2). Two tests reduce the number of troops. The first test reflects Moses' instructions to allow any warrior who was fearful to return home (Deut 20:8). This reduces the force from 32,000 to 10,000. The second test involves Gideon watching the troops as they drink from the stream. Only those who lap water like a dog are kept for the battle. So, with only 300 soldiers Gideon goes out to face the multitude of Midianites, Amalekites, and people of the east who "lay along the valley as thick as locusts" (7:12).

The account of the battle resembles the story of Joshua's battle at Jericho (Josh 6). Gideon's men blow trumpets to signal the fight (7:18, 19, 22), and the battle is won because God gives it into their hands (7:9, 14). The main difference is that Gideon also claims part of the credit for the victory. He instructs his troops to shout, "For the LORD and for Gideon" (7:18; cf. 7:20). Gideon claims for himself something that should be reserved only for God.

8:4–35. Gideon's Fall. The conclusion to the story of Gideon shows him to be an ambiguous figure. As 8:4–21 indicates, Gideon is successful as a commander in battle. The timid thresher of grain has indeed become a "mighty warrior" (6:11–12). It is possible to interpret these verses as an account of brutality that God does not mandate. Gideon treats his enemies cruelly, cutting off the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna (8:7) and killing the people of Succoth and Penuel (8:16–17). Nevertheless, Gideon's leadership in battle leads the Israelites to ask him to be their king (8:22). To his credit, Gideon responds by saying that only the Lord can rule over Israel (8:23).

What comes next, however, is a puzzling turn in the Gideon story. He asks the people to give him golden earrings they acquired as booty and with them he makes an ephod, an object associated with divination (8:27). The reason for making this object is not clear. It is possible that Gideon's fashioning of the ephod indicates that he abdicates his own responsibility as leader. Instead of "ruling" Israel, he provides an object meant to help them seek God's guidance. Regardless of the rationale for the ephod, it leads Israel astray. As 8:27 says, "all Israel prostituted themselves to it." At the end of his life Gideon is given a hero's burial (8:32), but his legacy is ambiguous. As soon as Gideon dies, the Israelites returned to worshiping the Baals and practicing idolatry (8:33–35).

F. Abimelech (9:1–57)

Gideon's son Abimelech is the first Israelite in the Bible to take the title "king." The fact that his story portrays his rule so negatively is evidence that Judges is not simply intended to prepare readers for the monarchy. Instead, the account shows how unjust monarchy can be.

Since ch. 9 never says that Abimelech "judges" Israel, his story should in fact be read as a continuation of the story of Gideon. His name ironically means "my father is king." Titles like this typically indicate that the person descended from a king or that his own kingship has been approved by the deity, the divine monarch. The first possibility does not apply since Gideon declared that neither he nor his son would rule over Israel. Indeed, he said only God could be Israel's king (8:23). The second scenario also does not apply. God does not give Abimelech his authority; he takes it by force.

Though Abimelech seeks to be king, his rule is not an attempt to create a national political entity. Rather, his authority is limited to a territory associated with his own kinship group. He convinces the "lords of Shechem" to anoint him alone as their ruler rather than have Gideon's seventy sons as authorities over them. They agree and provide him with money to form an army (9:4). Soldiers in such an army were typically at the bottom of the social order, without inheritance or standing (see 11:3; 1 Sam 22:2), but their identity here as "worthless and reckless fellows" also paints them with disdain (2 Sam 6:20). This characterization of Abimelech's troops is consistent with the description of Abimelech and his actions to secure his rule. After receiving the support of the people of Shechem, Abimelech murders his brothers in order to ensure his place as king. He was born to Gideon's concubine and thus had less status than the sons of Gideon's wives (on the significance of the concubine see the discussion of 19:1). Hence, Abimelech attempts to gain power and influence through means other than an inheritance. The people of Shechem then make Abimelech king at a sacred location, marked by a tree (see the reference to the palm of Deborah in 4:5).

Jotham, Gideon's youngest son, is the sole survivor of Abimelech's murderous plot. He denounces Abimelech's actions with a parable delivered from Mount Gerizim, a place outside Shechem closely associated with covenant-making (Josh 8:30–35). Jotham recounts that the trees looked among themselves for a king (9:8). But neither the olive tree (9:9), nor the fig tree (9:10–11), nor the vine (9:12–13) would accept the position. Each had its own important work to do, producing fruit that sustains and enriches life. Only the worthless bramble agrees to be king (9:14–15). The poem ends with the bramble's ironic declaration of its desire to provide "shade" or "refuge" for the other trees. As a mere scrub bush it cannot provide shade. The fable may not be intended as a critique of monarchy in general, but of the type Abimelech established, namely, rule founded on murder and deceit.

The remainder of the story of Abimelech narrates his downfall (9:22–57). God sends "an evil spirit" that creates dissension between Abimelech and the lords of Shechem. God's disapproval comes specifically because of Abimelech's violent killing of his seventy brothers (9:24). Thus, Abimelech must fight for control of his kingdom. At this point, two new characters enter the story—Gaal, who opposes Abimelech and wins the support of the lords of Shechem (9:26–29), and Zebul, the "ruler of the city" who continues to support Abimelech (9:30–33). With the help of Zebul, Abimelech fights Gaal for control of Shechem.

Abimelech wins the battle, razes the city, and kills all who are within its fortifications (9:45). This act shows how violent Abimelech really is. His dispute was with the lords of Shechem, not the commoners in the city, but he kills all of them. Moreover, after destroying Shechem he "sowed it with salt," which may mean he poisoned the ground so crops could not be grown in the territory again. Then Abimelech turns to the lords of Shechem who retreat to the Tower of Shechem, a fortified portion of a temple (9:46). Abimelech burns the tower and kills all those inside.

The victory of Abimelech at Shechem, however, comes back upon him when he continues to pursue his enemies at the city of Thebez (9:50–57). The people of Thebez retreat into a tower fortress just as the people of Shechem had done and Abimelech proceeds to burn the tower as he had burned the tower of Shechem. But Abimelech approaches the wall too closely and a woman drops a millstone on him. The millstone was an object a woman could hold in her hand, not what one imagines as a lethal weapon. That fact, and the fact that a woman dropped it on Abimelech is the ultimate sign of shame. Although Abimelech's armor bearer actually kills him with his sword to avoid it being said that "A woman killed him" (9:54), the manner of Abimelech's death was remembered for generations (2 Sam 11:21). To the extent that he is killed by a woman, Abimelech is like Sisera who is killed by Jael (4:9).

The story of Abimelech concludes with the statement that "God repaid Abimelech" for his violent acts (9:56) and God brought on Shechem the curse of Jotham. It is significant that in a book that seems to favor the Israelites over the Canaanites and supports the Israelite "conquest" of Canaan, God punishes Israelites when they behave inappropriately.

G. Tola and Jair (10:1–5)

These two judges provide a respite from the tumultuous times associated with Abimelech. They are often called "minor" judges because no narratives have survived about their activities. Both are said to have "judged" Israel (10:2, 3) and both are said to have ruled for an extended period (Tola, twenty-three years, 10:2; Jair, twenty-two years, 10:3).

H. Jephthah (10:6–12:7)

10:6–16. Rebellion, Oppression, and Divine Sorrow. This section describes the Israelites' rebellion against God according to the pattern introduced in 2:11–23: Israel worshiped the Baals and Astartes; the Lord was angry and allowed their enemies to defeat them. However, here the rebellion and subsequent punishment is intensified by the additional note that the Israelites serve the gods of Sidon, Moab, the Ammonites, and the Philistines. In other words, they worship the deities of all their enemies identified to this point (plus Sidon, which has not appeared until now). In turn, the Israelites are "sold" by God to two enemies—the Philistines and the Ammonites—not just one as before.

To their credit, the Israelites confess their unfaithfulness (v. 10). God responds, however, by reminding Israel of this recurring pattern; from the time of their oppression in Egypt (see the reference to the Egyptians in v. 11) the people have cried to God when their enemies oppressed them. Each time God delivered them from bondage, but each time Israel turned to other gods. Hence, God's declaration in v. 13a, "You have abandoned me" seems like a summary concerning Israel's disobedience rather than simply a declaration of one more instance of unfaithfulness. The pronouncement in v. 13b, "I will deliver you no more" is likewise a final statement. The character of vv. 10–15, however, provides the context for a radically different conclusion in v. 16. Verse 16a reports that Israel "put away the foreign gods" and "worshiped the LORD" (even without a promise of deliverance). Verse 16b then records one of the greatest expressions of divine pathos in OT. NRSV renders, "he could no longer bear to see Israel suffer," but this is a circuitous translation that does not adequately reflect the deep emotion the Hebrew communicates. The subject is actually "his soul" or "his life" (NRSV, "he"). The verb means "to be cut short." Although the meaning of this expression is uncertain (cf. RSV, "became indignant"), it probably means that God experienced sorrow, hence, God's life was diminished. Next comes an expression that explains the cause of God's disquietude, cf. Num 23:21; Isa 53:11. God was saddened (perhaps "cut to the quick") by Israel's suffering. This portrait of God provides an important balance to the frequent statement that God's anger "was kindled" against Israel (2:14, 20; 3:8; 10:7). The notion that God suffered because of Israel's suffering is consistent with the summary statement in 2:18, that God "would be moved to pity by their groaning."

10:17–11:28. Rise of Jephthah. Jephthah is introduced as an unlikely hero, the son of a prostitute who is rejected by his half brothers (11:1–3). His identity as the son of a prostitute has more to do with his place (or lack of a place) in the father's lineage than with any stigma attached to such disreputable birth. Being born to a woman other than his father's wife allows the sons of the legitimate wife to exclude him from the inheritance (v. 2). The omniscient narrator identifies Jephthah's father as Gilead.

The story of Jephthah is similar to those of Abimelech (Judg 9) and David (1 Sam 16:1–13), men forced to find wealth and position apart from the resources of the household of the father (David being the youngest of seven sons, thus virtually assured of inheriting nothing). Jephthah gathers around him others who were economically disadvantaged. They "went raiding," that is, they became mercenaries or guerrilla fighters (again, like David [1 Sam 22:2], as well as Jeroboam [2 Chron 13:6–7] and Abimelech [Judg 9:4]).

Jephthah wins the support of the elders of Gilead and then leads them successfully against the Ammonites. He shows himself particular adept at negotiation by arguing on the basis of Israel's history for the territory they possess (11:12–28). When the Ammonites fail to solve territorial issues through negotiation, Jephthah then leads the people of Gilead militarily.

11:29–40. Jephthah's Vow and the Death of His Daughter. Despite Jephthah's successful beginning, his story turns tragic when he makes a vow to enlist God's help in his battle with the Ammonites. The vow is a pledge that implies a self-curse if not upheld. In this case, the vow is part of Jephthah's preparation for battle, a practice attested elsewhere (Judg 21:1–3). The content of the vow, however, eerily anticipates the tragic end of the story. Jephthah's promise is ambiguous and open-ended; according to NRSV, he pledges to sacrifice "whoever comes out of the doors of my house" (11:31). But the expression, "whoever comes out" translates a participle that is masculine singular and could be translated "whatever comes out." It is possible to speculate that Jephthah assumed a domestic animal would emerge first when he arrived home. The first floor of houses in this period typically had a central courtyard where domestic animals were kept. But the courtyard was also used for cooking and other domestic chores and would have been a typical work place for women. Therefore, it should also not be a surprise that Jephthah's daughter, his only child, was the first to come out of the house.

The daughter in fact came out specifically to meet her father "with timbrels and with dancing" (11:34a), which would also not be unexpected. Women had a particular role as leaders in victory celebrations (see the same expression, "with timbrels and dancing" in Exod 15:20). When Saul's army returned victorious the women of the villages met them with celebrative songs (1 Sam 18:6–7).

It is possible to read into the story divine neglect of Jephthah's daughter. The story has parallels to Gen 22:1–19. Jephthah's daughter is called the "only" child (v. 34), as Isaac is also identified (Gen 22:2, 12, 16). But while a voice from heaven directs Abraham not to sacrifice Isaac, in Judg 11:34–

40 God is silent here. The story itself, however, provides no information about either divine approval or disapproval.

The ambiguity of Jephthah's vow is probably best left unexplained and the story is probably best read as a tragedy, similar to Greek tragedies. Jephthah has a fatal flaw that finally undoes him and his daughter. One main issue that plays out is Jephthah's lack of inheritance. Being excluded by his half brothers from a share in the father's property, Jephthah works his way into power and wealth by means of military and negotiating skills. When he oversteps his bounds ("negotiating" with God) by making his vow, however, he ensures that his own property, and his name, will not be passed on. The emphasis on his daughter being his "only" child suggests this point is primary. Further, Jephthah's comment to his daughter when he sees her coming out of his house should be understood in this light ("Alas, my daughter! You have brought me very low; you have become the cause of great trouble to me;" 11:35ab). His "great trouble" refers to his loss of his progeny.

The story ends with the daughter taking initiative: she responds to her father with a request to go for two months with her friends to "bewail" her "virginity" (11:37). After Jephthah grants her request (11:38a), she departs (11:38b). When the daughter returns, she gives herself over to the vow (11:39a). A final note then links the lament over her virginity to a custom among daughters in Israel of lamenting Jephthah's daughter for four days each year (11:39b–40).

The main question regards the meaning of the daughter lamenting her virginity. The word for virginity refers to the state of a woman who has not had sexual relations (Deut 22:14–15, 19ab; cf. "young woman" in Deut 22:19a). The emphasis in this case, however, may be more the young woman's marriageable age than her lack of sexual experience. The daughter perhaps "bewails" (literally, "weeps over") something related to this state, the major time of transition for a young woman in ancient Israel. But why did she weep over "her virginity" and why would this one woman's tragic experience produce a ritual for all daughters in Israel, as 11:40 indicates? One key may be in the broad similarities between this story of Jephthah's daughter and European folk tales about young women held captive in towers (Rapunzel) or otherwise captured (as in "Beauty and the Beast") or put to sleep ("Sleeping Beauty" and "Snow White"). In each case, the resolution of the story—release from the tower, from a beast, or from a death-like sleep—leads to the young woman becoming a wife. Hence, the stories both recognize the anxiety-producing nature of the time between childhood and womanhood, and reinforce the role of women in patriarchal society, namely as daughter and as wife/mother. The story of Jephthah's daughter particularly emphasizes the relationship between father and daughter.

The relationship between the two primary characters here is not a caricature of father/daughter relations in patriarchal social structures. First, it should be noted that the daughter's centrality to inheritance implies a higher status for her than one might expect. Only sons were to inherit property (Deut 21:17) unless the inheritance could only be passed on to daughters (Josh 17:3–8; see also the special case of Job 42:15). Here her role as heir to Jephthah's property provides the crux for the story. Second, the daughter appears as an actor in the story, not just as a victim of her father's vow. Although she acquiesces to her father's vow, nevertheless she expresses her opinion, makes a request of her father, and creates the ritual that is passed on to the daughters in Israel. In the end the story remains androcentric, but the daughter is not simply a silent pawn in its plot.

12:1–7. Jephthah's Violent Legacy. Jephthah's story ends sadly, with this once successful negotiator unable to maintain peace between the Israelite tribes. Conflict arises when the tribe of Ephraim complains that Jephthah did not include them in battle against the Ammonites (12:1). The complaint probably stems from the Ephraimites' desire to share the spoils. Jephthah says he called the Ephraimites to aid him, but they did not respond (12:2b–3). The story in Judg 11 does not report this. Hence, it is not clear whether the account implies that Jephthah is lying, or perhaps that such a call to arms was implied when tribes in coalition were engaged in conflict with outside forces. What is clear is that Jephthah could not avert violence between Ephraim and Gilead, as Gideon has earlier had done (the Ephraimites made the same complaint to Gideon; see 8:1). Instead, "Jephthah gathered all the men of Gilead and fought with Ephraim" (12:4).

I. Ibzan, Elon, Abdon (12:8–15)

The brief accounts about Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon provide little information except that Ibzan and Abdon had numerous sons, a sign of their influence as tribal chiefs. Brief accounts like these perhaps helped establish the paradigmatic number twelve as the number of judges who ruled Israel (the text never says Abimelech "judged" Israel; thus he stands outside this number).

J. Samson (13:1–16:31)

Samson is a famously flawed hero, known best for his incredible strength. The most positive aspect of Samson's story perhaps lies in the battles with the Philistines that shape Samson's "public" life. Samson represents Israel in its marginal state as victim of an oppressive power. Indeed, Samson's life is framed by the Philistine conflict (13:1; 16:23–30) and his role as deliverer.

Despite the potentially positive value of the Samson story, he also embodies much of what is wrong with Israel in the book of Judges. Samson sleeps with a prostitute (16:1–3) just as Israel "prostituted" itself with foreign gods (the same root is used in 2:17 and 8:33). Although the story begins with the lofty portrayal of Samson as a nazirite, he eventually breaks every vow. As the last judge, Samson stands in contrast with Othniel, the first and model judge, in two important ways: (1) unlike Othniel, who married an Israelite woman from a devout family (1:11–15), Samson has a string of bad relationships with foreign women who lead him astray; (2) Othniel delivered Israel from its enemies and gave them "rest" for forty years (3:9, 11), but Samson could only "begin to deliver Israel" (13:5). The end of his life marks no period of relief from Israel's enemies (16:35).

Samson's career as Israel's deliverer also marks the culmination of the worst impulses of previous judges. Gideon and Jephthah at times were given over to revenge and settling personal vendettas (8:4–9, 13–17; 12:1–6), but now Samson is consumed with such acts (14:19; 15:7, 14–17; 16:28–30). Hence, Samson's career punctuates the period of decline that is the period of the judges; it anticipates the complete lawlessness with which the book ends.

13:1–25. Samson's Birth. The opening verse of the Samson story (13:1) repeats part of the established pattern for the work of the judges: the Israelites "did what was evil" and the Lord handed them over to the Philistines for forty years. But what typically comes next—the Israelites cry to the Lord for deliverance—is missing (2:11, 14; 3:7–8, 12; 4:1–2; 6:1; 10:7–8). This missing element is a subtle sign that God's use of judges to rescue the Israelites has become ineffective. The failure of Israel to cry out to God implies that they do not even know how to call for help. This implication of the missing element is evident in 15:11 where the Israelites protest Samson's challenge to the Philistines by saying, "the Philistines are rulers over us." At the end of the Samson story, the relief from Philistine rule is only partial, with no summary statement concerning the number of years the Israelites had peace after Samson's time as judge.

The birth of Samson is foretold by the angel of the Lord to Samson's mother, the wife of Manoah. She is identified as barren (v. 2), which, along with the angelic visit, signals the extraordinary nature of the birth and the importance of the child (see similar stories of Isaac in Gen 11:30; 21:1–7; and Samuel in 1 Sam 1:1–28).

The angel instructs the woman not to drink wine or to touch anything unclean (v. 4) because the child will be a nazirite. The word nazirite means "separated one" or "consecrated one" and normally refers to an adult who takes a vow for a limited period of time (see Num 6:1–21). Samson, however, is to be a nazirite from birth and, apparently, for life. Numbers 6:1–21 stipulates three requirements for the nazirite: to abstain from wine, not to cut their hair, and to avoid touching a corpse. Samson's mother in essence begins to fulfill two aspects of the vow for him in-utero. All three of these requirements eventually play an important role in revealing Samson's weaknesses and failure to remain true to his nazirite identity.

After the angel appears to the woman, she reports the experience to her husband Manoah who, in turn, asks God to repeat the experience for him. The appearance of the angel of the Lord to Manoah seems to be written with knowledge of two stories in Genesis. Manoah's hospitality (v. 15) is like that Abraham extended to the three visitors who came to him (Gen 18:1–15). The attempt to learn the angel's name (v. 17) is similar to Jacob's effort to learn the name of the visitor with whom he wrestled (Gen 32:29). These allusions to the stories of the patriarchs, plus the motif of angelic visitation to a barren woman, suggest God is expending all possible effort in the birth of Samson. The previous judge's work (Jephthah) ended in failure, marked by intertribal conflict. Hope now rests on Samson.

14:1–15:20. Marriage at Timnah. The account of Samson's birth in ch. 13 raises great expectations for him to deliver Israel. The first story of Samson as an adult, however, immediately shatters those expectations. Samson marries a Philistine woman in violation of covenant regulations (Deut 7:3–4). In route to and during his wedding he breaks one, and possibly two of his nazirite vows. Throughout chs. 14 and 15, Samson seeks vindication on the Philistines who have wronged him, thus misusing his physical strength. Despite the selfish motivation of these acts, however, the story claims that God uses them to bring about Israel's deliverance (14:4).

Samson is born in Zorah, a town on the border between Israelite and Philistine territory. The account in chs. 14–15 turns on issues especially pertinent to residents of such an area. The covenant God established with Israel demanded separation from the people of the land, with particular emphasis on avoidance of marriage contracts with them (2:2; Deut 7:3–4). Samson's first act is to request his father and mother to arrange a marriage with a Philistine woman at Timnah, another town on the border between Philistine and Judahite territory. Recognizing the covenantal implications, his parents suggest marriage to an Israelite woman. But Samson insists, "Get her for me, because she pleases me" (v. 3; see v. 2). His words, "she pleases me" is, literally, "she is pleasing in my eyes." This statement anticipates the refrain that will appear later in the book, "all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (17:6; 21:25). Samson's disregard for the covenant seems to symbolize Israel's turn away from God's expectations.

Judges 14:5–9 is the first account of Samson breaking his nazirite vows even as he displays his legendary strength. Reference to the "vineyards of Timnah" (v. 5) is a subtle indication that Samson disregards his vow since he is to refrain from any product (food or drink) from the vine (13:14; Num 6:3–4). The portion of the vow he actually breaks in ch. 14, however, is the prohibition against touching a corpse (Num 6:6). On the way to Timnah, Samson kills a lion barehanded because the "spirit of the Lord rushed on him" (v. 6). According to Lev 11:27, the lion itself is ritually impure, thus rendering Samson unclean. But when he returns from meeting the woman at Timnah he takes honey from the beehive in the lion's carcass, a breach of nazirite regulations.

The next portion of the story (vv. 10–20) turns on the difficult union of rival groups—Philistines and Israelites—through marriage. The feast (v. 10) indicates the groom's contribution to the proceedings were meant to bring the two groups together. This event also seems to be the occasion for Samson to break the restriction against partaking of strong drink (Num 6:3–4; 13:4). The wedding feast is identified by a Hebrew word that implies drinking. So, although the story does not report it directly, Samson appears to violate his nazirite status. A significant feature of the feast is the assignment of thirty Philistine companions for the Israelite groom. The attempt to bring the two groups together, however, ultimately fails. Samson proposes a riddle, based on his discovery of the honey in the lion's carcass: "Out of the eater came something to eat. Out of the strong came something sweet" (v. 14). The riddle in turn is the center of a wager of sixty garments. When the Philistines cannot solve the riddle, they threaten Samson's wife and her family. She then nags him for the length of the festival until he reveals the solution to the riddle. When she discovers the answer to the riddle and provides it to the thirty Philistines, they give Samson the answer just before their time is up ("before the sun went down," v. 18). Their response, however, is not straightforward. Rather, it is formed as a question, "What is sweeter than honey? What is stronger than a lion?" (v. 18). Hence, their answer both solves the riddle (they identify lion and honey and eater/strong and sweet) and poses another one. The answer to their counter-riddle seems to be love or human passion (Song 8:6, "love is strong as death").

Samson's offers a poetic response to his companions that is also filled with sexual (and chauvinistic) overtones: "If you had not plowed with my heifer, you would not have found out my riddle" (v. 18). Throughout the Samson story (and throughout much of Judges) women are treated as commodities, as those owned or controlled by men. So here Samson refers to his wife as "my heifer," and his charge that the companions have "plowed" with her may imply that they have used her sexually. Whoever is in control of the woman sexually has advantage in the narrative. But ironically, the women Samson tries to control end up controlling him (the wife at Timnah in 14:17 handles Samson like Delilah does in 16:16). After being bested by the Philistines at Timnah, Samson goes into a rage, attributed again to the spirit of the Lord (v. 19), and kills thirty men at Ashkelon, an important Philistine city (see Josh 13:3). Then Samson abandons his wife, an act tantamount to divorce. Hence, her father gives her to Samson's best man.

Chapter 15 continues the story of Samson's wedding at Timnah with Samson returning to reclaim his wife whom he left earlier. Themes from the previous chapter continue, particularly the picture of women as desirable property used by husbands and fathers (v. 3) and of Samson's hotheaded action. Verses 4–8 narrate the first story of Samson's Herculean strength and v. 6 confirms that he uses it to settle a personal vendetta against the Philistines. When the men of Judah bind him and hand him over to the Philistines and he breaks the ropes, the scene anticipates the Delilah story in which he will twice be bound and break free (16:7–12).

In a more positive way, however, Samson ful-fills a role in this story best characterized by the label "wild man." Every culture seems to know such characters, from the Gilgamesh epic (the character Enkidu) to Medieval stories of wild men raised by animals. Wild men are closer to the untamed wilderness than to urban culture; they live alone in desolate places; they have power over wild animals; they use crude or unconventional implements (usually from the natural world) to conquer foes; and they are hairy! Samson has already been characterized as a person with long hair (as part of his nazirite identity). In 14:6 he kills a lion with his bare hands. Now in 15:4–5 Samson uses an army of foxes with fiery tails to get back at the Philistines. Later (15:15) he uses the jawbone of a donkey to kill 1, 000 Philistines. In 15:8 Samson hid "in the cleft of the rock of Etam," thus confirming his loner status.

Nonetheless, Samson's wildness is a mark of God's favor (for example, Samson's long hair ensures his strength and God's favor), whereas typically such characters become acceptable to God only when they are tamed. This view of Samson's wildness probably reflects the way in which Samson represents Israel in these stories. In terms of culture and military sophistication, Israel is inferior to the Philistines. But as outsiders and underdogs, Israel is favored by God (cf. Deut 32:10–13 which depicts Israel as a wilderness creature adopted by God and nursed with wild honey). Perhaps for that reason, God's spirit is with Samson, the wild man. His wildness represents the opposite of the sophistication and oppressiveness of the Philistines. Hence, Samson, with all his rash reactions and seemingly selfish acts of revenge, at some level represents liberation from oppression for Israel.

16:1–3. The Prostitute at Gaza. Samson's second sexual encounter is with a prostitute at Gaza, one of the five major Philistine cities. This brief story alludes to much of what has already been revealed about Samson in chs. 14–15: he lusts after foreign women; these women lead him into encounters with Philistine adversaries; the trysts do not lead to permanent relationships; Samson maintains his status as a loner. Samson's visit with the prostitute of 16:1–3 gives the men of Gaza opportunity to kill him. They lay a trap, waiting for his appearance at morning. But Samson tricks the Philistines by leaving the prostitute at midnight. Not only does he escape their trap, he also takes the city gate with him. The scene is Paul Bunyan-like. Genesis 22:17 refers to Israel's dominance over its enemy as "possessing their gate," and here Samson takes the gate, literally. He moves it from Gaza to the Israelite city of Hebron, some forty miles away.

16:4–31. Delilah and the Death of Samson. The final story of Samson's love life is much like the one in ch. 14. Samson is attracted to a woman who lures him into a trap for the Philistines. The name Delilah in Hebrew means "flirtatious," which fits her role in the story. Unlike Samson's first two lovers, however, her ethnic identity is uncertain. She lives in the valley of Sorek, an area within Israelite territory, some thirteen miles southwest of Jerusalem. Perhaps this means Samson finally listened to his parents and sought after an Israelite woman. Still, the area in which she lives is border territory and the Philistines use her to capture Samson. Whatever Delilah's ethnic identity, she differs from the first two women since she gets information from Samson for money.

Verses 4–22 narrate the way in which Delilah coaxes from Samson the secret to his strength. Two themes dominate the story. First, Delilah deceives Samson, just as the wife at Timnah had done, through constant nagging (14:17; 16:16). Second, Samson is overconfident, apparently believing he is the author of his own strength when in reality it comes from God. He knows, of course, that his strength derives from his nazirite vow to God (16:17), but his willingness to play with Delilah and the Philistines concerning the source of his strength exemplifies an overconfidence in his control of it (see especially 16:20).

The story has four movements. Each movement includes Delilah asking Samson to reveal the source of his strength (vv. 6, 10, 13, 15); Samson revealing, or supposedly revealing it (vv. 7, 11, 13, 17); Delilah acting on Samson's information (vv. 8, 12, 14, 19); and Delilah calling the Philistines to take Samson (vv. 9, 12, 14, 20). It may be tempting to think Samson a dolt since he revealed the source of his strength after Delilah called the Philistines on him three times before. The sequence of four episodes, however, is a typical storytelling technique that builds suspense (cf. Matt 13:1–9) and, if anything, it underscores Samson's arrogance, not his stupidity.

The final movement ends with the Philistines seizing Samson, gouging out his eyes, and making him grind at the prison mill. Since grinding grain was the work of women in the ancient Near East, this may be an attempt to feminize Samson, a common treatment of enemy soldiers (2 Sam 10:4). The movement ends, however, with a hint of what is to come: Samson's hair begins to grow back and, with it, his strength.

Verses 23–31 present a later scene as the Philistines gather to sacrifice to Dagon, their chief god of fertility. Samson's final act is a repudiation of the Philistines and their deity. His prayer is followed by the return of his strength. The conclusion to his story (v. 31) presents an honorable burial in his family tomb and a positive note that "he had judged Israel twenty years."

III. Downward Spiral of Violence (17:1–21:25)

The final major section of the book of Judges provides testimony concerning the failure of the era of the judges and of their leadership. This portion of the book is punctuated by the repeated refrain, "In those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (17:6; 18:6; 19:1; 21:25). These final chapters show the Israelites at the end of a downward spiral that is narrated throughout the book, but especially since the judge Jephthah (see 12:1–7).

A. Micah, the Levite, and the Danites (17:1–18:31)

Judges 17:1–18:31 reports the first scene in the decline of the Israelites in a story about an idolmaker and an opportunistic Levite who hires himself out as a priest. The account is set in northern territory. The story centers on a certain Micah and his mother. The name Micah (v. 1) is ironic in that it means "Who is like the LORD?" and yet the bearer of the name, and the other characters in the story seem to act in opposition to God. Micah initially embezzles money from his mother (17:2, "I took it"). When he returns it, his mother dedicates the money to the construction of an idol (17:3). The refrain in 17:6 offers indirect disapproval of this behavior. It is the act of an individual who creates a shrine without approval from a centralized authority. Although the story portrays a time when such images may have been accepted at local shrines, the reference to the house of God at Shiloh (18:31) hints at what would become official policy later: only one sanctuary is designated as the place of God's presence, first Shiloh and later Jerusalem (Jer 26:6).

Micah steals a sum of eleven hundred pieces of silver. The amount draws the reader back to the story of Samson, for this is the same amount each Philistine gave Delilah to betray the Israelite strong man (16:5). Although the story does not explicitly refer to the Samson account, the amount of money suggests that no good will come in the following events.

The description of the idol in 17:3 uses two words, one indicating something hewn (perhaps from wood) and the other an object cast with metal. This figure was probably an image carved out of wood and then overlaid with precious metal (a silver-plated calf similar to the one described here has been discovered at Ashkelon). In addition to this object, Micah also constructs an ephod and a teraphim, objects used for divination, and sets them up in his personal shrine. He then installs his son as priest.

Judges 17:7–13 introduces a Levite from Bethlehem who goes out looking for employment and a place to live. As one who did not inherit property, the Levite was to be supported by the community through its offerings at the sanctuary (Deut 18:1–8). This story may come from a time before such institutional support, or after the exile when support was difficult to find. In this narrative, the Levite hires himself out to Micah and becomes his private priest. Micah provides wages and essential goods. Micah believes that hiring the holy man brings God's favor on him, that he has, in effect, hired God (17:13).

The story of Micah and the Levite illustrates well the situation when "there was no king in Israel," that is, when the Israelites did not properly recognize God's authority over them (17:6). The subsequent story also begins with the same reference to there being "no king in Israel" and it too demonstrates the lawless character of Israelite behavior. Judges 18 recounts how the tribe of Dan searched for a territory to occupy and acquired one by attacking the innocent and defenseless people of Laish.

Judges 18:1 explains that the tribe of Dan had no allotted territory and therefore needed a place to live. This report directly contradicts Josh 19:41–46, which says Dan was given territory just to the north of Judah and extending west into traditional Philistine areas. Joshua 19:47 notes, however, that Dan lost its southern territory and moved north to the area at the center of the account in Judg 18.

The Danites begin their quest for a homeland by sending out spies. Given the negative assessment of spy missions in Num 13 and Josh 2, this does not speak well for them. The spies come to the home of Micah and encounter the Levite through whom they inquire about the success of their mission (18:5). Their target is the city of Laish (18:7). The people of the town are described as remarkably peaceful ("quiet and unsuspecting"; v. 7), simply minding their own business. Moreover, their distance from any of Israel's enemies indicates they are completely without malice and pose no threat to the Danites. This situation stands in contrast to other stories that depict Israel's "legitimate" conquest and holy war. Numbers 13:27–33; Josh 6; 10:1–11; and 11:1–5 describe powerful and aggressive enemies who oppose Israel. In Judg 18 the Danites are powerful and aggressive and take land from the weak and unsuspecting.

The Danites ironically carry out their mission with the tacit approval of God. The Levite indicates that God had given them the land (18:6), a claim one of the spies later states as well (18:10). But given the Levite's character, his declaration should not be taken at face value. He has simply sold out and now gives words in the name of God for pay. In the end, the Danites take the Levite and the elements of Micah's shrine and make both part of their own system of worship (18:27–31). The story ends with the subtle note that the Danites kept Micah's idol "as long as the house of God was at Shiloh" (18:31). Their sanctuary had no more divine approval than did their land-grabbing.

B. The Violent End (19:1–21:25)

19:1–30. The Levite's Concubine. The story in Judg 19 is one of the most horrifying accounts in the Bible. It recounts a Levite's concubine who was wantonly raped and killed during an attack on her family and the family that gives them refuge in the city of Gibeah. While the men of Gibeah are portrayed in the darkest way possible, the most sinister character in the story may be the Levite. After apparently abusing his concubine and thus causing her to leave him, he woos her back only to give her over to the ravenous crowd. Later he lies about what happened and incites an inter-tribal war. The picture of the Levite is subtly drawn. It is consistent in style, however, with the rest of Judges, which uses subtlety and irony to portray the condition of Israel when it does not follow its God.

The story begins appropriately with the note that "In those days, there was no king in Israel" (19:1). Although the full summary formula is not present, it is clear that the Levite in the story "did what was right in his own eyes" (see 17:6; 18:1; 21:25). He did not act as though God was king and as though justice and righteousness prevailed.

The story centers on the Levite's concubine and the fact that she has left him and returned to her father's house. A concubine is a wife of secondary status, sometimes obtained from an impoverished family as a slave and then designated by the master as his wife (Exod 21:7–11). The translation of v. 2, "his concubine became angry with him (the Levite)" follows two ancient manuscripts, one Latin and one Greek, that suggest the concubine has cause to leave her husband. The Hebrew of the verse, however, uses a verb that is usually translated "to commit adultery" (as NIV translates; see the same verb in Deut 22:21; Hos 1:2). This is probably due to the fact that Israelite law had no provisions for a woman to divorce her husband and, thus, the concubine's leaving could only be characterized as unfaithfulness. Marriage contracts were male-centered. The fact that the Levite sought to bring the concubine back and that he "spoke tenderly to her," however, probably indicates he had abused or mistreated her (see the same language in Gen 34:3; Shechem tried to get Dinah to marry him after he had raped her).

Verses 4–9 present an exaggerated display of hospitality as the concubine's father bids the Levite stay as his guest for five days. Hospitality was an important institution that offered protection for sojourners (Exod 22:21; Lev 19:33–34; Deut 16:14). It also served as a primary illustration of God's love for Israel who had been a "stranger" in the land of Egypt (Deut 10:18–19). The portrait of hospitality here also reveals the male-centered world in which the main benefits of hospitality are shared between men. The concubine who had been wronged is not even part of the conversation.

Verses 10–21 continue the story's focus on hospitality, but now the account turns to the problem of hospitality denied to the Levite and his concubine. The Levite departs his father-in-law's house in Bethlehem at a late hour, so it is necessary to find shelter for the night. He does not want to stop in Jerusalem because it is populated with Jebusites (thus the name Jebus for the city), and so he continues on to Gibeah, a city that should welcome the travelers as fellow Israelites. The Levite and his company, however, wait in vain for someone to offer them shelter. Only a resident alien from the hill country of Ephraim (the area to which the Levite is traveling) takes them in.

The next scene (vv. 22–26) echoes the account of Sodom and Gomorrah in Gen 19. As in the Genesis account the men of Gibeah surround the house, pound on the door, and demand that the traveler (the Levite) be sent out "that we may have intercourse with him" (v. 22; see Gen 19:5). "Have intercourse" translates a verb that literally means "to know." The old man responds to the crowd by saying, "Since this man is my guest, do not do this vile thing" (v. 23). The characterization of their intent to have sex with the Levite as "a vile thing" is probably not a statement about same sex relations in general (though see Lev 18:22). Rather, for the men of the city to have intercourse with him would be to treat him as an enemy. By this act, they would "feminize" him just as victorious armies often treated those they defeated as women.

Perhaps the greatest horror in the story, however, regards the action of the Levite who is under attack. As in the Sodom and Gomorrah story (Gen 19:8), the owner of the house offers his daughters to the crowd, along with the Levite's concubine (19:24). This in itself is unthinkable. But the Levite goes further by putting his concubine out to the ravenous crowd. Verse 25 says the Levite "seized" his concubine and put her out. The term translated "seize" is sometimes used to denote the force a man exerts over a woman when raping her (2 Sam 13:14). Therefore, the text suggests that the Levite is guilty not just of cowardice and lack of compassion, but of the rape also. His crime is emphasized further by the twofold notice that he stayed in the house until it was light (vv. 26, 27). Then, when he leaves the house and finds his concubine lying with her hands on the threshold he shows no emotion or remorse. When asked how the crime occurred, the Levite is disingenuous. He speaks as though he and his concubine were together through the ordeal and as though his life was threatened as well (20:5).

The scene in vv. 27–28 is remarkable in that it does not say whether the woman is dead or alive; the Levite does not express any concern over the matter. His silence is far removed from his "speaking tenderly" to the concubine when he sought to bring her back from her father's house.

20:1–48. Civil War. As the book of Judges nears its end, it is clear that the Israelites have moved far from the ideals of life in the land with which the book began. Judges started with an account of the Israelite tribes attempting to secure the territory God had given them, but it ends with the Israelites fighting each other. The Israelite tribes begin a civil war over the death of the Levite's concubine. Judges 20:1–2 emphasize that "all" Israel came together to inquire about the Levite's concubine. The irony, of course, is that not all the tribes are present and the ones who gather at Mizpah will attempt to annihilate the one tribe that is absent.

The Levite's testimony (20:4–7) is correct in labeling the rape of the concubine as a "vile outrage," but several features of his testimony are less than honest. He reports that the "lords of Gibeah" rose against him (20:5), but the account indicates the perpetrators were a perverse group in the city (19:22), not necessarily the city's leaders. The Levite also says the men of the city intended to kill him (20:5). Judges 19:22, however, only says they wanted to have intercourse with him. He also does not report that he "seized" his concubine and put her out to the crowd (19:25), which, as already noted, implicates the Levite in the rape as well as the men of Gibeah. By distorting the story in these ways, the Levite creates a conflict between the tribe of Benjamin and the other Israelite tribes that diverts attention from his own guilt.

Those who hear the Levite's carefully edited story respond with what is perhaps an unknowing distortion of justice. The law of Moses stipulates that punishment of a crime should be proportional, "an eye for an eye" (Exod 21:24). This means that more than "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" is a miscarriage of justice. The Israelite tribes, however, respond to the rape and death of the Levite's concubine by destroying the entire city of Gibeah (20:37).

The sequence of battles in Judg 20:18–48 shows the results of a civil war in which no one really wins, but all parties experience God's judgment. Before each battle, the Israelites ask the Lord whether they should go out to battle or not. Each time the Lord tells them to go, but initially God does not promise victory and the Israelites suffer defeat (20:18, 21). Finally, in Judg 20:28 God tells the Israelites they will be victorious. The text makes clear, however, that "the LORD defeated Benjamin before Israel" (20:35).

21:1–25. Reconciliation Through Violence. The book of Judges ends with the Israelite tribes attempting to reconcile with the tribe of Benjamin, but the effort at peace is fraught with difficulty. The tribe of Benjamin is cut off from the other tribes and threatened with extinction since no one will give their daughters to the Benjaminites as wives (21:7). The people weep over Benjamin's fate (21:2). In a society based on kinship, which assumes stable families and male heirs are necessary for survival, the absence of potential wives is indeed lamentable. But the solutions the other tribes propose lead to more violence against women like the violence done to Jephthah's daughter and the Levite's concubine. The final chapter portrays Israel trafficking in women to benefit Benjamin (vv. 12, 14) and Benjamin's stealing of women to ensure a future for itself (vv. 20–23).

Although the text does not outwardly condemn these practices, the treatment of women in this chapter and in the final section of Judges (chs. 19–21) is a clear sign of Israel's deterioration. At the beginning of the book, women like Achsah are held in high honor, they take initiative, and they effect positive change (1:13–15). Deborah successfully liberates Israel from its foes (chs. 4–5). But by the end of the book women are reduced to chattel, commodities traded, stolen, and abused. The final verse of the book ("there was no king in Israel"; v. 25) might be read rightly as an ironic statement about Israel's failure to recognize God's rule over God's people.

RUTH

KATHARINE D. SAKENFELD

OVERVIEW

A longtime favorite among Christians and Jews, the story of Ruth's commitment to Naomi is upheld as a model for the deep and active caring of one human being for another. The story moves from brokenness to wholeness, from death to life, from hunger to food in abundance, from anxiety to security, from exclusion to inclusion, from barrenness to birthing, from bitterness to rejoicing. The various characters constantly invoke God's blessing upon one another, and the story develops toward its positive ending because those same characters undertake actions that enable the fulfillment of their prayers. The town of Bethlehem at the end of the story can be viewed as a "peaceable village," a microcosm of the peaceable kingdom anticipated in Isa 9.

More recent reflection on the narrative has raised questions, however, about this idyllic perspective. Ruth has been portrayed as seeking her own self-interest, determined to escape from an undesirable life in Moab; Naomi has been portrayed as disliking Ruth but taking advantage of her. Boaz also has been portrayed as focused on self-interest (romantic and economic) rather than genuinely concerned with Ruth's welfare. These "against the grain" interpretations arise, and indeed are viable, because the narrator does not attribute motivations to the characters, and because it is possible to assume hidden motives underlying the characters' own words. This commentary works primarily with the traditional, more idyllic or positive perspective, while recognizing that biblical characters may have mixed motives for much of what they do.

The idyllic character of the story should not, however, blind readers to hidden dangers in applying its themes to contemporary life. Among these dangers are several implicit assumptions: that marriage and children are the only or even best or most desirable way to provide economic security for women; that outsiders should be fully included in a community only to the extent that they abandon their own cultural identity; and that Ruth provides the one proper model for a woman's relationship to her mother or to her mother-in-law.

Scholars disagree about the date of composition of the story, with options ranging from the era of King David ca. 1000 BCE (the earliest possible date, since the story is designed to establish his ancestry) to the Persian era ca. 450 BCE, when Ezra's insistence that foreign wives and children be sent away (Ezra 9–10) might have led an opposition group to highlight a tradition that even King David himself had a Moabite great-grandmother. Whenever the story emerged, it would have stood as a challenge to Israel's stereotyping of all foreign women as likely to lead Israelites away from the worship of God alone (e.g., Num 25; Deut 7:3–4; 1 Kgs 11:3–5; 16:31–32).

Set in the era of the Judges, the upright living characteristic of Ruth stands in sharp contrast to the violence and mayhem of that period. In the Christian canon, Ruth is placed chronologically, between the book of Judges and the story of David in 1 Samuel. Jewish tradition associates Ruth with the Feast of Weeks, and thus in the Hebrew Scriptures Ruth is placed with other short books read on festivals in the Jewish liturgical year.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Setting the Stage (1:1–22)

1:1–5. Arrival in Moab; Marriages and Deaths. The opening verses introduce two of the three main characters (Naomi and Ruth) and provide the geographic, cultural, and theological context for what is to follow. Hunger is a classic reason for migration both in the biblical tradition (e.g. Gen 12; 42) and in the modern world. The move from Bethlehem ("House of Bread") to Moab places the family squarely in the territory of one of Israel's traditional and most hated enemies. Moabites were remembered as descendants of the incestuous union between Lot's elder daughter and her father (Gen 19:37), and they were singled out as a people forbidden to enter Israel's house of worship (Deut 23:3). King Balak of Moab opposed the Israelites on their journey from Egypt to Canaan (Num 21–23), and King Eglon oppressed them in the era of the Judges (Judg 3). Tensions and battles continued throughout the monarchy, and prophets announced dire judgments upon Moab (e.g., Isa 15–16; Jer 48).

Awareness of this long history of animosity sharpens the impact of the narrative from beginning to end. According to one Jewish tradition, Naomi's husband Elimelech dies because he led his family to Moab, and her two sons die because of their foreign marriages. Yet by the end of the book, Ruth "the Moabite" will not only be married to a Bethlehemite but will also be remembered as the great-grandmother of King David.

As this section ends, Naomi's status is measured explicitly in terms of the absence of husband and sons. It seems that the two daughters-in-law do not count, and indeed vv. 11–13 will explain why this is true from Naomi's point of view.

1:6–9. Naomi Sets Out for Bethlehem and Bids Her Daughters-in-law Farewell. The ending of the famine in Naomi's homeland (1:6) is the first of only two events in the story attributed directly to God; the other is Ruth's conceiving of a child (see 4:13). Of all that transpires, these moments would be understood by the ancient hearers as the events least subject to human control.

Naomi soon dismisses her daughters-in-law. Yet she recognizes their goodness to her and prays that God will treat each of them as "kindly" (v. 8) as they have treated her family, and indeed that they will be able to marry again among their own people. Underlying the word "kindly" is the Hebrew term khesed, a key thematic concept in the story. Khesed, variously translated as "kindness," "lovingkindness," "loyalty," or (of God) "steadfast love," represents both attitude and action. It describes commitment in a relationship that takes shape in actions that go beyond what would normally be required or expected, actions that support and even rescue the other in times of deep crisis or distress. Here Naomi remarkably calls upon God to measure up to the standard of such human loyal love that her daughters-in-law have shown to her and to their Israelite husbands.

1:10–18. Orpah Returns Home; Ruth Insists on Accompanying Naomi. The younger women's unwillingness to return home evokes a long and despairing response from Naomi (vv. 11–13). The initial reasoning of her response turns to a wail of anguish in her assertion that God has turned from her.

The Israelite practice of levirate marriage may help to explain Naomi's reference to other sons, although the parallel is not exact. According to this custom, when a man died before his wife bore a son, one of his surviving brothers was expected to marry the widow for the purpose of producing an heir for the man who had died (see Deut 25:5–10; Gen 38; and the possible reprise of this theme in Ruth 4:5–8). The theme of marriage between a widow and a deceased husband's brother is present here, but Naomi's stated goal is security for her daughters-in-law rather than descendants for her dead sons.

Orpah goes "back to her people and her gods" (v.15), following her mother-in-law's advice and urging. The narrator makes no criticism of Orpah's decision; she simply disappears from the story. Yet Ruth will not follow Orpah's example. Ruth's statement of determined and unwavering lifelong commitment to Naomi (vv. 16–17) echoes Naomi's references to Orpah's people and gods, as Ruth declares her allegiance to Naomi's people and Naomi's God.

These words of commitment of a daughter-in-law to her mother-in-law resonate differently in different contexts. In Judaism, Ruth is remembered as the model convert, and the various phrases of her extended statement to Naomi are sometimes given symbolic associations with various aspects of the conversion process. Many Christian readers are surprised that the words were not originally related to a wedding context. Ruth's declaration stands in dramatic contrast to a steady stream of mother-in-law jokes and stereotypes that reflect the tensions frequently experienced in such relationships. Yet one should be wary of viewing Ruth's commitment as a norm. Her commitment represents precisely what was not culturally expected, as it manifests her continuing khesed toward Naomi.

1:19–22. Naomi and Ruth Arrive in Bethlehem. In response to the women of the town, Naomi asks to be called "Mara," meaning "bitter" (v. 20). Her lament made first to Ruth and Orpah reaches a second crescendo in a four-fold report about God's terrible dealings with her. Ruth receives no mention by Naomi or by the women; it is as if Ruth and her khesed count for nothing, as if she is not even present. Naomi's grief is center stage.

II. Ruth Spends a Day Gleaning in the Field of Boaz (2:1–23)

2:1–7. Ruth Arrives in Boaz's Field and Boaz Finds Out Her Identity. The action of ch. 2 covers a single day and is introduced by an aside from the narrator explaining the identity of Boaz, whom Ruth will soon meet. The description of Boaz as ish gibbor khayil, "a prominent rich man" (2:1), anticipates Boaz's subsequent description of Ruth as a esheth khayil, "worthy woman" (3:11). The phrases, translated according to context, indicate one who is well respected in the community.

Gleaning was the principal economic "safety net" for the destitute in ancient Israelite society, specifically for widows and resident aliens like Ruth (Deut 24:19–22 and Lev 19:9–10; 23:22). Although the narrator's "as it happened" (v. 3) might suggest coincidence, the reader is invited to imagine God at work behind the scene in bringing Ruth to the very field of Naomi's kinsman, whose family connection is reiterated here. Equally providential is Boaz's arrival ("just then"), whereupon he notices and inquires about the unknown person in his field. The explanation of the head reaper (vv. 6–7) mentions Ruth's Moabite ancestry two times, highlighting a theme that will persist throughout the story.

2:8–16. Conversation Between Boaz and Ruth. Boaz's opening words to Ruth indicate the potential danger associated with gleaning, particularly for an unattached foreign woman, as the phrase translated "not to bother you" (2:9) has overtones of sexual molestation. Boaz's advice and his offer of precious drinking water are quite extraordinary responses to a foreigner. Boaz attributes his good will solely to what he has been told of Ruth's character and behavior; conspicuously absent from his response is any reference to his kinship to Elimelech. His references to an unknown people and to "the LORD, the God of Israel" (vv. 11–12) harken back to Ruth's commitments to Naomi's people and God (1:16–17). The theme of God's wings of refuge (compare Ps. 91:4) will reappear in 3:9 within the context of a human relationship.

As he had made the unusual offer of water, so Boaz also offers food in abundance, and then grain in abundance as sheaves are actually to be placed in Ruth's path. The theme of Ruth's overflowing care and commitment to Naomi is mirrored by Boaz's generosity to Ruth.

2:17–23. Ruth Returns to Naomi and Reports on Her Day. Naomi's amazement at the large quantity of grain and leftovers from the midday meal reaches a climax when Ruth speaks the name "Boaz," whom Naomi now reports to be among near kinsmen of the family. Naomi's words in v. 20 mark the beginning of Naomi's turn from despair and provide a key theological clue for interpreting the story. The Hebrew construction is richly ambiguous because the relative pronoun "whose" may refer either to the Lord or to Boaz; theologically it surely refers to both. In Ruth's "chance" encounter with Boaz and Boaz's generosity, God's "kindness" (khesed; see above 1:6–9) has not forsaken Naomi, Ruth, or Elimelech and his sons. God's khesed is not an abstraction, but has taken concrete form precisely in Boaz's khesed, which extends beyond Ruth to Naomi and her family. For his part, Boaz's khesed has been inspired by Ruth's own khesed to Naomi. A web of human kindness reflects, refracts, and embodies God's kindness.

III. Ruth Spends a Night with Boaz at his Threshing Floor (3:1–18)

3:1–5. Naomi Gives Instruction to Ruth. As Naomi had earlier urged the "security" of Moabite marriages for her daughters-in-law (1:9), so now again she plans "security" for Ruth (3:1) through a man. She gives Ruth highly detailed instructions about bodily and clothing preparations, and is even more specific about the timing, location, and actions Ruth is to undertake at the threshing floor (vv. 3–4).

3:6–13. Conversation Between Boaz and Ruth. The Hebrew of this scene is filled with words that may have either ordinary meanings or sexual overtones, especially the words "feet" (used euphemistically for genitals) and "lie down" (for sleeping or sexual relations). Both in content and in choice of vocabulary, the storyteller establishes the possibility for a sexual tryst outside of marriage, yet draws back from saying exactly what took place.

When Boaz awakes in surprise, even shock, to discover a young woman next to him, Ruth diverges from Naomi's plan by announcing what Boaz should do. Her phrase "spread your cloak over your servant" (3:9) is in effect elevated language for a marriage proposal (compare Ezek 16:8). Furthermore, the Hebrew word for "cloak" is the same word that Boaz used for God's "wings" (2:12), suggesting a connection between divine refuge and human protection. Ruth is challenging Boaz to bring to fruition by marriage the "full reward" that he himself had earlier wished God to bring to Ruth. Boaz's response in praise of Ruth is even more fulsome than his initial words in 2:11. Again he refers to her khesed (here translated "loyalty"); "this last instance" points to her suggestion of marriage. Boaz's assumption that she might have gone after younger men suggests that he is considerably older than she is; more than that, it brings to mind the wilderness era story (Num 25) of Moabite women who enticed Israelite men into sexual relations and thereby into idolatrous practices. By contrast, Ruth the Moabite is here portrayed as behaving uprightly, even in her lying beside Boaz in the dark of night.

Boaz also speaks of Ruth as esheth khayil ("worthy woman"; see comment at 2:1). This expression appears elsewhere in the OT only in reference to a "capable wife" (Prov 31:10). Many of the characteristics of the wife described in Prov 31 are exemplified in Ruth's caring for Naomi. Unlike the woman in Proverbs, Ruth is poor and a foreigner, but her personal qualities (cf. Prov 31:11, 12, 13, 20) commend her to Boaz and to the larger Bethlehem community as one worthy of praise.

Having affirmed Ruth's intent, Boaz introduces an unexpected twist to the plot as he refers to a nearer kinsman who has first refusal rights for marriage to Ruth. Boaz's instruction to Ruth to "lie down until the morning" (v. 13) may be intended to protect Ruth from the danger of travel by night or from the suspicion that might come upon her if she were observed away from home at night. Nonetheless, her "[lying] at his feet" (v. 14) develops the ambiguous sexual overtones of the scene.

3:14–18. Ruth Returns to Naomi and Reports on Her Night. Ruth departs in the earliest predawn, in those moments when vague shapes may be seen but individuals not identified. As he had done before, Boaz again provides abundant grain for Naomi.

In selecting details of the conversation between the two women upon Ruth's return, the storyteller focuses not on the expected theme of Ruth's security, but rather upon Boaz's gift of grain, a symbol of his concern for Naomi's security. This focus reinforces the theme of Naomi's movement out of despair and emphasizes that the lives of all the major characters are intertwined.

IV. A Happy Ending? (4:1–22)

4:1–12. Legal Proceedings Before the Village Elders. Ruth now disappears as a speaking character for the remainder of the story. She is talked about, and indeed she conceives and gives birth, but she is no longer a principal actor on stage.

As Naomi had predicted, Boaz wastes no time in resolving the matter of who will marry Ruth. The gate of a town or city was the usual place for conducting legal proceedings in Israelite society. The immediate arrival of the unnamed nearer kinsman is reminiscent of the providential moments in 2:3, 4.

Many details of the proceedings described here remain obscure. What is the status of the plot of land belonging to Naomi, and why have we not heard of it earlier? If she owns land, why is she destitute? Why must the nearer kinsman marry Ruth if he takes control of Naomi's land? How exactly would marriage to Ruth damage his inheritance? While scholars are not sure of the answers to such questions, inheritance rights were certainly carefully regulated (e.g., Num 26; 27; 36). Whatever the system of inheritance at work in this scene (presumably clear to ancient hearers of the story), the underlying problem is the death of Naomi's husband and sons. Boaz's approach to the case heightens the drama. He first offers the nearer kinsman the opportunity to redeem Naomi's land, i.e., to make a financial arrangement to keep it within the extended family holdings. Only after receiving an affirmative reply does Boaz note that "Ruth, the Moabite, the widow of the dead man" comes with the deal—"to maintain the dead man's name on his inheritance" (v. 5). This explicit naming of Ruth's undesirable ethnic and marital status stands in tension with inheritance custom. It is reasonable to suppose that the redemption of Naomi's land represented a legal obligation with a sequence of rights of refusal, while the marriage to Ruth was understood as a concomitant moral obligation that could somehow have an economic impact on the value of the real estate transaction. Thus the nearer kinsman does not violate any customary law by his refusal, while Boaz is able to take the moral high ground regarding the opportunity to marry Ruth. The custom of sandal removal to seal a decision appears elsewhere only in Deut 25:9, which concerns levirate marriage. Although the two texts also share the motif of the name of a dead husband, the circumstances differ significantly in other respects; thus it seems that Ruth's case is at best tangentially related to levirate marriage.

The two-fold use of the verb acquire for both land and wife (vv. 9, 10) focuses on the legal transaction; the verb does not connote that Ruth is merely chattel or property. The witnesses to the transaction include not just the elders, but "all the people" (vv. 9, 11). The whole town, apparently including the women, joins in praying a blessing on Ruth. Remarkably, they invoke a favorable comparison to the great matriarchs Rachel and Leah, progenitors of the Israelite tribes. Ephrathah (compare 1:2) is the home region of the family of King David. The story of Judah and Tamar, Perez's parents (Gen 38) has many resonances with the story of Ruth, but also many differences in detail. One common thread is the birth of an important child to a woman who has challenged many societal norms. In Christian tradition Ruth and Tamar are connected as two of the four women mentioned in the genealogy of Jesus in Matt 1.

4:13–17. Marriage, a Baby Boy, and a Blessing. The marriage is consummated, and immediately Ruth conceives (see comment on 1:6). The women who greeted Naomi upon her return to Bethlehem (1:19–21) and heard her cry of bitterness now reappear to bless God for the goodness showered upon her. Ruth's son will become "restorer" and "nourisher" (4:15) for Naomi, terms that connote not only physical sustenance but comfort, encouragement, and support. Now the women also acknowledge Ruth, who had been totally ignored in the arrival scene, praising Ruth's love for Naomi. The comparison they offer, "more to you than seven sons" (v. 15), places Ruth on the highest possible pedestal according to the norms of Israelite culture.

The women then name the baby. In the OT, naming is done more frequently by mothers than by fathers, without any obvious pattern of circumstances, but only here are neighborhood women rather than either of the parents involved in the naming. The story also differs from other naming scenes because scholars can discern no apparent wordplay or other substantive connection between the name Obed and the women's explanatory statement that "a son is born to Naomi." Rather, the women's statement ties the entire story together by looking back to Naomi's lament in 1:11. Naomi is finally made whole. From this perspective, the book is Naomi's story even more than it is Ruth's.

The story ends well, in that food is in good supply; the outsider, Ruth, has been included not just by Boaz but by all the people; a child is born and celebrated; and Naomi's sadness is reversed. Yet, as indicated in the introduction to this commentary, this ending carries hidden dangers if it is viewed as a narrow prescription for happy endings in contemporary societies. Each community needs to examine afresh God's vision for its own wholeness, with care not to adopt uncritically the sociological patterns of previous societies, whether those of ancient Israel or of more recent history.

4:18–22. The Ancestral Genealogy of King David. The book concludes with an expansion of the three-generation genealogy that introduced David in v. 17. In this male-descent, linear genealogical form, familiar from Genesis and 1 Chronicles, there is no place for Ruth or Naomi. Despite all the language earlier in the narrative about the importance of maintaining the name of the dead, the genealogical line runs through Boaz, with no mention of Elimelech or his sons. The genealogy focuses the reader's attention squarely on David (the last word of the book) and provides in the Protestant canonical order a link to the story of David's rise to leadership that follows in 1 Samuel.

1 SAMUEL

STEVE MCKENZIE

OVERVIEW

Originally one work, 1 and 2 Samuel were first distinguished in the LXX. Though they bear the name of Samuel, he is the focal character only in the first eight chapters of 1 Samuel, dies before 1 Samuel ends (25:1), and is not mentioned in 2 Samuel. Most scholars view Samuel as part of a larger work encompassing Deuteronomy plus the Former Prophets in the Hebrew Bible (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings) and known as the Deuteronomistic History (DtrH).

The author(s) of the DtrH is/are unknown. It was apparently completed shortly after 562 BCE, the date of the last event it records (2 Kgs 25:27–30). Some scholars think that there were earlier editions of the DtrH, especially one from the time of King Josiah of Judah (640–609 BCE). The DtrH authors composed their work by making use of older sources, integrating them, and supplementing them with speeches and narratives in their own "Deuteronomistic" (Dtr) style.

Debate over the date and identification of those sources is part of a larger debate over the character of history of 1 and 2 Samuel. The fact that no reference to the person of David outside of the Bible had been found suggested to some scholars that he did not exist. The discovery of a ninth-century Aramaic stele referring to Judah as the "house of David" (Judah) has assuaged these doubts, but this does not mean that all of 1 and 2 Samuel functions as a neutral account of past events.

Further reason for caution regarding the work's historicity is its high literary quality. However Samuel was written and whatever its character as history writing, it is a literary masterpiece. Many of its passages are filled with puns and word plays; its characters are complex, its plots intricate. The author(s) who produced this work was/were very creative.

The main interest of 1 and 2 Samuel is David, who is also, in many ways, the central character of the DtrH. First Samuel tells of his rise and 2 Samuel of his kingship. The prophet Samuel introduces monarchy into Israel, and Saul is a foil to David. As is widely recognized, 1 Samuel is pro-Davidic. Saul can do nothing right and David nothing wrong. Many scholars regard 1 Samuel, if not 2 Samuel too, as an apology for David. That is, the work was written as a literary defense especially against the charge that David was a usurper who seized the crown from his predecessor. This charge is met, above all, by the claim that David was divinely chosen and guided to the throne.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Samuel the Prophet (1–7)

A. Samuel's Birth and Dedication to Yahweh's Service (1:1–2:11)

1:1–28. Hannah's Request for a Son Is Answered. The barren wife who has a son due to divine intervention is a common motif in the Bible. This story also puns repeatedly on Saul's name with the Hebrew root sh'al, "to request" (vv. 17, 20, 27–28, variously rendered). Hanna was the first wife and Peninnah the "second" (v. 2; NRSV, "other"). Elkanah apparently married Peninnah because Hannah could not bear children. While her husband was on his annual journey to the temple (v. 7; "house"), Hannah prayed outside of the temple where Eli, seated at the doorway (v. 9), could see her. She promised to make her son a "nazirite" or "devoted one" (v. 11). Samuel was to be a nazirite for life

(cf. Num 6:1–21). Hannah fulfilled her vow when Samuel was weaned (v. 24). In Hannah's statement that her son is "given" to Yahweh (v. 28), the word "given" in Hebrew is identical to the name Saul, leading some scholars to believe that this story originally narrated the birth of Saul rather than Samuel.

2:1–11. The Song of Hannah. Originally a hymn of national thanksgiving, this poem was adopted for the story of Hannah because of its reference to God reversing the fate of the disadvantaged (esp. vv. 4–8). The line in v. 5 about the barren woman who bears children seems particularly appropriate for Hannah. The references to Yahweh's "king" and "anointed" (v. 10) indicate that the poem was written during the period of the monarchy and thus significantly later than the time of Hannah. The poem features in Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:46–55).

B. The Rejection of Eli's Priestly House (2:12–3:21)

2:12–17. The Sin of Eli's Sons. Priests were given a portion of sacrifices as their livelihood (Lev 7:28–36; Deut 18:3). At Shiloh, they apparently received whatever meat a fork dredged up from a boiling pot. Eli's sons demanded the fat portion, which properly belonged to the deity, and thus they showed no respect for God.

2:18–21. The Visitation of Hannah. Samuel's ephod was a simple loincloth that signaled his status as a priest. Eli's reference to "the gift that she made" is another pun on Saul's name in Hebrew.

2:22–26. Eli's Parental Failing. The further sin of Eli's sons—lying with the women at the entrance to the tent of meeting (v. 22)—is not present in some of the best textual witnesses to Samuel and was probably borrowed from Exod 38:8. It disagrees with previous descriptions of the shrine at Shiloh as a building (temple) rather than a tent. The behavior of the sons contrasts with that of Samuel (v. 26), whose description here may have served as a pattern for Luke's portrait of Jesus (Luke 2:52).

2:27–36. Oracle Against Eli's House. This oracle was inserted by the Deuteronomistic author probably in anticipation of Saul's slaughter of the priests of Nob (1 Sam 22) and the later replacement of Abiathar's priestly line by the Zadokites (1 Kgs 2:27, 35). "Your ancestor" (v. 27) may be Moses, from whom many scholars think Eli traced descent, or Levi, because of the reference to choosing him from "all the tribes of Israel" (v. 28). To "go up to my altar" is to offer sacrifices, one of the duties of a priest, along with offering incense and wearing the ephod. This ephod may refer to an instrument used to divine Yahweh's will and mentioned later (1 Sam 23:9) rather than to Samuel's loincloth (2:18). The one who will survive (v. 33) is probably Abiathar, and the "faithful priest" (v. 35) Zadok.

3:1–21. Samuel's Call to Prophecy. Since prophetic revelation was rare (v. 1) and it was Samuel's first prophetic experience (v. 7), he did not immediately recognize God's call (vv. 2–9). Samuel slept in or near the "holy of holies" where the ark resided. Since the ark symbolized Yahweh's presence, this was an appropriate place for a revelation. The fact that Yahweh appeared to Samuel, not Eli, and that it took Eli three times to realize that Samuel was receiving a divine call were further indications of the growing separation between God and Eli. The divine message to Samuel (vv. 10–14) reiterated and confirmed that of the man of God in ch. 2. Eli's sons had so profaned the sacrifices that might be used to atone for sin that now no sacrificial atonement would be accepted (vv. 13–14).

C. The Ark Narrative (4:1–7:1)

4:1–22. The Philistines Capture the Ark. Some scholars consider 4:1–7:1 an independent source reporting the capture and return of the ark, since Samuel is not mentioned in these chapters. The story begins with a battle between Israel and the Philistines. They had entered Canaan from the western Mediterranean at the same time that Israel was emerging as a nation in the central highlands, so that clash between them was inevitable. After losing the first battle (v. 2), the Israelites bring the ark to the front in order to secure divine aid (v. 3). But the ark is captured and Israel soundly defeated (v. 11). The narrative makes clear that Yahweh is punishing Eli and his sons by removing the ark from Shiloh. Eli's own death is occasioned by shock at the news of the ark's capture rather than that of his sons' deaths (v. 18). He is placed in the line of the judges, who ruled Israel before the monarchy. However, the "forty years" ascribed to his rule is probably a round number for a generation.

5:1–12. The Ark as a Scourge to the Philistines. The Philistines take the ark to Ashdod, one of their main cities, and place it in the temple ("house") of their god, Dagon, beside Dagon's statue or idol (vv. 1–2). This act symbolizes Dagon's defeat of Yahweh, since wars between peoples in the ancient Near East were often conceived as contests between their deities. Dagon was a Canaanite god of grain who is portrayed in these stories as the Philistines' principal god. The Philistines find Dagon's statue lying prostrate before the ark with its head and hands cut off, as was often done with enemy soldiers captured or killed in battle (vv. 3–4), thus showing that Yahweh is superior to Dagon. Yahweh's demonstration of power continues in the form of a pestilence that some identify as bubonic plague because of the symptomatic tumors, its spread by mice, and its beginning in the coastal city of Ashdod (vv. 6–12). Following Ashdod, Gath and Ekron each experience plague. These were three of the five prominent Philistine cities (plus Ashkelon, Gaza) whose rulers made up the "lords" of the Philistines.

6:1–7:1. The Return of the Ark. The Philistines have learned that the ark is a sacred object. They return it with a "guilt offering" to atone for handling it and to stem the plague (vv. 1–5). The offering that is sent back is also a kind of test. One would expect two "milch cows" that have never been yoked to wander aimlessly in search of their calves. That they head straight for Israelite territory indicates that the plague was Yahweh's doing and not happenstance (vv. 7–12). The new cart and previously unyoked cows are appropriate for sacrifice, and the people of Beth-shemesh use them as such (v. 14). Kiriath-jearim, where the ark was sent (7:1) was on the border between Benjamin and Judah.

D. Samuel Judges Israel (7:2–17)

Samuel, who has served as priest and prophet, now is presented as Israel's national leader, the last of the judges and a transitional figure between the judges and the monarchy. The "twenty years" (v. 2) fits into the Dtr. chronology established in the book of Judges. It represents half a generation and the period of foreign oppression prior to deliverance brought by a judge. Before God will deliver them, the people must repent of worshiping other gods and turn to Yahweh (vv. 3–4). Baal and Astarte were the principal male and female Canaanite deities. Samuel then gathers all Israel to Mizpah for a rededication ceremony (vv. 5–6). The four ritual activities mentioned here—libation, fasting, confession, and prayer—do not occur together elsewhere in the Bible and seem to represent a combination of functions—repentance, purification, rededication, and, perhaps, preparation for war. Samuel's leadership is not as a warrior but as an intercessor; it is God's "mighty voice," i.e., thunder, that routs the Philistines (v. 10). The other adversary here, the "Amorites" (v. 14), is a Deuteronomistic term for the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan. As the book of Judges depicts two types of leaders—military deliverers and legal functionaries—so Samuel embodies both roles. Having effected victory over the Philistines, he rides an annual circuit (v. 16) administering justice in towns, all within the tribal territory of Benjamin.

II. The Rise and Fall of Saul (8–15)

A. Saul Becomes Israel's First King (8–12)

8:1–22. Samuel Reacts to Israel's Cry for a King. Having presented Samuel as the last judge, the book describes the beginning of kingship in Israel. Samuel's sons, like Eli's before him, are unfit to succeed him (vv. 1–2). The leadership vacuum occasions the elders' call for a king, but it is also motivated by their desire to be "like the nations" (vv. 4–5). The request for a king is interpreted as a rejection of Yahweh's sovereignty (v. 7) in line with a long history of disobedience (v. 8). Yahweh's granting the request for a king (v. 9) may indicate that the evil lies not in the institution of kingship but in the people's lack of faith. The "ways of the king" about which Samuel warns the people are the customary trappings of ancient Near Eastern kingship, such as conscription and taxation (vv. 11–18). This list may draw from an older document detailing a king's rights and privileges. They also resemble practices enacted by Solomon (1 Kgs 4:7; 5:13). The people "refused to listen" to Samuel's warning and insist on having a king (vv. 19–20). Here and elsewhere in this chapter, the verb "listen" or "hear" puns on Samuel's name. The verb "govern" here means "judge." Despite God's repeated prior deliverance of Israel through the judges, they now demand a king for military protection and rule.

9:1–10:16. Saul Is Anointed Privately. Chapters 9–11 contain three stories about Saul's election as king. The first of these was a folktale about Saul's recovery of lost donkeys that has been revised to report his private anointing as king. Saul's father, Kish, is a man of "prominence" or "wealth" (v.1; NRSV). Saul himself is tall and "handsome" (v. 2; NRSV, lit., "good"), and thus is an ideal candidate to be king, since leaders are often described in the Bible as handsome (Gen 39:6; Exod 2:2; 1 Sam 16:12). Saul and a servant search throughout the tribal areas of Benjamin and Ephraim (vv. 3–4), finally arriving at Zuph, the home of Samuel's father (1:1). The locations of Shalishah and Shaalim are uncertain, but both pun on Saul's name. It was customary to pay a man of God for the service of divine inquiry (vv. 7–8), and the servant proposes a quarter shekel (about 1/8 ounce) of silver for the purpose. The "shrine" or "high place" where sacrificial worship was carried out was outside of the city gate (vv. 11–14). Sacrifices marked occasions when people ate meat, i.e., the portions not offered to the deity (entrails and fatty portions). At the sacrificial meal (vv. 22–24), Saul is given the seat and portion (the thigh) of honor. At least a portion of these verses, that which concerns Samuel's foreknowledge of Saul's arrival, is also editorial. The editor makes clear that Samuel's anointing of Saul the next morning was an absolutely private affair between just the two of them (9:27–10:1); this permits the editorial inclusion of another story about Saul's designation in public (10:17–27a). Saul is anointed over Yahweh's "heritage," i.e., Israel; other nations are conceived as the heritage of their respective national gods. In the original folktale, it was apparently only at Saul's encounter with the men at Rachel's tomb that he learned the fate of the donkeys (10:2). The two loaves of bread are actually two offerings of bread according to the reading of the LXX and a Dead Sea Scroll fragment, indicating that Saul again receives a portion of honor (10:3–4). Saul's encounter with the prophets (10:5–6, 10–13) endows him with Yahweh's spirit as was the case with the judges. Music could be used to induce an ecstatic trance in which prophets delivered their oracles (v. 5). The story seems to be interrupted by vv. 7–8, which commission Saul to military action ("Do whatever you see fit to do"), and are part of the story of his failure (13:7b–15). The story ends with Saul's interview upon his return home (vv. 14–16). The interview with Saul's uncle rather than his father is unexpected since the uncle plays no role in the story. That interview emphasizes the private nature of Saul's first anointing, thus preparing the way for his public designation in the next episode.

10:17–27a. Saul Is Chosen Publicly. The process described in vv. 20–21 illustrates the social structure of Israel, consisting, in ascending order, of the individual, extended family, clan, and tribe. Designating by lot was a means of choosing akin to modern techniques like drawing straws. However, in the OT, God is typically understood to make the choice. Elsewhere, lots are used to designate offenders (Josh 7:14; 1 Sam 14:41), suggesting that the choice of Saul here may not be viewed positively. The verb "inquired" here puns on Saul's name. His height is a sign of his suitability to be king and perhaps another reason why he is chosen (vv. 23–24). The "rights and duties of the kingship" may allude to the "ways of the king" in 8:9, 11. Those who refuse to bring Saul a present (v. 27) in effect reject him as their king.

10:27b–11:15. Saul Proves Himself. This paragraph (10:27b), present in the NRSV and based on a Dead Sea Scroll reading, provided the information necessary for understanding the following story. The Gadites and Reubenites lived east of the Jordan in territory claimed by Nahash. Jabesh-Gilead lay outside of this territory, but when Nahash attacked, the Gadites and Reubenites fled there. Nahash pursued them and threatened Jabesh with the same treatment feared by the fugitives, namely, the loss of the right eye as punishment for their encroachment and a sign of submission (11:1–2). The city elders negotiate the opportunity to seek aid in Israel (11:2). The fact that they send "through all the territory of Israel" (11:3) rather than directly to Saul shows that this story did not originally assume Saul's kingship and was therefore independent of the previous two stories. In fact, Saul finds out about the plight of Jabesh only when he providentially hears the people weeping as he is returning from working in the field (v. 5). The spirit of God comes upon him as it had upon the judges (v. 6). Dismemberment was a punishment for treaty violation, so Saul's dismembering of his oxen and distribution of the pieces may have been a way of summoning the tribes to fulfill their treaty obligation (v. 7). Having received the news that Saul is coming to save them, the people of Jabesh tell Nahash, "Tomorrow we will give ourselves up to you" (v. 10). Literally, "we will come out to you," is ambiguous, since it could refer either to surrender or to do battle. The "next day" is that same night, since the day was measured from sunset to sunset (v. 11). Thus, Saul's army marches all night to reach Jabesh "at the morning watch." The reference to those who rejected Saul's kingship (vv. 12–13) links this story to the previous one (10:27a). The link was necessary because the story behind 10:27b–11:15 was originally independent, reporting how Saul was anointed king following a military victory (v. 15). The editor has added the reference to renewing the kingship (v. 14), so that Saul's victory now answers those who doubt his martial prowess.

12:1–25. Samuel's Farewell. This farewell speech of Samuel's is a composition of the Deuteronomistic Historian, who, like other ancient historians, often created speeches for major characters. Samuel begins by pointing out his age and his integrity in leading the people (vv. 1–5). His deeds contrast with the "ways of the king" (8:11–18). He reviews Israel's historical traditions, culminating in the recent request for a king (vv. 6–12). The name Bedan (v. 11, Heb.) either preserves a tradition not found in Judges or another name for Jephthah. The Greek reading, Barak, represents a different sequence of judges from the book of Judges. (Deborah, rather than Barak, is the real judge according to Judg 4–5.) The Hebrew text also has Samuel instead of Samson in this verse, and the former is likely a scribal error. Samuel indicates that it was the threat of Nahash, not the Philistines as in 1 Sam 8, that impelled the Israelites to request a king (v. 12). Samuel places the burden for the choice of Saul as king upon the people and puns on Saul's name ("asked," v. 13). He concedes that God will not reject Israel for requesting a king, so long as they remain obedient (vv. 14–15, also 19–25). He then offers a sign of Yahweh's power and presence with Samuel that hints at his displeasure with their request for a king (vv. 16–18).

B. Saul's Failings (13–15)

13:1–22. Saul Is Rejected for Failing to Wait. The next three chapters contain episodes from Saul's reign and battles, showing his disobedience and ineptness. Not much is known of Saul's reign, including its length or his age at accession. The appearance of Jonathan, Saul's son, for the first time here as a grown man (v. 2) implies a considerable lapse in time since the young man Saul became king. Jonathan wins a victory over the Philistines while Saul, following Samuel's order (10:8), waits in Gilgal (vv. 3–7). As directed by Samuel, Saul waits seven days before offering the sacrifices himself (vv. 8–9), though the stories narrated since 10:8 imply the passage of a much longer period of time. Samuel condemns Saul (vv. 13–14), but the nature of Saul's offense is unclear, especially since he later builds an altar (and offers sacrifices?) without condemnation (14:31–35). Saul's punishment is the rejection of the continuation of his dynasty, clearing the way for David, the "man after God's own heart" (v. 14). This expression does not imply any special quality on David's part but merely states that Yahweh favors him as Israel's "ruler," i.e., king designate, instead of one of Saul's sons. The Philistines have been making raids against Israelites (v. 17–18), who have no iron weapons because that metallurgic technology is controlled by the Philistines (vv. 19–22).

13:23–14:52. Saul's Foolish Oath. The battle in this chapter reflects poorly on Saul since it is Jonathan who takes the initiative. "Gibeah" (14:2) should probably be read as "Geba"; the two names are very similar in Hebrew and appear to be confused in this chapter. Saul's priest, Eli's grandson (v. 3), carries the divinatory ephod. It is striking, particularly in contrast to David's use of the ephod later, that Saul has not consulted Yahweh yet. Again, this reflects badly on Saul. In contrast to his father, Jonathan shows himself to be a man of great courage and faith, as he trusts in Yahweh to give him victory (vv. 4–10). Yahweh aids Jonathan and Israel by sending "a very great panic" (lit. "a panic of God") and an earthquake upon the Philistines (v. 15). Saul first tries to determine who has left the camp and is engaging the Philistines (v. 17), and then he calls for the ephod, presumably to determine what move to make (v. 18, where the Greek reading "ephod" is preferable to the Hebrew "ark"). However, the increasing tumult among the Philistines induces him to halt the consultation of Yahweh before the priest is finished (v. 19). The identity of the "Hebrews" in v. 20 is uncertain. They are evidently not identical with the Israelites and may be mercenaries who first sided with the Philistines and then rallied against them.

Saul's foolish oath in the remainder of the chapter spoils the victory. The oath imposing a fast on the army is intended as an act of piety (v. 24). But it has disastrous consequences, first because the soldiers would have fought better if they had not suffered weakness from hunger (vv. 30–31). Their hunger then leads to a ritual offense as they eat meat "with the blood" (v. 32), contrary to law (cf. Lev 19:26; Deut 12:16). Saul corrects this problem by ordering the troops to slaughter the animals on a large rock so that the carcasses could be leaned against the rock and the blood drained (v. 34). He also builds an altar to sacrifice those parts of the animals designated for God and perhaps to atone for the ritual violations.

In addition, Jonathan unwittingly breaks Saul's oath by eating honey (vv. 27–29). The statement that Jonathan's "eyes were brightened" means that the honey's nourishment energized him for battle. Later, however, when Saul tries to inquire of Yahweh about his next step, he receives no answer because someone has violated his oath (vv. 36–37). The verb "inquire" here puns on Saul's name. Ironically, though, it is the priest, rather than Saul, who proposes consulting God. The lack of an answer may suggest divine disfavor with Saul as well as displeasure at the violation of the oath. The Urim and Thummim were a form of "lot" used to divine the will of God by answering yes-or-no questions and choosing between alternatives (cf. Exod 28:6–30). They were also capable of yielding no response as suggested in this story. Saul's readiness to have Jonathan executed is another indication of his rash foolishness (vv. 43–46).

The final segment of this chapter summarizes Saul's reign (vv. 47–52), especially since his war with the Amalekites is related in the next chapter. Saul's victories and his valiant rescue of Israel (v. 48) hint that his reign may have been more successful than indicated in 1 Sam.

15:1–35. Saul's Disobedience. This story of Saul's disobedience may duplicate 13:8–15a. since both explain God's rejection of Saul as king. However, the focus in the earlier episode was on Saul's line, which would not continue, while the present episode is more a rejection of Saul's own kingship. Saul is ordered to avenge the Amalekites' opposition of Israel after the exodus (Exod 17:8–15; Deut 25:17–19) by annihilating them completely, a technique of "holy war" as attested in other ancient Near Eastern documents.

Saul warns the Kenites before his attack (v. 6). These were another clan in southern Judah known as metalworkers. Saul's preservation of King Agag and the best of the animals is viewed as disobedience by God and Samuel (vv. 9–14). Saul, though, intends to sacrifice the animals to Yahweh (v. 15), and he may be saving Agag for ritual execution (see below). Samuel's response (vv. 22–23) resembles the oracles of the eighth century prophets that denounce hollow ritual (Hos 6:6; Am 5:21–24; Mic 6:6–8).

Saul grasps the hem of Samuel's robe and unintentionally tears it (v. 27). Samuel likens the robe to the kingdom, which Yahweh will tear from Saul and award to his "neighbor," i.e., David. The statement that Yahweh ("the Glory of Israel") will not change his mind (v. 29) is in tension with the fact that he had changed his mind about Saul being king. It may be a later addition, as signaled also by its introduction with the particle wegam ("moreover," lit., "and also"). Samuel also curiously changes his mind about returning with Saul (vv. 30–31, cf. v. 26). Samuel then dismembers Agag "before Yahweh" in a ritual execution typically employed for treaty breakers (vv. 32–33). This may have been the fate Saul had in mind for Agag all along, as suggested by his dread (so NRSV following the Greek). The statement that "Samuel did not see Saul again" (v. 35) is contradicted by 19:18–24 but well anticipates the story in ch. 28.

III. David's Ascent (16–31)

A. David Comes to Saul's Attention (16–17)

16:1–13. Anointing of the Shepherd David. This chapter begins the story of David. God tells Samuel to prepare a horn of oil for the purpose of anointing a new king (v. 1). The title "Messiah," meaning "anointed," was used for kings and derives from this practice.

Jesse presents his sons to Samuel in birth order. Eliab, the oldest, is like Saul in appearance—tall and handsome (v. 6). But also like Saul he is rejected from kingship because he lacks the inner qualities that God seeks (v. 7). David appears as the youngest of Jesse's sons (v. 11), and God's favoring of the youngest is a theme found elsewhere in the Bible (e.g., Jacob, Rachel, Joseph). The word "youngest" also means "smallest," further highlighting the contrast with Saul.

The portrait of David as a shepherd foreshadows David's kingship, since kings in the ancient Near East were often described and depicted as shepherds (cf. 2 Sam 5:2). While "handsome" is a typical descriptor for the king, the further details about David's physical appearance—beautiful eyes and ruddy, i.e., of reddish complexion—are unusual (v. 12). The contrast with Saul is highlighted above all by the notice that Yahweh's spirit "came mightily upon David from that day forward" (v. 13). From this point on in the narrative God is with David and against Saul.

16:14–23. David Becomes Saul's Armor-bearer. The introduction of David in this episode was originally independent from 16:1–13. There David was a youth tending sheep. Here, he comes to Saul's court as an experienced warrior (v. 18). In the present sequence, the spirit of Yahweh leaves Saul (v. 14) only after it has already come upon David (v. 13). Together, the two stories drive home the point that God is with David and against Saul. The "evil spirit from Yahweh" reflects ancient theology in which Yahweh is the author of both good and ill. Evil spirits were conceived of as being all around, and music was understood as a way of keeping them at bay. Hence, it was common for a king to employ a musician as a regular figure in his court. The basic tradition behind this narrative, then, may have been simply that David came into Saul's service as a court musician. David's instrument was the lyre, a portable stringed instrument resembling a small harp.

The description of David is unusual for its detail (v. 18). "Man of valor" probably refers to social prominence or wealth, since the next item in the list is "warrior." "Prudent in speech" implies astuteness as well as eloquence. Yahweh's presence with David is a central theme in 1 Samuel, especially in contrast with Saul. The author depicts the relationship between David and Saul as a very close one at the beginning (v. 21). Saul is a sort of father figure to David and effectively "adopts" him as his son, thus hinting at David's succession as king.

17:1–58. David and Goliath. This famous story is actually a composite of two versions, which can be easily distinguished from one another because the Greek text (LXX) contains only the initial version (vv. 1–11, 32–49, 51–54), which has been supplemented in the Hebrew text with the remaining verses in this chapter and 18:1–5. The composite nature of the present story accounts for certain inconsistencies. Both versions were evidently drawn from a legendary story about David's defeat of a Philistine champion.

The familiar name of the Philistine champion, Goliath, occurs only twice in the story (vv. 4, 23), which generally refers to "the Philistine." While the name is genuinely Philistine, it was probably not original to this story and came in under the influence of 2 Sam 21:19, which says that a Bethlehemite named Elhanan killed Goliath. The champion's height in the Hebrew text, nine and one-half feet, is also likely an unintended exaggeration. The Greek reading, "four cubits and a span"—some six and one-half feet—is more realistic.

The Philistine's armor (v. 5) does not match depictions of Philistine soldiers in Egyptian reliefs and is probably borrowed from that of different cultures and different periods with an interest in presenting him as invincible. The bronze coat of mail, for instance, at five thousand shekels would weigh about 126 pounds! However, the "helmet of bronze," if modeled after Assyrian styles, which did not possess nose guards, would permit David's sling stone to strike the Philistine in the forehead. The "javelin" slung over his shoulder was probably more like a "scimitar." The weight of the spearhead at 600 iron shekels was more than fifteen pounds, suggesting that it was designed for hand-to-hand combat rather than hurling. The Philistine's proposal of combat between representatives of the two armies (vv. 8–10) has been likened by some scholars to examples of individual battles in Greek literature (esp., the Iliad).

The second version of the story begins with v. 12, where David is introduced as though for the first time. This version identifies the same three sons of Jesse named in 16:1–13. Here, David is a shepherd and errand boy rather than a warrior (v. 15, cf. 16:18). Here also the Philistine has been reproaching Israel for forty days, while the other version has him face David the same day he issues his challenge. Saul's promised reward to the successful Israelite champion includes making his family "free" (v. 25), which refers to exemption not only from slavery but also from conscription and taxation.

The initial version of the story resumes in v. 32 where David accepts the Philistine's challenge. Saul's reluctance to send David because of his youth (v. 33) contrasts David's trust in God with Saul's lack thereof. The contrast is further drawn in the comic scene of Saul's effort to equip David with protective armor and David's inability to maneuver in it (vv. 38–39). The sling that David produces (v. 40) was not a toy but an effective weapon commonly used in ancient Near Eastern warfare. It had the advantages of being easily portable, easily hidden, and deadly accurate from a distance.

The effort to demoralize one's enemy through taunting and threat (vv. 41–47) was a tactic in ancient Near Eastern warfare comparable to "trash talking" in modern sporting events. The Philistine's disdainful perception of David as a boy with sticks (vv. 42–43) hints that he may not have seen the sling. David invokes God as the true source of his victory, of which he is certain because of the Philistine's defiance of Yahweh and his people. Verse 50 is an insertion from the secondary version, which has the sling stone killing the Philistine. In the initial version, the stone merely felled him, and David finished him off by beheading him (v. 51). In the present compilation, the Philistine actually appears to be killed twice, though v. 50 could be read as an out-of-place summary of the story.

Following David's victory, the Israelites chase the Philistines deep into their own territory (v. 52). The current ending of the story (vv. 55–58) stems from the second version and stands in tension with the story at the end of chapter 16. There, Saul was said to love David, while here he does not know him.

B. David in Saul's Court (18–20)

18:1–16. David's Military Success. The first five verses of this chapter are lacking in the LXX and thus continue the supplemental version of the Goliath story. Nevertheless, this passage introduces the theme of the close relationship between David and Jonathan. While Jonathan's love is that of a close personal relationship (v. 1), "love" in the ancient Near East is also a way of conveying political loyalty. Thus, Jonathan, heir to Saul's throne, is loyal to David! His bestowal of his robes upon David (v. 4) is tantamount to an abdication in favor of David as Saul's successor. David's success as a military commander (v. 5) also wins him the loyalty of the army. As the writer presents it, everyone in Saul's kingdom favors David—except Saul himself.

Saul's jealousy of David is sparked by the victory celebration that allots David a status equal and even superior to Saul's (v. 7). This episode marks the turning point in the relationship between Saul and David. The remainder of this chapter and the next two recount subtle attempts Saul makes to rid himself of David. The schemes grow more and more overt until Saul begins openly to seek David's life. Saul's attempt to spear David (19:8–10) originally marked the climax of this series of subtle plots and the first overt attempt to kill David in the initial narrative. The gradual increase in the overtness of Saul's actions in the initial narrative has been broken by the insertion of an earlier attempt by Saul to spear David (18:10–11), which is again supplemental as shown by its absence from the LXX. Thus, in the initial story, Saul first removed David from his presence and gave him a military command, apparently in the hope that David would be killed in action (18:12–13). The plan backfired when David's constant success won him the loyalty of all Israel and Judah (vv. 14–15). 18:17–30. David Marries Michal. Saul's next subtle move was the offer of his daughter, Michal, in exchange for 100 Philistine foreskins, again hoping that David would fall to the Philistines in the attempt (v 20–30). "Foreskins" likely refers, perhaps euphemistically, to uncircumcised penises collected as war trophies, a practice attested on Egyptian reliefs. The terminology exemplifies "dark humor" on the author's part as a classic case of "adding insult to injury"; David "converts" the Philistines into Israelites by "circumcising" them. The stakes are high in this episode. Saul risks bringing David into his family and thus giving him a claim, albeit an indirect one, on the throne. Thus, the narrative speaks of becoming "the king's son-in-law," which is precisely the incentive behind David's risking his life. David's ambition is thinly masked here. The text states that Michal loved David but never that David loved Michal. Her love for David is yet another example of David's universal appeal and support in the story. Later texts report that he took her from her husband (2 Sam 3:14–16) and that she bore him no children, who would have been heirs to Saul (2 Sam 6:23). He seems to have been interested in her purely to legitimate his claim to Saul's throne.

19:1–24. Saul's Moves Against David Become Overt. Saul next tries to talk his servants and Jonathan into killing David, but Jonathan thwarts his father by warning David and then by convincing Saul that David is innocent (vv. 1–5). He secures an oath from Saul that David will not be killed (v. 6) and thus reconciles the two of them (v. 7). The reconciliation is temporary, though, as Saul is roused to jealousy by the evil spirit after David's next successful encounter against the Philistines and tries to kill David with his spear (vv. 8–10). This narrow escape initiates David's flight; from now until Saul's death David will be on the run. The episode in vv. 11–17, therefore, is probably out of place. It appears to reflect David and Michal's wedding night and thus probably originally came directly after the story of their marriage. It shows Michal helping David to escape and thus choosing him over her father. The household idols used by Michal to fool Saul's messengers are referred to elsewhere in the Bible, where they seem to have been used for divining and may have represented property rights (Gen 31:33–35; Judg 17:5).

David's first stop upon leaving Saul, Ramah (vv. 18–24), appears to make little sense historically or geographically, since it was north of Gibeah. This episode is included here for ideological reasons, because Ramah was Samuel's home: Samuel and the prophets add their support to David. Even more important, Yahweh uses prophecy as a tool to protect David from Saul's envoys and then to disable Saul himself.

20:1–42. Jonathan's Failed Reconciliation. David again seeks help from Jonathan, who does not believe that his father would act against David without consulting him. The two of them concoct a plan to test Saul's true sentiments toward David. The new moon was celebrated with sacrifice and feasting (v. 5). David's absence would be noted, and Saul's reaction to it would reveal his attitude toward David. The covenant in this chapter is about more than friendship; it involves political loyalty, implied by the term "love" (v. 17). Hence, Jonathan's wish that Yahweh will be with David as he has been with Saul (v. 13) portends David's kingship. Jonathan's concern for David's treatment of his posterity ("my house," vv. 14–15) also assumes David's future reign and is the basis for his treatment of Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9). Jonathan's oath (v. 16) was probably originally an imprecation against David himself as an assurance against future violation of the treaty. A scribe probably altered the language out of reverence for David. Ironically, "the enemies of David" would include Saul.

Saul does not initially remark on David's absence from the sacrificial meal, assuming that it is because of ritual uncleanness, which might have a variety of causes (v. 26; cf. Lev 11–15). But when Jonathan informs him that he has excused David from the sacrifice, Saul becomes angry, insulting and even attacking Jonathan (vv. 26–34). Saul refuses to call David by name, disparaging him as "the son of Jesse" (v. 27). Saul, in effect, accuses Jonathan of treason by saying that he has chosen David over himself (v. 30). Making such a choice shames his mother's "nakedness," a euphemism for the genitals and thus for Jonathan's own origins. Saul recognizes that if David lives he will be the next king in Jonathan's place (v. 31). The theme of David and Jonathan as rivals or alter-egos is further apparent when Saul tries to kill Jonathan with his spear just as he had tried to kill David (v. 33). Jonathan faithfully signals David as promised (vv. 35–40).

C. David the Fugitive (21–31)

21:1–9. David Seeks Help from the Priests of Nob. Lying between Gibeah and Jerusalem, Nob was evidently the home of Eli's line after the fall of Shiloh (Ahimelech was Eli's great grandson). Ahimelech greets David uneasily (v. 1), perhaps suspecting that he is on the run from Saul. But David convinces him that he is on a secret mission and about to rendezvous with his men (v. 2). The only food Ahimelech has is holy bread, which he offers to David if he and his men are ritually pure. (In the NT, Jesus cites this story to illustrate human need transcending ritual law [Matt 12:3–4; Mk 2:25–26; Lk 6:3–4].) The transaction is ominously witnessed by Doeg, an Edomite and a leading official in Saul's administration (v. 7). David also requests a weapon and receives Goliath's sword (vv. 8–9).

21:10–15. David Feigns Madness Before the Philistines. The story of David's flight to the Philistine king Achish of Gath (vv. 11–15) seems out of place, especially in view of chs. 27–29, where David serves him as a mercenary. David's feigning of madness in order to escape danger indicates that the mentally ill were considered divinely "touched" on the order of prophets and were therefore protected from harm. It is unlikely that the Philistines would have been familiar with the victory song of the Israelite women (v. 11). It is also peculiar that they refer to David as the "king of the land." Is it possible that David was already the effective ruler of the Negeb long before Saul's death?

22:1–5. David Gathers an Army and Provides for His Parents. Adullam, the site of a small fortress about 17 miles southwest of Jerusalem, becomes David's headquarters. "Cave" (v. 1) should probably be emended to "stronghold" (v. 4), the two words being very similar in Hebrew. Apparently fearing for the safety of his parents in Bethlehem, David sends them to Moab (vv. 3–4), perhaps because he was partly of Moabite ancestry through Ruth (cf. Ruth 4:17–22).

22:6–23. Saul Annihilates the Priests of Nob. Saul is cast in the typical, royal posture of a king seated under a sacred tree (the "tamarisk") judging the people (v. 6). Saul tells his fellow Benjaminites that they cannot expect rewards for supporting the Judahite, David. Ahimelech's inquiring of Yahweh on David's behalf (v. 10) is not reported in chapter 21, but it proves important when Saul confronts the priest. Ahimelech does not deny that he helped David. His defense, rather, is that he has often inquired of God for David, who is among Saul's most loyal servants (vv. 14–15). Both statements only fanned Saul's rage. Ahimelech also pleads ignorance, but Saul does not listen and orders the execution of the priests (v. 17). Doeg alone carries out the order, presumably because as an Edomite he does not have scruples against attacking Yahweh's priests (v. 18). Ironically, Saul devotes the city of Nob to destruction, thus committing an act of war against Yahweh himself. Abiathar's lone escape (vv. 20–23) fulfills the oracle in 2:27–36. He will prove an invaluable ally to David in avoiding capture by Saul and will eventually become one of David's high priests.

23:1–29. Providential Escapes in the Wilderness. This chapter recounts a series of narrow escapes from Saul in the wilderness, illustrating the benefit to David of having Abiathar and the ephod (v. 6). Following the directives of Yahweh, David rescues Keilah (vv. 1–5) and then escapes when he learns of Saul's approach (vv. 6–14). These incidents exhibit not only God's protection of David but also David's trust in and regular consultation of Yahweh. Jonathan's support of David (vv. 16–18) is both moral and tangible ("strengthened his hand"). Jonathan's willingness to yield his place as king to David and to agree to serve as his second in command (v. 17) illustrates the writer's apologetic contention that everyone—even the crown prince—recognized David's kingship. The final episode (vv. 19–29) is perhaps the best example of divine protection of David. Saul has David trapped but is forced to withdraw at the last moment by news of a Philistine incursion (v. 27).

24:1–22. An Opportunity to Kill Saul in a Cave in En-gedi. The remainder of 1 Samuel seems focused on demonstrating that David had nothing to do with Saul's death. This is the first of two stories (ch. 26) that show David having opportunities to kill Saul and refusing to do so. The point seems to be that if David did not kill when he had the chance, he certainly would not have been involved in Saul's final demise.

In a denigrating portrait, especially for a king, Saul enters a cave in the vicinity of En-Gedi, in order to "cover his feet," an idiom for defecation. David and his men are hiding in that cave, and the men see this as an opportunity. Refusing to kill Saul, David cuts off a portion of his garment, which might be viewed as symbolic emasculation or usurpation (v. 4b). David refuses to harm Saul because as Yahweh's "anointed" he is sacrosanct (v. 6). For the same reason, when David speaks to Saul outside of the cave, he is very respectful and self-deprecating. He denies that he intends any harm against Saul and displays the piece of Saul's garment as proof that he could have harmed Saul (vv. 8–11). Still, there is an edge, or double entendre to David's words. His designation of Saul as "my father" is respectful but also implies his right to succeed (v. 11). He also expresses confidence that Yahweh will vindicate him against Saul (v. 15). Saul's weeping confession is another sign of his instability, but it shows that, when rational, even he recognizes that David is in the right (vv. 16–25). He acknowledges that David will succeed him (v. 20) and begs him not to annihilate his line, as was common practice for usurpers (v. 21). David's oath (v. 22) anticipates his treatment of Saul's grandson, Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9).

25:1–44. David, Nabal, and Abigail. This story is placed between two stories of opportunities that David has to kill Saul and refuses (ch. 24; 26). Here, David vows to kill a wealthy, Saul-like figure out of personal revenge, but is prevented from doing so by the man's wife. Meaning "fool," Nabal seems an unlikely personal name. Its original meaning might have been different or the man's real name may have been different and "Nabal" adopted as fitting the character in this story. It is also similar to Hebrew words for "wine bottle" and "corpse," both of which appropriately characterize Nabal at different points in the story. Nabal's wife, Abigail, was his exact opposite.

Sheep shearing was a time of celebration, so David is hoping to catch Nabal in a generous mood (v. 4). The ten men he sends are intended both to intimidate Nabal and to indicate what size gift David has in mind (v. 5). As David presents it (vv. 6–8), he and his men have protected Nabal's flocks in the wilderness, so that Nabal is indebted to him. David's request is answered with insults by Nabal (vv. 10–11). David is furious and orders his men to arm themselves (v. 13). Nabal's servants immediately recognize the danger they are in and appeal to Abigail, acknowledging that Nabal cannot be reasoned with (vv. 14–17). Abigail wisely gathers provisions and sets out to intercept David (vv. 18–20). At this point, the narrator reveals David's true intention: to kill all of the males (lit. "everyone who urinates on the wall") in Nabal's household (v. 22), leaving Abigail, a woman, as the only one who could avert the crisis.

Abigail does obeisance to David as to a king (v. 23). Her speech is a model of eloquence and diplomacy, both soothing his bruised ego and gingerly reasoning with him. She dismisses Nabal and his actions as insignificant (v. 25) and offers him a "present" for his men (v. 27). She argues that it is in David's own self-interest not to attack Nabal's household, because the shedding of innocent blood would be a blot on David's kingship (vv. 30–31). Rather, he should trust Yahweh to avenge him. She concludes with a marriage proposal ("remember your servant"). "When the LORD has dealt well with my lord" is ambiguous and may refer either to Nabal's death or to David becoming king.

The chapter ends with the names of three of David's wives. All three marriages likely reflect political maneuvering. The only other Ahinoam in the Bible was Saul's wife (14:50). The only other Abigail was David's sister (1 Chr 2:16). It is uncertain whether these are the same women. In any case, Ahinoam's Jezreel was also in Judah near Carmel, so that she and Abigail represent David's hegemony over the Calebites. The reference to Michal prepares for 2 Sam 3:13–16, where David demands her return because through her he has a claim to Saul's kingdom. The fact that she was married to another man raises the possibility that she was not really previously married to David.

26:1–25. Another Opportunity to Kill Saul in the Wilderness of Ziph. This story is similar to the one in chapter 24. This time, Saul is sleeping with his army around him (v. 5). David sneaks down with Abishai, the brother of Joab, two of the rough and ready "sons of Zeruiah" (v. 7). Abishai encourages David to have Saul killed with, ironically, the same spear he had thrown at David (v. 8). As in chapter 24, though, David piously refuses to harm Yahweh's anointed (vv. 9–11). Going to "the other side," where he can lead Saul's men away from his own camp should Saul pursue him, David addresses Saul as in chapter 24, though here he speaks directly to Abner, Saul's commander. David curses anyone who may have accused him (falsely) to Saul because they have forced him to leave Yahweh's "heritage," i.e., Israel. The idea here is that each country had its own god, and each god its own country or "heritage." In other countries, therefore, one would "serve other gods" (v. 19). As in ch. 24, Saul admits that he is in the wrong and promises not to harm David, and he alludes to David's future kingship (v. 25).

27:1–28:2. David Becomes a Philistine Mercenary. David seeks refuge with the Philistine king, Achish, in the city of Gath. It seems unlikely that Achish would have accepted David if David had previously feigned madness to escape (21:10–15), so these two anecdotes stand in tension. The city of Ziklag, granted to David by Achish, lay on the southern Philistine frontier (v. 6), so that David and his men served as mercenaries guarding that frontier. From Ziklag, David conducted raids against settlements of people hostile to Judah (v. 8). He brought the spoils to Achish, claiming to have attacked Judah and its constituents (v. 10), and since he killed all the inhabitants of the places he attacked, no one could tell Achish the truth (vv. 9, 11). Thus, Achish became convinced that he had David's loyalty (v. 12), so much so that he takes David and his men with him to war against Israel (28:1). The statement, "Then you shall know what your servant can do" (28:2), is a double entendre; what Achish hears as a pledge of loyalty and promise of potential is a veiled warning about David's duplicity.

28:3–25. Saul Consults a Medium at Endor. Saul is anxious about the impending battle with the Philistines (v. 5). But having alienated himself from Yahweh, he receives no response using the customary means of divination (v. 6). He violates his own order and Israelite law banning those who consult the dead (v. 3; Lev 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut 18:10–11) by going in disguise to consult a medium. Verses 11–12a anticipate the identification of the ghost or "divine being" (lit., "god") as Samuel. The ghost comes up from the underworld (v. 13), where the dead are understood to reside. Saul recognizes Samuel from his robe (v. 14), the same one that Saul tore and Samuel used as symbol that God would tear the kingdom from him (v. 17; cf. 1 Sam 15). Saul is told that he and his sons will be with Samuel the next day, meaning that they will be dead (v. 19). Saul's terror at this news (vv. 20–21) ill befits a king and suggests that he is unqualified to continue as such. He is hungry probably because he fasted in anticipation of consulting the medium.

29:1–11. David Is Sent Away by the Philistine Commanders. In reviewing their troops for war, the Philistine commanders notice David and his men. Since it is they rather than the "lords of the Philistines," the rulers of the Philistine city-states, like Achish, who will actually fight the battle, they demand that the "Hebrews" be dismissed, fearing that David will revert to Israel (v. 4). Achish remains convinced of David's loyalty to him, but goes along with his fellow Philistine lords and dismisses David, sending him back to Ziklag, "the place that I appointed for you" (v. 10). David's reference to "the enemies of my lord the king" (v. 8) is again duplicitous. David's "lord" and "king" is Saul, making Achish and the Philistines the enemies against whom David desires to fight. This story makes clear that David did not participate in the battle in which Saul lost his life. Not only had the Philistines dismissed him, but he was on his way to Ziklag, far away from the northern town and valley of Jezreel, where the battle is joined (v. 11).

30:1–31. David Avenges the Sack of Ziklag. This episode both continues the defense of David in the face of Saul's death and presents him as a royal figure. The fact that it took three days for David to reach Ziklag (v. 1) emphasizes David's distance from the dying Saul. David faced a mutiny as a result of the raid and the loss of his men's families (vv. 2–6). But his reaction was exemplary as he "strengthened himself in Yahweh" (v. 6) and then called for Abiathar to consult God about his next move (vv. 7–10). In contrast to God's "silent treatment" of Saul (28:6), he answers David, telling him to pursue the raiders and attack them. The Egyptian servant found on the way (vv. 11–15), having been providentially abandoned to die by his master, has no qualms about leading David to the Amalekite camp. The defeat of the raiders garners David great booty (vv. 16–20), which he distributes among the elders of cities in southern Judah (vv. 26–31) as a way of securing their support for his kingship. The decree that David issues concerning the men who guarded the equipment (vv. 21–25) both shows him to be a decisive and effective leader and provides an etiology for the practice of equally distributing spoil.

31:1–13. Saul Dies on Mt. Gilboa. The scene switches back to Saul in battle on Mt. Gilboa. His sons have been killed, and he is seriously wounded (vv. 1–3). Wishing to avoid torture ("sport"), he asks his armor-bearer to finish him off. But the man refuses, presumably out of reverence for Saul's status as Yahweh's anointed. So Saul commits suicide (v. 4). (Suicide is not prohibited in the Hebrew Bible; it occurs elsewhere in desperate circumstances [2 Sam 17:23; 1 Kgs 16:18; cf. Matt 27:5].)

Those "on the other side of the valley" apparently refers to the Israelites who lived north of the Jezreel, where the battle occurred, and "those beyond the Jordan" to those whose homes are east of the Jordan. As a result of their flight, the central section of Israel falls to Philistine domination. This would have included the Jezreel and meant that the Philistines controlled access to the roads and thus trade through Israel, both east-west along the Jezreel Valley and north-south along the coast and through the Jordan Valley. Beth-shan guarded the eastern end of the Jezreel.

Just as David cut off Goliath's head and took his armor (17:51, 54), so the Philistines dismember Saul's corpse and seize his armor as war trophies (vv. 9–10). They credit their gods with the victory. The people from Jabesh-Gilead were indebted to Saul for rescuing them from Nahash (10:27b–11:15), which was probably why they undertook the mission of retrieving the corpses of Saul and his sons (vv. 11–13).

2 SAMUEL

STEVE MCKENZIE

OVERVIEW

The book of 2 Samuel is the continuation of 1 Samuel. Since 2 Sam 1 provides another report of Saul's death (1 Sam 31), it literally takes up where 1 Samuel leaves off.

The prophet Samuel, after whom the book is named, is long dead when 2 Samuel begins and is never mentioned in the book. At the same time, the story narrated in 2 Samuel extends beyond that book, continuing in 1 and 2 Kings. Thus, 1 and 2 Samuel are part of the much larger Deuteronomistic History (= Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings).

With Saul gone, David immediately becomes king of Judah. A protracted civil war with Saul's heir, Ish-baal (-bosheth) ensues. The assassinations of Abner and then Ish-baal open the way for David to unite Israel with Judah under his rule. This he does, conquering Jerusalem and designating it as his capital, installing the ark there as well. All this takes place in the first six chapters. The book tells how God responds to David's suggestion about building a temple by promising him a dynasty. It reports his military successes, and in the midst of one of these, his adultery with Bathsheba, murder of her husband, and Nathan's denunciation of the affair. Further trouble plagues David's reign in the rape of his daughter, Tamar, by her half-brother and crown prince, Amnon, and then the murder of the latter by Absalom, her full brother, who subsequently leads a successful, albeit short-lived, revolt against his father. After the report of another, less successful revolt, the book ends rather abruptly with a collection of texts (narratives, military anecdotes, and poems) that are out of chronological order but reflect careful arrangement. David's death is left to be recounted in 1 Kings.

The main feature in the literary-critical landscape of 2 Samuel is the so-called "Succession Narrative," otherwise known as the "Court History" of David. This hypothetical document was initially posited as an early work of historiography—essentially contemporaneous with the events it reports—underlying much of 2 Samuel, including David's dealings with Mephiboshet (2 Sam 9), the Ammonite campaign (2 Sam 10), the Bathsheba affair (2 Sam 11–12), the revolts of Absalom and Sheba (2 Sam 13–20), and Solomon's accession (1 Kgs 1–2), that sought to explain how Solomon came to succeed David. In recent decades, the date, purpose, characteristic—even the bare existence—of this document have been questioned by scholars. The designation "Court History" for what amounts to the bulk of 2 Samuel places in relief just how little of David's reign is actually reported in 2 Samuel—a handful of events over what is supposed to have been a forty-year reign.

There is much less unanimity among scholars about the overall interpretation of 2 Samuel than there is for 1 Samuel. Some, including the present author, find a continuation of the apologetic tendency of 1 Samuel; the author defending David in the face of allegations that he was responsible for the assassinations of the Saulides—Abner, Ish-baal, and most of Saul's other sons and grandsons—as well as his own sons, Amnon and Absalom. Others see the Court History as a scathing condemnation of the Davidic line and even of monarchy in general. The majority view probably lies between these two positions. The author of 2 Samuel is sympathetic toward David but faults him for personal and familial failings and traces the troubles during his reign to these failings.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. David's Accession to Kingship (1:1–5:5)

A. David Learns of Saul's Death (1:1–27)

1:1–16. Interrogation of the Amalekite. The book of 2 Samuel begins with a second account of Saul's death in battle, parallel to 1 Sam 31. The two versions need not be taken as variants from different sources. Rather, it seems likely that the Amalekite in the present account should be understood as lying. Hence, his claim to have been on Mt. Gilboa while the battle was raging (v. 6) is unbelievable. Moreover, Amalekites are depicted elsewhere as untrustworthy scavengers and enemies of Israel (1 Sam 15; 30). The reader is to surmise that he pilfered the royal effects from Saul's corpse (v. 10) and then, aware of the rivalry between Saul and David, brought them to David, along with his contrived story about finishing Saul off, in anticipation of a reward. The man's status as a "resident alien" (ger) makes him subject to Israel's laws and therefore liable for having killed Yahweh's anointed (1:13–14). This episode also shows David's respect for Saul and the position of Yahweh's anointed. "Anointed" is a royal title; it could be transliterated into English as "messiah."

1:17–27. Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan. The "lamentation" or "dirge" (Heb: qinah, v. 17) was a particular kind of poem marked by a distinctive meter. For "The Song of the Bow" (v. 18), the Hebrew text reads only "bow." This may be a copyist's error or perhaps a musical notation. The "Book of Jashar" was apparently a collection of poems; it is cited elsewhere (Josh 10:13). David orders that the poem be taught in Judah, i.e., among his fellow tribesmen, who rivaled the house of Saul and the tribe of Benjamin for leadership over Israel, in order to show David's high regard for Saul. "Glory" and "mighty" (or "warriors") allude to Saul and Jonathan (v. 19). The poem commands that the news of their deaths not be proclaimed among the Philistines, who would celebrate it (v. 20). The rejoicing of the Philistine "daughters," i.e., women, may be contrasted to the victory songs of the Israelite women in 1 Sam 18:6–7 and to their weeping in v. 24. Next, the poem curses the "mountains of Gilboa" where Saul died (v. 21). Leather shields were "anointed with oil" to keep them from becoming brittle and ineffective. The Israelite women lament Saul's death because his military conquests brought them items from the spoils of battle (v. 24). The reference to Jonathan's love "passing the love of women" (v. 26) is hyperbole; scholars disagree about whether it implies a sexual relationship between David and Jonathan.

B. Civil War (2:1–5:5)

2:1–4a. David Made King of Judah. The writer depicts David as still looking to Yahweh for direction. The verb "inquired" or "asked" (ša'al, v. 1) is a pun on Saul's name. Formal inquiry probably involved use of the ephod, Urim and Thummim, or some other divinatory device. Hebron was the principal city of the Calebites, the leading clan in Judah. Ahinoam and Abigail (v. 2) were both from this region (1 Sam 25:43), and their presence lent support to David's bid to be king of Judah. David's previous gifts to the elders of Judah from his despoiling of the Amalekites might also have won him supporters.

2:4b–7. David's Overture to Jabesh-Gilead. Not content to be king of Judah, David immediately begins moving toward the Israelite throne. Jabesh-Gilead was an enclave of loyal Saul supporters because he had rescued them from the Ammonites (1 Sam 11). Those from Jabesh retrieved Saul's corpse for burial (1 Sam 31:11–13). David's letter suggests that he, rather than one of Saul's sons, is Saul's successor and that the Jabesh-Gileadites should support him.

2:8–11. Ishbaal Succeeds Saul. Ishbaal is presented as something of a figurehead, with Abner, the commander of the army, holding the real power. The Hebrew actually reads "Ishbosheth," the word bosheth ("abomination") having been substituted for baal by a pious scribe because the latter is the name of a Canaanite god. However, baal means "master, lord" and may have once been an epithet for Yahweh. The location of Mahanaim east of the Jordan indicates that following Saul's death and Israel's defeat, the Philistines controlled most of the territory west of the Jordan, despite Ishbaal's claim to be king "over all Israel" (v. 9). "Geshurites" should probably be read instead of "Ashurites"; Geshur was a territory and sometimes independent kingdom directly east of the Sea of Galilee (2 Sam 3:3; 15:8). Ishbaal's reign overlaps with only two of the seven and one-half years that David reigned over Judah (vv. 10–11). It is unclear whether the remaining five and one-half years occurred after Ishbaal's death or before his reign, while Saul was still king of Israel.

2:12–32. The Battle at Gibeon and the Death of Asahel. The exact nature of the contest in vv. 12–17 is unclear. The episode provides an etiological explanation for the place name Helkathhazzurim, meaning "field of the flint blades." It also initiates the battle and subsequent war that follow. David's forces win the day and eventually the war. Of crucial importance in this narrative of the first battle is the death of Asahel in vv. 18–23. Asahel was the brother of Joab and Abishai, two of David's leading commanders (v. 18). He is depicted here as a young man, fleet of foot and trying to build his reputation as a warrior—a depiction that stands in tension with his inclusion as a leading figure in the list of David's military heroes (23:24). His death at Abner's hand furnishes a motive for Joab's assassination of Abner in the next chapter.

3:1–5. David's Sons Born in Hebron. Of the sons listed here, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah will play roles in future stories. However, nothing more is known of Chileab (v. 3), Shephatiah (v. 4), or Ithream (v. 5). It is often supposed that Chileab died young, since he was David's second son, yet he does not appear again. David's marriage to Absalom's mother, Maacah, likely sealed a treaty with her father, Talmai, who was the king of Geshur (see on 2:9).

3:6–39. Abner's Defection and Assassination. Ishbaal's questioning of Abner in the matter of Saul's concubine, Rizpah (v. 7), led Abner to defect to David. A "concubine" was a slave-wife used for sexual purposes, whose children were not considered heirs. Sleeping with one of the king's harem would amount to a claim to the throne, so that Ishbaal's question is effectively an accusation of treason. Abner does not deny his relationship with Rizpah but is offended by the disrespect and implication of disloyalty from Ishbaal, whom he placed on the throne (2:8–9). "Dog's head" is an expression unattested elsewhere in the Bible; the context as well as comparable references to dogs indicate that it is an expression of reproach (cf. 1 Sam 17:43; 24:14; 2 Sam 9:8; 16:9; 2 Kgs 8:13). Abner may have been seeking a pretext to defect to David's side, which was winning the civil war. "Dan to Beersheba" represented the traditional north-south extent of Israel (v. 10).

David's demand that Abner bring Michal (v. 13) is politically motivated; as Saul's daughter, she symbolizes his claim to Saul's kingdom. It is not clear why Ishbaal complies with David's demand (vv. 14–16), though some scholars have suggested that he was legally compelled to do so. It is possible that Paltiel (or Palti, cf. 1 Sam 25:44) was Michal's real and only husband and that the stories about her marriage to David are to legitimate his claim to be Saul's successor as his son-in-law.

Abner first lobbies the Israelites and Benjaminites on David's behalf (vv. 17–19). The promise from Yahweh that he cites in v. 18 is not attested in exactly this form elsewhere and is probably the author's synthesis, presented as a rhetorical device by which Abner seeks to convince the Israelite leaders. The author makes a point of claiming that David treated Abner hospitably (v. 20) and then dismissed him peaceably, indicating that he had nothing to do with Abner's death. Thus, the text repeatedly states that Abner left in peace (vv. 21, 22, 23). Joab is upset that David released Abner, whom he accuses of spying (vv. 24–25). The text also makes clear that David was ignorant of Joab's actions (v. 26) and that Joab acted out of revenge for Asahel (v. 27, 30). David affirms his innocence in the matter, denouncing and cursing Joab (vv. 28, 29), but does not punish him until many years later, in what is patently an act of retribution for Joab's having supported Adonijah instead of Solomon (1 Kgs 2:5–6). The harshness of the "sons of Zeruah" becomes a theme in 2 Samuel, as they shoulder the blame for the violent deaths of leading individuals whose removal benefited David. David also laments Abner's death and orders the people to do the same (vv. 31–34). He fasts as a sign of mourning (v. 35), and praises Abner as a great man (v. 38). The author reports that David's actions convinced the Israelites that he was not responsible for Abner's death (vv. 36–37).

4:1–12. Ishbaal's Assassination. Since Abner was the commander of the army and the real power behind the throne, his death effectively meant the end of the civil war and of Ishbaal's kingdom. The original form of the name Mephibosheth was probably Meribbaal (1 Chr 8:34; 9:40). His disability, described here, made him unsuitable to be king, and, as a result, he was later kept alive instead of being executed along with Saul's other sons (see on ch. 9). As in the case of the Amalekite who claimed to have killed Saul (2 Sam 1) and which David cites here (v. 10), the two captains who assassinated Ishbaal brought his head to David anticipating a reward. David does not call Ishbaal Yahweh's anointed as he did Saul (1:14), but refers to him as a "righteous man" (v. 11), and he has the two assassins executed and dismembered in ritual fashion (v. 12), perhaps because he considered them traitors.

5:1–5. David Made King of Israel. With Saul, Jonathan, Abner, and Ishbaal all dead, "all the tribes of Israel" (i.e., the northern tribes, excluding Judah), turn to David for leadership. They claim kinship with David ("your bone and flesh") and say that it was he who brought them military success ("led out Israel and brought it in") even while Saul was reigning. The quotation attributed to Yahweh (v. 2) is not attested elsewhere; it expresses the author's view and perhaps that of the Israelites that David is divinely chosen to be king, and it is a device by which the Israelites seek to ingratiate themselves to David. "Shepherd" was a common metaphor in the ancient Near East for the king. The term "ruler" (naghidh) means "king designate." The figure of "forty years" for the total length of David's reign may be a round number for a generation, as it is elsewhere in the Bible.

II. David Builds an Empire (5:6–12:31)

A. Consolidating the Kingdom (5:6–25)

5:6–16. Establishing Jerusalem as the Capital. One of David's priorities upon becoming king was the establishment of a capital. Scholars have long observed that Jerusalem was a perfect choice because of its geographical and political neutrality. As a Jebusite city, it did not belong to either Israel or Judah and was roughly between them geographically. The choice of Jerusalem thus helped to unite Israel and Judah under David's rule.

Exactly how David conquered Jerusalem is unclear. The interpretation reflected in the NRSV that his army entered through a water shaft may be correct. But it lacks definite archaeological confirmation and does not explain the references to the blind and lame. Another proposal translates the phrase "get up the water shaft" as "strike at the wind pipe" and takes it to mean that David orders his men to kill the enemy rather than maiming them (cf. Lev 21:18). "Millo" (v. 9) means "fill" and may refer to an artificial landfill between different hills on which Jerusalem was built. Yahweh's presence with David (v. 10) was a major motif in 1 Samuel and continues in 2 Samuel as well. David's house in Jerusalem is built with Phoenician materials and expertise (v. 11), illustrating his regional dominance. A further symbol of regnal power in the ancient Near East was a large harem; hence, David's addition of more wives and concubines (v. 13). Solomon's birth is recounted later, so that his mention in v. 14 is anticipatory.

5:17–25. Defeating the Philistines. David's battles with the Philistines likely preceded his conquest of Jerusalem, since they opposed his efforts to unite Israel and Judah. Thus the "stronghold" in v. 17 refers not to Jerusalem but probably to Adullam. Both accounts depict David inquiring of Yahweh (see on 2:1) about military strategy. In both battle accounts, it is Yahweh who fights for Israel and gives victory. The first (vv. 17–21) is based on an etiology for the name Baal-perazim. It is noteworthy that the etiology identifies Yahweh as the "lord" or Baal in the name. In line with ancient Near Eastern practice and in reversal of the Philistines' capture of the ark (1 Sam 4:5–11), David takes the Philistine idols as trophies of Yahweh's superiority and victory (v. 21). As a result, David drives the Philistines back to their own territory on the coastland west of Gezer (v. 25).

B. David Brings the Ark to Jerusalem (6:1–23)

6:1–19. Transfer of the Ark. The transfer of the ark takes place in two stages, separated by a three-month hiatus when the ark resides at Obed-Edom's house after Uzzah's death. The episode begins as a celebration (vv. 1–5). Viewed as Yahweh's throne, the ark was an important religious symbol, so that moving it into Jerusalem would make the city a religious as well as political capital. "Cherubim" were not the winged infants of Renaissance art but mythical, griffinlike creatures that guarded palaces and temples. The story of Uzzah's death is an etiology for the name Perez-Uzzah (vv. 6–11) as well as an illustration of the ark's holiness. As a sacred object, it is not to be touched; Uzzah's offense (or "breach") in this regard may have occurred because the ark was not being transported correctly. Wary of the ark's potential danger, David leaves it in Obed-Edom's house until the blessings it brings to that household show that it bears no inherent danger. Then David has it carried to Jerusalem—this time by humans and with frequent sacrifices to appease Yahweh (vv. 12–19). David himself officiates as a priest, wearing an ephod (v. 14) and sacrificing (vv. 17–18). This ephod was apparently a scant apron, and judging from Michal's reaction (v. 16), David wore little else.

6:20–23. David's Encounter with Michal. Michal accuses David of demeaning the office of king by uncovering himself in front of the lowest element of society. David responds that he is honored by Yahweh, who chose him to replace her father, and by his people. Although v. 23 implies that Michal's childlessness was the result of David's or Yahweh's displeasure with her because of this incident, it may actually have been a political strategy on David's part to prevent Michal from bearing a son who would have been Saul's heir and hence a potential rival to David.

C. Yahweh's Promise to David (7:1–29)

Yahweh's promise of an enduring or eternal dynasty is a key passage in the DtrH since it explains why Judah was ruled by a single dynasty and why it outlasted Israel. There is general agreement that the chapter is a Deuteronomistic composition. The point of the passage is presented as a kind of word play: David expresses interest in building Yahweh a house (= temple), and Yahweh says that instead he will build David a house (= dynasty).

The statement that David had rest from his enemies (v. 1) may be textually corrupt. It stands in tension with the accounts of his wars in the following chapters and with 1 Kgs 5:3–4. David makes no explicit proposal, but it seems clear that he has in mind building a temple for Yahweh, and Nathan initially approves of the idea (vv. 2–3). Similarly, Yahweh does not categorically refuse a temple, but suggests that he does not need a temple yet and that David's son rather than David himself is the one to build it (vv. 4, 12–13). The statement that Yahweh has not had a "house" (v. 5) overlooks the temple in Shiloh (1 Sam 1–3). Yahweh then says that just as he chose David to be king, he will choose the "place" for the temple to be built by David's son after God has given Israel peace (vv. 8–17). David's son, therefore, connects the two meanings of "house," since he will both establish and continue David's dynasty and build the temple. The word "forever" (vv. 13, 16) does not mean endless time but simply a long time. Another key word here is "steadfast love" (khesed), which refers to Yahweh's loyalty or commitment to David. The chapter ends with David's lengthy prayer, again in Deuteronomistic style, thanking Yahweh for his promise.

D. David Defeats Neighboring Countries (8:1–18)

8:1–14. David's Victories. These verses recount victories of David over the peoples surrounding Israel: Philistines (v. 1), Moabites (v. 2), Aram-Zobah (vv. 3–12), and Edom (vv. 13–14). In contrast to the two stories in ch. 5, David is here the aggressor against the Philistines, and v. 1 reports his decisive defeat of them. The identity of "Metheg-ammah" is unknown; NRSV renders it as a place name. David's treatment of the Moabites is somewhat surprising if, as the book of Ruth suggests, he was of partial Moabite descent (cf. 1 Sam 22:3–4). The "monument" in v. 3 must have belonged to David, since Hadadezer could have traveled from Aram (Syria) to the Euphrates without encountering David. David's crippling of the rear legs of the chariot horses (v. 4) has been taken as an indication that Israel did not yet have an extensive chariot force in its army. Hamath (v. 9) was another Aramean city-state, and a rival of Zobah. "Joram" is a Yahwistic name and unexpected for an Aramean. The Chronicles parallel (1 Chr 18:10) has "Hadoram," a more fitting Aramean name. In addition to the countries in these anecdotes, v. 12 mentions David's defeat of Ammonites and Amalekites. Verse 14 offers a theological synthesis: David's victories were the gift of Yahweh.

8:15–18. David's Cabinet. It was the king's responsibility to administer justice and equity for all of his people, especially the poor and disadvantaged (v. 15). A similar cabinet list occurs in 20:23–26. The precise functions of the different cabinet posts are uncertain, for instance, the difference between the "recorder" (v. 16) and the "secretary" or "scribe" (v. 17). The exact identity of the "Cherethites and Pelethites" is also uncertain, though scholars have typically identified them as "Cretans" (i.e., from Crete) and "Philistines." They apparently comprised a kind of elite bodyguard for David. The mention of David's sons as priests (v. 18) suggests that an exclusively Levitical priesthood was not yet in place.

E. David's Treatment of Mephibosheth (9:1–13)

David's question, "Is there still anyone left of the house of Saul?" presupposes the execution of Saul's heirs and indicates that 21:1–14, which recounts that execution, originally preceded ch. 9. "Kindness" (khesed) involves covenant fealty and recalls David's promise to Jonathan (1 Sam 20:15). However, David's motive in caring for Mephibosheth likely had more to do with his being "crippled in his feet" (v. 3). Since this disability made Mephibosheth less of a threat to rival David, he was not executed as were Saul's other heirs but was moved to David's residence where he could be watched (v. 13). At the same time, David allowed Mephibosheth to retain the income from Saul's estates (vv. 9–12).

F. War with the Ammonite-Aramean Coalition (10–12)

10:1–19. Defeat of the Arameans. War with the Ammonites is sparked after the death of Nahash, their king. This is presumably the same Nahash against whom Saul fought (ch. 11), yet David's words in v. 2 indicate that he had a treaty with Nahash. Hanun's actions suggest that Ammon was the inferior partner in the treaty and that he was trying to extricate himself. Shaving half of the beards of David's men and cutting off their garments below the waist (v. 4) were symbols of emasculation and were therefore insulting and humiliating both to the men and, by extension, to David.

Recognizing David's superior military might, the Ammonites seek reinforcement from several Aramean city-states—Zobah, Rehob, Maacah, and Tob. The "gate" (v. 8) is the city gate of Rabbah or Rabbat-Ammon, the Ammonite capital. The Israelites besiege Rabbah but are attacked from behind by the Arameans, so that Joab is forced to fight on two fronts (vv. 9–10). The "cities of our God" (v. 12) are Israelite cities east of the Jordan; Joab is rousing the troops by giving them a righteous cause to fight. After an initial defeat by the part of the Israelite army commanded by Abishai, the Arameans under Hadadezer rally other Arameans to their side but are defeated by David and the full Israelite army (vv. 14–19). This war with the Arameans may be the same one described in other terms in 8:3–8.

11:1–27. David's Adultery with Bathsheba and Uriah's Death. Verse 1 is not a general statement that kings went or should have gone to war in the spring as it is translated in the NRSV. Rather, the verse dates the events in ch. 11 one year after the kings in ch. 10 had come out to battle. There is, therefore, no implication that David should have gone to war rather than staying in Jerusalem. No reason is given for David staying behind. It is worth noting that he did not initially accompany Joab in the siege of Rabbah in the previous chapter and only came out secondarily to face the Arameans. What is clear is that his remaining behind in this instance has a literary function since it introduces the story of his adultery with Bathsheba. This story may be a later addition to Samuel; it differs from the surrounding material in that it is not apologetic but baldly admits David's crimes without attempting to deflect them.

Though the text does not say that David's couch was on the roof, he may have gone there in the heat of the afternoon to nap where he could catch the cool breeze. When he awakens he strolls on the roof and sees a woman bathing (v. 2). Her location is not given; she may have been inside a walled courtyard. Some have speculated that Bathsheba seduced David by bathing where she knew he would see her. The present narrative, however, focuses on David's responsibility and blames him entirely for the liaison. "Uriah" is a Yahwistic name, even though he is identified as a "Hittite," a term used in the Bible for one of the indigenous peoples of Canaan. Bathsheba's bath was part of her ritual purification following her menstrual period (Lev 15:19–28), meaning that she was at peak fertility when David slept with her. There is, therefore, no doubt that David is the father of the child she conceived.

It was unusual for Uriah to be summoned for a personal audience with the king—all the more so since he was one of the best soldiers in the army according to 23:39. His summons is made even more unusual by the fact that David asks him only general questions about the welfare of the army and the progress of the siege—questions that would have been answered by regular communiqués between Joab and David. Uriah, therefore, would have been suspicious that the king had some other reason for summoning him. He may have thought his loyalty was being tested and determined to be on his best behavior. Thus, the more David tried to get him to go home, the more Uriah resisted in order to prove his devotion to duty and his consecration for war (cf. 1 Sam 21:5). "Feet" is a common euphemism for the genitals, so that "wash your feet" is likely a euphemism for having sexual relations (11:8). David wanted Uriah to have sex with his wife, so that the child she had conceived would appear to be his (Uriah's). Ironically, David was confident enough in Uriah's loyalty to send him back to Joab carrying his own death warrant (11:14–15).

Following David's order, Joab placed Uriah opposite the enemy's best warriors (11:16). Uriah's death, however, resulted from a tactical error on Joab's part; he allowed his men to get too close to the city wall, and several of them in addition to Uriah were killed (11:17). Joab used Uriah's death to cover up his mistake just as David was covering up his (11:18–21). The well-known story of Abimelech's death (Judg 9:50–57) suggests that David's cover-up will be as successful as Abim was the Ammonite god. This explains why his crown (v. 30) was so heavy (a talent of gold weighs about 75 pounds). elech's attempt to mask the fact that he was killed by a woman. The story ends with an expression of Yahweh's displeasure at David's deed that links it with the account of Nathan's oracle of condemnation in the next chapter.

12:1–25. Nathan's Denunciation and the Death of David's Son. Nathan comes to David with what is ostensibly a legal case, though the lack of specifics hints otherwise. It is actually a parable of sorts designed to get David to pronounce judgment on himself. David's anger (12:5) is reminiscent of his response to Joab's news (11:20). In each case, an embarrassing revelation follows. Here, it is that David himself is the rich man who has stolen from his neighbor. The Hebrew words for "house" and "daughter" are similar and may have been confused in 12:8, so that the verse originally reported that God gave David Saul's daughter (Michal) and all the daughters of Israel and Judah. The point is that David had many women yet stole his neighbor's wife. The references to the sword (= violence) and trouble within David's own house (12:10–12) allude to the events in chs. 13–20, especially Absalom's revolt. The taking of David's wives really threatens his kingdom as represented by the harem. One of Absalom's first acts after driving his father from Jerusalem was to sleep publicly with concubines David had left behind (16:21–22).

David himself does not die for his crime, but his guilt is transferred to the son conceived in the adultery. David's responses at the baby's illness and death are unconventional (12:15–23). He mourns and fasts while the baby is alive, trying to convince Yahweh to let it live. But after the baby has died, he stops mourning and eats. "House of Yahweh" (12:20) is the Temple. Its use here is anachronistic, since the Temple was not yet built. Solomon's birth is reported as the next son of David and Bathsheba (12:24–25). The name Solomon means "his replacement," alluding most likely to the dead baby. Curiously, the name Jedidiah ("Yahweh's beloved") is never again used for Solomon.

12:26–31. The Fall of Rabbat-Ammon. The chapter ends by returning to the siege of Rabbah (12:26–31). Joab conquered the royal citadel and took the water supply and then notified David to join him for the final fall of the city. "People" in vv. 28–29 transparently means "army." Milcom was the Ammonite god. This explains why his crown (v. 30) was so heavy (a talent of gold weighs about 75 pounds).

III. Absalom's Revolt (13–20)

A. The Rape of Tamar and Murder of Amnon (13:1–39)

13:1–22. Amnon Rapes Tamar. In the present narrative, David's troubles in this and the following chapters are the punishment for his sin with Bathsheba. However, the Bathsheba episode may be a later insertion, as chs. 13–20 can be read independently, Absalom's revolt having its own causes, apart from David's sin, in Amnon's rape of Tamar and in Absalom's ambition. Amnon was the half brother of Absalom and Tamar, all three being children of David with different mothers. Amnon was the oldest son and crown prince. Assuming that Chileab died young (see on 3:3), Absalom would have been the next in line for the throne. As a virgin daughter of the king, Tamar may have been guarded, making it difficult for Amnon to be alone with her; hence Jonadab and Amnon had to concoct a plan (13:2–5). The word for "cakes" in Amnon's request (13:6) resembles the Hebrew word for "heart" and thus alludes to Amnon's intentions and the sexual overtones of the story. The words "brother" and "sister" (13:11–12) are also used in erotic literature (e.g., Song of Solomon) as terms of desire and endearment and further hint at the sexual nature of this story. It is unclear whether "such a thing" (13:12) refers to rape or incest. Tamar's suggestion that David would allow an incestuous marriage (13:13) may reflect contemporary practice or her effort to buy time.

Amnon's despicable treatment of Tamar is epitomized by his contemptuous reference to her in 13:17, where the word "woman" does not occur, so that it might be rendered, "Put this thing out of my presence." The type of garment worn by Tamar, "a long robe with sleeves" (13:18), is mentioned elsewhere in the OT only for Joseph (Gen 37:3). Tamar tears the garment (13:19) in lamentation for what has happened to her and perhaps because she is no longer a virgin. The consequences of Amnon's deed are devastating to her, as she remains unmarried and childless, living with Absalom (13:20). The narrator does not explain what happened to her subsequently. The narrator's report of David's response (13:21) suggests his apologetic stance: David was very angry but would not punish Amnon out of love for him; he would not, therefore, have been complicit in Amnon's later murder. Absalom, on the other hand, hides his hatred for Amnon by not speaking to him, all the while plotting his murder.

13:23–39. Absalom Kills Amnon. After two years of harboring his rage, Absalom chooses his moment to strike. His invitation of David (13:24–25) raises the question whether he was already planning full-scale revolt. Sheepshearing was a time of celebration; in fact the word "feast" actually refers to a drinking bout. Absalom waits to kill Amnon until he is drunk and vulnerable. David at first suspects a revolt but then is assured that Absalom murdered only Amnon for revenge (13:30–35). David's profuse weeping (13:36) is another technique of the writer's to assert David's innocence. Absalom fled to his maternal grandfather, with whom David had a treaty (see on 3:3), so it would have been odd for David not to suspect where he had gone. Verse 39 is best understood as reporting that after three years David was consoled about Amnon's death and his desire ("spirit") for going out in search of Absalom was exhausted; hence, his willingness in the next chapter to allow Absalom back into Jerusalem.

B. Absalom's Return from Exile (14:1–33)

14:1–20. The Wise Woman of Tekoa. Again, David is presented with a legal case that is designed to provoke him to pronounce judgment on himself. This time it is Joab who initiates the matter by hiring a wise or skilled woman to petition David. The woman's fictional case is similar to David's in that one of her sons killed the other, and the offender's life is now sought. The fact that the woman has only two sons while David has many more—a crucial difference—is ignored by both the woman and David in applying his decision and oath to her case. Verses 15–17, where the woman continues to plead her case after David has rendered his decision, may be out of place and fit better after v. 7. David perceives Joab's hand in the matter (14:18–20), presumably in part because the woman, a stranger, would have no particular stake or interest in David's treatment of Absalom.

14:21–33. Absalom Returns. Initially, David allows Absalom to return home but refuses to see him (14:21–24). The description of Absalom's hair foreshadows the way in which he will die (18:9–15). Two hundred shekels would be about five pounds, an enormous amount of hair. The mention of Absalom's daughter is a poignant reminder of her namesake and hints at Absalom's abiding animosity toward David.

After two years, Absalom determines to enhance his status and appeals to Joab. But this time Joab refuses, perhaps because he does not perceive it to be in David's best interests. Absalom then adopts more extreme measures, setting Joab's fields on fire. The stratagem, illustrative of Absalom's rash nature, works but gives Joab cause for revenge.

C. Absalom Seizes the Throne (15:1–16:23)

15:1–12. Absalom Launches the Revolt. Absalom pretends to the throne by adopting a king's entourage (15:1) and by claiming himself as a better judge—one of the roles of kings in the ancient Near East—than his father (15:2–4). He also casts himself as one of the common people (15:5). By these various means Absalom "stole the hearts" (an idiom for deception, so also Gen 31:20) of the "people of Israel." This likely refers to the entire nation, not just to the northern tribes, since the scene takes place in Hebron, which is in Judah. Absalom's choice of Hebron as a launching place for his revolt harks back to David's having been crowned king of both Judah and Israel in Hebron (5:1–7). Ahithophel was a famous advisor of David's (16:15–23).

15:13–16:14. David Flees Jerusalem. This section reports a series of encounters between David and various groups and individuals as he flees Jerusalem, crossing the Kidron Valley and the Mount of Olives. (1) The first encounter is with the Cherethites and Pelethites (see on 8:18) and Gittites, i.e., people from the Philistine city of Gath, who, David notes, display greater loyalty to him by their presence than do his own people of Judah (15:20–21). (2) Next come the priests, Abiathar and Zadok, along with the Levites bearing the ark. David sends them back to Jerusalem, perhaps because properly caring for a sacred object like the ark would slow David's retreat. The sons of the two priests will serve as covert informants to David of events in Jerusalem (15:28). (3) The appearance of Hushai answers David's prayer that God thwart the advice of Ahithophel (16:23). Hushai also completes David's spy network (15:32–37). The words David gives to Hushai (15:34) are duplicitous; he will serve David by pretending to serve Absalom. Hushai's epithet, "David's friend" (15:37) seems to be a title, but its exact sense is uncertain. (4) Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, comes with provisions but without his master, who, he claims has stayed behind in Jerusalem hoping to receive the throne by virtue of being Saul's grandson and Jonathan's son (16:1–4). David responds by awarding Saul's lands and property to Ziba, who may, in fact, be lying in the hope of receiving such a reward (19:24–30). (5) Another relative of Saul's named Shimei is less sympathetic, cursing David and pelting his entourage with stones as they flee (16:5–8). Shimei's accusation that David is a murderer with the "blood of the house of Saul" on his hands indicates an awareness of the executions of Saul's sons recounted in ch. 21 and may suggest that the accusation of David's complicity in Saul's own death was commonplace. Like his brother Joab, Abishai is portrayed as rash, violent, and fiercely loyal to David, here volunteering to kill Shimei (16:9–14).

16:15–23. Absalom Enters Jerusalem. The narrative scene now switches back to Absalom's entry into Jerusalem. Hushai is appropriately duplicitous: in referring to the one whom God and Israel have chosen, he means David, not Absalom. He also says, in effect, that by acting in Absalom's service, he is in fact serving David. Absalom is blinded by the flattery, a hint of his conceit. His first act as king, following Ahithophel's advice, is to cuckold his father publicly in a defiant claim of power (16:20–23). Exactly why Ahithophel joined Absalom's revolt is never explained, though it has been postulated that he was Bathsheba's grandfather, based on the name of Eliam as her father and his son (11:3; 23:34).

D. Hushai Buys Time for David (17:1–29)

While Ahithophel advises Absalom to pursue David immediately with the singular purpose of killing him, Hushai counsels waiting (17:1–14). Ahithophel's advice is sounder but suggests that people will turn to Absalom only because David is dead. Hushai plays on Absalom's ego, suggesting that loyalty for Absalom will only grow with time. Hushai also gives a vivid description of the great victory that Absalom will personally have as commander. Ahithophel's better advice is defeated by Yahweh (v 14), leading him, either in shame or with foresight about Absalom's inevitable defeat, to commit suicide (v 23).

As prearranged, Hushai sends word to David through the sons of Zadok and Abiathar. Thanks to Hushai, David has time to recoup his forces rather than having to worry about immediate pursuit. The priests' sons survive by hiding in a well whose simple opening—a hole in the ground—is camouflaged (17:15–22). This is the final reference to Hushai, leaving one to speculate whether his duplicity was uncovered by Absalom and he was executed.

Mahanaim, where David flees (17:24), was the site east of the Jordan where Ishbaal and Abner fled after the Philistine defeat (2:8). It will be strategically important in David's defeat of Absalom. He is provided for in Mahanaim by Barzillai, who is apparently wealthy (17:27–29). Meanwhile, Absalom has placed his cousin Amasa over his army (17:25). The curious reference to Abigail as the "daughter of Nahash" rather than of Jesse is probably a simple scribal error occasioned by the occurrence of "Nahash" in v 27.

E. Absalom's Defeat and Death (18:1–18)

David used the time won for him by Hushai to prepare for Absalom's attack. Perhaps aware of his focus on killing David, his men insist that he not go into battle with them (18:3–4). The narrative thus distances David from Absalom's death. David's order to deal gently with Absalom (v 6) further absolves him of responsibility. David's military expertise is suggested by his choice of the battleground—the forest of Ephraim—where Absalom's superior numbers are neutralized by the terrain (18:6–8).

Mules were the mounts of royalty (13:29; 1 Kgs 1:38), so that Absalom's unseating from his mule signals his loss of the throne. His hair may also be a symbol of his pride (14:26), which occasioned his downfall. It is not clear exactly how Absalom died; it may be that Joab uses three spears or sticks to beat on Absalom's chest and knock him from the tree (v 14) before he is surrounded and killed by the ten young men (v 15). Piles of stones are used elsewhere to bury cursed persons (Josh 7:26), as may be the case here too. However, the monument to Absalom mentioned here is not to be confused with the Hellenistic or Roman tomb, belatedly dubbed "Absalom's tomb," that stands in the Kidron Valley outside of modernday Jerusalem.

F. David Mourns for His Son (18:19–19:8)

The remainder of this chapter and the first part of the next one contrast David's reaction at the news of Absalom's death with the expected and typical response at an enemy's defeat. Ahimaaz wishes to carry the news to David because he thinks the king will be pleased about the victory. But David is fixated on his son, and Ahimaaz may not know Absalom's fate (18:29). The notice of Absalom's death is conveyed by the Cushite, a designation for a Nubian or Ethiopian. David's debilitating sorrow at the news can be compared to his profuse lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (1:11–27) and Abner (3:31–39). All three were political rivals whose deaths benefited him. David's mourning on this occasion is depicted as excessive to the point that it causes his army to be ashamed of their victory rather than celebrating it. Hence, Joab intervenes to persuade David of the necessity of welcoming and congratulating the army, lest he lose their loyalty (19:5–7). "Love" and "hate" in Joab's speech carry political overtones for loyalty and rebellion. Joab scolds David for mourning over the rebel, Absalom, as though he were a loyal servant and for shaming his loyal soldiers as though they were the ones who revolted.

G. David Returns to Jerusalem (19:9–43)

The narrative of David's return consists of two passages concerning the rivalry of the northern tribes and army with those of Judah over who would welcome David back first (19:9–15, 41–43). The two passages enclose repeat encounters with Shimei, Mephibaal, and Barzillai. The issue of who would welcome David first is not a hollow one; both Israel and Judah seek to curry David's favor now that he is back in power militarily and fiscally. David naturally favors Judah because it is his home tribe (vv. 11–12), although the army of Judah denies that it has received any special rewards or bribes from David (v. 42). His appointment of Amasa, his nephew (17:25), in place of Joab may have been intended to appease the army of Judah, which Amasa had commanded under Absalom. It also gave Joab a motive to do away with Amasa.

David's first encounter is with Shimei, who cursed and mocked David when he fled Jerusalem (16:5–13). The presence of 1,000 fellow Benjaminites (19:17) with Shimei likely influenced David to grant his plea for forgiveness in avoidance of another civil war. David's mercy is also part of the writer's contrast between him and the brutal "sons of Zeruiah," represented here by Abishai, who still wishes to kill Shimei (16:9–10).

Ziba may have been among the 1,000 Benjaminites with Shimei. Having received from David the holdings of Saul's house (16:1–14), he is pleased to welcome David back. However, Mephibosheth also appears this time and denies Ziba's accusations (19:24–30). He defends himself with the claim that his disability kept him from joining David in his flight from Jerusalem, and Mephibosheth supports this defense by his appearance, which suggests that he has been in mourning since the king's departure. Caring for his feet here probably means cutting his toenails, and his "beard" is more properly his moustache (v. 24). Mephibosheth's reference to his family being "doomed to death" (v. 28) reflects the typical practice by a usurper of executing all the males in the line of his predecessor. David's decision to divide the property (v. 30) suggests that he is unsure whom to believe.

H. Sheba's Revolt (20:1–26)

20:1–13. Amasa's Assassination. The statement that Sheba was present at the argument with Judah

(19:41–43) indicates that his revolt was occasioned by David's favoritism toward Judah. His rallying cry calls for the Israelite army to withdraw from David's service to its "tents" (v. 1). Despite the claim that all Israel joined Sheba (v. 2), the rest of the chapter indicates that not all Israel was involved. It may have been much smaller than Absalom's revolt. Joab assassinates Amasa in much the same way that he killed Abner (3:26–39). His ostensible motive was Amasa's replacement of him as army commander and Amasa's ineffectiveness (vv. 4–6). The real motive may have been political—to rid David of a former enemy and potential future rival. 20:14–22. Sheba's Demise. Abel Beth-Maacah was a large, fortified city on Israel's northern frontier. It is described here as one of Israel's "mothers" or largest, founding cities (v. 19). While feminine imagery is typical for cities, it is especially intriguing here, since Abel's leader is a nameless "wise woman" (v. 16). While she seems to know who Joab is, she seems entirely unaware of the reason for the siege or of Sheba and his revolt. Joab's identification of Sheba (v. 21) suggests that his revolt was limited to Benjamin and the hill country of Ephraim rather than involving all Israel. The woman's wisdom and negotiating skill are apparent in the story, where she saves her city from destruction by delivering up Sheba.

20:23–26. David's Cabinet. While some scholars think that this list represents a historical change in the make-up of David's cabinet as depicted in 8:16–18, they may have originated as two versions of the same list that came about with the displacement of 21:1–14 from before 9:1. One interesting difference between them is the presence here of an overseer of the "forced labor," indicating that it was David who began the practice of conscription of the northern tribes, which eventually led to the split between Israel and Judah (1 Kgs 12:18).

IV. The Appendix (21–24)

A. Narrative: The Execution of Saul's Heirs (21:1–14)

The last four chapters of 2 Samuel reflect a clear symmetrical (chiastic) structure: narrative, military anecdotes, poem, poem, military anecdotes, narrative. It has long been surmised that the narratives once stood together and were separated editorially by the insertion first of the anecdotes and then of the poems. The narratives themselves may have been placed at the end of the book because they reflect negatively on David. The first one, which tells of the execution of Saul's heirs, seems presupposed by David's question in 9:1 as to whether any heir remains to Saul's house and thus must once have preceded this verse. The story, furthermore, seems patently apologetic in nature as it explains David's execution of Saul's heirs as something he was forced to do in order to save Israel from a famine that itself resulted from an offense by Saul. Joshua 9 recounts the treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites that Saul is evidently accused of breaching. But there is no story elsewhere that details Saul's assault. Additionally, 1 and 2 Kings make clear that usurpers in Israel commonly executed the male members of the previous royal house as a way of securing power. David was likely doing the same thing, and his motive was strictly political. Hence, David's execution of Saul's heirs probably occurred early in his reign. The sparing of Jonathan's son, "Mephibosheth" (originally named Meribbaal, see on 4:4) may have led to the theme of David's special affection for Jonathan. The real reason that he was spared probably had to do with his disabled status. The "sons" of Saul includes grandsons, and Jonathan's son Meribbaal is to be distinguished from Saul's son Mephibosheth (v. 8). The courageous vigil of Rizpah, Saul's concubine, compelled David to honor Saul's and Jonathan's remains.

B. Military Anecdotes: Heroes of the Philistine Wars (21:15–22)

The anecdotes in these verses also probably originated early in David's reign during his battles against the Philistines. Some have suggested that David's near escape lies behind his not going into battle in 11:1 and 18:3. The reference to Goliath (v. 19) is a tradition that has influenced the story in 1 Sam 17 in the name of the Philistine hero and in the description of his spear. The confusion was early, as indicated by the Chronicler's attempt at correction (1 Chr 20:5). The name of Elhanan's father also reflects textual corruption; 'oreghim is the Hebrew word for "weavers" that occurs later in the verse. The Chronicles version of the name, Jair, is probably an attempt at correction. If so, this may be the same Elhanan son of Dodo mentioned in 23:24.

C. Poem: David's Song of Deliverance (22:1–51)

This psalm is essentially the same as Psalm 18. Its references to the Temple (v. 7), built after David's death, and to his descendents (v. 51), indicate that he did not write it. In this context it appropriately expresses the sentiments attributed to David for God's protection. The psalmist called upon Yahweh when his life was threatened (vv. 4–7). Yahweh's rescue of the psalmist is depicted as a cosmic theophany of the storm god as a warrior (vv. 8–20). The psalmist then praises Yahweh for his faithfulness and his help against enemies. "Anointed" (= messiah) was a royal title; this verse suggests that the psalm may have been composed in the royal court of Judah.

D. Poem: David's Last Words (23:1–7)

Like Jacob (Gen 49) and Moses (Deut 32–33), David's "last words" are conveyed in a psalm. Scholars debate the date of this poem, with some attributing it to David himself based on its epithets for God, and others arguing that its references to David as a prophet (v. 1) and to his dynasty ("house," v. 5) and the covenant with him indicate a much later date. The function of the poem in this context seems to be to praise David as the model of a righteous king (vv. 3–4) and to stress the divine promise to him of a dynasty.

E. Military Anecdotes: David's Military Honor Roll (23:8–39)

The first section of this "honor roll" (vv. 8–12) concentrates on exploits of the "three," whose heritage and deeds are otherwise unknown. The episode in vv. 13–17 is apparently to be understood as the deed of the "three" mentioned earlier (v. 17). However, the introduction in v. 13 suggests that it was originally an anecdote about three anonymous captains. The meaning of David's reaction to their exploit (vv. 16–17) is also unclear. Some think that he is upset that they risked their lives for such a frivolous purpose; others suggest that pouring out the water was a libation and a great honor to the men.

Abishai and Benaiah (vv. 18–23) are both known from other texts. Abishai was Joab's brother. Benaiah commanded David's bodyguard (20:23) and was Solomon's army commander who killed Joab (1 Kgs 2:28–35). Asahel, Joab's other brother, heads the list of the "thirty" (v. 24). His presence here among David's best warriors stands in tension with the description of his death as a youth (2:18–23), which may have been composed for the apologetic purpose of providing Joab a motive for the murder of Abner. Also notable among the thirty are Eliam (v. 34), the son of the famous counselor, Ahithophel, and possibly the father of Bathsheba (11:3), and Uriah the Hittite, Bathsheba's husband (v. 39). The total of "thirtyseven" apparently includes the "three" as well as Abishai and Benaiah. There are also textual variations in the present list of thirty where additional names may have been present. If so, the designation of the honor roll as the "thirty" may have been a round number or a constant number of living soldiers who were replaced as they died but whose names remained on the list as a memorial.

F. Narrative: David's Census (24:1–25)

The final narrative of Samuel looks forward to the building of the Temple in 1 Kings, the books originally being parts of a united work. "Again" alludes to an earlier story of punishment from Yahweh—probably the one in 21:1–14, which likely immediately preceded the present narrative. The parallel to this narrative in 1 Chr 21 states that it was Satan (or "an adversary") who incited David to take a census, the Chronicler evidently being troubled by the idea that God could incite someone to sin. At the time Samuel was written, the idea of Satan as a representative of evil had not yet developed. Rather, Yahweh, as the only God, was understood as the source of both calamity and prosperity, and disaster was typically seen as a response to human wrongdoing.

Different explanations have been offered as to why taking a census was sinful. Was it because of David's pride and his trying to take credit for what God had done in making Israel grow? Was it because a census was usually taken in preparation for conscription or taxation, measures that the author wished to denounce? Or was it that the Israelites were not all ritually pure as a census required? The narrative is more interested in the result of the sin than in its cause.

The census begins east of the Jordan at Aroer, proceeds north to Dan, and then goes south on the west side of the Jordan to Beer-sheba. The figures reported, 800,000 for Israel and 500,000 for Judah (v. 9), are of men of military age. They may be exaggerated, or the word "thousand" may refer to a military unit (e.g., "platoon") of an undetermined number. Israel and Judah may be distinguished because Judah, as David's home tribe, was to be exempted from taxation and conscription, as was implemented under Solomon.

David's choice of plague as punishment proves effective because Yahweh halts the plague after less than a day—from morning until the "appointed time," perhaps the evening meal. Still, there are 70,000 casualties, though again this figure may be exaggerated or a way of referring to seventy military units (v. 15). But Jerusalem is also spared. The angel of death is stayed at the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, that is, one of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Jerusalem, as David pleads for mercy for his subjects ("these sheep," v. 17). This may mark the end of the original story, since, in the verses that follow, the plague is stopped not because of David's pleas and Yahweh's mercy but because of the burnt offering. The story is thus transformed into what appears to be an etiology or ordination of sorts for the site of Solomon's Temple, and this is made explicit in Chronicles.

1 KINGS

IAIN W. PROVAN

OVERVIEW

As the name of this book indicates, 1 Kings describes part of the period of the monarchy in ancient Israel—from the end of the reign of David over all Israel down to the reigns of Jehoshaphat king of Judah and Ahaziah king of Israel. It was evidently written along with 2 Kings at some point after the middle of the sixth century BCE, since 2 Kgs 25:27–30 looks back upon the release of King Jehoiachin from prison in Babylon in 561 BCE. Its authors are unknown, but are often referred to as "Deuteronomists" because of the marked influence of the book of Deuteronomy on 1 and 2 Kings, in terms of language, literary style, and theology. For example, it is to Deuteronomy that the language of David's parting speech to Solomon points in 1 Kgs 2:1–4 (note "observe what the LORD your God requires," Deut 11:1; "walk in his ways," Deut 8:6; "keep his decrees and commands," Deut 6:2; "that you may prosper in all you do," Deut 29:9; "that the LORD may keep his promise," Deut 9:5; "with all their heart and soul," Deut 4:29).¹ "Deuteronomic" language of this kind recurs throughout 1 and 2 Kings, as first Solomon (1 Kgs 11), then almost all the succeeding kings of Israel and Judah, are weighed according to the Mosaic law code and found wanting (e.g., Jeroboam, 1 Kgs 12:25–33; 14:1–16). The era during which the book was written helps us to explain this phenomenon. The northern kingdom had fallen to the Assyrians around 722 BCE; Judah had fallen to the Babylonians in 587 or 586 BCE after a two-year siege of Jerusalem. First and Second Kings were composed when the city still stood in ruins, as was its Temple—one of the great symbols of the Lord's presence with Israel. The surviving descendant of King David, Jehoiachin, had only just been set free from prison. Questions abounded about the meaning of these events. Was Israel's God not in fact in control of nature and history, as Mosaic religion claimed? Were there other, more powerful gods in Babylon who had engineered the Babylonian victory over Israel? If the God of Moses really did exist, and really was good and all-powerful, how was it that God's chosen city and Temple had been destroyed, and how was it that God's chosen royal line (the line of David) had all but come to an end? First and Second Kings represent a sustained response to these questions, in the light especially of Deuteronomy's teaching. Israel's God is indeed in control of nature and history, the authors maintain; there are no other, more powerful gods anywhere. This good and all-powerful God has overseen the destruction of God's chosen city and Temple, and the exile of Israel to Assyria and Judah to Babylon respectively. The reason for these actions lies in Israel's great sinfulness. Israel has not obeyed God, nor heeded God's word through the prophets, from the reign of Solomon onwards (a king who turned away from the true God to worship other gods, 1 Kgs 2:12–11:43). In 1 Kings this truth is illustrated most importantly by Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who leads northern Israel into independence from Rehoboam and Judah (12:1–24) and into institutionalized idolatry (12:25–33); by Rehoboam himself, along with his successor Abijam (14:22–24; 15:3–5); and by Ahab, who compounds Jeroboam's sins with others of his own (16:29–22:40). It is such unfaithfulness to the Lord that has ultimately led to the demise of both Israel and Judah, as 2 Kgs 17 makes especially clear.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Reign of King Solomon (1–11)

A. Solomon Becomes King (1:1–2:46)

The opening narrative of 1 Kings constitutes the last chapter of the story about David as well as the first chapter of the story concerning Solomon. The prophet Nathan had promised David that his dynasty would last forever; God would raise up one of his sons and establish his kingdom forever (2 Sam 7:12–13). First Kings 1 recounts the ways in which Solomon, and not someone else, succeeded David, whereas ch. 2 reports David's final instructions to Solomon and reports what Solomon did immediately after his father's death to consolidate his power.

The "someone else" who might succeed David is Adonijah, the fourth of David's sons born in Hebron (2 Sam 3:2–5). He takes the risk of trying to seize the kingship because the king appears impotent, both generally and in the very precise sense that he is unable to "know" Abishag sexually (1 Kings 1:1–4). Gathering the symbols of kingship around him ("chariots . horsemen" and a regiment of soldiers, cf. 1 Sam 8:11), Adonijah organizes a coup with the help of the military commander Joab and the priest Abiathar (cf. 1 Sam 22:20–23; 2 Sam 2–3). He is opposed by people like Nathan the prophet and Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, whose strategy is to remind David of an oath (intriguingly not mentioned in 2 Samuel) that he swore to Bathsheba about Solomon's succession (1 Kgs 1:11–27). This strategy turns out to be successful (vv. 28–40). Adonijah's dinner guests disperse, and he himself seeks refuge in the Tabernacle (vv. 41–51) until he receives clemency from King Solomon in return for an (implied) promise of good behavior. He apparently believes that the altar in the Tabernacle, as a holy place, provides him with some protection from Solomon's vengeance (cf. Exod 21:12–14). Chapter 2 opens with some important words directed by David to Solomon. First he talks to him about his conduct as king (2:1–4), enjoining him to rule within the framework of obedience to God. The exercise of royal power is not to be arbitrary; it is to be in accordance with the law of Moses—in particular, with the law code of Deuteronomy, whose language is clearly evoked here. If Solomon should fail in this obedience, his dynasty will be in jeopardy.

David addresses Solomon, secondly, about certain "loose ends" from his long reign, which must be tied up if Solomon is to reign in peace (1 Kgs 2:5–9). Barzillai is to be recognized for his kindness (2 Sam 17:27–29); this inhabitant of Transjordan represents the ideal citizen of Solomon's kingdom, his dutiful service to his king rewarded with peaceful fellowship around the king's table. The northern Israelite Shimei and the Judean Joab, by contrast, are to be punished for their crimes—albeit that Shimei has already repented of his wrongdoing and been guaranteed safety by David (cf. 2 Sam 16:5–14; 19:16–23), while Joab's behavior has not concerned David sufficiently before this point in the story to make him take his own action against his close ally (cf. 2 Sam 3:22–30; 20:4–10). This suggests that it is not the need to deal with blood-guilt that drives David in 1 Kgs 2, so much as the need to remove people from David's past who are likely (as partisans of north or south) to disrupt Solomon's rule. The pragmatism at the heart of this course of action that is designed to bring each one's "gray head down with blood to Sheol" (i.e., to prevent these men from entering the underworld via a peaceful and natural death in old age) is significantly described in terms of "wisdom." Solomon must not act rashly, suggests David, but should use his brain and find some clever justification for removing Joab and Shimei from the scene (2:6, 9). There will be a great stress on Solomon's wisdom in the following chapters also (1 Kgs 3; 4:29–34; 10:1–13), but it will never again be used to such ruthless effect as it is in ch. 2.

First Kings 2 closes with a description of how this "wisdom" was enacted (2:13–46). Adonijah's request for David's concubine Abishag is apparently interpreted by Solomon as an attempt to revive his claim to the throne (cf. 2 Sam 16:20–22, which suggests that sexual liaison with the king's concubines amounted to such a claim). He is killed; and Abiathar and Joab are found guilty by association. The former is banished to his family estate; the latter grasps the horns of the altar in the Tabernacle (1 Kgs 2:28), apparently believing (like Adonijah earlier) that this offers him safety—but he also is killed. The occasion for the execution of Shimei (2:36–46) is his apparent infringement of a ban on traveling outside Jerusalem (despite that Solomon's generalized description of this ban in v. 42, indicated in NRSV's "any place whatever," does not in fact correspond to the much more specific wording in v. 37 about crossing the Wadi Kidron). By one means or another, Solomon has made sure that his control of the kingdom is secure.

B. More on Solomon and Wisdom (3:1–28)

The first thing that the new king does, after the ruthless acts of 2:13–46, is to make a marriage alliance with the pharaoh of Egypt—contrary to the teaching of Deuteronomy that warns against "a return to Egypt" (Deut 17:16) in terms of too-close relations with that nation and explicitly forbids intermarriage with foreigners, lest the Israelites should be led into apostasy (Deut 7:3). Solomon is not keeping the law of Moses, in spite of David's words in 1 Kgs 2:1–4, although he has paid attention to David's advice in the same chapter about using "wisdom" to rid himself of his enemies. His inattention to important religious matters is also suggested by his failure quickly to build the Temple and thereby deal with the problem of people worshipping at local cultic sites (NRSV, "high places"). He "loved the LORD" (v. 3), but there are question marks over the depth of this love. Hitherto in the story, Solomon has been ruling based on his own "wisdom" (1 Kgs 2:6, 9). In 1 Kgs 3:4–15, however, the deficiency of this wisdom is acknowledged. Solomon confesses ignorance (3:7) in the face of a task that is too great for him (3:8) and asks for "an understanding mind to govern your people, able to discern between good and evil" (3:9). It is essentially a confession that Solomon has not ruled well up until now, and wishes to make a fresh start. God is "pleased" with Solomon's prayer precisely because he has not sought to confirm his own position in life (3:10–11). He has not asked for "long life or riches," nor has he sought (as in ch. 2) the life of his enemies. Moreover, when God promises to give Solomon the things for which he had not asked (3:13–14), the death of enemies is not mentioned (although long life and riches are). The implication is that Solomon has recognized and God is confirming that the "wisdom" of ch. 2 was of an unenlightened, self-serving kind and must now be replaced with a higher kind, so that the king may rule justly and well over his subjects (3:9, 11). This event evokes an important theme of the OT: that it is the fear of the Lord that is truly the beginning of wisdom (Job 28:28; Ps 111:10; Prov 15:33).

First Kings 3:16–28 illustrates how this new wisdom makes all the difference to Solomon's ability to administer justice to his subjects (cf. 3:11). The king in ancient Israel was the highest court of appeal and the foundation of justice. That is why he hears the difficult case of the two prostitutes, each of whom claims a newborn child as their own. His success in judging claim and counter-claim reveals him to be one who has "the wisdom of God . . . in him, to execute justice" (v. 28).

C. Solomon's Rule over Israel (4:1–20)

The kingdom that results from the gift of wisdom in ch. 3 is well-ordered (4:1–19), happy and prosperous (4:20)—the kind of kingdom one would expect to find if its king has been gifted by God to rule (cf. Ps 72, "Of Solomon"). Its order is facilitated first by Solomon's "high officials" (vv. 1–6), including "the (high) priest," the "recorder" (perhaps the state prosecutor), and the "king's friend" (his personal advisor). Next come the "twelve officials over all Israel" who were to provide food for the royal household month by month. The regions over which they governed almost certainly included Judah, since "all Israel" in 1 Kgs 1–11 typically refers to the whole kingdom of Israel, north and south (3:28; 8:62, 65; 11:42), and Solomon's "all Israel" in 4:1 clearly correlates with "the people of Judah and Israel" in v. 20. NRSV is surely incorrect, therefore, in adding a thirteenth official in v. 19 who was allegedly "in the land of Judah." The Hebrew text itself only says that there was "one governor who was over the land"—using a Hebrew word that is different from the word used elsewhere in the passage for the district "officials." The reference is most likely to Azariah (v. 5), the person to whom the twelve district officers were responsible. The consequence of Solomon's wise administrative arrangements was that, even though his subjects were "as numerous as the sand by the sea" (a fulfilment of the Abrahamic promise in Gen 22:17), they were happy (v. 20).

D. Solomon and the Nations (4:21–34)

The Hebrew text understands what appears in the NRSV as 4:21–34 to be part of a single unit, beginning in 4:21 and extending through 5:18. This unit is distinct from what precedes it, moving on from Solomon's rule over Israel to his dominion over "all the kingdoms from the Euphrates to the land of the Philistines, even to the border of Egypt." Israel's peace and prosperity are related to this wider Solomonic dominion. The surrounding kingdoms contribute to the prosperity and present no military threat (vv. 21–28), so that all the Israelites live "under their vines and fig trees" (i.e., under God's blessing, each one having a degree of economic independence; cf. Joel 2:22; Mic. 4:4; contrast Ps 105:33; Jer. 5:17). This is also the context in which the district "officials" do their job of supplying "provisions for King Solomon and for all who came to King Solomon's table, each one in his month." We further discover just how great Solomon's wisdom is: it is unsurpassed throughout the world (vv. 29–34), exceeding even the wisdom of nations like Egypt.

E. Preparations for Building the Temple (5:1–18)

The Hebrew text treats NRSV's 5:1–18 as part of the same unit that began 4:21. As a result, the preparations made for the building of the Temple take place in the context of Solomon's sovereignty over the surrounding nations. The story about the gathering of building materials for the Temple project illustrates this reality. Solomon suggests to Hiram, king of Tyre, a co-operative venture ("my servants will join your servants," v. 6) in which Hiram should set the level of wages to be paid to his men. Hiram responds with proposals of his own: first, that his own men alone should cut and transport the wood down the coast to Israel, and that Solomon's men should only be involved after this has been done; and secondly that the wages are not to be paid to his laborers, but in the form of supplies of food for his royal household (v. 9). Solomon complies with the second proposal (v. 11), but ignores the first (vv. 13–18). There is cooperation; but it is cooperation between a vassal (Hiram) and a suzerain (Solomon). Such a high view of Solomon will become even more apparent in 1 Kgs 9:10–10:29.

F. Solomon Builds the Temple and His Palace (6:1–7:51)

The historian moves on to a detailed description of the building itself, beginning with the external structure: its overall proportions (v. 2) and its basic form (a tripartite arrangement, comprising the vestibule or entrance hall, the nave or main hall, and the inner sanctuary, vv. 3–5). One hears about its windows (v. 4); and of the strange structure around it with its side rooms (vv. 5–6, 8, 10). The work was carried out with reverence, avoiding the use of iron tools at the Temple site (v. 7; cf. Exod 20:25; Deut 27:5–6). Solomon receives an oracle concerning the entire project (vv. 11–13), which places the Temple in its proper theological context: God will "dwell among" his people once it is built, but God still requires obedience to the law (cf. Lev 26:11–12). The building of the Temple does not change anything about the nature of the divine-human relationship (or, indeed, about the nature of God, as 1 Kgs 8:27–30 later make clear). This was something that the Israelites were apt to forget in later times (e.g. Jer 7:1–34).

The author then proceeds to a description of the interior of the Temple, paying primary attention to the inner sanctuary (vv. 16, 19–32), because this was the very dwelling place of God (cf. 1 Kgs 8:1–13; 1 Sam 4:4; Ps 80:1; 99:1). One reads about its separation from the larger nave (v. 16); its measurements (v. 20); its decor (vv. 20, 29–30); its doors (vv. 31–32); its altar (vv. 20, 22); and its cherubim (vv. 23–28)—large, winged creatures which dominated the sanctuary, reaching half-way up to its ceiling and all the way across the walls. The other parts of the Temple were less significant. They receive little attention, although there is much interest in the splendor of the decoration. The predominant word in this respect is "gold" (vv. 20–22, 28, 30, 32, 35).

One might naturally expect to hear next about the way in which the whole Temple project was finished through completion of the interior furnishings; but this issue is not addressed until 7:13–51. Instead the historian narrates the construction of the royal palace complex. Significant here is the wording of 6:38–7:2. NRSV translates: "the house was finished in all its parts, and according to all its specifications. He was seven years in building it. Solomon was building his own house thirteen years, and he finished his entire house." A slightly different translation of 7:1 brings out better the contrast that is intended here: "But his own house Solomon spent thirteen years building; and he completed the whole of his house." Solomon spent much more time on the palace complex than on the Temple; and pushed it through to completion before fully completing his work on the Temple. This explains why the account of the building of the palace has been inserted between 6:38 and 7:13. The positioning is itself intended to indicate the way in which Solomon's energies were diverted from Temple-building to palace-building, to the detriment of the Temple project. He may be "wise," but this does not mean that he always makes good decisions.

First Kings 7:13–51 then picks up the Templebuilding account. A second Hiram of Tyre (not the king) is employed to complete the Temple furnishings made of bronze, while Solomon is responsible for the furnishings of gold. Notable in this account is the "molten sea" (a large, metal basin designed to hold water, possibly symbolizing the forces of chaos subdued and brought to order by the Lord who is creator of the world; cf. Gen 1:1–23; Ps 74:12–17; 89:5–11; 93).

G. The Ark Brought to the Temple (8:1–21)

The ark of God—the great symbol of the Lord's presence and the place where the tablets of the law were kept (Exod 25:10–22; Deut 10:1–5; Jos 3–6)—had hitherto remained in a tent-sanctuary somewhere in the old city of David (2 Sam 6:16–17; 7:2; 1 Kgs 3:15). Now it is carried to the Temple, during the festival of Tabernacles in "the seventh month" (cf. 1 Kgs 8:65–66; Lev 23:33–43). No sooner have the priests withdrawn from the inner sanctuary than another well-known symbol of God's presence—the cloud—appears (v. 10; cf. Exod 13:21–22; 16:10; 19:9; 40:34–38). Like Moses, the priests could not do their job because of this cloud that symbolized "the glory of the LORD" (1 Kgs 8:11; cf. Exod 40:35 and Rev 15:8). The presence of the cloud is a sure sign that the new arrangements for worship have received the divine blessing, as Solomon himself perceives (vv. 12–13) when he turns to address the people about God's promise to his father David (vv. 14–21; cf. 2 Sam 7:1–17).

H. Solomon's Prayer (8:22–53)

The speech is followed by a prayer. The main concern of its first part (vv. 22–26) is again the promise to David: Solomon asks God to fulfill the promise of an eternal dynasty. He quickly moves on, however, to the significance of the Temple as a place for prayer, uttering seven petitions, each of which contains a plea that God should "hear in heaven" (vv. 32, 34, 36, 39, 43, 45, 49)—for that is where God really is (8:27–30). The first petition (vv. 31–32) involves a difficult legal case in which a person must make an oath (cf. Num 4:11–31). The second, third, and fourth petitions concern various disasters that might befall the people of Israel: defeat in battle and subsequent exile (vv. 33–34); drought (vv. 35–36); and dangers such as famine, plague, and siege (vv. 37–40). In each instance, the cause of the problem is sin, and the main requirement of the situation is forgiveness. The fifth petition (vv. 41–43) addresses a foreigner who prays towards the Temple. Solomon desires that this person, too, would know that God answers prayers and that "all the peoples of the earth" would know God's name and fear him (cf. Isa 2:1–4; 56:6–8). The sixth petition (vv. 44–45) is, like the second, concerned with war. This time the focus is not on defeat as a result of sin, but on victory in God's cause ("by whatever way you shall send them," v. 44). The seventh petition (vv. 46–51) returns to the question of defeat and exile. If exile should take place, and if the people should repent and pray towards land, city, and temple (v. 48; cf. Dan. 6:10 for the practice), then God is asked to regard them once more as his people and "maintain their cause" (v. 49, cf. v. 45).

Solomon's prayer is of the utmost importance, for it places both the Temple and the law in a wider perspective. The Temple is an important building, but God is not confined by a building, and certainly does not depend upon it. He will survive even its destruction, to hear his people's prayers in exile. Likewise, obedience to the law is very important, yet Solomon holds out hope, beyond failure, for restoration.

I. The End of the Temple Narrative (8:54–9:9)

Solomon addresses the people for a second time (8:54–61) and the festivities come to a conclusion (8:62–66). God then appears to Solomon a second time, responding to Solomon's prayer with solemn words about dynasty and temple, people and land (9:1–9). God's first appearance to Solomon (1 Kgs 3:4–15) marked the beginning of his rise to greatness; he was endowed with heavenly wisdom. The second marks the end-point of his upward mobility, and points ahead to disaster. Israel will be cut off from the land, transformed from a nation renowned for its wisdom (1 Kgs 4:21–34) into a nation that is a "proverb and a taunt" (9:7; cf. Deut 28:37).

J. Glory Under a Cloud (9:10–10:29)

Solomon's rule over the surrounding kingdoms, combined with his status in the world in general

(4:21–34), put him in a position first to prepare for the building of the Temple (5:1–18) and then to build and dedicate it (6:1–8:66). First Kings 9:10–10:29 now reconsider the glory of this Solomonic empire in the context of 8:22–53 and 9:1–9 and their warnings of exile, which suggest an ominous future. Themes from chs. 4–5 are picked up again (Solomon's dealings with Hiram, 9:10–14; his use of forced labor, 9:15–23; foreigners coming to listen to his great wisdom, 10:1–13), but they are repeated in ways that hint, not of wisdom, but of foolishness (9:24; 10:26).

There was initially no reference to gold in the agreement struck between Solomon and Hiram (5:1–18), but the author now reports that Hiram supplied Solomon with as much gold as he desired (9:11). This is the first mention of gold in a section of Kings littered with such references (9:28; 10:2, 10–11, 14, 16–18, 21–22, 25)—a stark contrast to chs. 4 and 5, in which prosperity is described in terms of food, not gold. This is significant, since Deut 17:17 warns the king that excessive wealth brings with it the danger of apostasy (cf. Prov 30:8).

First Kings 9:15–23 alludes to 5:1–18, which reports that Solomon used conscripted labor to build the Temple. Solomon did not use this taskforce only for the Temple, but also for his other building projects (vv. 15–19). Those forced to work did not include his Israelite subjects, but only the descendants of those Canaanite peoples "whom the Israelites were unable to destroy completely" (v. 21). The point of this new information becomes clear when one remembers that the book of Deuteronomy identifies intermarriage with foreigners as apostasy (Deut 7:1–6). The foreigners mentioned there include precisely those Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites mentioned in 1 Kgs 9:20. First Kings 9:24 underlines this concern about foreigners by referring to Solomon's marriage to Pharaoh's daughter.

Another foreigner in the story is the queen from Sheba (cf. Gen 10:28), who visits Solomon "to test him with hard questions" (1 Kgs 10:1). The ease with which he deals with these questions, combined with her own observation of his wealth, leaves the queen breathless (10:5; NRSV, "there was no more spirit in her"). It is interesting, however, that whereas the authors of Kings in ch. 4 stress the benefit of Solomon's wisdom to all his subjects (4:20, 25), focusing on its practical effects for the life of the nation, she refers in the first instance much more narrowly to the blessing Solomon must be to his men (NRSV, "wives," v. 8) and his "servants." This comment is consistent with the theme of ch. 10, where the focus is upon the benefit of wisdom to the royal court, and particularly to Solomon himself, rather than to the people. The influx of food described in chs. 4–5 has been replaced by an influx of luxury goods (vv. 2, 10–12, 22, 25); and Solomon's use of all this wealth is entirely self-indulgent (vv. 14–29). Gold is mentioned no fewer than eleven times in these verses. Solomon uses it to decorate his palace (v. 16); to overlay the finest throne ever seen (vv. 18–20); and to make household items with it (v. 21). If he does not bother much with silver in his royal court (cf. Deut 17:17), it is only because it was of little value in Solomon's day (1 Kgs 10:21). This does not prevent him from accumulating it anyway (vv. 22, 27), along with chariots and horses from Egypt (vv. 26 and 28, recalling 4:26). All but one of the instructions about kingship in Deut 17:16–17 have now been abrogated by Solomon. First Kings 11 will address the remaining one, "he must not take many wives."

K. Solomon's Apostasy, Opponents, and Death (11:1–43)

First Kings 1–10 has hinted that all is not well with Solomon's heart. First Kings 3:1–3 juxtaposed affirmation of his love for God with suggestions of divided loyalties, revealed in his choice of marriage-partner and his priorities in building projects (linked with his attitudes to worship). First Kings 4:26 and 4:28 report that he accumulated many horses. First Kings 6:38–7:1 then pursued the question of building priorities; and 10:26–29 did the same with regard to horses, a context in which the topic of Solomon's great wealth was introduced, and the marriage/worship question again briefly addressed (9:10–10:29). Chapter 11 now voices open criticism of Solomon and tells of the inevitable consequences of all that has gone before. His sins have found him out; and they have led him to apostasy. Although he loved the Lord (3:3), he also "loved . . . the daughter of Pharaoh" and many other women besides (11:1–2); and these women "turned away his heart" from God (11:3–4). He worshiped their gods and built sanctuaries for them on the Mount of Olives (the "mountain east of Jerusalem," v. 7) and elsewhere. As 1 Kgs 2:4, 8:25, and 9:4–5 have led readers to expect, God's judgment follows. The kingdom is to be torn away from David's family, albeit not in Solomon's lifetime and not quite all of it. "One tribe" remains for the sake of David and Jerusalem (11:9–13). First Kgs 11:14–40 narrates the difficulties that Solomon now confronts. Whereas in the midst of God's blessing Solomon had peace on every side (1 Kgs 5:4), now the blessing has departed and the peace is fractured. Two adversaries from the south and from the north oppose the apostate king in his old age: Hadad (cf. 2 Sam 8:13–14), and Rezon son of Eliada (cf. 2 Sam 8:3–4). Solomon's most important enemy, however, is to be found closer at hand: Jeroboam son of Nebat, to whom Ahijah offers a forecast about his future kingship (v. 29). A cloak is torn and divided into twelve pieces, of which ten, symbolizing ten tribes, are given to Jeroboam (vv. 30–31). One tribe is to remain for the sake of David and Jerusalem (although actually this "one" includes "two"—Judah and Benjamin, 12:21). This concession marks out the narrative that follows, all the way through to near the end of 2 Kings; for the house of David is never judged as severely as are the royal houses of the northern kingdom, and it outlasts them all.

II. The Kingdom Is Divided (12–14)

A. The Kingdom Is Torn Away (12:1–33)

The narrator now describes the tearing away of the kingdom from David's family, which was threatened in ch. 11. Solomon's son Rehoboam goes to Shechem to be crowned king—a town with a long history in Israel (the place of covenant renewal in Josh 24:1–27; and the place where kingship first intruded itself into the tribal life of Israel in Judg 8:22–23; 9). The people complain that they are no longer a people living in freedom in the promised land; they have become once more a people under "hard service," as they were in Egypt (1 Kgs 12:4; cf. Exod 1:14; 2:23). Jeroboam appears in this story as a kind of second Moses, leading Israel out of bondage, even as Rehoboam plays Pharaoh, increasing the oppression by replacing mere whips with "scorpions" (perhaps a particularly vicious form of whip, 1 Kgs 12:14; cf. Exod 5:1–21) and thus fulfilling God's will even as Pharaoh did in the hardening of his heart (1 Kgs 12:15; cf. Exod 7:13). However, Jeroboam quickly becomes "Aaron" instead of "Moses" (1 Kgs 12:25–30). Fearing that the presence of the "house of the LORD at Jerusalem" (12:27) will undermine his rule of the northern tribes, he builds his own centers of worship in the far north of his territory (Dan) and in the far south (Bethel). Two "calves of gold" are created to act as focal points of worship there, introduced to the people by the very words used by Aaron in Exod 32:4 of his own golden calf (cf. 1 Kgs 12:28). Bethel is of primary interest to the biblical author, because that is where the story of ch. 13 will take place. The historian refers specifically to the temple at Bethel (a house on high places, v. 31; NRSV, "houses"), to the priests appointed to serve there, and to the new "festival on the fifteenth day of the eighth month" designed to replace the Feast of Tabernacles celebrated in Jerusalem in the seventh month (cf. 1 Kgs 8:2; cf. Lev 23:33–43).

B. The Man of God from Judah (13:1–34)

Jeroboam stands at the altar of his new temple as Solomon had stood at his (1 Kgs 8:22), ready to dedicate it; but he does not have the opportunity to speak, since this temple is illegitimate in the eyes of the deuteronomist. Jeroboam had been promised a dynasty as enduring as David's, if only he would obey God (1 Kgs 11:38); his various acts of disobedience now elicit prophetic opposition in the shape of a man of God from Judah, whose prophecy points forward to a time when all northern dynasties will have come to an end, and only the house of David remains to take action against Bethel (2 Kgs 22:1–23:30). In the meantime, the prophet provides a sign, indicating that the prophecy is true (vv. 3, 5): the altar is then torn down, and "the ashes poured out from the altar." The God who can ensure that prophecy comes to pass in the short term can surely also do so over the longer term. There can be no escape for disobedient kings. The strange sequel to this story (13:7–32) emphasizes that disobedient prophets will also not escape God's punishment.

God's law stands over everyone—even those who deliver it. Despite the strictest of divine commands, that he must "not eat food, or drink water, or return by the way" that he came, the man of God from Judah is persuaded by another prophet to accept hospitality in his house by the (false) claim that he too has had a prophecy from God (vv. 11–19). As a result, the man of God "disobeyed the word of the LORD" (v. 21) and he died. He ought to have heeded the word of the Lord that he had received rather than being led off his path by another's claim that God has spoken to him.

C. The End of Jeroboam (14:1–20)

These verses describe what happened as a result of Jeroboam's desire to have the two houses he wanted (dynasty and temple) instead of the one he was promised (dynasty); and they do so in a way which makes clear the essential differences between David's house, which endures, and Jeroboam's, which does not (see the comments on 11:1–43). Jeroboam's wife thinks that she has been sent to Ahijah to find out about her sick child; but she discovers when she arrives at his house that in fact he has been sent to her with a message about the kingship (v. 6). Jeroboam has failed to be like David (14:8; cf. 11:38), and has worshiped other gods as Solomon had done before him (v. 9). Therefore, God will "bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam," forcing the dynasty to an end for want of male descendants. It will be a dishonorable end, since human bodies will not be buried, but eaten by dogs and birds (vv. 10–11; cf. 1 Sam 31:8–13 for evidence of the importance of proper burial). This further horizon of prophecy is once again accompanied by a more immediate sign, as in 1 Kgs 13:

"the child shall die" (14:12). A still further horizon relates to the distant future (vv. 14–16). In the absence of a strong dynasty to rule them, the northern Israelites are destined to know only the instability of "a reed . . . shaken (i.e. swaying) in the water," and eventually exile to a land beyond the river Euphrates. That is where persistence in the sins of Jeroboam will lead them (cf. 2 Kgs 17:1–6, 21–23).

D. The End of Rehoboam (14:21–31)

The story of Rehoboam's reign, begun in ch. 12, has been delayed, since the historian has followed Jeroboam through rebellion to idolatry and judgment and on to death. Meanwhile, in Judah, people have been doing "evil in the sight of the LORD" (14:21): setting up high places at which idolatrous worship could take place, and installing there "pillars" (cf. Deut 12:3 for reference to these Canaanite cult objects that the people must destroy upon entry to the land) and Asherim (NRSV, "sacred poles"—wooden objects used in the worship of the goddess Asherah, who was the consort of Baal, the Canaanite god of fertility; cf. 1 Kgs 16:32–33). They have embraced local fertility religion, indicated further in the existence of "male temple prostitutes in the land" (cf. Hos 4:14; Deut 23:17–18). No prophetic oracle about the end of David's house ensues, however, because Judah is not to be torn away from David as Israel was torn away from Jeroboam. Instead the historian reports a lesser reversal suffered by Rehoboam at the hands of Shishak of Egypt, representing the fatherly discipline of God described in 2 Sam 7:14.

III. Abijam and Asa (15:1–24)

The deuteronomist continues with Rehoboam's immediate successors, Abijam and Asa—the latter of whom will reign throughout a period in which the northern kingdom will see five kings come and go (15:25–16:28) before Ahab comes to the throne in Asa's thirty-eighth year (16:29–30). Abijam is the characteristically bad Judean king, indulging in the idolatry of the later Solomon and of Rehoboam, yet surviving to produce an heir because "for David's sake the LORD his God gave him a lamp in Jerusalem, setting up his son after him, and establishing Jerusalem" (15:4). Asa, in contrast, is the characteristically good Judean king, behaving relatively faithfully like David and the earlier Solomon. Thus he took action against the "male temple prostitutes" mentioned in 14:24 (v. 12) and removed both the idols made in previous reigns and his own idolatrous mother who had made an "abominable image for Asherah" (v. 13). Although he did not likewise remove the high places and focus his reformed worship only on the Temple in Jerusalem, he was generally exemplary in his religious policy. These two kings between them—Abijam and Asa—set the pattern for all the Judean kings who follow; they are measured on the basis of whether they have been "like David" or not.

IV. From Nadab to Ahab (15:25–16:34)

The fulfillment of the prophecy against the house of Jeroboam (ch. 14) was delayed until it became clear how different it will be from God's treatment of David's house. Now readers discover what Ahijah meant by describing Israel as a reed swaying in water (14:15), as one northern dynasty follows another in quick succession. Nadab son of Jeroboam is murdered by Baasha, who in turn kills all the other members of Jeroboam's family (15:25–32; cf. 14:10–11). Baasha himself then walks "in the way of Jeroboam and in the sin that he caused Israel to commit," with predictable consequences (15:33–16:7). A prophet appears to announce that the fate of Baasha's house will be the same as Jeroboam's (16:3–4). His son Elah lasts no longer than Nadab (two years, 16:8–14). Elah is murdered at home in Tirzah by Zimri, who kills not only the family of Baasha, but also family friends (v. 11). Zimri only reigns for a week; and after fighting off the challenge of Tibni, Omri assumes the kingship (16:15–22). The only event of his reign that is recorded is his purchase of the hill of Samaria and his building of the new northern capital there (16:23–28). The last Israelite king to gain the throne in this period is the most famous one: Ahab son of Omri (16:29–34). He is also the worst, walking in the sins of Jeroboam but also marrying a foreign woman, Jezebel, who inevitably leads him into the worship of foreign gods. To the temple and altar for the calf at Bethel is added now an altar for Baal in a temple of Baal in Samaria.

V. Elijah and Ahab (17:1–22:40)

A. Elijah and the Drought (17:1–24)

Prophets had addressed the preceding northern royal houses, proclaiming that idolatry would lead to their demise. Elijah now appears to challenge the house of Omri. The doom that he announces will, however, not occur until 1 Kgs 21:21–24. His first task is to inveigh against the Baal-worship that Ahab has introduced into Israel—to demonstrate that Baal is no more a god in any real sense than Jeroboam's calves are. Chapter 17 provides the context—the divinely-ordained drought of 17:1—and demonstrates that it is the Lord, and not Baal (nor any other "god"), who controls both life and death, both fertility and infertility. In Canaanite religion, it was Baal who had authority over the rain and brought fertility to the land. Its absence meant the absence of Baal, who must periodically submit to the god Mot (death), only to be revived at a later date and once again water the earth.

Elijah begins to challenge this cyclical and polytheistic view of reality in 17:1–7. The Lord, and not Baal, brings rain, being sovereign over creation. This sovereignty extends to the Lord's ability to look after Elijah in an inhospitable area east of the Jordan River where there is no normal food supply. Elijah is miraculously fed there, just as the Israelites had once been the beneficiaries of God's provision of "bread and meat" in the wilderness (cf. Exod 16, esp. vv. 8, 12–13). The theme of miraculous provision continues in 17:7–16; the Lord is able to bring drought even in what is (1 Kgs 16:31 implies) the very heartland of Baal worship, the region of Sidon. Yahweh is God of all, and not just a local Israelite god. The threat of death having twice been overcome, 17:17–24 tells about the overcoming of death itself. A child dies, and the question that arises is: when faced by "Mot" (death), must the Lord, like Baal, submit? Even the underworld is not a place from which the Lord can be barred, however (Ps 139:1–12); and the child is brought back to life.

B. Elijah and the Prophets of Baal (18:1–46)

The day for the Lord once again to "send rain on the earth" arrives; but prior to this there must be a public demonstration of what has been established in private in ch. 17—that the Lord truly is God. The deuteronomist addressees the question as to who is the real "troubler of Israel," Elijah or Ahab (v. 17; cf. Josh 6–7, esp. 6:18 and 7:25). Elijah's view is that the trouble has religious roots, namely the forsaking of the commandments of the Lord and the worship of the Baals (the various local manifestations of the god Baal, 1 Kgs 18:18; cf. 2 Kgs 1). The contest on Mount Carmel is designed to settle the question of who is really God, the Lord or Baal (v. 21). It is a contest that involves "fire" (v. 24), perhaps because both Baal (the Baal myth) and the Lord (cf. Lev 9:24; 10:2; Num 16:35) were associated with fire and lightning. Baal fails to deliver such fire, even though his followers engage in extravagant actions apparently designed to elicit his support. Elijah saturates the whole area around the altar with water, precisely to make clear that there is no natural connection between what the human participants are doing and what God will do; and the "fire of the LORD" falls, consuming not only the burnt offering but everything else associated with it. The rain falls; and Ahab and Elijah run for Jezreel, where Jezebel awaits.

C. Elijah and the Lord (19:1–21)

Elijah appears to believe that he has won a decisive battle; yet a still more formidable opponent than Ahab awaits him: Queen Jezebel. Her ongoing resistance, apparently unexpected, sends Elijah into retreat, both physically and mentally. Even though no word of the Lord instructs him (cf. 17:2, 8; 18:1), he flees to the very south of the promised land, as far away from Jezebel as possible. He looks for a lonely place in which to die. He has had "enough" (v. 4). Here God gently intervenes to lead him back onto the right path, first with food and then with instruction. At "Horeb the mount of God" he is asked what he is doing there (v.8); and his answer is strangely selective; he does not speak of previous successes but only of Israelite apostasy and prophetic casualties. He needs to be reminded more fully of the past—to remember who God is and what God has done. This may well be one of the intentions behind the "wind . . . earthquake . . . fire" of vv. 11–12; they are a reminder of Mount Carmel. Yet there is also an apparent intention to teach Elijah something beyond what he has learned already; for while the emphasis at Carmel was on God's spectacular ways, the emphasis in 19:11–12 is on God's quiet ways. God is not to be found in the spectacular elements of the storm outside the cave; he reveals himself on this occasion in "a sound of sheer silence" (NRSV) or, better, in "a barely audible whisper." There is no evidence that Elijah understands the significance of this (notice that his answer to the second asking of God's question in v. 13 is exactly the same as before, vv. 10, 14). Most likely it is connected to the instructions he receives next: to "anoint Hazael . . . Jehu . . . Elisha" (vv. 15–16). A new order will bring about the final victory over Baal worship; it will come as a result of political process (God's "quiet ways"), not as a result of obviously spectacular demonstrations of divine power. It will arrive, not as a result of Elijah's efforts, but as a result of the efforts of others. Elisha, who is recruited by Elijah as the chapter closes, will play an important role in that political process.

D. Ahab's War Against Aram (20:1–43)

Since Elijah has recruited Elisha one expects the deuteronomist to report that Elijah now anoints

Hazael as king over Aram and of Jehu as king over Israel (19:15–18). Instead, one finds a story involving "a certain prophet" (v. 13, Elijah does not appear at all), and in which a different king of Aram (Ben-Hadad) loses a war with Ahab. These events underscore the purport of ch. 19. Elijah is not the only servant of God left, in spite of what he has claimed (19:10, 14). Moreover, the quiet ways of God must take their course before the events spoken of in 19:17 will occur. As ch. 20 opens, the king of Aram is trying to reduce Israel to vassal status. His terms are at first accepted by Ahab (v. 4), only later to be rejected after a revision which apparently makes them more oppressive (vv. 5–9). This leads to a battle, which a prophet correctly predicts will have a successful outcome (v. 13–15), if Israel fights according to an implausible divine battle plan in which untrained servants (NRSV, "young men") strike the first blow. The plan benefits from the fact that Ben-Hadad is the worse for drink (vv. 12, 16), and seemingly incapable of uttering coherent or sensible instructions (v. 18), and victory is won. Further warfare the following spring (v. 22; cf. 2 Sam 11:1) leads to the same outcome, for the Aramean plan to fight the Israelites in the plain (v. 23)—although it is sound military strategy if one possesses superior cavalry and chariotry—is based on faulty theological reasoning ("their gods are gods of the hills"). Ahab is found disobeying a divine commandment in pursuit of financial gain, however, and is confronted by a member of a prophetic group (20:35–43; cf. 2 Kgs 4:1; 6:1) who tricks the king into pronouncing judgment upon himself. Like Saul, Ahab has released an enemy king whom God had "devoted to destruction." His life is therefore forfeit.

E. Naboth's Vineyard (21:1–29)

Having already given notice of Ahab's death (20:41–42), the author now announces judgment on his house, which has been delayed since ch. 16, as an apparently reinvigorated Elijah appears again in Jezreel to denounce a new and heinous crime. The crime arises out of a dispute about a vineyard in that city, which Ahab wants (21:2) but Naboth (the owner) refuses to give up, because it is his "ancestral inheritance" (v. 3). Land in Israel belonged, not to the families who technically owned it, but to God (Lev 25:23) who had driven out the previous inhabitants and allocated its various parts to the tribes as their inheritance (see especially Josh 13:7). An Israelite was not supposed to sell land in perpetuity; and a complicated set of laws existed that were designed to keep land in the family and to prevent its accumulation in the hands of a few (e.g. Lev 25:8–24; Deut 25:5–10). Naboth is bound to refuse Ahab's offer; and in making it, Ahab disregards Israelite law. His own initiative frustrated, Jezebel steps in with a different plan (21:4–14), which is to have Naboth executed on false charges. The two witnesses required by OT law are paid off (v. 10; cf. Deut 19:15–21), and Naboth is duly stoned to death (v. 13; cf. Exod 22:28; Lev 24:14–16). This clears the way for Ahab to take possession of the vineyard (21:15–24), where he is confronted by Elijah. Ahab's house, the prophet announces, is to suffer the same fate as the houses of Jeroboam and Baasha (v. 22; cf. 1 Kgs 14:10–11; 16:3–4), because Ahab has (like them) provoked the Lord to anger and caused Israel to sin (cf. 14:9, 15–16; 16:2). The chapter nevertheless closes in a surprising way (21:25–28). Ahab repents; and God delays the disaster that Elijah has foretold (v. 28). God is gracious to even the most wicked of people.

F. The Death of Ahab (22:1–40)

Ahab's own death, foretold by two different prophets (20:41–42; 21:19), is now described in the context of a story about a third prophet. Its occasion is a campaign that Ahab launches to win back from the Arameans the strategically important city of Ramoth-gilead in Transjordan (v. 2) with the help of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (about whom the author will soon offer more information, 22:41–50). Jehoshaphat is prepared to accompany Ahab, but first he wants to "inquire . . . for the word of the LORD" (vv. 4–5). The prophets are gathered (22:6–8), with the exception of the allegedly difficult Micaiah, at the threshing-floor of the city (an open space at which people could assemble). They speak and act in ways that imply the military campaign will be successful. Micaiah, at first, apparently agrees (cf. vv. 12 and 15), but under questioning pronounces a negative oracle (vv. 17, 19–23). In fact, he provocatively claims, God's plan to lure the king to his death at Ramothgilead (v. 20) involves precisely those prophets whom Ahab first summoned into his presence (cf. Ezek. 14:1–11). They are being influenced by "a lying spirit" (vv. 21–23; cf. 1 Sam 16:14–15, a story in which Saul is afflicted by "an evil spirit). Ahab chooses to go with the overwhelming prophetic majority in favor of military action, but evidently not with great conviction, for he disguises himself before going into battle (vv. 29–30). Such a disguise is an evident harbinger of disaster, for it recalls the action of Jeroboam (1 Kgs 14:1–18), and before him Saul (1 Sam 28) just before their own deaths. So it proves, as Jehoshaphat (though alone wearing royal robes, v. 30) is saved from death because of his Judean shout and Ahab (playing the ordinary soldier) is struck down by an arrow shot at random yet piercing his armor at a weak point. Like Solomon, Ahab had married unwisely. He was led even further astray than Jeroboam. But like Jeroboam, he was not of David's house, and he was not therefore exempt from being treated like Saul (2 Sam 7:14–16), whose story echoes at various points. He, too, loses his kingdom.

VI. Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah (22:41–53)

Both Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah have already entered the narrative as characters in Ahab's story—comrade in arms and successor, respectively (1 Kgs 22:2, 40). Now they find their own place in the story as 1 Kings comes to an end. Stability has been the norm within the southern kingdom as chaos has afflicted the north, as the good Asa has been succeeded by the equally good Jehoshaphat, who "walked in all the way of his father" and reigned for a substantial length of years. The length of Ahaziah's reign, on the other hand, is exactly what we expect of the son of an Israelite king who receives an oracle of judgment: two years (v. 51; cf. 15:25; 16:8). His religious commitments are also entirely predictable. Like his father, he walked "in the way of Jeroboam son of Nebat" (cf. 16:31), and "served Baal and worshiped him" (cf. 16:31–32).

2 KINGS

IAIN W. PROVAN

OVERVIEW

Second Kings describes part of the period of the monarchy in ancient Israel—from the reign of Ahaziah as king of Israel to the reign of Judah's last king, Zedekiah. It was written along with 1 Kings at some point after the middle of the sixth century BCE, since 2 Kgs 25:27–30 looks back upon the release of an earlier Judean king, Jehoiachin, from prison in Babylon in 561 BCE. Its authors are unknown, but are often referred to as "Deuteronomists" because of the marked influence of the book of Deuteronomy on 1 and 2 Kings (see the introduction to 1 Kings for details). In particular, almost all the kings of Israel and Judah are assessed in relation to the laws in Deuteronomy and are found wanting (e.g., Jehoram, 2 Kgs 3:1–3). It is this corporate failure to obey God that the authors of 2 Kings identify as the fundamental reason for the fall of the northern kingdom to the Assyrians around 722 BCE and the fall of Judah to the Babylonians around 587 BCE.

These events did not signify (as many might have thought) that Israel's God was not in fact in control of nature and history; nor that there existed other, more powerful gods than he. Second Kings is adamant that there is only one God in the world (5:15); Yahweh is not to be confused with the other gods worshiped within Israel and outside. These are simply human creations (17:16; 19:14–19), and as such powerless, futile entities (17:15; 2 Kgs 18:33–35). It is the Lord, and no one else, who controls both nature and history (1:2–17; 4:8–37; 5:1–18; 6:1–7, 27; 10:32–33; 18:17–19:37)—something that is perhaps illustrated most clearly in the way prophets function within 2 Kings, describing the future before God brings it about (19:6–7, 20–34). The events of 722 and 587 BCE signified that Israel's good and allpowerful God had been angry with his people and because of this anger had overseen the destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple, and the exile of Israel to Assyria and Judah to Babylon respectively. Israel had not obeyed God, nor heeded God's word through the prophets, from the reign of Solomon onwards—that is why disaster fell (2 Kgs 17:7–23; 23:26–27; 24:1–4).

Two exceptions to this rule are, however, included in 2 Kings. The first is Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:1–20:21), who trusts God like no one before him; and the second is Josiah (22:1–23:30), who reforms worship like no one before him, in line with Deuteronomy's religious vision (note the many references in 22:1–23:30 to "the book of the law" that guides Josiah's reform—a phrase used in the Pentateuch only of Deuteronomy, e.g. Deut 28:61; 29:21). These kings stand as righteous models for a future Davidic king, as the Israelites return from exile and rebuild their community in Palestine—a hope that still exists by the end of the book, albeit in fragile form, associated with Jehoiachin (2 Kgs 25:27–30). His continuing existence hints that the promise of God to David of an everlasting dynasty may still remain in force, even after judgment has fallen on Israel and Judah.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Death of Ahaziah (1:1–18)

Ahaziah's reign is introduced in 1 Kgs 22:51–53. The occasion for the confrontation with the prophet Elijah in ch. 1 is an injury sustained when the king falls out of the window (NRSV, "lattice") of his upper chamber in Samaria (1:2). He sends messengers to consult one of the many local manifestations of the god Baal about his fate—Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron (a Philistine city about 25 miles west of Jerusalem). The name Baal-zebub (lit. "lord of the flies") is probably a deliberate corruption of "Baal-zebul" ("Baal the exalted"), intended to express the authors' scorn of or hostility towards this so-called "deity." Elijah intercepts the messengers on the road with a prophecy about Ahaziah's death; and not for the first time in Kings an attempt is made to capture the deliverer of such a negative word from God (cf. 1 Kgs 13:1–7; 18:9–10). The attempt fails and the oracle stands. The manner of Ahaziah's death is however unexpected—there is no revolution, and Ahab's royal house is not destroyed in line with Elijah's prophecy (1 Kgs 21:21–24). Has the prophecy partly failed? It seems so at first sight; but it will later turn out (2 Kgs 3:1) that there is another son of Ahab, Ahaziah's brother Jehoram. It is this son whose reign shall see the true fulfillment of Elijah's prophecy.

II. Elisha and Israel (2–10)

A. Elijah Gives Way to Elisha (2:1–25)

First Kings 19:15–18 makes clear that the end of the war with Baal-worship will not occur until Elisha has succeeded his mentor Elijah, and Hazael and Jehu have appeared on the scene. The first of these events is described here in 2 Kgs 2. In the course of a journey among different prophetic communities in Israel, Elijah, despite the fact that he has been told by the Lord to make Elisha his successor, keeps trying to leave him behind (2:1–6). He appears to want to deny Elisha the inheritance of the prophetic spirit that should be his (cf. vv. 9–12)—an indication, perhaps, that he is reluctant to endorse God's plans for the future. A "double portion" of land (v. 9) is what an eldest son would expect of a father as his inheritance (Deut 21:15–17; cf. 1 Kgs 2:12 for the "father-son" relationship between the two prophets). Elisha persists, however; and in a scene reminiscent of Moses at the Sea of Reeds, both men cross the Jordan on dry land (vv. 7–8; cf. Exod 14:15–31, esp. vv. 21–22) and Elisha does receive this gift of the spirit after all (2 Kgs 2:11–12), as chariots (NRSV, "chariot") and horsemen of fire take Elijah up into heaven. He is consequently able to repeat Elijah's action in parting the waters (vv. 13–14), proving himself to be Joshua to Elijah's Moses. His tearing of his clothes (v. 12) signifies both mourning for Elijah and the final transition from his old to his new life. The "company of prophets" in Jericho, not privy to what has happened in the storm's midst, assume that perhaps Elijah has simply been picked up and deposited in a different place, and go looking for him, perhaps at least to bury him; but to no avail (vv. 15–18).

The chapter closes with two stories that further authenticate Elisha as Elijah's prophetic successor—a man able both to bless and to curse in the Lord's name (vv. 19–25; cf. Moses in Deut 28). He purifies the water of Jericho; and he curses some boys from Bethel who adopt a disrespectful attitude towards a prophet of the Lord. This narrative of prophetic succession ends with Elisha's trip to Mount Carmel (v. 25)—the scene of Elijah's great victory over the priests of Baal. Elisha is ready to pick up where Elijah left off in the war against Baal.

B. Elisha and the Conquest of Moab (3:1–27)

Ahab's son Jehoram is a wicked king but "not like his father and mother" (2 Kgs 3:1–3). He does not worship Baal, although he tolerates the cult (cf. 3:13; 9:22; 10:18–28) and continues in Jeroboam's sins. His response to the rebellion of Moab (already mentioned in 2 Kgs 1:1) is to seek help, like his father before him, from Jehoshaphat—readers are in fact explicitly reminded of that earlier chapter by Jehoshaphat's response to this request in 3:7 (cf. 1 Kgs 22:4). Jehoshaphat is not concerned on this occasion to discover the counsel of the Lord before going off to war (cf. 22:5). Disaster follows, in the context of which Jehoshaphat recovers his memory: "Is there no prophet of the LORD here, through whom we may inquire of the LORD?" (2 Kgs 3:9–12; cf. 1 Kgs 22:7). Elisha's name is mentioned as one who used to "pour water on the hands of Elijah" (i.e., serve him), whereupon the kings agree to consult him. His two-part prophecy in 2 Kgs 3:13–19 foresees that the immediate crisis will be dealt with by a miracle (water deriving from "neither wind nor rain") and that, thereafter, God will grant the alliance a comprehensive victory over Moab. Events quickly begin to unfold in line with the prophecy (vv. 20–27). Water mysteriously appears, providing the troops and their supply animals with what they need but also fooling the Moabites into thinking that the allies have slaughtered one other. Their reckless advance on the Israelite camp is met with force, as their opponents drive them back and point by point act out Elisha's words (v. 25, cf. v. 19). However, on the verge of the total victory that Elisha had apparently prophesied, the Israelites encounter unexpected difficulty. "Great wrath" comes upon Israel from an unspecified quarter (v. 27). The reference is probably to the superhuman fury of Mesha's troops upon seeing the sacrifice, as they counter-attack with renewed strength. The Lord does hand Moab over to the alliance (v. 18)—but not completely. It is probable that this was God's intention from the start. Once again a wicked Israelite king has been lured to disaster, not this time by a lying spirit speaking through false prophets (1 Kgs 22), but by the Spirit of God revealing partial truths through a true prophet—for Elisha did not in fact say that the kings would conquer every fortified city in Moab (as per NRSV, v. 19), but only that they would attack them.

C. Elisha's Miracles (4:1–44)

The Moabite affair has further established Elisha's credentials as a prophet in the line of Elijah; for both are now associated with the God who provides water at will (cf. 1 Kgs 18). Chapter 4 includes more miracles that are reminiscent of Elijah. The first is occasioned by a crisis that faces the widow of a man from one of the prophetic groups over which Elisha exercises leadership (2 Kgs 4:1–7; cf. 1 Kgs 17:7–16). Her sons are to be taken as slaves in payment of debt (cf. Isa 50:1; Neh 5:4–5), but Elisha solves the problem. The major part of the chapter is then taken up with a sequel to the "widow narrative" of 1 Kgs 17:7–16 (2 Kgs 4:8–37; cf. 1 Kgs 17:17–24). Unexpected life (a son is conceived when the husband of Elisha's Shunammite hostess is too old to father a child, 2 Kgs 4:8–17) gives way to unforeseen death (vv. 18–21). The mother goes to see Elisha, even though it is not one of the days on which it is customary to consult prophets (4:23; cf. Amos 8:5). She is not willing to accept his plan to resurrect the boy from a distance by means of his staff (2 Kgs 4:29–30)—she wants his personal attention, which does in fact prove crucial, as Gehazi fails to evoke any response from the corpse (v. 31). It is only Elisha's own prayer and mysterious actions that succeed in bringing the boy back to life (cf. 1 Kgs 17:19–23). The third miracle of the chapter is reminiscent of the healing of the water of Jericho (2 Kgs 4:38–41; cf. 2:1–22), but this time it is food rather than water that is in an unsatisfactory state. Elisha knows what to add to the pot to make it safe to eat. Fourthly and finally, food is once again multiplied (4:42–44; cf. 4:1–7), so that it not only provides people with their immediate needs, but also produces a surplus.

D. An Aramean Is Healed (5:1–27)

The account of Elisha's miracles continues with the story of Naaman the Aramean, during which the Lord is recognized as God, not only of Israelites, but also of foreigners (cf. 1 Kgs 17:17–24), and is acknowledged as the only real God there is (cf. 1 Kgs 18:20–40). The sovereignty of Israel's God over the whole world is clear at the beginning of the story; the author reports that Naaman's success in life was a gift from the Lord (2 Kgs 5:1). Yet he has a skin disease (not necessarily "leprosy," NRSV), and this is what brings him to Elisha (vv. 9–12). The meeting does not go well. Naaman apparently expects personal attention from Elisha and a healing on the spot; what he receives is a messenger (v. 10) who apparently addresses him, not about healing, but about ritual cleansing. He would have been able "to wash . . . and be clean" in that sense using the rivers in his homeland (v. 12; this language echoes that of the cleansing ritual in Lev 13–14). He has failed to listen carefully; Elisha's words in fact include the promise that "your flesh shall be restored" (2 Kgs 5:10). His more attentive servants are able to persuade him to reconsider his hasty interpretation of Elisha's words (v. 13), with the result that Naaman is healed and comes to believe that the Lord is God (v. 15). Elisha did not, in fact, heal Naaman. Keen to drive home this lesson, he refuses to accept any payment from the Aramean (v. 16). However, his servant Gehazi has no such scruples about benefiting from God's work (vv. 20–27), and he suffers serious consequences as a result. Naaman's disease becomes Gehazi's own.

E. Elisha and Aram (6:1–23)

Elisha's activity as a prophet has thus far had a relatively private character (2 Kgs 2:19–25; 4:1–44), and this is briefly continued in ch. 6 with the short story about the ax head that floats so that it can be retrieved (6:1–7). However, it is Elisha's destiny also to be involved in important upcoming national and international events, presaged in his dealings with Naaman in ch. 5, where Elisha involves himself with Aram for the first time. That involvement with Aram occupies much of the next two chapters, which prepare the way for the bloody events of still later ones. Second Kings 6:8–23 contribute to this preparation by showing Elisha now fully drawn into the politics of the region. The uneasy peace of 2 Kgs 5 has given way to sporadic fighting involving Aramean raids into Israelite territory. The king of Aram is infuriated that Elisha is alerting Jehoram on a regular basis to Aramean troop movements. He tries to capture him at Dothan, about 11 miles north of Samaria. Elisha is unconcerned, because he knows that he is surrounded by the army of the Lord and that the Arameans are outnumbered (6:16–17). Their blindness to the odds is quickly compounded by a blindness to their surroundings, which puts them entirely at the mercy of the seer they had come to capture. Dependent upon him for guidance, they are led to the Israelite capital where, after a great feast, they are sent home.

F. The Siege of Samaria (6:24–7:20)

The historian now describes a full-blown invasion of Israel by the king of Aram, who besieges Samaria (2 Kgs 6:24–33). There is a famine so severe that one woman is driven to cannibalism. King Jehoram is powerless to help, lacking supplies. Only the Lord who provides such things can deliver, as Jehoram himself affirms (v. 27); and this is what happens, in line with another prophecy from Elisha (7:1–2). Normal business "at the gate of Samaria" (the marketplace) will be resumed on the following day. Produce worth eating will change hands once again at much lower prices than are presently the case (7:1; cf. the prices in 6:25). The king's skeptical right-hand man will see this miracle happen; but he himself will not eat—since to mock the prophetic word is to mock the Lord. The prophecy is fulfilled through the agency of four men with skin diseases (7:3–11). Faced with certain death if they go into the city or stay where they are (v. 4), these men instead choose possible death in the Aramean camp. Seen in the half-light of the late evening, with "the sound of chariots, and of horses, the sound of a great army" in the background (v. 6), they are perceived by the Arameans to be mercenaries. The Arameans flee from the field, abandoning their possessions where they lie (v. 7). General plunder of the Aramean camp follows (v. 16), with the consequence that economic conditions in Samaria immediately become better. The skeptical officer of 7:2 is trampled in the scramble to acquire goods (vv. 17–20). He stood in the way of God's salvation, as kings and their officials often do in these stories about Elisha; and he has died in a rush of judgment. It is the humble—in this case the "lepers"—who are the channels through which God's blessing comes to Israel.

G. The Shunammite's Land Restored (8:1–6)

There has been a concern throughout the Elisha story to portray the prophet as a channel for God's salvation, not simply to Israel as a whole, but also to individuals—Israelites and non-Israelites. Now, after the long narrative about the siege of Samaria, but before the report about Hazael, the historian writes again about the Shunammite woman of 2 Kgs 4:8–37. Whereas in 4:13 she had a home among her own people and did not need Elisha's patronage, now in 8:1–6 she does. While she has been avoiding the famine by sojourning in Philistia, someone has taken her land. Providentially, however, just at the moment she arrives at the royal court after seven long years to beg for her house and land, Gehazi is telling the king all about her. The king takes steps to ensure the return of everything that belonged to her, as well as all the income from her land that she would have received had she stayed in the country.

H. Hazael Murders Ben-hadad (8:7–15)

Ben-hadad becomes ill and consults the Lord about his illness (v. 8). Hazael is the man sent to find the answer from Elisha, the general thrust of which is that Ben-hadad is going to die (v. 10). Elisha encourages some deception on this point, however, so as to lull Ben-hadad into a false sense of security. Elisha also looks beyond the king's death into Aram's future—a future in which Hazael will be king, and will inflict great suffering on Israel (vv. 12–13), as he ravages the land and brutalizes the people (cf. Amos 1:13; Hos. 13:16; 2 Kgs 15:16). Hazael duly smothers his master with a wet bed-cover (if that is what the unusual Hebrew word in v. 15 means) and takes power. He has come from nowhere to the throne. He is a "mere dog" as he puts it—the "son of nobody" according to an Assyrian source.

I. Jehoram and Ahaziah (8:16–29)

The historian last referred to Judah in 2 Kgs 3, when King Jehoshaphat was involved in the ill-fated campaign against Moab. Another Judean king has come and gone in the meantime; the reader must be told about him and introduced to his successor in order to understand the story that follows (2 Kgs 9–10). That king is Jehoram (1 Kgs 22:50; 2 Kgs 1:17), a wicked ruler who is apparently a Baalworshiper (8:18). The Davidic dynasty survives in these circumstances only because God has promised David a "lamp" that keeps on burning (cf. 1 Kgs 11:36; 15:4). Jehoram's successor Ahaziah also possesses habits of religion to match those of the family to whom he is related by marriage ("he was son-in-law to the house of Ahab") and with whom he has close contact. It is in fact as he is visiting the wounded King Jehoram in Jezreel in the aftermath of another joint campaign against Ramoth-gilead (2 Kgs 8:28–29) that he is caught up in Jehoram's troubles and killed.

J. The End of Ahab's House (9:1–10:17)

Of the players in the last act of Ahab's drama who were mentioned in 1 Kgs 19:15–18 only Jehu remains. Elisha sends a servant to find him among the army still encamped at Ramoth-gilead (2 Kgs 9:1–13). A secret anointing takes place (vv. 2, 6), and although Jehu is reluctant to respond to questions about this act (v. 11) his reticence is overcome by the persistence of his companions, who immediately proclaim him king (v. 13). The terms of the prophecy received by Jehu are broadly in line with those of Elijah's in 1 Kgs 21:21–24 (cf. also 1 Kgs 14:6–11; 16:1–4): Ahab's house is to be destroyed, with special attention to Jezebel. Jehu now sets about his task, traveling to Jezreel with an army (2 Kgs 9:14–16). Jehoram, accompanied by Ahaziah, goes out to meet him "at the property of Naboth the Jezreelite" (v. 21)—a name with fateful connotations (cf. 1 Kgs 21, esp. vv. 1–2; 16–24). Jehoram is killed, and Ahaziah shares in his fate.

Jehu now approaches the city itself, in pursuit of Jezebel (2 Kgs 9:30–37). He discovers her sitting at a window, adorned as a prostitute (v. 30; cf. Ezek 23:36–49). She taunts Jehu as one unlikely to survive his own revolution (his reign will be a "seven-day wonder," like Zimri's in 1 Kgs 16:8–20) and is thrown down to the ground beneath by a number of eunuchs (royal officials). Some time later Jehu orders her burial; but while he has been eating and drinking the dogs have also been consuming Jezebel—just as Elijah had predicted (1 Kgs 21:23; cf. 2 Kgs 9:10).

Elijah had also prophesied that the Lord would consume Ahab's descendants and cut off from him every last male in Israel (1 Kgs 21:21); the story goes on to recount in 2 Kgs 10:1–17 Jehu's crusade against Ahab's family that accomplishes this end. The first to be dealt with are the seventy sons of the house of Ahab who are living in the capital Samaria under the tutelage and care of the leading men of the city (v. 6). These are the people from among whom a successor to Jehoram would normally be chosen. By writing letters to the leading citizens challenging them to place one of these "sons" on the throne and fight for their master's house, Jehu makes them choose sides. Jehu himself then goes on to kill the remaining members of the house of Ahab in Jezreel, as well as those closely associated with Ahab there (v. 11). His work in Jezreel complete, he leaves for Samaria; and on the way, he meets some relatives of Ahaziah (v. 13), who are duly murdered as well.

K. Jehu Destroys Baal Worship (10:18–36)

Samaria had been the focal point for the Baal cult (cf. 1 Kgs 16:32–33); and it is that cult to which Jehu now gives his attention, although his approach is a subtle one. The dynasty may have changed, he tells the people of Samaria, but the religious policy will remain the same (2 Kgs 10:18). A religious festival is organized and all the servants of Baal are gathered together, unsuspecting, under one roof (vv. 19–21), where they are massacred. The "pillar . . . in the temple of Baal" is destroyed and the temple of Baal demolished (vv. 26–27; cf. 1 Kgs 16:32–33; 2 Kgs 3:2). Baalworship in Israel is officially at an end. Jehu does nothing about the worship of "the golden calves that were in Bethel and in Dan," however (10:29). It is therefore surprising to find him addressed by God in v. 30 as one who has "done well in carrying out what I consider right." Apart from 2 Kgs 10:30 the authors of Kings only use such language of David (1 Kgs 15:5) and of the relatively good (i.e., non-idolatrous) kings of Judah (e.g., 1 Kgs 15:11; 22:43). It is even more surprising to find Jehu receiving a David-like dynastic promise (2 Kgs 10:30). Evidently the eradication of Baal-worship is so significant that, for the moment, participation in the sins of Jeroboam pales into insignificance. What Jehu has done that is right outweighs what he continues to do that is wrong (vv. 29, 31). The chapter ends by returning to Hazael king of Aram, who now begins a period of sustained aggression against Israel (10:32–36), conquering Transjordan as far south as the Arnon Gorge, the southern limit of Israelite territory there (Josh 12:2).

III. Joash (11–12)

The destruction of the house of Ahab has impinged to an unsettling extent upon the house of David. Ahaziah has been killed, just like Jehoram; and a number of his relatives have suffered the same fate as Ahab's relatives (2 Kgs 10:12–14). Have the two royal houses become so identified in intermarriage (8:18, 27) that a distinction is no longer to be found between them? Second Kings 11 intensifies this question by reporting the attempt of Athaliah (possibly a daughter of Jezebel) to wipe out the entire royal family, thus bringing the line of David to an end (just as Ahab's line has come to an end). Happily one royal prince survives. Joash is smuggled to safety and hidden with his nurse in the Temple, where he remains unrecognized for the six years of Athaliah's rule. Eventually a coup is organized by the chief priest Jehoiada (vv. 4–16), who conspires with the commanders of the various military units in Jerusalem and manages to ensure sufficient security for a coronation to take place within the Temple precincts. Part of the ceremony involves the presentation of a list of divinely-ordained laws (v. 12; NRSV, "covenant") by which the king shall govern (cf. Deut 17:18–20). Athaliah, rushing to the Temple precincts to find out what is happening, discovers the conspiracy much too late, and is executed (2 Kgs 11:15–16). There follows a covenant-renewal ceremony (vv. 17–21), in which the king and the people once more identify themselves (in the aftermath of the idolatrous interlude represented by the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah), as "the LORD's people" (cf. Josh 24:1–27; 2 Kgs 23:1–3). At the same time, a covenant is made "between the king and the people" (2 Kgs 11:17; cf. 2 Sam 5:1–3). It is important to re-define kingship in distinctively Israelite terms after a period in which thinking about such matters has no doubt been influenced by foreign ideas (cf. the kingship described in 1 Sam 8:11–18). The identity of Judah having thus been re-established, steps are taken to remove the worship of Baal from the city (v. 18).

Joash turns out to be a king who fundamentally "did what was right in the sight of the LORD" (2 Kgs 12:2; cf. the verdict on the idolaters Jehoram and Ahaziah, 2 Kgs 8:18, 27). He gave attention to the Temple of the Lord (12:4–16), which had suffered from neglect during the years in which the worship of Baal was encouraged. His initial plan is to leave the repairs to the priests themselves (vv. 4–5); but this plan fails because (it is implied) the priests are not anxious to spend money on mere buildings (vv. 6–8)—they care more for their own well-being than for the Temple, and divert funds to their own benefit even though they are well provided for under the normal laws of sacrifice (v. 16; cf. 1 Sam 2:12–17, 27–29, for a similar situation). Joash himself therefore takes control of the project, ensuring that money is truly set aside for it and is used properly (2 Kgs 12:9–12). The repairs are duly carried out, although it is a humble restoration that results. There are "no basins of silver, snuffers, bowls, trumpets, or any vessels of gold, or of silver" in this Temple (v. 13). Joash, like Solomon, reigns for forty years (cf. 1 Kgs 11:42); but the Temple is a poor reflection of its former glory (contrast 2 Kgs 12:13 with 1 Kgs 7:50). The house of David is still being "humbled" in the aftermath of Solomon's sins, as 1 Kgs 11:39 predicted. This theme is also visible in the closing verses of 2 Kgs 12. It is not just Israel (2 Kgs 10:32–33) but also Judah that is oppressed by Hazael king of Aram (12:17–18). The nation is far from the days when the king of Israel had peace on every side (1 Kgs 5:4).

IV. Jehoahaz and Jehoash (13:1–25)

Having just been told about events in Judah during the reign of Joash, the reader is now updated on what has been happening in Israel during the reigns of those two kings who acceded to the throne within Joash's lifetime. Both kings survive (if only just) the Aramean onslaught initiated by Hazael in 2 Kgs 10. The first is Jehoahaz (13:1–9)—a wicked king, indulging as his predecessors had done in the sins of Jeroboam. Under normal circumstances one might expect the appearance of a prophet to announce the end of Jehu's house (cf. 1 Kgs 14:6–14; 16:1–4; 21:21–24); but the divine promise to Jehu has created a new situation (2 Kgs 10:30). His house survives, although there is divine punishment in the form of an Aramean oppression so severe that it reduces the army of Jehoahaz to little more than a remnant (13:3) as insubstantial as "the dust at threshing" time that is caught by the wind and blown away (v. 7). There is also "a savior," however—perhaps a foreign king, distracting Aram from its war with Israel (v. 5). The second Israelite king in this period is named Joash/Jehoash (13:10–25). His reign provides the context for the death of Elisha. The prophet falls ill in a period when the "chariots of Israel and its horsemen" have been decimated by the Arameans (v. 14; cf. v. 7) and the king arrives to consult him. Elisha is able to offer Jehoash words of some comfort (vv. 15–19). They are not unqualified, however, apparently because the king's response to prophetic commands is not unreserved. The destruction of the Arameans will not be complete, because the king did not obey the prophetic word sufficiently enthusiastically. These are Elisha's last words; but his powers live on in the grave (13:20–21). The historian no doubt reported this because of the connection between this story and the verses that follow (13:22–24), which indicate that even in the living death of exile God has not banished the Israelites from his presence. If contact with the great prophets of the past is maintained through obedience to their teachings, it is implied, death may yet be followed by an unexpected resurrection (cf. Ezek. 37:1–14); for God has made a "covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (v. 23), committing himself to Israel as a people and promising her a land.

V. Amaziah, Jeroboam, and Azariah (14:1–15:7)

Second Kings 13 ended with the description of a modest upturn in Israel's fortunes (v. 25). The impetus of that recovery continues in ch. 14. Amaziah of Judah is a relatively good king who keeps the law of Moses in dealing with the families of those who had murdered his father (cf. Deut 24:16). Yet he foolishly challenges Jehoash of Israel to a fight, and ignores his warning (2 Kgs 14:9) that Amaziah is only a puny thornbush, easily trampled upon by any wild animal, in comparison to Jehoash's mighty and immovable cedar of Lebanon. Amaziah is duly defeated at Beth Shemesh, a city 20 miles west of Jerusalem (2 Kgs 14:11–12). This leads on to an Israelite assault on the capital of Judah itself (vv. 13–14), in which a section of the wall of Jerusalem is destroyed (cf. Jer 31:38; Neh 8:16 for the gates mentioned here). The humbling of the house of David thus continues (cf. 1 Kgs 11:39; 15:16–22; 22:48–49; 2 Kgs 11–12), and is not materially affected by the succession to the throne of Azariah (15:1–7; he is also called Uzziah in 15:13, 30, 32, 34). Israel, on the other hand, is resurgent—not just in the reign of Jehoash, but also in the reign of his son Jeroboam (14:23–29), who restores the border of Israel from Lebo-hamath (an unknown city located somewhere to the north-east of Hamath) to the Sea of Arabah (i.e., the Dead Sea; cf. Josh 3:16; 12:3). In so doing, Jeroboam recovers all the territory in Transjordan captured by Hazael in 2 Kgs 10:32–33 and reestablishes the ideal borders of northern Israel as they had existed under Solomon (cf. 1 Kgs 8:65). This happens not because Jeroboam is a good king (2 Kgs 14:24) but because the promise to Jehu stands (10:30) and God remains compassionate (13:23). Specifically, "the LORD had not said that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven" (14:27), so that when there was a danger of this happening, during the time of Jehu's VII. Jotham and Ahaz (15:32–16:20) dynasty, he took steps to deliver Israel from her enemies.

VI. Israel's Last Days (15:8–31)

The death of Jeroboam II marks the fourth generation of the divine promise to Jehu (2 Kgs 10:30). One, therefore, expects a return to the unstable government of the northern kingdom implied by 1 Kgs 14:15, before the houses of Omri and Jehu were established. Reign now follows reign in quick succession, as the nation plunges speedily towards defeat and exile at the hands of the Assyrians. Scarcely has Jeroboam's son Zechariah begun to rule (15:8–12) when he is assassinated by Shallum, who holds on to power for a mere month before losing both crown and life to Menahem (15:13–16). Menahem reigns for ten years (15:17–22), in which time Pul, king of Assyria, (also known as Tiglath-Pileser) invades his land and forced him to pay him tribute (v. 19). Menahem's son Pekahiah (15:23–26) lasts just two years. He, too, is the victim of conspiracy, as one of his chief officers, Pekah, launches an attack on the royal palace and Pekahiah is assassinated. Pekah then reigns for twenty years (15:27–31)—enough time to see Tiglath-Pileser demonstrate that he has replaced the Aramean king as Israel's greatest enemy by annexing much of Israel's northern and eastern territory and deporting to Assyria a significant percentage of her population. Pekah is in turn assassinated by Hoshea son of Elah—the king during whose reign Samaria and the northern kingdom will fall. Before narrating the demise of Israel, however, the historian describes events in Judah under Jotham and Ahaz.

VII. Jotham and Ahaz (15:32–16:20)

Jotham has already been exercising power in Judah because of his father Azariah's illness (15:5); but now he becomes king in his own right (15:32–38). He rebuilds the upper gate of the house of the Lord (presumably damaged in the course of Jehoash's incursion into Jerusalem in 14:13–14). He himself also suffers an assault from the north led by Rezin king of Aram and Pekah. This is the beginning of the Syro-Ephraimite war that features so prominently in the early chapters of Isaiah (Isa 7–9).

Jotham's son Ahaz permits the return to a period of officially sanctioned idolatry in Judah (16:1–20). The language in which his religious policy is described is in fact largely that of 1 Kgs 14:23–24, where Judah's adherence to idolatrous worship was first described (compare 2 Kgs 16:3b with 1 Kgs 14:24b; and 2 Kgs 16:4b with 1 Kgs 14:23b). The new element is the sacrifice of his son in the fire (v. 3a), which is an allusion to participation in the cult of Molech mentioned in 1 Kgs 11:7 (cf. Ezek 16:20–21; 20:26–31; Lev 18:21; Jer 32:35). The Syro-Ephraimite alliance besieges Ahaz in Jerusalem; and he responds by sending messengers to the king of Assyria, accepting vassal status and requesting his help (2 Kgs 16:5–9). This intervention by Assyria into Judean affairs is fateful in its consequences, not simply in terms of politics but also in terms of religion (vv. 10–20). A new altar for the Temple of the Lord displaces the old one (cf. 1 Kgs 8:64), which is now to be used only for Ahaz "to inquire by" (2 Kgs 16:15)—perhaps for sacrifice in relation to divination. There are also various other innovations at the Temple (vv. 17–18). Ahaz has been influenced by what he saw in Damascus (v. 12), and wishes to imitate it, possibly in part to please the king of Assyria (v. 18).

VIII. The End of Israel (17:1–41)

The exile of Israel has been foretold (1 Kgs 14:15), although it has long been delayed because of God's promises and God's character (2 Kgs 10:30; 13; 14:23–29). The third siege of Samaria that is now described will, however, be the last (cf. 1 Kgs 20:1 ff.; 2 Kgs 6:24 ff.). It occurs during the reign of Hoshea (17:1–6), whose political manoeuvring between Assyria and Egypt leads to his imprisonment and the capture of his capital city by the new Assyrian emperor Shalmaneser. The Israelites are carried off to Assyria and dispersed in various places throughout the empire. A number of different explanations might be given for these events, but the authors of Kings are interested only in one (17:7–17): "the people of Israel had sinned against the LORD their God" (v. 7). As the Lord once drove other peoples out of the land because of their sins (v. 8), so Israel now meets the same fate—as will Judah eventually, it is hinted (vv. 13, 19). Into the land of Israel, conversely, are now imported various other peoples (17:24–41) from places both close at hand (e.g., Hamath) and further away (e.g., Babylon). It is their religion that is the subject of interest in the last section of the chapter. From their own point of view, "they worshiped the LORD but also served their own gods" (v. 33). From the point of view of the authors of Kings, however, they neither worshiped the Lord nor adhered to his laws (v. 34); for the Lord is not simply a local god who can be worshiped alongside others, but the Lord of all peoples and all history.

IX. Hezekiah (18:1–20:21)

The account of Israel's exile in 2 Kgs 17 has introduced the possibility that Judah, like Israel, may be heading for exile, unless she heeds the prophetic warnings she has received and turns away from her sins. It is at this point in the narrative that a king appears who resembles David more closely than any Davidic king so far and leads Judah in a very different direction from his father Ahaz. He is, first, a king who reforms Judean worship. Even the most righteous of Judean kings thus far has failed to remove the high places—but Hezekiah does this (18:4). He also takes action against "the bronze serpent that Moses had made" in the wilderness (Num 21:4–9), which has evidently become an object of worship. He is, secondly, a king who displays unparalleled trust in the Lord (2 Kgs 18:5). The consequence of Hezekiah's faithfulness is that his military exploits parallel David's in a way that is not true of any of the rest of David's descendants. Only of David and Hezekiah among the Davidic kings is it said that "the LORD was with him" (v. 7; cf. 1 Sam 16:18; 18:12, 14; 2 Sam 5:10) and that the king "prospered" in war (2 Kgs 18:7; cf. 1 Sam 18:5, 14, 15). Only David and Hezekiah, furthermore, are said to have defeated the Philistines (2 Kgs 18:8; cf. 1 Sam 18:27; 19:8). Hezekiah was like David; he was at the same time unlike Ahaz, for he rebelled against the king of Assyria. To remind readers of the kind of environment in which Hezekiah pursued this bold policy, the historian reiterates the fate of the northern kingdom at the hands Shalmaneser (18:9–12; cf. 17:1–6). This reminder creates a transition into an account of what happened when the new king of Assyria, Sennacherib, attacked Judah (18:13–19:37). The beginning of the attack is reported in vv. 13–16, and does not augur well for Judah as "all the fortified cities" fall. Hezekiah attempts to buy off Sennacherib with an apology as well as gold and silver. Sennacherib does not accept this apology and tribute, but sends an army from Lachish (southwest of Jerusalem) to the capital to persuade Hezekiah to surrender (18:17–25). The persuasion focuses on the issue of "trust" that has been introduced in v. 5. Hezekiah should neither trust in Egypt nor in the Lord, who is unlikely to help since Hezekiah has just removed his "high places and altars." The people should make peace with the king of Assyria and surrender the city, going into exile only to find a new "promised land" like their own (v. 32; cf. Deut 8:7–9); for no god has ever been able to deliver its land out of the hand of the king of Assyria (2 Kgs 18:33–35), and it will be no different with the Lord. These disparaging remarks about the power of God are followed up with further remarks in 19:10–13 about his integrity: Hezekiah has been deceived by the God in whom he trusts.

The reality is of course very different and is outlined in Isaiah's prophecy in 19:1–7 (God is certainly powerful enough to assure Jerusalem's deliverance); in Hezekiah's prayer in 19:14–19 (He is God alone, creator of heaven and earth, "God . . . of all the kingdoms of the earth," whereas the other "gods" are only "wood and stone," cf. Deut 4:28); and in Isaiah's further prophecy in 19:20–34. In the last passage, it is clear that Sennacherib's blasphemy and pride will bring about his downfall (vv. 21–22). His great mistake has been to imagine that what he has accomplished in his military campaigns has been achieved in his own strength (vv. 23–26). This is not so; and he will be forced by the Lord to return to Assyria (vv. 28, 32–34). Recovery in Judah afterwards will be slow but sure (vv. 30–31)—initially the people will be able to survive only because of the crops that spring up from what is already in the ground, but in the third year normal agricultural practice will resume (v. 29). Chapter 19 concludes with the fulfillment of the first part of the prophecy, as the "great army" outside Jerusalem's gates (18:37) suffers enormous casualties and Sennacherib returns with all his forces to his capital Nineveh (vv. 35–36), where he is killed.

Jerusalem has survived and Hezekiah's trust in God has been vindicated. It seems that the veiled threats in 2 Kgs 17 about Judah suffering the same fate as Israel have come to nothing. Second Kings 20, however, persists in the idea that ultimately Judah will fall. The chapter opens with a "flashback" to the period around 713/712 BCE, fifteen years before Hezekiah's death, when Hezekiah contracts a life-threatening illness (20:1–7). He receives a promise that he will live for another fifteen years (v. 6). Throughout this period (it is implied) God will deliver the king and the city out of the hand of the king of Assyria. The immediate sign that the prophecy is true involves the movement of a shadow on some steps (NRSV, "dial" v. 11) associated with the name of his father Ahaz. The shadow miraculously recovers ground just as Hezekiah is (metaphorically) destined to do. What of the period after the fifteen years are complete, however? The story in 20:12–21 alludes to this. What Hezekiah's Babylonian visitors see, Isaiah tells the king, they will one day take away to Babylon, along with some of the king's descendants (v. 18). Hezekiah is surprisingly unmoved by this news. A man recently rescued from death, he is content simply to have "peace and security" in his lifetime (v. 19).

X. Manasseh and Amon (21:1–26)

Second Kings 17 and 20 had hinted that Judah will ultimately share Israel's fate, the deliverance of Jerusalem under Hezekiah notwithstanding. With Manasseh, God's patience breaks; and hints of disaster give way to explicit prophetic announcements of it. Manasseh is the worst of the Judean kings, indulging in all that has been most reprehensible in the religion of Israel in the preceding chapters of Kings and adding to it. His father's reforms are reversed, as the high places are rebuilt so that idolatry can resume there, and a new sacred pole for Asherah replaces the one Hezekiah removed (21:3; cf. 18:4). Like Ahaz, he sacrifices his own son in the fire and practices divination (21:6; cf. 16:3, and possibly 16:15). Like Ahab, he builds altars to Baal (21:3; cf. also the Asherah pole in 1 Kgs 16:33) and worships idols (2 Kgs 21:11; cf. 1 Kgs 21:26). Behind Ahab stand Jeroboam and the other Israelite kings who caused Israel to commit sin (2 Kgs 21:16; cf. 1 Kgs 14:16; 15:26, 30, 34; 16:2, 13). Manasseh also consults mediums and wizards (2 Kgs 21:6; cf. Deut 18:9–13) and takes it upon himself to install "the host of heaven" (sun, moon, and stars) as fit objects for worship alongside the Lord in the Temple (2 Kgs 21:5, 7).

Other nations had been driven out of the land for such crimes (vv. 2, 9); this is how it will be also with Judah (vv. 10–18). Jerusalem will be assessed by the divine architect (v. 13; note the use of the measuring line in Isa 34:11 and Lam 2:8) and, like a dangerous building, condemned. It will be emptied of all that is in it, wiped clean like a dish after a meal is finished (2 Kgs 21:13). Judah, the remnant of the Lord's inheritance left in the land, will be handed over to her enemies just as Israel was (v. 14; cf. 17:18; 19:4, 31). In the shadow of such momentous events, the reign of Manasseh's son Amon has the appearance of a relatively unimportant footnote (21:19–26).

XI. Josiah (22:1–23:30)

It is at this juncture in Judean history that Judah ironically finds herself with yet another righteous king—a second Moses to match her second David in 2 Kgs 18–20. This is Josiah, a king long-awaited (cf. 1 Kgs 13:2) and the best of all. The verses that introduce him (2 Kgs 22:1–2) already alert the readers to the kind of person he is going to be with their allusion to Deut 17:20, where the ideal king is said to be one who does not "turn" from the law of Moses "to the right or to the left." This is only the first of many references in 2 Kgs 22–23 that link Josiah with the figure of Moses in particular and "the book of the law" (22:8) in general—that is, with Deuteronomy (cf. Deut 28:61; 29:21; 30:10 for the phrase). As ch. 22 opens, however, this book has been lost (22:3–13). It has been generally available to the kings of Israel and Judah in previous times (1 Kgs 2:3; 2 Kgs 10:31; 14:6; 18:6); but it has disappeared from public view during the long reign of the apostate Manasseh. It is, however, found during Josiah's eighteenth year while the Temple is being repaired. Its contents lead to the king tearing his robes in grief and despair and sending various officials to "inquire of the LORD" about it (vv. 11–13). The prophet chosen by Josiah's officials for consultation is (perhaps surprisingly) not Jeremiah or Zephaniah, but Huldah, the wife of the "keeper of the wardrobe" (v. 14—perhaps a Temple official, cf. 2 Kgs 10:22). Her words confirm what the historian had already reported from the unnamed prophets of 2 Kgs 21. However, because Josiah has humbled himself before the Lord he will not personally see the disaster that is to fall on Jerusalem (v. 20). He will instead be "gathered to [his] grave in peace," that is, while Judah and Jerusalem still know peace, rather than the sword.

Since Josiah is a pious king, Huldah's oracle about the future does not deflect him from the path of religious reform despite its foretelling of doom (23:1–3). He gathers all the people together to hear "all the words of the book of the covenant" (v. 2; cf. Deut 31:9–13); and a covenant-renewal ceremony follows (cf. 2 Kgs 11:12–14), during which all concerned promise to follow the Lord and wholeheartedly to keep "his commandments, his decrees, and his statutes" (v.3; cf. Deut 6:17; 1 Kgs 2:3). The destruction of Baal-worship in Jerusalem and Judah immediately follows (2 Kgs 23:4–14), during which (and among other things) the apartments of the male temple prostitutes are broken down (where ritual garments were manufactured for use in the worship of Asherah, v. 8) and horses and chariots associated with the worship of the sun are destroyed (v. 11). The Josianic reform also embraces the northern cultic site of Bethel (23:15–20), to which Josiah takes the ashes of the idolatrous vessels brought out from the Temple (v. 4). He defiles Bethel's altar with bones taken from the surrounding tombs, in accordance with the prophecy of the man of God in 1 Kgs 13:2 (cf. also 13:11–32 for the background to vv. 17–18). For the first time since Solomon, a king has been able to treat the northern area of Israel as if it were part of the same kingdom as the south. A Passover follows (2 Kgs 23:21–25) in accordance with the stipulations of Deuteronomy (Deut 16:1–8, noting esp. v. 6; and see Josh 5:10–12 for the last mention of Passover in the narrative). There was simply no king like Josiah when it came to turning to the Lord (2 Kgs 23:24–25; cf. Deut 6:5). Yet Judah's fate was already settled and even Josiah himself did not come to a happy end (2 Kgs 23:26–30).

XII. The End of Judah (23:31–25:30)

The story of 1 and 2 Kings now comes to its end. The first of Josiah's successors is Jehoahaz, but he reigns for only three months (23:31–32). He is not a ruler acceptable to the Pharaoh of Egypt, who is temporarily Judah's new overlord in the aftermath of Josiah's death at Megiddo. Jehoahaz is therefore replaced with his brother (v. 34). It is during Jehoiakim's reign that readers hear for the first time about the armies of Babylon, the ultimate agent of divine judgment upon Judah (cf. 2 Kgs 20:12 ff.). It is Babylon that has been gradually replacing Assyria as the region's dominant imperial power in the preceding period; and it is the king of Babylon who now appears at the head of the army sent by the Lord to destroy Judah because of the sins of Manasseh (24:2–4). He subdues Egypt, and comes into possession of the whole Solomonic empire, "from the Wadi of Egypt to the River Euphrates" (v.7; cf. 1 Kgs 4:21, 24; 8:65). Jehoiakim's son Jehoiachin succeeds him and has to pay the price for his rebellion against Babylon, as Jerusalem is besieged (24:8–17). Jehoiachin surrenders (v. 12) and is carried off into exile (v. 13). A remnant of sorts still remains—but only the poorest people of the land (v. 14). Jehoiachin is replaced by his uncle Mattaniah (v. 17); but Mattaniah, under his new name of Zedekiah, also rebels against the king of Babylon (v. 20). The result is a new siege of Jerusalem. The city falls; "every great house" in Jerusalem is burned down, including Solomon's Temple and palace (25:9); and the walls around Jerusalem are broken down as well (v. 10). More of the population is exiled (vv. 11–12), and some are executed (vv. 18–21). The threats of 1 Kgs 9:6–9 have become a reality. Judah, like Israel, has gone "into exile out of its land" (2 Kgs 25:21; cf. 2 Kgs 17:23). Gedaliah, the grandson of Josiah's secretary Shaphan (23:12) is appointed to govern what is left, but he does not survive long. Ishmael son of Nethaniah, who apparently has ambitions to be the next king (he is a member of the royal family, 25:25), slaughters everyone at Mizpah. The final exile of the book of Kings is a voluntary one, as the remaining people flee to Egypt (v. 26; cf. Jer 40:7– 43:7). The epic saga that began with Exodus from that land has ended with the remnants of Israel returning whence they came. The only hope that remains lies with Jehoiachin (2 Kgs 25:27–30), released from prison and given a seat of honor at the king of Babylon's table. He is the only son of David left; and his survival hints that the promise to David of an everlasting dynasty may not yet have failed—that somehow the words of 2 Sam 7:15–16 remain true, that "my love will never be taken away from him . . . your throne shall be established forever."

1 CHRONICLES

ALEJANDRO BOTTA

OVERVIEW

The book of Chronicles (called sefer divre hayamim in the Babylonian Talmud, which is best translated "Annals") is the last book of the "Writings" (ketubim), the third section of the Hebrew Bible. The Babylonian Talmud refers also to a sefer yochatzin, "the book of the genealogies" (Talmud b. Pesah. 62) that Rashi associated with Chronicles. In the Hebrew Bible and in Jewish tradition both books of Chronicles comprise a unity (the Masoretic scribes consider 1 Chron 27:25 as the middle verse of the whole book).

Christian Bibles include 1 and 2 Chronicles among the so-called "Historical Books" after 1 and 2 Kings. The book itself, like most of the literary works composed before the Hellenistic period, doesn't include a title or the name of its author. The name given to it by the sages and church fathers reflects their intention to describe or qualify its content. The LXX calls Chronicles ta paraleipomena ("the things omitted or left out")—i.e. from the books of Samuel and Kings—and the LXX Codex Alexandrinus adds Basileon Iouda, "regarding the Kings of Judah." The Vulgate followed the LXX and called 1 and 2 Chronicles Liber (Primus and Secundus) Paralipomenon. The modern title Chronicles goes back to Martin Luther's German translation Das Erste and Das Zweite Buch Der Chronik (following St. Jerome, who referred to Chronicles as Chronicon Totius Divinae Historiae, or "Chronicle of the Entire Divine History.")

The Wisdom of ben Sirach's picture of David seems to reflect Chronicles' depiction of David as founder of the cult (Sir 47:9–10), indicating that Chronicles had already achieved authoritative status by the second century BCE. Mathew's reference to the death of "Zechariah son of Barachiah" is also evidence of the acceptance of Chronicles as part of the authoritative corpus (Matt 23:35 ref. to 2 Chr 24:20–22).

Authorship and Relationship with Ezra and Nehemiah

The Talmud ascribed part of the authorship of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah to Ezra, and part of it to Nehemiah. "Ezra wrote the book that bears his name and the genealogies of the Book of Chronicles up to his own time. This confirms the opinion of Rab, since Rab Judah has said in the name of Rab: Ezra did not leave Babylon to go up to Eretz Yisrael until he had written his own genealogy. Who then finished it [the Book of Chronicles]?—Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah" (Talmud b. Bat. 15a). Medieval Christian scholars were not so certain. Hugh of Saint Cher (ca. 1200–1263 CE), a French Dominican, affirmed that the author was unknown, although he trusted the veracity of its content. That was also the opinion of Stephen Langton (ca. 1150–1228 CE), Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Franciscan scholar Nicolaus Lyranus (ca. 1270–1349 CE).

Until recently, the great majority of biblical scholars had considered the book of Chronicles to form a unity with Ezra and Nehemiah. This position was supported by the overlap between 2 Chr 36:22–23 and Ezra 1:13a; a supposed linguistic identity between them, the use by 1 Esd of 2 Chr 35–36, Ezra 1–10, and Neh 8:1–13a; and similarities in their theology and purpose. Nowadays, pioneered by the work of Sarah Japhet and Hugh G. M. Williamson, the consensus has moved into considering the book of Chronicles and Ezra–Nehemiah as two different and independent works.

Date

There is a certain agreement among scholars that Chronicles is a post-exilic composition. The suggested dates by scholars range from 520 BCE to 160 BCE, although there is some consensus to date the book during the fourth century BCE.

Chronicles as Legitimate Historiography

The positive valorization of Chronicles by the church fathers and medieval scholars suffered a strong blow at the hands of nineteenth century and early twentieth century Protestant scholarship. For Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918), and Charles. C. Torrey (1863–1956), the work was historically unreliable and an extreme distortion of the history of ancient Israel. A more positive attitude toward the Chronicler was developed during the second half of the twentieth century under the influence of scholars like Gerhard von Rad (1901–71) and Martin Noth (1902–68). Contemporary scholarship seems to be more willing to accept Chronicles as a valid historiographical work. The Chronicler acts as a historian when he gathers material and sources about the past of his community, decides what is significant for his time, and connects diverse events from his sources to produce a coherent narrative about the past. The difference between a past event and a historical event is, after all, how significant that event is for the present community.

Sources

Chronicles abounds in citations of works used by the author to compose his narrative. The book of the kings of Israel and Judah is cited several times, although sometimes with a slightly different name (2 Chr 16:11; cf. 20:34; 25:26; 27:7; 28:26; 32:32; 33:18; 35:26; 36:8); there is also a mention of the midrash of the books of Kings (2 Chr 3:22 and 24:27). The Chronicler also refers to prophets or prophetic records like the acts of Samuel the seer, the acts of Nathan the prophet, the acts of Gad (1 Chr 29:29), the prophecy of Ahijah, and the visions of Iddo (2 Chr 9:29). The Chronicler is also familiar with the genealogical information provided by the books of Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Joshua, Samuel, and Ruth. There is a citation of what is written "in the law of the LORD" (1 Chr 16:40) which possibly refers to the Pentateuch; and a reference to a book of laments, unknown to us, that included a "lament of Josiah" (2 Chr 35:25). The author seems to know the books of Isaiah (2 Chr 28:16–21), Jeremiah (2 Chr 36:21), and Zechariah (2 Chr 36:9). The Chronicler also used information from lists (1 Chr 6:1–15), and three canonical psalms (Pss 96; 105; 106) are cited in 1 Chr 16. Without being exhaustive, this list of sources shows evidence of a dedicated historian at work.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Genealogical Lists (1:1–9:44)

A. Israel's Ancestors (1:1–2:2)

The first chapter of Chronicles is based on a list of genealogies from the book of Genesis and serves as an introduction to the book. The chapter is divided in three parts: (a) 1–23, the descendants of Adam; (b) 24–54, the descendants of Abraham, (c) 2:1–2, the descendants of Israel. In the same way as in the Assyrian and Babylonian cosmogonic genealogies, the author distinguishes an antediluvian generation (1:1–23) and a postdiluvian generation (1:24–2:2). The mention of Peleg (1 Chr 1:19) serves as a pivot for the Chronicler to highlight the original unity of humanity, as the author mentions that it was in times of Peleg (Heb.: "division") "the earth was divided." The Chronicler begins the genealogy with Adam in order to emphatically place the people of Israel in the context of universal history.

B. Judah's Lineage (2:3–4:23)

This section consists of three parts: (a) 2:3–55, the genealogies of the tribe of Judah; (b) 3:1–24, the house of David; and (c) 4:1–23, additional genealogies of the house of Judah. Here begins the section which will cover the longest part of the genealogical material of Chronicles.

2:3–9. Judah to Hezron. This section is based on Gen 46:12 and Num 26:19–22. The Chronicler stresses both the divine election of Judah and his intolerance with unfaithfulness in the cases of Er, who "was wicked in the sight of the LORD and he put him to death," and of Achar, "the troubler of Israel who transgressed in the matter of the devoted thing."

2:9–17. Descendants of Ram. The importance of Ram, who is not the firstborn but occupies the first place on the list, is due to his being one of David's ancestors. Verses 10–12 are based on Ruth 4:19–22. David's sisters are only mentioned here.

2:18–24. Descendants of Caleb. This is not the only place where the name Caleb is mentioned (cf. 2:42–55; 4:1–8) and could refer to two different people. The first part of the genealogy (18–20) deals with Bezalel, a silversmith (cf. Ex 31:2; 35:30), who although belonging to a period prior to David, is associated with David and the tabernacle in view of the future construction of the Temple by Solomon. The second part (21–24) establishes a connection between Judah and a group of descendants of Gilead.

2:25–41. Descendants of Jerahmeel. This section includes two lists of names (25–33 and 34–41) which appear only here in the Hebrew Bible.

2:42–55. An Additional List of Descendants of Caleb. Continuing the section 2:18–24, it includes two lists (42–50a and 50b–55). The first one enumerates the sons of Caleb from a wife whose name is omitted (42–45); the descendants of Caleb through his concubine, Ephah (46–47); and the sons of Caleb with his second concubine, Maacah (48).

3:1–24. Descendants of David. The line of David's descendants is the centered of Judah's genealogy and continues the section of vv. 2:1–17. David's nineteen sons are enumerated (1–9); the kings of Israel (10–16); and the post-exilic generation (17–24). The extension of David's genealogy to such a late period reflects the importance of David's descendants even during the restoration period (cf. Hag 2).

4:1–23. Other Descendants of Judah. This section contains various genealogies with no parallel in the Hebrew Bible. The best known of these is the one dedicated to Jabez (9–10) and his prayer granted by God. The Hebrew version of this prayer presents some difficulties and would be best translated "if you blessed me and enlarged my borders, and if your hand might be with me, and that you would extend lands of pasture." This way, the greatest honor Jabez deserves could be attributed to the extension of his territory due to prayer and not to military force.

C. Descendants of Simeon (4:24–43)

The tribe of Simeon comes after that of Judah due to proximity. The cities that are listed in vv. 28–33 (cf. Josh 19:2–8) were considered part of Judah from ancient times.

D. The Tribes of Transjordan: Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (5:1–26)

This section enumerates the descendants of Reuben (1–10), Gad (11–22), and the half-tribe of Manasseh (23–26). At the beginning of this section the Chronicler clarifies the reason by which Reuben, Jacob's firstborn (cf. Gen 29:31–32), does not come first in his genealogy. The interest of the author to demonstrate that God often discards the firstborn (cf. 1 Chr 2:3 and 26:10) seems to emphasize the fact that before God there are no natural rights, only the benefit of divine election. The section dedicated to Gad points to the theology of the Chronicler when explaining the reason for military success: they cried to God in the battle (cf. 2 Chr 14:11–15; 20:5–30; 32:20–21) and God granted their wish (cf. 1 Chr 12:19; 15:26; 2 Chr 25:8; 32:8) because they trusted in him (cf. 2 Chr 32:10); therefore, the Hagrites and all those who were with them "were given into their hands" (vs. 20). The section dedicated to Manasseh explains the reason for the exile of the northern tribes (cf. 2 Kgs 17:7–23). Israel had transgressed against God (cf. 2 Chr 36:14), idolatry being one of the main issues; God sends a foreign army to punish his people (cf. 2 Chr 36:17), and the consequence is the exile (cf. 2 Chr 36:18–20).

E. Descendants of Levi (6:1–81)

The importance that the Chronicler attributes to the Levites is evident in the amount of verses dedicated to the tribe of Levi. Together with Judah and Benjamin, they capture the attention of the Chronicler in the genealogy section. The section is divided into two parts: the genealogy of the Aaronite priests and other Levites (1–53), and the settlements of the Levites (54–81). The lineages of David and Aaron (cf. 1 Chr 2:10–17; 3:1–16) are the only cases in which the generations are enumerated from the patriarchal era until the exile.

F. Tribes of the Central Mountainous Region (7:1–40)

Issachar (7:1–5)

Benjamin (7:6–12)

Naphtali (7:13)

Manasseh (7:14–19)

Ephraim (7:20–29)

Asher (7:34–40)

The Chronicler has ordered the genealogies of Issachar, Benjamin, and Asher in a similar fashion: using the formula "son of..." followed by the list of leaders of the family clans, using military terminology (7:6; 7:11; 7:40); the use of exaggerated quantities to describe the men apt for war in each tribe (cf. 5:11 and 40); and finally the lack of narrative material as can be found in the genealogies of Manasseh and Ephraim.

Concerning the genealogy of Ephraim, it is noteworthy that in this brief text three literary genres can be found: a genealogy (vv. 20–21a), in which Ephraim's sons are mentioned; a brief narrative section (vv. 21b–24), which tells about the death of Ephraim's children by Gath, Ephraim's mourning, and the births of Beriah and Seerah; and Joshua's pedigree (vv. 25–27). The difference between a "genealogy" and a "pedigree" is that the first emphasizes the principal ancestor (in this case Ephraim) and later relates the descendants, while the second is centered on the final descendant (Joshua in this case).

Surprisingly, in the genealogies of both Manasseh and Ephraim there is no mention of any stay in Egypt. Manasseh appears to be associated with Aramaic elements in Palestine, from where he takes his wife (1 Chr 7:14ff), leaving aside the tradition of the stay in Egypt and emphasizing the continuity of the occupation of his territory (the northern part of the territory east of river Jordan). Something similar happens with the genealogy of Ephraim (1 Chr 7:20ff), who according to the Genesis narrative is born and dies in Egypt (Gen 41:50–52; Exod 16). However, in Chronicles Ephraim is in no way associated with Egypt. Rather, Ephraim is presented as originally from and settled in Palestine. The narrative of the murder of his sons as a result of a conflict with Gath's men and the foundation of three cities by his daughter Seerah "who built both Lower and Upper Beth-horon, and Uzzan-sheerah" located in Palestine, does nothing but reinforce the local Palestinian emphasis which the author of Chronicles places on Ephraim's sons.

Verses 25–27 include a list of ancestors, or pedigree, of Joshua, son of Nun. Due to the narratives about Joshua included in the book of Exodus, we know that Joshua was born in Egypt and was the leader who conducted the people across the Jordan and in the later conquest of the land. None of this is important to the author of Chronicles. In 1 Chr 7:25–27, Joshua is presented as already established on the land, in contrast with the conqueror role with which he is presented in the book that bears his name. His leadership in the conquest is omitted in Chronicles.

G. Additional Descendants of Benjamin (8:1–40; 9:1a)

This new chapter concerning the tribe of Benjamin is structured in two sections, a list of Benjaminite ancestral houses (vs. 3–32) and a genealogy of the family of Saul. While the previous section dedicated to Benjamin (7:6–12) was centered on the military census, the current chapter is centered on the geographical distribution.

H. The Post-Exilic Community (9:1b–44)

On concluding the descendants of Jacob (1 Chr 1–8), the Chronicler adds a final section listing the inhabitants of Jerusalem, paying special attention to the priestly families (10–13), the Levitical families (14–16), and the gatekeepers (17–33).

II. The Reign of David (10:1–29:30)

After the genealogies, a narrative section begins which follows the structure of 1 Sam 31– 2 Kgs 25. The Chronicler presents us with the particularities of his theological perspective through additions, alterations, and omissions of the text used as a base.

A. Death of Saul (10:1–14 // 1 Sam 31:1–13)

The Chronicler begins this section with the death of Saul forming an inclusio with 2 Chr 36. The death of Saul and the dispersion of his people is a foreshadowing of the end of the Judaeen dynasty and the subsequent exile of the southern kingdom. The section is structured in three parts: 1–7, the narrative of the war with the Philistines and its consequences; 8–12, the destiny of Saul and his sons; 13–14, summary and final thoughts. The Chronicler is not really interested in the reign of Saul more than as a prologue to the story of David. Saul's disobedience contrasts with David's faithfulness, while at the same time serving as a prototype for subsequent evil kings. Saul's unfaithfulness will be remembered throughout the Chronicler's work (2 Chr 26:16, 18; 28:19, 22; 29:5–6, 19; 30:7; 33:19; 36:14). It is summarized in 10:13, where Saul dies for his unfaithfulness to the Lord because he did not keep his commands and had consulted a medium seeking guidance instead of seeking the Lord's guidance. This chapter, nevertheless, serves as a paradigmatic anticipation of the exile, at the same time that David's serves as paradigm of the postexilic restoration.

10:1–4. A repetition of 1 Chr 8:29–38, acting as a transition between the genealogy section and the narrative section which begins at this point. The battle takes place on Mount Gilboa. The results are disastrous. The use of archers was a common tactic in the ancient Near East; the wounds of other kings due to enemy arrows are described in similar manner in other Scripture passages (1 Kgs 22:34; 2 Kgs 9:24; 2 Chr 35:23). Saul's suicide on the battlefield is, on the other hand, the only case of suicide in the OT.

10:5–6. Chronicler replaces "his armor-bearer and all his men" of 1 Sam 31:6 for "all his house died together," highlighting the end of the dynasty.

10:7–10. The narrative of this episode in 1 Sam 31 concentrates on the fate of Saul's body. Although the Chronicler does omit the fact that Saul is decapitated, he does pay attention to the fate of the head. The cutting of the head and disposing of the armor is a literary motif that also appears in the story of David and Goliath (1 Sam 17:54). It is possible that many stories on the death of Saul circulated in Israel.

10:13–14. These verses have no equivalent in 1 Samuel. This is the only place in Chronicles in which Yahweh directly intervenes in a dynastic change. Saul's dynasty could have endured if he had remained faithful to the Lord. It is clearly pointed out that the death of Saul is a punishment for his sins, "therefore the LORD put him to death," and with his death the Lord turns the kingdom over to David.

B. David's coronation (11:1–12:40)

Even though basically the material for this section comes from 2 Sam 5, the Chronicler presents his material with the intention to highlight the divine intervention in favor of David. Verses 11:1–3, 10–40 and 12:1–41 form a chiasmic structure aimed at emphasizing Hebron as the place in which the troops from different parts of the country concentrate to march towards the conquest of Jerusalem. The structure, as is common with the Chronicler, follows a thematic order rather than a chronological one:

a.	ebron H	11:1
b.	Ziklag	12:1
c.	stronghold	12:8
c'.	stronghold	12:16
b'.	Ziklag	12:20
a'.	ebron H	12:21

11:1–3. During Saul's reign, David had established his power's center in Hebron (1 Sam 30:31) and according to 2 Sam 2:4 it is exactly there where he is anointed king over the house of Judah. Nevertheless, this is not mentioned by the Chronicler, nor is the confrontation with Ishbaal. In this way the absolutist character of the Davidic dynasty is emphasized. In Chronicles, all Israel is "together with" David, while in Samuel the tribes only "came" to David. In this way the common destiny of all Israel and the Davidic dynasty is demonstrated.

Then David made a covenant with all the elders who had declared their union with the house of David: "we are your bone and flesh." According to the Chronicler's theological perspective, all this happened in accordance with what God had already announced through Samuel (1 Sam 15:28; 16:1–3).

11:4–9. The new dynasty needs a capital in neutral territory and Jerusalem is the chosen place. Once again it is "all Israel" who marches instead of "the king and his men" (2 Sam 5:6). All this serves the Chronicler to mark a break with the city's past and proclaim a new beginning. From this moment, and till present times, Jerusalem will be the city of David par excellence. The verse summarizes the essential elements of David's ascent to the throne, taken from 2 Sam 5:10. David's power will increase under the protection of the Lord of Hosts.

11:10–47. David's heroes. This section is taken from 2 Sam 23:8–39. In 2 Samuel the last name is that of Uriah the Hittite (Bathsheba's husband), whom David sent to die in battle.

C. Transferring the Ark to Jerusalem (13:1–16:43)

13:1–14. Failed Attempt to Bring the Ark to Jerusalem. 13:1–4. Chapter 13 begins with a prologue which is original to the Chronicler and is not found in the book of Samuel (13:1–4). It describes the first failed attempt to transfer the ark to Jerusalem. The Chronicler's intention to highlight David as being superior to Saul is set out, "for we did not turn to it in the days of Saul" (v. 3), and it is David who initiates the sequence of events which will finally bring the ark to Jerusalem. Jerusalem could in no way be the religious center of Israel if the ark was not there. David's procedure indicates his role as popular leader of the people. It is not by royal decree that the decision is made but rather after consulting with the commanders and leaders (v. 1). The decision to transfer the ark could not be made lightly; such a move needed to have the support of all Israelites, and their priests and Levites (v. 2). On other occasions the Chronicler points out the consultation carried out with the leaders of the people when important decisions have to be made for the cultic life of the people. In 2 Chr 30 it will be Hezekiah who consults with the leaders and "all the assembly in Jerusalem" to celebrate Passover.

13:5. David then assembled all Israel "from Shihor of Egypt" to "Lebo-hamath." Shihor is the literal Hebrew transliteration of the Egyptian expression "channel of Horus" and indicated the southern limit of Israel (= Sihor Mizrayim "channel of Egypt," cf. 1 Kgs 8:65; 2 Kgs 24:7) set by one of the eastern branches of the Nile (Pelusium) which no longer exists.

13:6. The Chronicler omits "LORD of Hosts" (2 Sam 16:2), a title for God only used in connection with David (and which refers only to the fact that "God's name is invoked").

13:8. A narrative climax prepares for the tragedy which follows—from general rejoicing to experiencing the fear of divine mystery.

13:9–14. Uzzah's death, who with all good intentions tries to stop the ark from falling, causes quite a stir. Verses 10–13 describe a sequence of events which begins with the "anger of God" (v. 10) and continue with the "anger" and "fear" of David (vv. 11–12), concluding in v. 13, in which David repents of his original idea as a response to the uncontrollable divine action and decides not to take the ark "into his care into the city of David." Rather he takes it to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. Paradoxically the ark ends up in the house of a Philistine at the service of the royal household (cf. 2 Sam 5:18). Contrary to David's fears, "the LORD blessed the household of Obed-edom and all that he had" (v. 14).

14:1–17. Three Success Stories. In 2 Samuel the first intent of taking the ark to Jerusalem is a failed one and is followed by a second try, this time successful (2 Sam 6:12–19). In Chronicles the narrative is interrupted to include between these two attempts, three success stories: King Hiram of Tyre's messengers (vv. 14:1–2); the increase of David's harem and family (3–7); and the story of the victory over the Philistines (8–12 and 13–17), basically following the narrative of 2 Sam 5:11–25.

15:1–16:3. Transporting the Ark to Jerusalem. In his description of the now successful move of the ark to Jerusalem, the Chronicler follows the model of 2 Sam 6:13–23.

15:1–3. Preparations for the Transportation. In 2 Sam 6:12 the beginning of the movement in the narrative is triggered by the news that David receives of the Lord's blessing of the house of Obed-edom. In Chronicles it is David's religious zeal which is presented as the initial cause of this new intent. David prepares a place for the ark, anticipating its arrival. On this occasion it will not be the lay people who will bring in the ark, but it will be carried by the Levites, as David declares in v. 2 (cf. Deut 10:8). The popular character of this enterprise is maintained in the narrative when it mentions that David assembled "all Israel" (v. 3).

15:4–10. List of Levites Who Participate in Transporting the Ark. The Chronicler, as he usually does, points out the distinction between the Levites and the "descendants of Aaron," i.e. the Aaronite priests (v. 4), and then sets out the list of Levites according to their families (Kothar, Merari, Gershon, etc).

15:11–15. Summons and Purification of the Levites. In accordance to David's original summons that "no one but the Levites were to carry the ark of God" (15:2), the Chronicler relates the sanctification of the Levites. This sanctification was necessary to bear the ark on their shoulders (cf. Exod 19:10, 15; Deut 23:10; 1 Sam 21:5), and explains the reasons for the original failure (cf. 1 Chr 13:1–14) when the ark had not been transported according to God's orders.

15:16–24. Appointment of Singers and Others at the Service of the Ark. After the Levites have been sanctified, the Chronicler narrates the selection of singers with musical abilities. First three singers of the same order are appointed and then fourteen of the second order, who at the end of v. 18 are called "gatekeepers".

15:25–16:3. Transporting the Ark. Here the Chronicler goes back to the narrative of Samuel. In Samuel the ark is transferred by David, while in Chronicles this is a collective endeavor in which the elders of Israel and the military leaders also take part. In Chronicles it is emphasized that the Levites (helped by God) are the ones who carry the ark; followed by the main strata of the Israelite society, the military, civilian, and religious groups. All Israel is behind this endeavor (v. 28). At the end of the story the Chronicler leaves aside the criticism of Michal, Saul's daughter—the Chronicler had mentioned the disdaining attitude when seeing David dance in 15:29.

16:4–42. Worship Organization Concerning the Ark. This long section has no parallel in the Deuteronomistic history and can be attributed to the Chronicler's composition, with certain ulterior editing and additions.

16:4–6. Personal Service. Once again David is the one to name ministers, to invoke—lit. "remember"—to praise, and to thank the Lord.

16:7–38. Psalm of Thanksgiving. As a corollary to the above description, the Chronicler includes a song of thanksgiving and praise ordered by David, "by Asaph and his kindred." The reference to Asaph is important, as the texts that mention him in place of Heman or Ethan are considered very ancient. The psalm of the Chronicler includes parts of Ps 105 (vv. 1–5); 96 (vv. 1–3); and 106 (vv. 47–48).

16:39–42. Worship at the Gibeon Sanctuary. Gibeon is located five miles northeast of Jerusalem. The last reliable historical mention of the tabernacle is that of Num 25:6. Here the Chronicler possibly follows an oral tradition which finally places it close to Jerusalem. The "high place," basically a place of worship often associated with different constructions (2 Kgs 17:29; 23:19), in Scripture usually represents the presence of syncretistic worship harshly criticized by prophets. Until Josiah closed down all places of worship to concentrate worship in Jerusalem, these were tolerated on the condition that Yahweh was the worshiped god (1 Sam 9:16–24; 1 Kgs 3:4–5; 2 Chr 1:3–7).

D. David's Kingdom Is Consolidated (17:1–21:30)

17:1–27. Nathan's Prediction. Nathan's prediction is of fundamental importance for the development of the theology of the covenant between God and Israel. From here onward, the covenant will not only be with the people but also with the Davidic dynasty. Through the covenant with David, God renews the covenant with all the people (2 Sam 23:1–7). Nathan's prophecy legitimizes the institution of the monarchy in the name of God, and can be taken as a starting point for the messianic dynasty that characterizes the theology of the house of David.

17:1–6. Oracle on the Temple (2 Sam 7:1–7). Both in Samuel and Chronicles, the prediction is preceded by an introduction (1 Chr 17:1–2; 2 Sam 7:1–3). Though here the Chronicler faithfully follows the text of Samuel, he omits the second part of 2 Sam 7:1: "the LORD had given him rest from all his enemies around him." In addition, the Chronicler substitutes the rhetorical question in Samuel "Are you the one to build me a house to live in?" (2 Sam 7:5) for a negation "You shall not build me a house to live in." This clarifies that God is not against the construction of the Temple, but rather against the man who was ready to begin the construction. The reasons offered by God by means of the prophet are that since leaving Egypt God has previously lived in a tent and tabernacle, both of these are synonymous and contrast with "house," which indicates a construction with walls. The second reason is that even during the following period, after leaving Egypt (the time of judges) and while the ark lodged in Shiloh, God did not ask for a temple.

17:7–15. Oracle on the Davidic Descendants (2 Sam 7:8–16). In this passage the oracle turns from the negative form (it won't be David who builds the Temple) to the positive form: it will be God who builds the house of David to assure his descendants, and it will be from these descendants that the person who will build the Temple will come. As in other texts of renewal or establishment of a covenant, the narrative begins with a historical prologue in which the benefits that God has bestowed on David (7–8a) are pointed out. God has taken David from the pastureland to make him king over Israel, protecting him from his enemies. Now, then, is the time to formulate the promises of the covenant which include the greater glory of the name of David, a secure place for the people of Israel, and the assurance of the dynastic continuity. It will be a son of David who will build the Temple, and God's covenant with David will be perpetuated in Solomon, from whom God will never withdraw his love, that is, the election (the opposite from what happened with Saul, David's predecessor).

17:16–27. David's Prayer (2 Sam 7:18–29). David responds to Nathan's oracle with a prayer taken from 2 Samuel with no significant alterations aside from the substitution of Yahweh for Elohim (17:2, 3) or "the ark of God" for "the ark of the covenant of God" (17:23).

17:16. David "sat before the LORD" in prayerful attitude. The suppliant could stand (Gen 18:22; 1 Sam 1:26), kneel (1 Kgs 8:54; Ps 95:6; Dan 6:10), or fall on his face (Deut 9:15; Josh 7:10). The verb used to describe David's posture (lit. "sitting") is quite surprising.

David's prayer consists of two parts: 16–22 and 23–27. The first responds to the content of the first part of Nathan's prophecy: God's benevolence towards David (7–8). David responds, praising God for his promise to establish David's house; to the enumeration of God's promise to Israel (9–10a), David refers to the exodus and conquest and the covenantal relationship between God and Israel (20–22). The second part of the prayer (23–27) claims from God the fulfilling of God's promise on the establishment and continuity of the Davidic dynasty.

18–20. The Battles of David and the Establishment of His Kingdom. These chapters represent a summary of 2 Sam 8–21, with no significant additions by the Chronicler:

1 Chronicles	2 Samuel
1 Chr 18	2 Sam 8
—	2 Sam 9
1 Chr 19	2 Sam 10
1 Chr 20:1a	2 Sam 11:1
—	2 Sam 11:2–27
—	2 Sam 12:1–25
1 Chr 20:1b	cf. 2 Sam 12:26
—	cf. 2 Sam 12:27–29
1 Chr 20:2–3	cf. 2 Sam 12:30–31
—	2 Sam 12:1–21:14
—	2 Sam 21:15–17
1 Chr 20:4–8	2 Sam 21:18–22

In this summary, the Chronicler tries to present David's military success against the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Arameans.

21:1–22:1. David Orders a Census and Acquires the Land to Build the Temple (2 Sam 24:1–4, 8–25)

The Chronicler follows the narrative of 2 Samuel in this case as well. The variations we find between the texts are attributed not so much to the particular perspective of the Chronicler, but to a slightly different version of the text of Samuel used by the Chronicler.

E. Preparation for Building the Temple (22:2–27:34)

This section is structured around the decisions made by David before his death regarding the building the Temple. This is the most extensive contribution of the Chronicler with no parallel in the Deuteronomistic history. After the promise to David that it would be his son who was going to build the Temple (ch. 7), the Chronicler presents the way David left everything ready for what Solomon was to carry out.

22:2–19. David Gives Instructions for Building the Temple. Chapter 22 consists of three sections: vv. 2–5 describe David's initial preparations; vv. 6–16, the charge to Solomon; vv. 17–19, his command to the leaders of Israel. Each of these sections is centered around a rhetorical nucleus—David's thoughts (v. 5); David's words to Solomon (vv. 7b–16); words to the leaders (vv. 18–19). Each of the following sub-sections begins with "David said" or "David commanded," emphasizing David's leadership in the whole project. This way, Nathan's omen in 1 Chr 17:11–14 begins to happen: "I will raise up your offspring after you, one of your own sons, and I will establish his kingdom. He will build a house for me and I will establish his throne forever," referred to by Solomon in 1 Kgs 5:5.

22:2–5. David Recruits Workers and Gathers Materials for the Temple. In this project, it will not be the Israelites who will be submitted to forced labor (as Solomon would do in 1 Kgs 5:27), but rather "aliens residing in the land." The term gerim is used in Chronicles when referring to the Canaanites who had remained in Israel (2 Chr 2:16ff; 8:7–10), free men but with no legal rights. The basic task these workers have to face is to cut the stone for the Temple. It does not say from where David imports iron and bronze. Usually iron was imported from Anatolia. In the times of Samuel, the Philistines exercised a form of monopoly (1 Sam 13:19–22). Tyre and Sidon, Phoenician cities which usually appear together (1 Kgs 5:15, 20; Ezra 3:7), are the places from which cedar wood came. The description of Solomon as "young and inexperienced" is in harmony with the description of himself in 1 Kgs 3:7, a young child "who does not know how to go out or come in," and with the introduction by David of him in 1 Chr 29:1 as "young and inexperienced." It is interesting that Rehoboam is the other king to whom a similar description applies ("young and irresolute" 2 Chr 13:7), which suggests that these are not mere descriptive terms but rather something pejorative which reflects the immaturity that characterizes both kings.

The greatness of the building task contrasts with the youth of Solomon. The building will be "famous and glorified throughout all lands" and reminds us of the failed intention of Gen 11:4 "let us make a name for ourselves; otherwise we shall be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth."

22:6–16. David Charges Solomon with Building the Temple. David's discourse consists of two parts, a historical prologue (v. 7–10) and an exhortation to Solomon (11–16). In the prologue David recalls his intentions to build the temple "to the name of the LORD my God" (v 7), bringing to mind the Deuteronomistic theology (cf. Deut 12:11) and the Deuteronomistic history (1 Kgs 8:16, 19, 20, 29). These verses are a programmatic discourse (cf. 2 Sam 7 // 1 Chr 17; Josh 1:1–9; 1 Kgs 2:1ff.) which will be repeated in 1 Chr 28:1–10. All ideas anticipated in verses 9–10, quietness, the "house"—both as a dynasty and as a temple—the adoption as son of God, and the everlasting kingdom are the components of the ideal paradigmatic king. "Peace" is a characteristic of this king, which contrasts with the violent times of David. Though in 1 Chr 17 we are not told the reason why it is David who will not build the Temple, here it is clearly stated that David has "shed much blood and [has] waged great wars" (already in 1 Kgs 5:3 it had been pointed out that David "could not build a house for the name of the LORD, because of the warfare"). "Peace and quiet to Israel" (v. 9), then, becomes an indispensable requirement for the construction of the Temple. At the base of this idea is Deut 12, which establishes that God will give you "rest from your enemies all around" (Deut 12:10).

David exhorts Solomon, who "will prosper if you are careful to observe the statutes and the ordinances that the LORD commanded Moses for Israel," making clear the conditional characteristics of the divine promises. Only obedience to the law of the Lord guarantees the promised prosperity.

22:17–19. David's First Discourse to the Leaders. This short pericope is addressed only to the leaders of Israel, whom he exhorts to seek guidance of the Lord with mind and heart, to concentrate all efforts on building the Temple, and, in so doing, support (cf. 1 Chr 5:20) Solomon in this project. This discourse is also divided in two parts. Verse 18 is a historical prologue for the exhortation of v. 19 which demands seeking God with "mind and heart" (cf 1 Chr 28:9; 2 Chr 15:12; 34:31) and building the Temple.

23:1–24:31. Organization of Levites and Temple Priests. Chapters 23–27 are generally considered a later addition to the Chronicler's work. Even if different stages can be identified in the composition, they should be considered as a unit on their own. The information presented here belongs to an ulterior period to Chronicles and cuts the preceding narrative. "Levite" is here used in a general manner, referring to all those who serve in the Temple as priests (ch. 24), musicians (ch. 25), gatekeepers and treasurers (ch. 26).

Preparation for the building of the Temple is not reduced to gathering materials and designing plans for the building. A precise definition of who will be serving in the sanctuary is an essential aspect of the project for the Chronicler.

23:1–32. List of Levites. Chapter 23 consists of three sections. Verses 2b–6a describe the obligations of the Levites; 6b–24 presents three lists of the three family leaders; and 25–32 returns to the duties of the Levites.

23:2b–6a. Enumeration and Division of the Levites. These verses calculate the total number of Levites over 30 years of age as is specified in Num 4:3; 23:30 (though in Num 8:24 age is established at 25) as 38,000. David assigns the division of tasks that they are to carry out: 24,000 supervisors, a quantity which largely exceeds the 8,580 Levites of Num 4:48.

23:6b–24. Levites to Service of the Temple. The Chronicler has previously introduced some of these names in relation to the role assigned to Levites by David in 1 Chr 6. Some narrative verses interrupt the lists. Verse 13 anticipates the privileged status of Aaron and his descendants. Verse 24 reduces the necessary age to be accepted among the Levites from 30 to 20 years old (23:3).

23:25–32. Description of the Tasks of the Levites. The changes in the obligations of the Levites, after the construction of the Temple, are explained in vv. 26–28. Due to the fact that they will no longer need to transport the tabernacle, they are assigned with additional tasks established in the Pentateuch (vv. 25–26) as assistants to the Aaronite priests, emphasizing the subordination of the Levites to the priests (vv. 28–32). While v. 24 is based on Num 1, vv. 25–26 follow the outline of Num 3–4.

24:1–19. The Sons of Aaron. This directly follows the previous chapter. In 23:23 the sons of Moses are mentioned, and now the sons of Aaron are mentioned. The genealogy of Aaron follows Num 3:2–4, though details about the deaths of Nadab and Abihu are omitted (cf. Lev 10:1–2). Most of the chapter is dedicated to describing the way the priests are organized and distributing their responsibilities.

24:20–31. Expansion of the List of Levites. The additional list of Levites of these verses is a complement to 23:6–24.

25:1–31. List of Musicians and Singers. This passage is directly linked to 1 Chr 23:6b–24a, repeating parts of those verses in the same order. Special emphasis is put on the musical ministry of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthum, and that their appointments came directly from David. The chapter is divided into two sections. The first (1–7) is an introduction to the musicians, their respective family ancestors, a brief description of their obligations, and their numbers. The second section (8–31) introduces casting lots for their duties and a subdivision in 24 classes similar to the priests (1 Chr 24). Tradition which affirms David's relation with music is well documented in biblical texts (cf. 1 Sam 16:23; 18:10; 19:9; 2 Sam 1:17ff; 6:5, 14). Music is central to the worship service and here related to the task of worship prophets. It seems evident that Levites also played this role (cf. 2 Kgs 23:2 // 2 Chr 34:30). In 2 Chr 20 the Levite prophesies in response to the prayer of Jehoshaphat. Asaph and Jeduthum are mentioned with the Levites in Neh 11:17ff. Two titles of the psalms include Jeduthum's name, (Ps 39, 62); twelve include Asaph's name (Ps 58, 73–83); and one includes Heman's (88).

26:1–32. A List of Gatekeepers and Officers. In its current form, chapter 26 can be divided into three sections. The first (vv. 1–19) is a genealogy of gatekeepers (vv. 1–11) and their tasks (12–19); the second section (20–28) is an additional list of Levites in charge of the treasury and their tasks; and the third (29–32) is a list of supervisors.

26:1–19. Gatekeepers. Besides this, Chronicles includes two other lists of gatekeepers (1 Chr 9:17ff; 16:37ff). Gatekeepers did not belong to the Levites in Ezra 2:42, 70; 7:24; 10:24; Neh 10:28; 11:19. Here the Temple gatekeepers descend from the two Levitical families of Kore (vv. 1–3, 9) and Merari (vv. 4–8, 10–11). Kore is identified in 1 Chr 6:37–38 as one of the sons of Izhar. The most prominent figure of the group is Meshelemiah (mentioned in 1 Chr 9:21). Merari's family is divided in two groups, Obed-edom (vv. 4–8) and Hosah (vv. 10–11).

26:20–28. Treasurers. This group of Levites is responsible for the administration and care of two types of "treasures": the "treasures of the house of God" (v. 20)—this includes "offerings" (cf. 9:28–29; 23:28–29)—and the "dedicated gifts."

26:29–32. Outside Duties. After the administrators of the Temple, the Chronicler includes a list of people whose duties are carried outside of the Temple. Chenaniah and his sons are "officers and judges" (v. 29), while Hashabiah is responsible for "oversight of Israel west of Jordan" (vv. 30, 32), because of the pedigree of Izhar and Hebron (see 1 Chr 6:2, 18; 23:12, 18–19). Even in the Priestly tradition (P), Levites do not carry out priestly duties, although this role does appear in Deuteronomy (Deut 17:8–13; 21:5) and in Ezek (44:24).

27:1–34. List of Civic Officials. Concluding the list of duties assigned to the Levites, ch. 27 describes the civil organization of David's kingdom. The list of officers is preceded by a summary in v. 1 which specifies it "is the list of the people of Israel," that is to say, no longer the tribe of Levi but rather the whole people.

27:2–15. The Army. These verses present the organization of the army in twelve divisions, each of them of 24,000. All the chiefs are part of the list of the heroes of David (2 Sam 23:8 ff; 1 Chr 11:10–30). Jashobeam of the tribe of Judah (Perez his father in v. 3) is one of the sons of Judah, and is assigned to lead the first division during the first month (Nisan = March–April). He is also named commander-in-chief of all the army during that period. In a similar fashion all commanders for the rest of the other months are listed.

27:16–24. Leaders of the Tribes. The second group of officials corresponds to the tribal leaders. Following the criteria to distinguish between priests and Levites, chiefs are introduced for Aaron and Levi (v. 17). The tribe of Manasseh is also divided in two (v. 20b–21a), a division based on what could be geographical reasons. Gad and Asher are not listed. The passage contains a critical note on the census of the population ordered by David (cf. 1 Chr 21 / 2 Sam 24). The condemnation is not against the census as such, rather against counting those under twenty. Taking into account that the census is used to estimate the payment of taxes and the number of men in case of war and for the need of public labor, counting those under twenty means increasing the burden that communities must suffer, and as such is condemned.

27:25–31. David's Stewards. The following list enumerates those in charge of administering David's private property (cf 1 Chr 28:1). Twelve officers are also assigned in charge of three areas. The first two of these officers are in charge of the king's property in Jerusalem and the fields, five stewards in charge of crops, and five in charge of cattle.

27:32–34. David's Personal Assistants. That there are seven counselors named in this list is probably due to Persian influence, where the emperor had seven counselors. It is not clear whether Jonathan should be identified with the son of Shimea (1 Chr 20:7 // 2 Sam 21:21). The title "king's friend" applied to Hushai is an administrative title (the same as in Egypt).

F. Solomon's Investiture (28:1–29:25)

These chapters relate Solomon's enthronement, barely referring to the Deuteronomistic's sources (cf 1 Kgs 1–2). The central figure is David: David gathers all Israel's officers (28:1); David says (28:2); David provides (29:1); David says (29:10, 20); David calls to bless the Lord (29:20).

Different from the story in 1 Kgs 1–2, where the people play a mere anecdotic role (cf. 1 Kgs 1:39b–40), in these two chapters they play a fundamental role: Solomon's investiture takes place before all the people; most of David's speech is addressed to the people (28:2ff; 29:1ff; 29:20ff); the people play an important role providing the necessary elements for building the Temple (28:1; 29:1); the people also participate in the blessing of God (29:20) and in worship and celebration of religious festivities (29:21–22).

28:1. Assembly in Jerusalem. This is the most complete listing of the Israelite officers in Chronicles. This verse is an appropriate summary of the list of officers presented in the previous chapter, to which three groups are added: eunuchs ("palace officials," NRSV), mighty warriors, and all warriors.

28:2–10. David's Second Speech. David's speech is introduced by a typical expression in Chronicles, "Hear me" (cf. 2 Chr 13:4; 15:2; 20:20; 28:11; 29:5) and centers round three topics: construction of the Temple, Solomon's divine election, and an exhortation to keep the commandments of God. David begins by reminding the people of his wish to build the Temple, denied by God because he was a man of war and he shed much blood. It is Solomon, chosen by God among David's sons to take his place on the throne, who will build the Temple. The same way as Moses could not enter the promised land (Deut 4:21–22) and it fell to Joshua to lead in the final possession of this promised land, so it will be Solomon and not David who will embark on the enterprise of concluding the Temple. The promise of a lasting kingdom for Solomon, which in 1 Chr 17:4 is unconditional, here appears conditioned to his efforts in keeping God's commandments and ordinances, which is reinforced in 28:9b: "if you seek him, he will be found by you; but if you forsake him, he will abandon you forever." The conditional character of the divine promise extends to the leaders of all Israel (28:8). They too must observe and search out "all commandments of the LORD your God" so as to possess the land and leave it as an inheritance forever to their children. From the perspective of the post-exilic community it is clear that the motive by which the Davidic dynasty has been displaced and the people were taken into exile has been the lack of observance of the divine commandments by the king and his leaders.

28:11–22. Plans of the Temple. The same way the plans of the tabernacle were revealed to Moses and then drawn (Exod 25:9, 40), so the plans of the Temple are revealed to David and then drawn up (28:2, 12, 18, 19). The difference between the times of Moses and the Chronicler is that Moses receives the revelation orally, while the revelation to David is in writing (28:19). For the post-exilic community the inspired word has become the inspired text.

David is not only the architect of the Temple but also the one who dictates the order of service and establishes the hierarchical order of the staff who serve the Temple. Even if Solomon is the builder, it is David who is the intellectual author of the whole project.

29:1–9. David's Third Speech. These verses follow a concentric structure centered on David's exhortation, "Who then will offer willingly, consecrating themselves today to the LORD?" (29:5). At the extremes David provides for the construction of the Temple (gold, silver, bronze, iron, wood, precious stones) (29:2–3) and the people provide for the construction of the Temple (gold, silver, bronze, iron, wood, precious stones) (29:7–8). The people "offer willingly" as in the building of the tabernacle (Exod 25:1ff.), an issue which dominates the entire section (29:5, 6, 9).

29:10–19. David's Prayer. These verses begin with a blessing: "Blessed are you, O LORD, the God of our ancestor Israel" which is a recurrent expression in the book of Psalms (Ps 41:13; 72:18; 89:52; 106:48), and constitutes David's prayer, which although similar to the psalms of thanksgiving, is written in prose. It is possible that the Chronicler decided to present it in such a way due to the fact that at the time the singing of psalms was related mostly to the adoration in the Temple and basically the responsibility of the Levites. The prayer is composed of three parts: the doxology (v. 10b–13), the presentation and dedication to God of the voluntary offering (vv. 14–17), and the supplication (18–19). David asks God that Solomon may faithfully uphold "your commandments, and your decrees, and your statutes," a clear reference to the Torah, so the Temple may be built.

29:20–25. Solomon's Anointment and the Beginning of His Reign. If it were not for the narrative in 1 Kgs 1–2 about the way Solomon reaches the throne, it would be impossible to perceive in the narration of the Chronicler the bloody family conflicts and palace intrigues which facilitated his ascent to the throne. The Chronicler adds to the narrative of 1 Kings the offering of sacrifices by "all the assembly" (v. 21), pointing to the unity of the people in support of the new king ("and all Israel obeyed him," v. 23).

G. Summary of David's Reign (29:26–30)

In the same way he will do with the other kings, the Chronicler here presents a summary of David's reign, highlighting that David reigned over "all Israel" (v. 26) without mentioning that while he reigned in Hebron the territory under his command covered only the tribe of Judah (cf. 1 Kgs 2:11). In v. 28 he points out that David achieved everything that a king could wish and died "in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honor."

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Reign of Solomon, Son of David (1:1–9:31)

Although the recounting of the reign of Solomon occupies nine chapters in 2 Chronicles, most of the narrative focuses on the construction and dedication of the Temple as it brings David's preparations to fruition.

A. Wisdom and Wealth of Solomon (1:1–17 // 1 Kgs 3:1–15 & 1 Kgs 10:26–29)¹

1:1. Solomon's Kingdom Established. The last verses of 1 Chronicles showed Solomon already sitting on David's throne; this first section of 2 Chronicles documents his prosperity. The opening verse states that he "established himself in his kingdom" (cf. 1 Kgs 2:12 and 2:46b), an expression that denotes the overcoming of certain obstacles or conflicts by the king (cf. 1 Chr 11:10; 2 Chr 12:13; 13:21; 17:1; 21:4).

1:2–6. Solomon Offers Burnt Offerings in Gibeon. Solomon's convocation resembles the one made by David (1 Chr 28:1). The purpose is to demonstrate that "all Israel" was present in this act of worship. The central verb in v. 5 is darash, which the NRSV translates as "to inquire." It is used in Chronicles in the sense of "to worship." The Chronicler feels the need to justify Solomon's worship at one of the high places (1 Kgs 3:4 "for that was the great high place") by adding that "God's tent of meeting . . . was there" (1:3) and by mentioning the altar built by Bezalel.

1:7–13. Solomon Asks for Wisdom. The Chronicler omits God's appearance to Solomon in a dream and moves directly to God's speech. The passage follows its parallel in 1 Kgs 3:5–14. God's question (1 Kgs 3:5b = 2 Chr 7b); Solomon's response (1 Kgs 3:6–9 = 2 Chr 1:8–10); and God's reaction (1 Kgs 3:10–14 = 2 Chr 1:11–12). Solomon, previously described as "young and inexperienced" (1 Chr 29:1), will demonstrate maturity and humility when he asks for wisdom to lead his people. Because of this request, God provides him with "riches, possessions and honor" (v. 12).

1:14–17. Wealth of Solomon. God's promise is fulfilled. During Solomon's reign, chariots began to be used in Israel. First Kings 9:19 says that Solomon built "the cities for his chariots, the cities for his cavalry."

B. Construction of the Temple (2:1–5:1)

2:1–18. Procuring the Material and the Craftsmen. David had already charged Solomon with completing the preparations for the building of the Temple (1 Chr 22:14). Solomon will force seventy thousand men "to bear the burdens" and "eighty thousand to quarry in the hill country" (v. 2). He will also request the help of Hiram ("Hiram" in Kings), king of Tyre, who provided skilled craftsmen, cedar, cypress, and algum timber for the project. The Chronicler emphasizes that the laborers forced to work on the Temple were not native Israelites but foreigners (2 Chr 2:17–18; cf. 1 Chr 20:3; 22:2 and 1 Kgs 5:13–18).

3:1–17. The Building. Solomon builds the Temple on the site that God has shown to David (1 Chr 21:28–22:1); the site is also identified as Mt. Moriah, where Abraham was ordered to sacrifice Isaac (Gen 22:2) and which is described as God's mountain (Gen 22:14). The date for the beginning of the construction coincides with the date provided in 1 Kings (2 Chr 3:1–5:1a // 1 Kgs 6:1–30; 7:15–51), but the reference to the exodus from Egypt is omitted, as is usual in Chronicles.

4:1–5:1. The Furniture. The making of the bronze altar (v. 4:1) is not mentioned in 1 Kings, but its existence is assumed in 1 Kgs 8:64; 9:65; 2 Kgs 16:14. The description of the rest of the bronze objects manufactured for the Temple closely follows 1 Kgs 7:40b–47, and the description of the gold objects follows 1 Kgs 7:48–50. The Chronicler clarifies the use of the "ten lavers" (v. 6). Ten tables are listed (v. 8) instead of only one in Kings (1 Kgs 7:48).

C. Dedication of the Temple (5:2–7:22 // 1 Kgs 8:1–9:8)

5:2–6:2. Bringing the Ark of the Covenant // 1 Kgs 8:1–13. The assembly gathers in Jerusalem on the seventh month (named Tishri after the exile but Ethanim in the pre-exilic period, cf. 1 Kgs 8:2) to bring the ark to the Temple. The assembly includes the leaders and "all the Israelites" (v.3). The seventh month is the month of the feast of the Tabernacles (Sukkot, Lev 23:34; Deut 16:13–16; 31:10). In 1 Kings the priests are in charge of moving the ark, but here the task falls to the Levites, according to what David had prescribed (1 Chr 15:2; cf. Deut 10:8; 31:25; Num 3:31). The sacrifices offered by Solomon and "all the congregation of Israel" resemble the sacrifices offered by David and the people when the ark was moved from Kiriath-jearim to Jerusalem (1 Chr 13:5). The climax of this section is achieved when a cloud fills the house of the Lord (v. 13b–14 // 1 Kgs 8:10b). God has previously inhabited a dark cloud (this is the meaning of 'arafel, translated sometimes "thick darkness," NRSV, or "thick cloud," JPS) which carries the sense of a provisional habitat. From now on, God will dwell permanently in the Temple.

6:3–42. Speech and Prayer of Solomon. Solomon's speech follows the pattern of David's speech in 1 Chr 28:2–10. After his speech, Solomon turns to the bronze altar, extending his hands in prayer (cf. Exod 9:29). The Chronicler is careful to put some distance between the altar, reserved for the priests, and the king, adding v. 13 to the narrative in 1 Kings. Solomon praises God for fulfilling his promise to David and asks that God keeps his promise that the Davidic dynasty be perennial, as long as "your children keep to their way, to walk in my law as you have walked before me" (v. 16). The general statement of 1 Kings "to walk before me as you have walked before me" becomes in Chronicles more specific: "to walk in my law as you have walked before me." After the exile, to walk before God has become to walk in God's law (torah). Verses 18–21 reflect tension between a belief in God's transcendence (cf. 2 Chr 2:4–5; Isa 56:7) and his presence in the Temple. Solomon's prayer (vv. 22–23) suggests that oaths previously made in the tent of meeting or other sacred place (cf. Lev 6:3–6; Num 5:13; Judg 11:11; Amos 8:14) are now made in the Temple. The Chronicler also thinks it possible for foreigners to pray to God (v. 33b).

7:1–10. Sacrifice and Theophany // 1 Kgs 8:54–66. The final act of the Temple's dedication is the offering of sacrifices. The Chronicler adds two miracles to the story narrated in 1 Kings. First, fire descends from heaven, consuming the burnt offering (v. 1), in the same way that fire from heaven had consumed David's offering (1 Chr 21:26). Second, God's glory fills the Temple, preventing the priests from entering the precinct.

7:11–22. God Answers Solomon's Prayer // 1 Kgs 9:1–9. Verses 13–15 offer a good example of the Chronicler's theology of retribution. Four actions by the people lead to God's forgiveness: "if my people who are called by my name humble themselves, pray, seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, then I will hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin and heal their land" (v. 14). The notion of humbling oneself appears previously in 1 Chr 17:10; 18:1; 20:4, and becomes a key element in the Chronicler's theology from this point forward (cf. 2 Chr 16:6–7; 30:11; 32:26; 33:12, 19, 23; 34:7; and 36:12). Praying has been connected to the rebuilding of the Temple (cf. 1 Chr 17:25 and 2 Chr 7:1) and to petitions for rescue (2 Chr 32:20–24 and 33:13). To seek God's face (2 Chr 11:16; 15:4, 15 and 20:4) and "to turn from their wicked ways" as theological concepts also appear in 2 Chr 15:4; 30:6, 9; and 36:13).

D. Solomon's Achievements (8:1–9:28)

8:1–18. Building and Settlement // 1 Kgs 9:10–28. Here the Chronicler contradicts the story in 1 Kgs 9:11–14. In 1 Kings, it is Solomon who gives away the cities to Hiram of Tyre for one hundred twenty talents of gold. The Chronicler considers the promised land sacred and giving it away is not a proper act for a king like Solomon.

9:1–28. The Queen of Sheba // 1 Kgs 10:1–28. The visit of the Queen of Sheba follows, with little variation, the parallel story in Kings. Solomon's wisdom has transcended the limits of his kingdom. As no other king before or after, he is a source of wisdom beyond the borders of Israel. Verses 13–28 highlight again the wealth of Solomon and his passion for luxury items: he orders "two hundred large shields of beaten gold" (v. 15) and three hundred smaller shields also of beaten gold (v. 16).

9:29–31. Death of Solomon // 1 Kgs 11:41–43. The Chronicler adds a few interesting details to the story in 1 Kings, such as the mention of additional sources about the life of Solomon: "the history of the prophet Nathan," "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and "the visions of the seer Iddo concerning Jeroboam son of Nebat" (v. 29), Solomon's years on the throne (forty), and his burial (v. 30–31).

II. Kings of Judah (10:1–36:23)

A. The Schism of the Kingdom (10:1–11:4)

The assembly of northern tribes challenge the oppressive taxes that enabled Solomon to pursue his building projects. Instead of following the advice of Solomon's advisers, Rehoboam chose to heed the advice of his young friends and to punish the people's disrespect with additional oppressive measures. As a result, the northern tribes reject Rehoboam as their king and secede. The intervention of the prophet Shemaiah prevents Rehoboam from engaging in a fratricidal war (11:2–4). The Chronicler thinks that Judah is still part of his ideal "all Israel" by replacing "all the house of Judah and Benjamin" (1 Kgs 12:23) with "all Israel in Judah and Benjamin" (v. 3).

B. Rehoboam, Son of Solomon (11:5–12:16)

11:5–12. Rehoboam's Fortifications. The list of cities fortified by Rehoboam does not have a parallel story in Kings, but there is no reason to doubt its authenticity.

11:13–17. Migration of the Levites // 1 Kgs 12:31–32; 13:33. Jeroboam undertakes religious reforms in the northern kingdom that revoked the Levites' ability to function as priests. As a result, they migrated to the southern kingdom. For the Chronicler, everything that Jeroboam does in matters of religion is reprehensible.

11:18–23. Wives and Children of Rehoboam. In addition to the reference to David's wives and concubines, this is the only place in Chronicles where the author mentions the names of wives, concubines, and children of a king. Comment on the fortified cities connects the passage with vv. 5–12. Following Solomon's example, Rehoboam appoints his sons in strategic positions to assure his control of the country.

12:1–12. Pharaoh Shishak Attacks Judah // 1 Kgs 14:25–28. Chronicles adds parenthetical comments to the parallel story in Kings. The first refers to the consolidation of Rehoboam's dominion and his unfaithfulness to God's law (v. 1). The narrative sequence makes clear that Shishak's attack results from Rehoboam's and the people's infidelity. Shishak lists one hundred and fifty cities captured during his campaign in his inscription at Karnak, most of them situated in northern Israel. This passage is composed with Sennacherib's campaign in mind (2 Kgs 18–19). In the case of both kings, Rehoboam vs. Shishak and Hezekiah vs. Sennacherib, the story highlights their consolidation of power and the subsequent arrogance that brings divine punishment. Also in both cases, the humbling of the leaders and the king prevents the destruction of Jerusalem.

12:13–16. Conclusion of Rehoboam's Reign. The Chronicler adds two sources not mentioned in Kings: "the records of the prophet Shemaiah and of the seer Iddo, recorded by genealogy" (v. 15). Rehoboam does not receive a favorable judgment: "He did evil, for he did not set his heart to seek the LORD" (v. 14). "To set one's heart to seek the LORD" will become an essential component of the Chronicler's definition of faithfulness. Not to do so leads one to sin.

C. Abijah, Son of Rehoboam (13:1–14:1 // 1 Kgs 15:1–2; 6–8)

The sermon of Abijah in vv. 4–12 is a literary form (sometimes called "levitical sermons") important in Chronicles. The theological message is clear: the northern kingdom has not only rebelled against the Davidic dynasty but against God himself. In vv. 13–21, Chronicles departs from the narrative in Kings to tell the story of the victory of Judah against Israel. Israel has a larger army, but regardless of their numbers or Jeroboam's military strategy, they are no match for God's chosen dynasty. Judah triumphs "because they relied on the LORD, the God of their ancestors" (v.18). Further on, the Chronicles makes clear that it is God himself who strikes Jeroboam, causing his death. Verse 22 cites another extrabiblical document, "the story of the prophet Iddo," as a source of his narrative.

D. Asa, Son of Abijah (14:2–16:14 // 1 Kgs 15:1–24)

14:2–15. Shalom and Foreign Intervention. Asa enjoyed ten years of peace. He acted as Davidic kings should (v. 2). Asa "took away the foreign altars and the high places, broke down the pillars, hewed down the sacred poles"(v. 3) and also kept the laws and commandments. The blessings are manifested in a period of peace and in the success of his building program. According to the Chronicler, prosperity is a direct consequence of being faithful. God's peace is challenged by a foreign invasion (vv. 9–15). An Egyptian army attacks Judah and Asa brings his troops to face an enemy much more numerous and powerful. But Judah is not alone. Asa cries to the Lord and the Lord acts, defeating the Ethiopians (who originated like Egyptians in North Africa and are known as Cushites).

15:1–7. Oracle of Azariah, Son of Oded. The spirit of God commands his prophet to address the king. The speech is another example of the theology of the Chronicler and has also been characterized as a Levitical sermon. In it, the Chronicler promises peace, prosperity, and blessings to those who seek the Lord (vv 3–6, cf. Hos 3:4).

15:8–19. Reforms and Covenant. Asa reacts immediately to the prophet's demands. He receives the support of all the people of Judah, Benjamin, and the refugees that fled the northern kingdom of Israel and who remained faithful to God. The reforms conclude with a covenant renewal, where the people "with all their heart and with all their soul" commit to the Lord. As a consequence, God gives them rest and peace. King Asa even decides to remove his mother, Maacah, as the queen mother because of her devotion of Asherah, although she is not put to death, as the oath of the people in 15:13 would have implied. The Chronicler states that Asa was not completely effective in removing all the high places of worship (in clear contradiction with 14:3), but he is described by the Chronicler as a king with a true heart.

16:1–14. War and Prophetic Reprehension. Asa cannot counteract Israel's strategic fortification of Ramah, a city in the territory of Benjamin (4.3 miles N. of Jerusalem), and has to resort to an alliance with the King of Aram, Ben-hadad, who resided in Damascus, to prevent its completion. Hence, he took "silver and gold from the treasures of the house of the LORD and the king's house" (v. 2) and sent them to Ben-hadad. The alliance produced the expected results. After Ben-hadad attacked the northern kingdom, Asa was able to take the fortification materials from Ramah to fortify Geba and Mizpah, two other cities in the territory of Benjamin. The story in Kings does not pass judgement on Asa's actions, but the Chronicler was very critical of this foreign alliance. The prophet Hanani came to Asa (vv. 7–10) and expressed God's condemnation of Asa's lack of trust in the God of Israel. The theology of the Chronicler demands that kings should put their trust only in God. Asa's reaction was very different from his reaction to the oracle of the prophet Azariah (15:1–7); instead of obeying, he became angry. Instead of returning to God, Asa throws Hanani in jail (v. 10). In the following verse the Chronicler comments that, at the same time, Asa oppressed some of the people of Judah. A king that leaves God cannot act justly with the people or his prophets. When Asa became sick, he failed again to look for God's assistance (cf. Exod 15:26). Of course, nothing good can come from this act of disloyalty to the Lord. Asa did not recover and died.

E. Jehoshaphat, Son of Asa (17:1–21:1 // 1 Kgs 15:24b; 22:1–36, 41–50a)

17:1–19. A Faithful King. Jehoshaphat is one the favorite kings of the Chronicler (along with Josiah and Hezekiah). The ongoing hostilities between the northern and southern kingdoms led Jehoshaphat to fortify cities and to establish garrisons and outposts to prevent Israel from invading Judah. In this unstable situation, he showed his faithfulness to God by rejecting Baal (v. 3) and trusting God. The Chronicler will make clear that the earlier ways of Asa were right and the final one wrong (v. 3). Jehoshaphat's loyalty to God will bring him prosperity and security. The mention of "great riches and honor" is similar to the Chronicler's rendering of the reigns of David and Solomon (cf. 1 Chr 29:28; 2 Chr 1:12). His educational efforts offer a concrete example of Jehoshaphat's faithfulness. He sends officials, Levites, and priests to teach God's law in the cities of Judah. This "mission" is, however, peculiar since teaching God's law was a prerogative of the priests (Jer 18:18; Ezek 7:26; Lev 10:11). The exact nature of the "book of the law" that the group carries with them is uncertain. The existence of such a book is assumed in Deuteronomistic texts (Deut 28:61; Josh 1:8; 2 Kgs 14:5). As a result of Jehoshaphat's faithfulness, God imposes fear on the surrounding countries, which not only will refrain from attacking Judah, but will bring Jehoshaphat tribute, increasing his wealth.

18:1–19:3. Impious Alliance. This section describes an alliance between Judah and the northern kingdom, designed to attack the Aramaean enclave of Ramoth-gilead. "Jehoshaphat had great riches and honor" (v.1) and did not need to enter into an alliance with Ahab, king of the unfaithful northern kingdom. He is, however, "incited" to do it (NRSV, "induced"), which in the Bible always has a negative connotation and outcome, by Ahab. In the midst of optimistic oracles of victory and triumph, Jehoshaphat wants to hear what Micaiah son of Imlah has to say, a prophet whom Ahab dislikes because he always prophesies disasters. Micaiah reluctantly declares the word of God: disaster will indeed be the outcome of the battle (v. 16). The parallel text in Kings reports that during the battle, Jehoshaphat, surrounded by the enemy, cried to his soldiers for help (1 Kgs 22:32); in Chronicles, he asks God for help and is rescued (v. 31). Ahab is wounded and does not outlive the day. He dies at sunset (v. 34). Jehoshaphat returns to Jerusalem only to be reprehended by the seer Jehu, son of Hanani (19:2).

19:4–11. Judicial Reform. Jehoshaphat continues his reforms by traveling around the country to bring the people back to the Lord and by appointing judges that would "judge not on behalf of human beings but on the LORD's behalf" (v. 6). A final appeals court is set up in Jerusalem, presided over by Amariah, the chief priest for religious matters, and by Zebadiah, son of Ishmael, for civil matters (v. 11).

20:1–21:1. War and Final Disappointment. The Chronicler reformulates the story in Kings to focus on God's reward for Jehoshaphat's piety. The description of the invasion by Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites (cf. 2 Chr 26:7) fits well with the narrative of 2 Kgs 1:1; 3:5 and the Mesha inscription. As is usual in Chronicles, the author highlights the religious elements, leaving aside the political or economic aspects of the conflict. The Chronicler reports that Jehoshaphat's reaction to the invasion was religious: "he set himself to seek the LORD, and proclaimed a fast throughout all Judah" (v. 3).

The Levite Jahaziel, son of Zechariah, proclaims an oracle of salvation: "Do not fear or be dismayed; tomorrow go out against them, and the Lord will be with you" (v. 17; cf. Exod 14:13–14; 1 Sam 17:47). In the final section the Chronicler reports again about the destiny of any alliance with the unfaithful: Jehoshaphat of Judah accepts a partnership with Ahaziah of Israel to build a fleet. As expected, the ships were wrecked and were not able to reach their destination.

F. Jehoram, Son of Jehoshaphat (21:2–22:1 // 1 Kgs 22:50b; 2 Kgs 8:17–24)

Jehoram marries a daughter of Ahab and falls to her idolatrous practices. He systematically kills every other possible candidate to the throne. The bad behavior of the king naturally brings political calamities and Jehoram is unable to maintain control over his dominion: the Edomites achieve liberation from the Judahite yoke (vv. 8–11). The Chronicler includes in this section a letter from the prophet Elijah (vv.12–15), which is absent in the parallel story in Kings. The letter reflects very clearly the Chronicler's theology of immediate retribution. In vv. 12b–13, Jehoram's sins are enumerated, and in vv. 13–15 the prophet foretells the consequence of his behavior. Verses 16–20 fulfill the prophecy: Jehoram dies a painful death.

G. Ahaziah, Son of Jehoram (22:2–9 // 2 Kgs 8:25–10:14)

The youngest son of Jehoram is made king by the people. All of his older brothers had perished. Several kings appear in the Bible as being put in office by the people (Joash, Uzziah, Josiah, and Jehoahaz, 2 Kgs 11:12–20; 14:21; 21:24; 23:30 // 2 Chr 23:1ff; 26:1; 33:24; 36:1). The Chronicler adds to the story in 2 Kings that it was his mother and bad counselors who led him astray (vv. 3–4). Ahaziah's death story is altered by the Chronicler to reflect his pernicious alliance with the northern kingdom. His father's piety, however, prevents him from the ultimate dishonor and his body is properly buried.

H. Athaliah, Mother of Ahaziah (22:10–23:21 // 2 Kgs 11:1–20)

In this section, the Chronicler follows with only minimal variations the parallel story in Kings. Details surrounding the foreign character of the troops brought to the house of the Lord (2 Kgs 11:4) are omitted because they do not suit the theology of the Chronicler. Joash is made king and Athaliah is sentenced to death by the priest Jehoiada, who led a religious reform to return to traditional Yahwism.

I. Joash, Son of Ahaziah (24:1–27 // 2 Kgs 11:21–12:21)

Joash's reign is clearly demarcated by the life and death of Jehoiada the priest. While Jehoiada was alive, Joash acted faithfully (v. 2). After Jehoiada dies, the king abandons the beliefs of his advisor and faces the disastrous consequences of such defiance. During his faithful period, the king restores the Temple (the Chronicler highlights the role of the Levites in this task), but after the death of Jehoiada, the king and the nobles reject the faithful priest's reforms and even kill Jehoiada's son, the prophet Zechariah. His last wish "May the LORD see and avenge!" (v. 22) will be fulfilled. Verses 23–27 provide additional information to the story about Joash in Kings: the army of Aram attacks Judah and Jerusalem "with few men" (v. 24), but they achieve a decisive victory because God had abandoned Joash. He is wounded in battle and killed in his bed by his own servants.

J. Amaziah, Son of Joash (25:1–26:2 // 2 Kgs 14:1–17)

25:1–16. First Years and the Campaign Against Edom. The reign of Amaziah follows a similar pattern to the reign of Joash. There is a period of faithfulness and prosperity when the king listens to God's prophet and follows his advice (vv. 1–13), followed by unfaithfulness and disaster when the king disregards the message of the prophet (vv. 14–24). His first action is to take revenge for his father's death, killing those responsible but not their children (cf. Deut 24:16; Jer 31:29–30; Ezek 18:20). The Chronicler expands the only verse in Kings about the campaign against Edom. There is a census before the campaign (cf. 1 Chr 21; 2 Chr 14:8; 2 Chr 17:14–19), and the king also hires mercenaries from the northern kingdom, but a prophet prevents them from participating in the battle. God was not with Israel. Still, if the people of the northern kingdom return to God with all their hearts, God will return to them (cf. 2 Chr 15:2). The victory is not the result of human efforts but the direct consequence of relying on God. God fights for his people. Paradoxically it is the booty that Amaziah brings with him that causes his future downfall. He takes the Edomite gods and, as might be expected, worships them. A prophet rebukes the king but is threatened. Amaziah's destiny is sealed.

25:17–28. War Against Joash, King of Israel. The theology of the Chronicler is evident here again in the differences from the story in Kings. The announcement of the prophet of God to Amaziah will be fulfilled (v. 20) and the king will face a terrible defeat, followed by the plundering of the royal residence and the Temple.

K. Uzziah, Son of Amaziah (26:3–23 // 2 Kgs 14:21–15:4)

Two different periods marked again by the king's faithfulness (vv. 3–15) and unfaithfulness to God (vv. 16–23) also characterize the reign of Uzziah. In his youth, the king follows the good counsel of Zechariah, "who instructed him in the fear of God" (v. 5) and "as long as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper." But arrogance leads again to transgression and the king encroaches upon the privileges of the priests to make the offerings (v. 18). The story in Kings does not explain why Uzziah became leprous. For the Chronicler it is clear; God struck him (v. 20). Before falling in disgrace Uzziah had led successful military campaigns against the Philistines, Arabs, and Meunites and took tribute from the Ammonites. His building projects helped improve the defense system of the city of Jerusalem and supported agriculture "for he loved the soil" (v. 10). His last days were spent in isolation due to his illness; his son Jotham exercised authority until Uzziah died. The sequence of faithfulness, prosperity, arrogance, and disgrace is apparent here once more.

L. Jotham, Son of Uzziah (27:1–9 // 2 Kgs 15:33–38)

His father's leprosy was a living example for Jotham of the consequences of violating the sanctuary's holiness. He continued to reinforce the defensive fortifications in Judah. Verses 3b–6 are additions of the Chronicler to his canonical source; his triumphs in battle and the tribute he received were the result of his faithfulness because "he ordered his ways before the LORD" (v. 6).

M. Ahaz, Son of Jotham. (28:1–27 // 2 Kgs 16:1–12)

Chronicles' portrays Ahaz quite negatively. While in Kings one finds the expression "the LORD his God" (2 Kgs 16:2), the Chronicler omits "his God," emphasizing the distance between this king and God.

The most important event during his life was the Syro-Ephraimite war (cf. 2 Kgs 15:27; 16:5; Isa 7:1–17; Hos 5:8–15). The result of this war that exemplifies Ahaz's unfaithfulness differs considerably in Chronicles from the text in Kings. Jerusalem does not fall in Kings; it does in Chronicles, and booty and captives are taken away from the sacred city. The captives taken by the northern kingdom will return, however, due to the intervention of the prophet Oded. The prophet points out that despite the constant strife between the northern and southern kingdoms, they are still one people. God shows his displeasure with both Judah and Israel, but denounces the northern kingdom as having been repeatedly guilty of unfaithfulness (28:13b).

The war leaves Judah vulnerable, whereupon the Edomites and the Philistines take advantage of the situation. Ahaz should have asked the Lord for help, but against Isaiah's advice (Isa 7), he asks the king of Assyria for help (v. 16). Help comes but at a heavy price. Ahaz is forced to accept Assyrian hegemony. The Temple of God is shut down and the Baals are worshiped. It is possible that Ahaz even used the Temple to worship pagan deities (cf. 2 Kgs 16), but the Chronicler omits that possibility in order to preserve the sanctity of the Temple. According to the Chronicler, Ahaz's burial outside of the royal burial ground, separated from his ancestors, will be his punishment (cf. 2 Kgs 16:20).

N. Hezekiah, Son of Ahaz (29:1–32:33 // 2 Kgs 18:1–6; 13–17; 19:14–19, 35–37; 20:1–3, 12–21 // Isa 36:1–22; 37:14–20, 36–38; 38:1–3; 39:1–8)

29:1–36. Purification of the Temple. The restoration of the Temple and the renovation of the covenant (v. 10) are the first steps in a religious reform. Hezekiah's speech offers another good example of the Chronicler's theology. The sin of the ancestors has brought God's ire upon the people, but reconciliation is possible and Hezekiah will become an agent of divine reconciliation. The sacrifices for the re-dedication of the Temple follow the instructions of Lev 17:6 and Num 18:17; offerings and burnt offerings (cf. Lev 1) and sacrifices of peace (cf. Lev 7:11) follow.

30:1–27. Passover Celebration. From a private family celebration (Exod 12:1–2), the now Passover becomes a public festival. It also offers the occasion to call the northern kingdom to return to God (v. 6). The Passover will be celebrated by all the people at the Temple. Letters are sent to all Israel emphasizing the religious unity of the people. The invitation, however, is not to celebrate the Passover meal, but to return to the Lord (vv. 6, 9). The holy city is cleansed from shrines for Baal and the Levites offer sacrifices for the people. The arrival of ritually impure refugees from the northern kingdom presents a theological challenge that the Chronicler resolves by inserting Hezekiah's prayer, asking God to pardon those people. This prayer contains an important theological innovation, placing internal intent ahead of external purity.

31:1–21. Religious Reforms. After the purification of the Temple and the celebration of the Passover, Hezekiah reorganizes the Levites and priests to serve in the Temple and provides the logistical support for the regular Temple sacrifices and worship activities. The just king is able to achieve all of this because he sought God with all his heart (v. 21).

32:1–33. Assyrian Invasion and Death of Hezekiah. Sennacherib reigned in Assyria from 721–681 BCE. His Palestinian campaign aims, among other things, at punishing disloyal vassals. The story in Chronicles presents differences from the story in Kings: it adds a description of the defense system prepared by Hezekiah; omits the alliance with Egypt (an act for which previous kings have been punished); and omits the pay of tribute to Assyria. These omissions are meant to uphold the image of Hezekiah as a just king. Hezekiah dies full of honor and respected by all the people (v. 33).

O. Manasseh, Son of Hezekiah (33:1–20) and Amon, Son of Manasseh (33:21–25)

Manasseh becomes king when he is only twelve years old, and the first part of his long reign of fifty-five years is portrayed by the Chronicler as a systematic program to overturn the religious reforms of his father Hezekiah. God speaks to Manasseh and his people, but they reject the word of God. Immediate retribution follows and Manasseh is taken captive by the Assyrians. When he prays to God (v. 12), God hears his prayer and restores him (something not mentioned in Kings). The Chronicler demonstrates that God hears the prayers of the humble (cf 2 Chr 6). After Manasseh turns back to God, he begins a building program to repair the walls of Jerusalem (v. 14; cf. 1 Chr 11:8; 2 Chr 26:9; 27:3–4), reorganizes the army in Judaeen cities (cf 2 Chr 11:5–12; 14:6; 17:12–19), and restores the Yahwistic faith. All of these actions are those appropriate for a just king. The summary of Manasseh's reign reflects the two aspects of his behavior: his apostasy and his repentance. The brief reign of Amon (vv. 21–25) follows closely the description of Kings (2 Kgs 21:21–22), adding that Amon never repented (v. 23). He is portrayed as an evil king whose death at the hands of his servants seems just the natural consequence of his impiety.

P. Josiah (34:1–36:1 // 2 Kgs 22:1–23:30 // 1 Esd 1:1–33)

Josiah (together with David, Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, and Hezekiah) belongs to a select group of kings favored by the Chronicler. He becomes king at a very young age, which suggests that most of his policies were dictated by the group who brought him to power, the "people of the land."

34:1–7. Introduction. The Chronicler reinforces the positive evaluation of Josiah found in Kings (2 Kgs 22:1–2) by adding information about his early piety. Josiah sought God since he was sixteen years old, and at twenty he led the persecution and execution of priests of Baal (v. 5).

34:8–33. The Book of the Law. In Chronicles, the discovery of the book of the law is the consequence of a program of religious reform already in place, whereas in Kings the book of the law triggers Josiah's reform. In this way, the Chronicler does not base Josiah's reform on a fortuitous finding, but as the consequence of the king's fidelity to God. The precise content and extension of the book found by the priest Hilkiah (v. 14) is a matter of debate, but it almost certainly contained material found in Deuteronomy. Josiah's reform seems to have been patterned according to the regulations of Deut 12 (cf. 2 Chr 34:24; Deut 27:9–26; 28:15–68); the celebration of the Passover follows the regulations of Deut 16 (cf. 2 Chr 34:22–28; Deut 18:9–22). The book makes Josiah aware of how unfaithful his father has been. His sense that God's punishment is on the horizon is confirmed by the prophet Hulda (v. 24). The imminence of the punishment does not prevent the renewal of the covenant. The book of the law then becomes the book of the covenant (v. 30). The narrative closely follows the story in Kings, but prophets become Levites in Chronicles (v. 30, cf. 2 Kgs 23:2) in harmony with the Chronicler's attribution of prophetic ministry to the Levites (cf. 1 Chr 25:1; 2 Chr 20:14; 29:30).

35:1–19. Passover Celebration. The text presents a more elaborate version than the brief narrative in Kings (2 Kgs 21:21–23), emphasizing liturgic details and the participation of the Levites. The Passover celebration is the climax of Josiah's reign. It takes place in Jerusalem, following the precedent established by Hezekiah. The Chronicler considers this celebration a return to the faithful days of Samuel.

35:20–27. Last Days of Josiah. Paradoxically, the faithful king (2 Chr 34:27; 35:6, 12) finds a tragic death for not heeding the word of God conveyed to him by Pharaoh. Instead of retreating from battle, Josiah rides to his death. The Chronicler follows a pattern similar to the one used to describe the death of Ahaz: both kings try to disguise themselves (v. 22; cf. 2 Kgs 18:19), both die as consequence of an arrow wound (v 23; cf. 2 Kgs 18:33); both are taken away in a chariot (v. 24; cf 2 Kgs 18:34).

Q. Final Kings of Judah: Jehoahaz (36:2–4); Eliakim–Jehoiakim, Brother of Jehoahaz (36:5–8); Jechoiachin, Son of Eliakim–Jehoiakin (36:9–10); Zedekiah brother of Jehoiachin (36:11–13 // 2 Kgs 23:30–35 // 1 Esd 1:34–38; 2 Kgs 23:36–24:7 // 1 Esd 1:39–42; 2 Kgs 24:8–17 // 1 Esd 1:43–46; 2 Kgs 24:18–25:21 // 1 Esd 1:46b–58)

Babylon assumed control of the Middle East after the fall of the Assyrian Empire in 610 BCE. After they defeat the Egyptian army in 605 BCE, there was no one who could oppose their might. The city of Jerusalem was captured on March of 597 BCE and the elite deported to Babylon. In July 587, after a short-lived rebellion, the Babylonians destroyed the city and the Temple and took thousands as exiles to Babylon.

36:1–4. Jehoahaz. The death of Josiah leaves the "people of the land" in power again. They skip the firstborn Eliakim and set Jehoahaz on the throne. Pharaoh Neco intervenes, deposing and deporting him to Egypt. Neco declares Eliakim the new king, changing his name to Jehoiakim.

36:5–8. Eliakim–Jehoiakim. Jehoiakim will reign eleven years, but the destiny of Judah has already been decided. Their alliance with Egypt makes them an enemy of Babylon, and Egypt is no match for the powerful Babylonians. According to Kings, Jehoiakim dies in Jerusalem, but in Chronicles he is taken captive to Babylon.

36:9–10. Jechoiachin, Son of Eliakim–Jehoiakin. Jehoiachin seemed to have been a precocious rebel, as the Chronicler reports that already at the age of eight he began to do what was bad in the eyes of the Lord. Immediate retribution followed, and within a year he was taken captive to Babylon together with the rest of the vessels of the Temple.

36:11–13. Zedekiah, Brother of Jehoiachin. Zedekiah was supposed to rule under Babylonian supervision, but the urge to rebel was growing among the elite and the people. After eleven years, Zedekiah rejected Jeremiah's message and rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. The consequences were tragic; in July 587, Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed.

R. Deportation and Cyrus' Edict (36:14–23 // Ezra 1:1–3)

The last verses in Chronicles fulfill Jeremiah's words of hope (Jer 25:11–12; 29:10). The exile comes to an end and the people return to the land. God has kept his promise.

OVERVIEW

In many manuscripts of the LXX and in the Masoretic tradition, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah comprise a single book. Although the Vulgate and some of the early church fathers separate it into two distinct works, this book was likely composed as a unity and should be appreciated as such.

The book of Ezra–Nehemiah recounts the Judean reconstruction during Persian rule (539– 430 BCE), after the devastation wrought by the Babylonians (586 BCE). It may be divided into three general sections: Whereas the first one (Ezra 1–6) relates primarily to a construction project (the Temple) and the second one (Ezra 7–10) to reforms for the community, the third (Neh 1–13) integrates the two themes by addressing a construction project and internal reforms.

Within these sections, there is room for a wide range of subjects. Yet they all relate to the fundamental question of Judah's identity—which institutions stand at its center and which practices demarcate its boundaries. It is the question, not the answers to it, that unifies the work. Yet the authors have also created a sophisticated narrative that aligns the physical with the spiritual: The building of Jerusalem's Temple and the municipal Wall runs hand-in-hand with the construction of the Judean community as whole. ("Wall" is capitalized since it represents in Ezra–Nehemiah the pendant to Temple and includes much more than Jerusalem's physical ramparts.)

Within the corpus of biblical literature, Ezra– Nehemiah is distinctive in its citation of many sources. The genre of these sources include lists (Ezra 2; Neh 3; 7; 11–12), official correspondence and edicts written in Aramaic (Ezra 4–6, 7), and first- person memoirs (Ezra 7–9; Neh 1–7, 13). The sources have been subjected to heavy criticism with respect to their authenticity, and this criticism has provoked interest in the book as a work of literature. Ezra–Nehemiah reflects a new form of historiography, which may be influenced by Greek forms of history-writing. It also testifies to the growing importance of texts as sources of authority in a new post-monarchic age. Even the Persian kings first consult their records before making an imperial decision. They then supplement earlier decrees with new edicts (=commentaries). In this way, they model a hermeneutical method of survival for the Judeans themselves, who find their way by searching in their own texts.

As for the problems the sources pose for historians, one should not confuse authenticity with historical worth. That the Persian letters and decrees in Ezra 1–7 may stem in large part from Judean hands should neither dismay the biblical reader nor lead to a wholesale dismissal of the book. Rather, it should foster a greater appreciation for the ideals of the book expressed through the writings of foreign kings and Judean heroes.

The completion of Ezra–Nehemiah is usually dated to the late Persian period (end of the fourth century BCE). The Artaxerxes mentioned in Ezra 7–8 and Neh 2 is most likely Artaxerxes (d. 424 BCE). The identity of the Darius in Neh 12:22 is difficult to determine, but he may be Darius III (336–330 BCE). Aside from these datable rulers, a handful of evidence suggests that the composition of the book (esp. the final chs. in Neh 8–12) continued in the early Hellenistic period, if not even in the times of the Maccabees. If so, the combination of Torah piety and a well-fortified Jerusalem in Neh 1–13 would have provided an important model for polities at this time. Furthermore, the book depicts an ideal history of relations between Judah and a foreign empire, from its inception (Ezra 1:1) until its end (Neh 12:22). This scope likely presupposes the fall of that empire and the need to reflect on past history in the face of succeeding empires.

The title of the book commemorates two figures who differ starkly from each other in their (portrayed) personality and approach to problems. Much contemporary homiletic literature devotes a great deal of attention to this contrast, using Ezra and Nehemiah as leadership case studies. Such use of these figures is by no means unprecedented; it can be traced throughout the book's long reception history and probably informed the composition of the book itself.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. First Movement: Rebuilding Altar and Temple (1:1–6:22)

The first six chapters of Ezra treat the construction of the altar and Temple, and the problems encountered during the course of the project. In explaining the delay of the construction (from the reign of Cyrus to Darius), this section also serves as a kind of historical reflection on prophets, especially Haggai and Second Isaiah (see especially 5:1–2).

The section has its own distinctive character and themes. Especially prominent is the motif of seeking-and-finding in texts. Indeed, the narrative is governed by the fate of Cyrus's decree: Readers are introduced to it at the outset (ch. 1). Yet in the course of time, this document gets lost in the imperial bureaucracy and archives, which results in a lengthy delay of the project (chs. 4–5). When the decree is finally found again (6:1–2), the Judeans can finally complete the project. Rather than mere narrative conceit, this motif of seeking-and-finding expresses a fundamental message of the book: the potential as well as the perils inherent in textual authority.

A. The Cyrus Edict (1:1–4)

Because EN seems to represent one book, some commentators read this paragraph as an introduction to the entire work. The "house of the LORD" represents accordingly the city or community rather than just the Temple. However, the book lacks a grand conclusion and thus perhaps one should not expect an introduction to the whole.

The deity is said to "stir up the spirit" of Cyrus. In Hag 1:14 the same expression refers solely to local Judeans who build in the time of Darius. The author of our passage seems to have transferred the inspirational moment to an earlier point and to a foreign king (see, however, v. 5), constructing thereby a much different historical account from that in Haggai (and Zechariah). The notice that the decree was "also in writing" is important for the subsequent narrative (see esp. 6:1–2).

The decree responds to any doubt as to where this House should be built. The likely reason for the stress on location is the existence of communities who considered themselves equally to be "the people of Yahweh" (v. 3) yet built temples in other locations (e.g., Samaria). Cyrus's words implicitly proscribe these competing temples. If a group really belonged to Yahweh's people and heeded imperial (as well as divine) orders, it would contribute solely to the building project in Jerusalem.

The decree may be based in some way on a historical edict. The Persian rulers followed a long established tradition of reversing earlier policies in order to gain the loyalty of their subject peoples. However, the formulation of these verses betrays a Judean theological perspective that the historical Cyrus would have considered heretical, and it differs from the quotation of the decree in 6:3–5 (see also 5:13–15). By allowing Cyrus to proclaim that Yahweh granted him all the kingdoms of the earth (v. 2) and charged him to build his house in Jerusalem (temple construction often followed conquest in ancient Near Eastern royal ideology), the author introduces a central message of the book: The role of native Judean kings has been assumed by foreign imperial rulers. The continuity between native and foreign kingship is underscored by the use of vv. 1–3a in 2 Chr 36:22–23.

B. Return of Yahweh's People and Vessels (1:5–11)

The people of Yahweh (v. 3) who heeded the response are solely the former inhabitants of Judah and Benjamin (v. 5). The remaining verses present the return of this people in a direct relationship to the return of the vessels (see esp. v. 11b), which are mentioned throughout the book (5:14–15; 6:5; 7:19; 8:25–33; Neh 10:39[40]; 13:5, 9). The cultic vessels represent the essential continuity between the First and Second Temples inasmuch as they are the same items that Nebuchadnezzar had despoiled from the First Temple (v. 7). (Despoliation of cultic inventory was widely practiced in the ancient world; cf. especially 1 Sam 4–7; 2 Sam 5:21; and—with respect specifically to the vessels/people—Jer 27–28.) The identity of Sheshbazzar (Zerubbabel?) is a mystery. Here he is called the prince of Judah, while according to 5:14–16 he was appointed governor by Cyrus and later laid the Temple foundation (cf. however 3:8–10).

C. The Plurality and Boundaries of the Community (2:1–70)

This chapter consists primarily of a list of names and numbers of Judeans who could trace their roots back to exilic origins. The list is interrupted by a reference to groups who could not prove their genealogies (2:59–62). This attention to ethnic continuity echoes the emphasis on cultic continuity in 1:7–11 (compare Nebuchadnezzar's actions in 2:1 with 1:7). For a community in the midst of upheaval and struggling to negotiate its survival in a new imperial, multicultural environment, such concern with identity and tradition is to be expected. In the absence of clearly demarcated political borders and a native Judean army to defend those borders, the community notably turns to texts (=written tradition), such as genealogies and registers, imperial edicts, and the Torah—the text par excellence (see, e.g., 3:2, 4). By means of these texts and sophisticated methods of interpretation, the community not only demarcates their social, ethnic, and religious boundaries but also determines how they should proceed into an unprecedented future.

The list probably represents an ideal vision of Judah. For the narrative, it serves various purposes: It fills the gap between chs. 1 and 3, and may be compared to the voyage accounts in the subsequent two movements (from Mesopotamia to Judah: Ezra 8 and Neh 2). By the end of the chapter, the author can report that the Judeans (identified with "all Israel"!) were now residing in their cities (v. 70). As a hybrid between clan and territorial register, it also functions as a map of Judah in compendium form. Finally, the list serves, as in Neh 7, to express the plurality of the community and to replace the otherwise anonymous, general designations (such as "people of Judah") with actual names.

The central role played by the kings of Judah and Israel at an earlier time is now filled by numerous names of clans and families, who are guided by a lay leader (Zerubbabel) and a priest (Jeshua). In this respect, the community's leadership may be compared to that of pre-monarchic Israel as depicted in Exodus–Joshua. Moreover, whereas earlier only the king contributed to the building of the Temple (1 Kgs 5–7; 1 Chr 22; 2 Chr 2–4), now the people themselves assume this responsibility (vv. 68–69), as the exodus generation did with respect to the tabernacle (Exod 35–36).

D. Building the Altar (3:1–7)

This passage, which seems to have been created as a preface to 3:8–13, tells of the construction of the altar. By virtue of this passage, the book presents concentric spheres of sacrality, each marked by the verb "to build": altar, the House of God, and the Wall of Jerusalem. The narrative will progressively refocus attention from the center (altar and priesthood) to the periphery (the Wall and entire community).

If the altar was built already in the seventh month, the community had little time to make the voyage back and settle in their new homes. Yet it is important to re-inaugurate the festival calendar on the first day of the year (3:6). The community also works quickly because of "the terror of the peoples of the lands"¹ (3:3), who later attempt to disrupt their progress (4:1–5:5). It then takes measures to prepare for the second phase of construction (3:6b–7, compare 1 Chr 22:2, 4, 15; 2 Chr 2:15–16 as well as the prophecy in Isa 60:13). These measures once again involve private donations "in keeping with authorization from Cyrus" (3:7). The latter point is noticeably absent in 1:1–4 (but cf. 6:4). Its inclusion here further illustrates not only the imperial support for the project but also the community's strict adherence to imperial orders. It may be compared to the emphasis on adherence to the Torah (3:2, 4, 5). The community is ultimately governed by two texts: the Torah and the Cyrus edict.

E. Construction of the Temple (3:8–6:22)

Up until this point the narrative has treated important preliminary matters relating to preparations for the building of the Temple, which are dated to the first year of Cyrus. Beginning in 3:8, which is dated to the second year, the account will now focus on the construction of the Temple and reasons why its completion was delayed until the reign of Darius.

3:8–13. Laying a Foundation. The second phase of building involves the appointment of Levites to oversee the rest of the construction of "the House of Yahweh," the laying of the foundation of the sanctuary proper (hekhal), and a festive "groundbreaking" ceremony. That this event is dated to the second month (of the second year) should be read in connection with 2 Chr 3:2 relating to the work on the First Temple. Here again the text stresses historical continuity in this fledgling community (see also the reference to David in v. 10).

The antiphonal musical celebration is led by the priests and Levites (v. 10) and consists of two types of song: praise (hallel) and thanksgiving (hodot). The quoted psalm (v. 11) appears often in the book of Chronicles in relation to the First Temple (1 Chr 16:3; 2 Chr 5:13; 7:3). Its popularity in the post-exilic period is likely related to its affirmation of Yahweh as the source of the community's connection to a prior glorious period of Israel's history. The narrator notes that the community was moved to praise, while some of the elderly wept at the sight. The notice may be responding to the same reaction that the prophet Haggai addresses (Hag 2:3). If so, it declares that the disappointment Haggai observed was counterbalanced by joy.

4:1–5. Interruptions to the Building Project. The concluding statement in ch. 3—that the sound of the celebration was heard far away (3:13)—leads directly to ch. 4, which begins with the enemies of Judah and Benjamin hearing about the construction project. These enemies identify themselves as non-natives who began sacrificing to "your God" after they had been settled in their land by the Assyrians (4:2). Their petition to join the project is briskly rebuffed by the leaders of the community. The reason offered is strikingly similar to that of Nehemiah in Neh 2:20. Yet in contrast to Nehemiah's response, Zerubbabel et al. can refer to a decree from Cyrus, which is addressed solely to the people of Yahweh (1:3). Although these "enemies" seek Yahweh and sacrifice to Yahweh, the authors do not consider them to be the people of Yahweh (see however 6:21). Spurned, the enemies adopt various machinations to disrupt the project, which include both scare tactics and bribing officials in the imperial bureaucracy. That this harassment continues from the reign of Cyrus to the reign of Darius (4:5) reflects the historical likelihood that the construction of the Temple commenced in the reign of Darius rather than the reign of Cyrus (see Hag 1).

4:6–24. Seeking-and-Finding in the Imperial Archives, Part I. After referring to two letters (4:6–7), the narrator cites the correspondence between Artaxerxes and two of his officials in the West, Rehum and Shimshai (4:8–23; the language switches here to Aramaic). They write to the imperial court with accusations against the Judeans. Artaxerxes responds and commands the work be brought to a halt. The narrator then reports that the construction ceased until the second year of Darius (cf. 4:5). Thus, the narrative jumps ahead to the reign of Artaxerxes (d. 424 BCE) and then back to Darius (d. 486 BCE). These letters also refer to the work on the city walls rather than the Temple.

How can one explain these incongruities? First, the letters illustrate and provide concrete evidence for the claims made in 4:5–7. Second, the possibility that the decree could be reversed (4:21b) anticipates the permission this same king later grants Nehemiah. But before this happens, the narrator reports the completion (chs. 5–6) and beautification (chs. 7–8) of the Temple. In this way, the book illustrates how the imperial court favors the Temple, whereas the Wall project (initially) jeopardizes the success of the Restoration. Third, Artaxerxes seeks and finds in his records before making a decision (4:15, 19). His behavior provides a model for the Judeans, who can seek and find matters in their records (cf. 2:62; 7:10; Neh 7:5, 64; 8:14; 13:1) at a time when they no longer have a king of their own.

5:1–2. The Role of the Prophets. A new era begins with the prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, encouraging Zerubbabel and Jeshua to "rise and build" (5:1–2). Although the community thereby implicitly disobeys the orders of Artaxerxes (4:21), the authors can, in this way, harmonize the books of Haggai and Zechariah with the prophecy of Second Isaiah. The reader now knows that Haggai and Zechariah did indeed play an essential role in initiating the construction of the Temple. But the preface to this history provided in Ezra 1–4 shows how the prophecy in Second Isaiah pertaining to Cyrus and his declaration (e.g. Isa 44:28) was also fulfilled. This sophisticated exegesis resolves the tension between these books. However, in contrast to Hag 1, the authors of Ezra 1–6 present the work as merely resuming in the second year of Darius (instead of commencing) and the community being concerned with this project since the first year of Cyrus.

5:3–6:12. Seeking-and-Finding in the Imperial Archives, Part II. Like ch. 4, this section pivots on the king's activity of seeking-and-finding. This time, however, the king does not search in a book but rather in the imperial archives for a particular document: the Cyrus edict. Because it had been lost, enemies could interrupt the building project. The plot of Ezra 1–6 is thus propelled by the Cyrus edict—both its fate and its interpretation.

A brief narrative (5:3–5), consisting mainly of an excerpt from 5:8–10, prefaces the letters themselves (5:6–6:12). (For "the eye of their God," see Ps 33:18 and Job 36:7.) The letters closely resemble those in ch. 4 in both form and content, yet they present a scenario that is more historically tenable. Tattenai and Shetharbozenai do not accuse the Judeans (in contrast to Rehum and Shimshai; 4:11–16) but merely report about their inquiry. When asking the king to undertake a search, they also employ more polite language (cf. 5:17 with 4:15). Like Neh 1:1–4, the history recounted by the Judean elders (5:11–13) notably lacks any reference to a collective return, as told in Ezra 1–2. Sheshbazzar is the governor of the community (in contrast to 3:1–5:2, but see 1:7–11). Moreover, one hears nothing about opposition as in 3:1–5:5.

The sense of identity and history mirrored in the elders' response is noteworthy. They are the servants of the sovereign God ("the God of heaven and earth"). Surprisingly, they do not say anything about being Darius's servants. Yet they claim authorization from Cyrus, whose edict they link historically to the work of a great king of Israel (Solomon). What separates the two sides of history is destruction and exile—attributed emphatically to the Babylonian–Chaldean king—in direct response to their ancestors' act of angering the deity.

Darius's role as interpreter figures prominently in this passage. The Persian king presents a new reading of the Cyrus decree that focuses on the dimensions/location of the Temple as well as the return of the vessels. He also discovers that, according to Cyrus, the royal treasury should bear the costs of the building project (6:1–5; for kings sponsoring the Temple construction, see comments on 2:1–70). On the basis of what he finds in the text, he then acts, issuing a new decree that confirms and supplements what he found.

6:13–22. The Completion of First Phase of the Building Project. Once the new decree is issued by Darius, the House of God is finally completed after more than two decades. The agreement between the divine command and the imperial decrees is noteworthy (6:14). Moreover, this passage emphasizes, in contrast to the letters, the exilic origins of the community; they represent the twelve tribes of Israel (6:17). After describing the dedication, the narrator notes the celebration of Passover (and Mazzoth) a month later (6:19–22; now reverting to Hebrew). The returning exiles are joined in the festivities by those "who had separated themselves from the nations of the land to seek Yahweh . . ." (i.e., the non-exiled population or, as Rashi claims, proselytes). Reference to the Assyrian king (6:22) is anachronistic, but it agrees with the emphasis on all Israel (the Assyrians exiled the ten northern tribes/Israel).

II. Second Movement: Ezra, the Temple, and Community (Ezra 7:1–10:44)

Ezra 7 marks the beginning of the second movement. It is once again (cf. ch. 4) set within the reign of Artaxerxes. Yet it revolves around the person of Ezra, who represents an ideal figure of the new post-monarchic age. Chapters 7–8 recount his commission and voyage to Jerusalem; its focus is primarily the Temple. In contrast, chs. 9–10 shift abruptly to recount his approach to a communal crisis.

A. Ezra Is Sent to Jerusalem (7:1–8:36)

The preceding movement (chs. 1–6) presents the community building the Temple with the help of texts, in which they together with the Persian kings seek-and-find. This section now focuses attention on the activity itself of seeking-and-finding by portraying an individual who "had set his heart to seek the Torah of the LORD, and practice and teach Israel laws and commandments" (7:6, 10).

7:1–10. Introducing Ezra. The account begins with Ezra's priestly genealogy (7:1–5). The genealogy, however, is not complete; rather, it highlights the most prominent names connecting him to Aaron, "the first/ chief priest." Ezra's later partner, Nehemiah, identifies himself in his introductory prayer as a servant of Yahweh like Moses (Neh 1:5–11).

Second, the narrator, like the king (7:12), identifies Ezra as a proficient scribe of Torah (7:6, 10–11). Ezra's dual identity (priest-scribe) mirrors the book's ideals: birth supplemented by action/merit. His genealogy establishes his personal continuity to earlier generations that inhabited the land and, more specifically, his connection to the first priest in Israel's history. Yet the narrator also shows how Ezra complemented his inheritance by birth with meritorious performance in studying the Torah.

Third, in 7:9 the narrator expresses the beginning of the return in architectural terms (yesud hama'alah), which are employed elsewhere in the books for, respectively, the foundation and ascents/elevations in Jerusalem. Accordingly, Ezra's mission is presented as continuing the project of building the House of God.

7:11–26. The Artaxerxes Decree. Whether Artaxerxes' decree (in Aramaic) corresponds to an authentic imperial document is a matter of debate among scholars. Whatever the case may be, its presence in the book reiterates one of its primary emphases, viz., that the Persian court looked favorably upon the Temple, which served as the conduit of imperial benefaction to Judah. The heart of the decree (vv. 15–24) parallels the decrees in ch. 6 inasmuch as it prescribes donations for the Temple from the royal treasuries. Here, however, the king (and his court) also make "freewill offerings" (7:16; cf. 1:4; 2:68; 3:5); and he also exempts Temple officials from taxes (7:24). Artaxerxes' words leave no doubt that the king acts out of fear and respect for Ezra's God (see esp. 7:23). The framework of the decree grants Ezra permission to go up to Jerusalem with anyone who wishes to accompany him (7:13), to inquire (lit. "seek") in Judah according to the law/wisdom of God (7:14, 25), and to appoint a government to administer these laws, executing corporal punishment if necessary (7:25–26). It should be noted that chs. 9–10 do not depict Ezra either appointing judges or threatening corporal punishment.

7:27–8:36. Transporting the Vessels. After the decree is cited, the narrative moves seamlessly into a first-person account, which begins with Ezra's blessing (7:27–28a). The attention devoted to the Temple in the preceding decree underscores the continuity between Ezra's commission and the larger building project. The same is reaffirmed in Ezra's blessing: God is praised as the one who guides the heart of the foreign king to "glorify" the Temple.

The actual narrative begins in 7:28b, where Ezra tells his readers how he took immediate action to fulfill his commission. His first move is to assemble representative leaders. The account here continues in 8:15 after being interrupted by a list of clans that accompanied him from Babylon. This list consists of three individuals followed by twelve larger groups. (One may compare this constellation to the three patriarchs and twelve tribes, or three major and twelve minor prophets.) Based on the number of males (1,513), the whole congregation would have exceeded 5,000. Nevertheless, Ezra notices that the entire community was not represented: The Levites were absent, and hence he takes measures to remedy the situation (8:15–20). The passage resembles others in the book that highlight the importance of the Levites (see esp. Neh 13:10–14, 22).

Second, Ezra proclaims a fast during which the people petition their God for a safe journey (lit. "straight path"—cf. Isa 40:3) for themselves, their children, and their possessions (8:21–23). The fast replaces the imperial soldiers. After they had just expressed their unequivocal trust in God's providential care for those who seek him, Ezra says that he was ashamed to ask the king for a military escort "to aid" them (azar, a play on the name Ezra, lit. "[God is] aide"). This verse (8:22) accentuates the already implicit contrasts between Ezra and Nehemiah. Nehemiah's trip is much more about himself: He travels alone and is accompanied only by an entourage of imperial soldiers (Neh 2:9). In contrast, Ezra makes a concerted effort to bring a large and representative group.

Third, Ezra identifies twelve priests to carry the cultic vessels and offerings; both objects and their bearers are declared holy. Ezra's act and instructions to the group (8:24–30) have ritual, symbolic qualities communicating the significance of the move from Babylon to Jerusalem.

The rest of the chapter (8:31–36) recounts the voyage and arrival. The description of the journey is reported in very few words, emphasizing the deposition of the vessels in the Temple as well as the concluding sacrifices and the delivery of the king's edicts. The closing line expresses the happy ending and overriding theme of this first episode of the Ezra account: The Persian governors "supported (lit. "lifted up") the people and the House of God."

B. Ezra's Approach to a Communal Problem (9:1–10:44)

After the happy ending in 8:36, the narrative takes a sharp turn. Persian patronage for the Temple now becomes the backdrop (9:9) against which a communal crisis and Ezra's response are portrayed. These chapters have Nehemiah's memoir in view: What is only one of several abuses that Nehemiah confronts (Neh 13:23–30) is here presented as the fundamental problem facing the community—one of existential proportions (9:14). In this way, the authors of the book provide a preface to Nehemiah's work, whose Wall and reforms can now be read as a response to the problem Ezra faced. The book also invites its readers to compare and contrast Ezra's and Nehemiah's approaches.

9:1–15. Ezra's Own Account. The account is extremely precise in both the narrative order and word-choice. First, Ezra is confronted with a problem; he does not notice it himself (cf. Neh 13:23). Second, the problem itself is presented in historical terms: The Judeans (Israelites, priests, and Levites) have failed to separate themselves from the peoples of the lands, whose abominations resemble the land's prior inhabitants and neighbors (9:1). Third, the problem of non-separation expresses itself in the activity of intermarriage. The "holy race" (lit. "seed"; see Isa 6:13) becomes in this way "mixed up." The statement may be compared to Exod 19:6, in which the holiness that defines priests is applied to the whole nation; yet here the stress is not on the closeness of priests to the deity but rather the distance that holy priests must maintain from the profane. Fourth, the leaders are identified as especially culpable.

In his mourning behavior, Ezra manifests in his own body what is happening to the communal body. By rending his clothes and pulling out his hair, he performs his message. In the end, however, his dismay is beyond words and actions, and thus he sits the entire day in silence (cf. Job 2:12–13). The silence adds gravity to the moment he speaks, so that his words provoke collective action. But he does not address the community directly; rather he turns to his God in prayer. The contrast to Nehemiah's approach is pronounced (Neh 13:25–27).

Ezra's prayer is not concerned with purity of race but rather with issues that govern the book's account of post-exilic history: separation, solidarity, and survival. Without ethnic, social, and religious boundaries, the community by definition does not exist. But making a bold reductionist move, Ezra's prayer reveals the deeper theological principle underlying this sociological truism: The community is on the brink of destruction because it has failed to appreciate the divine favor (9:7–9) and mercy (9:13) manifested in recent history in that it has disregarded the commandments communicated through the prophets (9:10–12). The potential result is that they would be punished to the point that now not even a remnant would escape (9:14–15). Intermarriage does not threaten Judean cultural-ethnic superiority but rather its very attempt to survive in a situation of foreign "bondage" (9:8–9). In the words of the poet Rainer Maria Rilke, "Who is talking about great triumph? It is all about simply survival!"

10:1–44. A Report about Ezra's Actions. After his prayer, Ezra's first- person account stops and a third-person narrative begins. This switch reflects how Ezra simply catalyzes a movement that is really propelled by others: The shift from first- to third-person account corresponds to the shift from Ezra to community.

Chapter 10, like the preceding accounts, focuses on the approach to the problem. Ezra's prayer elicits a collective response (10:1). One leader, Shecaniah ben Jehiel, proposes to make a communal pact to "put away" all the wives and their children. This proposal, which is disturbing for modern readers and was probably for many ancient ones as well, is then adopted by Ezra (10:2–4).

Significantly, the narrative never reports the execution of the proposal. Instead one reads at length about an assembly in Jerusalem (10:6–16). Everyone (man) who did not appear is subject to loss of property and membership in the "exilic congregation" (10:8). Here one encounters a sectarian or communal polity that differs starkly from the authority over territory and body granted by Artaxerxes in ch. 7. Accordingly, Ezra does not call for the expulsion of women and children from Judah in 10:11 but rather a "separation" from the congregation (cf. 10:8). Elsewhere the word for "separation" bears predominantly a ritual association or refers to formal status (see esp. 8:24–29). The particulars of this legal ritual are not spelled out (10:14). Yet it is unlikely, contrary to the insistence of many commentators, that 10:6–44 (in contrast to 10:2–5) refers to a mass divorce and banishment of women and children. Only the priests, in keeping with ancient law, are said to have pledged to divorce their wives (10:18–19).

The interpretation adopted here explains why the account seems to taper off without a conclusion (KJV/JPS 10:44; the RSV/NRSV translates a later Greek version). It concludes in this manner because it does not have the actual expulsion of women and children in view. Rather the author points the finger at the numerous men (10:20–43) who were culpable yet had been faithful to appear before the council in order to undergo the "separation," whatever it entailed.

Although the immediate narrative concludes here, the story of rebuilding identity told by this book continues in Neh 1.

OVERVIEW

Nehemiah comprises together with Ezra one book, and an overview of this work is provided in the preceding chapter. The problems posed specifically by Neh 1–13 will be treated in the course of the commentary. One issue, however, must be addressed at the outset: the relationship between the narrative in Neh 8–10 and the rest of the book.

Nehemiah 8–10 stand out within Neh 1–13 for a number of reasons. Rather than being narrated by Nehemiah, these chapters are formulated about him. Moreover, not only does Neh 8 focus on the figure of Ezra, but also much of the narrative in this chapter represents the continuation of Ezra 10 in the Greek version of 1 Esdras. These and other observations have led many scholars to conclude that Neh 8 was originally formulated as part of the Ezra account. According to this position, the chapter was formerly positioned, along with portions of Neh 9, either between Ezra 8 and 9 or after Ezra 10. The communal pact in ch. 10 is said to represent an independent document found in the Temple archives and included by the editor of the book.

While this position deserves consideration, it creates more problems than it solves. The mention of Nehemiah in 8:9 would have to be attributed to a gloss in order to attribute the narrative to the Ezra account. Furthermore, the mention of Ezra at key points elsewhere in Neh 1–13 suggests that the original formulation of Neh 8 could have also presented these two figures cooperating. That 1 Esdras removes the reference to Nehemiah from Neh 8 is not surprising: This late book is characterized by an almost complete erasure of Nehemiah's memory from this history (presumably because his account criticizes the high-priestly line). Based on undeniable lexical and stylistic parallels between Neh 7–8 and Ezra 2–3, it is much more likely that Neh 8–10 was composed from the beginning for its present literary setting.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

III. Third Movement: Nehemiah, the Wall, and Community (Neh 1:1–13:31)

Within the third movement of the book, one can likewise distinguish three sections: The first allows Nehemiah to recount the building of the Wall (1:1–6:19), the second section is told—with few exceptions—in the third-person and involves important events leading up to the dedication of the Wall (7:1–13:3), and in the third small section Nehemiah resumes the narration to complete the book (13:4–31).

A. Rebuilding the Wall (1:1–6:19)

These first six chapters consist almost exclusively of first- person passages ascribed to the Nehemiah Memoir (see however 3:1–32). As such, the section has its own distinctive character: it depicts the construction of the Wall in various building stages, beginning with the prehistory of the project (chs. 1–2). Each stage is demarcated by a response from Judah's enemies when they "hear" of the progress: 1:1–2:10; 2:11–20; 3:1–4:5; 4:6–15; 4:16–23; 6:1–19 (the account of the reforms in ch. 5 interrupts this schema). Moreover, each stage corresponds to a specific problem facing the community and progress in the project of rebuilding identity.

1:1–11a. First Pivotal Conversation. The narrative begins with a conversation through which Nehemiah learns about the problem he will later address. The condition of Jerusalem's wall and gates, although representing the focus of Nehemiah's project, is identified by Hanani and the Judeans as a part of a larger social problem facing the entire province of Judah: great trouble and shame. Throughout Nehemiah's memoir, these terms bridge the building report (e.g. 3:33–35/ 4:1–3) and the accounts of social reforms (e.g. 5:9; 6:13; 13:7, 17, 27).

The passage refers to the Judeans who escaped the deportations and remained in Judah, but surprisingly ignores the numbers of those who, according to Ezra 1–10, had recently returned from exile. Only a late addition to the first-person Nehemiah account (7:4–73) is cognizant of the Babylonian/exilic origins of the Judeans. This reveals the historical problems posed by the references to massive returns.

Nehemiah's reaction to the news—mourning, fasting, and praying (1:4)—may be understood as "performed theology." It affirms that the solution to Judah's distress ultimately lies with divine hands rather than in Nehemiah's clever tactics and leadership, which are depicted throughout the memoir. The prayer itself (1:5–11a) pauses narrative time and allows the protagonist to reveal his theological motivations. It is framed by petitions that past prayers be heard (1:6, 11). Situated between these petitions are (1) an affirmation that sin had caused the present calamities, (2) a reference to a divine promise, and (3) a reminder of the community's special identity.

Most of this passage (1:1b–11a) is not presupposed in the following scene. The expansion of Nehemiah's building report with accounts of reforms (esp. chs. 5 and 13) would have necessitated a new introduction, which 1:2–4 provides. Likewise, the insertion of the narratives in chs. 8–10, which emphasize Torah-piety, seems to correspond to the insertion of the prayer in 1:5–11a (see esp. 1:7).

1:11b–2:9. Second Pivotal Conversation. This paragraph describes a (second) pivotal conversation, now between Nehemiah and Artaxerxes. It takes place in the first month, perhaps during a New Year's celebration. As the royal cupbearer, Nehemiah is serving wine to the king. Because Nehemiah enjoyed the king's favor, he is granted a request. Yet by telling his readers that he prayed right before responding (2:4), Nehemiah ascribes ultimate responsibility for the positive outcome to divine providence (see 1:4–11).

Nehemiah is granted only a leave of absence; he is not appointed governor, which seems to contradict 5:14. He must also ask for letters granting him safe passage and providing him lumber for the project. In contrast, Artaxerxes grants Ezra generous gifts and makes the royal treasuries available to him. Still, Artaxerxes provides Nehemiah with a retinue of soldiers and cavalry, which Ezra does not receive (see Ezra 8:22 and comments there). The disparities between Ezra's and Nehemiah's account may be related to tensions between Nehemiah and the Temple circles, which seem to have had a hand in the composition of Ezra 7–8.

2:10–20. Initiation of the Project. Opposition to Nehemiah is presented already in 2:10. Similar notices, which begin with "as heard," punctuate the building narrative and create discrete building phases (2:19–20; 4:1–5; 4:7–9; 6:1–14); they conclude in 6:16 after the statement of completion. The three figures that are the subject of these notices are Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem/ Gashmu. Sanballat was probably the governor in Samaria; he is attested in extra-biblical sources. Tobiah likely oversaw the administration in the Transjordanian/Ammonite region. There is also independent evidence for Geshem as a sheikh in the southern Arabian/Edomite region.

The first notice (2:10) presents Nehemiah's agenda in broad terms, i.e., to seek the welfare of the people. It is also more radical than the subsequent notices inasmuch as it identifies Sanballat and Tobiah as opposed to "the people of Israel." Both figures would have most probably worshiped Yahweh and have identified themselves as belonging to "the people of Israel." In comparison, the second notice (2:19–20) is much tamer: All three now accuse the Judeans of rebuilding the Wall in order to rebel against the empire.

In between these two notices is an account of Nehemiah's arrival in Jerusalem, his night ride during which he inspects the ruins, and his address to the community leaders that convinces them to embrace his building program (2:11–18). As elsewhere, the narrative attributes success at critical junctures to Nehemiah's savvy approach. Here the account emphasizes his decision to wait to reveal his plan (2:12, 16) and the way he goes about presenting it (2:17–18).

3:1–32. An Account of Building the Wall. This passage poses a problem: It not only recounts the completion of the work but it also lacks references to interruptions or opposition that characterize Nehemiah's account elsewhere. Due to similarities in expression between 3:1 and 2:18 (and 2:20), the passage was likely created for its present context rather than originating as an independent archival document. It was probably inserted at a relatively early point in the composition of the memoir and, if so, testifies to the originally brief and un-polemical nature of the building report.

The passage both describes the topography of the Wall and memorializes the donors—all the guilds, groups, and regions that contributed to the project. They are "the servants of the God of heaven" who "have share, claim and right in Jerusalem" (2:20). The Wall is formed literally by the names of the builders, who work collectively and in collaboration.

The passage mentions no fewer than 10 gates. This unusually large number, rendering it vulnerable to penetration, corresponds to the way the construction of the Wall symbolizes the demarcation of Judahite identity: Although a barrier to the outside, the Wall does not hermetically seal off Jerusalem but rather offers many points of access.

4:1–23 (Heb 3:33–4:17). Animosity Intensifies. The present arrangement of the building account alternates between passages reporting progress on the Wall and passages reporting attempts to thwart this progress. This back-and-forth is especially apparent in the present section. In the first paragraph (3:33–37/4:1–5), Sanballat and Tobiah taunt the Judeans, and Nehemiah responds with an imprecation.

Sanballat's insult expresses one of the main messages of the account itself: the correspondence between the restoration of the ruins and the revivification of the community. Similarly the joining of the Wall (3:38/4:6) corresponds to the enemies joining together in a military coalition (4:2/4: 8).

The account highlights, and depicts at length, the leadership skills Nehemiah displays during this crisis. He mobilizes the builders in preparation for the impending attack by arranging them into armed militia companies and rallying them with stirring speeches (4:8, 13–14/4:14, 19–20). These speeches resemble the great addresses delivered at the time of the first Conquest (e.g., Josh 10:25).

The present section contains the image that is most widely associated with Nehemiah: working with one hand and wielding a weapon with the other. Building becomes a means of fighting. This image also marks the great conceptual disparity with the preceding narrative in Ezra 1–10: The Judeans do not wait patiently for the empire to protect their interests, nor are they focused on the Temple as the conduit of imperial benefaction. Rather, they create a larger space (symbolized by the Wall) in which they can flourish; and they are prepared to fight their neighbors who attempt violently to disrupt this project.

5:1–13. The Fraternity of the Judeans and Socio-Economic Reforms. This passage evinces many parallels with the three reform accounts in ch. 13: Nehemiah witnesses an abuse, indicts the offenders, takes various corrective measures, and then utters a concluding prayer of remembrance (see 5:19).

The first paragraph (5:1–5) delineates the formal complaints of "the people and their wives against their Judean kin" (5:1). At issue is a situation of increasing economic disparities: some families are becoming wealthier at the expense of others, who are losing possession of both property and children. The female children in particular are being abused. Due to these financial injustices and loss of familial property rights, the fabric of the Judean community is being torn apart. If the problem is not addressed, the Wall—both in the physical and larger social sense—would not be built. The solution is a complete restoration of all property and interest (5:11–12), a major imposition on any economy.

As an ideal leader, Nehemiah hears this complaint and responds effectively (5:6–13). He calls for the wealthy to "walk in the fear of God" (=ethically) in order to prevent the "reproach" of the surrounding nations. Earlier, he refers to this "reproach" in order to convince the Judeans to rebuild the Wall (2:17); hence the reform and the building project address a common problem.

Yet Nehemiah is not satisfied with mere preaching and promises. Rather he institutionalizes the change through legal actions, which include a formal oath and a curse; readers are told that such measures proved to be effective (5:13b).

5:14–19. Nehemiah's Munificence. This paragraph, which continues the theme of 5:1–13, describes Nehemiah fiscal policies as governor. This is the first time he is described this way. It is quite possible that later authors identified him as a governor in order to present a model of behavior for—or polemics against—later governors.

Nehemiah claims that, because of his fear of God (5:15), he did not place any extra burdens on the people in order to pay his own salary. In addition he displays generosity by hosting many guests each day at his table. Such commensality would have helped consolidate political and social bonds.

Uniting this paragraph with the preceding one is a petition that his God not "forget" (or "erase," 13:14) everything he had done for "this people" (5:19). This prayer presumes that the deity keeps a written record of human deeds. Because the prayer is addressed directly to God (as in 3:36–37/4:4–5; 6:14; 13:14, 22, 29, 31 and in contrast to 1:5–11 and 2:4), the memoir (or a version of it) may be meant primarily for a divine readership and only secondarily for a human audience.

6:1–14. Attempts to Assassinate Nehemiah or His Character. After the interlude in ch. 5, the theme of building and opposition from chs. 2–4 resumes. The first three episodes (6:2–4, 5–9, 10–14) of this section are dated to the final phase of the project (6:1). They all concern the person and work of Nehemiah, mirroring an emphasis of 5:14–19. The texts allow one of Judah's "founding fathers" to address important questions facing later generations of readers. Thus, the first paragraph (6:2–4) presents Nehemiah focusing on the "great work" and refusing to be distracted (see 5:16). The second paragraph (6:5–9) allows Nehemiah to affirm that his intention in building was not to establish a monarchy or rebel against the empire. The author alludes here to the corruptibility of prophets—and the danger it poses for Judean rulers (6:7); this point becomes central to the message of the following paragraph (6:10–14).

6:15–19. The Climactic Statement of Completion. Now, finally, the Wall was finished—in just 52 days (6:15). Responsibility for such quick work is attributed to divine assistance (6:16; see Ps 118:23). Here also one reads for the last time that the enemies "heard" the news, yet now they must admit their defeat (6:16). What necessitated the project ("disgrace and reproach," see 1:3 and 2:17) has now finally been alleviated.

The twenty-fifth of Elul marks a great reversal of fortune, for not only had the ramparts been restored but the community had also undergone a major social and spiritual transformation. To underscore this point, all the reforms are dated to the period of construction. This is not only the case for ch. 5 but also for the reforms reported in ch. 13. Nehemiah 13:15–22 and 13:23–30 begin with expression "in those days," which also introduces 6:17–19, and the "days" in 6:17 clearly refers to the 52 days in 6:15. Moreover, 6:17–19 most likely originally continued, before the insertion of the largely third-person narrative material in 7:1–13:3, in the account of 13:4–9(10–14). Tobiah had to send letters to his Judean alliance partners (6:17–19) because when Nehemiah came to town, he removed Tobiah from his apartment in Jerusalem (13:4–9; on the date in 13:6, see ad loc.). Accordingly, the reforms recounted in ch. 13 are presented as taking place during the construction, so that the twenty-fifth of Elul becomes truly climactic. Support for this reading is provided by structural observations: Five consecutive accounts beginning in ch. 5 conclude with prayers for remembrance (5:1–19; 6:1–14; 6:17–19 + 13:4–14; 13:15–22; 13:23–31), and the final three of these accounts begin with the phrase "in those days," referring to the 52 days in 6:15–16.

B. Repopulation and Dedication of Jerusalem (7:1–13:3)

Whereas 13:4–31 seems to have been originally connected to 6:17–19, a large block of material in 7:1–13:4 now severs the earlier narrative. This block appears to have gradually grown to its present proportions. The first insertions are probably the texts relating to the fortification and repopulation of Jerusalem in chs. 7 and 11 as well as the account of the dedication ceremonies in 12:27–43. By citing the list of Ezra 2, the author of Neh 7 provoked the composition of Neh 8–10 (cf. Ezra 2–3); these important chapters expand on the theme of the internal reforms in Neh 5 and 13. Nehemiah 8–10 were composed with the climatic celebration at the dedication of the Wall in view. The reader should understand that the people studied Torah, confessed their sins, and made a pact before celebrating that momentous day.

7:1–73 (Heb 72). Fortifying and Repopulating Jerusalem. After finishing the building project, the people appoint gatekeepers, a commander of the city, as well as a militia to protect the city and their homes. Jerusalem is now fortified and rests fully within Judean hands. The martial elements of the account, which are introduced in ch. 4, continue in ch. 11. That singers and Levites also are appointed (7:1) has to do with the fact that the gates, as thresholds, are also religiously precarious places (see 3:1 and 12:27–43).

In the process of fortifying Jerusalem, Nehemiah repopulates the city (7:5–72/73). This theme too continues in ch. 11. God is said to "place this idea in [his] heart" (7:5). This expression, which is used first in 2:12 with reference to the building project, appears here to introduce a new project, one that relates specifically to the people.

Significantly the method Nehemiah employs for repopulating the city is "seeking-and-finding" (see commentary on Ezra 4–7). The text he "finds" is "the book of the genealogy of those who were the first to come back" (7:5). This may be the author's description of Ezra 1–6, since the passage he "finds" in it, and then quotes at length (7:6–72(73)), parallels closely Ezra 2. This discovery results in a new understanding of the Judeans' identity, since up until now Nehemiah had never acknowledged any collective return from Babylon (see esp. 1:2–3).

This harmonization of Nehemiah's account with the historical conceptions in Ezra 1–10 has likely been provoked by the mention of mixed marriages and alliances in 6:17–19. The need for internal social-religious reforms is answered with the composition of Neh 8–10.

As to why the author listed all the names again (after Ezra 2), one should note that the numbers in ch. 11 are precisely 10 percent of those in ch. 7, corresponding to the "tithe" in 11:1. From the perspective of ch. 8, the repetition of Ezra 2 also grants names and identity to the otherwise anonymous mass of people in ch. 8.

Finally we may appreciate an element of "realized eschatology" here: Only those whose names were "found written" in this book are permitted to inhabit the new(ly built) Jerusalem.

8:1–12. Reading Torah. This passage takes its point of departure from the repetition of Ezra 2 in Neh 7. In contrast to the account of the rebuilding of the altar and the numerous sacrifices in Ezra 3, this description of the seventh month (the central month in the cultic calendar) noticeably lacks any reference to the Temple or the High Priest Eliashib.

Herewith the narrative shifts the perspective from the center (priests sacrificing on the altar) to the periphery (the people beckoning Ezra to read the Torah to them). In the course of the month, the leaders (8:13) and then people (9:1) learn to read for themselves. In keeping with his portrayal in Ezra 9–10, Ezra responds to communal petition and only then becomes a catalyst for collective action. When he ascends the platform to read, he takes with him a group of leaders, symbolically demonstrating that he cannot lead alone. Later the Levites are involved in interpreting the text to the congregation (8:8).

The activities are performed ceremoniously in keeping with the reverence for the Torah; many of these features anticipate later rituals of reading in the synagogue. Yet the account also underscores general comprehension (8:8–12). Earlier we are told that not only men but also women and "all who could understand" were present. After the loss of territorial statehood and living in the context of imperial rule, broad participation and education have become critical to the formation and survival of the community. In keeping with the festive nature of the day (later known as Rosh Hashanah), the people celebrate with feasting, drinking and merrymaking—"because they had understood the words that words that were declared to them" (8:12).

8:13–18. Celebrating. The second part of ch. 8 is about not just the celebration of the Feast of Booths (Sukkoth) but also an ideal form of communal action. The lay leaders, priests, and Levites gather around "the scribe Ezra in order to study the words of the Torah." Through their seeking in the scriptures, they "find" (see on "seeking-and-finding" in Ezra 4–7 and Neh 7) a particular commandment. However, what is said to be written is not found word-for-word in the Pentateuch. Rather it represents a product of constructive exegesis called "midrash" (derived from the word "to seek"). By means of this sophisticated technique of interpretation, ancient law and the sacred writings as a whole are applied to new circumstances.

The innovative way the festival is celebrated— by making booths throughout Jerusalem and dwelling in them—corresponds to the building theme in the surrounding narrative, but it also expresses a theological message: the festival celebrates divine providence and commemorates a time when Israel did not yet possess its land (see Lev 23:42–43). The reference to "the days of Jeshua son of Nun" is probably to be explained by the fact that this epoch marks the zenith in the biblical memory—when Israel successfully occupied the land and followed their leader Joshua in observing Torah. Not surprisingly the narrator notes that "he" or "they" read Torah each day of the weeklong festival.

9:1–37 (Heb 38). Confessing and Petitioning. After celebrating throughout the month, the people reassemble in Jerusalem, now in a much more somber mood: fasting and wearing sackcloth with dust on their heads. They first ritually separate themselves from foreigners (see comments on Ezra 10), and thereafter engage in confession and Torah reading—now significantly on their own and without the help of Ezra.

The brief narrative is followed by a lengthy prayer uttered by a group of Levites. The complex text deserves attention not least because of its distinctive reading of biblical history. The paramount concern of the prayer is the land. After praising the deity's creative and sustaining acts, it begins with the election of Abraham and the fulfilled promise to give his descendants a land possessed by other peoples (9:8). The prayer alternates between enumerations of divine benevolent acts (9:9–15 and 19–25) and descriptions of Israel's stubbornness and disobedience (9:16–18 and 26–31) that result in the loss of sovereignty. The cyclical judgment-restoration schema that characterizes "the period of Judges" has been applied to all of Israel's subsequent history, so that the catastrophe of 586 BCE is no longer central (9:26–31). In fact, the construction and destruction of the Temple are passed over in silence, in keeping with distinctive emphases of the preceding chapter and of Nehemiah's account.

The final section (9:32–37/38) consists of a petition that the deity once again regard the people's plight. In what way God should respond is not spelled out. Nevertheless, the problem is clearly stated: "We are slaves in our own land." As recompense for past sins, foreign kings possess "power over our bodies and livestock." This note of protest stands out in the context of the book, which presents foreign rule otherwise in ultimately favorable terms. While the yearning for Judean territorial sovereignty also deviates from many passages in the book, it dovetails with the emphases in Nehemiah's account.

9:38–10:39 (Heb 10:1–40). Covenanting Together. Proceeding from the close interdependence between Torah-obedience and land-tenure affirmed by the prayer, the community responds to "all this" (the "great distress" in 9:37) with a communal pact. The word here for "pact" is constructed from the same root as that for Abraham's "faithful" heart. God rewarded it with a covenant that was likewise upheld (9:8). Mirroring the importance assigned to texts in the book, the pact is explicitly said to have been put in writing and sealed with names of communal leaders (Nehemiah sets the example; 10:1/2). The list of names is followed by a general declaration of intent: "to walk in the Torah of God" (10:28–29/29–30). What such obedience entails is spelled out in the subsequent stipulations.

Most of these stipulations relate specifically to contributions for the Temple and cultic officers (10:32–39/33–40). Yet the wording of the final line as well as the first two stipulations (10:30– 31/32–33) are drawn from Nehemiah's indictments in ch.13. This citation necessarily affects the reading of the final chapter of Nehemiah's account: Instead of introducing new reforms, Nehemiah must now be understood to be enforcing prior communal resolutions. Yet the authors' aim was likely not to diminish the importance of Nehemiah's actions. The intention is probably rather to demonstrate the importance of a strong leader: The community ultimately fails in its commitment to uphold the pact. Hence they require someone like Nehemiah who, through his preaching, identifies abuses, reaffirms the community's earlier pledge, and institutes proactive measures that ensure its fulfillment. A similar compositional history and reading strategy inform the relationship of pentateuchal law to the preaching of the prophets.

11:1–12:26. The Commemoration of Leaders. The narrative continues here with a brief note regarding the repopulation of Jerusalem, followed by several lists. Thematically the account resumes the thread in ch. 7 regarding both Jerusalem's repopulation and fortification (see the references to warriors in 11:6, 14). The difference is that in ch. 7 Nehemiah is the subject of the action; here the people act on their own, in keeping with the transition depicted in chs. 8–10.

One may wonder why the closely related chs. 7 and 11 are so widely separated. In addition to the initial compositional move to create a parallel to Ezra 2–3, the larger motivation was likely to show that the community first undergoes a deep spiritual transformation (recounted in chs. 8–10) before it finally inhabits Jerusalem, "the holy city" (11:1).

The method employed to select the city's new residents is casting lots. One tenth of Judah's population must relocate to Jerusalem. But they are said to "volunteer" for this move and thus receive a blessing from their neighbors.

The following list shares much with 1 Chr 9 and may be based on an independent source. The whole chapter, and especially 11:25–36, constructs an ideal map of greater Judah (and Benjamin).

It draws on conceptions and antiquated names from the book of Joshua, and it includes places that were not integrated into Judah until the Maccabees (who may have viewed Nehemiah as a great hero). At the center of the province is Jerusalem (containing 1/10 of the population), and this center is circumscribed by towns with their dependent villages.

These lists of cultic officers who resided in Jerusalem provoked the addition of other registers of cultic officials. One can still detect some of the ancient priestly disputes under the surface of this material.

12:27–13:3. The Day of Dedication. Now finally we are told about "the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem" (12:27). This account is predominantly a third-person report, but in 12:31–43 Nehemiah's voice makes itself heard again after a long pause. Originally a brief account of how he organized celebrations must have stood close to the notice of completion in 6:15–16. This account is still preserved in our text. In it Nehemiah tells how he choreographs two large thanksgiving companies from among the princes of Judah. Separately they circumambulate the Wall, singing in stereo, and in the end they come together for sacrifices and celebrations at the Temple. The depiction of a closing circle or two halves joining together, which can be found elsewhere (see esp. chs. 3–4), expresses symbolically one of the central messages of the Nehemiah Memoir: the social and spiritual unification of Judah through the Wall-building project. The text deserves to be appreciated for its deliberate liturgical or performed theology.

As the book developed, the account was both amplified internally and successively distanced from 6:15–16. Now the Judean princes are joined by Ezra the scribe, priests, Levites, and cultic musicians (12:27–30, 33–36, 41–42). The celebration is also called a "dedication," and the people, gates, and Wall are purified (see already 3:1). In addition to these cultic officials, others are appointed (12:44–47). The expression "on that day" (12:43, 44, 47, and 13:1) has eschatological significance in prophetic books and refers to a coming age. Here, however, it refers to a historical moment as a kind of "realized eschatology." Jerusalem has been rebuilt and the people dwell in peace. The messianic hope associated with David is fulfilled here above all in the Temple and cult (12:46).

That these dedication ceremonies are so far removed from their original proximity to 6:15–16 has to do with same redactional dynamic informing the separation of chs. 7 and 11. Before the people can celebrate and properly dedicate the Wall, they must first experience the events recorded in 6:17–12:26. What they then celebrate is not just the building of the Wall but other major achievements (e.g., social reforms, a communal pact).

13:1–3 reports further that "on that day" the people engaged in scriptural seeking-and-finding, and what they "found" relates to the expulsion of Ammonites and Moabites. The paragraph bridges the narrative to the following section, which relates to various measures to demarcate boundaries to non-Judeans (13:4–9, 16, 20–21, 23–30). This preface identifies Nehemiah's practical-political measures as in keeping with a prior communal resolution and as based on scriptural precedent.

C. Enforcing the Communal Pledge (13:4–31)

The book concludes in this last section by giving Nehemiah the final word. This section includes three discrete paragraphs, each of which resembles ch. 5 both in structure and in style: first he observes a problem, then he indicts the offenders and takes various corrective measures, and finally utters a prayer that his God will remember his good deeds.

Originally these accounts told what Nehemiah undertook soon after arriving for the first time in Jerusalem (13:6a–7); they were formerly linked directly to 6:17–19: Because Nehemiah had "before this" (13:4) removed Tobiah from Jerusalem, Tobiah's alliance partners in Judah were forced to write letters in order to maintain relations with him (6:17–19). As seen in the commentary on 7:1–13:3, these passages have gradually grown apart due to the insertion of new material.

Nehemiah 13:6b dates the events to a time twelve years after the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (the year to which everything narrated in ch. 1:1–13:3 is dated). The date in this half-verse however was most likely secondarily interpolated and drawn from 5:14. Such editorial activity would have been elicited by the composition of the communal pact in ch. 10. The inserted date in 13:6b allows Nehemiah to leave the province and then return a long time thereafter, only to witness that the community had failed to follow through with its pledge (ch. 10). The addition of 13:6b thus adds a new dimension to these texts: What were originally descriptions of how Nehemiah introduced new reforms become now accounts of how he reminds the community of the pact and enforces it.

All three units in ch. 13 include secondary yet thematically related material. Thus 13:10–14 treats the larger theme of the Temple as in 13:4–9. Here Levites had not received their "portions" (i.e., livelihood) and therefore had "fled" to their properties elsewhere (13:10). Nehemiah gathers them back to Jerusalem and institutes measures to correct the problem. The second account relates primarily to native Judeans engaging work on the Sabbath (13:15–22). But it also includes a superimposed layer that treats the problem posed by foreign traders (13:16, 20–21).

The problem posed by "others" in Judah is presented also in 13:4–9 and especially in 13:23–31. There readers are told about Nehemiah's response to intermarriages in Judah. With respect to a culpable son of the high priest, Nehemiah "made him flee" (13:28; note the contrast to the Levites who "fled" in 13:10). As for non-priestly Judeans, however, he does not expel them nor does he manifest his anger against their foreign wives.

Undeniably, his direct approach to the mixedmarriage problem contrasts starkly with that of Ezra. Moreover, he is also disturbed by a different aspect of the issue: The children could not speak "Judean"—that is, the intermarriages posed a serious threat to the survival of Judean language, culture, and traditions. Yet despite the differences from the Ezra account, one must appreciate the editors' choice to allow this passage to serve as the book's conclusion. The problem that Ezra witnesses and introduces to the narrative of the book (i.e., mixed marriages and the paradigmatic issue they pose for the project of rebuilding identity) is answered in Neh 1–13 with its complex depiction of the community constructing for themselves a physical and spiritual Wall. This Wall both unites the people in an unbroken circle (see esp. Neh 3) and serves as a barrier to deleterious practices and influences.

ESTHER

NANCY BOWEN

OVERVIEW

Esther is one of the five festival scrolls in the Writings of the Jewish Bible. The story is an etiology of the Purim Festival, which is not legislated in the Torah. Its location in Christian Bibles, after Ezra and Nehemiah, reflects its historical setting of the Diaspora. Thus, this story addresses issues related to Israel's life in exile as a minority among a potentially hostile majority. Since some of the story's features correspond to what is known from Persian sources, it may have been composed in Persia. However, discrepancies suggest Persia was a convenient background for raising issues involving life in the Diaspora.

Esther presents a two-fold threat of annihilation: destruction of Jewish identity by assimilation to Persian culture and complete elimination of the Jews by Haman's genocidal plot. The plot revolves around these threats and suggests how Jews might respond whenever they arise. The story illustrates that salvation from these threats requires solidarity, courage, cleverness, and chance. Combining these elements yields surprising reversals—the powerful lose their power and the powerless gain it. The book's genre is that of a novella or short story. The use of literary (narrative) exegetical methodologies dominates contemporary Esther studies. These show that exaggeration plays a major role throughout the story. Descriptions of lavish banquets, extensive beauty treatments, and a gallows' height, as well as how individuals overreact to relatively unimportant slights, are examples of how exaggeration leads to irony.

Esther is similar to the stories of Joseph (Gen 37, 39–50) and Daniel (Dan 1–6), as all three recount how a follower of Yahweh achieves great status within a foreign court despite great danger. Esther is also similar to the stories Judith and Ruth, stories where the main characters are women whose actions save others. Esther differs from all of these stories in that there is no explicit mention of God or God's role. In the other stories, deliverance results from God's intervention in the situation. As this is a story of planned genocide, God's absence is noteworthy. In this story, the people are forced to rely on one another, rather than on God. Throughout Esther, hiding and revealing are important actions. Disclosure or non-disclosure of identity motives, piety, and ideology will decide events and their eventual outcome.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introductions (1:1–3:6)

A. Introducing Ahasuerus (1:1–22)

The name "Ahasuerus" may be a Hebrew rendering of the Persian word for "mighty man," a common epithet for Persian rulers. Ahasuerus was a generic ruler, like the unnamed Pharaoh in Exodus. Thus, the issues presented in Esther are not a matter of a particular king's policies, but arise whenever Jews are subject to foreign rule.

The word "banquet" (mishteh) is derived from the Hebrew verb "to drink," making them winedrinking events, not eating events. These occur frequently throughout the story (1:3–9; 2:18; 5:4–8, 12, 14; 6:14; 7:2, 7–8; 8:17; 9:17–22). The opening scene alone consists of three banquets: the 180-day banquet for the officials (1:3–4), the subsequent 7-day banquet for all the people (1:5), and a concurrent women's banquet given by Queen Vashti (1:9).

Ahasuerus summons Vashti to his banquet, and she refuses him (1:11–12). Why she refused is a matter of speculation. Perhaps she did not wish to be displayed like a trophy before a room of drunken men. Some speculate she was to come naked, "wearing the royal crown," and nothing else. Whatever her reason, she is a subordinate resisting authority—one of the major themes of this story. Ahasuerus is "enraged" by this, but, unsure how to respond, he willingly accepts Memucan's advice (1:13, 21). Patriarchal and political control are reestablished by decree: all wives must obey their husbands and Vashti is banished (1:19–20). Vashti's downfall makes possible Esther's eventual elevation, but it also warns possible successors they will be expected to obey all the king's commands.

B. Introducing Mordecai and Esther (2:1–23)

This chapter establishes Ahasuerus' character. The lavish banquets indicate he is generous and benevolent. But benevolence hides a petty tyrant who drinks too much, is short tempered, and is easily influenced by others. Once Ahasuerus' anger abates, he realizes he has no queen (2:1). Again uncertain what to do, his servants propose a solution he happily accepts—to hold a Miss Persia contest where the winner becomes queen (2:2–4).

Readers are now introduced to Mordecai, a "Jew" (2:5; 3:4; 5:13; 6:10; 8:7; 9:29, 31; 10:3). His lineage obliquely connects him to Saul (1 Sam 9:1, 21; 10:21 14:51; 2 Sam 16:5–14). The Hebrew text implies that Mordecai was among the first group of Jerusalemites deported by Nebuchadnezzar in 597 BCE (2:6; cf. 2 Kgs 24:10–12), making him more than 100 years old! Whether this is an editorial error or an instance of exaggeration, the narrative clearly identifies Mordecai as a foreigner in Persia.

Esther, who lives with and is cared for by Mordecai, is introduced with Hebrew (Hadassah means "myrtle," hinting at her sweetness) and Persian names (cf. Dan 1:6–7). Esther ('ester) can be considered a word play on the Hebrew verb "to hide" (satar), which would refer to Esther hiding her Jewish identity (2:10) and/or to God's hiddenness in the story.

Since Esther is "fair and beautiful," she is one of those selected to participate in the contest to become Ahasuerus' queen (2:7–8). Within the citadel she wins the "favor" of Hegai, the chief eunuch (2:9). "Favor" (khesed) might also be translated "loyalty" or "devotion" (e.g., Josh 2:12, 14; 1 Sam 2:5–6; Prov 19:22; Ruth 3:10). Hegai's loyalty to Esther translates into giving her special treatment, perhaps providing her an edge in the competition.

The twelve-month beauty treatment that follows is another example of exaggeration and Ahasuerus' generosity—no expense is spared (2:12–14). It also illustrates Esther's compliance with her indoctrination into the role of royal concubine. To the extent that assimilation poses a threat to Jewish existence, the community is in danger; Esther has succumbed. She neither engages in distinctive Jewish practices nor has physical characteristics that set her apart. Only self-disclosure would reveal her kindred (2:10). Unlike Daniel's resistance to the Babylonian assimilation (Dan 1:3–5, 8), Esther does not resist Persian assimilation. In the end, Esther wins Ahasuerus' "favor" (or "loyalty"; cf. 2:9). Furthermore, Ahasuerus "loved" Esther, a word elsewhere associated with covenantal loyalty (cf. Deut 6:5).

As Esther gains the king's loyalty, so does Mordecai. He sits "at the king's gate" where he overhears two royal eunuchs plotting against the king (2:21). Mordecai demonstrates his loyalty to the king by telling Esther the plot. She reports it to Ahasuerus, and he orders the eunuchs hanged. The event, and Mordecai's role in it, is recorded in the king's annals, which later becomes significant (6:1–11).

C. Introducing Haman (3:1–6)

Like Esther and Mordecai, Haman is a foreigner. He is a descendant of King Agag, whose destruction God commanded of Saul (1 Sam 15). Hence, before Mordecai and Haman even meet, one can anticipate their hostilities. Haman also achieves a rapid rise in the Persian court, and Ahasuerus issues a command that all his servants should "bow down and do obeisance" before Haman, which Mordecai refuses to do (3:1–2). Infuriated by Mordecai's noncompliance, Haman overreacts (3:5–6). Considering it "beneath him" to retaliate against Mordecai only, he plans to destroy all the Jews, which ironically mirrors God's plan for the total destruction of the Amalekites as a form of punishment (1 Sam 15:2–3; cf. Exod 17:8). Haman's character is thoroughly despicable—proud, self-centered, greedy, and vindictive.

II. The Plot Thickens (3:7–6:13)

A. Haman's First Plot (3:7–19)

Haman's threat to destroy the Jews creates the story's key conflict and drives the plot for the remainder of the story. To ensure success, Haman casts a lot to determine an auspicious day for battle (2:7; cf. Judg 20:28; 1 Sam 14:37; 23:4; 2 Sam 5:19; 1 Kgs 22:6). "Lot" (pur) is a Persian loan word associated with the festival's name, Purim (9:26). Haman's inquiry takes place "in the first month," when Passover is celebrated (Exod 12:1–2; Lev 23:5; Deut 16:1–8). Ironically, the month celebrating deliverance now foreshadows destruction. The lot selects the thirteenth day in the twelfth month, which gives everyone almost a year to plot further.

Haman needs Ahasuerus' consent to carry out his "final solution." Playing to Ahasuerus' fear of disobedience as a destabilizing force, Haman argues that the Jews are insubordinate, following their own laws and not the king's (3:8). Like most racist propaganda, there is no evidence to verify his claim. Haman also employs financial persuasion, depositing an excessive amount of money in the king's treasuries. Ahasuerus' reply, "The money is given to you" (3:11), might imply he refused the bribe. Mordecai's report to Esther of the sum (4:7) and Esther's claim that the Jews were "sold" (7:4) suggest the king accepted the money. Perhaps Ahasuerus permits Haman use of the money for implementing his plan.

A decree ordering wholesale annihilation of the Jews is sent to "every province in its own script and every people in its own language" (3:12). Clearly, this was a multiethnic empire, suggesting that the existence of the Jews was not an inherent problem. The decree commands all "to destroy, to kill, to annihilate" the Jews (3:13; cf. 8:11). The language reveals Haman's excessive anger; it takes three verbs to eradicate the Jews. The Hebrew text does not provide a rationale for attacking the entire Jewish population, including women and children. Would other ethnic groups obey lest they are labeled insubordinate, or would they resist this unethical decree? As if anticipating resistance, the decree includes financial incentive—citizens will be allowed to plunder the goods of those they kill. Inside the citadel, Haman and Ahasuerus drink to their agreement. But outside the citadel, things are far from settled; there is chaos (3:15).

This episode reveals the dangers of vengeance, hate-filled speech, racial profiling, prejudice, and stereotyping. It serves as a warning of what happens when one group demonizes another. The episode ironically mirrors Israel's treatment of "others" among them (Deut 7:1–6, 22–26; 9:1–5; Josh 6:21; 11:16–20). Israel's history witnesses to their own acts of annihilating those who were different. If "genocide" is to disappear from contemporary vocabulary, the story encourages readers to challenge any similar act.

B. Mordecai's and Esther's Counter Plot (4:1–17)

When Mordecai hears of the decree, he performs actions of mourning seen elsewhere in the Bible (4:1; cf. 2 Sam 3:31; 1 Kgs 21:7; 2 Kgs 19:1; Isa 37:1; Jer 6:26; Dan 9:3; Jon 3:6). Although "loud and bitter" cries appear in psalms petitioning divine help (Pss 22:5 [6]; 107:13, 19; 142:1 [2], 5 [6]), the text does not clearly state that Mordecai is appealing to God. There is solidarity among the Jews who join Mordecai in mourning their anticipated death. Since Esther demonstrates that identity can be hidden by non-disclosure, these public actions would reveal identity. Threatened with annihilation, instead of choosing to conceal their identity, the Jews reveal it. Esther's servants bring news of the decree and Mordecai's actions to her attention (4:1). Since she does not join in mourning, Esther continues to hide her identity. Perhaps sending clothes to Mordecai (4:4) expresses her wish that he similarly conceal his identity.

What ensues is a series of messages relayed by the eunuchs, who are important characters throughout Esther. As castrated men, they exist at the boundary of gender—male, yet not male. They are thus able to cross other boundaries, conveying information between separated spaces—between men and women (1:10–11; 3:3–4) and citadel and city (2:21; 3:4–15; 6:14; 7:9). In the first exchange (4:5–8), Mordecai tells Esther of the situation and sends a copy of the decree. He charges Esther to intercede with the king on the Jews' behalf, but offers no specific strategy for countering the decree.

Esther replies that intercession is impossible (4:9–11). The law states that an individual can see Ahasuerus only if that individual is summoned, and he has not called for her in thirty days. His disinterest hints at limits to her influence. The penalty for violating this law is death. Although it is possible that Ahasuerus might spare her life, his previous over-reactions to disobedience suggest otherwise. Besides, disobedience goes against everything Esther has been trained and told to do all her life. Her obedience is why she is where she is. She is now faced with competing demands—does she violate Mordecai's request or the king's law?

Mordecai's reply (4:13–14) is the most often cited and preached upon statement in the book, even though the interpretation of key phrases remains contested. Mordecai points out that Esther can die going before Ahasuerus or she can die when the decree is executed—her position and rank will not save her. If she does act, that "relief and deliverance will rise for the Jews from another quarter" is traditionally interpreted as referring to divine deliverance. But it could refer to another human willing to help, unlike Esther. Whether Esther has "come to royal dignity for just such a time as this," may be interpreted as a reference to God's guiding hand working behind the scenes for the benefit of God's people—or as a moment of chance. Either way, Mordecai challenges Esther to take advantage of the situation, now.

Esther responds with a command for the Jews to fast. Since she will also fast, this act moves her to solidarity with the Jews and begins to reveal her identity. A public fast means others (though not the king?) will notice her association with the Jews (4:15–16). The fast is not necessarily a religious act. It may be interpreted as a means of preparation for her audience with Ahasuerus, including coming to terms with revealing her Jewish identity. Esther's statement, "if I perish I perish," acknowledges that she acts with no assurance of what the outcome will be. There is no certainty there will be deliverance (Dan 3:17–18); however, regardless of consequences, she is determined to take a particular course of action.

C. Esther Acts: First Banquet (5:1–8)

Dressed in royal robes, Esther approaches Ahasuerus (5:1). Although her clothing continues to hide her Jewish identity from the king, it emphasizes her power and authority as queen. Esther again wins the king's favor (5:2; cf. 2:17). Ahasuerus' character has changed; he does not fly into a rage. By holding out the scepter and letting Esther live, Ahasuerus holds out hope of deliverance to the Jews.

Continuing to display benevolence, Ahasuerus asks Esther what her request is, offering to give her whatever she wants, even to half of his kingdom. (5:3). She requests a banquet (mishteh), with him and Haman (5:4). Knowing that Ahasuerus never refuses a banquet and that he is easily influenced when drunk, Esther's request displays crafty planning. Mordecai asked her to approach the king, but how she does so is her own plan.

As they are drinking, Ahasuerus asks Esther again for her request (5:6, cf. 5:3). The repetition suggests he did not interpret the invitation to the banquet as her request. He would view her failure to make a request as insubordination. Since he is drinking, one might imagine an edge to his voice. "What do you really want Esther." In reply, Esther piles on the flattery (5:7–8). She repeats Ahasuerus' words, "petition" and "request," stating what he wants to hear. She thrice addresses him as "king," emphasizing his superior position. Besides asking, "if it please the king" (cf. 5:4), she emphasizes winning his "favor" (cf. 2:17; 5:2), to remind him of their bond. Esther asks that Ahasuerus and Haman attend a second banquet on the next day, promising to reveal her real request then, assuring Ahasuerus of her obedience. Why she does not "entreat him for her people" at this banquet is an open question. One possibility is that another banquet builds suspense. Esther has not yet revealed her identity to Ahasuerus. Will she have the courage to do so? How will he respond? Will she save her people?

D. Haman's Second Plot (5:9–14)

Haman leaves the party "happy," evidently believing that he is continuing to rise in the king's inner circle. He is also drunk. "Good spirits" is identical in Hebrew to Ahasuerus being "merry with wine" (1:10). Haman's contentment soon dissipates to be replaced by fury (2:9). As he leaves, Haman passes by Mordecai, who again shows disrespect, this time by refusing to stand instead of refusing to bow. Nor does Mordecai "tremble," a word that can indicate fear (Dan 5:19; Hab 2:7).

Why Haman "restrained himself" is unstated (5:10). He may be waiting to seek advice before acting on his rage, a pattern for both him and Ahasuerus (1:13; 3:6; 7:8–9), or may be afraid to act without the king's permission. Returning home he calls his friends and his wife, Zeresh, and recounts his woeful condition (5:11–13). In advising her husband, Zeresh stands in the biblical tradition of women who advise men, for good or ill (e. g., Gen 27:5–10; 1 Sam 25:26–31; 2 Sam 13:12–13; 14:4–17; 20:16–19; Job 2:9). On the advice of those assembled, Haman builds a gallows fifty cubits high, planning to tell the king in the morning to hang Mordecai on it. He will then go to the banquet in the evening happy (5:14). The gallows' height of seventy-two feet (twenty-two meters) is another exaggeration. The word for "gallows" is literally "tree" ('ets). So the wording, "hang on a tree," reminds readers of God's curse in Deut 21:22–23.

E. Haman Mortified (6:1–13)

The next episode relies on fate and leads to one of the story's many ironic reversals. On the night before the banquet, by chance, Ahasuerus has insomnia and cures it by having someone read to him from his annals (6:1). By chance, the episode recounting Mordecai's thwarting of the eunuch's assassination plot is read (6:2). Haman arrives just as Ahasuerus is inquiring whether anything had been done to honor Mordecai (6:3–5). Ahasuerus seeks Haman's advice on what to do "for the man whom the king wishes to honor" (6:6), and Haman thinks that Ahasuerus wishes to honor him. Knowing that Ahasuerus always does what others advise, Haman suggests an outrageous list of things that he considers honorable (6:7–9). The tables are turned on Haman as Ahasuerus tells him to do exactly those things to his enemy, Mordecai. But Haman obediently complies (6:10–11).

Here, the text focuses on Haman's reaction (6:12b) to this humiliating turn of events. He rushes home. Instead of revealing himself so all could bow to him, he hides his identity by covering his head, a gesture of shame (2 Sam 15:30; Jer 14:3–4). He also mourns, but for what? The death of his prestige? His loss of honor? A bruised ego? Does Haman foresee his impending death? The response of his wife and friends to his predicament is unsympathetic. They are certain that Haman cannot defeat his enemy. There are many possibilities for the basis of their certainty. It may be a hidden reference to Yahweh who is with the Jews and fights for them, an overt reference to previous biblical claims to destroy Haman's people (Exod 17:14–16; Num 24:20; Deut 25:17–19), an acknowledgement that Mordecai's star is on the rise, or due to some inherent quality in the "Jewish people." Haman's decline is emphasized by the three-fold repetition of the verb "to fall" (nafal) (evident only twice in translation)—"downfall . . . will surely fall."

III. Resolution (6:14–10:3)

A. Esther Acts: Second Banquet (6:14–8:2)

This is the turning point in the story. From now on the plot works to eliminate the threat of Jewish annihilation. Haman hurried home the night before; now he is "hurried" off to Esther's second banquet by royal eunuchs (6:14). The Hebrew states that Ahasuerus and Haman went in "to drink" with Esther, not NRSV's "feast" (7:1). In Hebrew, the same phrase, "wine banquet" (mishteh hayyayin), is repeated three times (7:2, 7, 8), though translated differently in NRSV. Ahasuerus' language is identical to his previous queries to Esther (7:2; cf. 5:3, 6), as is her answer (7:3; cf. 5:8). She again uses flattery and court language to smooth the way with the king. She finally reveals her real "petition"—let my life be given me—and "request"—and the lives of my people. The equation of "my life" and "my people," demonstrates that Esther has become fully Jewish.

Esther uses the exact phrasing of the decree's language (3:13) to explain to Ahasuerus the need for clemency. Her claim that if they "had been sold merely as slaves," she would have held her peace is probably exaggeration (7:4). The remainder of her speech is difficult to translate and interpret, but the general idea is that acting on her request will be to Ahasuerus' advantage.

The realization that his queen's life is threatened seems to sober Ahasuerus, and he demands to know the evildoer (7:5). Haman is revealed as the perpetrator of this racist crime (7:6). The story reminds readers that the way to deal with such evils is to expose them. As long as they remain hidden, they cannot be changed. Ahasuerus is enraged and storms off to the garden.

Haman seizes the king's absence to beg for his life. Again fate intervenes. As Haman is appealing to Esther, Ahasuerus reenters the room and believes Haman is assaulting his wife. If the stakes were not so high, the scene would be a comedy of errors. This gives the king a good explanation for why he is punishing Haman, someone he had promoted, given permission to write the decree, and from whom he had taken a sizable bribe. An anonymous "they" (the eunuchs?) cover his face, signifying shame (e.g., Pss 44:15 [16]; 69:7 [8]; Jer 51:51). The eunuchs point out Haman's gallows and remind Ahasuerus that Mordecai had saved his life. Ahasuerus' command to hang Haman on the gallows he intended for Mordecai is the story's central reversal and an "eye-for-an eye" variety of justice. Such an approach began this catastrophe. Hanging Haman assuages Ahasuerus' anger and brings many benefits to Esther and Mordecai. Esther inherits Haman's house, she is able to reveal Mordecai's relationship to her, the king gives Mordecai the ring he had previously given to Haman (3:10), and Esther sets Mordecai over the house (8:1–2). This brief interlude is reminiscent of the stories of Joseph and Daniel who, even in the midst of calamity, find themselves promoted. It also builds further suspense since Haman's death does not overturn the looming edict.

B. Undoing Haman's Plot (8:3–17)

8:3–8. Esther's Petition. Instead of rational appeal, Esther employs dramatic emotion (8:3). She employs even more flattery than in 7:3. The expressions, "if the thing seems right" and "I have his approval (lit. I am good in his eyes)," occur only here (8:5). Since Ahasuerus throughout is incapable of or unwilling to come up with his own solutions to crises, Esther now tells Ahasuerus what to do. Esther suggests that the previous order be revoked, making it as if the letters stating Haman's decree had never been sent. For Esther, this will prevent the calamity coming to "my people" and "my kindred" (8:6). Now Esther is fully identified as a Jew. Her people and kindred were exactly what she had concealed (2:10).

Ahasuerus' statement to Esther and Mordecai is fraught with ambiguity (8:7). Is he suggesting he has already done enough for them? Or is this a veiled threat? If one moment Haman is writing decrees in the king's name and the next he is hanged, then Esther and Mordecai could also be subjected to Ahasuerus' fickleness. Ahasuerus does not directly accede to Esther's request. He gives them permission to "write as it please you (pl.)."

One of the vexing plot devices is that a written law cannot be revoked. Not even Ahasuerus can change it. A law's morality cannot be challenged, only obeyed. Letters once sent cannot be returned. As a consequence, writing functions throughout the story both to reveal and reinforce existing realities. The first decree reveals and reinforces patriarchal fears and ideology. Haman's decree reveals and reinforces ideologies of racism and violence. Such ideologies are not easily reversed. Outlawing slavery did not end racism, and enfranchising women did not end sexism. In Esther, writing also seeks to create an alternative reality—where women are obedient and Jews no longer exist. What ideologies will Esther and Mordecai's writing reveal and reinforce? What new reality will they seek to create?

8:9–17. Mordecai's Decree. Mordecai alone dictates the decree. Except for brief appearances (9:12–13, 29–32) Esther disappears; as if having served her "moment such as this," she becomes dispensable and can be set aside. One wonders whether Esther's decree would have differed. On one level, the counterdecree changes everything. Instead of sackcloth and ashes, Mordecai parades through the city in royal garb (4:1; 8:15). Instead of weeping and lamenting (4:3), the people celebrate with gladness and joy (8:16–17; cf. 9:22). On another level, nothing changes. The language of decree (3:12–15) and counterdecree (8:8–14) is nearly identical. Drinking continues (8:17; "festival," mishteh). There is nothing to prevent the story from repeating.

C. Enemies Destroyed (9:1–19)

Esther 9:1–10:3 consists of several episodes that were added later to the story, which successfully concludes at 8:17. The first episode relates the events of the day chosen by lot, when power reverses in favor of the Jews (9:1–19). Shifting power is evident in the Jews' actions, which sound more offensive than defensive (9:2). That "the fear of them" had fallen on everyone (9:2) indicates reaction to rising Jewish power rather than divine miracle (9:3–4). The day's mayhem is reported incrementally, moving from the citadel outward to the city and to the provinces.

Five hundred Gentiles are killed in the citadel, including Haman's ten sons (9:6–10). When this is reported to Ahasuerus, he seeks out Esther to find out what is happening in the provinces. He asks if she has a request and asks that the Susans be allowed another day of defending their lives (9:11–13). This explains the different customs regarding which day to celebrate Purim (9:17–18, 21). She further requests to hang Haman's sons (who are already dead). What she requests is as an act of proof, shaming, and warning, analogous to the public display of photographs of the dead bodies of Saddam Hussein and his sons during the Iraq War. The photos offered proof they were dead, shamed the Hussein family and Baathist party, and warned others who might behave similarly that the same could happen to them. Ahasuerus, of course, grants Esther's request (9:14–15). The death count in city and provinces combined is 75,800 over two days. The enormous number symbolizes how widespread and pervasive the anti-Semitic sentiment was.

D. Purim Established (9:20–10:3)

Deliverance from annihilation is officially ritualized through the yearly commemoration of Purim (9:20–32). Since it is not legislated in Torah, letters from Mordecai and Esther sent to all the Jews authorize Purim. Mordecai's writing, though not officially a "law," functions similarly. His record of the events reveals interethnic conflict as the key issue and emphasizes the importance of human actions (9:25). The holiday's repetition reinforces the ethic necessary for confronting the ongoing conflict: whether or not relief is gained from enemies this year, destruction is certain if humans do not act. A ritual aspect of Purim is to send "gifts of food," the same word for the "portion of food" that Hegai gives to Esther when she wins his favor (2:9). Hegai's favoring Esther is arguably what puts Esther in the right place at the right time. Reenacting Hegai's kindness will hopefully spur similar coincidences resulting in deliverance. Mordecai's writing does not envision the elimination of interethnic conflict, but occasional reversals, where there is joy instead of sorrow (4:1–3), "feasting" (mishteh), instead of fasting (4:16–17). This future will happen only if all Jews, everywhere, through all time commemorate Purim (9:27–28).

Esther writes the final letter in the book (9:29–32). Esther is described by both her Persian ("Queen") and Jewish ("daughter of Abihail") identities. Unlike Mordecai, she is never only "the Jew." As a result, Esther bears multiple identities, one is characteristic of Jewish existence in the Diaspora. The only detail recorded is the inclusion of "fasts" and "lamentation (lit. outcry)" in Purim regulations. This is the language describing the responses to Haman's decree (4:1, 3, 16). Although the wish is for "peace (shalom) and security," Esther's writing acknowledges that as long as the ideology of racism and the violence that attends it remain inscribed, so will sorrow and sadness.

On the surface, the final verses celebrate the theme of reversal by describing how Mordecai advanced in the kingdom (cf. Gen 40:40–45; Dan 5:29). A series of parallel statements suggest how he uses his privilege. He uses his "power" for "the good" of "the Jews/his people," suggesting he continues to thwart any would-be Hamans. Mordecai is "popular" with "his many kindred" because he seeks their "welfare (shalom).\" What he had done only for Esther (2:10), he extends to all \"his descendants.\" This positive outlook, however, hides something more sinister, namely, that Ahasuerus \"laid tribute\" on the entire empire. The word for tribute (mas) describes coerced labor (Exod 1:11; Josh 17:13; 1 Kgs 5:13). Now everyone, not just one ethnic group, have been \"sold into slavery.\" Is Mordecai involved in any way? Does this hint at the oppressed becoming the oppressor? If so, from where will relief and deliverance come?

JOB

ADELE BERLIN

OVERVIEW

What is the book of Job about?

The meaning of the book of Job is not easily captured in a single phrase, for it touches on a number of the most important issues in religious thought, including the reason for suffering, divine justice, human intellectual integrity, and the motivation for piety. More broadly, it is a quest for knowledge about the nature of God and the universe, and the place of humans in it. It is essentially an inquiry into human and divine wisdom, about the possibility of arguing against accepted truths, and about exploring in the most abstract way the human condition and the morality of the universe.

Literary character, structure, and language

Job is usually placed under the rubric of wisdom literature, a modern scholarly category that includes biblical and ancient Near Eastern works that address questions of how to live one's life, the meaning and purpose of life, human and divine justice, and other perennial inquiries into the nature of the world and the place of humans in it that range from the practical to the theoretical or philosophical. Biblical wisdom literature—Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job—is written in poetry, as are the psalms and other poems found throughout the Hebrew Bible. But nothing in wisdom literature, or in all of biblical poetry, approaches the sustained intensity or the linguistic virtuosity of the poetry of Job. The vocabulary is extensive and, at times, esoteric, with a number of terms that are found nowhere else in the Bible. The numerous Aramaisms add to the foreignness and the learnedness of the discourses. Parallelisms often extend beyond the requisite two lines into multiple-line parallelisms; and metaphors, often one-liners in other books (like Proverbs) are stretched into long conceits (elaborate comparisons). Rhetorical questions abound, drawing the reader, as well as the participants in the dialogues, into pondering the issues raised. Rational thought is wedded to aesthetically beautiful expression in a way that may seem unexpected to a modern reader, for whom the rational stands in opposition to the emotional, with poetry a form generally reserved for the emotional. The book of Job combines high verbal art and sophisticated inquiry — an intellectual and aesthetic treat.

The book is formally structured, again showing its artifice, although parts of the structure are incomplete. A prose frame, chs. 1–2 and 42:7–17, surrounds the poetic dialogues. The first two prose chapters are further structured as scenes that alternate between earth and heaven. The poetic speeches in 3:1–42:6 alternate between Job and each of his three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, for almost three rounds (Bildad's third speech is short and Zophar lacks a third speech). A fourth speaker, Elihu, is introduced in chs. 32–37. God too speaks, in chs. 38–41, with Job responding. Standing outside of the dialogic structure is ch. 28, a poem about wisdom.

The dialogue, or disputation, is a familiar form in ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature, both in Egypt ("A Dispute Between a Man and His Ba [Soul]") and in Mesopotamia ("A Dialogue Between a Master and His Slave"). Mesopotamia had earlier disputation literature both in Sumer and in Babylonia, in which two parties, usually natural phenomena, argue about which is superior (e.g., the dispute between summer and winter or the tamarisk and the palm). Literature structured on dialogue is perhaps best known from the symposia of ancient Greece.

Most of the Mesopotamian dialogue literature is lighthearted in tone; more serious and closer to Job in contents is "The Babylonian Theodicy," a dialogue between a sufferer and his friend in which the sufferer bemoans the injustices of society while the friend attempts to reconcile these injustices with the accepted views on the divine ordering of the universe. Another Babylonian composition often compared to Job is a monologue called "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom" (sometimes called "The Poem of the Righteous Sufferer" or "The Babylonian Job") describing various calamities that a certain noble experienced and his restoration to health and prosperity by Marduk (the Lord of Wisdom) to whom he offers praise.

Date and Composition

Despite some archaizing vocabulary, the book is generally dated to the Persian period, probably during the fifth to fourth century BCE. The role of the "Satan" resembles that in Zech 3:1 and 1 Chr 21:1, and allusions to Isa 40–66 (postexilic prophetic literature) also support this late dating. Considerable discussion has been devoted to the source-critical question of whether the book was written as one piece or evolved in several stages. Some scholars think that the Elihu speeches are a later addition. Most agree that there existed a folktale about a righteous man named Job (cf. Ezek 14:14, 20) that the author called upon for his main character, although the form in which this tale is recounted in our book seems to have been the product of a sophisticated writer, most likely the author of the poetic sections.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Prologue: Job's Piety (1:1–2:13)

The scenes of the prose prologue alternate between heaven and earth. They are preceded by the narrator's introduction of Job and his family, providing the setting and characterization of Job; and they are followed by the arrival of his three friends to comfort him. The prose frame reappears as an epilogue at the conclusion of the book (42:7–17). Written in an apparently simple style, like other postexilic books such as Jonah and Ruth, the prologue is actually carefully contrived and tightly structured—not at all the way folktales are typically told. It may draw on an ancient folktale, but its present form bears the marks of the Persian period (the character of the Satan and the word q-b-l, "to receive" [2:10], which occurs almost exclusively in late books). It is likely from the same hand responsible for the rest of the book. The author, like the author of Jonah, chose as a main character a figure mentioned in the biblical tradition (2 Kings 14:25 for Jonah and Ezek 14:14 for Job) but about whom little or nothing was said.

A. Introducing Job (1:1–5)

The story opens with a "once upon a time" construction, suggesting to even the ancient reader that the story of Job is not intended as a historical account. Indeed, the set-up is entirely theoretical, for it focuses on a sinless man (patently impossible) and the absurd situation in which God is forced to test a person he knows to be perfect. But such a setting is necessary in order to press in its most extreme and abstract form the questions of the book—God's justice vs. the suffering of the righteous, the accessibility of wisdom, etc. Job is presented as a prosperous aristocrat from Uz, an area equated with or south of Edom (or perhaps associated with Aram, northeast of Israel). Though not an Israelite, he is nevertheless God-fearing and blesses Yahweh, the God of Israel (1:21). The adjectives that describe him, "blameless and upright, one who feared God and turned away from evil" (v. 1) mean that he is morally perfect. The same adjectives will be used by God (1:8; 2:3), confirming the narrator's description and adding that there is no one else on earth like Job. "Greatest of all the people of the east" (v. 3) may refer to Job's wealth or to his wisdom; the men of the east were known for their wisdom, as was Job. The point of making Job a non-Israelite is to add to the theoretical nature of his character, and the point of making him a man of the East is to epitomize his wisdom.

The perfect Job has a family perfect in size (seven and three are favorite biblical numbers for perfection) and gender distribution (more sons than daughters), and a full complement of wealth, a sign of his success and his blessing. He will lose his wealth and children in the reverse order of their mention. Job's exaggerated piety is exemplified by his "preventative" offerings for his adult children (who should be responsible for their own sin-offerings), just in case they may have thought, not uttered, blasphemy while they were feasting. The idea of cursing God, the antithesis of fearing God, is central to the test (1:11, 22; 2:5, 9).

B. The Scene in Heaven: The Test Proposed (1:6–12)

Each scene opens with "one day" (1:6; 1:13; 2:1), focusing attention on a particular moment. God is in the company of a council of heavenly beings, among them the Satan, that is, the Adversary or the Accuser or the Prosecutor (the definite article in the Hebrew indicates that this is not a personal name). Only centuries later does Satan become God's rival, an autonomous power opposed to God (cf. Mark 3:22–30; Luke 22:31; John 13:27; Rev 20:1–10). To test whether Job's piety is motivated by a reward, the Satan proposes to deprive Job of all that signals a reward for piety: wealth and family in the first test and physical health in the second. God has no choice but to accept the Satan's challenge and agree to the test, which places the ultimate blame for Job's loss and suffering on God. The question of why a person should fear God is never fully answered in the book. It is perceived as an absolute value.

C. The Scene on Earth: The Test Enacted (1:13–22)

The test is carried out in a most unrealistic and highly structured manner, whereby Job is informed, in rapid succession, by a sole surviving messenger in each of four instances, that his wealth and children have been destroyed by human attacks (marauding tribes, the Sabeans and the Chaldeans) alternating with natural disasters (lightening and a wind-storm). Job's reaction is to bless God, not to curse him. In the prologue, Job seems passive and accepting of the terrible tragedies that befall him.

D. The Scene in Heaven and on Earth: The Second Test (2:1–10)

The first test having failed to make Job curse God, Satan ups the ante, now requesting that Job suffer physically in his own body in the form of a loathsome skin disease. Yet he still refuses to curse God. He maintains his integrity, another themeword (from the same Hebrew root as blameless in 1:1) that occurs in God's speech (2:3) and in Job's wife's speech (2:9). Job's wife appears in v. 9, urging him to curse God and die. Cursing God was a capital offense (Exod 22:27; Lev 24:10–16; 1 Kings 21:10) and would result in Job's death, presumably here by the hand of God. But Job rejects her advice, insisting that people must accept both the good and the bad from God. If written during the Persian period, this may be a subtle polemic against the dualism of Zoroastrianism, which posits that good and evil originate from separate sources. Interpreters differ on their assessment of Job's wife: was she an agent of the Satan or a loving wife who could not bear to see her husband suffer? "Foolish woman" (v. 10) is a woman who rejects wisdom teaching and speaks disgraceful words (cf. "fool" in Ps 14:1; Deut 32:6).

E. Job's Friends (2:11–13)

Three friends from three unidentifiable places in the vicinity of Uz come to comfort Job, as friends are formally required to do for a mourner. Silent at first, out of respect for Job's suffering, they adopt the signs of mourning along with Job. When they do speak, in the poetic sections, they draw on wisdom ideas that they think will lead Job to an acceptance of his condition; but Job will refuse to be comforted by arguments he cannot accept.

II. Job Curses His Existence (3:1–26)

The poetic section of the book opens with an angry lament by Job, despairing that he had been born. He does not curse God, but curses the day of his birth, wishing it had been erased from the calendar. Words for darkness and gloom predominate in vv. 1–10, as Job attempts to undo the creation of light and revert to the darkness before the creation of the world. Leviathan (v. 8), the primordial sea monster, signals a return to chaos (cf. Ps 74:14; Isa 27:1).

If he had to be conceived, he then wishes that he had perished in the womb or in the birth process or at his first suckling at the breast. His view of death is positive, a relief from suffering. The realm of death is not a place of reward and punishment (that idea comes later), but of a peaceful shadowy existence. Most important, although not explicit here, in the realm of death one is cut off from God (cf. Ps 6:6); and Job would like nothing more than that God would leave him alone. "Fenced in" (v. 23), used here in a negative sense, is, ironically, the same word that the Satan used in a positive sense for God's protection of Job (1:10). The end of the chapter (vv. 20–26) raises the question of why people in despair continue to live when they would prefer to die. However much Job would welcome death, he never contemplates suicide or euthanasia.

III. The Dialogues Between the Three Friends and Job (4:1–27:23)

The dialogues begin at this point, with cycles of speeches alternating between each of the three friends—Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar—and Job, who responds to each friend in turn, refuting the argument just offered at greater length than it was stated. Consistent with the Bible's narrative convention, no more than two parties can participate in a conversation, so it is literally a dialogue, a two-way conversation; there is never a three- or four-way debate among the speakers. There are three rounds of speeches, although Bildad's third speech is short and Zophar lacks a third speech altogether. Perhaps these missing speeches were lost, or, alternatively, this structure signals an intentional petering-out of the debate with no side declared the winner. The argument is not linear, but traverses the same topics, escalating at different points. The friends try various arguments to rationalize and justify the condition in which Job finds himself, while Job vehemently rejects their assumptions and their reasoning, insisting that there is no valid reason for his suffering. Both sides employ emotional language loaded with metaphors as well as logic.

A. The First Cycle (4:1–14:22)

4:1–5:27. Eliphaz's First Speech. Eliphaz, the first to break the silence of 2:13, begins softly and solicitously, reminding Job of his (Job's) wisdom and how he had helped others in the past. But, he adds, when Job himself is afflicted, he seems unable to offer himself the same wise and comforting advice he had offered to others. This is a subtle rebuke to Job that he should rely on the traditional answers to the problem of suffering, summed up by "See, we have searched this out; it is true" (5:27). Indeed, Eliphaz offers the conventional wisdom—that the innocent are not destroyed; only those who do evil are punished (4:7–11). "Fear of God and integrity" (4:6) are both attributes of Job (1:1, 8; 2:3) and are so recognized by Eliphaz, who suggests that they should provide the explanation Job seeks. While the terms are near synonyms, the modern reader may think of integrity as maintaining what one thinks is right, which in Job's case is his innocence. This type of integrity risks undermining Job's fear of God.

Eliphaz then (4:12–21) describes a revelatory vision he had, an eerie dream-like experience of communication with the divine (dreams were thought to be a way in which the deity communicated with humans), in which he was told that no human can be more righteous than God. This passage is difficult; some scholars think it is misplaced and should be assigned to Job, following his lament in ch. 3, rather than to Eliphaz. Most important is the rhetorical question, implying a negative answer, "Can mortals be righteous before God" (4:17), that is, can humans prove they are righteous if God has condemned them (suffering being a sign of God's judgment of one's guilt). To be righteous before God is precisely what Job seeks to accomplish, but the friends declare that it is impossible, that God's standard of justice, as they understand it, cannot be overridden. Cf. 9:2; 15:14–16; 25:4–5. Humans are frail and transient, and they fall short of God's standard. Humans lack the ultimate wisdom that is God's. This lack of parity between God and humans will continue to play out in the book, especially in God's speeches in chs. 38–39. "Even in his servants he puts no trust, and his angels he charges with error" (4:18) shows that even the divine beings in the heavenly court fall short of perfection; an ironic statement hinting that the Satan was wrong, although, of course, Eliphaz knows nothing of Satan's actions in ch. 1.

Implying that Job has become a fool (5:2), one who rejects the teachings of the wise, Eliphaz urges Job to seek God, to acknowledge that God does great and mysterious things, that he frustrates the wise but ultimately saves the needy. In other words, trust in God takes precedence over rational understanding of the situation. "How happy is the one whom God reproves" (5:17) suggests that Job should welcome his suffering as divine correction, a way of improving Job. At the same time, says Eliphaz, trying to have it both ways, suffering is temporary, and God will ultimately heal Job, end his suffering, and grant him the ideal life with many children and death at a ripe old age with undiminished strength (5:24–27).

6:1–7:21. Job's Response to Eliphaz. Job's words echo Eliphaz's, but with a different twist. He opens with a description of his suffering, as if to intimate that that is the reason he spoke so rashly, seeming to agree with Eliphaz's judgment about Job's earlier speech. But Job is not about to apologize for what he said, nor to retract his words. Here and throughout, Job maintains that he is correct. And in the last part of his speech, in ch. 7, he reiterates even more strongly his thoughts about the misery of life and the injustice he feels.

Eliphaz counseled Job to seek God; Job says that he wishes that God would grant his request, which is that God should let him die (6:8–10). Job questions his ability to remain patient much longer, and insists that he has not "denied the words of the Holy One" (6:10), as Eliphaz implied. This phrase may mean that Job has not cursed God, even under duress; or it may mean, rather, that Job has not hidden the suffering that God has caused him.

In 6:14–27, Job lashes out in a biting critique of his friends, whom he compares to the treacherous and undependable waters of the desert wadis that flood in the winter and dry up in the summer, leading rich caravans from distant places to get lost in the desert wasteland. The friends have, likewise, let Job down. He never asked them for money, only comfort and wisdom; but they have offered nothing to comfort Job or to instruct him. Eliphaz accused Job of wrongful speech, but Job finds nothing in Eliphaz's speech that is right.

Chapter 7 begins with a description of Job's condition, similar to some of the psalms of lament. But unlike the psalms of lament, this is not a prayer to God but rather an angry outpouring, parodying the psalms, about the frailty and transience of human life, so incommensurate with the blow dealt by God against Job. "Am I the Sea, or the Dragon, that you set a guard over me" (7:12), asks Job, meaning that he is not a powerful cosmic force like the primeval waters that God subdued at the time of creation. He is insignificant vis-à-vis God and wants only to be left alone, away from God's scrutiny. "What are human beings, that you make so much of them" (7:17) is a parody of Ps 8, and vv. 19–21 echo Ps 39 with a twist. What sin could Job have committed that would harm God? Why does not God just wipe it away and be done with it (7:20). Job is not admitting here that he sinned, only that for whatever reason (which he cannot fathom) God has made him a target; God's reaction is all out of proportion. The only way Job can avoid God's scrutiny is by dying, for then God cannot find him any longer (7:21). This speech, like ch 3, views life as burdensome, akin to the hard service of a laborer (7:1; similar to parts of Ecclesiastes), and it views death as a release (7:15–16; cf. 3:18–20). Job has ostensibly been addressing Eliphaz, but his words are really aimed at God.

8:1–22. Bildad's First Speech. As is common in disputation literature, where the debaters must refute the words of their opponents, Bildad reacts to the last speaker's (Job's) words, characterizing them as a lot of hot air. Bildad asks a leading question: "Does God pervert justice?" (8:3). Of course, Bildad does not think so, but this is precisely what Job accuses God of doing, and it is the crux of the dialogues. Bildad makes the extremely uncomfortable observation that if Job's children were destroyed, they must have done something to deserve it. (Job's earlier critique about the lack of support he got from his friends is amply justified here.) As for Job, if he will supplicate God and if he is pure and upright (readers know that Job is and Job knows it, but Bildad seems uncertain), then God will restore him. Bildad paints a lovely picture of the future while omitting the darkness of Job's present suffering. Like Eliphaz, he urges Job to accept the wisdom of previous generations. The end of the chapter contains a plant metaphor equating a plant without water to a person without God, a common image found also in Ps 1 and Jer 17:5–8. Both the plant and the person who ignores God will perish. (The text is difficult in vv. 16–19).

9:1–10:22. Job's Response to Bildad. Ostensibly agreeing with Bildad that God does not pervert justice, Job asks if, theoretically, a human could win a legal case against God. God is so great, says Job, describing him in the cosmic terms of creation and control over the forces of nature, that who could stand up to him? Even a righteous person would have no chance against such power. In some ways, this section anticipates God's speeches in chs. 38–39, but in their present context the words express Job's hopeless inadequacy and frustration; God is too large for a human to deal with, too preoccupied with big things to even notice the trouble of one insignificant human.

9:25–10:22. Job then contemplates his own life, transient and miserable, wondering yet again what he could possibly do to prove his innocence. Job calls for an arbiter to settle the case between himself and God; for as it stands now, God is both the judge and a party to the dispute. Job requests to know what error he has committed. Is God sadistic, Job asks; and if not, why does he pick on Job so much, discovering faults that do not exist? Job accuses God of having created him with the intent to find sin in him. (Cf. Ps 139 for a more positive view of God's formation of the individual.) Better, then, that Job had never been born or that he be permitted to die, for only in Sheol, the realm of the dead, can he escape God's scrutiny and condemnation. Verses 18–22 echo ch. 3. The speech as a whole inverts tropes that are usually invoked to praise God—God's mastery over the cosmos and his intimate knowledge of the humans he has created—using them to criticize God.

11:1–20. Zophar's First Speech. Like Bildad but in even stronger language, Zophar criticizes Job's speech concerning both its quantity and quality, pointing out that a lot of babble does not make the speaker correct. "My conduct is pure" (v. 4) is better rendered "my teaching is pure." Zophar is paraphrasing and criticizing Job's earlier words. "But O that God would speak" (11:5), wishes Zophar, thinking that God would contradict Job's claim of innocence. Of course, in line with so many ironies in the book, Job has been hoping all along for God to speak, but for the opposite reason. God does finally speak beginning in ch. 38. In vv. 7–10 Zophar describes the impossibility of understanding God's ways, specifically God's limits, which extend beyond the cosmos. In one sense, this is an answer that the book provides to the problem of the righteous sufferer. But Zophar offers this advice in a belittling manner, not taking Job's words seriously and in essence calling him as stupid as an ass (the apparent meaning of the unclear Hebrew phrase in v. 12). Here, as at several other points in the book, a solution to Job's inquiry is glimpsed, but the context makes it unacceptable. Zophar concludes by advising Job to act with proper contrition (since Zophar is certain Job has sinned), and then his condition will improve.

The friends have offered the conventional answers: only sinful people suffer, God forgives sin if the sinner repents, suffering is good discipline for a person, and one cannot understand God's ways. These points may seem contradictory, but each has merit on its own and some or all of them are still offered today when one is confronted with tragedy. Yet Job will not settle for easy answers; answers that are dissonant with his experience bring him no comfort.

12:1–14:22. Job's Response. This long speech evinces several moods. Job opens with a response to his friends, especially Zophar, that is angrily sarcastic (12:1–13:19), but then addresses God (13:20–14:22), first using a legal metaphor followed by contemplative remarks on the transience of human life.

In 12:1–13:19 Job reacts angrily to Zophar's insult about his lack of wisdom, arguing that he is no less wise than the friends, who present themselves as the epitome of wise men. Yet Job has become a laughingstock to them—another injustice that he suffers. 12:6, somewhat obscure, seems to point out the unfairness of the world in which those who provoke God are not punished, contrary to what the friends preach. That God is responsible for this state of affairs is readily apparent, even to dumb animals. This is a rebuttal, in the form of a parody of a wisdom discourse, to Zophar's calling Job a stupid ass and to the notion that wisdom is difficult to obtain but can be achieved if one tries hard enough.

In 12:13–13:2, on the other hand, wisdom and strength are the properties of God, who uses them to control the world. No one can undo what he does. Most of what God does, according to this passage, is destructive and negative; this is a satirical reversal of a hymn of praise for God. Job concludes that what he knows he has learned from his own experience, unlike the friends who rely on conventional assumptions. He insists that he is not inferior to his friends.

Still addressing the friends, in 13:3–19, Job insists that he wants to argue his case directly with God. The friends, he says, have spoken falsely about God (God will agree in 42:7), and they are taking God's side unfairly. In fact, if Job can indeed come before God, that will vindicate him, for "the godless shall not come before him" (13:16). The legal metaphor is prominent in this passage. Verse 15 is a famously difficult passage, sometimes translated "Though he kill me, yet I will hope in him."

In 13:20–14:22 Job pleads with God to desist from troubling him, or at least, as if in a legal scenario, to reveal to him what sin he may have committed. In despair he notes that human life is fleeting and is determined by God. If so, why does God not turn away and let humans enjoy whatever short life he has allotted them? For when humans die, they are dead forever. Job then imagines a temporary death (14:12–17), hiding in Sheol until God's anger passes; afterwards he would live again, this time as a person whose sin is out of God's sight. It is doubtful that the idea of resurrection or a belief in the next world had developed by the time the book was written, although perhaps the idea was beginning to be formulated. More likely, this is a poetic metaphor for an unrealistic situation, a wish on Job's part for a temporary reprieve. 14:1, "a mortal, born of woman," has the nuance of human frailty (see 15:14). 14:2, the imagery of grass and flowers signifies transience, whereas a tree (see 14:7–9) can regenerate.

B. The Second Cycle (15:1–21:34)

With some of the same ideas they used earlier, the friends and Job engage in a second round of dialogues. Here the tone is less sympathetic and more abstract. The focus is on the defense of accepted religious ideology, particularly on the punishment of sinners.

15:1–35. Eliphaz Speaks Again. Eliphaz, using rhetorical questions typical of wisdom dialogue, again criticizes Job's speeches but attributes them to Job's sinfulness, not to his anguish, as he did earlier. Does Job possess some secret wisdom that no one else has, asks Eliphaz with sarcasm. Wisdom that goes back to the time of creation and is therefore like God's wisdom? The implied answer is "no," that Job's wisdom is of recent vintage whereas the friends have the weight of generations of wisdom on their side. Moreover, no human is perfect; even the divine beings are less than perfect (15:15–16; cf. 4:18). But those who are indeed wicked will meet a bad end, described by Eliphaz in lavish detail and with great assurance. The portrait of the sinner includes pain, despair, and destitution; and the absence of the ideal life, for he will die before his time (not in a ripe old age) without progeny to survive him (15:32–33). The emphasis is on retribution, which will come in this life, although the description sounds in part like later images of hell. This chapter is the counterpart of Eliphaz's speech in ch. 5, where he describes the reward of the righteous.

16:1–17:16. Job Responds to Eliphaz. The verbal insults continue as Job dismisses the words of his friends. But the greater criticism is leveled against God for his savage violence against Job, described in the most physical terms, with a military metaphor added (16:12–15). God has handed Job over to the wicked (16:11) who jeer at him (16:10). But the real enemy is God, who has decimated Job. This discourse is similar to psalmic laments (see also Lam 3:21) but unlike typical laments, it never resolves itself in the sufferer's plea for God to save him and the assurance that God will do so. Legal discourse then takes over, with Job calling upon witnesses to testify on his behalf. "O earth, do not cover my blood" (16:18) is a plea, in legal terms, that the crimes against him be avenged (see Gen 4:10). Parallel to the earth's crying out for him, Job also seeks a heavenly witness ("my witness is in heaven," 16:19), an angel-like figure who can serve as witness and judge in the law suit between Job and God. Chapter 17 expresses Job's despair at his situation—mocking and social ostracism are common motifs in laments—and his sense that the solution to his predicament is death, a thought that he earlier welcomed as an escape from God but here mentions sardonically as the only place he can find a secure home, given the social rejection he finds in life.

18:1–21. Bildad Speaks Again. Less patient than before, Bildad chastises Job, warning him that the natural order of the world will not make an exception in his case, and that the wicked person will receive the harsh punishment he deserves. That punishment is described in graphic detail, including the failure of his schemes, the ensnarement of the wicked, an assault by terror, and the destruction of his home and family, until in the end he is entirely cut off from society; there is no continuity of his family line and no memory of him, except for horror at his fate. The metaphors are largely military and/or hunting images, followed by loss of security and family. The loss of progeny and the family line is especially devastating in the ancient context. The wicked is defined (17:21) as one who does not know God. While Bildad does not say that Job is wicked, and that therefore his situation was deserved, some interpretations infer it. Alternatively, Bildad may be speaking more theoretically, reinforcing the certainty of the traditional claim that sees the moral order reflected in the just awarding of reward and punishment.

19:1–29. Job Responds to Bildad. The war of words continues. Job accuses Bildad of verbal abuse, insisting that God has wronged him (Job) and that he has not sinned. Job's reply calls on military imagery that is reminiscent of Bildad's imagery for the wicked, including darkness, tearing him down, troops advancing against him and encircling him (in a siege). Job has been alienated from his family, friends, and servants. Job is, then, suffering in some ways as Bildad described for the wicked, but Job's description is aimed at evoking sympathy, not condemnation. In fact, he calls for pity from his friends instead of their constant accusations against him. They persecute him as God does rather than offering him support. "O that my words were written down" (19:23): Job wishes to preserve his words, either written in a book or engraved on a rock or monument, presumably so that in some future time he will be proved right. "For I know that my Redeemer lives" (19:25): this famous verse and the following ones are often interpreted Christologically (hence NRSV's capitalization of "Redeemer") to refer to the distant future when Job will be vindicated. It is also used to support the notion of bodily resurrection. However, in the context of the book, it makes more sense to understand this phrase as referring to a time near the present, while Job is still alive, not after his death. The Hebrew term for "redeemer" is go'el, meaning a kinsman who is responsible for protecting the interests of the family when the normal avenues of protecting were not present (Lev 25:25, 28; Deut 19:6–12; Ruth 4:4–6; Jer 32:6–7), be it the buying back of inherited land, the ransoming of someone from slavery, or the avenging of a murder. Although Job may wish to have his words preserved, he really wants his vindication now, while still in his flesh (19:26), and here he is expressing the hope that, although there is no one in his immediate family to defend him (since he has been alienated from them), there may yet arise a kinsman to take his side and defend his interests. Better, then, to translate the Hebrew copula waw that precedes the word "redeemer" as "but" rather than "for." It is open to interpretation whether Job has an actual person in mind or is using the term metaphorically for a heavenly intercessor like the one in 16:19. Verses 25–29 present a number of textual difficulties but one can discern a hopeful note here, that Job still believes in himself and in the rightness of his cause, which he expects will be demonstrated, and that ultimately the friends will be judged to have been wrong.

20:1–29. Zophar Speaks Again. Zophar is agitated by Job's words, which threaten to undermine the friends' basic principle of reward and punishment. He insists that since the beginning of time, the wicked thrive only briefly and are then sure to be punished. The chapter is devoted to the punishment of the wicked, portrayed in mounting intensity. Verses 4–11 elaborate on the ephemeral nature of the wicked, who "fly away like a dream" (v. 8) and will no longer be remembered. Any happiness that the wicked enjoy will be fleeting, and any wealth they acquire will quickly disappear so that their children "will seek the favor of the poor" (v. 10). Wealth was thought to be a sign of God's blessing, as in the description of Job in 1:2–3, so the wealth of the wicked could not be lasting. The wicked may seem to prosper for a while, but ultimately they will get what they deserve. Verses 12–23 use metaphors related to eating. The wicked person savors evil, holding it in his mouth and enjoying its taste. But this delicious food soon turns into venomous poison in his body, making him sick and ultimately killing him. The wicked is unable to ingest the truly good food, "honey and curds" (v. 17), a symbol of plenty, as in Isa 7:15 (see also the related phrase describing the promised land as a land flowing with milk and honey [Exod 3:8, 17]). Although the wicked person "eats," he cannot "digest" that which he has taken unlawfully; he cannot benefit from his ill-gotten gain, obtained by oppressing the poor. Verse 23 forms a transition between the imagery of the wicked person's eating and God's punishment; God will rain down punishment upon the wicked like food (the Hebrew is obscure). The following verses describe the punishment in terms of metal weapons that attack the wicked and destroy his body. The image begins as a description of a human battle and then turns into a cosmic destruction of the wicked by darkness, fire, and flood. ("The possessions of their house will be carried away" in v. 28 is better rendered "A flood will carry away his house.") Heaven and earth reveal his iniquity and rise up against him. Ending as he began, Zophar declares that this dreadful punishment was ordained by God.

21:1–34. Job Responds to Zophar. Job refutes Zophar's picture of the punishment of the wicked, and by so doing he overturns the foundation of the moral order of the world, as perceived by the friends and the tradition they represent. The principle that the righteous are rewarded and the wicked punished is the foundation of traditional wisdom, as taught in Proverbs and by Job's friends. But Job's personal experience contradicts this principle; and Job's wisdom comes from experience (and later from the revelation of God), not from the traditional wisdom teachings of the ages. We can sympathize with Job, for how often in our own lives do we see the wicked prosper, yet we try to maintain our faith in a moral order. Sometimes, we do so by projecting the time of reward and punishment into the future, after death. But this option was not available to Job; for him and the people of his time, reward and punishment must occur in this life. For Job, then, his own experience stands in direct contradiction with traditional teaching, and that contradiction cannot be harmonized.

The wicked live on, says Job (vv. 7–8), living to a ripe old age, gaining power, and having many children. Old age and much progeny are the blessings of the pious, here portrayed as the fortune of the wicked. The picture of a secure and happy life is further developed: secure homes, successful animal husbandry, an expanding family that brings delight. Furthermore, their wickedness is manifest in their rejection of God (vv. 14–15). And, lest one say that the punishment comes in the time of the children (5:4; 18:19; 20:10), Job replies that the wicked cannot know or care what happens after they are dead, hence it is no punishment at all. Job concludes that reward and punishment are random, without reason (vv. 23–26). Those who think that ultimately the house and the memory of the wicked will perish should consult world-travelers who have seen more than most people. They will report that even after death the wicked are honored (vv. 28–33). In describing the fate of the wicked, Job's friends have brought him not consolation but rather nonsense (hevel, the theme-word of Ecclesiastes) that is sacrilege (ma'al; NRSV, "falsehood").

C. The Third Cycle (22:1–27:33)

This last round of dialogues among the three friends is shorter than the first two. Bildad's speech is unusually short and under-developed as it stands in ch. 25, although it seems to continue in 26:5–14 under what is labeled as Job's speech. Zophar does not speak at all in this cycle (although some scholars ascribe 27:13–23 to him). Many scholars suspect that part of what was once a more complete cycle, modeled on the first two cycles, had been lost in antiquity and some of the remaining parts have been dis-arranged (before the time of the Septuagint and the Targum of Job at Qumran, which contain the same speeches as the MT). An alternative explanation is that the dialogue intentionally breaks down at this point, the two sides (Job vs. his friends) having made their arguments many times over but being unable to resolve their differing views. To the extent that there is a satisfying solution in the book, it will come later and not from the three friends.

22:1–30. Eliphaz Speaks for the Third Time. Human piety can neither harm nor benefit God, says, Eliphaz, so therefore God is an objective judge of human behavior. Reiterating the accepted principle of reward and punishment, Eliphaz here declares in no uncertain terms that Job has acted wickedly, a point that had been suggested before but only tentatively. Job's wickedness is exemplified by moral and social wrongdoings: economic oppression of family and of the underprivileged in society (the poor who are hungry, widows, and orphans). Similar tropes are used by the prophets in their criticisms of Israelite society. Verse 6 speaks of pledges for loans, here seized "for no reason"—apparently suggesting that the borrower was not given the chance to repay the loan. A person who had nothing of value would give his clothing as a pledge for a loan (Exod 22:25–26; Deut 24:17). NRSV's "from your family" is actually "from your brothers/ fellows" in Hebrew and refers to Israelites in general. The portrait is of a greedy and uncaring person.

In vv. 12–14 the normally positive description of God's position in the heavens is twisted into a negative one. Echoing Job's statement in 21:22b, Eliphaz ascribes to Job the idea that God is so high up in the heavens that he cannot see what is happening on earth. The clouds that envelop God (typical of theophany language; the clouds shield humans from direct contact with the divine) block out his vision (compare Lam 3:44 where the clouds block out prayer). The notion that God does not know what people do is typical of the wicked (e.g., Pss 10:11; 73:11). Eliphaz warns Job not to side with the wicked but to learn from the punishment that they have suffered in the past. The wicked will always be cut off, much to the satisfaction of the righteous. Eliphaz ends by entreating Job to agree with God rather than opposing him, to repent and to pray. Then will God favor him and grant him success.

23:1–24:25. Job Responds. Job seeks God but not the way Eliphaz intended. Using some of the same images for quite different effect, Job insists that he is pious and that if he could find God, he would present his case to him and be acquitted of guilt. Far from suggesting that God cannot see what happens on earth, Job insists that God knows that Job is innocent (23:10). Yet God acts in his own way, doing as he likes, which is what terrifies Job. Indeed, as Eliphaz intimated, there are moral and social injustices in the world, but they are not of Job's doing. Why does God allow them to continue? If he is a just God, why does justice come so slowly?

Job's list of wrongs in the world (24:2–17) is longer and more rhetorically developed than Eliphaz's. It begins with items that one finds in legal collections and prophetic chastisements, like moving boundary markers, oppressing the poor, seizing pledges, and even committing murder, theft, and adultery. But the picture of misery that these wrongs generate is stronger than any condemnation of the evildoers. The poor are completely impoverished, forced off their land, hungry and without shelter against the weather, serving as day laborers who cannot benefit from the food they gather and process for the wealthy. In their weakened and unprotected state, they fall victim at night to murderers, thieves, and adulterers. But it is not so much the criminals who are condemned; rather it is God, who permits his world to deteriorate into lawlessness and social breakdown. God, who knows the time of justice (24:1), does not bring it about in a timely manner.

These chapters are linguistically difficult, and not all passages (especially 24:18–24) altogether comport with their contexts.

25:1–6. Bildad Speaks Briefly. This snippet of a speech may continue in 26:5–14, in what is now included in Job's speech. In terms that echo ancient myths of creation, Bildad declares the superiority of God over everything. "He makes peace" (v. 2) among the rebellious members of the heavenly court (perhaps an ironic nod to the Satan in ch. 1). "How then can a mortal be righteous before God . . . one born of woman" (v. 4); see 4:17–19 and 15:14–16. Verses 5–6 remind us of Ps. 8, which, for a different purpose, puts humans low on the divine hierarchy; cf. also Job 4:18.

26:1–27:23. Job Responds. Job's first words are sarcastic questions, asking how Bildad has helped him. The attribution of the passage from 26:5–14, describing God's power in creation, is uncertain. Perhaps it is the continuation of Bildad's speech in ch. 25; or perhaps these are Job's words, seemingly agreeing with Bildad's description of God but actually opposing him by describing a God who is cruelly powerful. There are strong echoes of the combat myth of creation. In 26:5–6 the emphasis is on the reaction to God in the netherworld, the place of the dead, especially the "shades," the spirits of dead kings and heroes. The formation of Zaphon, God's cosmic mountain, is mentioned next, followed by the creation of the celestial domain. Verse 10 describes the horizon set upon the waters (cf. Prov 8:27), the place where light and darkness meet. God's defeat of the primordial waters or water-monsters (Sea, Rahab, serpent) form the climax of God's awesome power that none can withstand.

27:1–23. Swearing by God's name (a serious act in the ancient world that makes God a party to the oath), the very God who deprived him of justice, Job insists that he will maintain his integrity (cf. 2:3, 9), meaning that he will not speak falsely nor admit any wrongdoing. In vv. 7–10 Job curses his enemy, whose fate, Job hopes, will be like that of the wicked, described graphically by Zophar in ch. 20 and echoed here. But who is the "enemy"? If it is God, as some suggest, the curse that God will not hear his cry makes little sense. If it is the friends, this is indeed far stronger language against them than has occurred before. Or it may be a rhetorical mode of expression in which Job is actually describing himself, who is being treated by God as if he were wicked. In fact, the resemblance to Zophar's earlier speech in ch. 20 makes Job's speech here look like a parody of it whereby Job is implying his rejection of Zophar's traditional pre-packaged ideas. Job may appear to others to be wicked, to judge by his abject condition, but it is his "enemy" or opponent who is the wicked one, not himself.

IV. A Poem about Wisdom (28:1–28)

This gem of a poem is justly famous, but its place in the structure of the book is uncertain. Since it has no introductory heading to identify the speaker, most scholars think it stands outside the dialogues, either as a later addition or as an original interlude. Others take it as part of Job's preceding speech or even as part of Elihu's speeches that follow in chs. 32–37 (ch. 28 having been misplaced). It seems best to understand the chapter as an interlude that is integral to the book—the linguistic style is similar to the book's other poetry—but not part of any character's speech. The poem focuses on the question of the accessibility of wisdom that has been an underlying subject of the dialogues and that will be further developed when God speaks from the whirlwind (chs. 38–41). The poem falls into three sections: vv. 1–11, 12–19, 20–28, marked by "But where shall wisdom be found?" (v. 12) and "Where then does wisdom come from?" (v. 20).

28:1–11. While most commentators understand this section as a description of mining, some think that it is really about creation, or perhaps a combination of the two in which human mining is analogous to God's creating the world. In any case, this section portrays the world underneath the ground, a world very different from that above the ground (see v. 5). The underneath world is the source for precious metals and stones, to whose value wisdom may be compared (see Prov 3:13–15); in ancient Near Eastern thought, the underneath world is also a potential place where wisdom may be located. Wisdom, like these precious materials, is hard to find and requires great effort to extract. "A mine for silver" (v. 1) in Hebrew is "a source for silver." NRSV chooses the "mining" interpretation. "Miners" (v. 3) is in Hebrew "he." Some commentators think the reference is God rather than a human miner. Verses 7–11 say that humans can seek out places and extract treasures where no other creature can, even birds of prey, which have extraordinarily fine eyesight, and wild animals who roam far to find their prey.

28:12–19. Wisdom is even more difficult to find than precious materials. Humans do not know how to find it. It is not in the land of the living, nor is it in the deep primordial waters, the deep (sweet waters) or the sea (salt waters)—the waters which lie beneath the earth and are even deeper than the mines of the previous section. Wisdom's value is far above the most expensive commodities and the most exotic gems.

28:20–28. No living creature knows where to find wisdom, not even the far-seeing birds. It is neither in the land of the living (v. 13) nor in the realm of death (v. 22). Only God, all-seeing and all-knowing, knows where wisdom is, for he used it to create the world. (On the idea that wisdom was used in creation see Prov 8:22–30 and Ps 104:24.) Wisdom, then, belongs to God, and humans can acquire it only through fearing God. The culmination of this chapter agrees with Prov 1:7 and Eccl 12:13—that the prerequisite for wisdom is the fear of the Lord. "Fear of the LORD . . . depart from evil" (v. 28) echoes the description of Job in 1:1. One may conclude, then, that Job is indeed wise. In that light, readers can appreciate Job's final speeches.

V. Job's Concluding Speech (29:1–31:40)

Coming after the interlude of ch. 28, these speeches of Job are not to be taken as concluding his argument to his friends, but as a self-standing speech, different in tone from the dialogues, in which Job presents himself and his situation to anyone who will listen (the implied audience is unclear). Job has actually not had the opportunity to do this earlier: in the prologue he is presented by the narrator; and in the dialogues by the friends, with Job providing "corrections" to their estimate of him; but here he speaks for himself, telling his story in his own words. He begins (ch. 29) by wishing for the good old days when God was beneficent to him and he was successful in life, enjoying high status and the respect of his community, where his every word was valued (unlike the reception his friends gave his words now). He then laments (ch. 30) that now younger men deride him and God does not heed his cry. He reiterates his innocence (ch. 31) using the language of oath-taking—if he did X, may Y happen to him—whereby a person legally proclaims his innocence. This section has often been compared with the Egyptian Book of the Dead, wherein the deceased declares to Osiris, the divine ruler of the realm of the dead, and to forty-two judges that he is innocent of a specific list of offenses. It also bears some resemblance to Samuel's farewell address (1 Sam 12:1–5) in which he rhetorically asks the community if he has defrauded anyone and the Israelites answer formulaically that he has not.

29:1–25. Job wishes for life as it was before his suffering, when he felt cared for by God, as evident by the fact that he led a successful life, surrounded by his immediate family (vv. 4–6), respected by his peers at the upper echelons of society (vv. 7–11), and a benefactor to those at lower socio-economic levels (vv. 12–17). No one spoke when Job spoke (vv. 9–11; speech is important at the end of the chapter as well, and at the beginning of ch. 30). He aided the unfortunate and saw to it that the wrong-doer did not oppress them. In a nutshell, the social values of society—honor and social justice—were embodied in Job. This section provides a complement, with different emphasis, to the narrator's description of Job in 1:1–3, a Godfearing person of substance and social standing. Job expected to live this way forever (there was no reason he should not), enjoying a long and vigorous life with his family and the continued respect of the community who looked to him for counsel and approval.

30:1–19. Now, in the language that combines lament and anger, Job describes his fallen social state, when even younger men with no status mock him. Job describes these people as outcasts and scavengers who shame and abuse Job. Job has lost his honor and his place in society. He suffers mentally and physically; physical pain and disease is often the way mental anguish is described, here and in the psalms.

30:20–31. Addressing God (as he might have been doing all along), Job complains that God has not heard his cries and has not helped him. In fact, God is cruel to Job, harassing him and bringing him close to death (which earlier Job wished for but here uses as a sign of extreme suffering). Despite his care for the needy, which should have brought him God's blessing, Job is beset with misery, socially isolated in the mirror image of his former state. The description echoes Lamentations: the ostrich and the jackal were thought to be nasty animals who frequented ruins or lived in the wasteland (cf. Lam 4:3, where they are considered bad parents); blackened skin and bones dried out from the heat render the person unrecognizable (cf. Lam 4:8, where they are the result of starvation in the siege). Job's former public persona has been erased; hence, he ceased to exist. In a society where one's identity was a function of one's belonging to and hierarchy in a group, and where the individual was of little import, this is the equivalent of identity-theft.

31:1–40. Believing in both himself and in God, Job seeks a way out of the conundrum in which he finds himself. He declares God's omniscience, which must include the knowledge of Job's righteousness. Job insists, indeed, formally declares in an oath-like formula ("If I have done X, let Y happen to me"), that he has conducted himself properly in a long list of situations.

31:1–12. The first theme is sexual propriety. Job has not lusted after women nor committed adultery (a capital offense). Warnings against such behavior are directed at young men in Proverbs; here, then, Job portrays himself as the "wise" person that Proverbs seeks to produce. Had he engaged in inappropriate sexual behavior, Job would deserve severe punishment, which he states not in terms of legal penalties but in terms of measure for measure retribution. In v. 8, sowing and reaping may be taken literally or may be metaphors for having sex. A clearer case is in v. 10, where "grind" and "kneel" have sexual connotations. If, says Job, I have violated another man's wife, let my own wife be violated.

31:13–23. The second theme is care for those who are lower on the socio-economic scale: servants and the poor. Job has not ignored or rejected the grievances of his servants, for they, like he, are God's creations (v. 15). Job speaks here not as a powerful owner of slaves or as a judge, but as one who can empathize with his fellow human beings. An extension of that sentiment is his generosity to the poor, including the orphan and the widow (who often exemplify disadvantaged members of society). Charity to the poor is a common biblical trope. The punishment suggested by Job if he had not been charitable is that his shoulder and arm, symbols of his strength and control, be broken. He would then be subject to superior power, as the poor were to his own power.

31:24–28. The third theme is loyalty to the important values, mainly to the fear of God. Job has not been seduced by money, nor has he been enticed by false worship of the celestial bodies. Rather, he remained loyal to God.

31:29–34. This section deals with proper behavior to outsiders: enemies and sojourners. Job did not rejoice at the downfall of his enemies, and he specifically did not curse them. And he provided hospitality for wayfarers. The last phrase in v. 33 may be rendered as "like Adam" instead of "as others do." The allusion is to Adam's hiding his disobedience from God (Gen 3:8). The effect is to make any failure of Job's social conduct equivalent to disobeying God; and, more to the point, it also makes any attempt to hide a sin from God impossible. Just as Adam could not hide his sin, so Job could not hide any sin from God. Therefore, Job must be sinless. Why, then, must he fear everyone and remain isolated?

31:35–37. Job pleads for God to hear his case, to provide a response to his declaration of innocence, or to draw up an accusation against him that Job would proudly display. This would give Job an even better chance to prove his innocence.

31:38–40. These verses return to the formula "If I have done X, may Y happen to me." They concern proper disposition of the land and its produce. On one level, Job is saying that if he has taken from the land anything that does not belong to him, may the land never produce food for him again. On a second and more serious level, Job alludes to the idea that the land of Israel rids itself of anyone who has polluted it by immoral offenses (Deut 24:3). This is an allusion to national exile, which seems to be applied here to Job's sense of personal exile from God and from his society.

The words of Job are ended (31:40). The narrator or editor signals the end of the dialogues. (Cf. Ps 72:20; Jer 51:64, which mark the end of a major section or subcollection.)

VI. The Elihu Speeches (32:1–37:24)

Most scholars think the Elihu speeches are a later addition to the book. The end of Job's speeches, and the friends' speeches as well, is formally noted in 31:40 and 32:1, so the introduction of Elihu is certainly a new move in the book. That this character is not mentioned among the friends in the prologue (chs. 1–2) or the epilogue (42:7–17) suggests that he was not originally present. He seems to know the earlier speeches since he quotes from them more frequently than the earlier speakers do. The style of his discourse is different from the earlier dialogues, with more Aramaisms and a preference for the divine name "El." Elihu presents himself as something of an upstart, a younger man who thinks he can accomplish what the three friends failed to do. Modern readers often find him to be a windbag, a portrait with which Elihu might agree (see 32:18–20). He speaks at length; there are four speeches, as marked by editorial phrases like "Then Elihu continued," but they follow one another with no interruption or response from Job or anyone else. While he does not actually add a new line of thought to the previous arguments, he emphasizes the idea of speaking even more than the others and also the idea of "knowledge." His main line of argument is that God is just. He agrees with the three friends that Job must have sinned, but he focuses less on Job's sin and more on the greatness of God, arguing that Job cannot put himself on the same level as the deity. His description of God's power, especially in ch. 37, prepare the way for God's speeches that follow immediately in ch. 38.

32:1–5. The narrator introduces Elihu in a few prose lines telling us four times that he was angry, at Job because Job thought himself more righteous than God and at the friends because they could not convince Job otherwise.

32:6–22. Elihu's first speech. Elihu begins his poetic discourse by addressing all present. In 33:1 he directs his words to Job, and in 34:1 he speaks to the "wise men." Job is the addressee in 35:1. Elihu opens by challenging the accepted notion that to be older is to be wiser. Wisdom, he opines, is not a factor of age but of the knowledge given by God. He waited patiently for his elders to speak, he explains in a quasi-humble manner, but he found their words unenlightening. Now, bursting with eagerness to voice his own views, he can hold himself back no longer.

33:1–31. Elihu takes God's side against Job. In order to persuade Job, to soften him up, as it were, Elihu points out that both he and Job are equal in that both are creatures of God (33:6–7), so Elihu is not trying to overwhelm Job with superior power, but to convince him as an equal. Job was wrong, says Elihu, to think that he was innocent and was being persecuted by God. Elihu argues that God is greater than humans, and that he does, indeed, reply to humans but in indirect ways, through dreams and night visions (both were accepted modes of divine revelation), which Job earlier found terrifying (7:4). The main point is that pain and suffering are God's means to discipline people, to turn them away from wrong actions. The description of illness in 33:19–22 is quite vivid. The sufferer is rescued by a mediator (the Hebrew term is melitz, "an angel, a mediator" in NRSV; others take it as a human intercessor), who declares the innocence of the sufferer before God. Then God returns him to health. This is a later take on the psalmic laments in which the sufferer appeals to God directly and is saved. The idea of an angelic intermediary reflects later Judaism, as does the emphasis on prayer and repentance (33:26–27; the growth of penitential prayer is a phenomenon of the Second Temple period). While Eliphaz contended (5:17) that Job's suffering could be seen as divine correction, Elihu has a much more developed system whereby God regularly brings a person to the brink of death as a way to shape him morally, with repentance being the key ingredient to deliverance. Thus, by insisting on his innocence, Job defeats Elihu's system for he has no reason to repent. That is why Elihu was angry at Job.

34:1–37. Elihu's second speech. Elihu addresses the wise men, presumably not Job's friends whom he castigated in ch. 32 for their ineffective arguments, but a wider implied audience of wise men, the community's bearers of wisdom. Elihu aligns them with himself as opposing Job, and he proposes that they can assay Job's arguments with their own minds, that is, through reason. He quotes Job's earlier words in a belittling manner, implying that these words make no sense and are contrary to what is known of the world. He deems Job, who insists that God has been unjust to him, to be among the wicked, for Job denies the basic principle that God rewards or punishes people for just cause. Most of the chapter, its central section from vv. 10–33, is a description of God's nature and his governance of the world, which is intended to refute Job's argument. In the concluding verses (34–37) Elihu again addresses the wise men, requesting that they verify Elihu's estimation of Job's wickedness.

34:1. Then Elihu continued. The Hebrew uses the same expression, literally "then Elihu said and replied," that was employed in the dialogues when the speaker changed, but here Elihu is the only speaker. The phrase marks a new section or speech and is thus well-rendered in NRSV.

34:7. "Who is there like Job" is somewhat ironic to the reader who knows there is no one on earth as perfect as Job (1:8), but Elihu means it in a derogatory sense: there is no person who mocks God as Job does.

34:10–37. Arguing against Job, Elihu notes that a main attribute of God is that God does not act wickedly, for he repays people for their deeds as they deserve. God is, then, a just God. The "proof" is that God created the world and continues to maintain it; if God were to disappear, so would the world. God as creator is a common trope, most often used to demonstrate God's power over enemies and his care for the righteous, but here it supports the assertion that God is just. The "logic" with which Elihu backs up this statement is "Shall one who hates justice govern?" (34:17). It is inconceivable to Elihu that the ruler of the world, who chose to create and govern the world, would be unjust; and he illustrates this point by showing how God addresses injustice in the world, even when it comes from kings. God shows no partiality to the rich and powerful. Moreover, he sees every human action and there is no place to hide from him, even in the darkest shadows. This statement refutes Job's in 24:13–17 that criminals operate in darkness unbeknownst to God. It may also be a subtle reproof of Job's wish to escape from God's sight and a warning to Job that he cannot get away with his "lies." Verse 23 is difficult; it seems to mean that there are no set times to come before God for justice; rather, God carries out justice in his own good time and it is not for humans to compel him to do so. Nevertheless, God is sure to carry out justice, sometimes suddenly and without warning (34:20, 24–27). Even if God apparently remains silent and hides his face, he will eventually render justice (v. 29 is difficult) for in that way does God prevent the wicked from triumphing.

Verses 31–37 are difficult and have been variously interpreted as Elihu's advice to Job, or Elihu's construction of what Job expects God to say, or, perhaps best, a concluding address to the wise men, condemning once again Job's lack of understanding of God's justice.

35:1–16. Elihu's third speech. Directing his remarks to Job, Elihu continues his argument along the same lines as before but with a slightly different focus. He does not argue that Job was inaccurate to say that he had not sinned, but rather that saying so showed a lack of justness (mishpat, a term that occurs several times in Elihu's speeches). The point Elihu makes is that whether a person sins or not does not affect God in the least, and similarly, being righteous offers no benefit to God. It is human beings who are affected by righteousness or wickedness. God remains true to his nature whatever people do. That does not mean, however, that God pays no heed to human behavior. On the contrary, God is ever vigilant.

35:9–16. If the oppressed cry out but are not answered, it is because "no one says, 'Where is God my Maker' " (35:10), that is, they do not call upon God in the manner proper to prayer (or, alternatively, those seeing oppression in the world complain about it but do not seek God's help). They do not recognize that God gave them more knowledge than he gave the animals (or, alternatively, that humans learn from the animals about God's nature; compare Job's words in 12:7). If God fails to respond immediately, it is because of "the pride of evildoers" (35:12), that is, the oppressed are evildoers in that they did not say "Where is God my Maker." Their cry is, then, "an empty cry" (v. 13) which goes unheeded: "Surely God does not hear an empty cry." An alternative interpretation is that this phrase means "Surely it is false that God does not listen" (NJPS). Whatever the precise meaning of this difficult passage may be, Elihu is insinuating that Job, who is a prideful evildoer (because he has accused God of injustice), has by his own words prevented or delayed God's proper response. Elihu moves from generalities to Job's particular case in v. 14, which, according to NRSV, means that Job's cry to God is even less valid than that described in the previous verses. The chapter concludes by summing up Job's words as hevel, worthless, empty words, since they are uninformed by true knowledge.

36:1–37:24. Elihu's fourth speech. In contrast to Job's worthless words (35:16), Elihu characterizes his own speech as "not false" because he is "perfect in knowledge" (36:4), that is, his knowledge is complete whereas Job's falls short. He then reiterates at greater length and intensity his previous point that God is just, that he punishes the wicked and rewards the righteous.

36:5–15. If God's justice appears delayed, it is because the righteous are arrogant and need to be shown the error of their ways (cf. 35:12). Suffering is a wake-up call to obey God: "He delivers the afflicted by their affliction" (36:15). If the sufferers listen and serve God, they will be granted prosperity, but if not, they will perish, "without knowledge."

Knowledge or its absence is a repeated theme in this chapter. Worse than righteous sufferers who calls upon God (even imperfectly) are the "godless in heart" who do not cry out (to God) when they suffer (36:13). This is a more pointed critique of Job, who never asks God to save him but only rants and rages against what God has done to him. The idea that the godless meet an early death (36:14) is a rhetorical exaggeration, suggesting that they have no chance to change their ways and be delivered; it obviously cannot apply to Job, who is no longer young.

36:16–21. Elihu now switches from making general statements in the third person to addressing Job in the second person. This section is difficult to understand (especially v. 19) and has provoked different renderings. The gist is that God has granted beneficence to Job (presumably in the past) but Job is concerned only with the question of God's justness. Job should beware that his anger at God should not lead him to mock God or accuse him falsely of being unjust. Verse 21, as rendered by NRSV, seems to explain Job's current situation by the earlier point that affliction is a warning to avoid iniquity.

36:22–37:24. Elihu concludes his discourse with praise of God's power. He employs many rhetorical questions, as God will do in chs. 38–39. These rhetorical questions draw in the listener (Job), who can easily supply the answers, thereby supporting Elihu's argument. The tone of the discourse gradually changes from annoyed impatience at the lack of knowledge of God displayed by Job to a calmer, hymn-like expression of awe and appreciation for God's immense power and presence in the world. The main point is that God is in no way comparable with humans.

36:22–33. This section may be subdivided into three parts, each beginning with Hebrew hen, "indeed" (rendered in vv. 22 and 30 in NRSV by "see," and in v. 26 by "surely.") God's power, says Elihu, is far above everyone and everything; no one teaches him what to do and no one can accuse him of error. Rather, Job should extol God in songs of praise, as others do. Humans observe God's greatness from a distance, a thought that leads to the point that God is ultimately unknowable (36:26a), that God and humans are not comparable. "The number of his years is unsearchable" (36:26b), or, "the number of his years is infinite." The crucial distinction between God and humans is that God lives forever while humans are mortal (cf. Gen 3:22).

Evidence for God's superiority to humans is the divine creation and control of the cosmos (a common biblical trope). The primary example is the cycle of rain, which is both beneficent, bringing the water necessary to grow food, and also frightening and dangerous, with its storms and lightning (cf. 37:13). The imagery in vv. 29–33 is reminiscent of Ps 29 and elsewhere where God is depicted as a storm-god. Verse 33, as rendered by NRSV, interprets lightning and thunder as God's anger at iniquity (the verse is difficult).

37:1–13. The theme of God's power manifested through thunder and lightning is developed further, along with related meteorological phenomena. This is a wonder that humans are unable to fathom (37:5).

The less common phenomena of snow and ice, infrequent but not unknown in Israel, are even more wondrous. Ice comes from the breath of God and the expanse of water is frozen (37:10). When a snow storm or rain storm occurs, this is a sign of God's power. Even animals must take shelter. Again, Elihu does not stop at the mention of these marvelous divine acts, but explains them as being either for correction or for love (37:13).

37:14–24. Addressing Job by name, Elihu urges Job to consider God's wondrous works, posing rhetorical questions (much as God will do in ch. 38) calculated to emphasize Job's ignorance and powerlessness versus God's cosmic power. God's "knowledge is perfect" (37:16) recalls Elihu's claim that his own knowledge is perfect (36:4). This is not to suggest that Elihu's knowledge equals God's, but to focus on Job's imperfect, incomplete knowledge and to intimate that Elihu is correct about God's nature while Job is mistaken. The theme of "knowing" is emphasized in these verses when Elihu asks Job "Do you know" (37:15, 16) and "Teach us" (37:19; literally, "cause us to know"). "Whose garments are hot" (37:17) is a way of saying that Job is at the mercy of the weather and cannot control its effect. "Spread out the skies, hard as a molten mirror" (37:18). The verb "spread out" is from the same root as "firmament" or "dome" (NRSV) in Gen 1:6–7, and it means something hammered out like metal. (Compare the different and softer image in Isa 40:22: "stretches out the heavens like a curtain.") Verses 21–22 describe a theophany; God appears as brightness, as golden splendor (compare the similar and more elaborate description in Ezek 1). This is a foreshadowing of the theophany that follows in the next chapter and suggests that even if the Elihu speeches were a later addition, they have been neatly stitched into their present context. The speech culminates with Elihu's main point: that God is inscrutable and awesome in power and in justice. A play on the similar-sounding Hebrew words "to see" and "to fear" informs the last verse and introduces the common wisdom trope of fearing the Lord.

VII. God Speaks from the Whirlwind (38:1–42:6)

Rightfully considered the climax of the book, God at last appears to Job in a theophany (theophanies are often accompanied by thunder and lightning, as at Mt. Sinai). God does not answer Job's questions, but instead he reveals to him something of divine wisdom, the wisdom whereby the cosmos was created. Several scholars have described these Godspeeches in terms of the sublime—the description of something that is indescribable, that exceeds the imagination, that evokes the feeling of being overwhelmed by something too vast or too powerful to be fully grasped. The divine speeches present verbal pictures of the edge of the cosmos where chaos and creation meet—the mysterious place far from human habitation where darkness turns to dawn, where snow and hail are stored, where wild and exotic animals go about their lives. The purpose of these speeches was not to frighten Job into submission, but rather to lift Job to a new level of reality, a God's-eye view of the universe, where all things, even suffering and death, have their place and need no justification. From a human perspective this is not a perfect place, for it includes elements of chaos, which, though under God's control, continue to be present in the universe; moreover, even these elements of chaos are cared for by God. For all that, God's speeches may appear terrifying, but they are also comforting, for they reassure readers and Job that the world was indeed created through divine wisdom and that it continues to operate that way.

There are two speeches, 38:1–39:30 and 40:1–41:34 (MT: 26), with short responses by Job at 40:3–5 and 42:1–6. As in the speeches of the human characters, there are many rhetorical questions. In these chapters they highlight the contrast between God's power and knowledge and Job's lack of these attributes. The description of creation moves in general from the founding of the universe to celestial and meteorological phenomena, and then to wild and exotic fauna, including the war-horse, the Behemoth, and the Leviathan. The descriptions are highly poetic and highlight God's understanding and care of his creations vis-à-vis Job's inability to do so.

38:1–39:30. God's first speech. God's first speech sets Job's lack of knowledge against God's perfect knowledge, as shown by his creation of the world and his ongoing care of it. It begins with the creation of the universe, the control over the sea, and the creation of light. It then moves to meteorological phenomena, the constellations, and again to the rain. Finally, it speaks of wild animals—mountain goats, wild asses and oxen, birds of prey—whose ways only God understands and whom God provides for. These animals are not under the sway of humans. Somewhat anomalously, from the modern perspective, the ostrich and the war horse are included in this picture, perhaps because of their energy and their nonconventional behavior that puts them at odds with human tastes and values, as the other animals in this speech are.

38:1–3. God responds to Job's challenge with a challenge of his own. Echoing Elihu, God declares that Job lacks knowledge, as the "examination" that follows will prove.

38:4–7. Where was Job when God created the universe? In a society that prized antiquity, the first question shows that Job is a recent newcomer to the world. In any case, he would not have been able to construct it as God did. The imagery is architectural—laying a foundation and a cornerstone, taking measurements. Verse 7 introduces the idea of the cosmos as God's temple, in which the heavenly beings sing his praise.

38:8–11. The restraining of the sea, the primordial waters of chaos, is a major feature in creation imagery (see Gen 1:6–10). Normally, the sea is depicted as a powerful force of evil that needs to be prevented from overrunning the created world and returning it to chaos, but here that image is softened. The sea is likened to a newborn whom God swaddled in the clouds.

38:12–15. Interpretive problems abound, but the sense is that Job cannot control the cycle of day and night.

38:16–21. Job has never been to the far reaches of the cosmos; he has never traversed the cosmos and therefore has no direct experience of it. Verses 16–17 refer to the vertical axis, the deepest places of the universe, the realm of darkness and death below the earth. Verses 18–19 refer to the horizontal axis, the places from which light and darkness, day and night, originate. Verse 21 is obviously ironic.

38:22–30. Meteorological phenomena, located far from human habitation: snow, hail, east wind (also the source of the light), rain, dew, and ice. Job knows neither the origin of these phenomena nor how to direct them. These "exotic" meteorological events are distant from humans; even the rain is in the desert where no one lives. In v. 28–29 God is imagined as both father and mother to the various forms of water, much as he parented the sea (38:8–9).

38:31–33. The constellations, which rise and set and change their positions in the sky throughout the year. The identity of Mazzaroth is unknown. For the other names see 9:9. The Pleiades is in Hebrew "the herd," Orion is "fool," and the Bear may be "lioness."

38:34–38. Job lacks the wisdom to know when and how to send the rain to water the earth; that is, he is unable to provide sustenance for the universe as God does (also 38:39–41). The imagery in vv. 37–38 is evocative—the clouds as rain-jars and the rain pouring down onto the earth, forming mud. In v. 36 the terms "inward parts" and "the mind" are obscure in Hebrew and may refer either to proper names (perhaps of Egyptian deities) or to birds who could tell when rain would fall.

38:39–41. God provides for the wild animals and birds, far from human habitation, while Job cannot. The lion, a predator, and the raven, a scavenger, seem most able to provide for themselves, yet is it really God who provides their food.

39:1–4. Job does not know the gestation cycle of the wild mountain goats. Unlike domestic animals, these animals are not bred by humans.

39:5–12. The wild ass and the wild ox run free in uninhabited areas. Like the wild goats, they are the antithesis of domesticated asses and oxen. These animals resist human domination over them. This is a part of nature that humans cannot control.

39:13–18. The ostrich, an ungainly and flightless bird that can run very fast (v. 13), was widely considered throughout the ancient Near East to be a negligent parent (cf. Lam 4:3) because it deposits its egg in a hole in the sand rather than in a conventional nest (although it is not accurate that it abandons its egg or its young). Its poor parenting is explained here by God's depriving it of wisdom. The ostrich is also a loner or outcast (30:29). The stereotypical hiding of its head in the sand (or in a bush) is not biblical but is mentioned by the Roman writer Pliny the Elder.

39:19–25. The final phrase of the ostrich passage, "the horse and its rider" (v. 18), forms a transition to the war horse, also fast running. The horse pulled the chariot and the rider rode in the chariot, not on the horse. This horse is eager for battle, undaunted by the sight and sound of weapons.

39:26–30. The hawk and the eagle are birds of prey that soar high above the earth. Job is no more responsible for their instinctive behavior than he is for the behavior of the other creatures. This is the natural world that God has made, with its own rules that humans cannot understand or regulate. If Job cannot understand the natural world, how can he understand God's actions vis-à-vis humans?

40:1–5. Job's response. Job now understands that he is unworthy in comparison to God and says that having spoken before when he had no right to, he will now keep silent. Notwithstanding Job's admission of unworthiness, God continues to speak. Job's more contrite response will come at 42:1–6.

40:6–14. God's second speech. God's second speech begins with words similar to his first (38:1–3), but then raises the stakes by daring Job to make himself as powerful and majestic as God is, so that he is able to bring low the proud. Verse 8 articulates the way Job has set up the contest between himself and God into a zero-sum game: will Job condemn God so that he (Job) may be justified?

40:15–41:34. The Behemoth and the Leviathan. Having dared Job to vanquish the proud and powerful, God describes the archetypes of powerful creatures, the Behemoth and the Leviathan (cf. 41:34). It is not clear whether these are mythical beasts or actual animals. Many identify the Behemoth as the hippopotamus, since he lives in the marsh, or perhaps as a bovine creature, since he eats grass like cattle and his description implies the virility often associated with bulls. The word "Behemoth" is a plural form of "cattle" or "beast," a land animal in contrast to the Leviathan, a sea monster. The Leviathan has been identified as the crocodile although elsewhere in the Bible it is a mythical sea serpent or sea dragon associated with the forces of chaos. Its description here is as much mythical as real. Both the hippopotamus and the crocodile are known in Egypt, in real life and as mythological creatures whom the god Horus slays, although it is not clear why Egyptian cultural symbols would be used here. My own preference is to think of the Behemoth and the Leviathan as mythical animals that are modeled on exaggerated descriptions of real creatures. I would liken the Behemoth to a dinosaur, a real animal that has taken on mythic dimensions. The counterpart for the Leviathan is the Loch Ness monster, a creature that occupies the space between real and mythic.

40:15–24. The Behemoth is the first of the great acts of God (v. 19; cf. v. 15) meaning that this beast is venerable compared to the newcomer, Job. His body is compared to the tallest of trees and the hardest of metals. The stiff tail in v. 17 may be a euphemism for an erect penis.

41:1–34 (40:25–41:26 in Hebrew). The Leviathan, like the Behemoth, cannot be hunted, nor can it be tamed. The Leviathan is even more frightening than the Behemoth, with impenetrable armor-like skin, spewing fire from its mouth and nostrils. This sea dragon is undaunted by any weapon. It thrashes about in the water and frightens even the gods (divine beings, 41:25).

42:1–6. Job's second response. Job now recognizes that God is beyond human comprehension, and that the world is not run by human rules of order or moral justice. Quoting God (42:3–4; cf. 38:2–3), he admits that he spoke before from a lack of knowledge. Now, after the theophany, Job has a deeper, more direct understanding of God, not just through hearing about him from traditional teaching but through "seeing," that is, experiencing God firsthand (Job did not literally see God). Before, Job's experience was incongruent with traditional teaching about God. Now, though, from his position of greater understanding, that tension is gone, for Job sees the world differently. The world that he sees is not neatly divided into good and evil, righteousness and sin; rather, it is a world in which elements of chaos—and that includes suffering—remain, under God's watchful eye. Job suffers not because he sinned, but because he is human.

42:6 is enigmatic. Whatever its exact meaning, Job does not repent of sin (of which he was free) but of his accusations against God. In the end, as at the beginning, Job is God-fearing.

VIII. Epilogue: Job is Vindicated and Restored (42:7–17)

The prose narrative that opened the book concludes here, forming a frame around the poetic speeches and providing closure. God deems Job correct and his friends wrong in the way they spoke about God (42:7–8). Many interpreters find this statement inconsistent with the dialogues, but it may mean that Job was more honest than his friends in trying to understand God's ways, and in the end more successful, whereas the friends maintained a more simplistic view of God.

Job is restored twofold, including a new set of children (which seems not to have raised ancient eyebrows). Special attention is granted the daughters, who are named, declared most beautiful (a favorite biblical attribute for women), and receive an inheritance along with their brothers (this is highly unusual). Job lived for 140 years, twice the natural lifetime of 70 years (Ps 90:10) and had four generations of descendents. Long life and great progeny is the traditional reward for piety and wisdom. And so Job "lives happily ever after," having successfully undergone a quest for wisdom like no other man.

PSALMS

ROLF A. JACOBSON

OVERVIEW

The Psalter is a collection of 150 prayers, songs, liturgies, and poems. The various psalms were composed by a variety of authors, all of whom are anonymous.

Many psalms are introduced with superscriptions such as "of David" or "of Asaph." Such superscriptions do not identify the author of these compositions, but rather indicate that the psalm is to be associated with these figures in some fashion. Most scholars believe that these superscriptions were not originally a part of the psalms that they introduce. They were most likely added at a later date, sometime during the process through which the individual psalms were collected together. These superscriptions often include terms and phrases that interpreters believe are musical notations referring to how the psalms were performed. These include "for the flutes" (Ps 5), "with stringed instruments" (Ps 4), and the like. The meaning of other terms in the superscriptions is simply unknown, such as "according to the Sheminith" (Ps 6), "according to the Gittith" (Ps 7), and so on. The meaning of Selah, which occurs 71 times in the middle of various psalms as well as 3 times in Habakkuk 3, is also unknown; most believe that it was a liturgical direction, perhaps calling for a pause or a musical interlude.

The interpretation of the psalms has been dominated by a method called Form Criticism. This approach categorizes the psalms into various genres, or forms, and interprets the psalms in light of these categories. The most significant forms are:

Prayers for Help—Also called "laments," these are prayers that request divine rescue from various crises. Most of the time, little specific information about the situation that gave rise to these prayers is discernible. Perhaps specific information was deliberately obscured in the editing process so as to make the prayers available to future generations to be prayed in many circumstances. Prayers for help come in both individual and communal forms. For a representative prayer for help, see the commentary on Ps 13. There are more prayers for help than any other type of psalm.

Hymns of Praise—Also called psalms of "descriptive praise," these songs were composed for the community to sing in worship. The purpose of praise is not to flatter God but to bear witness to God's character, actions, and blessings. There are subgroupings of hymns, such as the "songs of Zion" (see Ps 46) and "enthronement psalms" (see Ps 47). For a representative hymn, see Ps 117.

Songs of Thanksgiving—Also called psalms of "declarative praise," these songs were composed to praise God following an experience of having been rescued by God from some crisis. Songs of thanksgiving come in both individual and communal forms. In the Psalter, the appropriate way for one to offer thanks to God is to publicly praise God so that others may hear about and learn from what God has done. For a representative song of thanksgiving, see Ps 30.

Instructional Psalms—Also called "wisdom psalms," many of the poems in the Psalter show the influence of Israel's wisdom tradition and seem to have been written in order to offer instruction. For a representative instructional psalm, see Ps 41.

Royal Psalms—Many of the prayers, hymns, and poems of the Psalter were written either about Israel's kings or composed for them to perform. Royal psalms are not properly a "form," since there are royal hymns, royal liturgies, and royal prayers for help. Yet there are enough psalms that clearly relate in some way to the king that scholars have assigned them the category of "royal psalm." For a representative royal psalm, see Ps 2.

Liturgies—Many of the psalms seem to have been liturgical compositions, in which various sections may have been spoken or sung by different parties. These psalms both offer clues as to how Israel worshiped and also may hint at how all of the psalms were performed in the Temple. For a representative liturgy, see Ps 15.

Other Psalm Forms—In addition to these major types of psalms, there are also acrostic poems (see Pss 9/10), historical psalms (see Pss 103 and 104), festival psalms (see Pss 50, 81, 95), and other genres that have been proposed by various scholars.

The upside of form criticism is that it helps interpreters to see recurring patterns in the psalms and to remember that these are the real prayers and songs of ancient people. The downside of form criticism is that it sometimes causes interpreters to flatten individual psalms. This can result in a tendency to fail to appreciate the unique aspects of various psalms and to reduce all prayers for help (for example) into a single, aggregate prayer.

Perhaps the most salient feature of the psalms is that they are Hebrew poetry. Hebrew poetry is both like and unlike English poetry. Like English language poetry, Hebrew poetry tends to be richly symbolic, metaphorical, and imaginative. It often makes non-linear leaps (for example, expressing deeply anguished pain in one verse and expressing stolid trust in the very next) or indulges in counterfactual imagery (e.g., describing a river in the midst of the city of Jerusalem, in which there is no actual river; cf. Ps 46:4). The imaginative and often playful nature of this poetry contributes both to the joy and difficulty of reading the psalms.

Unlike English poetry, end rhyme is not an important feature in Hebrew poetry. But in the same way that end rhyme lends structure and a sense of completion to English poetry, a feature called "parallelism" serves a similar purpose in Hebrew poetry. Parallelism can be described as the balancing of two or more sections of grammar by placing one after the other. For example:

Have mercy on me, O God, according to your steadfast love;

According to your mercy, blot out my transgressions. (Ps 51:1)¹

Or

My heart is steadfast, O God, my heart is steadfast;

I will sing and make melody. Awake, my soul!

Awake, O harp and lyre!

I will awake the dawn. (Ps 108:1–2)

Although some scholars have tried to capture the different ways in which Hebrew parallelism functions by assigning categories and labels to it, it is most helpful simply to be aware that parallelism exists. It works by taking a word or phrase and then building on it by attaching another word or phrase.

The 150 psalms of the Psalter are divided into five books, each of which closes with a verse or more of doxological praise. The most likely reason for this five- book division was to put the Psalter on even footing with the Pentateuch, which also has five books. In recent years, some scholars have argued that there is a discernible progression and argument in the arrangement of these psalms. It is apparent that the psalms move generally from individual psalms to communal psalms, from prayers for help to songs of praise, and from psalms of David to psalms associated with other figures. According to one major interpretation, the Psalter tells the story of the rejection of the Davidic covenant—which had accented the eternal nature of the Davidic monarchy—and the embrace of the Mosaic covenant, which had emphasized the responsibility for all Israelites to keep the law. An alternative viewpoint notes that both royal and instructional psalms were placed at key seams between various of the Psalter's five books. According to this view, the placement of these psalms serve to teach that the Psalter is both a book of instruction (for all Israelites) and a book of promise (that God would send the Davidic messiah sometime in the future).

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Book I (1–41)

Psalm 1

Psalm 1 contrasts the "way of the righteous" (v. 6) and the "way of sinners/the wicked" (vv. 1, 6). The first stanza (vv. 1–3) portrays the way of the righteous; the second stanza (vv. 4–6) portrays the way of the wicked.

In the first stanza, the one who is "happy" is described first negatively and then positively. Negatively, this one does not follow the advice of the wicked, take the "way" of sinners, or sit in the seat of scoffers. Positively, this one delights in God's instruction, which is a better translation of torah than law—the term here could almost be translated scripture. The happy one will flourish, like a tree that bears fruit even in a brutal environment. The connection between the tree that drinks of the water and the happy one who drinks of the Lord's instruction/scripture is obvious.

The second stanza also begins negatively, by describing the "way of the wicked." They do not bear fruit and flourish. Quite the opposite from one who is deeply rooted in God's instruction, the wicked lacks roots and thus is like dried up leaves in autumn, lacking substance and subject to the wind. The poem ends with the promise that God watches over the chosen people. The wicked choose their own way and thus lead themselves to destruction. The righteous surrender self-mastery and give themselves to the Lord's way, becoming objects of the Lord's care.

Psalm 2

Psalm 2 is a royal psalm, perhaps originally used at the coronation of a new king in Jerusalem. The psalm consists of four stanzas (vv. 1–3, 4–6, 7–9, 10–12), which play out a drama; each stanza changes the scene of the drama and the first three stanzas close with a different voice being quoted. The entire action of the psalm occurs via speech.

The first stanza begins with a rhetorical question—Why do the nations rage against God? To conspire against heaven is futile, and the rest of the psalm describes the reason for such futility. The stanza describes the nations' rebellion against God's reign and the authority of God's "anointed" (mashiakh) as rebellious speech: They "conspire" and "plot," and the stanza closes by quoting the speech of the rebellious rulers.

In stanza 2, the action shifts to heaven, where the Lord laughs—a form of speech—at human rebellion. This laughter is not mean-spirited, but underscores the futility of human rebellion. The stanza closes with the Lord's speech, which gives God's answer to the rebelling human speech of stanza 1.

The third stanza moves the drama to Jerusalem's Mt. Zion, where the king reports God's promise—one characteristic way in which God responds throughout Scripture to human rebellion.

In the closing stanza, the psalmist enjoins the "kings" and "rulers" to serve God and use their mouths to kiss the king, rather than speak rebellious words. When interpreting this psalm, it is important to include ourselves among those rebelling against God, otherwise the psalm might be employed triumphalistically.

Psalm 3

Psalm 3 is a prayer for help from foes who oppress. The superscription identifying the poem with David's escape from Absalom's treachery (see 2 Sam 15–18) is not original to the psalm, but indicates the earliest interpretation of the psalm. It underscores the Lord's sustaining love for those who suffer, even those who suffer familial betrayals. The poem has four stanzas plus a closing declaration.

The psalmist begins by repeating three times how "many" foes oppress. The enemies' malice toward the psalmist is exacerbated by their impious belief that God lacks the power to deliver the psalmist. The psalmist, by contrast, trusts exclusively in the Lord's faithfulness and delivering power. The words help (v. 2), deliver (v. 7) and deliverance (v. 8) all derive from one Hebrew root. The psalm paints a vivid scene of chaos and security: many foes encircle the psalmist all around, but because the Lord is the psalmist's shield, the poet can sleep in security and awake sustained.

Psalm 4 is a prayer for help, perhaps from one who has been falsely accused (v. 2) or from one who is beset by worshipers of false gods (vv. 3, 7). The poem is paired with Ps 3; both use the phrase "many are saying" (3:2; 4:6), both speak of sleeping securely (3:5; 4:8), and both are prayed with the assurance that the Lord responds to the cries of the faithful (3:5; 4:3).

The situation that originally generated this cry for deliverance cannot be determined, but that is appropriate, since the psalm is meant to be prayed in any situation in which a sufferer desires God's righteousness and graciousness (v. 1). The psalm contrasts proper trust and joy with improper trust and joy. The psalmist trusts in and finds true joy in the Lord and the light of the Lord's face, which is a metaphor for God's favor and deliverance (v. 6). The wicked seek after lies (which may mean either that they lie or that they worship gods who cannot keep promises, v. 2) and they rejoice in material prosperity (v. 7).

The psalm draws an inseparable connection between right worship and right living: "Do not sin . . . put your trust in the LORD" (vv. 4–5).

Psalm 5 is a cry for help from one who prays "in the morning" (twice, v. 3). Break of day was both a time for offerings (Amos 4:4; 2 Kgs 3:20;), for prayer (Pss 55:17; 88:13; Mark 1:35), and for the manifestation of God's deliverance (Ps 46:5; Isa 33:2). It is impossible to pinpoint the situation that gave rise to this prayer in any particular morning ritual or sacrifice. Rather, the psalm should be interpreted in light of the hope that God's deliverance would arise like the sun, driving darkness and threat away.

The psalm's five- stanza structure is informative. Stanzas 1 and 5 (vv. 1–3, 11–12) are about God—who hears the prayers of those who cry out and receives the praise of those who have been delivered. Stanzas 2 and 4 (vv. 4–6, 9–10) are about the wicked—those who boast, lie, breathe threats, and rebel against the Lord. The middle stanza is about the faithful supplicant—the one in need of God's steadfast love, God's presence, God's guidance; the one who worships the Lord. This structure sets off the sufferer from the wicked, whose violence threatens God's people. It also emphasizes God as the only agent capable of offering deliverance.

Psalm 6 is the first of seven poems the Western Church later classified as "penitential psalms" (Pss 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). This classification would not have been recognizable to the ancient psalmists, but reflects a particular understanding in the Pauline-Augustinian tradition concerning the role of confession and forgiveness in the life of faith. The category is part of the history of the interpretation of the psalms rather than part of composition of the psalms. The psalm does not formally ask for forgiveness, though the references to God's "anger," "wrath," and "discipline" may indicate a sense of guilt due to sin. Whether or not the psalm originated from some instance of guilt, it is nevertheless a passionate prayer for deliverance from a near-death experience. The poem may be prayed by or on behalf of anyone undergoing intense suffering.

The psalm is at its most poignant in its desperate cries for help ("do not rebuke," "be gracious," "heal," "save," etc.) and in the eloquent portraits of pain ("I am languishing," "my bones are shaking with terror," and the entirety of vv. 5–7). The painful metaphors and images haunt the reader and point to a God so near as to care deeply when any suffer.

In some prayers for help, the psalmist closes by praising and trusting God (cf. Ps 13:5–6). Here, such trust/praise takes the form of a scathing rebuke of those who wish the psalmist ill (vv. 8–10). This address to the enemies highlights the social aspects of trusting and praising the Lord.

Psalm 7

Psalm 7 is an intense plea for God to deliver the psalmist from enemies. While some interpreters see the poem as the words of one falsely accused, such precision is impossible. The declaration of innocence in v. 3 may not relate to a specific event or accusation, but may indicate the psalmist's claim to a more general innocence in comparison with persecutors (cf. vv. 4, 8, 14–16). It is unclear whether vv. 12–13 refer to God or the enemy.

The dominant metaphor for God in Ps 7 is the common OT metaphor of God as judge (vv. 6–11). The judgment in question here is not the final judgment at the end of life or time, but an immediate judgment of a violent clash between the supplicant and those who threaten violence. The attribute of God that goes along with the judge metaphor is righteousness (vv. 8–11, 17). The image of God as an angry (v. 6) and righteous judge offends many today. But the anger and judgment of God are the flip side of the love and forgiveness of God. Because God loves all creation, God is angry with any who cause suffering.

Psalm 8

The first hymn of praise in the Psalter begins and ends with praise of God "in all the earth" (vv. 1a, 9). The middle of the psalm continues this theme, touching on God's glory in the heavens (vv. 1b–3) and the vocation of responsibility for creation that God has entrusted to humanity (vv. 5–8). Set in the middle of the psalm is a question (v. 4).

The first section of the poem ruminates on the glory of God in the heavens. The meaning of v. 2 is unclear, but the sense of vv. 1b–4 is clear. The psalmist considers the magnitude of the Creator's work—the heavens, the moon, the stars—and is led to a question: why, in light of a vast creation, should the powerful Creator be mindful of one human being, or even all human beings?

Other parts of Scripture answer this question differently, but Ps 8 responds: because God has a vocation for humanity. In vv. 5–8, the poem magnificently portrays humans as the royalty (v. 5) to whom God has given the responsibility for caring for creation (vv. 6–8). This responsibility extends over domesticated animals, wild animals, birds, and even sea creatures.

Psalm 9/10

For many reasons, Pss 9 and 10 are considered one unified psalm. The chief reasons are that together they form an extended alphabetic acrostic poem, and multiple ancient manuscripts and translations considered them one psalm.

An alphabetic acrostic is a poem in which each section begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The acrostic structure may simply have been a device to help people memorize poems, although the length of certain acrostics casts doubt on this as a universal conclusion about all acrostics. To the extent that the conclusion is valid, however, it indicates that the psalm was composed in part to instruct people in prayer and praise. The structure may also be a clue to an early theology of the word in Israelite religion, in which the written word itself was understood as sacred because the development of the alphabet allowed writing to preserve theological testimony.

The general themes of this unified psalm are trust and praise in the Lord's just judgment and longing for God's intervention on behalf of the oppressed. Among the notable poetic devices in Pss 9/10 is the quotation of the words of the enemies (10:4, 11, 13). In these verses, the enemies are quoted saying that God does not "see" or "seek out" the wicked for judgment. The psalmist, living a countercultural faith, avers that "you do see!" (10:14) and begs God to "seek out their wickedness." The enemies are also quoted as saying that God has "forgotten." But the psalmist avers that the nations have "forgotten" God, and God will not forget the poor and needy (9:17–18).

The chief characteristics of the wicked are arrogance and persecution of the poor. The arrogant mindset of those who imagine themselves as completely autonomous and independent leads them to oppress the poor (10:2). Those who "fear" God understand their dependence, and thus trust in and pray for God's just intervention.

Psalm 11

The poem of trust embodies the difference between alarm and trust. There are four players in this poetic drama: the psalmist, some wicked people who pose a threat to the psalmist and his/ her community, a group of righteous who advise the psalmist to flee, and the Lord.

The psalmist begins with a here-I-stand declaration, "In the LORD I take refuge." Then the psalmist poses a rhetorical question, asking the panicking righteous why they advise flight. The speech of these advisors extends from v. 1b through v. 3; the final verse sums up their terror: What can the powerless righteous do?

The psalmist's answer comprises vv. 4–7. The psalmist asserts a confidence that is not based on anything that is visible, but on God, who cannot be seen and whom only faith can apprehend. The psalm plays poetically with the metaphor of vision. The Lord is in the heavenly temple, where no human can see, but from which God's eyes can see and test all (v. 4). The righteous live now by faith and will one day see God's face (v. 7).

Psalm 12

Psalm 12 is a prayer for help. The poem displays signs of liturgical use, but it is impossible to reconstruct an original liturgical setting or sequence with any certainty. It may have been the prayer of an individual (v. 1), or of the community (v. 8), and may have featured a priest speaking a promise on behalf of God (v. 5). That promise, spoken in v. 5 and elaborated upon in v. 6, is the heart of the psalm.

The psalm begins and ends with assertions that the psalmist and the community are isolated, surrounded by wickedness and those whose tongues breed malice (vv. 1, 8). Speaking is a major metaphor in the psalm—the wicked lie, speak with false hearts, have flattering lips, and boasting tongues. In response to this speech, the psalm quotes the promise of the Lord. The Lord says, "I will now rise up." In many psalms, the suppliant begs God to arise. The promise here indicates that deliverance will come soon. A second promise should be translated, "I will place in safety" The psalm then reinforces the word of promise with a poetic reflection upon the surety of God's promises (v. 6)

Psalm 13

This short poem is often considered the model prayer for help. The basic elements of this psalm genre occur once each, in a neat order: a threefold complaint ("I," "You," and "They" complaints; vv. 1–2); a petition (v. 3); a motivating clause (v. 4); an expression of trust (v. 5); a promise to praise (v. 6).

The psalm begins intensely and then intensifies further. The sufferer's fourfold "how long" complaint is quite literal (vv. 1–2)—suffering is intensified when one does not know how long it will last (cf. Ps 74:9). The psalmist's accusation that God has "hidden your face" is matched by the psalmist's plea that God "look!" (v. 1; NRSV, consider) and "give light to my eyes." The prayer elegantly matches the threefold complaint about self, God, and "my enemy" in vv. 1–2, with what one might call a threefold request in vv. 3–4. The petition asks God to deliver me lest "my enemy" rejoice. Continuing the play on words, the psalm closes by expressing trust in God's deliverance and a promise to rejoice in divine deliverance. The psalmist's community-building attitude of rejoicing over God's salvation is implicitly compared with the enemies, who rejoice over the pain and defeat of others.

Psalm 14

Psalms 14 and 53 are nearly identical poems (see commentary on Ps 53). The best rubric under which to understand the literary nature of this psalm is "wisdom" or "instruction," because the poem contrasts the "fool" and the "wise" (vv. 1–2), which is typical of wisdom literature (see Prov 30:21–28). Although v. 7 grants the end of the psalm a prayer-like quality, this verse was probably added later by editors.

The best rubric under which to understand the theological nature is "the unity of thought and action." In respect to both the fool and the wise, the poem underscores the basic unity between thought and action. The fool says "there is no God" and does "abominable deeds" (v. 1); has "no knowledge" and thus does evil (v. 4). The wise, by contrast, "seek after God" (v. 2) and make God "their refuge." To make God one's refuge (cf. Pss 7:1; 11:1) is actively to seek God's help in times of danger. The danger that threatens the psalmist's community is described in absolute terms: "There is no one who does good, there is no one, not even one" (v 3; NRSV, no, not one). The comfort and refuge that God provides is likewise stated absolutely (v. 5).

Psalm 15—similar to Pss 2, 24, 118:19–21, and 121—shows signs of probable liturgical use. Each poem takes a question/answer shape. Psalms 15, 24, 118:19–21 and Isa 33:13–16, furthermore, share the common theme of entrance into God's presence, indicating they may have functioned as entrance liturgies. When one compares these with similar liturgies from Israel's neighbors, it is striking that these liturgies do not include commands pertaining to ritual or physical purity (see Num 19:10a–22; Lev 21:10–24). Rather, the concerns are ethical. Similar to Jesus' teaching that one should make peace with one's neighbor before approaching God's altar (Matt 5:23–24), the concern here is on the impact one's actions have on the community.

Who "sojourns" (v. 1; NRSV, abide) in God's presence? The answer is given both positively and negatively. Positively, the one who is blameless and is a doer of right sojourns with God. Negatively (the Hebrew word for not occurs six times in vv. 2–5), the one who does not harm a neighbor by means of speech (v. 3), attitude (v. 4), or wealth (v. 5) sojourns with God. The psalm closes with the promise that matches these criteria: Those people "will not be moved."

Psalm 16

The psalm begins with one brief word of petition (vv. 1–2) and then shifts to an extended expression of trust (vv. 3–11). The psalmist first confesses to worship and seek good from God alone and later rejoices in manifold blessings received.

The meaning of vv. 3–4 is disputed, so it is better not to center any interpretation of the psalm on these verses. It does seem clear, however, that the psalmist is rejecting a false way of worshiping false gods (v. 4b–c). Verses 5–8 form the center of the psalm both literarily and theologically. Based on the psalm's vocabulary, the psalmist was probably a priest. The terms portion, lot, boundary lines, and heritage describe the distribution of the land among God's people. The Levites, notably, were given no land; the offerings of the land (Lev 6:9–10) and the Lord (Num 18:20) are described as their portion. The term cup symbolizes both the abundance of God's gifts (cf. Ps 23:5) and also a ritual celebration of thanksgiving (cf. Ps 116:13).

The message of these verses suits a materialistic time when money is worshiped rather than God. The suppliant celebrates the spiritual, intangible blessings of God as if they were tangible property.

Psalm 17

Psalm 17, a prayer for deliverance from danger, builds on Pss 15 and 16. Psalm 15 declared that those who "speak the truth" and "do not slander" (vv. 2–3) may sojourn with God; here the psalmist asserts "my mouth does not transgress" (v. 3). Psalm 16 rejoiced in the "portion" God has granted (vv. 5–6) and confessed "I shall not be moved" (v. 8); here the psalmist prays for protection from those "whose portion in life is in this world" (v. 14) and asserts "my feet have not slipped" (v. 5).

The suppliant asserts innocence and demands to be heard on that basis (vv. 1–5). This assertion is not an abstract claim of absolute moral perfection, but a provisional appeal for help based on the rightfulness of the psalmist's situation vis-à-vis those who attack. The psalmist is beset by those whose hearts are closed to pity (v. 10); the issue is the fairness of the psalmist's cry for deliverance.

The psalm vividly contrasts the enemies' violence ("They track me down . . . like a young lion lurking in ambush," vv. 11–12) and the protection of the Lord ("Guard me as the apple of the eye ... in the shadow of your wings," v. 8).

Psalm 18

Psalm 18 is a hymn of thanksgiving sung by one who had experienced divine deliverance (v. 6). Both the superscription, which situates the poem in David's life, and a very near parallel of this psalm in 2 Samuel 22, near the end of the narrative of David's life, indicate the types of situations in which such psalms were appropriate. They indicate that praise of God is not reserved for public worship occasions, but is to be spoken in the midst of daily life when God's deliverance and blessing are experienced. The psalm's structure is:

Introduction (vv. 1–3)

Praise of God's appearance and deliverance (vv. 4–29)

Center confession (vv. 30–31)

Praise of God's blessings for the king (vv. 32–45)

Conclusion (vv. 46–50).

God as rock is prominent at both the beginning and end of the psalm (vv. 2, 46) and in the theological and literary center of the psalm (vv. 30–31). This central section confesses that the Lord alone is God because God's way is perfect, God keeps promises, and God is the rock who provides refuge.

Psalm 19

This praise poem is a composite poem formed in two or three phases. The psalm is unified by the twin motifs of "word(s)" and "creation."

The first section (vv. 1–6) refers to God ('el) and explores the paradox of creation's inaudible praise of the Creator. The paradox is that nature has no discernible language ("There is no speech, nor are there words; their voice is not heard," v. 3) and yet those who worship Creator can nevertheless hear nature's praise ("their voice goes out . . . their words to the end of the world," v. 4). Among Israel's neighbors, the sun was the god of law and justice, so the image of the sun in vv. 4b–6 can be interpreted as praising God's endowment of natural law in creation.

The second section (vv. 7–10) refers to the Lord (yhwh) and praises the "torah" (v. 7; NRSV, law); vv. 7–9 contain six parallel lines, which together describe what the Lord's word is (perfect, "pure, etc.) and what it does (revive the self, make wise the simple, etc.). The creation theme is continued by natural metaphors (gold, honey) in v. 10.

The last section is a recognition that while God's word is perfect and following it is rewarding, those who keep it are not, so forgiveness is a necessary part of the life of faith (v. 12). The psalm ends with a closing prayer for protection from violence (v. 13) and the request that this prayer might be accepted by God.

Psalm 20

This elegant composition was originally a liturgy intended for use by the king (vv. 6, 9). The military (vv. 5–7) and cultic (vv. 2–3) terminology indicate either a time of war or some other occasion in which the king's military leadership would have been important symbolically. The poem has two stanzas (vv. 1–5, 6–9), with vv. 1 and 9 forming an inclusio—both verses include the words LORD, answer, and day of (v. 9; NRSV, when, is literally day of). The message of the psalm can be asked rhetorically: where should we look for answers in times of trouble—to ourselves and our military strength or to God?

The first stanza consists of a series of benedictory prayers offered on behalf of the king. The petitions intensify as the stanza progresses, culminating in the overarching prayer: "May the LORD fulfill all your petitions" (v. 5). The second stanza is a response to these prayers, bearing witness to the confidence that the king and community have in God's deliverance. Although the prayer was originally composed for an ancient king, it is appropriate now for anyone struggling with difficulties that seem beyond his or her abilities and powers.

Psalms 21

Similar to Ps 20 in many ways, this royal psalm first gives thanks for the Lord's faithfulness to the king (vv. 1–7) and then speaks words of either promise or trust, depending on one's interpretation (vv. 8–12). The psalm ends with a verse of praise.

The poem's first movement praises and thanks God for the fidelity that God has shown to the king. This section offers a litany of gracious deeds that the Lord has done on behalf of the king. The theological center of the entire psalm in v. 7b summarizes this litany of gracious deeds by ascribing them to the fidelity or "steadfast love" of God.

The second section of the psalm may be interpreted either as speech to God (and thus an expression of trust) or words spoken by a priest or prophet to the king (and thus as a set of promises). These two interpretive options are not as different as one might suspect. Is not trust based on faith in what is promised? Are not promises spoken to engender trust? The language of the closing paean of praise (v. 13) echoes the vocabulary of v. 1, bringing the poem to a fitting end.

Psalms 22

Psalms 22 may be the most poignant and famous cry for help in the Psalter. Perhaps because of its raw power and pain, Jesus later echoed its opening cry while on the cross. Although the early church interpreted the psalm as messianic prophecy, the psalm remains an actual prayer available for any sufferer to take up, a reminder that faith in God includes room for doubt and even despair.

The first section of the psalm (vv. 1–21a) is comprised of alternating sections of lament (vv. 1–2, 6–8, 12–18), trust (vv. 3–5, 9–10), and requests for deliverance (vv. 11, 19–21b). The poem alternates between metaphors that are viscerally excruciating (vv. 2, 6–7, 12–18, 20–21a) and touchingly hopeful (v. 3, 9–10). This part of the psalm roars to its crescendo with the petition of vv. 19–21a.

Many have puzzled over the sudden change of mood and circumstance that governs the second half of the psalm (vv. 21b–31). Has the psalmist received a promise of help, or the actual help, or even just had a psychological shift in perception? All that may be said with certainty is that in some way the deliverance of the Lord has become real to the psalmist. Therefore, the psalmist's song changes into a soaring song of praise. The images of vv. 21b–31 portray an entire gallery of metaphors of God's faithfulness on behalf of Israel.

Psalm 23

One of the most loved passages in all of Scripture, this poem draws on the metaphors of shepherd and table host to express trust and confidence in the Lord. The psalm combines two movements—one movement from the metaphor of shepherd to that of host, and a second from third-person creedal language spoken about God to second-person prayer language spoken to God.

In the ancient world, the shepherd metaphor always carried royal connotations (see 1 Kgs 22:17–18; Jer 23:1–4). Thus, far from being a bucolic image, the shepherd of Ps 23 is a royal figure. The metaphor confesses the faithfulness with which God provides food, safety, and guidance. In v. 4, when the psalmist is "in the darkest valley," the divine pronouns shift from thirdperson to first-person. This reflects the reality that creedal information one memorizes about God quickens into a second-person relationship when one experiences the paradox that God's care becomes known in suffering.

The image of God setting a table in the midst of violent pursuers draws on the social values of honor and shame. Although the enemies desire the psalmist's shame, God provides a place of honor. God's faithfulness is not merely passive acceptance of the psalmist, but active pursuit. Normally, in the psalms the enemies "pursue" the psalmist to do violence, but here, God's "goodness and mercy" pursue (v. 6; NRSV, follow) the psalmist. The original meaning of v. 6b was that the psalmist was promising to return to God's Temple throughout life. The later Christian interpretation of this verse as confidence of eternal life in God's heavenly house is a faithful expansion of this image.

Similar to Pss 15, 118:19–21, and Isa 33:13–16, this poem seems to have been used liturgically accompanying entry into the Temple compound. The psalm begins with a confessional statement (vv. 1–2), continues with a question and answer regarding who may enter the Temple (vv. 3–6), and closes with a praise of the Lord's entrance into the Temple (vv. 7–10). The psalm envisions the mutual movement in which the Lord's people (vv. 3–5) and the Lord (vv. 7–10) enter into each other's presence in the Temple.

The psalm concentrates theologically on the identity of these two parties who move to meet each other. There are two complementary questions in the psalm: "Who is the King of glory?" and "who shall stand in his holy place?" In answer to the first question, the Lord is the God who has created all (vv. 1–2) and who remains active in its history (vv. 8–9). The opening verses retain vestiges of the ancient mythological conception that creation was a battle in which God defeated the forces of chaos (sea and rivers). Similarly, God's activities in history are portrayed via a military metaphor (v. 8). In answer to the second question, those whose intimate relationship with the Lord leads them to live ethically exemplary lives may enter into God's presence.

Psalms 25

Psalms 25 is an acrostic psalm (see commentary on Ps 9/10), although two letters are repeated and two omitted. Similar to other acrostic psalms, the argument of the psalm does not proceed smoothly, but is repetitive and irregular, most likely because of the need to start each verse with a successive letter. Nevertheless, three main motifs are noteworthy: the "way" of the Lord (vv. 4–5, 8–10, 12), the appeal not to be put to "shame" (vv. 1–3, 19–21), and the appeal for forgiveness, which is rare in the psalms (vv. 11, 17–18).

God's "way" or "path" (see Pss 1; 23) is a common metaphor in the psalms. The metaphor implies the promise that those who follow God's way in life will travel life's road more safely and will arrive at a better destination. This psalm particularly connects the metaphor with instruction regarding sin. God's way is for sinners (v. 8), meaning both that God forgives sin and that God shows an alternative way of life. Finally, the way of God leads to the place of honor, where those who seek violence will be put to shame and those who "fear the LORD" (v. 12) will not be put to shame.

Psalms 26

This prayer for deliverance echoes both the concerns of Ps 1—with its emphasis on avoiding the company of evildoers (cf. Pss 1:1; 26:4–5)—and Pss 15 and 24—with their emphases on the moral requirements of those who will enter God's presence (cf. Pss 15:2–4; 24:4–5; 26:1, 6). The psalm may have originated as a prayer of someone facing formal indictment, but is now appropriate for anyone who feels judged or rejected by the community.

Two main motifs dominate the poem. The first motif is the assertion of innocence. The psalmist asks God to "judge me" (v. 1; NRSV, vindicate); and through many metaphors such as walking in integrity, not wavering, walking faithfully, having a pure heart, not sitting with evildoers, and the like, the psalmist asserts innocence. The psalmist is not claiming to be sinless in the absolute sense, but in regards to specific charges. The second motif has to do with the body and bodily postures. The psalmist walks in integrity and faithfulness, asks God to test the heart, does not sit with the wicked, washes hands in innocence, moves around God's altar, is not like those whose hands are full of evil, and has feet planted on upright ground. The point is that God's righteous way is one that people are to follow.

Psalm 27

The unity of Ps 27 has often been questioned, because the first half of the poem (vv. 1–6) appears to be a song of trust in the midst of a military threat (v. 3), whereas the second half (vv. 7–14) appears to be a prayer for help of one suffering false accusations and familial betrayal (vv. 10–12). It is possible that these two segments originally arose independently, but are trust and petition really that different? Every psalm of trust assumes real and immediate threats, such as "the darkest valley" of Ps 23:4 or the foaming seas and roaring nations of Ps 46:3, 6. And every prayer for help except one (Ps 88), includes explicit affirmations of trust (cf. Pss 13:5; 22:3–5). Moreover, the psalms slip so fluidly in and out of various metaphors that the interpreter cannot safely conclude that the image of the threatening host (v. 3) or false witnesses refers to literal life situations.

The opening metaphor of God as "my light" occurs only here in the Old Testament. Another key motif is "seeking" or "inquiring" of (vv. 4, 8) God's face. Literally, the metaphor refers to an intentional journey to a sanctuary to request a word from the deity. Symbolically, it expresses both the psalmist's trust in and longing for God.

Psalm 28

As with many prayers for help, this petition is spoken out of a complex, three-way relational web. The supplicant is caught between God and a hostile community. The psalm at once adjures God to end the divine silence by simultaneously rescuing the psalmist from a desperate situation and also imposing judgment on those who persecute the psalmist. This so-called dual wish—to be rescued and to have the enemies judged—troubles many modern readers, but the psalmist suffers a reality in which there is no other deliverance than the destruction and removal of the threat.

The poem employs two plays on words. First, as the psalm begins, the petitioner "lifts" (v. 2; nasa') hands to God's sanctuary in petition and praise. The psalm correspondingly ends with the request that God would be Israel's shepherd and "lift" (v. 9; NRSV, carry) them out of danger. The closing request that God "shepherd" (ra'a) the people also is part of the poem's linguistic play, the petitioner having earlier complained about enemies working evil (ra'a) even as they speak peace with their "neighbor"(rea').

Psalm 29

This hymn of praise is replete with the ancient mythological symbolism with which modern readers struggle to identify. Without ears to hear this symbolism, the poem falls on deaf ears. In ancient Israel's imagination, the one God was surrounded by lesser "heavenly beings" (v. 1), the council of God (cf. Isa 6:1–5), some of whom maybe hostile to God's rule (cf. Ps 82). The Lord earns lordship by defeating the powers of chaos—here portrayed as "the waters" (v. 3) and "the flood" (v. 10; cf. Gen 1:1).

Psalm 29 is a hymn that celebrates the Lord's triumph over these powers of chaos. The psalm begins by calling on the beings in God's heavenly house to acknowledge the Lord's kingship by acknowledging God's "glory" (v. 1); the psalm ends in a similar fashion as those in God's earthly house (the Temple) also speak God's "glory" (v. 9). The middle section speaks seven times of the "voice of the LORD"—the cacophony of a thunderstorm—triumphing over waters, mighty waters, cedars, and so on. The psalm ends by celebrating the Lord as enthroned over the forces of chaos, and thus as the only power worthy of glory and able to grant true blessing and peace (v. 11).

Psalm 30

Psalm 30 is a song of thanksgiving celebrating God's faithfulness as experienced in the psalmist's delivery from a near-death crisis. The structure of the psalm is clear: thanksgiving for deliverance (vv. 1–3); call for others to join in thanks (vv. 4–5); recollection of the crisis (vv. 6–7); repetition of the petition (vv. 8–10); closing word of praise (vv. 11–12).

A key motif is the image of the psalmist having nearly "gone down to the Pit" (v. 3; the pit could be a well or cistern, and thus is a metaphor for death), but of God having "drawn me up" (v. 1) and "brought up my soul" (v. 3). In v. 9, the psalmist recalls an earlier prayer for deliverance: What profit is there if I "go down to the Pit?" (v. 9).

The psalm also employs pairs of words and images that contrast the despair of the crisis with the wonder of God's deliverance: God's anger/ God's favor; for a moment/for a lifetime; weeping/ joy; night/morning; mourning/dancing; sackcloth/clothed with joy; silence/praise. The creedal confession in v. 5 and the prayer confession in v. 11 together summarize the message of the psalm.

Psalm 31

This poem alternates between poignant pleas for help (vv. 1–2, 9, 16–18), a profound expression of pain (vv. 10–13), and expressions of trust and praise (vv. 3–8, 14–15, 19–24). As a whole, the psalm moves from petition to praise to instruction (vv. 23–24). The psalm is replete with formulaic language. The text borrows from other texts and is in turn borrowed from—compare vv. 1–3a with Ps 71:1–3; v. 5a with Luke 23:46; v. 9a with Ps 6:3; v. 12 with Jer 22:28; v. 13 with Jer 22:10; v. 17 with Jer 17:18; v. 24 with Josh 1:6, 7, 9.

The dominant theological note of the psalm is sounded in vv. 5 and 14. The psalm as a whole explores what it means to entrust and commit one's life to God. Such a life will be dually marked: on the one hand, by the opposition and scorn of those who reject the way of God (vv. 6, 11), and on the other hand, by a steadfast "hope" (v. 24; NRSV, wait) that is able to take a long view of life and rely on God in the face of persecutions and suffering.

Psalm 32

This psalm of thanksgiving after deliverance from a crisis was later counted as one of the penitential psalms (see commentary on Ps 6). In place of a call to praise (cf. Ps 30:1–3) the psalm starts with a wisdom-like beatitude celebrating the joys of forgiveness. The psalm recalls the crisis as a bodily illness (vv. 3–4) and recounts how a confession of sin led to forgiveness (v. 5) and restoration. Three different terms for sin are used in vv. 1–2 and again in v. 5, emphasizing via both repetition and variety the necessity for the sinner to seek forgiveness from God. At the close, the sufferer transforms into preacher. The psalmist offers instruction about the benefits of "the way" (v. 8) of the Lord, and, with wonderful imagery, warns against mulish stubbornness (most likely the psalmist is recalling his or her own earlier silent reluctance to confess sin).

One interpretive issue that the psalm raises is the connection between sin/guilt and suffering/disease. As Job's misguided counselors illustrate, one cannot automatically conclude that those who suffer illness have violated some law. The fact that the psalmist interprets the past health crisis as God's judgment does not mean that all such crises are the results of sin.

Psalm 33

This moving hymn of praise bears witness to several cardinal elements of Old Testament theology: worship, (vv. 1–3), creation (vv. 4–9), the word of God (vv. 4, 6, 9, 11), providence (vv. 10–18), and hope (vv. 20–22).

The psalm teaches that worship is both a human response that is fitting, but also that it is the way in which the "word of the LORD" (v. 4) shapes and renews (this is the force of "new" in v. 3) the people. Worship is not merely a human activity; the primary actor in worship is God. The psalm also connects the Lord's word with both God's creating and sustaining works. Similar to Genesis 1, this poem portrays creation as an act of God's word by which God ordered a chaotic environment into a hospitable one (vv. 6–7). The existence of life depends on the ongoing creative activity of God. Moreover, God remains an active subject within creation, frustrating the chaotic wishes of those who oppose God's reign (vv. 10–11) and ordering human society into hospitable community (vv. 11–15).

The psalm ends on a high note concerning trust and hope. Hope and trust are not merely beneficial attitudes, they are attributes of the life of faith. To belong to God is to wait on and trust in God.

Psalm 34

This acrostic psalm (see commentary on Ps 9/10) is similar to Ps 25; both omit the letter waw and both add an extra pe verse at the end. Unlike many acrostic poems, Ps 34 has a clear structure and form. It is a psalm of thanksgiving that, like Ps 32, moves from a call to praise (vv. 1–3), to thanksgiving (vv. 4–10), to instruction (vv. 11–22). The Davidic superscription is not original to the psalm; it suggests that one read the psalm against the background of 1 Sam 21:10–15 (assuming that the superscription's Abimelech is a mistake for Achish). The psalm is heavily influenced by Israel's wisdom tradition.

A notable element of the call to praise is the call for the community to join the psalmist's thanksgiving for an act of divine deliverance. For the congregation to be God's community, it must join in the praise of those whom God has redeemed. As other psalms show, inability or unwillingness to join thusly ruptures the community. The thanksgiving section emphasizes the fear of the Lord (vv. 4, 7, 9). To fear God is to acknowledge one's dependence on God and to reject the false lure of self-sufficiency. The last section of the psalm emphasizes God's agency as the one who hears, sees, rescues, saves, and redeems the righteous.

Psalm 35

This cry for help can be understood as an unpacking of the petition, "Deliver us from evil"—this is a prayer meditation of one caught in the nets of evildoers. A sufferer marshals military (vv. 1–3), natural (vv. 5–8, 17), legal (vv. 11–12), and grieving (vv. 13–14) imagery to portray a crisis fraught with threat and pregnant with deliverance.

An interesting element in the psalm is the various voices that the psalmist quotes: God's voice (v. 3), "my bones" (v. 10), the enemies (vv. 21, 25), and the community who desires "my vindication" (v. 27). As one traces the progression of these attributed words, one can map the psalmist's desired movement from crisis to rescue to rehabilitation. Of special note is the psalmist's plea for God to declare, "I am your salvation" (v. 3). Many interpret this as a message of salvation announced by a priest in a temple (similar to Eli in 1 Sam 1:17), but it may simply express the psalmist's desire for rescue. Of equal interest is the closing request in v. 27 for the congregation to praise the Lord. This indicates that divine deliverance must be matched by communal rehabilitation; God's saving act is not complete until God's people join in welcoming the sufferer.

The psalm seems like a prayer for help, but its vocabulary betrays wisdom tradition influence. Prayers for help often include complaint about foes, trust in God, and cries for help. Here, complaint is replaced by description of "the wicked" (vv. 1–4); trust is replaced by praise of God (vv. 5–9). The petition occurs in vv. 10–12.

The psalm's first two sections contrast a description of the "wicked," whose flaw is that they are self-governed (vv. 1–4), with praise of "the LORD" (vv. 5–9). Given the occurrence of wisdom terminology, this is surprising; in wisdom literature one expects "the wicked" to be contrasted with "the righteous" (cf. Pss 1; 37). Instead, Ps 36 contrasts the wicked with the Lord! The praise lauds God's character, which is described by pairing key theological words about God's character—steadfast love (hesed), faithfulness, righteousness, and judgments—with poetic metaphors drawn from the domain of creation—heavens, clouds, mighty mountains, and great deep. This poetic strategy of pairing culminates with the confession "in your light we see light," where the natural and theological metaphors become one.

The psalm closes with the petition that God would stay true to the divine character by continuing to act faithfully on behalf of the people.

Psalm 37

Like most acrostic poems (see commentary on Ps 9/10), this psalm lacks a discernible progression. The influence of the wisdom tradition is evident both in the contrast between "wicked" and "righteous" and in the self-consciously instructional nature of the psalm. If the reference in v. 25 to being old is taken literally, this poem is the sage advice of an elder. Taken canonically, the poem comes to new generations as the advice of spiritual ancestors.

Two repeated motifs in the psalm can serve as foci for interpretation. First, the psalm warns do not "be obsessed" (vv. 1, 7, 8; NRSV, fret) with the success of the wicked. Similar to Ps 73:2–20, the psalm warns that if one focuses either on the seeming reward of the wicked or on their unrighteous behavior, one might be tempted to follow their path. Second, the psalm promises that the righteous shall "inherit the land" (vv. 3, 9, 11, 22, 34; cf. vv. 18, 27). This allusion to God's promise to Abraham (Gen 12:1–3) invites the reader to imagine living life for the long haul, trusting that in the end God keeps promises—as God did for Abraham and Sarah. The rhetoric about age in v. 25 underscores this point.

Psalm 38

This prayer for forgiveness, healing, and rehabilitation is one of the seven penitential psalms (see note on Ps 6). The psalm is almost certainly the prayer of one suffering from a grave illness (vv. 5–10). This suffering is increased by the fact that in addition to the physical suffering, the illness has isolated the psalmist from the community. It may be that members of the community, similar to Job's friends, interpreted the psalmist's illness as evidence of sin (v. 19). Or, it may be that the community simply remained aloof to the psalmist's pain and offered neither support nor comfort (v. 12)—either because they were afraid of contagion or because, as often happens, they did not know how to bring comfort.

For the psalmist, the answer to the crisis is found first in the decision to "declare" his or her sins (v. 18; NRSV, confess), and second, in the hoped-for forgiveness of God. With humans, forgiveness does not automatically mean reconciliation; but with God, it does.

Psalm 39

This psalm can be understood through the lens of paradox. The psalmist claims more than once to be silent (vv. 2, 9), yet speaks this prayer and begs, "Give ear to my cry" (v. 12). The sufferer desires both more and less of God's attention—asking God both to "turn away" (v. 13) and to "hear my prayer" (v. 12). The singer desires to "know my end" (v. 4), even while acknowledging that attempts at knowledge are fruitless (v. 6). The psalmist experiences life as toil and trouble (v. 6), yet begs for more (v. 13). The keystone that holds together the paradoxical arch under which the psalmist lives is God, whose faithfulness is experienced both in punishment for sin (v. 10) and in forgiveness (v. 8).

The metaphor of the psalmist as a "sojourner" (v. 12; NRSV, passing guest) "like all my forebears" has captured the imagination of many interpreters. The metaphor, which conjures echoes of the ancestral narratives in Genesis, proclaims both law (that humans are mortal) and promise (that eternal God watches over and values human life).

Psalm 40

As in other psalms of thanksgiving, the psalmist recalls the past crisis (vv. 1–3), then offers renewed praise of God (vv. 4–7). Verse 7 should likely be translated, "I have come, in this scroll is written what happened to me"—the psalmist came to the sanctuary and presented a written testimony of God's act of deliverance.

Such testimony is a necessary part of the life of faith. To refrain from such testimony is to hide God's saving help selfishly in one's own heart (v. 9)! Whereas our culture privatizes faith, this psalm teaches that faithfulness to God requires public testimony, lest one conceal God's grace (v. 10). The psalm closes with a renewed prayer for help (vv. 11–15) and the wish that God would manifest deliverance so powerfully that all might join the psalmist in a new song (vv. 16–17). Verses 13–17 also appear as Ps 70 (see commentary there).

Psalm 41

Book I of the Psalter closes as it began, with an instructional psalm that begins with the term happy. Similar to Ps 1, this poem promises that God sustains the righteous through troubles and tribulations (vv. 1–3). This opening stanza is a thumbnail sketch of the psalmist's theology. The remainder of the psalm (vv. 4–12) functions as a case study of this theology. Both the psalmist and the community interpret the psalmist's illness as evidence that the psalmist has sinned. The community includes both ill-wishers who delight at the prospect of the psalmist's demise (vv. 5–7) and well-wishers who have given up hope in the psalmist's recovery (vv. 8–9). Rejection by the community both multiplies the psalmist's suffering and paradoxically drives him or her to rely even more deeply on God (vv. 10–12). Verses 11–12 may indicate that the psalmist has already experienced healing or completely trusts in God's faithful promise of healing. Either way, the personal case study in the psalmist's theology climaxes with the psalmist's solid expression of trust and hope.

The doxology in v. 13 is not properly a part of Ps 41, but is the editorial closure of Book I of the

II. Book II (42–72)

Psalms 42/43

For several reasons, Pss 42 and 43 are judged to comprise one poem: a refrain occurs three times across the two psalms (42:5–6a; 42:11; 43:5), Ps 43 lacks a superscription, and the theme of the Temple unifies the entire poem. The superscription assigns this to "the Korahites," probably a group of Levitical musicians in the Second Temple (cf. 1 Chr 9:19; 2 Chr 20:19) who are identified with a group of psalms (see introduction). The psalmist's memories of leading the musical temple procession for the festival (42:4) suggest that the singer should be understood as one of the Korahites. But the references to enemies who taunt "where is your God?" (42:3, 10) and to physical separation from the Temple (42:6; 43:3) suggest that the Levite is in exile. Who are these enemies? Certainty eludes the interpreter. All that can be said is that they are those who separate the singer from God.

The governing theological motif of this psalm is separation from God's presence. The governing poetic motif is water—the psalmist thirsts for God as a deer longs for streams, the psalmist weeps, pours out his soul, and feels like the thundering deeps and waves are drowning him. Like one dying of thirst who is tortured by memories of water, the psalmist's very memories of joyful singing in God's presence torture him in exile from the Temple. Yet, paradoxically, these memories also promise the psalmist hope. Three times in the chorus, the psalmist addresses himself, adjuring himself to hope and singing the promise, "I shall again praise him, my help and my God."

Psalms 44

The community prayer for help may have been composed for use either after a particular national defeat or for annual temple use as part of a liturgy enacting a drama of defeat and rescue. In either case, the theological challenge to God's faithfulness and plea for deliverance resonates in any age. The fact that the speaking voice alternates between an individual (vv. 4, 6, 15–16) and community probably indicates that the king or some other leader spoke the prayer on behalf of the people.

The poem has three movements. In the first (vv. 1–8), the language is creedal. The psalm recites God's mighty deeds on behalf of the nation, emphasizing that Israel's fortunes were not their own doing but the gracious action of God. This sets up the second movement, in which the singer accuses and questions God, transforming the language of confession into accusation (cf. vv. 7, 10). In the third movement, the psalmist questions God: Since "we have not forgotten you" (v. 17), "why do you forget our affliction and oppression?" (v. 24). Then the poem calls for God to reverse the nation's fortunes. The closing verses (23–26) resound with bold pleas for God to remain faithful to the promises of the covenant "for the sake of your steadfast love" (cf. Exod 34:6–7).

Psalm 45

This psalm is unique in the Psalter, a song of praise addressed to the ancient king and his bride, most likely on the occasion of their wedding. A psalm of the Korahites (see commentary on Ps 43/44), the singer likely was a temple musician. In the ancient world there was no concept of separation of "church and state," and thus the state and its head were directly associated with the nation's faith. Although Israel's prophets, laws, and scriptures often criticized the king (cf. Deut 17:14–20; 1 Sam 8:4–22; Jer 23:1–4), the king was nevertheless understood as akin to a means of grace, one of the ways in which the Lord acted to bless the people (cf. Ps 72). Thus, the king was a means by which God protected the people militarily (v. 3), provided justice and equity (v. 4), established righteousness (v. 7), and kept faith with the ancestral promises to give the people land, a name, and descendants (vv. 16–17).

Israel's kings universally failed to live up to the divine standards, for kingship and the monarchy failed. In both Rabbinic Judaism and Christianity, this psalm became reinterpreted as a promise of the coming messianic king.

This communal song of trust is composed of three stanzas (vv. 1–3, 4–6, 8–10). The refrain that follows the second and third stanzas (vv. 7, 11) can be seen as the central confession of trust in the psalm (see also vv. 1, 5). Like other psalms of trust such as 23 and 27, the poem names forces that pose mortal dangers. The poetic imagery of the psalm describes both the threatening powers and God's protecting presence in ways that merge mythological features with historical and natural features.

In the first stanza, the focus is on the earth—the raging seas and roiling earth encompass both the natural threats of earthquakes and storms as well as the mythological hazard of cosmic chaos. In the second, the focus is the nations (cf. Ps 2:1). God's presence in Jerusalem and gracious protection are portrayed mythologically as a river (v. 4). There is no river in Jerusalem (the Gihon spring does not qualify); but the image is a frequent mythological symbol of blessing, protection, and new life (cf. Ezek 47). The last stanza portrays God paradoxically as a warrior who brings peace. The voice of God crowns the psalm (v. 10) with the promise that God is exalted in both the nations (stanza 2) and the earth (stanza 1).

Psalm 47

This psalm is one of a group of psalms that have been labeled "enthronement psalms," because they celebrate the Lord as king (v. 7). It has been proposed that each year—possibly during the Festival of Tabernacles at the time of the fall harvest or during the celebration of the new year—Israel liturgically enacted the enthronement of the Lord. Some believe that at this worship service the Israelites proclaimed, "The LORD has become king!" (Ps 93:1; NRSV, the LORD is king)—in much the same way that Christians annually enact Jesus' resurrection at Easter with the words, "Christ is risen!" According to this view, the liturgical cry "The LORD has become king!" renews—reenacts—the reality of God's kingship, which God had established in the past.

This hymn of praise has two stanzas, each of which follows the normal pattern for such poems—a call to praise (vv. 1, 6) followed by testimonies or reasons for praise (vv. 2–5, 7–9). Whether such an annual celebration of the Lord's kingship ever happened is unknown, but the message of Ps 47 is indeed that the Lord reigns over both Israel and all the earth, which is reason for praise. Human praise is the subversive announcement that the powers that claim dominion over the earth are fraudulent. Praise announces a different Lord, and thus undermines the claims of all others who would rule over us.

Psalms 47–48

This psalm, with 76, 84, 87, and 122 (46 and 132 are related), is a "song of Zion" (cf. 137:3). Zion refers both to Jerusalem as a whole and to God's Temple specifically. The songs of Zion share some unique features: the psalms personify Zion, often addressing it directly; they praise Zion's beauty and glory; they emphasize that God has chosen to dwell or cause God's "name" to dwell in Zion; they emphasize that God protects the city.

The literary device of praising the city may seem odd to modern readers, but the city functioned in Judean theology in ways similar to the concept of "means of grace" in Christian theology. God was understood as present on behalf of the people "in, with, and under" the city (48:3, 8–10)—so much so that the psalm can even say of the city, "This is God" (v. 13!). As such, this motif picks up God's promise of "a land" to Abraham (Gen 12:1–3). "In the far north" (v. 1) is not literal (Jerusalem is in Israel's south), but refers to the mythological Canaanite Mount Zaphon (which in Hebrew means "north") that was the imagined residence of the gods. Likewise, vv. 4–8 probably do not refer to any historical attack on Jerusalem, but are a mythological depiction of the nations' rebellion against God.

Psalms 49–50

This song of instruction levels the unlevel earthly playing field by asserting that all humanity, "low and high, rich and poor together" are mortal and thus are alike in God's sight. The message of the psalm is that the righteous should not be afraid when others, especially the wicked, achieve earthly success, for all such victories are temporary. Rather, trust in God who alone has eternal power.

The structure of the psalm is straightforward. A four-verse introduction calls on the audience to listen to "wisdom" (vv. 1–4). Two eight-verse stanzas follow, each of which culminates with a refrain that announces that all flesh is mortal (vv. 12, 20). A key concept in the poem is that of "ransom" (vv. 7–8, 15), which plays on the theme of wealth that dominates the psalm. The term means to "rescue" a person or animal from an obligation by paying a price either in money or in kind (Exod 34:20; Num 18:17). The point here is that no amount of earthly wealth can ransom human life from the obligation flesh owes to death. Only God can "ransom . . . from the power of Sheol" (v. 15). While some doubt that this verse promises life after death, it seems likely that in this late psalm, the promise of eternal life is implied.

Psalm 50

Psalms 50, 81, and 95 have been labeled as "festival psalms" because they probably were used liturgically at one of Israel's three major annual festivals (Passover, Weeks/Pentecost, or Booths/Succoth)—major elements of which included animal sacrifice (Lev 23:33–36). These psalms share an admonishing tone, the call to "obey" (v. 7; NRSV, hear) as God testifies against the people, the quotation of God's voice as the culmination of the psalm (vv. 5–23), and the reference within these quotations to the Decalogue (vv. 18–20). The presence of the voice of God in these psalms underscores that worship is not primarily a human activity, but a sacred time when God encounters humanity. The admonishing tone of God's voice underscores that discipline and even reproach are important parts of a healthy relationship with God.

God's speech to the people in Ps 50 is underscored by the motif of "silence." God says that while the people transgressed the commandments against theft, adultery, and false witness (vv. 18–20), "I have been silent" (v. 21). But now God is breaking this silence (v. 3) and testifying "against" the people (v. 7). God denounces the sacrifices of the festival as penultimate (vv. 8–14). Instead, God desires covenant obedience and a sacrifice of "thanksgiving" (vv. 14–15, 23).

One of the seven penitential prayers (see commentary on Ps 6), this prayer for help is a passionate plea for forgiveness. The superscription that connects this prayer with the affair between David and Bathsheba (see 2 Samuel 11–12) is not original to the psalm, but reflects the earliest layer of interpretation of the psalm. It offers one example of an instance in which this prayer for forgiveness would be appropriate.

The opening two verses of the psalm use three different Hebrew words for sin, emphasizing by repetition and variation the psalmist's complete sense of sin. The psalmist matches this with three different words for forgiveness, accentuating the desperate need for forgiveness. The phrase "against you, you alone, have I sinned" (v. 4) does not deny that sin has human victims, rather it emphasizes that God cannot and will not be separated from the equation. The basis of the psalmist's plea for forgiveness is God's character ("steadfast love" and "abundant mercy," v. 1), rather than any action or quality of the sinner.

The central section of the psalm includes two passages that are well known because they have been adopted widely in worship. In the first, "create in me . . ." (vv. 10–12), the psalm employs the metaphor of re-creation to ask for forgiveness. In the second, "O LORD, open my lips . . ." (vv. 15–17), the psalmist promises that forgiveness will be met with a response of praise.

The last two verses are a later Priestly addition to the psalm, probably added to balance the criticism of sacrifice in vv. 16–17.

Psalm 52

This poem moves from the announcement of judgment upon one of the wicked (vv. 1–7), to a song of trust and praise in God's steadfast love (vv. 8–9). Because the psalm addresses the wicked directly (vv. 1–5; cf. 2:1–22; 4:2–5; 6:8–10), some have compared this psalm to prophetic texts, in which judgment is often proclaimed directly to the wicked.

The wicked are marked by two complementary characteristics. First, they do evil to their neighbors primarily with their words (vv. 1–4). Second, the wicked do not trust in God, but instead trust in "abundant riches" (v. 7) and, by extension, in earthly understandings of power and success. God's anger here is related to God's love. Because God loves the oppressed, God's judgment is announced. The psalmist is loyal to both God and God's "faithful," presumably the powerless who are oppressed by the wicked (vv. 8–9).

Psalm 53

This psalm is identical to Ps 14 in all but a few minor details, primarily that whereas Ps 14 uses the Hebrew proper name for God yhwh (The LORD), Ps 53 uses the more generic 'elohim (God). This is generally the case in Pss 42–83, which are therefore labeled the Elohist Psalter. For commentary, see Ps 14. Note the resonance between Ps 52, which emphasizes that the wicked do evil because they have chosen to trust in wealth rather than God, and Ps 53, in which the "fool" rejects both God and doing good (v. 1).

Psalm 54

The brevity of this prayer for help serves to magnify the intensity of the psalmist's crisis. Words are not wasted. The psalm opens with a fourfold cry for deliverance; the first two phrases beg for salvation, the second two ask to be heard (vv. 1–2). The description of the enemies is typically opaque. No one situation can be discerned behind the clouded glass of the text; rather, the words are sufficiently ambiguous to allow sufferers in many different crises to make this prayer their own. In that light, the superscription that connects the prayer with a time in David's life (cf. 1 Sam 23:19) offers one situation appropriate for this psalm, but does not reflect the setting in which it was authored.

The center of the prayer, both textually and theologically, is v. 4, which expresses the psalmist's trust in God. God is confessed as "helper," the same word used in Gen 2:18 to describe the partner that the man needs. The word does not imply a diminutive or inferior person, but one with the necessary power and fidelity to help. The "freewill offering" (v. 6) that the psalmist promises is a type of offering that is not required by cultic legislation, but a gift offered solely in grateful response for deliverance.

Psalm 55

This prayer for help may have been first uttered by a Temple priest, as indicated by the reference in v. 14 to processing in the Temple with "the fellowship" (NRSV, throng). The psalmist is in desperate straits, but that is not unusual in the psalms. What marks this psalm as singular is that the betrayal has not come from "enemies . . . I could bear that" but from "my equal, my companion, my familiar friend" (vv. 12–13). The force of this threefold, emphatic utterance in Hebrew can scarcely be overstated. The pain that gave rise to this prayer makes it appropriate for anyone who has experienced a similar betrayal by a friend, neighbor, or family member. This personal treachery is exacerbated by the psalmist's sense that similar brokenness stalks the walls and markets of the city (vv. 10–11). The reference to crying out evening, morning, and noon (v. 17) may echo daily ritual activities in the Temple.

A surprising and unexpected confidence in the Lord arises out of the midst of this anguish. The psalmist is confident in the face of daunting earthly odds, because of the character of God, "who is enthroned from old" (vv. 18–19). Verse 22 is a promise that undergirds the prayer; it is a reminder that prayer is a relational activity based on trust in God's character.

Psalm 56

This poem opens with a cry for help, but is dominated by powerful expressions of trust, which begin in v. 3. Something akin to a refrain occurs in vv. 4 and 10–11, sounding the psalm's leitmotif of trust: why fear human beings when one can trust in God?

The psalmist's trust is built upon the twin foundations of God's word (v. 4, 11) and God's providence (v. 8). The two go together. The psalmist trusts in the promise that God keeps watch over the faithful and, in fact, that God has written the psalmist's name in a book—signifying the surety and steadfastness of the divine-human relationship. It is not clear how the psalmist knows God's word. Does this refer to a promise received from a priest or prophet? Does this refer to a promise made in the distant past or one recently received? Does the "word" refer to Scripture (assuming this is a late psalm)? As the reference to God collecting the psalmist's tears indicates, trust in the promise of providence is not a naïve assumption that God's people are immune to suffering, but a more nuanced trust that God transforms suffering and gives life meaning.

Psalm 57

Similar to Ps 56, this psalm begins with an appeal for help (vv. 1–4), but the second half of the psalm is dominated by praise (vv. 5, 7–11). The psalm has two halves, as the praise refrain in vv. 5 and 11 indicates. The turning point of the psalm comes in v. 6, as the psalmist confidently announces, in traditional wisdom vocabulary, that the enemies have fallen into the very trap that they had set.

This poem features powerful metaphors that communicate both the psalmist's desperation (the enemies are greedily devouring lions, the psalmist takes refuge under God's wings) and also the psalmist's praise (the psalmist calls for "my heart," "lyre and harp" to awake). In the psalms, sufferers often call on God to awake as part of the cry for help. Here, the language is reversed. In light of trust in God's "unfailing love," the cry to awake is an expression of spontaneous, joyful praise. The psalm closes with images of creation (heavens, clouds, heavens, earth). These metaphors communicate both the vast reach of God's hand and the sudden "shine" of God's deliverance.

Psalm 58

This poem begins with a textual problem and ends with a theological problem. The textual problem regards how to unravel v. 1. The Hebrew word for silence, 'elem, makes little sense here, so most translations emend the word to 'elohim, meaning either gods (NRSV) or mighty ones (NIV). The first option assumes the psalm is directed at the false gods of the nations, similar to Ps 82. The second view interprets the psalm as aimed at corrupt judges and leaders within the community, as v. 3 suggests. Either way, this prayer is rare in that it opens by being directed not at God but at someone other than God.

The harsh wishes of the destruction of the enemies in vv. 6–10 raise a theological problem for many readers. While it is tempting to try to diminish the raw impact of these curses, it may be more honest to admit that such rage can be a part of the life of faith—especially when one has been deeply hurt. The psalmist, as far as we know, does not take vengeance into his or her own hands, but takes it to the Lord in prayer and, one can hope, leaves it there. The psalmist also trusts that God will have the last word, in spite of the harsh reality of evil.

Psalm 59

Psalm 59 is a prayer for help that is woven artfully around the root metaphor of speech. The psalm has three stanzas (vv. 1–5, 7–13, 15–17) and a refrain that separates the stanzas (vv. 6, 14). The first stanza employs formulaic language. It begins and ends with appeals for deliverance; in the middle the enemies are described and the psalmist asserts innocence. The refrain portrays the enemies as predatory dogs (cf. Ps 22:16), who growl threateningly—in Ps 46:3, 6, the word translated here as "growl" describes the threatening roar of the sea and the nations. Here, the word denotes both the violence that the wicked achieve with their speech (vv. 3, 7a) and the fact that they do not believe God has the power to intervene and judge them (v. 7b).

The second stanza describes God's reaction to their "words," "cursing," and "lies" (vv. 12–13); God "laughs" (v. 8). God's laughter here portrays the rebellious threat of the enemies as insignificant in the grand scheme. The last stanza describes the psalmist's reaction to the enemies' speech. The psalmist sings praise of God. Praise may seem an insignificant response to the violent speech of the enemies, but it names God as an active agent in the world, thus it is a form of speech that sustains the psalmist in a faithful relationship with God.

Psalm 60

Psalm 60 is a corporate prayer for help that may cause modern readers difficulty, both because of its many geographical references and because of its theology. The poem may have been composed in light of a particular military crisis, or it may have been used liturgically on an annual basis.

The geographical references (vv. 6–9) remind the reader that God's ancient promise of the land (cf. Gen 12:1–2) was a vital part of ancient Israel's faith. The land was seen in ancient Israel as akin to a "means of grace" in Christian theology. The land was God's paramount gift. It simultaneously provided identity, sustenance, and protection for the people. For modern readers who may take for granted citizenship in a peaceful country, the poem is a reminder of the crisis that the loss of place can lead to. The ancient promise that is quoted in vv. 6–8 fuels the request that God restore the land.

The theology in this psalm does not support a nationalistic triumphalism or a view that a military victory is automatically a sign of God's favor. Ps 60 is the prayer of an oppressed people; it underscores God's presence among the defeated and reminds that "human help [Heb.: salvation] is worthless" (v. 11).

Psalm 61

Similar to many other prayers for help, the circumstances that gave rise to this prayer are lost. The opening appeal indicates that the psalmist desires rescue, but other than the obscure reference to a faint heart (v. 2), there are no clues to the psalmist's situation.

The psalm draws on spatial metaphors to make its appeal. The psalmist calls "from the end of the earth" (v. 2). This is most likely not a literal reference to exile from the Temple, but a theological reference to a situation of crisis—the psalmist is distant from God in a spiritual sense. Balancing this lament, the psalmist seeks refuge and sanctuary in the Temple (v. 4). Again, this is most likely not a literal request for sanctuary, but a spiritual request for protection and deliverance.

The petition on behalf of the king (vv. 6–7) recognizes that a prosperous government benefits society at large. The psalm personifies God as "steadfast love and faithfulness" (v. 7), indicating that God's character and person are inseparable.

Psalm 62

This instructional poem moves from personal trust to public instruction. Building on the foundation of a refrain, which expresses a trusting faith that waits only for God (vv. 1–2, 5–6), the psalmist first admonishes the wicked about the violence of their ways (vv. 3–4) and then exhorts the faithful to trust in God (vv. 8–11).

The poem is shaped by a staccato, pedagogical rhythm. The refrain gives voice to the theological center of the psalm, emphasizing the faithful posture of trusting and waiting in God. To wait "in silence" does not literally mean to refrain from all speech; after all, the psalmist speaks in this poem. Rather, it emphasizes a dimension of faith that trusts steadfastly in God alone. Verse 8 begins, "Trust in [God] at all times," whereas v. 10 starts, "Do not trust in oppression" (NRSV, put no confidence in extortion). This complementary structure can be seen as a commentary on the first commandment. To trust in God is to denounce faith in other powers and protections. Here, the tempting gods of oppression and riches are specifically named. God's trustworthiness is imagined metaphorically as a fortress or refuge—one of the most common metaphors in the Psalter.

Psalm 63

Drawing upon the metaphor of nutrients that sustain life, Ps 63 confesses that God true life depends on a relationship with God. The psalm is launched by the powerful metaphor of thirsting for God "as in a dry and dreary land" (v. 1). Even for readers who do not live in an arid climate, the metaphor translates powerfully, since thirst—and even extreme thirst—is a basic human experience. The psalm builds on this metaphor in v. 5, "my soul is satisfied as with a rich feast." Again, because hunger and satiation are basic human experiences, the metaphoric force is powerful. "Soul" does not refer to a spiritual counterpart of the body, but to the psalmist's "inmost being," or "vital center." The point is that God is the necessary and only central sustaining force of life.

The psalmist further declares that God's "steadfast love is better than life" (v. 3). Although this verse may hint at life beyond the grave, the real sense is that God's steadfast love is the one thing needful for life. Because of this, the psalmist promises to "praise you with my life" (NRSV, bless you as long as I live). The sense here is that having found the one thing necessary to sustain true life, one's life becomes completely caught up in bearing witness to God's sustaining love.

Psalm 64

As with so many prayers for help, this prayer begins with an appeal for help (vv. 1–2) and ends with confident trust and the call for praise (vv. 7–10). Because the tense of the verbs in vv. 7–9 is uncertain, it is unclear whether this poem is best understood as a prayer for help in the midst of crisis or a psalm of thanks after deliverance from crisis.

The psalm is composed of the twin elements of "speech" and "ambush." The enemies are portrayed as doing violence with the speech, by shooting verbal arrows at the blameless from ambush (v. 4). How the enemies' speech does violence is not spelled out. They may make false accusations (v. 4) or perhaps they merely plot evil (vv. 2, 5). As in many psalms, the wicked feel free to make mischief because they believe God lacks adequate power to "see" or to hold evildoers accountable (v. 5). But the psalmist confesses faith that God will in turn "shoot his arrow at them" (v. 7), because God does see and will hold the wicked accountable for the crimes of "their tongue" (v. 8). The psalmist further promises that there will be a time when people will "tell" what God has done (v. 9).

This hymn praises God for answering prayer and forgiving (vv. 2–3), for electing Israel and being present in the Temple (v. 4), for achieving victory over the cosmic forces of chaos through the act of creation (vv. 5–7), for providing deliverance from the nations (v. 7b), and for providing a bountiful harvest (vv. 9–13). The hymn refuses to draw neat lines between God's various gracious activities on behalf of creation. Theologians often prefer to compartmentalize God's various deeds and deal with them cleanly, but this psalm serves up a messy plate. The attempt to link the various activities of God in this psalm in a clear, causal sequence is ill advised. The poem is an effusive pouring forth of praise that transgresses the boundaries of such categories and causal links.

At its heart, the psalm praises God for the ongoing sustenance and bounty of harvest (vv. 9–13). Although some interpreters have tried to locate the psalm at the time of the end of a drought, such a setting is unlikely. The psalm is a more general praise for the blessings of harvest. These blessings are not seen as distinct from or available apart from God's other actions, such as forgiveness, creation, and the like, but as one aspect of God's multifaceted grace.

Psalm 66

Psalm 66 is a poem that morphs through three types of praise—a hymn of praise (vv. 1–7), a communal song of thanksgiving (vv. 8–12), and an individual song of thanksgiving (vv. 13–20)—introducing the history of God's actions on behalf of Israel and inviting all to join themselves to this story. One can understand the movement of the psalm by tracing the words come and bless. The psalmist bids the peoples to "come and see what God has done" (v. 5). The language of coming (cf. Ps 95:1) means to enter into a relational space with God. Here, the purpose is to hear of what God has done for Israel in the exodus and the entry into the land (v. 6). The psalm then invites the peoples to "bless" (which means praise) God, who has sustained the people through many hardships. Verses 10–12 present God's sustaining help by means of vivid imagery.

The psalmist presents himself or herself as a personal example, doing personally what the nations were exhorted to do: "I have come . . ." (NRSV, I will come). The psalmist describes the gift of exorbitant offerings (v. 15), a ritual means of joining oneself to God. On this basis, the psalmist renews the call for the peoples to "come" (v. 16). The poem closes with the psalmist again fulfilling his or her own imperative: "Blessed be God" (v. 20).

Psalm 67 is part priestly prayer for blessing and part hymn of praise. The psalm has three stanzas (vv. 1–2, 4, 6–7), separated by a refrain (vv. 3, 5). Both the refrain and the central stanzas are calls for the nations to join in praise of the Lord. The call to praise is substantiated by two reasons: God's saving deeds (v. 2) and God's justice (v. 4). As the phrases "among all nations" (v. 2) and "the peoples/the nations" (v. 4) indicate, the universal frame of God's actions are emphasized. Thus, the psalm's exhortation to praise transcends national and ethnic boundaries—praise is the activity that breaks down the walls that divide.

The opening and closing stanzas of the psalm are prayers for blessing. Verse 6b should be translated, "may God, our God, bless us" (NRSV, has blessed us). The connection of this prayer for blessing with "all the ends of the earth" recalls the ancestral promise of Gen 12:1–3 that God's blessing of Israel is for the purpose of blessing all the nations of the earth. As part of the divine mission to bless all the families of the earth, God uses the priestly nation Israel as a means of blessing.

Psalm 68

This lengthy poem is most likely the oldest psalm in the Psalter and is certainly the most difficult to interpret. It is so filled with unclear terms (15 Hebrew words occur only here in the Old Testament) and obscure phrases that some scholars have concluded that the poem is comprised of the fragments of other psalms. Given the psalm's length and obscurities, commentary here will focus on one major theme of the psalm.

One major theme of the psalm is the revelation of God's presence (vv. 5–10, 15–18, 29, 35). The psalm recalls God's presence as made known at Mt. Sinai, during the march through the wilderness, in the blessings of harvest, in the establishment of the Temple in Jerusalem, and above all in the history and fortunes of the nation Israel. Of interest here is the particularity of God's revelation. Like the Christian witness to God's incarnation in the person and flesh of a crucified messiah, Israel's witness to God's presence in her history is a scandalous claim that the eternal has become available in one particular people and place. The ways and wisdom of God's reign break into the world through this ancient people and its story.

Psalm 69

Similar in many ways to Ps 22, this individual prayer for help is often cited in the New Testament, especially in the passion narratives. The imagery and emotions of this lyric are volatile, particularly in the opening description of crisis (vv. 1–5) and in a long section that curses the psalmist's oppressors (vv. 22–28). As with Ps 22, the turn to confident praise at the end of the psalm has caused confusion. Although some explain this change as the result of a divine promise delivered by a priest, it is more likely that lament and confidence are psychologically enmeshed emotions.

It is impossible to translate for the modern mind the intensity and force of the metaphor of drowning in water (vv. 1–3, 14–15). Among ancient Israel's neighbors, the river was both god and judge. Within Israel, water and sea symbolized the anti-creation forces of chaos. It is striking, then, that in the trusting conclusion of the psalm the sufferer confesses, "Let. . . the sea and everything" in them praise the Lord. The only ground for such a breathtaking reversal is the rescue of the Lord. The psalmist is a figure typifying God's action. The pray-er is oppressed and lowly, admits to sin (v. 5), and yet is faithful and trusts in the Lord's deliverance.

Psalm 70

These verses are repeated, with very minor differences, in Ps 40 as part of a song of thanksgiving (vv. 13–17). Here, they comprise an independent prayer for rescue from personal oppressors. One salient feature of the psalm is the contrast between the quoted speech of the enemies in v. 3, and the called-for speech of the community in v. 4. The enemies' speech has no denotative content; it consists solely of a destructive mood that rejoices in the downfall of the psalmist. The community, in contrast, is enjoined to "love" God's salvation and thus to sing, "God is great!" This points to a foundational quality of the community that God calls forth to share in God's mission: the community rejoices in the deliverance of others and resists rejoicing in the suffering or downfall of others.

Psalm 71

Rhetorically, this poem is the anguished prayer of an elderly member of the community (vv. 5–6, 9, 17–18). Literarily, it is a composite prayer for help assembled in part from elements of other psalms (vv. 1–3//31:2–4; v. 6//22:9; v. 12//22:11, 38:22; v. 13//35:4; v. 18//22:30; v. 22//33:2, 98:5; and so on). Combining the rhetorical and literary, one gets the impression that a person who has drunk deeply from the Psalter's tradition of prayer and praise now draws near to the end of life.

Theologically, the psalmist's trust bears comparison with the concept of faith in Hab 2:1–5. Having been afforded a broader perspective by a life long in days and deep in experiences of both joy and sorrow, the psalmist trusts in God's deliverance and providence even in the midst of calamity. Thus, the psalm swings back and forth between praise and petition, complaint and confidence, honor and shame. The present moment of suffering is the time in which the psalmist experiences all of those emotions and prayer postures. Furthermore, the psalm is a teaching testimony (v. 18), a witness of one wise with age, who has recorded this instruction for a future generation. It is included in the Psalter for the edification of those who have ears to hear.

Psalm 72

It is no accident that Ps 72, a royal psalm, closes Book II of the Psalter. In the editorial shaping of the Psalter, royal psalms were placed at key junctures between books (see Pss 2, 72, 89) as part of the reinterpretation of these psalms in the tradition (more on this below). The superscription identifies this psalm as written for Solomon, probably because of the theme of the king judging the people in righteousness.

As noted in the commentary on Ps 45, in ancient Israel the monarchy was understood as something akin to a means of grace in Christian theology. One sees that connection clearly in Ps 72 in the way that the poem can move seamlessly from petitions asking that the king judge righteously and defend the poor, to petitions asking that mountains and hills provide prosperity (vv. 2–4). Both king and land were seen as gifts from God through which God blesses and provides. The special emphasis on the government's responsibility to the needy and poor (vv. 12–14) is noteworthy.

The fact that Israel's human kings did not live up to their divine calling was interpreted by Israel as one of the reasons that the monarchy failed. Precisely after the monarchy failed, the royal psalms were retained in the Psalter and reinterpreted. Both Christianity and Judaism interpreted the inclusion of Ps 72 in the Psalter as a messianic promise of a perfect Davidic king to come. Some scholars have detected signs of that reinterpretation present already in v. 17.

Verses 18–20 are not part of the psalm. Each of the five books of the Psalter concludes with a doxology; vv. 18–19 are the doxological conclusion of Book II. Verse 20 is an editorial insertion signaling the close of the major collection of Davidic psalms.

III. Book III (73–89)

Psalms 73

Book III of the Psalter begins with an instructional psalm; such psalms have been placed editorially at key seams in the Psalter (see Pss 1, 41, 73, 90)—a clue to read the psalms not just as ancient prayers, but as instruction in the way of faith. This poem is a confession of God's faithfulness. Similar to a song of thanksgiving, the psalmist recounts a time of crisis; after this narration, rather than turning to praise as is typical in a song of thanksgiving, the psalm turns to instruction.

The confession of faith is summed up in the opening phrase: "Truly God is good to Israel" (NRSV, to the upright). This opening declaration provides the context within which the psalmist narrates a past crisis in which the temptation to give up on God and God's ways was so strong, that the psalmist almost joined the wicked. This temptation arose from the apparent prosperity of the wicked (vv. 3–14).

What helped the psalmist avert this temptation was an experience of God's presence (vv. 17, 23–24, 28). The experience occurred in worship and afforded the psalmist a wider perspective on life, the perception that the apparent prosperity of the wicked is a phantom prosperity (v. 20) in comparison with the richer gifts that God grants.

Psalms 74

Psalm 74 is a communal prayer for help. Although the poem may have been composed for annual liturgical use in some Temple commemoration, the descriptions of the Temple destruction and certain vocabulary in vv. 3–8 suggest that the psalm was written (similar to the Book of Lamentations) soon after the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem and the Temple c. 587 BCE.

A key word in the psalm is the imperatival petition, "Remember!" While the term is not uncommon in prayers for help, its threefold occurrence here (vv. 2, 18, 22) is telling. The fact that this imperative also occurs twice in Ps 89:47, 51, another lament likely written after Jerusalem was destroyed, signals the important theological conviction that new life for the people could only be generated by the agency of God. The call was for God to remember the covenantal promises (v. 20) and thus restore the nation.

Two other theological motifs are employed to move God. First, the scoffing of the enemies who destroyed is quoted, and God is urged to remember those taunts (vv. 8, 18, 22). Second, the psalmist recalls God's primeval creative activity—understood mythologically as the defeat of the anti-creation forces of chaos (vv. 12–17). The poem intimates that as God once fashioned life and order where there had been no life and chaos, God can again create new life for the people.

This communal song of thanksgiving may have been placed after Ps 74, a communal prayer for help, both to balance its despair and to illustrate the full cycle one finds in Israel's prayer of the movement from crisis to petition to deliverance to thankful praise. Similar to the three great festival psalms (50, 81, 95), this liturgical poem features the voice of God speaking words of admonition to the worshipping congregation.

After opening sentences of thanksgiving (v. 1), the Lord speaks—most likely through a prophetic or priestly figure. God assures that justice will be established "at the set time"—meaning when God decides the time is ripe, perhaps to be understood as an answer to the cry "how long" in 74:9. God also admonishes the wicked against their pride (vv. 4–5). The psalm continues with an affirmation that judgment comes only from God. The cup of wine is a metaphor for God's judgment (cf. Isa 51:17; Rev 14:10). The psalm ends with a second speech from God. The psalm paints an especially vivid portrait of the wicked as those who live under a false sense of autonomy, whereas the righteous are those who depend on God.

Psalm 76

This hymn of praise is similar to other "songs of Zion" that praise God's election of Jerusalem as the divine dwelling place and God's protection of the city against cosmic and human threats (cf. Pss 46; 48; 84; 114). Although some scholars have tried to identify the psalm with a specific military victory in Israel's history—such as the exodus, one of David's triumphs, or the defeat of Sennacherib in 701 BCE—it is more likely that the psalm was composed for annual, liturgical use in the Temple.

Verse 1 of the psalm indicates that God's choice of Zion is a means of revelation, a channel through which God has revealed the divine character. The remainder of the psalm unpacks two expressions of God's character—God's activities of stopping war (vv. 3, 5–6; cf. Ps 46:9) and God's righteous judgment of oppressors (vv. 7–12). To some modern minds, these two activities seem contradictory. But in the ancient view they were seen as complementary. God's desire to end war is based in God's love for all creation and the divine desire that society be ordered in such ways that all can thrive. When the wicked do evil, God's love for the oppressed is expressed in judgment of the oppressors.

Psalm 77

Memory often plays a significant role when people of faith endure times of crisis. This prayer for help is testimony to the power of memory both to torment sufferers and also to help them come to grips with questions of faith in the midst of suffering. The psalmist is in the midst of a personal crisis that keeps sleep from coming (vv. 1–3). In the middle of the sleepless night, the sufferer's racing mind returns again and again to God and the history of God's saving deeds (v. 5). At first, this knowledge causes despair, as the psalmist wonders if God has forsaken love and recanted the divine promises (vv. 7–10). The complaint section of the prayer climaxes in v. 10 as the psalmist quotes his or her own conclusion that God has repented of love.

But then the psalmist's rumination on God's history takes on a new role. The psalmist narrates the deeds of God in such a way that the psalmist's understanding of God's presence in suffering is reframed. God's way is "holy" and "your footprints were unseen" (vv. 13, 19), meaning that God's presence is often mysterious and beyond the capacity of human comprehension. Nevertheless God is present and active. God's way is "through the sea," meaning God does not promise the absence of suffering, but God leads in the midst of and through chaos.

Psalm 78

When the Old Testament narrates history, it is never simply for the purpose of recounting what happened. Rather, history is recited for the purpose of theological witness. That is the case with Ps 78, in which Israel's history is told in order to teach "the next generation" (v. 6) to know God, by knowing what God has done in the past. Following an introduction (vv. 1–8), the psalm narrates Israel's dealings with God during the wilderness wanderings (vv. 9–41), the exodus (vv. 42–51), and from the time of the settlement of the land down through King David (vv. 52–72). Similar to 2 Kings 17, a major concern of Ps 78 involves God's rejection of the northern kingdom and election of both David and Jerusalem (v. 67–70).

Similar to the Deuteronomic History (Judges through 2 Kings, except for Ruth), the poem relates a long story of the people's unfaithfulness. They tested (vv. 18, 41, 56), forgot (v. 11), lacked faith in (vv. 22, 32, 37), and did not obey God (vv. 10, 56). God met this constant infidelity with compassion and forgiveness (v. 38), although at times God exercised anger in order to bring about repentance (vv. 34–35). This story serves as both a warning not to repeat the sins of the northern kingdom and a promise that God remains faithful in spite of human infidelity. Even in the rejection of the northern kingdom God remains faithful, since the southern people are still present as God's inheritance (vv. 71–72).

Psalm 79

This psalm follows Ps 78, which details the rejection of Israel and the destruction of the sanctuary at Shiloh, and precedes Ps 80, which pleads for communal restoration. This location suggests that the poem be understood in light of Jerusalem's destruction c. 587 BCE at the hands of Babylon. The violence of that destruction challenged Judah's faith, which was in part built on the promises that God would protect Jerusalem and the Davidic line.

At the heart of Ps 79's faith struggle is the question quoted in v. 10: "Where is their God?" This typical "taunt" (vv. 4, 12; cf. Pss 42:3, 10; 115:2) reflects the ancient belief that the destruction of a nation was equivalent to the defeat of that nation's god—that the destruction of a god's temple (v. 1) in effect made that god homeless. The words quoted in v. 10 are placed on the lips of the enemies, but they also reflect Israel's own doubts and pain. By quoting the enemies, Israel could both voice its own struggles but also distance themselves from responsibility for the words. By quoting the enemy's taunt—like Hezekiah, who "spread" a taunting Assyrian letter before the Lord (Isa 37:14–17)—the psalm presents God with the enemies' challenge to the Lord's strength and fidelity. By asking God to hear the "groans of the prisoner" (v. 11), the psalmist asks God for a new exodus deliverance (cf. Exod 2:23–25).

Psalm 80

The threefold refrain (vv. 3, 14, 19) summarizes the driving concern of this prayer: restore the people! The request for God's face to shine is simultaneously a prayer for blessing (Num 6:25) and a plea for a new revelation of divine power (Ps 67:1–2). Many elements tie Pss 78–80 together, including the motif of shepherd. Ps 78 describes the Davidic kings as the shepherds of God's sheep (v. 71). Psalm 79 prays for God to tend "your people, the sheep of your pasture" (v. 13). Psalm 80 begins by addressing God as "shepherd of Israel," a title that occurs only here. Some scholars have interpreted this sequence to the rejection of the Davidic monarchy; at the least, God's lordship is here elevated to a degree that relativizes all human claims to rule God's people, even the claims of God's earthly servants.

Similar to the parable in Isa 5, vv. 8–13 recall God's history of gracious deeds by drawing on the metaphor of the people as God's vineyard. But whereas the prophet sought to move the people to repentance, the psalmist seeks to move God to repentance (turn again in v. 14 renders shuv, which is normally translated repent). As "give us life" in v. 18 indicates, the prayer is literally a prayer for new life and existence for people.

Psalm 81

As with the two other great festival psalms (50, 95), this hymn of praise features a call to praise (vv. 1–5) and the words of God, which were probably spoken by a priest or Temple leader (vv. 6–16). Verses 3–5 identify the psalm with the Festival of Tabernacles, Israel's fall harvest feast. During the Old Testament period, this was the major festival of the liturgical year.

The most striking aspect of this liturgy is the admonishing tone. Modern worshipers expect festival days to be joyous celebrations, but the words of admonition and moral exhortation here call this assumption into question. As with the divine speeches in the other festival psalms, there is a direct connection with a part of the Decalogue. Here, the first two commandments are reinforced (vv. 9–10; cf. Exod 20:1–6). The call to obey the Lord (vv. 11–13) is driven by the reminder of God's loving actions for the people (vv. 6–7) and God's promise to care for the people, especially the continuing providential gifts of the fruits of the harvest (vv. 10b, 16).

Psalm 82

Psalm 82 is the most explicitly mythological poem in the Psalter. Its background—the concept of the "divine council" (v. 1)—represents an ancient worldview that is foreign to modern readers. The divine council consists of the Lord as the chief God presiding over other subservient beings (see Isa 6:1–6; 1 Kgs 22:19–22; Job 1:6–12; Jer 23:18). The psalm takes the form of a drama. The Lord plays the role of the universal judge who assembles the divine council for trial. The Lord charges the gods of other nations with failing in the fundamental obligation to establish justice, especially for the unprotected classes—the orphan, the "poor" (v. 3; NRSV, "lowly"), and the needy. Justice, a fundamental biblical concept, refers to the external social order in which all life can prosper. Verse 5 is a description of the gods who are blind and ignorant. In v. 7, the Lord sentences the gods to mortal death because they have failed to provide justice.

As the dramatic sentence in v. 6 indicates, the psalm is a transitional poem on the way from a polytheistic worldview—which many in Israel held—to a monotheistic view, which is the end product of the OT canon (cf. Ps 115:3–8). The closing appeal for God to rise up and judge the earth may be an exclamation of praise, but it may also be an appeal for the Lord to perform justice—as the Lord had expected the gods of the nations to do.

Psalm 83

Various dates have been proposed for this communal prayer for help, based on the names of the ten threatening nations mentioned in vv. 6–8. A precise date cannot be determined; in fact, it is likely that the psalm represents a liturgical poem composed for regular liturgical use in the Temple, rather than for any one crisis. The mention of the nations reflects the perpetual threats that Israel experienced from many nations. The accusation that "they conspire with one accord" (v. 5) does not mean that there was a literal league among these nations, but rather that Israel interpreted the history of hostility as an overall opposition of other nations to God's mission to bless the nations of the earth through Israel (cf. Gen 12:1–3).

After an opening appeal (v. 1), vv. 2–7 consist of complaint about the nations, while vv. 8–18 are a mirroring section of petition. At the center of each of these sections is a verse in which the words of the enemies are quoted. In v. 4, the nations say, "let the name of Israel be remembered no more." Such boasting taunts were typical in the ancient world, as is attested in Pharaoh Merneptah's famous boast on a victory monument: "Israel lies in waste, its seed is no more." The poem closes by turning the vocabulary of the nations on its head: "Let them know that you alone, whose name is the LORD, are the Most High" (v. 18).

Psalm 84

This bright lyric is part pilgrimage psalm, part song of Zion, and all hymn of praise. That is to say, this is a song that praises God for the wonders of divine grace that God showers (literally, v. 6) on Israel by virtue of the Temple. It is also a poem with significant pilgrimage themes (vv. 5–7); it may have been sung by worshipers who were on their way to Jerusalem to observe one of the three annual pilgrimage festivals, most likely the fall harvest Festival of Tabernacles (cf. Exod 23:16–16). The psalm praises God by lauding the Temple—God's holy dwelling place (v. 1), the nexus point between heaven and earth—and by lauding the worshipers—God's holy people. The Temple is conceived of as an incarnational space where the divine and human realms intersect. Thus, it is the space where human beings become God's people—the channel through which God's blessings, such as harvest/fertility (v. 6), protection (v. 9), and "favor and honor" (v. 11), are made available. God's hospitality is portrayed via the image of the lowly sparrow finding a home in the Temple (v. 3). The surpassing joy and grace that are manifest in the Temple are pictured through the contrasting images (one day versus a thousand; better a doorkeeper than a dweller) of v. 10. The "doorkeeper" is not a priestly office, but should be understood as one who sleeps outside awaiting entrance into the Temple.

Psalm 85

Psalm 85 consists of four stanzas: a communal thanksgiving for past deliverance (vv. 1–3), a communal petition for national restoration (vv. 4–7), a prayer for God's word to be revealed (vv. 8–9), and a promise of deliverance (vv. 10–13). Interpretations of the psalm as a whole differ. The view taken here is that the psalm is a liturgy in which the community requests divine restoration and then receives that promise from God. Exactly what "restoration" entails is unclear: perhaps return from exile (vv. 1b, 4–6), perhaps forgiveness for some national sin (v. 2), perhaps deliverance from a national threat (vv. 7, 9), perhaps a bountiful harvest (v. 12).

Seen from a bird's-eye view, the psalm bears witness to God's past acts of deliverance (vv. 1–3), to the ongoing human need for divine intervention (vv. 4–8), and to the promise that the one who established a covenant with Israel will remain faithful and continue to deliver Israel (vv. 10–13). In the last stanza, the divine attributes of steadfast love, faithfulness, righteousness, and peace are personified as tangible forces that act at God's behest and on the people's behalf. The text of v. 8c is difficult and thus not too much weight should be placed on any interpretation of it.

This is the touching, three-stanza prayer of a sufferer who has nowhere to turn "in the day of trouble" but to God (v. 7). The first stanza (vv. 1–7) consists of confident yet vulnerable petitions for God to rescue the sufferer. Taken together, these verses offer rich insight into the reasons supplicants can have confidence that their petitions are heard. Every verse, with the exception of v. 6, includes a clause that contributes something to the understanding of why the psalmist hopes for the prayer to be answered. These reasons include God's character, the nature of the relationship between God and the psalmist, and the psalmist's desperate situation.

The second stanza picks up the theme of God's character and magnifies it. None is like the Lord, because none has the power to accomplish what God has and will accomplish, and because none has God's faithful and steadfast character. Even though a major theme of the first stanza is the strong relationship between God and psalmist, the psalmist knows that God always has more to teach about the divine way (v. 11).

The last stanza consists of renewed appeals, this time focusing on the threat of the enemies (v. 14) and again on God's character (v. 15). The closing request for a sign—some hint of deliverance—is a prayer to which anyone who has suffered can relate.

Psalms 87

This "song of Zion" is perhaps the most obscure and difficult psalm in the Psalter. How to translate much of the psalm is unclear. Those parts that can be translated with confidence still often remain obscure. Those difficulties granted, the psalm praises the city Jerusalem directly as a stand-in for God (v. 3). It praises Zion as the favored point of contact between the heavenly and earthly spheres (v. 5). In particular, Jerusalem is praised above Jacob (the northern kingdom), while the residents of various foreign countries—Rahab (a mythical beast that here symbolizes Egypt), Babylon, Philistia, Tyre (a city of the Phoenicians), and Ethiopia—are portrayed as honoring those born in Jerusalem. The Lord singles out those born in Jerusalem (v. 6). The meaning of the last verse is not clear, although if one takes "singers and dancers" as a reference to worshipers, then the verse has those worshipers recognizing in some way the singular blessings that God pours out in and through Zion. The psalm's emphasis on Zion's blessings should be balanced by a reminder that in the OT, God's blessing of the chosen people was for the purpose of blessings all the nations of the earth (Gen 12:1–3).

Psalm 88

This psalm is widely regarded as the darkest of all the prayers for help. Of all the laments, Ps 88 alone lacks any sign of confidence in rescue or hope in the future. The psalm's desperate gloom is magnified by its artistic construction. The psalm has a three-stanza structure (vv. 1–9a, 9b–12, 13–18). Each section is structured similarly, containing an appeal to the "LORD," a reference to a different part of the day—"at night" (v. 1), "every day" (v. 9b), "in the morning" (v. 13)—and a reference to a different body part—"incline your ear" (v. 2), "I spread out my hands" (v. 9b), "you hide your face" (v. 14). In those laments that move toward hope, a reference to the morning would signal hope (cf. Pss 5:3; 30:5; 143:8). The morning of Ps 88 dawns upon only more pain and despair. The sufferer is ill onto death (vv. 3–9) and expects no new life after death (vv. 10–12). The illness is caused by God (vv. 14–17). The psalms usually portray God as defeating the forces of chaos that are metaphorically pictured as the "flood" (v. 17). But here, God's activity is portrayed as the flood. The psalm's climactic verse (v. 18) repeats the complaint of v. 8a and punctuates it with a dark exclamation: "my companion is darkness" (the translation of this last phrase is disputed; NRSV, "my companions are in darkness" is unlikely).

As noted already, the artistry of this poem only serves to make its painful cry more poignant. The only glimmers of hope are the three mentions of the Lord, signaling that even in complete suffering, a relationship still exists between the sufferer and the "God of my salvation" (v. 1). Perhaps the best that can be said is that even cries of pain this stark are part of a life of faith.

This lengthy royal psalm brings Book III of the Psalter to a close. The psalm is comprised of an introduction (vv. 1–4) followed by three distinct sections (vv. 5–18, 19–37, 38–51). It begins in praise but closes in pain. The introduction sounds both the psalm's praise keynote—God's covenant with David (vv. 3–4; cf. 2 Sam 7:1–17)—and also introduces the theological grounds for the closing lament, God's "steadfast love" and "faithfulness" (vv. 1–2). The first section of praise emphasizes the Lord's universal kingship, which the Lord earned through the complementary actions of creation and of defeating the powers of chaos (vv. 9–14).

Section two transitions from God's kingship to God's election of the Davidic monarchy. This section emphasizes God's promises to David, specifically God's assurance that although wayward Davidic kings would be disciplined, "I will not remove him from my steadfast love, or be false to my faithfulness" (v. 33). Section three turns to lament, accusing God of having "renounced the covenant" (v. 39). It asks, "where is your steadfast love . . . your faithfulness you swore to David?" (v. 49). The psalm seems to reflect the fall of Jerusalem c. 587 BCE. As mentioned, the theological issue is God's faithfulness to the Davidic covenant. Having accused God of renouncing the covenant, the psalm's only petition is "Remember" (vv. 47, 50; see also the commentary on Ps 74).

Verse 52 is not properly a part of Ps 89, but a doxology that closes Book III.

IV. Book IV (90–106)

Psalms 90

Book IV begins with a wisdom psalm. Some interpreters have argued that the arrangement of Ps 89 (which laments the destruction of the Davidic monarchy) at the end of Book III and of Ps 90 (the only "song of Moses") at the start of Book IV is a major clue to the theology of the Psalter. According to this view, the Psalter tells the story of the failure of the Davidic covenant and a corresponding move to embrace the Sinai covenant (cf. Exod 19–20). But wisdom psalms are placed at the junctures of several of the books of the Psalter (cf. Pss 1; 41; 73). It is more likely that this arrangement signals that the Psalter is a book of instruction.

Psalms 90 begins with the image of God as the people's eternal "dwelling place." This establishes the psalm's poetic contrast between God's eternal nature and the mortal existence to which humans are consigned. The psalm expresses the notion of human mortality through the metaphors of fleeting dreams, withering grass, evening and morning, sin, and flight (vv. 5–10). The span of life is seventy or eighty years (v. 10). The psalm applies this wisdom in three requests. It asks God to grant a wise perspective (so that life may be well lived; v. 12), to "turn back" God's wrath (grant longer life; v. 13), and to "prosper the work of our hands" (to bless the work of one's life; v. 17).

Psalms 91

One of the key theological images of the Psalter is God as "refuge"—the protecting place and person to which a sufferer can flee from enemies, illness, threats from nature, and even from personal sin. Psalm 91 can be understood as an extended meditation on that metaphor.

The poem begins by pairing the image of God's protective refuge with the act of the follower confessing faith—divine refuge is available for anyone who confesses the Lord as refuge and places trust in that refuge (v. 2). The images of "shelter," "shadow," and "wings" may have been associated with the Temple as a place of sanctuary and the image of the cherubim's wings (cf. 1 Kgs 6:22–28), which may be a clue that the psalm was a liturgy for individuals who came to the Temple seeking assurance of God's protection. Alternatively, the metaphor may stem simply from the tradition elsewhere in the Bible that depicts God's guidance using the metaphor of the eagle (Deut 32:10–11; Exod 19:4). The body of the psalm consists of a sequence of divine promises, which are summed up "no evil shall befall you" (v. 10). In Luke 4:10–11, Satan quotes the promise of vv. 1–12—a possible warning to those who might take the promises of Ps 91 out of context.

Psalms 92

The superscription that identifies this as "a song of the Sabbath Day" reflects the later application of this song of thanksgiving. This emphasis on joyful music and singing in the call to praise (vv. 1–4) and the praise of the congregation gathered in the Temple (vv. 12–13) fit well with this Sabbath application. Categorized according to form, the psalm is a song of thanksgiving, expressing the praise of one whom God has sustained through a personal crisis. Categorized according to content, the psalm is an instructional psalm, because of its wisdom-like contrast of the "wicked" (also dullard and stupid) with the "righteous." Similar to many other instructional psalms, this poem emphasizes the limited perspective of the wicked, whose short-timeline worldview leads them to eschew the narrow path of God's way in favor of the quick fix and fast payoff. The righteous, on the other hand, take a broader view of life. They have learned to trust God through times of crisis. This longer view affords them the strength to flourish even into old age.

Psalm 93

This hymn of praise is one of a group of psalms that have been labeled "enthronement psalms" (see commentary on Ps 47), because the argument has been made that they were part of a liturgical celebration that announced, "The LORD has become king" (v. 1a). The argument has also been made that the Lord's kingship is the central theological affirmation of the Psalter. Such a broad conclusion may not be merited, but Ps 93 does bear witness that the Lord's kingship was established through the act of creation. Even the "floods" (v. 3, NRSV; a literal translation would be "rivers," cf. Ps 46:4)—a mythological symbol of the anti-creation forces of chaos—praise the Lord's majesty. The Lord's dominion, based in creation, is eternal and the Lord's "decrees" are sure (v. 5). The psalm thus makes the connection between God's nature and God's instruction.

Psalm 94

This intense prayer for rescue is one part petition for divine vengeance and one part meditation on divine providence. As a prayer for vengeance, the poem numbers among the so-called imprecatory psalms that actively call evil down upon the enemy (cf. Pss 69:22–26; 137:7–9; 139:19–22). As a meditation, the psalm poetically addresses those who deny God's providence and asserts that God is both aware of human rebellion (vv. 8–11) and has the capacity to discipline and judge (vv. 12–23). The enemies are characterized by their rebellion against God and God's ways, which leads them to commit deliberate acts of evil, including the murder of society's most vulnerable members (vv. 5–6). The wicked feel licensed to engage in such immorality because they do not believe that the Lord is aware of human evil or has the power to hold evildoers accountable (v. 7). The prayer's plea for judgment against the wicked offends some modern readers. It should be noted both that genuine evil is a part of fallen human existence and that outraged emotions are part of a life committed to God's just ways. The community asks for God's judgment but does not take vengeance into its own hands.

Psalm 95

Similar to Pss 50 and 81, this hymn of praise betrays signs of having been composed for one of the three major festivals of the Israelite year (probably Tabernacles, the fall festival) and includes a section in which the divine voice admonishes the congregation (vv. 8–11). It may be that the psalm enacts a liturgical procession in which the fellowship first enters the sanctuary (v. 2) and then bows down before God (v. 6). Whether this is true or not, the theological pairing of praise and entering in God's presence is instructive. Praise is speech that names God as the indispensable actor in the world's drama. Praise is not song and speech designed to flatter God; rather, by naming God as lord, it creates the theological space in which the worshiping community enters anew into relationship with God.

The hymn is one of the enthronement psalms (see commentary on Ps 47). God's kingship is based on the acts of creation (v. 5) and of electing Israel (v. 7). The divine admonition reminds the people of the history of testing and rebelling against God during the wilderness years (cf. Exod 17:1–7; Num 20:1–13).

Psalm 96

This hymn of praise accentuates the universal kingship and judgment of God. One of the so-called enthronement psalms (see commentary on Ps 47), it praises the Lord as king (v. 10). The psalm has two stanzas (vv. 1–6, 7–13). Each stanza starts off with three verses (six clauses) of imperative exhortations to praise. The first stanza calls for "a new song." This phrase may have been a technical term for a song of thanksgiving sung after experiencing divine rescue, as the clause "tell of his salvation" in v. 2 may indicate (cf. Ps 40:3). This stanza also praises God as unequalled by other powers. Israel worships the creator; other peoples worship humanly fashioned idols (vv. 4–5).

The second stanza calls on all the nations and families of earth (vv. 7, 10) to worship the Lord by bringing offerings and praise to Jerusalem ("his courts," v. 8). The song calls on the nations to sing Israel's song (v. 10), and poetically depicts creation as already praising the true creator (vv. 11–12). The reference in v. 12 to God's coming in judgment does not refer to the New Testament concept of the end of time, but to God's rescuing actions within history.

Psalm 97

This hymn of praise is one of the enthronement psalms (see commentary on Ps 47). The dramatic focus of this song is on the revelation of God by means of a thunderous theophany (vv. 2–9). The point of the metaphor is not that God is literally in the thunderstorm, but that the Lord's presence is like the storm—an immanent presence that overshadows and destabilizes earthly powers, yet a transcendent mystery surrounded in "clouds and thick darkness" (v. 2). The "heavens proclaim his righteousness" is a double entendre that continues the metaphor. The heavens are both the thundering skies, but also the heavenly realms in which the righteous God dwells. "Zion hears and is glad" continues the double meaning; Zion hears both the storm and the spiritual realm's testimony to the true God, who surpasses any human idols or images.

The psalm makes a characteristic Israelite connection between God's revelation and God's ongoing providence and guidance. The God revealed in Zion loves those who hate evil. In v. 11, the abstract concepts of light and joy portray God's presence.

Psalm 98

A communal "new song" (see commentary on Ps 96) that celebrates an experience of God's deliverance of the people, this hymn calls for exuberant praise. The hymn occurs in three stanzas. The first calls for praise because God has delivered Israel. The song may have been composed after a specific experience of rescue, such as deliverance from military threat, but is general enough to be applied to many circumstances. The point is that in the experience of deliverance, God has revealed the divine character: steadfast love and faithfulness.

The second stanza calls on "all the earth" to praise God, but focuses on human praise—that of song, lyre, trumpet, horn, and voice. The praise names God as king (this is an enthronement psalm; see commentary on Ps 47). The final stanza picks up the call for "all the earth" to praise and enjoins the sea, world, floods, and hills to praise. This poetic flourish is more than a mere anthropomorphism. It is a metaphoric description of the universal rule of the faithful Lord, whose reign bears not just on people, but also on plants, animals, earth, and even the anti-creation forces of the chaotic flood.

Psalm 99

The first three verses of this enthronement hymn (see commentary on Ps 47) poetically pair the particular and universal aspects of Israel's theological witness. The first phrase of each verse names the particular: "The LORD" is the proper name of God revealed to Israel, the cherubim are the winged lions represented in Jerusalem's Temple (cf. 1 Kgs 6:22–28), "Zion" is a name for Jerusalem. The second phrase of each verse names the universal: God's lordship extends over the peoples, the earth, and all the peoples. Together, these verses capture the particular and universal scandal of Israel's good news: The Lord revealed particularly to Israel is king (v. 1) of all creation.

The Lord's kingship is not merely objective, however. God is committed to justice and righteousness both within Israel and throughout the nations. This characteristic commitment to justice is as much the basis for the Lord's reign as any objective qualities of God. The psalm bears further witness to the Lord's faithfulness by narrating God's fidelity in answering Moses, Aaron, Samuel, in giving the law, and in forgiving sin.

Psalm 100

Perhaps the best known of all psalm paraphrases in hymns, "All People That on Earth Do Dwell," captures both the universal scope of this song's witness and its joyful mood. The psalm has two stanzas (vv. 1–3, 4–5), each of which includes both imperative calls for praise and a reason to praise. There are seven imperatives—make a joyful noise, worship, come, know, enter, give thanks, and bless—a number symbolic of perfection. The center imperative sums up the psalm's theology: "Know that the LORD is God" (v. 3a). To "know" God however is never simply a matter of intellectual assent. The Hebrew term does not distinguish between intellectual knowledge and moral obedience, but includes both. To know God is also to obey God (cf. Hos 4:1–4).

The first of the two reasons for praise names God's act of creating the nation (v. 3). The phrase "it is he who made us" refers to the act of electing the people, not the more universal act of creation. The second reason for praise (v. 5) lauds God's goodness, steadfast love, and faithfulness—terms that bear witness to God's faithful character, which is the heart of the theology of the Psalter.

The singer of this song is not named explicitly anywhere in the text, but most interpreters identify the singer as the king, because the statements "I will destroy" the wicked (vv. 5, 8) fit best with the monarch's role in ancient Israel. That interpretation makes this a royal psalm, expressing the king's role as one of the means through which the Lord's reign is realized. The poem may have been composed for a king's coronation, or more likely, for the king to speak during an annual Temple ritual. It fits within Israel's conception of the ideal Davidic monarch, whose reign the prophets anticipated (cf. Isa 9:1–7; 11:1–9).

As an expression of God's action in the world, the poem affirms that God's commitment to a just order requires judgment of those who oppress the neighbor (v. 5). As an expression of what God requires of human beings, the psalm affirms that the call to leadership within God's people is also a call to follow God's "way that is blameless" (vv. 2, 6). More to the point, the call to join oneself to God's house (vv. 2, 7) is a call to be accountable to and for other members of the community. The psalm makes this point poetically when the speaker pledges to "study the way that is blameless" but also trusts that "whoever walks in the way that is blameless shall minister to me" (v. 6).

Psalms 102

The superscription labels this "a prayer of one afflicted, when faint and pleading before the LORD." The superscription is not original to the psalm, but a clue to the earliest interpretation. This description also indicates that the poems and prayers of the Psalter were collected in part so that other men and women could pray them. This prayer is for one who seeks divine intervention due to illness or a similar crisis. The psalm was also identified by the Western Church as one of the penitential psalms (see commentary on Ps 6), although confession and forgiveness are not explicit themes in the prayer.

One dominant motif is the sufferer's contrast between human mortality and divine immortality. For instance, the poem contrasts "my days" (vv. 3, 11, 23, 24; NRSV, "my life" = "my days" in Hebrew) and "your years" (vv. 24, 27). This stark contrast is accentuated by the apposition of a description of the psalmist's suffering (vv. 3–11) with a description of God's glory (vv. 12–22). Particularly poignant is the simile of the psalmist lying awake through the night, groaning like a lonely owl (vv. 5–7). Prayed from this depth of pathos, the psalm expresses confidence that God can offer healing, because God hears the groans and prayers of the lowly (vv. 17, 20).

Psalm 103

Psalm 103 combines praise, thanksgiving, and instruction. An artistic masterpiece, the song opens with imperative calls to "bless" (that is, to praise) the Lord. In vv. 1–5, the psalmist poetically exhorts "my soul" to praise God. By soul is meant the psalmist's most essential self, not some eternal, spiritual counterpart to the body—the Israelites knew no such concept. The reasons to praise God are summed up in v. 2b: because of "all his benefits." The reformer Philip Melancthon famously taught that to know Christ is to know his benefits. Similarly, when the psalm recounts the Lord's benefits in vv. 3–19, it seeks to make God known others. In vv. 3–5 the psalmist testifies to the benefits that God has shown the psalmist. The your and you in vv. 3–5 refer to my soul, thus the psalmist testifies that God has forgiven, healed, redeemed from near death, given long life, and renewed.

In vv. 6–19 the psalmist broadens the description of God's benefits "for all who are oppressed." These benefits include the gift of the law (v. 7), acts of compassion (v. 13), and especially God's gracious forgiveness (vv. 8–12). The closing crescendo of four imperative calls to "bless the LORD" offers a bookend to the psalm, in which all the hosts of heaven join the psalmist's "soul" in praising God for his benefits.

Psalm 104

This hymn is a twin to Ps 103. Both begin and end with the self-exhortation, "Bless the LORD, O my soul." But whereas Ps 103 praises the wondrous acts of salvation of God for both the psalmist and the people, Ps 104 praises God's magnificent acts of creation.

The order in which creation unfolds is similar to the liturgical description of creation in Gen 1—first the heavens are created (vv. 2–4), followed by earth and sea (vv. 5–9), animals, plants, and people (vv. 10–26)—but the order is not exactly the same and the Gen 1 emphases on Sabbath and creation in the image of God are lacking in Ps 104. As lyric poetry, Ps 104 is both more metaphorical (see the anthropomorphic descriptions of God stretching out, riding, setting, building, rebuking, etc.) and more mythological (see the references to the fight against chaos and the reference to the mythological Leviathan, vv. 2–4, 26) than Gen 1.

Creation is both a one-time and an ongoing divine event. God's creations in turn "bring forth" (v. 14) other creations. The psalm emphasizes both that creation function orderly according to laws and rhythms (vv. 19–25) and that God's ongoing presence and guidance within creation is reason to praise (vv. 27–30).

Psalm 105

The second of three lengthy historical psalms (see 78 and 106). The center of this hymn's proclamation is that throughout the people's history God has kept the promises that were made in the ancestral covenants with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. To put this a different way, the psalm describes the history of Israel as the history of God's faithfulness to the promises God made to Abraham. The psalm narrates this history, with its "wonderful works," "miracles," and "judgments" (v. 5), as the story of God remembering the covenant. Promise is the key term in the psalm; it is translated variously as word, promise, and what he had said in vv. 8, 19, 27, 28, and 42.

The psalm spends the bulk of its historical narration on the story of Israel's early period, from Joseph's slavery in Egypt (vv. 16–23), through the exodus events (vv. 26–39), God's guidance and provision in the wilderness (vv. 40–41), and the gift of the promised land (v. 44). This history is sung both so that new people will come to know God through the psalm's praise (v. 1) and also so that people might participate in the covenant and obey God's laws (v. 45).

Psalm 106

This historical psalm plays off its twin, Ps 105 (cf. also Ps 78). Whereas Ps 105 focuses on the story of Israel's sojourn in and exodus from Egypt, Ps 106 briefly relates the story of the exodus (vv. 7–12), but goes into far greater depth about the events of Sinai (vv. 19–23), the wilderness years (vv. 24–33), and the first generations in the land (vv. 34–43). Whereas Ps 105 emphasized the people's history as the story of God's faithfulness, Ps 106 narrates the history of a people who repetitively sin against God. Whereas Ps 105 is a hymn of praise, Ps 106 begins and ends with praise, but the body of the psalm is as much a prayer for forgiveness and rescue as it is a hymn.

As a prayer for forgiveness, the psalm multiplies various expressions for sin: sinned, committed iniquity, did not remember, rebelled, forgot, put God to the test, had no faith, did not obey, and so on (vv. 6–7, 13–14, 24–25). As the psalm progresses through the story of Israel's history, the perversity of the people's sins increase. For example, early on the people merely "did not remember the abundance of your steadfast love" (v. 7). Later they "provoked God to anger with their deeds" (v. 29). Finally, they "sacrificed their sons and daughters" and "poured out innocent blood" (vv. 37–38). The poem brings this dramatically building intensity to a climax with the announcement of a gracious surprise: God "remembered his covenant and showed compassion according to the abundance of his steadfast love" (v. 45).

Verse 48 is not properly a part of the psalm, but the closing doxology of Book IV of the Psalter.

V. Book V (107–150)

Psalm 107

An artfully balanced liturgy of thanksgiving, Ps 107 calls for praise in response to the Lord's acts of steadfast love on behalf of many people. After an opening call to praise (vv. 1–3), the psalm includes four tightly composed, parallel stanzas (vv. 4–9, 10–16, 17–22, 23–32) and ends with a more freely composed stanza of praise (vv. 33–43).

The introductory call to praise exhorts those whom the Lord has redeemed from the east, west, north, and south to thank God. Each stanza begins with a description of "some" who suffered some peril or crisis (vv. 4, 10, 17, 23), then continues that "they cried to the LORD in their trouble, and he delivered/saved them from their distress" (vv. 6, 13, 19, 28). Finally, each stanza enjoins, "Let them thank the Lord for his steadfast love" (vv. 8, 15, 21, 31). This fourfold pattern is presented as a model for the life of faith. The Lord intervenes to move people from lamentation in the midst of crisis to praise after experiencing deliverance. To praise, therefore, is to place one's own life within the overarching narrative of God's deliverance. It is to sing oneself into God's story.

The final stanza praises God's characteristic actions of providing for the hungry and thirsty (vv. 33–38) and of overturning the oppressive orders of society on behalf of the lowly oppressed (vv. 39–43).

Psalm 108

A composite poem made up of Pss 57:7–11 and 60:5–12, this psalm may be a clue that some psalms were created by borrowing sections from various earlier compositions. See commentary on Pss 57 and 60, but also consider this psalm in its own integrity. The persona of this psalm seems to be speaking on behalf of the people as a whole, and a key theme is Israel's role and fate "among the nations" (v. 3). Appeal is made to God on the basis of the steadfastness of the singer's heart, on the singer's witness among the peoples, on God's strength, and most importantly, on the basis of God's character (v. 4). The psalm quotes a past promise (vv. 7–9) in which God pledged to establish Israel in the land and give them victory over threatening powers. On the basis of this past promise, the singer closes the psalm in complaint over Israel's situation (vv. 10–11) with a renewed request for help (v. 12) and confidence in God's intervention. This confidence is based both on God's character and on God's power.

Psalm 109

This prayer for help is all about speech, as the manifold references in vv. 1–5 indicate: do not be silent, praise, deceitful mouths, speaking, lying tongues, words of hate, accuse, and prayer. The psalmist has been accused and asks God to pronounce innocence. Following the opening verses, there is a long section in which the enemies' false speech is quoted (vv. 6–19). The introductory words They say (v. 6) are not present in the Hebrew, but for a variety of reasons the passage is best understood as the psalmist's quotation of the enemies' words. The enemies desire the psalmist to be tried and punished. The references to children and posterity (vv. 10–13) may indicate that a guilty verdict would result in the sale of the psalmist's children as slaves to pay off a debt (cf. Lev 25:39). The reference to the sins of the parents (vv. 14–15) reflects the ancient belief that personal misfortune stemmed either from personal sin or the sins of one's parents.

After quoting the violent speech of the enemies, the psalmist appeals to God for deliverance (vv. 20–31). The entire psalm can be understood as a commentary on the false-witness commandment. The psalmist's request may be summed up: "Let them curse, but you will bless" (v. 28a). Both cursing (accusing) and blessing are speech acts—actions one does with words (like making a bet). The psalmist requests an irrevocable divine blessing in the form of a declaration of innocence.

Psalm 110

Psalm 110 contains some of the most obscure lyrics in the Psalter. In spite of many scholarly attempts, textual corruptions and confusion about how to understand certain terms and sentences have prevented a clear interpretation of the text, so readers must proceed with caution. What is clear is that this is a royal psalm dealing with God's gracious activities through the person of the human king. The psalm seems to quote various promises of the divine king to the human king, consisting of assurances of God's presence and blessing, particularly in battle. The reference to being a priest "according to the order of Melchizedek" (v. 4) is a reminder that the monarch also served priestly functions on behalf of the people. The title refers to a pre-Israelite king of Jerusalem who was called a "priest of God Most High" (cf. Gen 14:17–20). Early Christians interpreted the psalm as a messianic promise; it is frequently cited in the New Testament (cf. Mark 12:36; Acts 2:34–35; Heb 5:6; etc.).

Psalm 111

Psalms 111 and 112 are alphabetic acrostics (see commentary on Ps 9/10), with each half verse beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Both are concerned with the divine-human relationship; but whereas Ps 112 majors in the human side of that relationship, Ps 111 concentrates on the divine side.

The psalm focuses on God's agency within the human-divine relationship. It names many "works of the LORD" (v. 2), such as provision of food, remembering the covenant, giving the land, issuing the law, and rescuing the people from foreign tyranny (vv. 5–7, 9). The closing wisdomlike instruction that the "fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom" (v. 10) further reinforces the conclusion that the psalm was intended as instruction in the godly way.

Psalm 112

Like its twin Ps 111, this poem is an alphabetic acrostic (see commentary on Ps 9/10). Psalm 112 picks up the concluding admonition of Ps 11 to "fear the LORD" and restates it in v. 1. Continuing along this line, the poem focuses on the human side of the divine-human relationship. Although the psalm does laud the blessings and benefits of those who fear God and follow the commandments (v. 1), the emphasis is actually on the blessing that God's followers are to their neighbors. To put this another way, this psalm is a commentary on following God's way as the means to love the neighbor. Those who follow God's laws become a beacon for those in darkness, are generous in lending, conduct their affairs with justice, and give freely to the poor (vv. 4–5, 9). They even begin to take on some of God's qualities: righteousness, graciousness, and mercy. This is so because in loving the neighbor (by following the law), the believer exhibits these divine characteristics.

Psalm 113

In Jewish liturgical usage, Pss 113–118 form the Egyptian Hallel (praise). The first two psalms are sung before the Passover meal and the last four after.

This masterful lyric is also a classic hymn of praise, consisting of both an artful call to praise (vv. 1–3) and poetically crafted reasons for praise (vv. 4–9). The call to praise begins with a thrice-repeated imperative call to praise (v. 1) followed by a shift to the synonym *ble*ss. After asserting that the name of God be praised "from this time on and forevermore," the psalmist engages in some poetic play. "From the rising of the sun to its setting" means both all day (from dawn to dusk) and everywhere (from the east to the west).

The psalm also explores the gracious activity of God by means of a poetic progression that descends along an imagined vertical axis: "high above all nations" > "above the heavens" > "seated on high" > "looks far down" (vv. 4–6). Who does God find at the bottom? God finds the lowliest of humans: the poor man and the barren woman. What does God do? God "raises" them up. The NRSV phrases seated (v. 5), make them sit (v. 8) and gives a home (v. 9) all reflected the same Hebrew verb (yashav), suggesting that when God condescends from on high to raise up the lowly, God is exchanging some part of God's nature and character with the humans that God is saving.

Psalm 114

Psalm 114 is a tightly composed four-stanza hymn, with an A–B–B'–A' chiastic pattern. The first stanza dramatizes the exodus from Egypt and the division of the land. The "house of Jacob" refers to the Israelite people as whole, whose twelve tribes are described as descending from the ancestor Jacob. In v. 2, Judah refers to the southern kingdom, in which the Lord's Temple ("sanctuary") was located; Israel is the northern kingdom, God's "dominion" (where God reigns rather than dwells).

The second stanza describes the entry into the land, while the third stanza transforms the assertions of the second stanza into rhetorical questions, which are a familiar motif (cf. Ps 113:5–6). The answer to the rhetorical questions occurs in v. 7. Why flee and turn back? Because of the "presence of the God of Jacob." To worship is to enter God's presence. Although the psalm never directly calls on the people to praise, it does address the terrain of the land: "Tremble, O earth." In v. 2, the terms Judah and Israel equated people with land and land with people. Thus, to call for the land to praise both calls for the people to praise and underscores their connection with the land.

Psalm 115

Similar to Pss 2, 15, and 121, this hymn is structured around an opening question (vv. 1–2) followed by a longer answer. The opening question, "Where is their God?" was a taunt in the ancient world (cf. Pss 42:3, 10; 79:10; Joel 2:17; Mic 7:10). The taunt reflects the ancient belief that a national defeat meant that the victorious nation's god had triumphed over the defeated nation's god. The psalm rejects that belief. In a daring poetic move, the psalmist interprets the enemies' rhetorical taunt literally and gives a literal answer: "Our God is in the heavens" (v. 3a). There follows a substantial ridicule of human-made idols "and all who trust in them" (vv. 4–8; cf. Isa 44:9–20).

The word trust becomes the hinge of the poem, as the psalmist turns and exhorts Israel to "trust in the LORD." Israel (vv. 9, 12) refers to the laity gathered for worship, house of Aaron (vv. 10, 12) refers to a priestly group, descended from Aaron. Those who fear the LORD may refer to uncircumcised proselytes, who have not fully joined the people (vv. 11, 13).

The psalm's conclusion plays on two different meanings of the Hebrew term translated as *ble*ss. Worship is the sacred space where humans "bless the LORD" (meaning praise) and where the Lord "will bless" humans (meaning bestow blessings; vv. 13–15). Idols, it is implied, are not worthy of praise because they cannot bless.

Psalm 116

This is a song of thankful praise sung following divine deliverance from a personal crisis. A normal part of a prayer for help is the vow to praise God once the crisis has passed (cf. Ps 13:6). Corresponding elements of a song of thanksgiving are descriptions of the crisis (v. 3), of the cry for help (v. 4), of the divine deliverance (vv. 5–11), and the announcement that the vow to praise is being kept in the form of renewed praise of God (vv. 12–19). The crisis from which the psalmist was rescued may have been a grave illness, but the psalm is general enough that anyone who has received God's help and passed through a crisis may sing its words.

The reference to the "cup of salvation" most likely reflects a ritual meal celebrating the deliverance (cf. Lev 7:11–18). Verse 15 should be translated "Grievous in the sight . . ." (NRSV, precious). The Temple is the sacred space where the psalmist returns to offer thankful praise, but it is also the place where the community is restored, as the congregation hears the testimony of the one who was delivered and receives that one again as a healthy and full member of the body (vv. 14, 18). As is indicated by the deep anguish and complaints over the enemies that one finds in the prayers for help, the loss and restoration of this community is no small matter.

Psalm 117

The shortest of all psalms also provides a clear model for a hymn of praise and a thumbnail sketch of the theology of the Psalter. A hymn includes two elements: a call to praise (v. 1) and reasons for praise (v. 2). Hymns also often include a closing renewal of the call to praise (v. 2c). The call to praise has a universal flair, enjoining all the nations to praise Israel's God. The reasons for praise given in this psalm are the Lord's steadfast love and faithfulness. These two finite terms succinctly bear witness to the character of the infinite Lord. The central affirmation of the Psalter, and this psalm, is that God is faithful.

Psalm 118

Similar to Ps 116, this is a song of thanksgiving of one who has experienced divine deliverance and has passed through a crisis, such as a severe illness. Many have speculated that the psalm reflects a Temple liturgy for those who come to the Temple to fulfill vows of thanksgiving that were uttered during times of crisis. Reasons for this conclusion include apparent references to various groups in the Temple (Israel, house of Aaron, fearers of the Lord; vv. 2–4, see commentary on Ps 115), liturgical directions (v. 15), an entrance liturgy (vv. 19–20), and a description of a worship procession (vv. 26–27). It is impossible, however, to reconstruct such a Temple liturgy on the basis of the text of this psalm.

Many affirmations of the psalm are characteristic of the Psalter: God's characteristic steadfast love (vv. 1–4), God's faithful commitment to hear the cries of the lowly (v. 5), the wisdom of trusting in God rather than earthly forms of refuge (vv. 8–9), and the restoration of the one who was rescued with the larger community (vv. 15–16, 22–23). Verse 24 should be translated, "This is the day that the Lord has acted [to rescue], let us rejoice and be glad in him." Verses 1 and 29 form an inclusion around the psalm, affirming the central confession of the Psalter's theology.

The blue-ribbon winner of acrostic poems (see commentary on Ps 9/10), Ps 119 is comprised of 22 stanzas, each one having eight lines and each line beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The acrostic pattern provides the only discernible structure. There is no other development in the poem.

Along with Pss 1 and 19, the central motif of this psalm is God's torah (translated in NRSV as law, but properly rendered as instruction). This theme is developed by the nearly constant repetition of nine synonyms for divine instruction: law, decrees, ways, precepts, statutes, commandments, ordinances, word, promise. The poem is part meditation on, part love song about, part prayer for God's instruction. Its message can be summed up by v. 97: "Oh, how I love your law! It is my meditation all day long."

As its length, plodding style, and theme indicate, this poem is neither for life's high or low moments, but for the long and steady walk of faith. The psalm commends God's guiding word as the light for the lifetime journey of faith.

Psalm 120

"A Song of Ascents"—Pss 120–134 bear this superscription. The meaning of the title is unclear, but many scholars believe it refers to those on pilgrimage ascending the mountain to Jerusalem's Temple. Perhaps these psalms were collected for those making pilgrimage and were sung at various points along the journey. Supporting that conclusion, Ps 120 speaks of being an "alien," distant from the Temple, and Ps 121 would be fitting for one departing on a journey, whereas Pss 133 and 134 fit the arrival at the Temple.

Psalm 120, the first psalm of ascent, is a prayer for help that expresses the distress of one forced to live far from home. The psalmist complains of living in the midst of warring hearts "who hate peace" (v. 6). The psalmist refers to the enemies as "lying lips," "deceitful tongue" (twice), and "sharp arrows." This objectification of the enemies has the effect of magnifying their violent actions. The psalmist, on the other hand, is exiled—Meshech refers to an area near the Black Sea, while Kedar to a part of the Arabian peninsula. The point is not that the psalmist is literally in one of these places, but separated (spiritually or physically) from home, people, and God.

Psalm 121

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). One of the most well-loved lyrics in Scripture, this poem may have originated as a liturgy for those leaving on a journey, possibly a pilgrimage. The psalm is replete with promises of protection and is thus also suitable for those going through the pilgrimage of life.

Although the syntax is unclear, NRSV is probably correct in translating v. 1 as a question. The hills may refer to the mountains around Jerusalem (cf. Ps 125:2) and thus to the psalmist's destination. Or the hills may signify a source of threat, behind which dangers lie hidden. Either way, the psalmist confesses that the one who created those hills, the maker of "heaven and earth," is the psalmist's helper.

The remainder of the psalm is a series of promises, perhaps delivered by a priest. These promises feature the sixfold repetition of the word keep/ keeper (shamar). The word means to guard or watch over, as the use of the term in Pss 127:2 and 130:6 indicates. The balanced images of God keeping watch through day and night, no matter where one places foot and right hand, symbolize that God's care is constant and all-encompassing.

Psalm 122

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). This "song of Zion" (see commentary on Ps 46) was probably part of a pilgrimage observance, as the references to going to the "house of the LORD" "as was decreed for Israel" indicate. The decree in question was most likely the law requiring all males to journey to Jerusalem for the three pilgrimage festivals (cf. Exod 23:14–19). Employing a poetic device common in the songs of Zion (see commentary on Ps 46), the song speaks directly to Jerusalem as a cipher for God. This song praises Jerusalem (vv. 3–4) as the place where God's just judgment occurs. It also prays for Jerusalem (vv. 6–9) as a source of the blessing of peace—the name Jerusalem and the Hebrew word for peace (shalom), which each occur three times in the short poem, are etymologically related. Jerusalem is celebrated because it is the place where God's blessings of justice, prosperity, and peace converge; and from Jerusalem they emanate outward for the world (cf. Isa 2:1–4).

Psalms 123

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). This brief communal prayer for help is uttered from a profound posture of humility. The psalm has two stanzas, each with two verses. The first stanza draws on the poetic motif of the eye to emphasize the community's humility. It has an A-B-B-A chiastic structure. In the first and last phrases, the eyes of the community look to God in prayer "until he has mercy on us" (v. 2). The two middle phrases are similes that support the petition for mercy. The psalmist compares the humility of the community before God to that of slaves before the hand of their master, or a servant maid before the hand of her mistress.

The plea for mercy at the end of v. 2 is immediately repeated twice more in v. 3, making it the hinge and center of the psalm. The poem's conclusion continues the theme of humility by describing the humiliation Israel has received at the hands of arrogant, proud powers. The ancient cultural values of honor and shame lie behind the psalm's posture of humility. The psalm pleads with God to reverse the unjust conditions of the world and to act on behalf of the lowly.

Psalms 124

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). Psalm 124 is a communal song of thanksgiving, most likely prayed after deliverance from a crisis, such as a military threat (v. 2). The phrase "let Israel now say" in v. 1b, followed as it is by a repetition of v. 1a, may indicate that the entire psalm was sung responsively by half-verse. It may even give a clue that many psalms were chanted in this manner, although such a conclusion cannot be drawn with confidence. As it is, the text only repeats the phrase one time (v. 2a). This repetition emphasizes the basic tenet of Israel's witness to its history: if the Lord had not been there—in the flood, in droughts, in Egypt, in the wilderness, in the exile—Israel would have been swallowed up. As with so many psalms, this poem conflates the threats of human enemies (who are in this poem portrayed as devouring predators; vv. 3, 6) and of cosmic enemies (the anti-creation powers of chaos; vv. 4–5).

The psalm closes with praise of God, whose merciful intrusion not only sprung Israel from the snare but broke the snare for good (v. 7). The closing confession of God as "our help" is an echo of the promises of Ps 121.

Psalms 125

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). This is a communal song of trust, which expresses confidence that the Lord will faithfully provide for and protect Israel. The psalm also is meant as instruction for the people of God concerning the value of properly trusting God. Those who trust in the Lord's provision are compared to the holy city Jerusalem. The city was understood both as an instrument through which God blessed the people (cf. Ps 122:3–5) and as part of God's covenantal promise to protect (cf. Ps 46:5). By identifying the people with the city, the psalm underscores the people's participation in God's blessings and God's promises. The enemies are pictured metaphorically as a scepter, a symbol of human lordship (v. 3). The subtle imbalance between the contrasting images of the righteous like mountains and the wicked like a scepter is meaningful. To human perception, the oppressing foreign powers may have seemed an imposing, even dominating, threat. But consistent with so many psalms, this poem bears witness that it is better to trust in God than in mortals.

Psalms 126

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). This communal prayer for help pairs the complementary notions of restoration and rejoicing. The psalm consists of two stanzas (vv. 1–3, 4–6). The first stanza recalls God's past act of restoration (v. 1) and the memories of rejoicing and laughter that accompanied God's rescue. The psalm probably has in mind the return of the people following the Babylonian exile. The stanza also contains the surprising affirmation that when God delivered Israel, the nations—that is, the people who worship other gods and often threaten Israel (cf. Ps 124:2)—praised God. Even more surprising, the nations' praise of God inspires Israel to echo that praise, which they do verbatim in v. 3. Often in the Psalter the enemies' words are quoted as reason for God to punish them, but here, the righteous echo the words of the nations.

The second stanza picks up the themes developed in the first stanza and rephrases them in the form of petitions. God is asked to restore the people again that they may rejoice again. The images of dry riverbeds teeming with water and harvesters singing joyfully may reflect a prayer for rescue from drought. The recollection of past deliverance and renewed call for restoration are reminders that divine help is a constant need.

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). Similar to God's covenantal promise to David in 2 Sam 7:1–17, this brief instructional poem is crafted around the multiple meanings of the Hebrew term translated house (v. 1; bayit). The term can refer to the Temple (God's house), to a human home or dwelling, and to human offspring. In 2 Samuel 7, after settling into his newly constructed palace, David thinks to build God a house. But God refuses and in turn promises David a house (dynastic lineage). Psalm 127 affirms that all human work, including the construction of houses and cities, is vain without God's blessings. It goes on to affirm that children are one of God's ultimate blessings. The psalm may reflect traditions about Solomon, who was the builder of the First Temple, a fortifier of cities (1 Kings 8; 9:15). The psalm bears witness to the penultimate frustration that human efforts are tenuous and the ultimate promise that with God's blessings almost anything is possible.

Psalm 128

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). Psalm 128 continues several themes of the preceding psalm: children as a blessed heritage (127:3–4; 128:3, 6), the concept of house (127:1; 128:3), concern for labor (127:1; 128:2; although the two psalms use different Hebrew words for labor), the presence of Happy is . . . statements (127:5; 128:1). Also present in the psalm are two characteristic themes of the songs of ascent: the Lord's blessing (v. 5; cf. Pss 133:3; 134:3) and a concern for the welfare of Israel (v. 6; cf. Pss 130:7; 131:3). The twice-repeated theme of the "fear of the LORD" also lends the psalm a wisdom hue. The ancient worshipers did not make pilgrimage merely out of obedience, but also because they experienced God's blessings in the Temple. The psalm is a reminder that in spite of the appearance that worship is a human act, the true actor in worship is God.

Psalm 129

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). Psalm 129 is a communal song of trust. This classification depends on translating the verbs in vv. 5–6 as declarations rather than wishes: "All who hate Zion will be put to shame and turned back. They will be like . . ." The psalm begins with a liturgical call for Israel to recall the constant stress under which it endured as a community and thus the constant deliverance experienced at the hand of the Lord. The firstperson reference refers to the community as a whole, as the liturgical call "let Israel now say" indicates (on this phrase, see commentary on Ps 124). The psalm teems with agricultural metaphors—the wicked "plowed my back" (v. 3), they will be like grass that withers so that reapers may not harvest it. According to Ruth 2:4, harvesters would call out blessings on one another: "The LORD bless you!" The last verse of the psalm says that because the wicked will be like grass that does not grow and thus is never harvested, they will never hear the blessing of the Lord called upon them.

If the conclusion is correct that the psalms of ascent were connected with a harvest pilgrimage, then the agricultural image fits well. But the imagery is employed here to confess confidence in God's ongoing providence and protection.

Psalm 130

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120); one of the penitential psalms (see commentary on Ps 6). A prayer for help from a crisis that the psalmist believes was brought on by some unnamed sin (vv. 3–4). The psalmist calls out from the watery "depths," a metaphoric description of the crisis that draws on the mythological concept of the floods as the embodiment of chaos (cf. Ps 69:1–3). The psalmist does not explicitly confess sins, but such a confession is implied in vv. 3–4. God's grace, rather than God's wrath, is given as the reason God is to be revered. Because the one thing that the psalmist needs, the word of forgiveness and restoration, can come only from God, the psalmist does the only thing possible: wait. The twice-repeated metaphor of the watchers was interpreted in later Judaism as priests who wait for the dawn in order to offer sacrifice, but more likely it refers to guards (cf. Ps 127:1) who keep watch. The morning is often the time when God's help is revealed (see commentary on Ps 5). The psalm ends with an appeal for the entire community to hope in the Lord with the same steadfast resolution as the psalmist.

Psalm 131

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). Regarded by some as the prayer of a woman, the psalm expresses the humble confidence of one who has given up the illusory quest for selfdetermination and has found peace in God's lordship. The dominant note of v. 1 is humility. In the psalms, arrogance and pride are characteristics of the wicked, who do not submit themselves to God's ways. The psalmist rejects the folly of prideful self-mastery and submits humbly to God. The translation of the last phrase of v. 2 is disputed. The psalmist may be comparing "my soul" to a "weaned child that is with me," implying that the psalmist is a woman. Or, "like the weaned child within me," the psalmist may be claiming to have a quiet, childlike faith. How to interpret the metaphor of the weaned child is also unclear, since nursing children are usually those who are quiet. Perhaps the point is that weaned children have reached a stage of semi-autonomy in which they are no longer totally dependent but still recognize their dependence. The closing exhortation calls upon all of Israel to hope in the Lord with this sort of humble dependence.

Psalm 132

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). A royal liturgy that celebrates David's recovery of the ark of the covenant and transportation of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Sam 7:1–2; 2 Sam 6). The psalm also celebrates God's twin election of David and his line to be God's king—"son"—forever (vv. 11–12) and of Jerusalem as God's "resting place forever" (vv. 13–14). These two tenets were foundational expressions of the theology of Zion. Accompanying these promises, God also promises that blessing will emanate from Zion for the sake of David and the covenant (v. 15).

It is probably the motifs of blessing, of David's first "pilgrimage" to Jerusalem, and of God's past actions for Israel that resulted in the inclusion of this royal psalm in the songs of ascents. The psalm differs from the other songs of ascents in its length and the fact that it seems to be an older psalm than the others. But its emphases on blessing and Jerusalem made it appropriate for the collection.

Psalm 133

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). This brief poem focuses on the unity of God's people. Many modern readers understand v. 1 as relating to the contemporary, nuclear family; the psalm has in mind the larger family, the people of God. Following Solomon's reign, the people split into two countries. The psalm is a prayer for unity for the people, a unity centered in God's blessing. The poem employs a radical strategy to make its case for unity: it poetically describes an abundant act of hospitality and then an impossible scene of unity. The abundant act is the anointing of the head with oil. This act symbolized hospitality and welcome (cf. Pss 23:5; 92:10; 141:5; Mark 14:3–9). It also was an act of consecration for priests (cf. Exod 29:7). Both acts are in mind here, the former to signify the call for unity, the latter to signify the Temple and its priests as a mediating source of blessing for the entire people. The Hebrew word descend (a nice counterpoint in the songs of ascents) is translated twice as running down (v. 2) and once as falls in the impossible metaphorical scene of the dew of the northern Mount Hermon falling on the southern Mount Zion. The metaphor describes the gathering of the two people around God's blessings, as they emanate from Zion.

Psalm 134

"A Song of Ascents" (see commentary on Ps 120). The last of the songs of ascents takes place in the Temple at night. The poem plays on two meanings of a Hebrew verb that can mean both bless and praise (vv. 1, 2, 3; barakh). The adherents arrive to "praise" God and find that God blesses them. The theme of blessing is a red thread running through the entire songs of ascents collection. That theme reaches its climactic moment in Ps 134, which declares the blessing of the Lord "maker of heaven and earth" (an echo of Ps 121:1) upon all those who gather. There may also be a subtle poetic play in the poem on body parts. Those who stand in the Temple raise their hands to bless God (or perhaps to kneel down). The previously mentioned verb bless is derived from the Hebrew root that means knee and thus can mean to kneel down. The meanings bless and praise may have developed from the posture one took to receive a blessing or to praise.

Psalm 135

This hymn of praise begins and ends with calls for praise (vv. 1–3, 19–21). The opening call to praise features a fourfold repetition of the imperative call "praise!" while the closing section has a corresponding fourfold repetition of "bless!" In between, the psalm recounts various reasons for praising the Lord, all of which are summed up in the introductory reasons of vv. 3–4: the Lord is good and has chosen Israel. In vv. 5–6, the setting is the heavenly realm and God's action of creation is stressed, especially God's ongoing actions of making creation fertile (v. 7). "Above all gods" refers to the ancient conception of God ruling as the king of the divine council (cf. Isa 6:1–6). In vv. 8–12, the setting shifts to the earth and the focus is on God's interventions in history on behalf of Israel, culminating in the gift of the land. The psalm's ridicule of human-made idols and those who worship them is typical of post-exilic literature (cf. Ps 115:4–8; Isa 44:9–20). To praise God is to confess the person in whom one places trust (v. 18). To praise the Lord of Israel is to align one's voice and life with the one who delivered Israel from Egypt and is known in the ongoing history of that people.

Psalm 136

Like Ps 117, this hymn of praise bears witness to the central confession of the Psalter's theology: the Lord is a God of steadfast love. Whereas Ps 117 succinctly confesses that witness in two verses, Ps 136 sounds that note with every breath, making the confession an antiphon that occurs in every verse. Similar to the structure of other hymns, such as Ps 135, the song opens and closes with calls for praise, and in between recounts first God's gracious action of creation (vv. 4–9) and then God's gracious acts of deliverance in history (vv. 10–25). Those two complementary tenets form the poles around which Israel's praise resounds. The historical actions of God cited are those that formed the core of Israel's identity: the deliverance from Egypt (vv. 10–16), the guidance through the wilderness and into the land (vv. 17–22), and God's ongoing protection from foes and gift of sustenance (vv. 23–25).

Psalm 137

The composer of this song was a Temple musician who had been hauled into exile when the Temple was destroyed. In Babylon, he was tormented by requests for a "song of Zion." Songs of Zion, such as Pss 46, 48, 76, and 84, often praise Zion directly (cf. 76:4) as a stand-in for God. They celebrate God's protection of the city and the Temple as God's abode. The request for such a song was a painful barb at both the psalmist's vocation and his faith.

The psalmist confesses being caught up in a painful paradox. Ironically addressing a question to Zion, he asks, "How could we sing?" As such, this is a song of Zion sung in a new key, place, and theme. If he does forget the city, he invokes curses on his "right hand" that plucks the harp and "tongue" that sings. In spite of the pain, the psalm is nevertheless a song.

The closing prayer for the destruction of the enemies (vv. 7–9) is perhaps the most vitriolic curse in the Psalter. There is no softening its venom or explaining away its violent wish. Considered in a canonical scope, the psalm does remind that vengeance belongs to God and human beings are not to act out on wishes to see the enemy punished (cf. Rom 12:17–21).

Psalm 138

Psalm 138 is a song of thanksgiving sung in response to deliverance. The opening expression of praise (vv. 1–2) celebrates God's characteristic steadfast love and faithfulness. The phrase before the gods reflects the ancient view of God presiding over the heavenly council (cf. Isa 6:1–6). The last phrase of v. 2 is unclear, but it may reflect the psalmist's experience of God proving faithful to a divine promise. The psalm lacks a description of the past crisis and only mentions that the psalmist called out in the day of trouble and God answered (v. 3).

Because vv. 4–5 call on the kings of the earth to praise the Lord, some have identified the speaker as the king. This conclusion is unwarranted, however, since the confession that the nations shall bear witness to God is also characteristic of post-exilic theology. Verse 6 describes the countercultural nature of God's actions, honoring the lowly and humbling the arrogant (cf. Ps 113:5–8; Luke 1:51–53). The psalmist's experience of deliverance leads the psalmist to a new understanding of God's guidance, so the psalm ends with a renewed confession of trust (vv. 7–8; cf. Ps 23:4).

Psalm 139

One of the most-loved psalms, this wellbalanced, four-stanza poem moves from an intense meditation to passionate petition. The first stanza meditates on God's supreme knowledge of the psalmist. Employing key words that will return later—search, know, thoughts, way (vv. 1–3)—the psalmist confesses that there is nothing about the psalmist that God does not know. The second stanza modulates to the theme of God's presence and confesses that there is no place where God would not be with the psalmist, including the realm of the dead (Sheol), the watery deeps where chaos was thought to reign, and the place of utter darkness. The third stanza meditates on the relationship between the psalmist and the creator. Earlier, the psalmist confessed that "you discern my thoughts from far away" (v. 2). Here, the psalmist confesses that God's thoughts are as far beyond human comprehension as the grains of sand are beyond mathematics.

The closing stanza picks up the vocabulary of the opening verses—search, know, thoughts, way (vv. 23–24)—in a plea for deliverance from the wicked. The psalmist tenders the self to God's searching in a plea of innocence. Perhaps the psalmist had been falsely accused by enemies. The psalmist's claim to "perfect hatred" troubles many; the psalmist is rejecting the ways of evil and oppression that characterize the wicked. But the ancients knew no distinction between a person's deeds and the person. To hate their evil deeds is to hate them, according to the ancient grammar.

Psalm 140

Many scholars consider this psalm the prayer of one who has been falsely accused, because of the references to the violence that the enemies do with their tongues (vv. 2–3, 11). Such a conclusion is not warranted, however. The term translated slanderer in v. 11 literally means "a man of the tongue," which does not necessarily imply false accusation. As in many other prayers in which the sufferer complains about the speech of the wicked, it is most likely that the enemies use their tongues to plot evil against the psalmist: "The arrogant have hidden a trap for me" (v. 5a). As is also typical of many psalms (and as influenced by Israel's wisdom tradition), the sufferer prays that the wicked will be caught in their own traps: "Let the mischief of their lips overwhelm them!" (v. 9). The language of God covering the psalmist's "head in the day of battle" (v. 7) should also be understood as metaphorical, rather than taken as a literal clue to the psalmist's situation.

The psalmist is besieged by those who use speech to plot evil. For this reason, the psalmist stresses that his or her own speech is a confession of faith: "I say to the LORD, 'You are my God.' " Speech may be used for evil or for good. The psalmist employs the tongue to confess faith in God and on that awaits vindication from God.

Psalm 141

In both Second Temple Judaism and in Christianity, this psalm was assigned for use during evening prayer services, because of v. 2. The reference to prayer rising "as an evening sacrifice" may not mean that this prayer originally accompanied the offering (cf. Num 28:1–8), but that the prayer was offered in substitute of the offering (because the supplicant was not present in the Temple). Psalm 40:6 recounts how God did not require sacrifice from that psalmist, but praise (cf. Pss 50:8–23; 51:16–17). A similar understanding may be reflected in Ps 141.

This prayer accentuates the psalmist's humble vertical orientation ("my eyes are turned toward you, O God," v. 8a) and guarded speech (vv. 3, 6). The motif of guarded speech reflects the psalmist's prayer to be protected from temptation. Speech reflects internal attitudes and internal attitudes lead to action. Verses 5–7 are corrupt and impossible to translate with certainty. Typical of many psalms and of Israel's wisdom tradition, the psalmist prays that the wicked will be caught in the very traps that they lay for others (v. 10).

Psalm 142

This prayer for help has two stanzas (vv. 1–4, 5–7), with the argument of the prayer turning at the end of v. 4. In the first stanza, the psalmist complains bitterly to God, employing intense first-person language throughout. Only once, in the very center of this stanza, does the psalmist use second-person language: "you know my way" (v. 3a). The psalmist immediately contrasts this confession of faith with the dangerous reality: "In the path where I walk they have hidden a trap for me" (v. 3b). The psalmist sums up the crisis: "no refuge remains for me" (v. 4).

Refuge becomes the hinge on which the psalm swings, as the psalmist immediately confesses, "I say, 'You are my refuge . . .'" (v. 5). Although two different Hebrew words for refuge are used in vv. 4 and 5, the concept provides the turning point of the psalm. The psalmist even emphasizes the confession of trust with the emphatic introduction, "I say" The psalmist then offers petitions for rescue (vv. 6–7a), followed by a vow to praise and an expression of trust (v. 7b). The contradictory references to being pursued and in prison are best understood metaphorically, rather than literal clues to the psalmist's situation.

Psalm 143

A prayer for help, one of the penitential psalms (see commentary on Ps 6). This intense plea for rescue is one of the places in the Bible where the connection is made between God's actions on behalf of the people and God's actions on behalf of the individual. The psalmist cries out for personal intervention (vv. 1–4, 6–12). As part of the prayer, the sufferer recalls God's wondrous deeds for the people as a whole (v. 5; cf. Ps 22:3–5). The theological basis for this connection is the character of God. As the Lord has proven to be a God of "faithfulness," "righteousness," and "steadfast love" (vv. 1, 8, 11–12) through God's wondrous deeds for Israel, so God is enjoined to demonstrate God's character by delivering the psalmist from a personal crisis.

The psalm is replete with potent imagery and concepts: no one is righteous before God (v. 2; cf. Rom 3:10); a soul thirsting for God (v. 6); God's steadfast love in the morning (v. 8; cf. Ps 30:5); a request for instruction in God's ways (v. 8; cf. Ps 1). Perhaps because of v. 8, the Greek church assigned this psalm for morning prayer.

Psalm 144

A royal prayer for help, the king probably prayed this prayer before battle, although it is possible that the poem was a liturgical composition intended for use in an annual Temple festival. The king's prayer is not primarily for himself, but for himself as the leader of the national community (vv. 1–2, 9–11). The psalm begins with a praise confession of faith, reminiscent of Ps 18, another royal psalm. The meditation on human mortality in v. 3 is similar to Ps 8:4, but in this context it serves rhetorically to fuel a plea for help, rather than praise (as in Ps 8). Verses 5–8 comprise an imaginative request for a theophany, in this case meaning a display of God's power in victory. Verses 9–11 are the vow to praise following the crisis; "new song" is a technical phrase referring to a song of thanksgiving after deliverance (cf. Ps 40:3). The enemies are twice referred to as those "whose mouths speak lies" (vv. 8, 11). Perhaps the lies that the enemies speak are that God lacks the power and fidelity to save Israel (cf. Isa 37:17–20; Ps 10:4, 11; etc.). Although vv. 12–14 may have been prayed by a priest, they nevertheless reflect a proper royal concern for the nation.

Psalm 145

As much as any other hymn, this song indicates that a primary purpose of praise is to confess one's faith. Praise is not intended to please or flatter the deity. Praise is sung as a means of bearing witness and confessing faith. The psalm makes this transparent in the description of how the psalmist's praise (vv. 1–3) is part of a dominolike progression in which the praise of one generation is passed to another (v. 4), so that they (v. 7; meaning future generations) will continue to praise and laud God's wondrous deeds. This is also the force of the last verse of the psalm. The song scores this point again through its creed-like testimony to God's character (8–9, 13b–20). Even the alphabetic acrostic structure of the poem may subtly underscore that language exists for the purpose of praising God.

The witness underscores God's faithfulness, especially in keeping faith with divine promises (v. 13b, the phrase The LORD . . . his deeds, is not found in the Masoretic Text, but was restored from other Hebrew and ancient texts). Verses 15–16 testify to God's gracious action of continuing to provide sustenance through creation; they serve in some traditions as a table prayer.

Psalm 146

Psalm 146 is the first of five hymns of praise that close the Psalter. Each of these psalms begins and ends with the call, "Praise the LORD!" Similar to Ps 8, this hymn may be the praise performance of an individual, because it lacks the typical call for praise. If so, this psalm bridges the categories of the hymn of praise and the song of thanksgiving. The song alternates poetically back and forth between heaven and earth. The psalmist starts by praising God "as long as I live" (v. 2) to admonishing the congregation not to trust "in mortals in whom there is not help" (v. 3) and who "return to the earth" (v. 4). The psalm then transitions back to a heavenly focus with the testimony that the Lord "made heaven and earth" (v. 6). It then returns to the earth, with a description of the Lord's gracious deeds for the lowly (vv. 7–9). The emphasis here is on God's counter-worldly preference for the oppressed, the hungry, prisoners, the blind, the bowed down, the righteous, the stranger, and the orphan and widow. Standing against all of these are the wicked (v. 9), whose ways God derails.

Psalms 147

Psalms 147 is a tripartite hymn of praise, in which each of the three stanzas (vv. 1–6, 7–11, 12–20) could just as well have stood separately as an independent hymn. Each stanza calls for praise (vv. 1, 7, 12) and offers as reason for praise Israel's characteristic dual testimony for God's transcendent heavenly activities (vv. 4, 8, 15–18) as well as for God's immanent earthly actions (vv. 2–3, 6, 9–11, 13–14, 19–20). The hymn places special emphasis on God's election of Israel. The emphasis spells out both the particular benefits to Israel, such as security, peace, and prosperity (vv. 2, 13–14) and also the special revelation that Israel received in the form of the law (vv. 19–20). It is worth stressing that the psalm, while distinguishing between the dual heavenly and earthly actions of the Lord, holds them together as a consistent unity. The command (v. 15) and word (v. 18) that God sends out effect God's will in the natural sphere; this same word (v. 19) is revealed only to Israel in God's statutes and ordinances. The connection between God's creative word and revelatory word seen here is found also in Genesis 1.

Psalms 148

A hymn of praise in which the call for praise element (vv. 1–5a, 7–13a) begins to dominate over the reasons for praise element (vv. 5b–6, 13b–14). This shift anticipates the climax of the Psalter in Ps 150. The two stanzas (vv. 1–6, 7–14) each display a parallel structure. In the first stanza, the extended call for praise exhorts the heavens and all their residents to praise the Lord (cf. Ps 96:11). The reason for praise, fittingly, is God's action of creation. In the second stanza, various earthly characters are called to praise God, including the mythological forces of the storms and the earthly terrain (v. 9; cf. Pss 97:1 114:5–8), wild animals, and the kings of the nations (v. 11; cf. Ps 96:7). Both the call for the heavens and the various earthly subjects to praise the Lord may represent a polemical edge in Israel's praise, since Israel's neighbors deified the heavenly bodies, certain forces of nature, and human royalty.

The fictive audiences that the psalm addresses (heavens, sea monsters, kings, etc.) are a cipher for the actual Israelite congregation worshiping in the Temple. That audience would have understood the call for them to praise.

Psalms 149

This psalm most likely was composed and performed during a liturgical Temple celebration, such as the fall harvest Festival of Tabernacles. The references to song, musical accompaniment, and Zion mark the song as a Temple composition (vv. 1–3). The references to military victory, weapons, and the subjugation of enemies suggest the mythological conception that the harvest was a celebration of the Lord's defeat of the anti-creation powers of chaos (vv. 4–8). The psalm's placement as the next-to-last psalm in the final form of the Psalter suggests that the original liturgical testimony to the Lord's victory was later interpreted eschatologically, with an eye on the future deliverance of both Israel and the world from the powers of evil.

Psalm 150

This hymn places a final exclamation mark of praise on the theological witness of the Psalter. In general, the Psalter moves from lament to praise and from individual to communal songs. This hymn is the appropriate conclusion to that general progression, because it takes one element of the hymn—the call for praise—and develops that call into an independent and complete poem. The psalm offers little along the line of reasons for praise (cf. v. 2b), but the rest of the instructional witness of the Psalter can be taken as the summative reasons for praise. The song calls for praise of the Lord to be sounded everywhere (v. 1), upon every musical instrument (vv. 3–5), and by every living thing (v. 6).

PROVERBS

GLENN D. PEMBERTON

OVERVIEW

Proverbs is one of three canonical books (Job, Ecclesiastes) associated with Israel's wisdom tradition. In its broadest sense, wisdom (khokhmah) denotes any expertise or skill (e.g., a professional sailor [Ezek 27:8] or mourner [Jer 9:17]). Among the sages, however, wisdom came to denote expertise in life based on careful observation of God's created and moral order. Thus, wisdom had primary concern for practical success in everyday life, a goal at the heart of Proverbs (1:2–4).

Proverbs and Israelite wisdom developed over a long period of time within the broader international wisdom traditions from Mesopotamia and Egypt. Despite formal attribution to Solomon (1:1), Proverbs explicitly identifies several other individuals or groups responsible for large portions of the book: anonymous sages (22:17; 24:23), Agur (30:1), Lemuel (31:1), and the scribes of Hezekiah (25:1). Implicitly, the materials of Proverbs also denote diverse origins such as the family farm (10:4–5; 14:4), home (13:24), city (11:10), and the royal court (25:2–7). Thus, while the book of Proverbs comes from an urban setting in the postexilic period, much of the book's contents originate from other places many years prior.

A brief prologue (1:1–7) provides the title (v. 1), objectives (vv. 2–4, 6), audience (vv. 4–5), and primary theme of the book: the key to genuine wisdom is one's relationship to the Lord ("fear of the LORD," v. 7). Form and content then coincide to divide the book into two halves. The first half of the book (1:8–9:18) consists of ten speeches from a parent to a child (literally, a father to a son, e.g., 1:8–19; 2:1–22) and four interludes that feature wisdom personified as a woman (e.g., 1:20–33; 8:1–36). The cumulative aim of these materials is to convince the reader of the importance of choosing wisdom as a way of life, a choice nothing less than a decision between life and death (4:13, 22; 5:7–14, 23).

The second half of the book (10:1–31:9) presents the content of wisdom through individual sayings that describe wise and foolish behavior. Six sections or collections provide minimal structure to these diverse proverbs. The first and longest is a collection of "the proverbs of Solomon" (10:1–22:16) that has little discernable internal order other than beginning with a large group of antithetical proverbs (10:1–15:33). The second and third collections derive from anonymous sages (22:17–24:22, 23–34), the second is related to the Egyptian wisdom text of Amenemope. The fourth section is again attributed to Solomon through the hands of Hezekiah's scribes (25:1–29:27) who either inherited or arranged some of their materials according to theme. Finally, the book credits the fifth (30:1–33) and sixth sections (31:1–9) to non-Israelites: Agur and King Lemuel.

An acrostic poem regarding the woman of noble character comprises the epilogue to the book (31:10–31). Although this poem may describe an ideal wife, it is more likely that the woman is personified Wisdom from chs. 1–9. Earlier the sages had urged the son to pursue and marry Woman Wisdom (4:5–9); now the sages present the benefits of having chosen Wisdom as one's life partner. The one who responds to the book's invitation to decide for wisdom (1:8–9:18) and adopts a life-style of wisdom (10:1–31:9) will receive great blessings.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prologue (1:1–7)

The prologue identifies youths with little life experience as the primary audience for the book (v. 4, see 14:15), with secondary concern for the continued learning of sages (v. 5). A series of infinitives (for, to) identify two goals for that audience: (1) an intellectual grasp of wisdom (vv. 2, 6), and (2) an ethical response of "righteousness, justice, and equity" (v. 3). Both depend on a theological conviction ("the fear of the LORD," v. 7), a reverence of God that leads to life (Prov 15:33; Job 28:28).

II. An Invitation to Choose Wisdom (1:8–9:18)

Chapters 1–9 interweave three themes within a collection of ten lectures from a parent to a "child" (literally, a father to his "son" who is coming of age) and four interludes: (1) the importance of wisdom for a successful life (e.g., 3:13–18), (2) wisdom as a way of life or a path upon which one walks, not a one-time decision (e.g., 6:20–23), (3) the necessity of making a proactive choice for wisdom (e.g., 2:24–25; 7:1–5; 9:3–6), and (4) not to choose it is to accept a foolish life-style.

In the first lecture (1:8–19) the parents urge the child to accept rather than reject their teaching (vv. 8–9) and then caution against the seductive allure of sinners and their greed. The sinners' speech attempts to circumvent the parents' appeal for a disciplined life and invites the child to participate in an exciting illicit adventure (vv. 11–12) that leads to fast wealth (v. 13) and membership in a one-for-all community (v. 14). The parents implore the child to see through the rhetoric (vv. 15–19) and warn that these people are rushing toward violence that will ultimately take their lives. Even a bird avoids an obvious trap, but not these people. Greed will destroy them (v. 19).

Wisdom, personified as a woman, makes her first appearance in 1:20–33 (Interlude 1) with tones reminiscent of a prophet ("how long?") or a woman scorned. Wisdom is not elusive but shouts at every public location (vv. 20–21); the child has no excuse for missing her call. Tragedy awaits those who ignore her counsel (vv. 24–26). Such people will turn to her only when calamity strikes (and it will), but then it will be too late (vv. 26–28). Wisdom explains that their fate rests on their prior decisions. Since they did not choose a relationship with God (v. 29) and would not accept Wisdom's counsel or correction (v. 30), they will reap the consequences of their behavior (v. 31). The time to accept wisdom is now; those who do will live securely (v. 33).

The acquisition of wisdom is no easy matter. In the second lecture the parent asserts that intense effort is necessary to gain wisdom (2:1–22). The child must not only accept the parent's words but pay close attention, cry out for insight, and seek wisdom like a buried treasure (vv. 1–4). Only if a person fully invests herself in the pursuit of wisdom will she come to have a genuine relationship with God (v. 5) and be able to enact ethical behavior ("righteousness and justice and equity," v. 9). Indeed, the Lord stores up and gives away wisdom (vv. 6–7), but the gift must be sought through diligence with an integrity of character appropriate to wisdom's aims (v. 7). The result of acquired wisdom is a relationship with God that is not only pleasant (v. 10) but provides protection or rescue from two dangers: (1) the alluring speech of evil men who abandon ethical behavior for the so-called joy of devious schemes (vv. 12–15), and (2) the smooth words of the adulteress who abandons her marriage vows and leads her male victims to death (likely metaphorical, living death, vv. 16–19). In both instances, the parent's primary concern is for the words these people speak to lure and then entangle the child in deadly conduct. Wisdom, however, will enable the child to see reality through the deceptive rhetoric and escape the danger of both evil men and women. Therefore, the parent concludes, the child must stay on the path of just behavior. To do so means security and stability (v. 21); to fail will result in loss of home and livelihood (v. 22).

The third lecture reminds the child of parental instruction regarding fundamental character qualities and their value (3:1–12). The reminders alternate between warnings ("do not"—vv. 3–4, 7– 8, 11–12) and admonitions ("do"—vv. 5–6, 9–10). A good reputation depends on an unflinching commitment to be loyal or reliable (vv. 3–4). Rather than relying on oneself due to an inflated sense of one's own abilities (v. 5) or arrogance ("wise in your own eyes," v. 7), a person should "fear" or fully trust in the Lord (vv. 5–8). Such reliance on God may be demonstrated by giving the first or best of one's profits and trusting God to provide an abundance in return (vv. 9–10). The parent urges the child, however, also to regard hardship or a lack of blessing as a sign of the Lord's favor, the discipline of a much-loved child (vv. 11–12).

The second interlude in chs. 1–9 consists of an ode to wisdom (3:13–18): it was by wisdom that the Lord created the heavens and the earth (vv. 19–20). The ode again personifies Wisdom as a woman (cf. 1:20–33) who offers benefits to those who grasp and hold onto her. She offers riches (v. 16) and an income better than money (v. 14). She provides quality of life ("long life"): honor (v. 16), peace, and pleasantness (v. 17). She is more precious than anything else (v. 15). Woman Wisdom is nothing less than a tree of life restored and within the grasp of all people (cf. Gen 2:9; 3:22).

The fourth lecture again implores the child not to lose sight of wisdom, but to practice a prudent life-style, upheld here as the key to a secure life (3:21–35). One who maintains wisdom will walk without stumbling, sit without fear, and lie down to sleep soundly (vv. 23–24). He will not fear disaster (reading with the NJPS "you will not fear" rather than the NRSV "do not be afraid") because the Lord will be his security (vv. 25–26). The remainder of the lecture defines a prudent life-style in attitudes and actions toward others: prompt repayment of loans or other "good" due to another (vv. 27–28), not taking advantage of a person's trust or good will (vv. 29–30), and not being enamored with the apparent success of the violent (vv. 31–32). In fact, the Lord's curse is on the wicked, while the righteous, humble, and wise receive God's blessing (vv. 33–35).

In the fifth lecture the father recounts his training from his own father (the child's grandfather) in order to persuade his children to accept wisdom (4:1–9). When the father was young, the grandfather spoke to him to convince him (the father) to hear, remember, and obey his appeal to acquire wisdom (vv. 4–5). In order to accomplish this rhetorical goal, the grandfather personified wisdom as a woman, either as an influential patron or spouse, who protects, honors, and rewards the child who loves and embraces her (vv. 6–9). Lecture six urges the child to accept parental guidance by contrasting the path (life-style) of wisdom and the path of the wicked (4:10–19). Though it may not seem so dire to the child, he or she must realize that the decision between wisdom and folly is a life-or-death decision. On the one hand, Wisdom provides a smooth and well-lit path on which the child may walk or even run without stumbling (vv. 11–12, 18). On the other hand, those walking on the path of the wicked cannot rest until they cause someone to stumble. They thrive ("eat" and "drink") on violence and stumble about in darkness (vv. 16–17, 19). The child must not step foot on their path (v. 14) but accept the parent's way of wisdom (v. 10).

Once again, in the seventh lecture the parent urges the child to remember his teaching because it alone offers genuine life (4:20–27). The speech unpacks the anatomy of wisdom: heart (v. 23), lips (v. 24), eyes (v. 25), and feet (vv. 26–27). The heart denotes a person's innermost being, the source of the will (3:1) emotions (12:25; 13:12), desire (6:25; 23:17), and trust (3:5; 31:11). Consequently, the heart determines the course of a person's life (21:1).

A contrast between the danger of the "other" woman and the benefits of fidelity to one's spouse governs the eighth lecture (5:1–23). After a brief appeal for the son's attention (vv. 1–2), the parent warns against any association with a "loose" woman, any woman other than the son's wife. Her speech allures (v. 3; cf. 2:6; 7:5, 21) but the consequence of swallowing her words is nothing less than a living death. This woman leads young men straight to the grave ("Sheol") although she is so deluded that even she is unaware of her true course (vv. 5–6). A man who does not stay away from her gives away his life to the "alien" (vv. 8–10). Alien may denote a non-Israelite or more likely is metaphorical for the "otherness" of any woman who is not the son's spouse. Only at the end, when all is lost, will the son realize and confess his foolishness: the folly of not listening to correction or accepting instruction (vv. 11–14).

The parent advises the son to find sexual fulfillment with his wife (vv. 15–19). "Water," "springs," and "fountain" are erotic imagery (Song 4:12, 15). To drink from "your own cistern" denotes sexual intercourse with one's own wife (Prov 5:15), a pleasure that should be reserved for the son and his spouse (vv. 16–17). The parent further pronounces a blessing on the son's sexual relationship with his wife, that it be fully satisfying and even intoxicating in its passion (vv. 18–19). If so, the parent cannot imagine any reason why the son would seek sexual fulfillment in another woman (v. 20).

Two final arguments clinch the parent's appeal. The first is theological; the Lord sees everything; there are no secret affairs (v. 21). The second is practical; every sinful activity produces results that destroy the sinner (vv. 22–23). The lecture is obviously androcentric; it is to a young man about the sexual dangers of the "other" woman. Nonetheless, the same message to women would vary only in detail. The danger of "other" men is just as real for young women.

A third interlude from the lectures brings together sayings that warn against practices that may seem innocent or inconsequential but are in fact dangerous (6:1–19). First, vv. 1–5 warn against the risks of pledging financial security for a loan (e.g., collateral or co-signing). Such a reckless action puts a person entirely at the mercy of the lender ("your neighbor's power") and the only escape is an immediate release from the obligation (see also 11:15). A second reckless practice that may seem harmless is "just a little" laziness. In reality, just "a little slumber" or "folding of the hands to rest" will cause poverty to attack like a thief or warrior (vv. 10–11; cf. 24:33–34); it is better to observe and follow the example of an industrious ant (vv. 6–8). Third, those who devise deceptive schemes against others through their misleading speech, winks, and other gestures are in imminent danger of calamity (vv. 12–15). Finally, a graded numerical saying concludes the interlude. In the pattern of $x/x+1$, the emphasis sometimes falls on the final item, here the Lord's feeling ("hate") regarding those who disrupt family relationships (cf. ch. 30).

The opening appeal of the ninth lecture (6:20–35) again introduces concern for the son's interaction with the "wife of another" ('esheth r'a, lit., "evil woman," v. 24a) or "adulteress" (nokhriyah, lit., "foreign woman," v. 24b). This woman may attract the son with her beauty (v. 25), but her most potent weapon is her seductive speech ("smooth tongue," v. 24). Only acceptance of parental wisdom will provide an effective defense to her persuasive words (vv. 23–24).

The remainder of the lecture advances two arguments against sexual liaisons with a married woman. First, adultery comes at a high cost. Verse 26 compares the cost for a prostitute ("a loaf of bread") with the price of adultery ("a man's very life"), not to condone prostitution but to assert the much higher cost of adultery (see also vv. 32–33). Second, no one can avoid paying the price for an adulterous affair. No one can play with fire and not be burned (vv. 27–28). A community might understand ("not despise") a thief who steals only to eat, even though the thief will still pay in full (vv. 30–31). But no one will have compassion for an adulterer (vv. 32–33), especially not the woman's husband (vv. 34–35). The son (and daughter) must realize that illicit affairs come only at a high cost that is certain to be paid; only a fool thinks he or she can "get away with it."

The tenth lecture (7:1–23) continues the theme of the danger of illicit sexual liaisons. Here, the remedy for keeping the son away from the other woman is not only for the son to remember parental instruction, but to develop an intimate, even marital relationship with Woman Wisdom. "You are my sister" (v. 4) is an expression of endearment between a husband and wife (Song 4:9).

From his window, the father (or mother) claims to have witnessed just how an adulteress seduces young men. She dresses like a prostitute (v. 10; although married, v. 19) and looks everywhere for her next victim when she sees and approaches a young man (vv. 11–12). She seizes, kisses, and then brazenly speaks to him (v. 13). In fact, her speech is the power of her seduction (vv. 5, 21). She claims the recent fulfillment of a vow and peace offerings (shelamim), which featured the return of meat to the worshiper to eat (Lev 7:11–18). In other words, she claims to have fresh meat for dinner at home. She also claims that she has been looking just for this particular young man (v. 15), a rhetorical ploy to flatter him. The woman goes on to describe the erotic preparations she has made (vv. 16–17) before finally making a direct proposal for sex (v. 18). With her intentions now explicit, the woman anticipates possible objections: where is your husband? (not home, v. 19a), how long will he be gone? (a long time, v. 19b), how do you know? (he took a bag of money, v. 20). Her speech is smooth and seductive, and the young man believes it like a dumb animal senselessly walking to his own death. He fails to see through the rhetoric and realize that his life is on the line (vv. 21–23). The parent has seen this episode happen so many times that it seems like the house of the adulteress (or adulterer) is the gateway to living death (vv. 26–27).

Personified Wisdom makes her third appearance in chs. 1–9 (interlude 3), again to implore the child to accept her instruction (cf. 1:20–33; 3:13–20). As before, she appears in every public space inviting all to listen (8:1–5). Wisdom gives several reasons why people should respond to her teaching. First, the quality of her speech is noble; Wisdom speaks only what is right, true, and straight—and nothing that is twisted or deceptive (vv. 5–9). Second, her instruction is better than the acquisition of any other aspiration or desire, especially wealth ("jewels," vv. 10–11). Third, Wisdom's character is impeccable. She lives with "knowledge and discretion" and hates pride and corrupt speech (vv. 12–13). Fourth, she supplies the insight and strength for those who govern justly (vv. 14–16). Fifth, while Wisdom is better than riches (cf. vv. 10–11), she does reward those who diligently seek her with "enduring wealth and prosperity" that is better than gold or silver (vv. 17–

The sixth argument for accepting Wisdom vividly expands her personification to include direct descent from God. Wisdom was "created" (qanani, v. 22) or "brought forth" (kholalti, vv. 24–25) by the Lord before the creation of the earth or heavens (vv. 22–25). Both verbs suggest the process of birth; God gave birth to a daughter—Woman Wisdom. As a result, Daughter Wisdom was present when God created the land, the sky, and restrained the waters (vv. 26–29). At that time she was beside the Lord as a "master worker" ('amon, v. 30). As translated by the NRSV (drawing from the LXX), Woman Wisdom worked beside God in creation as a master artisan. The context, however, better supports the translation "little child" (NRSV footnote) or "infant" (KJV, REB). Wisdom was born prior to creation (vv. 22–25) and at creation "dances about" (sha'shu'im, NRSV, "his delight," v. 30), rejoicing and delighting in creation, especially humanity (vv. 30–31). Because of Wisdom's presence at creation, she knows how the world works, including what is best for humans. Therefore, people should listen to her to gain life (vv. 32–36).

Chapters 1–9 conclude with a final appeal from Woman Wisdom (9:1–6), instruction to teachers of wisdom (9:7–12), and a warning about Woman Folly (9:13–18). Woman Wisdom has made every arrangement for a splendid banquet: built a large house, prepared meat and wine, set the table, and sent out invitations to all the simple or naïve (vv. 1–8). Her food and drink denote laying aside immature behavior in order to act with insight or understanding, in other words, to truly live (vv. 5–6). Personified Folly appears in stark contrast to Wisdom. Folly is loud and ignorant (v. 13). And yet she extends the exact same invitation as Woman Wisdom: "You who are simple, turn in here!" (v. 16, cf. v. 4a). Woman Folly also offers food and drink, including the exciting allure of danger and secrecy. "Stolen water" and secret bread most likely denote illicit sex (cf. 5:15–17). Although initially similar to Wisdom's call and perhaps even more appealing, the child (son) must employ wisdom to see through the guise. Those who follow Woman Folly walk to their own death (v. 18).

Instruction to teachers of wisdom lies between the two contrasting invitations (vv. 7–12). In Proverbs the terms describing foolish or wicked behavior exist on a graduated scale of character deformation with "simple" (pethi) as the least severe and most correctable and a "scoffer" (lets) or "fool" ('ewil) as the most extreme and least correctable. The text warns against attempting to correct a scoffer; the wise will only be hurt by the attempt because a scoffer is beyond correction. However, rebuking and teaching the wise will lead to their further character development (vv. 8b–9). Wisdom is ultimately rooted in a proper relationship of respect to God (v. 10, cf. 1:7, 15:33) that alone promises genuine life (v. 11).

III. The Content of Wisdom (10:1–31:9)

10:1–22:16. The Proverbs of Solomon (i)

The first and longest collection of sayings in Proverbs begins with five chapters of primarily antithetical proverbs, the first line asserting a truth or observation which is then contrasted by a second line (e.g., "A wise child . . . but a foolish child" [10:1] or "the wise of heart . . . but a babbling fool" [10:8]). Despite many recent efforts to identify purposeful arrangement of these proverbs, close literary connections do not appear to extend beyond small clusters of two or three proverbs (e.g., 10:1–2, 3–4, 6–7). Recurring topics in chs. 10–15, however, are clear. Most proverbs in these chapters regard one or more of four thematic contrasts: (1) righteous/wicked, (2) appropriate/ inappropriate speech, (3) prosperity/poverty, and (4) wisdom/folly. The density of these themes in chs. 10–15 is far greater than their appearance in other chapters, suggesting a deliberate emphasis on these contrasts. As a result, the commentary will review each of these themes with special attention to select verses.

The first and most prominent theme in chs. 11–15 is the contrast between the righteous and the wicked. Apparently, a key concern of the editors was to address misperceptions regarding the life and fortunes of the wicked. Despite appearances, the sages claim that the wicked do not possess any true or lasting prosperity, e.g., "Treasures gained by wickedness do not profit" (10:2a), "The wicked earn no real gain" (11:18a), and "No one finds security by wickedness" (12:3, see also 10:3, 6, 16, 24, 28; 11:23; 13:25; 14:19). Instead, the lives of the wicked "are filled with trouble" (12:21b) and "trouble befalls their income" (15:6b, see also 11:8, 21). The wicked will collapse under the weight of their wrongdoing (10:25; 14:32). They will not remain in the land (10:30), their years will be short (10:27; 12:7; 13:9; 14:11), and their expectations and hopes will come to nothing (10:3, 28; 11:23). In contrast, it is the righteous who achieve or who are blessed with real and enduring prosperity (10:2, 6; 11:18; 14:11; 15:6), enjoy stability in times of crisis (10:25, 30; 11:8; 12:3), and find their dreams and hopes fulfilled (10:24, 28; 11:23). The emphatic rhetoric suggests that then, as now, the presence of wicked people who appear to flourish posed a special problem for sages who wanted to encourage righteous behavior.

These proverbs, as others, should not be read as a guarantee that the righteous will always prosper and the wicked always suffer. Neither ancient nor modern proverbs function in such absolute ways. Rather, these proverbs assert in general terms that the way to genuine prosperity and security is by means of integrity, fairness, and just business practices—not shortcuts, dishonesty, or oppression. Despite appearances, the sages warn, people do not really admire the wicked. The community will rejoice when the wicked perish (11:10b; 10:7). Further, the religious practices and the life-style of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord (15:8– 9), and the "LORD is far from the wicked" (15:29a).

A second thematic contrast involves speech. Lack of restraint characterizes foolish speech. A fool babbles on and on without self-control (10:8, 14; 13:3; 15:2, 28). Wise speech, however, is restrained (10:19), appropriate (10:32; 15:23), guarded (13:3), thoughtful (15:28), and sometimes even silent (11:12; 12:23). Disciplined speech both enables and results from listening—to instruction (15:31–32; 10:8, 17; 15:5), advice (12:15; 13:10), and rebuke (13:1, 18). To listen and learn, however, would require a fool to stop talking, which is an impossible task for him (10:8, 14). The collection also emphasizes the power of the tongue for good and ill. Foolish or wicked speech may bring ruin (10:8, 14; 13:3), ensnare the speaker (12:13), ambush the listener (12:6), thrust like a sword (12:18), destroy friends (11:9), stir up anger (15:1), and even overthrow communities (11:11).

But wise or righteous speech is like valuable silver (10:20); it brings healing (12:18), encouragement (12:25), and nourishment to the listener and speaker (10:21; 12:14; 13:2). Such talk preserves and fosters life (13:3; 14:3, 25) primarily because of its honesty (12:17, 22; 14:5, 25). Godly speech is a fountain of life (10:11) and a tree of life (15:4).

Third, many proverbs in chs. 10–15 contrast the ideas of wealth and poverty. Although addressed to the wealthy rather than the poor, the sages are realists. The poor have a hard life (10:15; 14:20; 15:15) while wealth provides security to the rich (10:15; 13:8). Further, while the proverbs draw extensive attention to self-induced causes of poverty (e.g., laziness [10:4, 5; 12:24; 13:4; 15:19], wickedness [10:3; 11:18; 13:21, 22, 25; 15:6], stinginess [11:24–26], greed [11:26; 15:27], chasing worthless pursuits [12:11], and all talk with no work [14:23]) so that the reader will avoid these behaviors, the sages also acknowledge that poverty may come due to injustice (13:23). Over against causes of poverty, the sages identify appropriate means to long-lasting prosperity (e.g., righteousness [10:3, 6, 16, 24; 11:18, 28; 12:12; 13:21–22, 25, 15:6], diligent work [10:4; 12:11, 14b, 24, 27; 13:4; 14:23], and generosity [11:24–25]) as well as the proper use of wealth (e.g., kindness to the poor [14:21, 31]). And yet, despite their positive attitude toward wealth (it is the Lord's blessing [12:2]), the sages emphasize that some things are far more important (e.g., righteousness [11:4], fear of the Lord [15:16], and love or harmony [15:17]) and mock those who pretend to be rich in order to impress others (12:9; 13:7).

The final thematic contrast in these chapters consists broadly of the ideas of wisdom/folly, good sense/lack of understanding, and other similar terms. A fundamental precondition for wisdom is humility (11:2) with an openness to learn (12:15; 13:10). Wise behavior is especially exhibited in self-control (14:16), mentioned here in regard to various contexts (e.g., temper [12:16; 14:17, 29], speech [10:14, 19], and wealth [12:11]). The sages show their disapproval of an out-of-control life by scorning those who act without sense (11:22; 14:1) and emphasizing the public support for those with good sense (12:8; 14:35). Because of their careful, disciplined actions, the wise have direction in life (14:15; 15:21, 24) that brings joy to their parents (10:1; 15:20), benefits to those around them (13:14, 20; 14:7), and pleasure to themselves (10:23). While folly is the reward of fools (14:18), wisdom crowns the life of the wise (14:24).

Although not a contrasting theme or more prevalent than elsewhere in the book, these chapters also have much to say about the Lord's active presence in human affairs (15:3, 11). Unfortunately, much of what the Lord sees is an insult (oppression of the poor, 14:31; cf. 17:5) or an "abomination (to'evah) to the LORD," i.e., things that are offensive, repulsive, or repugnant (e.g., false balances [11:1], lying lips [12:22], the sacri-fice of the wicked [15:8], the ways of the wicked [15:9], and evil plans [15:26]; cf. 6:16–19). While the Lord works against the proud (15:25), security and well-being come to those who follow the way of the Lord (10:3, 29; 12:2; 14:9; 15:29) and have a proper relationship with God ("fear of the LORD," 10:27; 14:26–27; 15:33).

The following comments address problems in the following proverbs:

10:2, "delivers from death"—In Proverbs the terms life and death are often symbolize a person's quality of life, a full and vibrant life or the lack joyful living (e.g., 10:16, 17, 21, 27).

10:10, "winks the eye"—a gesture to plan or coordinate deceptive or harmful actions (6:12–14; 16:30; Ps 35:19).

10:12, "love covers all offenses"—to forgive or pardon, not improperly cover-up or condone sin (cf. 1 Pet 4:8).

10:15, "the wealth of the rich"—a realistic observation about the benefits of wealth. Wealth provides security unavailable to the poor. Elsewhere the sages warn against overestimating the security wealth provides (see 18:10–11; cf. 13:8; 14:20–21; 19:4).

10:22, "and he adds no sorrow with it" or "and toil adds nothing to it"—reading 'etsev (toil or sorrow) as the subject of the sentence. While other proverbs affirm the importance of human effort (10:4; 14:23), with exaggeration characteristic of many proverbs, this text emphasizes that the Lord is the ultimate source of blessing.

11:1, "false balance" and "an accurate weight"—balances with weights were a basic form of measurement for trade or commerce. True balances and weights denote honest business practices (see 16:11; 20:10, 23).

11:15, "guarantee loans"—to be held responsible for repayment should the debtor default, a practice similar to co-signing for a loan. Several proverbs caution against this risky practice, especially on behalf of a stranger (see 6:1–5; 17:18; 20:16; 22:26–27; 27:13). While Proverbs upholds generosity (e.g., 11:24–25), the danger of financial ruin is to be avoided.

11:16, "A gracious woman . . . aggressive gain riches"—The NRSV adopts the Greek text, which adds lines b and c to this verse (alone, lines a and d reflect the Hebrew). The primary antithesis in the proverb is ambiguous. The contrast may be between honor (long lasting) and riches (temporary), female behavior (gracious) and male behavior (aggressive), or gentleness (gracious) and violence (aggressive).

12:4, "she who brings shame"—like most proverbs this saying and those regarding the "contentious wife" come from a male's perspective. With imagination and humor, the sages bemoan the plight of a man married to a quarrelsome and argumentative wife; better to suffer the discomforts of the desert (21:19) or the corner of a housetop (21:9; 25:24)—to live anywhere but endure the torture of her arguing, an unstoppable dripping of rain (19:13; 27:15–16). The principle is just as valid for hypercritical, domineering, and verbally abusive husbands—better to live anywhere but with them.

12:27, "The lazy do not roast their game"—because they do not hunt or capture game to roast (cf.

NAB, NJB, RSV). The Hebrew is difficult but the main idea is clear; the lazy have nothing, but the diligent obtain wealth.

13:8, "but the poor get no threats (ge'arah)"—or "does not listen to rebuke" (cf. NJB, NAB). The contrast with ransom in 8a supports understanding ge'arah as threat. Wealth is a relative good. It may provide ransom or relief from kidnapping or other danger, but wealth also raises a higher possibility for some dangers.

13:9, "lamp of the wicked goes out"—metaphorical. A lamp or light that goes out is a sign of death (Job 18:5, 6; 2 Sam 21:17) or disaster (Job 21:17; see also Prov 20:20; 24:20).

13:24, "spare the rod"—a commonly held principle in Israel and the ancient Near East, namely, that corporal punishment improves character. Paradoxically, the motivation for physical punishment was to come out of love for the child, not hate or anger. Other proverbs urge parents to discipline children in order to drive out folly (22:15), instill wisdom (29:15), and save their lives (23:13–14; 29:17). The concept of the rod or corporal punishment does not advocate child abuse or mistreatment of prisoners but wisely measured discipline within the context of love.

14:9, "Fools mock at the guilt-offering ('asham)"—ambiguity in the Hebrew has spawned several emendations (e.g., RSV, NAB, NJPS). Fools have so little concern for their sin that they act with contempt toward a guilt offering that would atone for their sin, a rare reference to sacrificial atonement in wisdom literature (cf. Lev 5:14–6:7; 7:1–6).

14:13, "Even in laughter the heart is sad"—human emotions are complex. A happy appearance may mask inner turmoil, and our greatest joys hold the potential of our greatest sorrows, even at the same moment. As with other proverbs, the text does not assert an absolute truth but makes a general observation.

14:15, "the simple (pethi)"—a young person who stands at a crossroads in his or her character development (1:4; 7:7). In contrast to the clever ('arum), the simple lack training and knowledge and so tend to believe everything (14:15, 18); they also fail to recognize danger and suffer for it (22:3). Though ignorant, the simple are open to learning (19:25; 21:11), but because of their inexperience they are also prone to wander into the wrong path (1:32). As a result, the book of Proverbs records something of a battle between wisdom (1:22; 8:5; 9:4) and folly (9:16) for the life and character of the simple. The book itself enters the fray by identifying the simple as the book's primary audience (1:4).

14:20–21, "the poor . . . the rich"—see 19:4.

15:11, "Sheol" (synonym "Abaddon")—the underworld or realm of the dead (see also 1:12; 5:5; 27:20; Job 26:6; Ps 139:8).

15:13, "glad heart . . . sorrow of heart"—heart (lev) denotes a person's all-important inner being or psyche (4:23) made visible in one's facial appearance ("countenance") and powerful enough to crush hope or strength ("the spirit"; cf. 4:23; 17:22; 18:14).

15:24, "Sheol"—see 15:11.

15:30, "The light of the eyes"—may denote the joy of good news reflected in the face of a messenger (NIV; cf. 16:15) or the inner courage and strength given by God (Ezra 9:8; Ps 13:3). Chapter 16 begins with two short thematic collections. The first stresses the presence and activity of the Lord in human affairs (vv. 1–11). Over and above human efforts, the Lord determines plans (v. 1), steps (v. 9), and outcomes (v. 3). The Lord exercises insight into a person's inner disposition (v. 2) and may respond with favor (v. 7) or disgust and punishment (v. 5). The Lord is sovereign, even over those who reject his rule (v. 4). But those who commit their plans to the Lord succeed (v. 3) and those who live in reverence and respect of the Lord ("fear the LORD") are able to avoid evil (ra') or trouble (v. 6).

The second collection regards the king (vv. 10–15) and is closely related to vv. 1–10. In ancient Israelite thought the king was God's representative and the mediator between God and the people (e.g., Ps 2:6–9). So here the ideal king, like the Lord, is a wise judge (v. 10; cf. 16:2), views evil as abomination (v. 12; cf. 16:5), and delights in honest and righteous behavior (v. 13; cf. 16:11). His favor brings blessing (v. 15; cf. 16:3, 7), and his anger is deadly (v. 14; cf. 16:5).

The following comments address problems in the following proverbs.

16:4, "even the wicked for the day of trouble"—not that the Lord forces some people to be wicked. Rather, the Lord's dominion is absolute, including punishment ("day of trouble") of the wicked.

16:6, "By loyalty and faithfulness iniquity is atoned for"—genuine devotion erases or cancels the effects of sin with God (and others; cf. 10:12) while a proper relationship of reverence ("fear of the LORD") prevents sin. The proverb does not reject sacrificial atonement (Lev 1–7), but emphasizes vital attitudes necessary for atonement (cf. Hos 6:6; 1 Sam 15:22).

16:10, "Inspired decisions (qesem)"—elsewhere this term denotes divination, forbidden to Israel (e.g., Deut 18:10; 1 Sam 15:23). Here, used in a positive sense, the term metaphorically refers to God enabling the king to make wise judgments as if the Lord himself had spoken.

16:11, "Honest balances and scales"—see 11:1.

16:15, "In the light of a king's face"—see 15:30.

16:30, "winks the eyes"—see 10:10.

16:33, "the lot is cast into the lap"—a way of reaching a decision, especially that of divine will (e.g., 18:18; see also Jonah 1:7; Acts 1:26). While the precise procedure for casting lots is uncertain, ancient Israel regarded the Lord's control of the outcome as certain. Chapter 17 has no obvious literary structure although three themes reverberate in the text: the fool, friendship, and family. A fool is nothing but trouble for his or her parents (vv. 21, 25) or those who encounter him (v. 12); fools refuse to learn (vv. 16, 24) or accept correction (v. 10), and the only hope for their speech is not to speak (vv. 7, 27–28). Friendship relies on forgiveness (v. 9), not returning evil for good (vv. 13–14), and faithful love (v. 17; cf. 18:24). And healthy families choose peace over abundance (v. 1), wisdom over shameful behavior (v. 2), and justice over unfairness (v. 13). Naturally, grandchildren are the pride of their grandparents (v. 6).

17:8, "A bribe is like a magic stone"—a realistic observation about the power of a bribe. Bribery or gift-giving often achieves its goals, at least in the eyes of the person offering the gift (18:16; 21:14; cf. 6:35). Proverbs condemns bribery for illegitimate purposes (17:23; 15:27; see Exod 23:8; Deut 16:19).

17:18, "pledge" and "surety"—see 11:15.

17:19, "one who builds a high threshold"—either elaborate architecture of the door or the whole house (synecdoche) expressive of pride, or "his opening" (pithkho; NRSV, "threshold") denotes the mouth, thus haughty or proud speech. In either case, pride leads to destruction ("broken bones," see also 16:18).

17:24, "the eyes of a fool to the ends of the earth"—fools are incapable of concentrating on their true needs. Instead, they are continually distracted and their attention wanders from one thing to another. The topic of speech dominates ch. 18. Words possess tremendous power, even the power of life and death (v. 21); a fool's talk is his or her undoing (vv. 6–7) while good lips produce fruit that sustain life or bring satisfaction (vv. 20, 4). A wise person listens before speaking (v. 13; cf. 2, 15, 17) and will avoid the tasty words of a gossip (v. 8). On the topic of the court and justice see verses 5, 17–18, and 23.

18:1, "The one who lives alone is selfindulgent"—a person who isolates himself from the community and pursues selfish desires. Such anti-social behavior is contrary to the collective identity and values of the Old Testament. Selfcentered commitments lead a person to reject wisdom from the community ("sound judgment," 1b) and value only his own personal opinion.

18:4, "The words of the mouth are deep waters"—either (1) a contrast between words that derive from deep within a person and are thus ultimately incomprehensible (v. 4a; cf. 20:5) and wisdom that is readily available (v. 4b; so NRSV, NIV), or (2) the three images of water in lines a and b describe ideal speech as "deep waters" (inexhaustible), a "fountain of wisdom" (wise), and a "gushing stream" (refreshing; so NAB, NJB, NJPS).

18:16, "A gift opens doors"—see 17:8.

18:18, "Casting the lot"—see 16:33.

18:19, "An ally offended is stronger than a city"—the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain (see the diversity of translations: NIV, NAB, RSV [following the LXX], NJB). Reading 19a with the NRSV, a close relationship (friend or family) damaged by a dispute or offense is more difficult to reconcile than capturing a fortified city. Line b is more obscure; it likely emphasizes the difficulty of resolving a broken friendship.

18:23, "The poor use entreaties"—because of their marginal social location, the poor must present requests with care and deference to superiors (cf. 19:4, 7). Because of the security of their resources and position (cf. 10:15; 14:20; 22:7) the wealthy may respond ("answer") rudely, without concern for the feelings or reactions of the poor. The proverb is an implicit rebuke of such common social conditions and behavior (see also 13:23; 22:16).

Wealth and poverty are the most prominent theme in ch. 19. The proverbs identify regrettable social realities: people flock to those with money to spend (vv. 4a, 6), but avoid those who lack resources (v. 4b, 7). Only one specific cause for poverty is recognized: laziness (v. 15, comically portrayed in verse 24). Genuine prosperity comes as a result of wisdom (v. 8), obedience (v. 16), kindness to the poor (v. 17), and, above all, a proper relationship to the Lord (v. 23). However, integrity not wealth should be a person's upmost aspiration. Even if the result is poverty, it is better not to become perverse (v. 1) or a liar (v. 22). Other themes prominent in the chapter include family life (vv. 13, 14, 18, 26), the court (vv. 5, 9, 28, 29), and anger (vv. 11, 12, 19).

19:4, "poor are left friendless"—a troubling but common feature of human society; people befriend those who advantage them (the rich) and avoid social entanglement with those who drain them (the poor). A similar proverb pair in 14:20–21 condemns such behavior, not only as shallow but sinful (cf. 10:15; 18:23; 19:7).

19:7, "are hated"—the term sane', encompasses a broad spectrum of feelings: intense hatred (1 Kgs 22:8), aggravation (25:17), avoidance (11:15, translated as "refusing"), or preference for one person over another (Gen 29:31, 33).

19:7, "when they call . . ."—an ambiguous third line (literally, "one pursuing words, they are not [or 'they are']"). Some devise a translation that relates the line to the previous couplet (e.g., NRSV, NIV). Others regard it as a remnant of an unrelated lost proverb (e.g., NJB).

19:13, "a wife's quarreling"—see 12:4.

19:19, "if you effect a rescue . . ."—the Hebrew is ambiguous. Either: (1) "you will have to do it again" (NRSV, NAB), or (2) you will only make matters worse (NJPS, NJB). In either case the counsel is the same; the only hope for a hottempered people is for them to endure the consequences of their behavior. Attempts to help by extricating them from their punishment are ineffective or even harmful.

19:25, "Strike a scoffer (lets)"—a scoffer is one of the final stages in the character deformation of a fool. A scoffer not only acts foolishly but refuses to listen to rebuke (13:1; 15:12) and turns on those who try to help (9:7–8). Above all, a scoffer "acts with arrogant pride" (21:24) and so is an abomination to all (24:9).

19:25, "the simple"—see 14:15.

Chapter 20 features a number of proverbs that describe or comment on the human condition. The human heart (or mind) is complex (v. 5). The Lord searches out and weighs the heart (v. 27; 21:2), but the intelligent also can discern a person's intentions (v. 5). Although a person's actions reveal his or her inner character (v. 11), it remains impossible for a person to understand fully his or her own way (v. 24), just as it is impossible to make oneself pure from sin (v. 9) or find a trustworthy person (v. 6).

With three exceptions (vv. 25, 29–30), all the proverbs from 20:22 to 21:3 regard either the Lord, the king, or both. The Lord is the creator (v. 12) and not only understands humans (vv. 27; 21:2) but can order a person's steps (v. 24), turn a king's heart (21:1), and help the wronged repay evil (v. 22). Deceptive trade is an abomination to the Lord (vv. 10, 23), but righteousness and justice "is more acceptable than sacrifice" (21:3; cf. Hos 6:6; Mic 6:6–8). Like the Lord, the ideal king has dangerous power (20:2), sifts out the wicked (vv. 8, 26), and his reign is characterized by righteousness (v. 28).

Several other verses in ch. 20 concern business and finance (vv. 4, 10, 13, 16–17, 21, 23, 25).

20:5, "like deep water"—symbolizes the intentions and plans concealed deep within a person, accessible only to a wise person who knows how to fish the water (see 18:4).

20:10, "Diverse weights and measures"—see 11:1.

20:14, " 'Bad, bad,' says the buyer . . ."—a humorous glance at the marketplace. During the bargaining process a prospective buyer will question or deny the value of a product in order to drive down the price ("Bad, bad"). Then, once purchased, the buyer will boast to others about the product and his or her great bargain.

20:16, "pledge given as surety"—see 11:15.

20:20, "your lamp"—see 13:9.

20:23, "weights" and "false scales"—see 11:1.

20:25, "to say rashly, 'It is holy' "—to make a vow dedicating something to the Lord (e.g., a sacrifice [Lev 7:16; 22:18], person, animal, house, or land [Lev 27:1–27]). Once made, a vow could not be revoked (Num 30:2; Eccl 5:4; cf. Judg 11:29–40). A rash vow might derive from a dangerous situation (asking God to save) or out of great joy for God's intervention.

20:27, "The human spirit is the lamp of the LORD"—the "human spirit" (nishmath 'adam) is the life-breath by which God animates flesh (Gen 2:7, "the breath of life" [nishmath khayyim]). Since this life-breath enters deep within a person, it is a fitting figure for God's lamp that searches a person's inner motives and thoughts (see also 15:11; 16:2; 21:2).

Like ch. 20, ch. 21 highlights personal business or finances, especially misguided efforts to obtain wealth (hastiness [v. 5], deception [v. 6]) or character traits opposed to gaining and keeping wealth (laziness [v. 25], miserliness [v. 13], loving luxury [v. 17], quickly spending resources [v. 20]). This chapter also features the character and destiny of the wicked (rasha'). The wicked are utterly corrupt: their desires are evil (v. 10), they are brazen (v. 29), they covet all day long (v. 26), and their sacrifices are an abomination (v. 27; cf. vv. 8, 15, 24). Just retribution will come on the wicked (vv. 7, 12, 18, 28; cf. v. 16); they cannot prevail against the Lord (v. 30). But those who pursue righteousness will be rewarded (vv. 21, 23).

21:4, "the lamp of the wicked—are sin"—the meaning of this phrase in relation to 4a is uncertain. Elsewhere extinguishing the "lamp of the wicked" means death or a difficult life (13:9; 24:20; 20:20). Perhaps because of their arrogance (4a), even what should give light and direction to their lives is sin—corrupt and darkened (e.g., Matt 6:22–23). Or "lamp" may be a symbol for any endeavor (so in the NIV, NAB, NJPS). Because of their pride, anything the wicked undertake will be sinful.

21:9, 19, "a contentious wife"—see 12:4.

21:14, "a gift in secret" and a "concealed bribe"—see 17:8.

21:18, "The wicked is a ransom for the righteous"—enigmatic, perhaps best understood as a metaphor for the concept of just rewards: the wicked suffer, not the righteous. The righteous and upright are not perfect (Mark 10:18), but they do not walk on the path of the wicked (Prov 11:5; 15:9). In some sense (collectively?), the wicked and faithless are the ransom or payment (kofer, see 6:35; 13:8; Exod 21:29–32) that allow the righteous to go free (cf. Isa 43:3). Or in a broader view, justice is established by a reversal of positions—the righteous away from a place of suffering and the wicked toward punishment (see 10:2, 28; 11:8, 21; 12:21).

21:22, "one wise person"—one might question the wisdom of a lone sage attacking a fortified city (cf. Eccl 9:14–16), but the hyperbole establishes the key idea: wisdom is more powerful than brute strength (cf. 20:18; 24:5; Eccl 7:19).

Proverbs 22:1–6 concludes the collection that began in 10:1. These verses, like preceding chapters lack any evident structure. They do, however, continue the emphasis on wealth and business from chapters 20–21 with an unusual density of the terms 'osher ("riches," vv. 1, 4) and 'ashir ("rich," vv. 2, 7, 16; see similar ideas in vv. 9, 13).

22:6, "Train children in the right way"—like other proverbs, a statement of general truth, not an absolute guarantee or sweeping judgment of parents. Early and consistent training has lasting effects upon a child, for which parents (especially) are responsible (cf. 19:18; 23:13; 29:15; see also on 20:30). Children, however, are ultimately responsible for their own decisions and life (13:1; 15:5).

22:8, "rod of anger"—the Hebrew in line b is difficult and has led to various translations (e.g., NJPS, NAB). Rod (shevet) symbolizes rule or power (as in Isa 14:5–6); taken with line a the image is that of a cruel tyrant who rules unjustly and in anger.

22:17–24:22. The Sayings of the Sages (i)

After initial debate following its discovery in 1923, most scholars now recognize a close relationship between the Egyptian text of Amenemope and Proverbs 22:17–24:12. Israelite sages were likely familiar with, influenced by, and perhaps even made direct use of Amenemope. This section of Proverbs especially addresses young men from the upper class who are near the beginning of their careers on how to succeed or advance in their professions. The opening verses define such success as a pleasant life (22:18), living out trust in the Lord (22:19), and reliability and competence in one's work (22:21). To these ends, the sages offer cautions regarding common missteps taken to advance one's career (e.g., taking advantage of the powerless [22:22–23], risky financial practices [22:26–27], an unhealthy ambition for wealth [23:4–5], and losing self-control [23:19–21, 26–28]) and admonitions toward best practices for achievement (e.g., skill in one's work [22:29], listening to wise counsel [24:3–6], and faithful service to the Lord and king [24:21–22]).

22:20, "thirty sayings (shalishiwm)"—the Hebrew text is uncertain. Most translations and commentators adopt the emendation "thirty" (sheloshim) based on a similar statement in Amenemope, "Look to these thirty chapters. They inform, they educate." On this basis the NIV, GNB (TEV), and CEV not only adopt this emendation but also identify the thirty sayings by inserting headings into their translations, although each differs. Most interpreters identify only 24–28 sayings in the collection.

22:21, "to those who sent you?"—common language for a messenger who must convey his master's message, bring back an accurate reply, and perhaps even represent his master in any negotiations (see 10:26; 13:17; 25:13; 26:6).

22:22, "at the gate"—the place for public business and legal trials (see Deut 21:18–21; Ruth 4:1–12; cf. Prov 8:1–3, 24:7).

22:26, "pledges . . . surety"—see 11:15.

22:28, "Do not remove the ancient landmark"—ancient landmarks consisted of pillars or stones set out to mark property lines. To remove or move such a stone would be to encroach on and claim someone else's property, most likely individuals who are poor or cannot defend their rights (e.g., 1 Kgs 21:1–16; Isa 5:8). Chapter 23:10–11 repeats verse 28a and adds that God is the protector of those who are vulnerable (cf. 15:25). See also Deut 19:14; 27:17; Job 24:2.

23:7, "like a hair in the throat"—the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain. Most translations read the rare word (sha'ar) as a verb for "calculate, reckon" (e.g., NIV, NJPS, RSV). The NRSV follows the Greek and a similar passage from Amenemope (regarding a person who confiscates the property of a poor man, "it [is] a blocking to the throat; It makes a vomiting to the gullet") and renders (sha'ar) as a noun: a "hair" in the throat that causes a person to vomit (v. 8). As a whole, verses 6–8 warn against accepting an invitation from a begrudging or two-faced host.

23:10, "ancient landmark"—see 22:28.

23:13, "Do not withhold discipline"—see 13:24.

23:20, "winebibbers (sob'e-yayin)"—those who drink to excess. With the "gluttonous eaters of meat," these two groups symbolize extravagant and self-centered life-styles (see Deut 21:20 and Prov 21:17; on alcohol in Proverbs see 20:1; 23:29–35; 31:4–5).

23:29–35, "Who has woe?"—an extended lampoon of excessive drinking. An initial riddle of six questions (v. 29), leads to an answer (v. 30), a warning (v. 31), and then a vivid description of the "bite" of drunkenness (vv. 32–35). The text includes a full range of consequences for drunkenness: emotional ("sorrow," v. 29), relational ("strife," and "complaining," v. 29), mental (hallucinations, v. 33), and physical (red eyes, v. 29; the sensation of seasickness, v. 34; injuries without awareness or memory, v. 35a; and addiction, v. 35b).

24:7, "the gate"—see 22:22.

24:16, "fall seven times"—a symbolic number of completeness (6:31; 26:16, 25; Job 5:19). No matter how many times the righteous may fall, they will recover. The wicked, however, will not recover from even one calamity (v. 16).

24:17, "do not rejoice"—the sages advance a challenging ethic regarding a person's enemy. Instead of taking revenge (20:22; 24:29) a person is to help an enemy (25:21–22), and when misfortune befalls, one should not rejoice or gloat (Job 31:29; cf. Ps 35:13–15). Verse 18 is more difficult and may be read in at least three different ways: (1) God will stop punishing the enemy because of your reaction, (2) public celebration preempts the divine process of justice, or (3) the Lord is so repulsed by self-righteous gloating that he will turn away from the enemy to punish you.

24:20, "lamp of the wicked"—see 13:9.

24:21, "do not disobey either of them"—the text is uncertain. The NRSV reads with the Greek while most English translations follow the Hebrew ("and do not join with rebellious officials," NIV; cf. NAB, NJPS, NJB, NRSV margin). The underlying idea, however, is much the same for both translations: faithfulness to God and the king, God's earthly representative. The warning presupposes an ideal king who exercises justice and righteousness (see 27:23–27; 28:2–3, 15–16; 29:4, 14).

24:23–34. The Sayings of the Sages (ii)

The editorial heading, "These also are sayings of the wise," sets these verses apart as an appendix to the previous section (22:17–24:22, "The Words of the Wise"). The contents of this section fall into two parallel parts of three sections each: Part I—(a) the law court—admonition to judges for impartiality (24:23b–25), (b) a related proverb on honesty (24:26), (c) an admonition regarding diligent and timely work (24:27), and Part II—(a) the law court—admonition to witnesses for honesty (24:28), (b) a related proverb on vengeance (24:29), (c) a tale and admonition regarding diligent and timely work (24:30–34).

24:27, "after that build your house"—literally, prepare your fields before building a house; figuratively, acquire a means of support first and then build a family.

24:33–34, "A little sleep, a little slumber"—perhaps the lazy person's excuse: just a little more rest will not hurt anyone. Verse 34 responds: a little more sleep and poverty will attack you (cf. 6:10–11).

25:1–29:27. The Proverbs of Solomon (ii)

The superscription attributes the compilation of Prov 25–29 to scribes during the reign of King Hezekiah of Judah (ca. 715–687 BCE). The first half of the collection contains a number of thematically related verses (25:1–27:27) while the second half contrasts the righteous and the wicked (28:1–29:27).

The opening verse (25:2) establishes the first topic (the royal court) while vv. 3–15 address courtiers with advice for success. First, court ministers should be wary of overconfidence regarding their insight into the king's mind, just as a king should respect God's unsearchable wisdom (vv. 2–3). Second, wicked officials pollute the kingdom and must be removed to provide the purity of righteousness that establishes a king's reign (vv. 4–5). Third, self-advancing courtiers are put on notice; it is best to act humbly rather than claim a place of prestige only to be humiliated (vv. 6–7; Luke 14:7–11). Fourth, one should not be hasty to bring a matter to court (royal or civil, vv. 7c–8) or betray a confidence in order to win a case (vv. 9–10). Like claiming a place of prestige, such unethical actions lead to shame, not advancement. Fifth, a good decision or rebuke ("a word fitly spoken") and a receptive attitude ("a listening ear") are both highly valued (vv. 11–12). Sixth, a faithful servant is refreshing and life-giving (v. 13), but an unreliable person who makes empty promises only disappoints (v. 14). Finally, words are powerful, especially patient and gentle speech that may change a superior's mind (v. 15).

The rest of the chapter is loosely based on the ideas of friendship (vv. 16–22) and appropriateness or self-control (vv. 16–17, 20, 27–28).

25:20, "one who sings songs"—the NRSV reconstructs the Hebrew from the Greek. A person who sings cheerful songs, as opposed to laments, to someone overwhelmed by grief inappropriately disregards the impact of sorrow on the human heart.

25:21–22, "heap coals of fire"—a person should provide for the needs of an enemy in order to bring about the enemy's contrition or perhaps add to their punishment (vv. 21–22). The phrase "heap burning coals on their heads" is obscure. Many interpreters follow Augustine and Jerome who claim the action helps the enemy by softening his heart or pricking his conscience. More recent work has suggested an Egyptian ritual of placing coals in a bowl on one's head in order to represent burning shame and penitence. On the other hand, in the Old Testament fire upon the head typically denotes punishment (Pss 18:12; 120:4; 140:10; Ezek 10:2; 2 Sam 22:13).

25:27, "to seek honor on top of honor"—the Hebrew of v. 27b is unintelligible and requires emendation. In the NRSV, line a describes moderation in one's appetite for a good thing (honey). Assuming synonymous parallelism, line b identifies another good ("honor") that should also be pursued in moderation, if at all (cf. 27:2).

Three themes about fools are interwoven throughout 26:1–12. First, the true character of a fool is like a reluctant horse or stubborn donkey (v. 3), unreliable in the completion of any assignment (vv. 6, 10). Fools proudly think that they know everything ("wise in their own eyes," vv. 5, 12), although they do not learn from their mistakes (v. 11), are unable to deploy a proverb properly (vv. 7, 9), and speak ineffective curses (because the curses are undeserved, v. 2). Second, because of their character, fools are a danger to the community. Their unreliability will hurt the one who hires them (v. 6), and the employed fool will endanger the public (v. 10). A fool is not only inept with proverbial wisdom (v. 7) but apt to hurt others by his or her use of proverbs (v. 9). Third, the collection offers guidelines for how a community should deal with fools. Honor for a fool is out of place (v. 1); it will only expose the community to further harm (v. 8). A person should not employ a fool (v. 6, 10) and should be careful when and how he or she interacts with fools. Sometimes it is best not to answer a fool, lest one be drawn into acting like a fool (v. 4). But other circumstances require a response that will deflate a fool's pride (v. 5).

Verses 13–16 use hyperbole to ridicule the lazy person or " sluggard" (KJV). Such a person makes ridiculous excuses to avoid activity (v. 13), stays in bed so long that he or she is like a hinged door turning back and forth (v. 14), and lacks even the energy to put food into his or her mouth (v. 15). And while the lazy person thinks that he or she is wiser than anyone else (v. 16), in truth one who is so wise "in self-esteem" (literally, "wise in his own eyes") is really a fool (cf. 25:6, 12).

The remainder of ch. 26 consists of two interlocking themes: quarrelsomeness and speech. Persons who meddle in other's quarrels (v. 17) or who mislead a neighbor (and claim innocent intentions, vv. 18–19) are both acting like lunatics. Quarrels would die out if only people would stop "whispering" about matters that are none of their business (v. 20). A quarrelsome person, however, keeps trouble stirred up (v. 21). One particular challenge is that a whisperer's words taste good (v. 22). A listener would be wise to remember, however, that such smooth speech covers an evil heart (v. 23) and disguises deceitful intentions (v. 24). So, one should exercise care when an enemy has kind things to say; most likely, he or she is hiding perfect ("seven") hatred (v. 25). Such duplicity will eventually come to light. Those who lay a trap (e.g., deceive) or start a stone rolling (e.g., a rumor) will be caught by what they started (v. 27). Lies and flattery are not innocent or harmless but destroy both the victim and the oppressor (v. 28).

Chapter 27:1–10 consists of proverbs, often in pairs, without any clear overarching theme.

27:10, "do not go to the house of your kindred"—the proverb assumes that one's family ("kindred") is far away. In such a case it is vital not to forsake personal or family friends who are nearby (v. 10a). Then when calamity comes one can seek support from these friends who are nearby (v. 10c) and not a relative who is far away (v. 10b). See also 17:17; 18:24.

Reminiscent of chs. 1–9, in 27:11–22 the parent urges the child to accept wisdom (v. 11) so that the child may see the danger in what might otherwise appear to be harmless practices (v. 12). For example, persons who secure a loan for a stranger do not see the jeopardy in which they have placed themselves (v. 13). Nor does a person who rises early and speaks loud greetings ("blesses") realize that his or her action will not be appreciated (v. 14). Verses 15–16 warn the child against the danger of marrying a contentious spouse (see 12:4). On a more positive note, the parent reminds the child of the value of friendships that make a person better (v. 17) and the honor of reliable service to a superior (v. 18). The parent also provides insight into human nature. The expression on someone's face reflects the inner person ("one human heart reflects another," v. 19), and the human desire to see or experience is never satisfied (v. 20). Finally, a most telling test of character is how a person responds to praise (v. 21). However, no test or manner of correction will drive folly out of a fool (v. 22).

At first glance, 27:23–27 appears to address shepherds. Inclusion of v. 24, however, and its reference to "a crown" that does not last forever indicates that the agricultural language is being used of a king or courtier. Thus, these verses remind leaders to be attentive to the needs and condition of their people (v. 23) and the profit that comes from a well-tended populace (vv. 25–27).

Chapters 28 and 29 are given shape by several proverbs that contrast the righteous and the wicked (28:1, 12, 28; 29:2, 16, 27). The first of these proverbs compares the insecurity of the wicked with the confidence of the righteous (28:1). Recurrence of key ideas in vv. 2–11 may explain how the righteous come to have such confidence. They listen (v. 9), obey (v. 7), and do not forsake instruction (v. 4). They recognize the greater value of being blameless rather than being wealthy (vv. 6, 11). Unlike evildoers, they are discerning or understanding (vv. 2, 7, 11) and knowledgeable (v. 2). And their treatment of the poor provides evidence of their attention to instruction. They do not oppress the poor to enrich themselves (vv. 3, 8).

The next unit (28:12–28) continues to contrast the righteous and wicked (vv. 12, 28) and develops the theme of wealth and poverty. Those who truly prosper are those who confess rather than conceal their sin (vv. 13–14), hate illegitimate profit rather than charging ruthlessly over the helpless (vv. 15–16), are blameless (v. 18), trust in the Lord rather than self (vv. 25–26), and give to the poor rather than neglecting their needs (v. 27). Several verses further contrast appropriate and effective means of acquiring wealth against ineffectual and unethical methods. On the one hand, a person who works hard (v. 19), is reliable (v. 20), has the courage to speak an honest rebuke (v. 23), trusts the Lord (25), and is generous to the poor (v. 27) will gain an abundance of food, blessing, and favor. On the other hand, those who are eager to get rich (vv. 20, 22), chase pipe dreams (v. 19), show favoritism (v. 21), are stingy (vv. 22, 27), speak only what others want to hear (v. 23), take advantage of parents for monetary gain (v. 24), and are greedy (v. 25) should expect nothing but poverty (vv. 19, 22), punishment (v. 20), and disfavor or curses (v. 27). Ultimately, it is those who trust the Lord and walk in wisdom who truly prosper (vv. 25–26).

Chapter 29:1–14 draws special attention to the contrast between what happens when the wicked are in power and when the righteous thrive (vv. 2, 16). When the wicked rule, people suffer (v. 2) because wealth is squandered (v. 3), extortion or bribery tears down the country (v. 4, NIV), concern for the poor is lacking (v. 7), mockers keep cities in an uproar (v. 8), the bloodthirsty seek to kill the upright (v. 10), and lies corrupt the government (v. 12). But when the righteous thrive, people rejoice because justice gives a country stability (v. 4), evildoers are caught by their own actions (v. 6), wisdom calms cities (v. 8) and settles the rage of fools (v. 11), and justice for the poor becomes a priority that secures the kingdom (vv. 7, 14).

The last unit of ch. 29 distinguishes between the discipline associated with righteous behavior and the consequences of the failure to administer or respond to correction (29:15–27). Accepted with humility, discipline imparts wisdom (v. 15), peace (v. 17), blessing (v. 18), and honor (v. 23). But failure to correct or a refusal to listen to instruction leads to disgrace for parents (v. 15), a lack of restraint (v. 18), insolence or disrespect (v. 21), and disgrace (v. 23).

30:1–33. The Sayings of Agur

This chapter consists of an introduction (vv. 1b–6) and conclusion (vv. 32–33), three short sayings or proverbs (vv. 10, 17, 20), three numerical sayings (vv. 7–9, 15a, 24–28), a list without numbering (vv. 11–14), and four graduated numerical sayings ($x/x+1$; vv. 15b–16, 18–19, 21–23, 29–31). At times, the final item of a numerical list is the climax or key point of the saying (e.g., vv. 18–19, vv. 29–31); at other times the enumeration is for rhetorical effect—to build tension or attention (cf., 6:16–19; Amos 1:3–2:4).

30:1, "Agur son of Jakeh. An oracle."—The term hammassa' ("An oracle," NRSV) better designates Agur as a non-Israelite from "Massa" (RSV, NJPS, NJB, NAB), a people of North Arabia (cf. Gen 25:13–14; 1 Chr 1:29–30). Nothing else is known about this sage.

30:1–6, "The words of Agur, son of Jakeh"—with the exception of this phrase, the Hebrew of v. 1 is so difficult that commentators question the text and/or meaning of almost every word. As a result, major English translations differ significantly (cf. NRSV, NIV, NJPS, NAB, NJB, RSV). The best solution is to read v. 1 in light of the context of vv. 2–6. Agur confesses his inability to acquire genuine wisdom (vv. 2–3). He then turns to a series of rhetorical questions (cf. Job 38–39) with the only possible answer: God. God alone is the all-powerful creator (v. 4). Finally, Agur directly asserts the reliability of God's word (vv. 5–6). In view of this context, it seems best to read 1bc with the NRSV ("I am weary, O God") or NAB ("I am not God"). As a human, Agur's efforts to gain perfect wisdom only weary him.

30:23, "an unloved woman"—literally "a hated woman" (shenu'ah). The term may denote an older unmarried woman who unexpectedly marries (NRSV), or perhaps a second, unfavored wife of a polygamous home who suddenly comes to rule the house (cf. Deut 21:15–17; 1 Sam 1:1–2:10).

30:23, "a maid when she succeeds (tirash) her mistress"—the verb has two possible meanings: (1) to inherit (NJB) or succeed (NRSV) after the death of the mistress, or (2) to displace (NIV, NAB) or supplant (NJPS) her position in the house (e.g., Hagar and Sarah, Gen 16; 21). While either scenario is an unexpected social reversal, the second is more shocking, and thus, may be preferred here.

30:31, "the strutting rooster . . . and a king striding"—the Hebrew of v. 31 is unintelligible. In line a most translations adopt "strutting rooster" from ancient translations and for line b rely on the Greek ("he harangues his people," cf. NJB) or work from the context ("a mighty lion," 31a) and emend the text to read: "striding before his people" (NRSV, cf. NAB).

31:1–9. The Sayings of Lemuel

This short instruction not only comes from a non-Israelite (on "oracle" or "Massa" see 30:1), but from a woman, King Lemuel's mother, the only instruction from a woman—extant in the ancient Near East. The text consists of two warnings and two commands; it begins with warnings about sex (vv. 2–3) and alcohol (vv. 4–5). Lemuel's mother is not clear how women might destroy the king's reign (v. 3), perhaps by his own obsession with sex or manipulation by his harem. She is clear, however, about the detrimental effects of alcohol on the king's exercise of justice (vv. 4–5).

The commands correspond to the warning about alcohol. While the king should not drink to excess, he should give alcohol to those in bitter distress so that they might have relief, albeit temporary (vv. 6–7). Such advice would be cynical if not for the second command with its proactive stance on behalf of the destitute (vv. 8–9). Together these commands administer both a short-term immediate relief and a long-term solution that gets to the root of the problem—injustice. The king's power should not be for the unrestrained pursuit of luxury but for action on behalf of the unfortunate (cf. 31:20; 28:3, 15; 29:7, 14).

IV. Epilogue: Woman Wisdom as Wife (31:10–31)

An acrostic in Hebrew, starting with 'aleph each verse begins with the next consonant of the alphabet (with sin and shin taken as one letter); the poem describes either an ideal woman or wife (so the NRSV heading "Ode to the Capable Wife") or returns the reader to the concept of Woman Wisdom from chs. 1–9 (or perhaps has both meanings in mind).

As an ideal wife, this woman is a hard worker (vv. 15, 18, 19, 27), an expert in domestic management (vv. 13–15, 21–22, 27) and commercial enterprise (vv. 16, 24), of great monetary and social benefit to her husband (vv. 11, 23), and is a wise woman who has a proper relationship to the Lord (vv. 26, 30). Her husband should acknowledge her value and is ordered to give her a share of her own profits (vv. 10, 31).

The lack of advice to women in chs. 10–31 and the rather unrealistic portrait of this woman (e.g., when does she sleep?) has led a number of commentators to identify this figure as Woman Wisdom. Many similarities exist: both Woman Wisdom and the woman of Prov 31 are more precious than jewels (3:14–15; 8:11, 19: cf. 31:10b); both provide security (1:33; cf. 31:21, 25), riches, and honor (3:16; 8:18, 21; cf. 31:11b, 13–14, 16, 23–24); and both open their mouths with wisdom (1:20; 8:1; cf. 31:26). Woman Wisdom promises that those who keep her ways will be happy (8:32) and in Prov 31 the sons of the woman call her happy (v. 28). Finally, wisdom is the fear of the Lord (1:7; 9:10) and the woman of Proverbs 31 fears the Lord (v. 10). In Prov 1–9, Wisdom appeared as a young woman seeking relationship with young men, even marriage (4:5–6). In Prov 10–31, the sages explored what life with wisdom would look like. Now, Proverbs concludes with a description of the immense benefits that derive from having an intimate marital relationship with Woman Wisdom. Such a person "will have no lack of gain" (31:11b).

ECCLESIASTES

KATHERINE J. DELL

OVERVIEW

The book of Ecclesiastes takes its name from the Greek (LXX) translation of the Hebrew Qoheleth ("one who assembles"). The designation of Qoheleth in English is traditionally Preacher, but in the NRSV (1:1) we find Teacher. The book is, along with the other wisdom books (Proverbs, Job) a part of the Writings. Like Proverbs, it is attributed to Solomon. However, its language and style suggest a post-exilic origin (third century BCE is most likely, although some scholars date it to the fifth century). Like other wisdom literature, it has a timeless quality and is concerned with human experience rather than containing any reference to Israelite history. However, the persona of Solomon is an inspiration for the book, as indicated by the royal testament in 1:12–2:26. The book is basically the work of one author, although the epilogue in 12:9–14 may be added or even be a later reflection by the same author. Although Ecclesiastes' roots lie in the wisdom literature of the Old Testament, it offers a distinctive message and represents a significant development away from the optimism of Proverbs. It breaks away from belief in life's certainties and in the principle of just reward and punishment to express profound doubt and to question any principle of fairness in life. The frequent catchword hebel, vanity (e.g., 1:14) gives the book a pessimistic air. However there are moments of optimism—or at least realism—that create a positive/negative tension in the book. Like other wisdom books, God is portrayed as the creator and orderer of human life, and yet the author doubts whether human beings can truly apprehend that order. He sees wisdom's limitations; he notes the fleetingness and yet the value of enjoyment, the reality of hard work, and the repetitiveness of experience; he is preoccupied with the transience of life and of death as the final leveller of rich and poor, righteous and wicked alike; and he is well aware of life's ambiguities.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Introduction (1:1–11)

"The Teacher" (Eccl 1:1), thought to be the proper name of the author, is described as the son of David and king in Jerusalem, by inference Solomon, who succeeded to the throne of the united kingdom (1 Kgs 2:12). He was also famed for his wisdom (1 Kgs 3; 4:29–34). It seems here that the author is deliberately taking on the persona of Solomon—as becomes apparent in 1:12–2:8—perhaps to show that he, Qoheleth, stood within the venerated tradition of wisdom. The pessimistic tone of the book is set in v. 2 with the opening phrase, "Vanity of vanities." This phrase and its variant, "All is vanity," are repeated approximately 50 times throughout the book. The Hebrew hebel is usually translated vanity (as NRSV), although futility and worthlessness are possible. The word signifies something insubstantial that is fleeting or fruitless. Qoheleth's first question (v. 3) is about human toil and what people gain from it. He infers that human toil is fruitless. The author then (vv. 4–7) comments on cycles of natural phenomena. This may mean, from the perspective of v. 3, that toilers come and go while the earth remains forever. These verses are not necessarily negative; they are simply a comment on known observations of the time. On a flat earth the sun appears to rise and disappear with nowhere to go until rising again; winds blow around on known circuits, and there is a similar cycle of rain causing streams to flow into the sea; and, since the sea is not full, the cycle must somehow go around. The cycle of human life with each generation succeeding another is a similar cycle, but changing generations contrast with the seeming permanence of the earth. In v. 8 Qoheleth seems to explore a new line of thought—that everything is wearisome. The human eye and ear are never satisfied—human beings want to see and hear new things and may think they are doing so—and yet in fact the human race has seen everything before. One has the sense here of an aged man who sees patterns being repeated. This is a variation on the idea of cycles—everything comes around again. According to v. 9 the past repeats itself in the future, and what appears new is not so in reality. In v. 10 he explores the irony of people thinking something is new and not remembering that it has gone before. The people of long ago (v. 11) are not remembered and their deeds with them, and this pattern will repeat itself in the future. People make the same mistakes over and over again and do not learn from history or their predecessors.

II. The Solomonic Experiment (1:12–2:6)

A. The Quest for Wisdom (1:12–18)

The function of a Solomonic persona is made clear. Verse 12 restates v. 1; this Qoheleth was king over Israel in Jerusalem. Qoheleth is putting himself into the role of the wise king Solomon in order to provide an experiment concerning the quest for wisdom. Wisdom is meant to be the key to understanding all that is done under heaven, but Qoheleth relativizes this statement when he describes it as an unhappy business designed by God to keep humans busy (v. 13). Qoheleth has observed others and has claimed to have seen all the deeds that are done under the sun and declared them vanity. In v. 15, Qoheleth apparently quotes a proverb, which he then relativizes. Straightening out what is crooked and numbering nothing are both impossible and, in like manner, so is his task here. The autobiographical tone resumes (v. 16)—this author, as did Solomon, acquired great wisdom and knowledge, and yet that led him to know its opposites, madness and folly. Verse 18 also looks like a quotation from the tradition, or one made up by Qoheleth to express his sentiments about the futility of seeking wisdom.

B. Solomon's Test of Pleasure (2:1–11)

The Solomonic guise continues with "a test of pleasure." He tries enjoying himself, but laughter is deemed mad and pleasure useless (v. 2). He drinks wine—for his body not his mind—trying to lay hold on folly, to see if there is any pleasure in it (v. 3). He constructs "great works" (vv. 4–6). He builds houses, vineyards, gardens, and parks full of trees. The text gives the impression of great riches, not just his property, but in his descriptions of fruit trees and his possession of slaves and herds (the markers of wealth in those days) as well as silver and gold (v. 8a). Singers and concubines (cf. Solomon's concubines in 1 Kgs 11:3) are also part of the attempt to gain satisfaction (v. 8b)—he tries entertainment, both spiritual and physical. The king's greatness was unsurpassed, his wisdom was intact, and every desire was fulfilled (vv. 9–10). He even found pleasure in all his toil. This passage is mainly positive until v. 11, which provides the relativizing statement that the toil was indeed vanity and led to no real gain under the sun.

C. The Vanity of It All (2:12–26)

The Solomonic persona continues his reflection about wisdom, madness, and folly. This is an unusual juxtaposition; normally wisdom and folly stand in opposition to one another. He resumes the theme of nothing being new—the king's successor will only do what has already been done (v. 12). He cites what appears to be a traditional proverb (v. 14) on wisdom being as preferable to folly as light to darkness. However, death relativizes everything, so what is the point of having been so very wise (v. 15)? For this author, since death is the ultimate fate, everything in human life, including all striving and toil, is rendered ultimately pointless. What distinguishes a wise man from a fool when both are dead? Neither is remembered after death (v. 16). With the inevitability of death in mind, Qoheleth says that he hated life (v. 17). There is not even a legacy of wisdom from one generation to another, for the one who follows the wise person may be a fool (vv. 18–20). He thinks specifically in terms of inheritance, the result of all his toil, which may well go to a fool who did not toil for it (v. 21). All the pain, vexation, and sleeplessness are for nothing (v. 23). There is a slight mood change (v. 24) when the author has one of his moments of optimism, celebrating eating and drinking and finding enjoyment in one's toil. This is God-given. This is the first reference to God, perhaps suggesting that God gives a person a reason to live after all—for apart from him who can eat or who can have enjoyment (v. 25)? Verse 26, another quotation from the wisdom tradition that is relativized in v. 26a, states the traditional doctrine of retribution, that to one who pleases him God will give wisdom and all good things, while, ironically, the one who displeases him will serve the very one who pleases him.

III. The Poem on Time (3:1–8)

This poem, with an almost liturgical use of repetition, illustrates Qoheleth's views on the cyclical nature of time. Human beings live out their lives according to fixed times. This poem celebrates the diversity of human life and activity. However, humans are not in control of their own destiny. These expressions of time occur mainly as opposites, such as a time for breaking down and a time for building up (v. 3). The formulations are general, as is usual in poetry—the poem does not report what is being broken down or built up. Some of the references are obscure, e.g., a time to throw away stones, and a time to gather stones together. Does this refer to demolition and rebuilding, or is it a metaphor for keeping and throwing away as in v. 6? The pair may derive from an agricultural context, i.e., clearing out stones from a field. Verse 7b, a time to keep silence and a time to speak recalls the emphasis on communication found in Proverbs (e.g., Prov 10:14, 19).

IV. Musings on God (3:9–22)

Verse 9 echoes an earlier refrain (1:3) about the point of toil. In v. 10 the "business" described echoes 1:13, typical of repetition in this short book. Qoheleth seems to provide commentary on the poem about time—God has made everything suitable for its time (v. 11). Still, though human beings have a sense of past and future, their knowledge of God's actions from the beginning to the end of time is beyond human grasp. Qoheleth returns to the thought of enjoyment being God's gift (vv. 12–13, cf. 2:24–5) and wonders at God's works (v. 14). The permanence of God's actions stands in contrast with human transience. Qoheleth then returns (v. 15) to a cyclical view of human life, and yet here with the idea that God seeks out what has gone by, i.e., what has been forgotten. The final section of ch. 3 concerns justice. Even in a pure place—that of justice—wickedness exists (v. 16). He is probably thinking of the corruption of courts. Qoheleth knows the traditional formulation that God rewards the righteous and punishes the wicked in their due time (v. 17). He then makes a comparison between human beings and animals—their fate is the same—as one dies, so dies the other (v. 19). There appears to be no difference. Does one even know if the human spirit will rise and that of the animal descend (v. 21)? One wonders whether Qoheleth's purpose here is to downgrade human beings or whether he has a particularly high view of animals. Qoheleth concludes with the idea that all should enjoy their work—a positive note rather than the previous negative idea that toil is meaningless (cf. 2:22–3).

V. Musings on Human Activity (4:1–6:12)

A. Society, Toil, and Friendship (4:1–16)

The author airs his ideas on all kinds of human activity. He sees oppression of the weak by the powerful and concludes that those already dead are more fortunate than the living (v. 2). It is even better not to have been born at all so as never to have seen all the evil deeds that are done under the sun (v. 3). This is a moment of particular despair—this author's moods swing from one extreme to another, and in the context of oppression here he commends non-existence (cf. Job 3). This chapter contains a number of separate proverbs, probably quotations of traditional wisdom sayings. He notes that envy of another person is often a strong motivation for working (v. 4)—an apt comment on human nature but regarded by him as vanity (v. 4). Verse 5 is a proverb about the dangers of laziness (cf. Prov 19:15, 24)—fools are so lazy they metaphorically eat their own flesh rather than going out to gather food. Verse 6 is a proverb that recommends peace and quiet over toil. These two proverbs contradict one another and create a tension, in this case the truth that work is a necessity but moderation is best and doing no work leads ultimately to ruin. Qoheleth enjoys reflecting about particular cases, e.g., persons with no siblings or descendants (vv. 7–8). Their motivation for toil is personal riches, but they deprive themselves of pleasure in their life and will have no one to whom to pass on this gain. Qoheleth understands this as vanity and an unhappy business (v. 8). This comment contradicts Qoheleth's view that there is no point in toiling since a person will not enjoy the fruits of labor after death (2:21). Verses 9–12 contain a final musing on toil in the context of friendship. Qoheleth decides that two is better than one (this follows on from consideration of the loner in verses 7–8). With two, one can lift up and help the other (v. 10); two can keep each other warm (v. 11); and two are stronger against an enemy (v. 12). The image of a threefold cord in verse 12b reinforces the point—the thicker the cord, the stronger it is. Verses 13–16 contain another test case; this time a poor but wise youth is compared with an old but foolish king. Qoheleth infers that in time the wise youth becomes the foolish king despite the initial hope in the youth—everything comes around.

B. Proper Reverence, Money Matters, and Ultimate Contentment (5:1–20)

Qoheleth turns his attention to Temple life and warns that a cautious listening is better than rushing in with a sacrifice as fools do (v. 1), for they do not know how to keep from doing evil. As in the prophets (e.g., Amos 4:4–5) right living is more important than the offering of sacrifice. Qoheleth gives a different reason for speaking carefully chosen words than does traditional wisdom (cf. Prov 10:19). He draws a sharp contrast between God in his heaven and humans upon earth, expressing his sense of the otherness of God before whom few words should be spoken. The importance of actually fulfilling vows to God is pursued in vv. 4–6. Words and dreams seem to be associated in vv. 3 and 7—he is clearly against too much daydreaming. Dreams probably come from people's own imaginations—better to fear God (v. 7). Verse 8 provides another test case—the author describes injustice and is not surprised to see corruption at the highest level. Verse 9 quotes a proverb that seems to advocate the presence of a king, the highest power in the land. His theme then changes to money, appearing again to cite proverbial wisdom. Money does not ultimately satisfy; it is vanity (v. 10). Verse 11 states the point that increased wealth never goes as far as expected—the cost of acquiring it has to be offset against the gain from it. Increased wealth brings anxiety (v. 12). An ordinary laborer does not have such worries—he sleeps peaceably while the surfeit of the rich will not let them sleep. Another test case appears in vv. 13–17—that of parents who lose all their money and have nothing to pass on—as they came from their mother's womb, so they shall go again (v. 15). Qoheleth disapproves since it makes a mockery of all the work they have done and causes them much vexation (v. 17). In the final verses of ch. 5, Qoheleth summarizes his view that eating, drinking, and enjoying one's work are keys to contentment in human life (v. 18). Money is a gift of God (v. 19), if one is able to enjoy it and not look to it for ultimate satisfaction.

C. The Futility of Life Without Enjoyment (6:1–12)

Qoheleth is concerned about evil in the world, again using test cases to make his points. He starts (v. 2) with the wealthy person who has everything, but is unable to enjoy it all. He is concerned that a stranger enjoys them, perhaps after the person's death. His next thought is of someone who has had many descendants and a long life—again if it has not been an enjoyable life, it was not worth living. The absence of a burial (v. 3) may indicate a convicted criminal or simply that at death some people are not honored. Better is a stillborn child who has not seen the sun or known anything (vv. 3–4). Life is about enjoyment, and death is the fate of all (v. 6). In v. 7–9 he airs a few of life's ironies; e.g., in v. 7, humans toil for food but the appetite is never satisfied. This could be a metaphor for never being satisfied with enough money. Qoheleth's cyclical view of life seems to reappear in v. 10; whatever has come to be has already been named. Presumably this means named by God. In v. 11 he seems to tire of words and wonders how anyone knows what is good for mortals in their short lives (v. 12). The inference is perhaps that God does know, but humans do not. The phrase "like a shadow" (v. 12) indicates that human beings are dim figures to be likened to shadows that are fleeting and impermanent.

VI. Observation and Advice (7:1–9:18)

A. Facing Human Limitations (7:1–14)

This chapter opens with a string of proverbs. Qoheleth nevertheless puts them in a new framework and relativizes traditional wisdom ideas. His choice of proverbs is a pessimistic one, favouring reputation over precious items, death over birth (v. 1), and mourning over feasting, all in the light of death (v. 2). Awareness of death colors his approach to life so that he commends sorrow and sadness rather than excessive laughter—the heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth (v. 4). A number of proverbs warn against fools and their song (v. 5) and laughter (v. 6). Traditional wisdom themes continue: human beings are easily corrupted (v. 7); patience is better than pride (v. 8); beware of anger (v. 9); don't spend your time looking back (v. 10). In a moment of optimism, he moves on to praise wisdom over all things (vv. 11–12)—it protects and ultimately gives life. All things are the work of God, both good and bad; and human beings cannot change anything (vv. 13–14).

B. Testing by Wisdom (7:15–29)

Qoheleth continues his commentary on different types of people, following the traditional wisdom distinction between the righteous and the wicked (v. 15). However, he advises not being over-righteous or its opposite. Humans live in a tension between opposites, and the fear of God is at the heart of it all (v. 18). Wisdom gives strength (v. 19), but no one is so righteous as to have never sinned (v. 20). Furthermore one should make allowances to people who may talk about you behind your back—your heart knows that many times you have yourself cursed others (v. 22). Wisdom is not easily attainable (vv. 23–25, 27). In v. 26 he echoes Proverbs 6:20–7:27 in his description of a woman who ensnares men. Qoheleth claims that he has found one man among a thousand, but not a woman. It is not clear whether he means a righteous man or woman or something else. Could this be an echo of Solomon and his thousand women as mentioned in 1 Kgs 11:3? If so, it is more of a warning to men about their attitude to women.

C. King and God (8:1–17)

Qoheleth begins by extolling wisdom (v. 1). He then moves (vv. 2–5) to consider the king (cf. Prov 15). He is aware of the immense and unchallengeable power that the king wields. The wise person will need to steer a careful path with the king as in all life. Verse 6 echoes the poem on time. Human lack of power in general receives comment—humans cannot tell the future (unlike God is the inference) (v. 7), nor can they control elements, the timing of events, or indeed effect deliverance (v. 8). Qoheleth muses on the enigma that, almost inevitably, one person's authority leads to another's hurt (v. 9). He goes on to talk about the wicked and their dissembling (v. 10) and regrets that the human heart is fully set to do evil (v. 11). His view of human nature is pessimistic. Yet, unlike the wicked, those who fear God will have nothing to fear (v. 13). Another irony is that righteousness is sometimes mistaken for wickedness and vice versa. He repeats his injunction to enjoy life in (v. 15). Verses 16–17 express the thought that only God knows his work, and humans will continue to seek but never find it (cf. Job 28).

D. Life and Death (9:1–18)

Qoheleth sees the usual categories of righteous and wise people, and he notes that only God knows what is truly in their hearts. Human beings, whether righteous or wicked, suffer the same fate. This irony of life makes one question the worth of good behavior. However, Qoheleth ultimately decides that life is better than death. The living know that they will die, unlike the dead who know nothing, have no reward, and of whom no memory lasts (vv. 5–6). Qoheleth is more positive concerning joy in life (v. 7). He elaborates on the wearing of white garments, a sign of joy since white was reserved for special festive occasions, and on enjoying one's wife (v. 9). He mentions Sheol (v. 10), the place of the dead; there will be no work to do there. He airs the thought (v. 11) that while human beings would like there to be certainties (e.g., the fastest person wins the race), it is not always so. Time and chance happen to all. Disaster can strike quickly, like a net for a fish or like birds caught in a snare (v. 12). The final part of ch. 9 contains a story of a poor wise man who saved the city by his wisdom, and yet he was not remembered. So, though wisdom is better than might, since this man was not heeded it puts a different gloss on wisdom's value. The chapter ends with several traditional proverbs on the importance of quiet words by the wise rather than shouting from a ruler and on wisdom's worth over weapons of war (v. 18).

VII. Miscellaneous Sayings (10:1–20)

This collection of maxims is akin to that found in Proverbs. The author may have borrowed some and created others. Much of it reads like traditional wisdom, but Qoheleth juxtaposes proverbs in order to highlight contradictions, unafraid to add his own comment. There is much preoccupation with wisdom and folly (vv. 1–3). Verse 4 highlights the anger of rulers—power is dangerous and it is better to sit tight and let the anger pass. In v. 5 Qoheleth bewails the apparent disorder of society's hierarchy—folly sits in many high places, and the rich sit in a low place. Living life is a dangerous exercise (vv. 8–9); even physical exercise has its risks. Blunt tools need more strength (v. 10). Such sayings are truisms about life. Concern about communication returns (vv. 12–14) with a depiction of fools who talk on and on. Qoheleth enjoys painting a picture of the unwitting fool (v. 15). Verses 16–17 concern the relationship of king to land—the proper hierarchy is the right order of things. Verse 18 condemns sloth, a common proverbial theme (e.g., Prov 10:26). Verse 19 speaks of the need for gladness and makes a positive statement about money as necessary. The danger of speaking out against people—especially the king—is aired in v. 20. It is surprising how words carry!

VIII. The Mystery of Life (11:1–10)

The chapter opens with a short series of proverbs. The first two (vv. 1–2) concern keeping options open—send out your bread upon the waters is probably a metaphor for spreading the risk, as in dividing one's means. The second two (vv. 3–4) are about the ways of nature, including tips about farming—clouds spilling their rain, trees falling, not sowing on a windy day, and not reaping when rain is due. Qoheleth wonders (v. 5) at the mystery of life given to an unborn child—a mystery at that time and likened to the mysterious purposes of God. Spreading risk comes back as a theme in an agricultural context (v. 6). In v. 7, Qoheleth observes that it is pleasant for the eyes to see the sun, which stands in contrast with the long years of darkness when dead. The commendation of enjoyment is reiterated. A note of judgment is also sounded—youth should not be irresponsible. He decides (v. 10) that youth is a vanity after all—he also advises not worrying and ignoring pain.

IX. The Poem on Old Age (12:1–8)

In contrast to youth, the author now turns to figurative descriptions of old age. Human life is on an inevitable cycle from youth to old age to death. The trembling guards of the house (v. 3) symbolize shaking limbs; the strong men bent reflect the stooped posture of some aged people. The women who grind may refer to teeth that fall out. Seeing dimly may well be a reference to the eyes dimming with age. Verse 4 probably alludes to the dead of night when elderly people are often awake, their need for sleep diminished. The daughters of song (v. 4) may refer to what one can no longer hear. Verse 5 concerns being more fearful when older. The almond tree blossoming may refer to the hair going white, as the almond tree does when it flowers. The image of a grasshopper dragging itself along indicates weak legs, perhaps painful movement or a broken limb, or it may indicate overeating (which is the only time a grasshopper appears to drag itself along). Sexual desire fades too; ultimately death is in store. Images of brokenness (v. 6) describe the descent to death (cords, bowls, pitchers, and wheels, which can all be broken). The silver cord and golden bowl (possibly an oil lamp suspended by a cord) may indicate former glory and riches, its recipient brought low by sickness and finally death. In v. 7 a distinction is made between the dust and the breath, an interesting dualism, atypical of the Hebrew Bible. The dust represents the body and the breath returns to God. Qoheleth concludes the chapter with his usual refrain about life as vanity.

X. The Epilogue (12:9–13)

Beginning in v. 9 Qoheleth is no longer speaking, but is spoken of in the third person. Qoheleth is described as not only wise but as having taught many things. He took care over the words he used and wrote words of truth plainly. He may have taught in a school; he was an educator and steeped in the wisdom tradition. However, he was not afraid to question the essential elements in that tradition. In v. 11 wise sayings are praised as fixed points and derive from "one shepherd," a phrase that may refer to God. The work ends on a note of there being too many books written and study itself being a weariness of the flesh (v. 12). There is also a pious note—fear God and keep his commandments, cf. 3:14. The author sees God as holding the key to all understanding and being in a position to judge every deed (v. 14). Trusting in God is thus good, pragmatic advice, as has been the character of this short, yet profound book.

SONG OF SONGS

FRED W. DOBBS-ALLSOPP

OVERVIEW

The Song of Songs is a collection of lyric poems that celebrates human love. It features the voices of two lovers, a girl and boy, and their professions of love for one another (the description "girl" and "boy" convey the youth and inexperience of the lovers). At times the two voices join in dialogue (e.g., 1:9–17; 2:1–7), while at others they speak separately, addressing each other or the girl's companions, the "daughters of Jerusalem." The title, "Song of Songs" (shir hashshirim) is a superlative construction in Hebrew, i.e., "the most sublime of songs," like "king of kings" (Dan 2:37). However, the phrase may be taken more literally still as "a song of (many) songs," suggesting a collection or anthology of songs. The sequence as a whole exhibits cohesiveness, and yet the multiple poems or fragments of poems require the reader to negotiate the junctures and disjunctions between the poems.

Structurally, the Song remains stubbornly open and idiosyncratic. There is some intentional shaping of the sequence's beginning and end. It starts with the voice of the girl yearning for her lover, followed by fragments of poems. Only in ch. 2, especially with the ode-like celebration of springtime (2:8–17), does one begin to encounter the articulated poems that comprise the main body of the collection (e.g., 3:1–5; 4:1–7; 5:2–6:3; 6:4–10). The sequence then seems to unravel, much as it started, among fragments and bits of poems (esp. 8:5–14). In its last lines, readers once again hear the girl's voice, and thus the collection ends very much as it began. Aside from this overarching movement, the Song resists all attempts to map, paraphrase, or otherwise reduce to logical or thematic content. What stands out most conspicuously, then, are the individual poems and peak moments whose effects are mostly ephemeral. Whatever underlying structure there is reveals itself organically as the poems wind their way from one peak moment to the next. In the end, this kind of lyrical structure invites and even necessitates readerly focus on single fragments and individual poems.

This love poetry has ancient parallels in the Mesopotamian sacred marriage texts and in Egyptian love poetry. Moreover, Isaiah of Jerusalem uses a love poem in his "Song of the Vineyard" (Isa 5:1–7). And the editor(s) of the Psalter, who created the various psalmic superscriptions, know about love songs (Ps 45:1; cf. Ezek 33:32).

The date of the Song is debated. There is nothing in the poems that ties them to a specific historical setting. The language, including Aramaisms and Persian loanwords, strongly suggests a relatively late date, sometime between the fourth and second century BCE. The Song, either in whole or in its several component poems, may have had some prehistory (oral or written). Later Jewish and Christian interpreters eventually appropriated the Song for explicitly religious purposes by way of allegory, explaining the relationship between the two lovers as if it referred to the relationship between God and Israel or Christ and the church (or the individual believer). Ironically, such claims bring the Song closer to the ways in which the poetry of love in Mesopotamia was most commonly staged, through the voices of gods and goddesses or the king and divine consort.

The allegorical tradition of reading the Song is a strategy imposed on the text. That is, there is nothing within the Song itself or within the tradition of love poetry from the ancient Mediterranean world that requires (or authorizes) such a strategy of reading. Allegories tend to prescribe a particular interpretation and are normally not very subtle (e.g., 2 Sam 12:1–7; Isa 5:1–7). Yet there is nothing allegorical about the Song and no textual, historical, or cultural warrant for reading it allegorically. The Song, like much ancient Egyptian love poetry, is what it appears to be, a celebration of the love of two flesh- and-blood people.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

The initial line of the Song is often construed as assigning authorship to Solomon—"the Song of Songs, by Solomon" (NJV). However, it was common practice in antiquity to attribute authorship to a well-known figure (e.g., David [Pss 3:1; 4:1], Solomon [Prov 1:1]). The line is most likely an editorial superscription. The ascription to Solomon is not totally unmotivated since he is mentioned (possibly) a half-dozen other times in the Song (1:5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11, 12).

II. First Poem (1:2–4)

The Song opens with the love affair in full bloom. The first poem is voiced by the girl and consists of two brief stanzas (vv. 2–3 and 4), each beginning and ending with like sounds or the same words. The whole is shaped through repetitions (e.g., the eightfold occurrence of the second person pronominal suffix), wordplays and puns, and an intermingling of pronominal references that all but defies logical ordering. These combine to express the girl's desire and the topsy-turvy world of young love.

1:2. In the phrase "let him kiss me with kisses" (yishaqeni minneshiqoth) verb and object share the same Hebrew root, which allows for some pleasant alliterating and redoubles the depth of the desire named. The addition of the last word in the line, "his mouth," signals hyperbole; first love and young love by its nature must be over the top, the very definition of hyperbole. It also elicits a play in the Hebrew between the verbs for kissing (nshq) and drinking (shqh; cf. 8:1–2). The longing here is for the deep-throated kiss of lovers that can only be gulped greedily for fear that the thirst (for love) will be too quickly quenched. The second line of the couplet cinches the play as the best wine is used as the standard of comparison. This "love" is to be tasted, smelled, felt, and ultimately praised and reveled in (v. 4). "Wine" is the drink most emphatically associated with lovemaking in the Song (1:2, 4; 2:4; 4:10; 5:1; 7:9; 8:2).

1:3. The extolling of the fine "fragrance" of the boy's "anointing oils" plays on the designation for the finest virgin olive oil (esp. 2 Kgs 20:13=Isa 39:2) Olive oil was a chief staple of the ancient Levant and was used for many purposes, including to oil skin and hair. "Poured out" (NRSV) measures the depth of the girl's longing for her lover by the image of expensive oil being poured out. The "maidens" (NRSV) are either the girl's companions, who are more commonly referred to as the "daughters of Jerusalem" (e.g., 1:5), or some non-specified other young women who potentially pose a threat to the lovers.

1:4. The string of first common plural verb forms ("let us . . . we will . . . we will") gives some cohesion to the stanza. The "king," i.e., the boy (also in 1:12 and 7:6)—is, perhaps, a pet name or an erotic fantasy, though the royal motif is significant throughout the sequence of poems. Extol (NRSV), or more technically, savor (as in the breathing in of burnt offerings, cf. Lev 24:7; Isa 66:3; Ps 20:4), evokes the senses.

III. Second Poem (1:5–8)

In moving to the second poem, the reader notices that nothing joins the two poems, except voice, which in 1:5–6 is finally identified clearly as female, and the tone, which is self-assertive and exuberant, but also light and playful. Reference to Solomon (v. 5) continues the royal motif. The poem breaks into two main sections, vv. 5–6 and vv. 7–8. The first section features the voice of the girl addressing her girlfriends and extolling the beauty of her sun-darkened skin. The second section of the poem highlights the banter of the two lovers. That the lovers are in conversation is significant, because Egyptian love poetry, by contrast, is almost all monologic. In the Song, readers are treated to (at least) two different views about love.

1:5. The phrase "I am black and beautiful," is affirmative, not apologetic. The girl extols the beauty of her own sun-darkened skin. The girl's blackness is clearly identified within the poem as resulting from exposure to the sun as she tended the vineyards. She is emboldened by the reassuring knowledge that she and her blackness are loved by the boy (who addresses her as "most beautiful of women," v. 8). The boast, then, is the healthy braggadocio of one newly in love and eager to share her happiness.

The first person pronoun is used only by the girl in the Song (1:5, 6: 2:1, 5,16; 5:2, 5, 6, 8; 6:3; 7:11; 8:10) and effectively centers the Song's discourse on her.

The reference to "the tents of Kedar" is wonderfully multivalent. Tents could refer literally to the tents themselves (if they are made in Bedouin fashion, from the wool of black goats), or intended as a metonym for the Kedarites, a North Arabian nomadic tribe. The Hebrew root (qdr) itself implies "darkness" (esp. Sir 25:17).

1:6. The language throughout these lines is layered with plays, puns, and double entendre. One example is "they were angry with me" (from kharah), which may also be read as "they burned against me" (from kharakh), playing on the scorching sun that burns the skin.

"Mother's sons" is a synonym for "brother" (Gen 27:29; Deut 13:7; Ps 50:20) and serves as a counterpoint to the earlier "daughters of Jerusalem." The girl says, "They made me keeper," a task typical for older children in a family. The term vineyard is used here (as elsewhere) both literally (cf. 7:12)—vineyards were conventional settings for love in ancient love poetry—and figuratively as an image for the girl herself (esp. 4:12–5:1; 6:2), and as a symbol of female sexuality (cf. 8:12).

1:7. The imagery shifts from vineyards to shepherding. The girl speaks first in a mock pout, wondering where her lover grazes his flocks that she may join him during the afternoon siesta—"noon" in warm climates is a time for rest and repose, and thus convenient for an amorous tryst.

1:8. The boy stands his ground, replying that if she truly does not know—and of course he implies that she does know—then she should go right ahead and "pasture" her "kids" among his companions' flocks. She is here imagined as a shepherdess, but kids may signify figuratively the girl's breasts, as with the gazelles and fawns in 4:5 and 7:3.

IV. Third Poem (1:9–17)

Dialogue dominates the next several poems. This poem has three stanzas of six lines apiece. In the first stanza (vv. 9–11), the boy's voice carries over from the end of the last poem. He uses the image of a fine mare fitted out with decorative bridle and halter to express the girl's beauty (cf. 1:5). By way of response (vv. 12–14), the girl imagines wearing her kingly lover as a "bag of myrrh." The whole stanza is shot through with references to the pleasing and alluring scents of exotic spices and flowers. The final stanza (vv. 15–17) features the couple's mirrored exclamations of admiration and ends with reference to their union—"our couch . . . our house . . . our rafters."

1:9. The point of comparing the girl to a "mare among Pharaoh's chariots" affords an image of fierce beauty (a literary commonplace) and also her sexual allure. The chariotry is made up of only stallions, and a mare in their midst would cause a stir. The simile takes its point of departure in the harness and other fineries with which the finest royal horses were commonly fitted out, and thus suggests the girl's bejeweled head and neck. "My love" is the boy's preferred term of endearment for the girl (1:9, 15; 2:2, 10, 13; 4:1, 7; 5:2; 6:4).

1:10–11. The imagery of ornaments and jewels may well have both mare and girl in mind.

1:12–14. Nard and myrrh are fragrant spices; henna is the aromatic flower of the cypress. The spices complement the gold and silver, just as imaging the boy as king echoes the identification of the chariotry as belonging to Pharaoh. My beloved, which plays on the term for lovemaking (see esp. 7:8–14), is the girl's pet name for the boy, occurring more than two dozen times in the Song.

"En-gedi," an oasis on the western shore of the Dead Sea, literally means, kid-fountain, a pun that confirms the earlier erotic metaphor of kids (1:5).

1:15–17. The boy's and the girl's professions of admiration mirror each other. One of the lovers plays on the phrasing or imagery used by the other.

The rock dove's dark upper torso and characteristic head-bobbing symbolize the sparkle and aliveness of the girl's dark irises set against the white of the eye (cf. 5:12).

V. Fourth Poem (2:1–7)

This poem continues the dialogic form of the last several poems. The first section (vv. 1–3) is comprised of flattering compliments in which each lover builds on the language of the other and suffuses it with images of fragrant flowers and fruit trees. The second section (vv. 4–6) shifts scenes. Now the girl finds herself in a "house of wine" and sick "with love." The poem closes (v. 7) with an adjuration addressed to the girl's companions (cf, Song 3:1–5; 8:1–4). The poem is highly fragmented, with only a few words (apple tree/ apples, love/love/love) and phrases (I am/I am, so is among/so is among) providing a sense of a larger whole.

2:1. The nature of the girl's self-appraisal here— whether boastful or self-deprecating—is unclear. The Sharon probably refers specifically to the fertile coastal plain of Israel.

2:2–3. The alternating compliments intentionally mirror one another. There is no ambiguity about the boy's intentions. He takes up the image of the lily, and by contrasting it to the noxious bramble, he makes clear his own sense of his beloved's singular brilliance. Maidens likely means young women (of marriageable age).

2:3. It is the girl's turn to speak again. This time she fashions her own eroticized comparison. The Hebrew term routinely translated apple (thapuakh) likely refers to the apricot or possibly even the quince, as both are indigenous to the greater Levant. But whether apple, apricot, or quince, the erotic symbolism of the fruit is not in doubt (2:5; 7:9), nor are the girl's ambitions. In Mesopotamia, the male lover is frequently symbolized and imagined (most phallically) as what is conventionally glossed as an apple tree.

2:4. "Banqueting house" (lit. house of wine) is a unique term in the Bible. Given the erotic associations of wine in the Song, it surely means to allude to another of the couple's trysting places (as in 1:17).

2:5. Raisins and apples were thought to have aphrodisiac qualities; hence the rich fruit is symbolic of lovemaking. Beyond an expression of affection or tender feeling, the term love refers as well more specifically to the act of lovemaking (so also in 2:7; cf. Jer 2:33; Prov 5:19).

2:6. The girl's wish, "O, that his left hand were under my head and his right hand embraced me!" is similar to an Old Assyrian love spell in which the girl is rendered "lovesick" and unable to "rest" until her neck is "entwined" with her lover's. Love is the cause of the girl's malady, and more love is its only cure.

2:7. "By the gazelles or the wild does" stands here in place of an oath sworn in the name of the deity. In the naturalistic vernacular of the poetry, the gazelles and wild does are emblems of love (this is especially clear for the gazelle, which appears in 2:9, 17 and 8:14 with reference to the boy and in 4:5 with reference to the girl's breasts). Thus, the girl swears by her love instead of her god. The final couplet (repeated in 3:5 and 8:4) may be taken as a warning about arousing love prematurely or unmindfully.

VI. Fifth Poem (2:8–17)

Up to this point in the Song, the poems have a pronounced sense of fragmentation about them. Only with this ode-like celebration of springtime love does the reader begin to encounter more perceptibly articulated poems. The beloved's coming and going as a gazelle, at beginning and end, effectively frames the poem, and the fivefold repetition of "my beloved" (vv. 8, 9, 10, 16, 17) and the interlacing of animal imagery (gazelle, dove, jackal) help join the stanzas (vv. 8–9, 10–13, 14, 15, 16–17) into a whole.

2:8–9. The first stanza invokes the experience of sighting a shy and skittery gazelle, almost as if it has been conjured by the oath at the end of the previous poem. The abbreviated lines and choice of active verbs convey the characteristic speed and agility of the gazelle.

2:8. The gazelle is the male lover. The girl first hears his approach— as "the voice of my beloved." She catches sight of him ("look, he comes!") leaping and bounding playfully in the distance. A palpable sense of excitement and expectation courses through these opening lines.

2:9. And then just as suddenly ("look, there he stands!"), the gazelle/lover appears at the wall of the family compound, peering in at the girl as she is peering out at him. The woman-in-the-window is a common motif in ANE art. The poet transforms this motif (cf. Judg 5:28; 2 Kgs 9:30), allowing readers to see both the girl and the boy as they are framed for each other by the window.

2:10–13. The second stanza is framed by the words "Arise, my darling, my fair one, and come away" (vv. 10, 13). This is the only time in the Song where any direct discourse is introduced formally (v. 10), perhaps because it is unequivocally the girl's telling of what the boy said to her. The entire poem, after all, is written from the perspective of the girl. He beckons her to join him, enticing her through a beautifully evocative depiction of the awakening of spring, a perennial time of love.

2:11–13. Winter is the rainy season in Palestine, usually ending in mid-April. Spring, the time described in these verses, arrives with flowers blossoming, figs and vines blooming, and migrant birds reappearing.

2:14–15. The next two stanzas (vv. 14 and 15) feature animal figures. In the first (v. 14), the girl is imagined as a "dove," literalizing the boy's term of endearment for her (my dove, cf 5:2; 6:9), and thereby figuring her inaccessibility (cf. 7:8). The wild rock dove, common to the region, nests in rocky crags, in part, to stay out of reach of predators, such as a fox or jackal. But in this case, the metaphorical cliffs also stand in for the wall and house that keep the boy out of reach of his beloved.

There follows in v. 15 an apostrophe imploring the capture of the scavenging foxes or, as likely, jackals, before they ruin the vineyards. The vineyards of ancient Palestine were walled and guarded for just this reason. Possibly the dove and gazelle are in danger too as prey. The blossoming vineyards recall the girl's earlier reference to her budding sexuality (1:6) and more immediately to the blossoming vines of spring (v. 13). There is something of a tease, then, in these lines, especially if heard as voiced by the girl—far from being inaccessible, her sexuality (our vineyards) is in full bloom and in danger of being raided by others (i.e., jackals).

2:14. The girl's next lines may be heard as a response to the "voice" (v. 8) and then "sound" (vv. 10–13) of her lover and as the "voice" that the boy so desires to hear (v. 14). These "voicings," then, join in with the other "voices"/"sounds" of spring (v. 12) to form a virtual chorus.

2:16–17. The final section of the poem begins again with reference to the girl's lover and reprises the gazelle and stag imagery from vv. 8–9, though this time as a plea for the boy to leave at the coming of dawn.

2:16. The mutual pledge of love echoes ANE marriage and adoption formulas. His flock of the NRSV is an overly literal translation that stresses only one of the senses of this line: the image of the boy as shepherd. The Hebrew is more nuanced. "He pastures among the lilies" intimates the erotic and provocative image of the lover himself, grazing among the lilies, the choicest and most delicate portion of the pasturage, i.e., the girl herself.

2:17. As the shadows of night recede, the beloved, imagined (again) as a "gazelle," is warned to flee. The NRSV's turn is overliteral; the Hebrew imperative focuses on the lover's "becoming like a gazelle." The bounding and skipping gazelle/ young stag which came up to the window at the poem's beginning, must go back from where he came.

VII. Sixth Poem (3:1–5)

This poem features a nighttime search for the beloved. The opening line (lit. "on my bed in the nights") cues readers to think of their meeting as occurring nightly. Indeed, in coming to the poem from what precedes it, a narrative-minded reader might well imagine the girl by her window waiting night after night for another sighting of her gazelle-like lover. This impulse toward story is aided by an obvious narrativity that infuses these verses. Its base story-line may be simply stated: the girl, desiring her absent lover, searches the city for him and eventually finds him, though not before she herself is found by the nightwatch. She seizes him and brings him to her mother's house. At this point the story breaks off, and the poem ends with the girl adjuring her girlfriends (as in 2:7 and 8:4).

3:1. The transition from the first ("upon my bed nightly") to the second line ("I seek him whom my soul loves") is all important, as it disturbs from the outset any straightforward narrative construal. Is the girl dreaming or thinking to herself, longing for her lover? Does she actually leave her bed to search for her lover? Or is it all imagined? None of these questions can be answered definitively and thus should serve as the reader's initial cue that something more than a charming story is afoot.

3:2–4. The heart of the story (such as it is) unfolds through iteration. Almost all of the language (e.g., "him whom my soul loves") is repeated, as many as four times over. There are even some phrases repeated from 2:8–17 (to arise, to go around). Two times the girl seeks her lover but cannot find him. The third time (typical of stories) also fails, as the girl is herself "found" by the nightwatch, who, like her, go "about in the city." They offer no reply to her query about her lover's whereabouts, and it is only after this last encounter that she finally finds "him whom her soul loves." She seizes him and "does not let him go." The phrasing "my mother's house" (cf. 8:2) is striking. Its rarity (occurring elsewhere only in Gen 24:28 and Ruth 1:8) deviates from the otherwise ubiquitous designation "house of the father." When set alongside the Song's other furtive mentions of the girl's mother (1:6; 6:9; 8:1, 2, 5), the poet's references to motherhood begin to seem less accidental, perhaps flavoring the Song with an awareness of a social reality in which women had an important role in family life and household decisions, a notion that comports with the important role of the female voice throughout the Song.

3:5. But whatever more happens is left to the reader's imagination, with only a bit of prompting from the closing address to her girlfriends— not to arouse or disturb love (v. 5). The constant repetition of seeking and finding (or not finding) articulates well the basic nature of human love and desire.

VIII. Seventh Poem: Solomon's Wedding Procession (3:6–11)

Solomon's wedding procession. Elsewhere in the Song, the boy is imagined as a royal figure (1:4, 12; cf. 7:6), even as Solomon (1:5; 8:11, 12). So there is no reason not to think that in this passage too the reference is to the boy—the king, after all, is one of the major personas in Mesopotamian love poetry. In this instance, the royal motif may have been chosen for its "sexual allure." Royal rhetoric in the Bible, as in Mesopotamia, occasionally presents the body of the king as alluring, desirable, beautiful (e.g., 1 Sam 16:12; Ps 45:3). Indeed, Solomon is heralded as a paradigmatic lover (e.g., 1 Kgs 11:3). The poem itself falls into three uneven parts. The first stanza (v. 6) is comprised of a rhetorical question, "who is this?" which the long middle stanza (vv. 7–10) answers (rhetorically, if not otherwise). The poem concludes in v. 11 with an apostrophe (this one addressed to the "daughters of Zion"), a favored closing gesture (cf. 2:7; 3:5; 8:4).

3:6. The Hebrew term rendered here as coming up is commonly used to designate travel to Jerusalem. It is a homonym of the Hebrew noun for "whole burnt offering." Thus, the image of the procession, viewed from afar, appears as a column of smoke—like one would associate with sacrifice and the burning of incense—winding its way up the mountainous approach to Jerusalem. The allusions to sacrifice lend the scene an otherworldly and spiritual appearance as well. The aromas, myrrh and frankincense, have associations with the cult and trade, and also with love (cf. 4:6; 5:13).

3:7–8. At one level, the image of the royal retinue is realistic and projects onto the boy a strong sense of masculine desirability. The bed, if a litter (so NRSV) by the logic of v. 6, is also just an ordinary bed (2 Kgs 4:10)—a place for sleeping or love. Whatever more may be intended by the mention of the "alarms in the night," it injects a sense of unease or foreboding, which often accompanies the Song's darker tonalities (e.g., 5:7; 8:5–7).

3:9–10. The fineness of Solomon's wedding bed is invoked (Amos 6:4; Esth 1:6). Indeed, it is not uncommon for the aesthetic appeal of the love bed to be stressed (e.g., 1:16–17; Prov 7:16–17).

3:11. The mention of the "wedding day" here (and the allusion in 8:8) recalls that bridal songs were a popular genre of love poetry in Mesopotamia. Although the Song's celebration of love is not staged with marriage narrowly in view, marriage, children, and a continuing life lived among family and kin would have been the normal horizon of expectation for young lovers.

IX. Eighth Poem (4:1–7)

This poem (see also 5:10–16; 6:4–10; 7:1–7) prefigures the later Arabic wasf, a poem or a section of a poem that elaborates an extended description of a person or other object. Sung in the voice of the male lover, it proclaims the beauty of the girl he loves. The opening and closing couplets (vv. 1a, 7), which form an inclusio, plainly express the poem's sole preoccupation: "Wow! You are so beautiful, my love/ Wow! You are so beautiful!" (v. 1a).

The structure of the poem is very intentional. Its main body is divided into two symmetrical halves (vv. 1b–2, 3–4). In the first section, an aspect of the woman's beauty—"your eyes," "your hair," "your teeth"—is fronted and compared to a domestic animal—"doves," "goats," and "sheep." In the second section, the similes—"like a scarlet thread," "like a slit of pomegranate," and "like the tower of David"—are now fronted and feature products of human culture—textiles, fruits, architecture. The descriptive aspect of this wasf-like poem is brought to a close in v. 5 with the boy's appreciation of his lover's breasts. He then resolves to join his lover (v. 6), and the poem concludes with a reprise of the opening exclamation.

4:1. Much of this poem's charm lies in the play of metaphor at the heart of its several similes. "Your eyes are doves" features the image of the rock dove (see comment on 1:15). Visually, the image is that of the girl's dark eyes, perhaps hiding bashfully behind the veil, but very much alive, darting like the dark, bobbing head of the dove. The image projected in the comparison of the girl's hair to a flock of goats meandering down a mountainside is of her dark hair cascading down her back.

4:2. The girl's teeth are white, like the prevailing color of the fleece of sheep (especially after shearing and washing).

4:3. The Hebrew word translated mouth only occurs here. It designates both the mouth and speech. The comparison of the girl's cheeks (cf. Judg 4:21; 5:26; lit. temple, forehead?) with the half of a pomegranate is perhaps intended to convey the image of rosy cheeks. The metaphor of "scarlet thread" and a "half of pomegranate" provide provocative color against the black and white palette of the earlier lines.

4:4. The mention of David's name might be intended to lend the girl a bit of the warrior-king's regality and ability to intimidate. Alternatively, the name "David," Hebrew dwyd (dawidh) puns the girl's favorite pet name for the boy, dwdy, "my lover" (dodhy). The architectural imagery used here of the girl (cf. also 6:4; 7:4, 5) may draw on the biblical tradition of personifying cities as women (e.g., Isa 47:1–15; 52:1–2; 54:1–17; Lam 1:2).

4:5. The "gazelle" embodies grace and beauty (see at 1:8). The erotic connotations of "feed among the lilies" recalls 1:8 and 2:16.

4:6. Here the boy mirrors the words uttered earlier by the girl in 2:17. Inspired by the vision of his lover's beauty, he insists that, instead of retreating into the hills at the coming of dawn, he will go at sunset to the "mountain of myrrh" and "hill of frankincense," that is, to the girl's breasts, for she is "perfumed with myrrh and frankincense" (3:6). His ambition to rest among these hills of spices echoes the girl's earlier exclamation (1:13).

4:7. The attributes inscribed here praise the beauty of the girl's entire self—body, mind, and soul—which has "no flaw."

X. Ninth Poem (4:8–5:1)

These verses offer another dialogic poem. The boy's voice is dominant (4:8–15, 5:1). The poem is filled with puns, wordplays, and repetitions that help structure and bind the whole together. 4:8–15. The first section features the voice of the boy, who again (cf. 2:8–17) aims to entice his beloved to come away with him. This time she is portrayed as being sequestered in the Lebanon mountains (cf. v. 15).

4:8. The references to the "Lebanon" and the Anti-Lebanon mountain ranges, which are located north of Israel in modern day Lebanon and Syria, symbolize danger (backed up by the menacing mention of "lions" and "leopards") and the girl's inaccessibility (cf. 2:14). The poem moves geographically from the inaccessible mountains to the (ultimately accessible) garden.

4:9. A paradigm example of staircase parallelism—each successive line elides an element from the previous line while adding a new element. Ravish can be considered either in a privative sense (i.e., "you take my heart away") or with more specific connotations of sexual arousal.

4:10. Here the boy echoes the girl's language from 1:2–3. The boy's repetition of the woman's words is a gesture of the mutuality and parity that characterizes these lovers' relationship. The variation in the boy's words inscribes, just as importantly, an awareness of their individuality.

4:11. The metaphors of nectar, honey, and milk focus on the sweet taste and allure of the girl's lips and tongue, as well as the honeyed nature of her words (cf. Prov 16:24).

4:12. "A garden locked" means she is unavailable to other men.

4:14. The profusion of exotic spices and fruits is deliberate and exaggerated to suggest the intensity of feeling and also to continue layering the whole with erotic overtones (Prov 7:17; Ps 45:9). Many of these products were not indigenous to Palestine (e.g., nard, myrrh, frankincense) and would have been imported, a detail that suggests they are expensive. Chief spices is better translated best spices.

4:15. The water imagery alludes to v. 12 and helps to bind vv. 12–15 to this section. The girl is the figurative source of life for the boy.

4:16. The boy summons the winds of love using the same word (awake) that the girl used earlier to warn about not summoning love prematurely (3:5; cf. 2:7; 8:4). Lest the reader miss the sexual overtones, come is used elsewhere for sexual intercourse in the Hebrew Bible (esp. Gen 16:2; 38:16). The second couplet is spoken by the girl. Both agree that the "garden"—the girl!—is the boy's.

5:1. The boy accepts the girl's invitation (4:16) and enters the garden of his delight. Eating and drinking as elsewhere in the Song have palpable erotic overtones.

XI. Tenth Poem (5:2–6:3)

The longest poem in the collection. The absent lover and the "sickness" induced (5:2–8) provoke the girl's description of him (5:10–16), which in turn eventually conjures him (6:2–3). The boy ends up in "his garden" (6:2) where he was at the end of the previous poem (esp. 4:16–5:1), gathering and sampling its various delights.

5:2–9. A companion piece of sorts to 3:1–5.

5:2–6. Contrary to 3:1–5, the focus here is on the action that happens prior to the search itself. Separation, not absence, is the poem's initial preoccupation. The boy comes to the door, knocks, and begs to be let in out of the heavy nighttime dew (v. 2). The girl, who has already gone to bed, is somewhere (in the sleeping room) on the other side of the door. She dithers. By the time she opens the door, her lover has fled (v. 6). Readers are allowed to sense how very close to a union the lovers come—the boy even managing to reach through the lock, the very lock the girl eventually manipulates to open the door (vv. 4–5)—whatever allusions to sexual intercourse that this sequence of events may conjure are left, quite wonderfully, to the readerly imagination. Readers, like the girl herself (v. 4), feel in their own stomachs the tumble of excitement at these prospects and just as surely register the ache of her disappointment.

5:7–9. The pace picks up and vocabulary familiar from 3:1–5 begins to recur. She seeks but does not find, and, again as in 3:3, the nightwatch find her instead. The reader takes all in stride, having quite literally been down this road before. And then comes the hammer. The guards beat, batter, and (literally) disrobe the girl. End of story, but the poem continues. The reader, reeling from the girl's brutal violation, hardly is able to take in the closing adjuration, which either asks rhetorically about what the girl's friends will tell her lover—namely, that she is lovesick—or makes them swear not to tell him what has happened.

5:10–16. The girl's response comes in the form of her only wasf. The section as a whole is framed by two general statements of admiration: "my lover is radiant and ruddy" (v. 10) and "this is my lover" (v. 16). In contradistinction to the other three wasfs, the girl's admiration is frequently relayed in terms derived from sculpture. To what end is this inflection of sculpture in the round put? Literally, it is offered as an answer to her girlfriends' question in v. 9: what distinguishes your beloved from other men? The wasf, then, is intended to say that he is beautiful, vital, and sexually alluring (esp. v. 16: "and all of him is desirable"). She is evidently successful since as her girlfriends agree to help in the search (6:1).

5:12. The image is wonderfully complex, suggesting both the whiteness of the dove and the image of the dark pupil set within the white iris, and lush. Milk, in particular, is associated elsewhere with the idyllic, human flourishing and prosperity (Exod 3:8, 17; 13:5; 33:3; Num 13:27; Deut 6:3; Isa 55:1; 60:16; Joel 3:18; Job 29:6; Song 4:11; 5:1; Lam 4:7). The whiteness of the milk also contrasts with the blackness of the raven.

5:14–15. The imagery in these verses suggests a statue, the great value and surpassing beauty of which is uppermost in mind.

XII. Eleventh Poem (6:4–10)

Another wasf (cf. 4:1–7; 5:10–16; 7:1–7), staged almost as if in answer to the girl's immediately preceding wasf-like admiration of the boy. The four wasfs of the Song clump together here in the middle of the sequence, anchoring the whole in the singularity of genre. The body of the poem is framed with an inclusio (v. 4, 10), featuring repeated vocabulary and multiple similes with the same concluding line, "terrible as an army with banners." The body is composed of the wasf proper, which is the most limited wasf in the Song, focusing only on the beloved's face.

6:4. Tirzah was the capital of the northern kingdom in the late tenth and early ninth centuries. Comparisons to the beauty of capital cities likely draws intentionally on the biblical tradition of personified cities (cf. 4:4), e.g., Jerusalem was "perfect in beauty" (Lam 2:15). 6:8–10. The singularity of the girl is stressed in these lines, a point underscored in the Hebrew by the juxtaposition of the numbers sixty and eighty in v. 8 with one repeated twice in v. 9, and then elaborated for good measure in v. 10 (cf. 3:7).

6:10. Moon/sun are not the common terms for these heavenly bodies, but are highly elliptical poetic metonyms, whiteness and heat (cf. Isa 24:23; 30:26), which more eloquently evoke dawn imagery, the point at which the moon is still visible but the heat of the sun can already be felt. The image conveys a sense and feeling of freshness, newness.

XIII. Fragments (6:11–12)

The exact connection of these fragments to the immediately surrounding material is not obvious. The garden imagery and the royal theme are obviously common to the larger sequence.

6:11. The identity of the speaker is ambiguous. The garden imagery, usually associated with the girl (e.g., 4:12), may suggest that the boy is speaking. If not, the girl at last responds positively to the boy's invitation in 2:10 to accompany him.

XIV. Twelfth Poem (7:1–7)

This final wasf is framed by an inclusio, consisting of couplets that laud the girl's beauty. The boy's admiring gaze travels in trepidation from sandaled-foot to the regal braids that hold him captive. With only one exception ("your feet" displaced by the opening exclamation of beauty), each of the ten body parts admired head their lines. The framing inclusio makes evident the loving and admiring nature of the boy's gaze.

7:1. The identity of the voice(s) heard in the opening couplets is unclear, and while a curiosity, knowing who is speaking is not crucial to the experience of the poem. The voice implores four times over for the girl to "(re)turn" that she may be looked upon. Only here in the Song is the girl provided with a designation, the "Shulammite." The second couplet ("why do you look . . ."), whether or not it is uttered by a different voice (e.g., the boy's), may be heard as a response to the opening request for the Shulammite to "(re)turn" (cf. 5:8–9).

7:2. "How graceful are your feet in sandals"—adornment (here the sandals) is important in this culture's ideal of beauty. Your rounded thighs, better, the curves of your thighs. Here too the adorned nature of beauty's conceptualization is patent, as the curve of the girl's thigh is likened to jewelry (Hos 2:15; Prov 25:12) made by a master artisan.

7:3. Navel (cf. Ezek 16:4; Prov 3:8) is commonly thought of as a euphemism or double entendre for vulva, but this may be doubted. When taken straightforwardly, the simile would appear to suggest that "the navel was considered pretty." If reference is made at all to the girl's vulva, it is made allusively, triggered by the mention of a bowl never lacking mixed wine. In Sumerian love poetry the goddess's vaginal juices are imagined as a "sweet drink" for her lover. Here, as elsewhere in the Song, the phrasing is far more delicate and discrete than what is often found in the Mesopotamian love poetry. The following simile, "your belly is a heap of wheat," works on a variety of levels. The term for belly frequently designates more specifically a woman's womb (e.g., Gen 30:2; Judg 16:17; Isa 13:18). When combined with the image of "a heap of wheat," the associations with fertility and nourishment are palpable, and thus eroticism and fertility imagery are closely linked. At another level, the image of heaped wheat suggests the softness and gentle curve of the woman's stomach, as well, perhaps, as its golden and tawny hue.

7:5. Each of the images in this verse has the personified city in their background. For the image of the girl's neck as an "ivory tower," compare 4:4. Ivory is likely meant to convey a notion of splendor and opulence (cf. 1 Kgs 10:18; 22:39; Amos 3:15; 6:4; Ps 45:8).

7:6. Carmel is the mountain range that runs southeast of modern Haifa. Though not incredibly tall (552 m at its highest), its headland juts out prominently into the Mediterranean Sea. The western slopes catch the breezes off the Mediterranean, and thus are lush and fertile and beautiful.

XV. Thirteenth Poem (7:8–14)

The next poem, shaped as an asymmetrical dialogue (vv. 8–10a, 10b–13), is distinct from the wasf that precedes it. The boy speaks first; his part turns out to be the shorter of the two sections. The second and longer half of the poem (vv. 10b–13) is rendered in the girl's voice.

7:8–10a. The girl's intimidating inaccessibility is once again depicted (cf. 2:14). She is imagined as a beautiful, stately palm, one of the oldest cultivated fruit trees in the ancient world and rich in cultural symbolism. The girl's breasts are high and out of reach. And though the boy repeats his determination to scale the scary height (the date palm grows to be between eighty and a hundred feet tall) and to lay hold of the desired fruit, the poetry reflects—laments!—his doubts about accomplishing such a feat. And thus readers are not surprised to find the boy's closing lines pitched more as a wish ("Oh, may your breasts . . .") and the image shifted ever so slightly but crucially. Would that the girl's breasts were more like clusters of grapes on the vine, down low and quite reachable, than the date clusters of the tall palm.

7:9. As if energized by the accessibility implied by the vine imagery, the boy can now even taste the girl's kisses—the imagery echoing the girl's opening ejaculation (1:2–3), and thus symbolizing (yet again) the lovers' harmonious commensurability. The next line enacts another of the Song's high moments. The image of wine continues, literally "going down . . . smoothly." But the movement is directed specifically "to my lover," the girl's pet name for the boy. Apparently, she now is the speaker, interrupting and completing the boy's speech. And what is so very delectable is just how the poet musters language to depict a kiss (even the kiss the girl has longed for from the beginning of the sequence), linguistic intercourse both literal and figural. Here is as close as the Song comes to actually showing the lovers joining together, each satisfying their own and the other's want. And yet, of course, the joining is not itself represented or narrated. All that is said is that the fine wine to which the girl's mouth is likened goes down smoothly.

7:12–13. This section is given over to the girl's invitation to her lover to join her in the garden. The desire for the garden is shared by two: "let us go forth . . . let us . . . see" The lusciousness of the garden imagery here matches in tone and tenor the fruit-full imagery in the first part of the poem, binding the poem together as a whole.

7:12. The girl is in the midst of urging her lover to rise early in the morning and accompany her to the garden, which is both a favorite place for the couple's tryst and an emblem of the girl herself and her budding sexuality (esp. 4:12–15). The final line breaks off the invitation and description of the garden to announce, with some emphasis: "There I will give my love to you!"—the Hebrew of "my love(making)" playing on the fourfold repetition of the girl's favorite designation for the boy, "my love(er)."

7:13. The closing lines echo and play off language used elsewhere in the poem and the poem itself ends with the girl's comment that she has stored up the choicest fruits "for you, my lover" (NIV).

XVI. Fourteenth Poem (8:1–4)

A poem of yearning. The girl speaks throughout, continuing from the previous poem. The clustering of second person masculine suffixes (7:12, 13; 8:1) helps connect the two poems to one another and emphasizes the girl's agency, effectively complementing her willed passivity. The language and imagery throughout draw most explicitly on language and imagery already encountered in the Song.

8:1. The girl wishes her lover was "like a brother" so that they could express their love freely and publicly without rebuke.

XVII. Conclusion (8:5–14)

The sequence unravels to a close, much as it started, among poetic fragments.

8:5a. The first part of this verse appears to be one of the several floating fragments that surface here and there in the Song (e.g., 5:1; 6:11–12; 7:1). It is a reprise of 3:6, only now the girl is in focus, not the boy imagined as Solomon.

8:5b–7. The consistency of voice—the girl speaks throughout—gives this fragment its greatest sense of cohesion.

8:5b. For the eroticism inherent in the girl's imaging the boy as an "apple tree," see the comment on 2:3. To "rouse" a boy so, by means of his lover and under such a symbol laden tree, hardly requires Freud to appreciate the implication of the boy's "arousal." The eroticization of the boy's mother is explicit—earlier (3:4; 6:9; 8:2) the girl's mother was similarly eroticized. Such transgressive imaginings—here the mother viewed as sexually alluring, the idea of making love on the very spot where the girl's beloved was conceived, where, once upon a time, another pair of young lovers made love—provide the electric charge required to ignite the erotic. By figuring the mother's lovemaking in terms of conception and childbirth, the poet fixes on the outcome of the event, the birth of the girl's lover, while lending a darker hue to the image—childbirth was a common literary trope for extreme pain.

8:6. Seals were made of precious and semiprecious metals and stones and were used to seal documents and to indicate ownership. They were worn on a cord around the neck (Gen 38:18) or as a ring (Gen 41:42; Jer 22:24; Sir 49:11) and were considered a valuable possession. The image, not uncommon, signifies belonging and special intimacy. The girl desires to be bound closely and always to her lover. "Love is as strong as death" (maweth) is usually (and not inaccurately) glossed as denoting love's ultimate ineluctability. But it is doubtful whether the simile can finally be reduced to any one paraphrasable gloss. For instance, not to be missed is the allusion to the mythic image of "strong Mot," the Ugaritic god of death, who battles and defeats equally strong Baal. Thus, one might infer that love, or at least this particular love, is to be imagined as locked in mortal combat with Death—all love inevitably comes to an end, even if only through the actual death of (one of) the lovers. And, in fact, the Song is aware of the dark side of love that is always at risk of being unleashed—the girl is beaten by the night guard for love (5:7), becomes sick (2:5; 5:8), and warns her girlfriends three times over not to arouse love prematurely (2:7; 3:5; 8:4); her lover is assaulted by her very glances (4:9; 6:5) and not infrequently imagines her through a militaristic lens.

8:7. "Many waters" in the Ugaritic myths are associated with the god Yam (Sea) whom Baal conquers. This mythological overlay lingers in biblical tradition as well, where the "many waters" are similarly associated with the powers of chaos which Yahweh dominates (Gen 1; Isa 51:9–10; Ps 74:12–14). Here then "love" successfully resists that which only Yahweh is able to withstand.

8:8–10. Another fragment. Perhaps the playful banter between the girl (8:10) and her brothers (cf. 1:6). The "little sister" in question is surely fictive, but there is no reason not to think that as with the boy's periodic inflection as Solomon the one elsewhere called "sister" (4:9, 10, 12; 5:1, 2) is not also here in view, especially since she appears to speak in the final couplet. Little and she has no breasts stress the girl's sexual immaturity. The girl counters (8:10) that her maturity is beyond doubt. The language foregrounds city imagery throughout (wall, battlement, door, towers). In the eyes of her lover she finds peace and well-being; she is, that is, like that ancient Mediterranean paradigm of safety, a walled and fortified town.

8:11–12. Solomon is addressed. The speaker is likely the boy, who extols the unparalleled value of his own vineyard, the girl.

8:13–14. The concluding poetic fragment ends on a note of anticipation. The boy asks to hear the girl's voice (v. 13), echoing his own earlier plea (2:14) and answering in kind the girl's initial request for a kiss (1:2). She complies and beckons him, as in 2:17, to flee to the mountains (v. 14).

8:14. The closing lines of the Song, like the opening lines, are the girl's, and thus they form an inclusio, featuring her voice and effecting one last rendition of desire, the ebbing and flowing that is love. By figuring the mountains as "the mountains of spices," the girl's closing command is made enigmatic. These spice-filled mountains are surely a figurative reference to the girl herself, and thus the ultimate instability of love—to want it and at the same time to not want it—is wonderfully figured (i.e., flee . . . to me). And with the addition of the final word (spices) and its transformative self-reflexivity, readers are sent back to the beginning of the Song. A fitting, albeit relentlessly circular, close to the Song.

ISAIAH

JOHN GOLDINGAY

OVERVIEW

The book of Isaiah is the first of the three "major prophets," that is, the three longest prophetic books. Its position as the first reflects the fact that Isaiah himself lived in the eighth century, whereas Jeremiah and Ezekiel lived 150 years later. It thus has its scale in common with those two books, but it also deserves setting alongside Hosea, Amos, and Micah, who were contemporaries of Isaiah ben Amoz (especially alongside Micah, who like Isaiah prophesied in Judah).

The book's opening reports that Isaiah ben Amoz was active during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah over Judah. Chapters 1–39 indicate that this was a time when Judah came under considerable political pressure through the expansionist policies of the first great Middle Eastern empire, that of the Assyrians; the question was, how is the people of God to cope with that kind of situation? These chapters also reflect the social changes that had come upon Judah over two centuries and more, a time of increasing urbanization and a divide between people who were quite comfortably off and people who had a hard time making ends meet. Finally, the chapters attest to the temptation to look to religious resources other than Yahweh in order to cope with such political and economic pressures. They urge people to turn back to Yahweh, but they also promise that even if Yahweh brings calamity upon the people, there will be restoration.

The second half of the book begins with a different tone as it reports Yahweh's proclamation, "Comfort, O comfort my people" (40:1). It presupposes that Yahweh has indeed brought calamity on the people but has now said "Enough is enough"; the time for restoration has arrived. It is coming about through the Medo-Persian king Cyrus (44:28), who led the Persians in conquering the Babylonian Empire, taking Babylon in 539 BCE. This part of Isaiah thus presupposes a setting and an audience living two centuries after Isaiah ben Amoz. So, this prophet is someone different from Isaiah ben Amoz, and this part of the book deserves setting alongside Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who preceded it by a short period and also looked forward to Yahweh's restoration of Judah. Lamentations provides further background to some of the conditions presupposed by chapters 40–55.

Chapters 56–66 in turn combine a confrontational tone like that of chs. 1–39 with promises that elaborate on ones in chs. 40–55. Chapters 56–66 make best sense if one reckons that they come from a time soon after chs. 40–55, when something of the restoration that those chapters promise has come about, but things are not nearly as glorious as they would have made one expect. This part of the book thus deserves setting alongside Haggai and Zechariah.

The book as a whole reflects several different periods, but it is not merely an anthology of unrelated prophecies. Chapters 40–66 continue on from chs. 1–39. In all three parts of the book, Yahweh is "the Holy One of Israel." This title appears 25 times throughout the book and only five times in the rest of the Old Testament. The entire book is a message from the Holy One. Other motifs in one part of the book are taken up in another, such as the people's blindness and deafness, the image of Yahweh as the potter, and the notion of the nations being drawn to Jerusalem. Yahweh used the messages in chs. 1–39 to inspire the anonymous prophet or prophets whose words come in chs. 40–55, and later used the words of that "Second Isaiah" to inspire a "Third Isaiah" whose words come in chs. 56–66. (It may be that within chs. 1–39, too, there is material that was inspired by Isaiah ben Amoz rather than that came directly from him, particularly in chs. 24–27; but there are fewer explicit markers of this.)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Judah in the Time of Ahaz (1:1–12:6)

Chapters 1–5 alternate two kinds of message. There are accounts of why and how things have gone wrong for Judah and how things will get worse; interwoven with these are promises of how Yahweh will transform Jerusalem on the other side of these calamities. Isaiah 6:1–9:7 then focuses more on narrative accounts of Isaiah's ministry, but with the same threefold implications. Isaiah 9:8–12:6 returns to direct warnings and promises, but now with the emphasis more on the latter.

A. Confrontations and Promises (i) (1:1–5:30)

1:1–2:1. Judah's devastation (i)

1:1. What we are to read is a "vision." These prophecies are not mere human insight or opinion but a divine revelation; readers need to be open to them as that. Yet they are a vision of "Isaiah ben Amoz." They came via this particular human person. Isaiah's angle of vision is different from that of other prophets, and his person is part of his ministry. His very name, which means "Yahweh is deliverance," expresses a central theme of his message. His vision concerns "Judah and Jerusalem." Judah, a tiny people in the southern part of Syria-Palestine, is the entire book's consistent focus; and even when it talks about other nations, it does so because of their significance for Judah, whether as threats or as allies. The problems, danger, and destiny of Jerusalem, Judah's capital, are also the whole book's consistent focus. Then the names of the kings remind readers that the chapters need to be understood against the background of this particular period. What Yahweh has to say to Judah and Jerusalem is different in other times.

1:2–4. Judah is actually called "Israel"; it is a partial embodiment of "my people." They are Yahweh's "children." But they do not behave like it. They no longer accept the authority of the head of the family. They do not "know" their father; in the OT know often implies "acknowledge," recognize the authority of, obey.

1:5–9. Their rebellion against Yahweh eventually issued in invasion by the Assyrians, rendering Jerusalem like a man who has been mugged or like a bivouac in the middle of a field, almost as devastated as Sodom and Gomorrah. The implication is that although this chapter comes at the beginning of the book, its message relates to events quite late in Isaiah's own ministry, i.e., during the time of King Hezekiah (the back story comes in chs. 36–37). These verses indicate where Judah's story is going; succeeding sections and chapters will indicate how it got there.

1:10–20. Jerusalem has ended up like Sodom and Gomorrah because it has behaved like Sodom and Gomorrah. There is a mismatch between its worship and its life outside worship. People made costly offerings, celebrated great festivals, and prayed fervently, and as far as one can tell, meant every word. But their lives did not match the nature and concerns of the God they worshiped. Their hands were full of blood: the community includes powerful people who can swindle the vulnerable out of their rights, their land, their livelihood, and thus ultimately of their lives (1 Kgs 21 describes an extreme example). The rest of this community tolerates that and fails to protect such people. They need to remove the blood from their hands if Yahweh is to be able to tolerate looking at these hands raised in worship and prayer. Verse 18 describes the change Yahweh demands, and vv. 19–20 lay alternative destinies before the community.

1:21–31. The prophet again speaks of oppression, of the neglect of the vulnerable, and of the people's worship, though here not orthodox worship of Yahweh whose problem is that it is not matched by a life worthy of Yahweh, but an inclination to traditional, Canaanite-style forms of worship (vv. 29–30). People may have seen this as worship of Yahweh, not worship of other gods, but it was far away from the worship Yahweh could accept, because it again did not match who Yahweh really was. The tragedy of the situation in the city is that it has fallen so short of its destiny and of how things used to be (vv. 21–22). The threat against the people (v. 20) is now expressed more chillingly. But Yahweh's action is designed to purify and restore as well as punish (vv. 25–27). Even shame at those spiritual practices (v. 29) is a positive thing if it turns people back to Yahweh.

2:1. A conclusion closes off this opening summary of Isaiah's ministry.

2:2–5. Jerusalem's Transformation (i)

2:2–4. The vision of Jerusalem's transformation had spoken of justice and judges (1:21, 26, 27), which are related words in Hebrew and reflect people with authority exercising their authority in the right way. This more far-reaching vision speaks of Yahweh "judging" between the nations. The implementing of proper authority will not characterize Jerusalem alone. Jerusalem will be the base from which Yahweh effects that in the world, stopping the nations fighting one another by deciding who is in the right, in the manner of the judges (the body of elders) at the village gate resolving community conflicts. The geophysical transformation (v. 2) is presumably a metaphor; the promise does not indicate how Yahweh will accomplish this goal. But Yahweh will not merely make decisions for the nations in an authoritarian way. The nations will come to be "taught" and receive "instruction." These two words are also related. "Instruction" is torah, often translated "law"—but "instruction" or "teaching" gives a better idea. Yahweh will teach them so that they walk in Yahweh's ways, behavior that might even reduce their conflicts.

2:5. This verse both concludes vv. 2–4 and introduces what follows. "Come, let us walk" takes up the nations' words in v. 3. It is not Jerusalem's job to transform itself in the spectacular fashion of v. 2 so that it may draw the nations, but the people of God are supposed to embody God's vision for the whole world. Perhaps God will use that to draw the world to Zion.

Verses 2–5 appear in a slightly different form in Micah 4:1–5. It is impossible to know which prophet actually uttered them or whether they come from yet another prophet. One need not assume that all the material in a prophetic book came from the prophet whose name stands at the top.

2:6–4:1. Judah's Devastation (ii)

2:6–9. These verses, like 1:1–2:1, indict Judah for its waywardness. The section again begins from the disaster that has already overcome the community. The judgment has issued from the people's inclination to trust in resources other than Yahweh—political, religious, financial, and military. This motif will recur in the book. A prophet's job includes praying for the people, so the frightening prayer in v. 9c likely presupposes that the people do not repent, and also that it is designed to frighten them into doing so. Prophets' words were often designed to avoid being fulfilled.

2:10–22. Such humbling and false trust relate to questions the community needs to take seriously; otherwise it is in danger of calamity. The main focus is on "pride" or "haughtiness," though those English words give only a narrow impression of what the prophet refers to. Verses 12–13 help to make the point clear as they refer to what is "lofty," "lifted up," and "high," and in the subsequent illustration—such as Lebanese cedars and Bashan oaks—the emphasis lies on their impressiveness, not on the attitude they take. So the problem lies in Judah's ability to stand so tall. It is impressive, and it knows it. That means it compromises Yahweh's majesty rather than testifying to it; the word describing Yahweh's majesty (ga'on) is closely related to the word describing the people as proud (ge'eh). So describing the people as of haughty eyes need only imply that they stand tall and look tall and are entitled to do so. The passage doubtless presupposes that the people have become overattached to their impressiveness, but part of its significance is that people find it hard not to do that. Powerful and impressive people start thinking of themselves that way. They are then on the way to disaster.

The day when human impressiveness will be put down is "the day of Yahweh" (v. 12). "Yahweh's day" was a day people anticipated as a time of great blessing, but prophets warned that they could make it the opposite (cf. Amos 5:18). Sometimes "Yahweh's day" appears to be far off, but here it is a day that will come in people's experience. Yahweh's purpose will be implemented in spectacular fashion in their lives, and this will not be pleasant (if they carry on as they are). That day will also expose some of the inappropriate resources in which the people now trust (vv. 20, 22).

3:1–8. Issues concerning Judah's leadership come into focus. First, an aspect of the trouble that will come upon the community is that all its leadership will be gone. "Support and staff" is a metaphor for leadership, while v. 1b describes the results of chaos in the land, and vv. 2–8 itemize the literal reality of the loss of leadership. The community will be driven to recognizing and following the leadership of people who are unqualified and inadequate for the task (some of whom will be wise enough to recognize their inadequacy and resist being drafted), resulting in further social breakdown.

3:9–12. Since vv. 1–7 presuppose that calamity has not yet taken place, v. 8 presumably reflects the situation after Jerusalem and Judah will have fallen. Verses 9–12 fit with that. The people have brought this trouble on themselves; it has not yet happened, but it is inevitable, unless the community does something about it. They attack and defy Yahweh (v. 9a—they will not see themselves as doing that, but it is the implication of their stance). And one reason calamity will take the form of removing their leadership is that the leadership is already a disaster (v. 12). Verses 10–11 make an aspect of Isaiah's challenge more explicit. If the community as a whole has brought this trouble on itself, this action does not rule out the possibility of dissociating oneself from its causes and thus from its effects.

3:13–15. The three little messages about leadership close by explicitly confronting the elders and princes (that is, the government). In the OT, government's central task is to care for ordinary people's needs and rights. But government regularly uses its power to look after itself. It is "my people" you are thus abusing, says Yahweh. The solemnity of that charge is increased when the passage closes with the description of Yahweh as "the Lord GOD of hosts," as it began with the description of Yahweh as "the Sovereign, the LORD of hosts." The expressions are virtually identical in Hebrew; more literally, they mean "the Lord Yahweh of Armies." The expression is difficult to translate, but it clearly means that this sovereign God controls mighty power.

3:16–4:1. In a patriarchal society, the men's job is to exercise the leadership, while their women's job is to exemplify beauty. Presupposing that arrangement, Isaiah complements the indictment of the men regarding their role with a shorter confrontation of these women regarding theirs. Their being able to strut their stuff in their finery depends on their men being involved in the abuse that 3:14–15 described. And the decimating of the men in war that will be their punishment will have its implications for their women (4:1).

4:2–6. Jerusalem's Transformation (ii)

As was the case in 2:2–5, the declaration that trouble is coming is balanced by a promise that this will not be the end of the story. The city's population will be decimated, but there will be "survivors," people who "remain"; the verb links with the word "remnant," which will be important in Isaiah. And these "remains" will see the city and the land beautified and fruitful once again. As 1:25–27 promised, the calamity will be designed not merely to destroy but to purge and cleanse. People do not survive because they are holy (disaster is not selective); they are made holy because they survive. They are not the remnant because they are faithful; because they are a remnant, they are to be faithful. Yahweh will then establish a wall of protection around the city.

5:1–30. Jerusalem's Devastation (iii)

At this point in the book, however, devastation not transformation has the last word. Prophets have to balance the way they talk about these two realities, giving people enough encouragement to motivate them but not so much that they avoid the issues they need to face.

5:1–7. A love song would continue the positive tone of 4:2–6, and vv. 1–2a would give that impression. But the love song changes, and then things get worse and worse. A song about a vineyard would puzzle people less than it puzzles readers today; Israel was often pictured as a vine or an olive tree. But in case people had not gotten the point, v. 7 makes it explicit. The scandalous difference between what Yahweh looked for and what happened is underscored by the words Isaiah uses, whose similarity underscores that contrast. "Justice" is mishpat; "bloodshed" is one letter different, mispakh (literally, "flowing"; it comes only here, and maybe Isaiah invented it to make the point). "Righteousness" is tsedaqa; "a cry" is again one letter different tse'aka. The word for Israel's own cry under oppression in Egypt now comes from the lips of people oppressed by fellow-Israelites.

5:8–24. A series of "Ah"s ("Hey" would give more the impression) protests more concretely the wrongdoing that earns Yahweh's punitive action. The land-grabbing that prevents families from farming their own land will result in the devastation of the houses and land that people have accumulated (vv. 8–10). The self-indulgent partypeople will die of hunger and thirst (vv. 11–17). The people who pervert the legal system to their own ends, and do not believe Yahweh will act, will find that Yahweh does (vv. 18–24), because they have rejected Yahweh's instruction, despised Yahweh's word. "Instruction" (torah) may refer to the teaching in the Torah, in Genesis–Deuteronomy, but the parallelism with Yahweh's "word" suggests it refers to Isaiah's own message.

That is all the more solemn against the background of a particularly significant definition of who Yahweh is (v. 16). This first brings together in parallelism the expressions "Yahweh [of?] Armies" (see comment on 3:13–15) and "Holy God," the short version of Isaiah's distinctive "Holy One of Israel." Yahweh is the frighteningly awesome, overwhelmingly transcendent God. It is unwise to violate Yahweh's Torah; Isaiah 6 will spell out the implications.

Here, the verse itself spells out how Yahweh's awesomeness expresses itself. The verb that speaks of Yahweh being exalted is related to the word for "haughty" in the previous verse. Human majesty is put down as Yahweh's majesty asserts itself. But Yahweh is not just concerned to safeguard divine majesty for its own sake, nor is Yahweh irrationally and unpredictably intense and fierce. Yahweh asserts this majesty and demonstrates holiness by "justice" and "righteousness." These two words attempt to express in English the meaning of Hebrew words that do not have English equivalents. "Justice" is mishpat, the exercise of leadership or authority, which can apply to the implementation of legal justice by judges but has much wider implications. "Righteousness" is tsedaka, which denotes doing the right thing by people in your community, a righteousness embodied in the way one protects and serves other people. Yahweh, then, expresses divine power and holiness by exercising authority in such a way as to do the right thing by "my people" in Israel (3:15). This is a frightening prospect for the powerful, wealthy people in the nation who hear Isaiah's words.

5:25–30. The move between past tense verbs and future tense verbs again suggests that Judah is challenged to respond to the calamity that has come, lest a worse one follow with the arrival of the terrifying Assyrian army. The Assyrians will come because they want to enlarge their empire, but they will come because (unknown to them) Yahweh is whistling for them.

B. An Account of Isaiah's Ministry (6:1–9:7)

The book makes a transition to talking primarily about Isaiah's ministry rather than only relating messages from Yahweh, and from mostly poetry to mostly prose.

6:1–13 Isaiah's Vision of the Holy One, and the Message Isaiah Is to Give

6:1–8. This account of Isaiah's ministry starts by describing how he came to be a prophet. Initially it describes a vision of Yahweh, specifically of Yahweh as the great king (in the context of the earthly king's death) and as the holy one: not just holy but utterly holy. This vision explains why Yahweh's being "the Holy One" is so important in Isaiah. The seraphs come only here in the OT; because saraf means "burn," and on the basis of OT references to fiery serpents, they are usually reckoned to be serpent-like.

6:9–13. This is not really a story about Isaiah's call, because actually Isaiah volunteers, and he is then commissioned to declare a frightening message. Understandably, then, readings in church commonly stop at v. 8, but vv. 1–8 lead inexorably into vv. 9–13. Isaiah's ministry is to stop people from understanding anything, so that terrible punishment falls on them; Jesus says the same applies to his ministry (Mark 4:11–12). The people are already willfully resistant to Yahweh's message; this persistent lack of understanding is one form that punishment will take. At the same time, the point of telling people that this is Isaiah's commission (as with other prophetic declarations of judgment) is presumably in part to shake them into a response that will mean the declaration does not need to be implemented.

7:1–25. Isaiah's Fulfillment of His Commission (i)

7:1–9. An opening summary of the story, like a newspaper headline, is followed by the details. The kings of Judah's northern and eastern neighbors want Judah to join in rebelling against their Assyrian overlords, and if Ahaz is unwilling to do so, they are prepared to depose him. Isaiah wants Ahaz to trust Yahweh such that he need not worry about these two kingdoms. Aram and Ephraim (the northern kingdom, also referred to as "Israel") are not more impressive than their capital cities, and these cities are not more impressive than those two kings. Isaiah's son's name is nicely ambiguous: only remnants of Ephraim and Syria will survive, or only remnants of Assyria will survive, or only remnants of Judah will survive if it does not trust in Yahweh, or at least remnants will survive, or the remnants must return to Yahweh. Isaiah's subsequent words suggest that the first meaning is the primary one in this context.

7:10–17. Isaiah offers Ahaz a sign to bolster his faith; he cannily declines (he would then have no option but to trust Yahweh). Isaiah says he will receive one anyway. A young woman who is present, perhaps Isaiah's wife (as their other children are also given significant names), will have a baby and call it "God-is-with-us." The implication is not that the baby is "God-with-us," any more than that the son in v. 3 is the remnant. Rather the baby's birth will follow the moment when Judah experiences a deliverance that indicates Yahweh has indeed acted, that "God is with us." NRSV assumes that the word for a young woman does not mean virgin; if it does (and the woman is therefore not Isaiah's wife), Isaiah likely means that by the time a woman who is at the moment a virgin but is about to marry conceives and has her first child, the crisis will be over and she will be able to give her baby that name. The further description of the child then elaborates the point. But the sign will do Ahaz no good (v. 17). As is often the case, the New Testament gives the passage new significance in using it to illumine Jesus' story.

7:18–25. Four further declarations elaborate not only on the way Yahweh will bring the Egyptians and Assyrians, but also on the way life will be able to continue after the devastation.

8:1–15. Isaiah's Fulfillment of His Commission (ii)

8:1–4. Names and the birth of a baby are once again means of Isaiah's fulfilling his prophetic commission. This baby is called "Pillage speeds, loot hastens." It is thus again cryptic, like "Remnants will turn," and like Jesus' parables. It draws people's attention and makes them think. The closing words again clarify the meaning in the immediate context. The message is parallel to that of the baby's birth (7:10–17). Getting people to witness the inscription on the tablet will provide evidence in the future that Yahweh really had said this through Isaiah and thus that people should take it seriously then even if they do not now.

8:5–15. Isaiah declares the consequences of ignoring his message about the need to trust Yahweh. "Shiloah" refers to the Siloam stream, Jerusalem's water supply, which is a metaphor for Yahweh's supplying Jerusalem's needs. Alternative waters will all but drown Judah, but not quite do so. Verses 9–10 explain how. "God is with us" recurs at the end of vv. 8 and 10. Countries can plot against Judah, as Ephraim and Aram have done, but they will not succeed. Yet people are inclined to be more awed by Ephraim and Aram than they are by God (vv. 11–15). "Sanctuary" is literally "holy place," so v. 14 picks up the warning in v. 13. Being like a holy place or a rock, Yahweh should provide safety for the people, but they are making Yahweh a threat to themselves.

8:16–22. Isaiah's Gloomy Conclusion

Once again, v. 16 presupposes that people are ignoring Isaiah's warnings. They are more inclined to resort to traditional means of receiving divine guidance such as consulting dead people, who might be expected to know more than the living. So Isaiah puts this message into writing and again has it sealed against the day when his warnings have been fulfilled and the day of darkness has fallen.

9:1–7. The Promising Coda

As usual, Isaiah does not let calamity have the last word; darkness, gloom, and anguish are succeeded by glory, light, and joy. Strikingly, v. 1 begins with a promise for Ephraim, the sibling nation with whom Judah is in conflict and whose devastation Isaiah has promised. For what happened before Ephraim's final fall and is presupposed by v. 1, see 2 Kgs 15:29. But presumably vv. 2–7 apply to Isaiah's actual audience in Judah as well as to Ephraim. The promise is expressed in the past tense, a vivid way of describing something that is certain and guaranteed by God and is therefore in effect on the way, though the very last line ("the zeal of the LORD of hosts will do this") speaks more literally. This is something that Yahweh will definitely make happen.

Christians have used some aspects of the passage to help them understand the significance of Christ, but the passage as a whole does not directly apply to Christ and the NT does not so apply it. Verse 7 does express what Christ will yet do. So far, most if not all the significant children have been Isaiah's; but this is a royal child, perhaps one already born but not yet on the throne (Hezekiah?), or perhaps a Messiah-like figure not yet born. Like the names of those other children, the name in v. 6 does not describe him but describes the reality he points to. Like Immanuel, the name is a description of God, the God who guarantees the ultimate destiny of the people. The day of Midian's defeat (see Judg 6–8) provides an image for Judah's deliverance by Yahweh from Assyria.

C. Confrontations and Promises (ii) (9:8–12:6)

Isaiah returns to words of prophecy directly confronting Judah, though they again look beyond disaster to deliverance and renewal.

9:8–10:4. His Anger Has Still Not Turned Away

The link with 1:1–5:30 is explicit in the refrain (9:12b, 17b, 21b; 10:4b), which takes up that in 5:25b. But 9:8 also follows neatly on 9:7b in describing the power and effectiveness of Yahweh's word. The sequence again speaks of troubles that have already come and of people's unwillingness to learn the lesson from them.

9:8–21. Why does Isaiah focus on calamities that have come to Ephraim, and specifically on its capital city, Samaria (the kind presupposed by 9:1)? Isaiah lived in Jerusalem; as far as one can know, he never went to Samaria, in a foreign country with which Judah had an uneasy relationship. The people who heard these messages would be the Judeans themselves. This message might make them feel comfortable; bad news about another country can do that. But they could undergird Isaiah's emphasis on not being afraid of its big and apparently impressive neighbor. The calamities that had come on Ephraim provide evidence of the truth of Isaiah's message in 7:1–17.

10:1–4. There is something else. In 9:8–21, it is all about "them." But much of the description of Ephraim repeats features of Isaiah's critique of Judah, which ought to make Judah feel uncomfortable as it listens; Ephraim is only the same as Judah. This final part of the sequence (ending with the final occurrence of the refrain, in v. 4b) makes that explicit: it addresses "you." One function of 9:8–21 is to set up the people in Judah who are Isaiah's actual audience. If they have said "Yes" to 9:8–21, these verses make them see they have been challenging themselves. They, too, are people who think they can solve their own problems and turn a crisis into a challenge (9:8–12). They, too, are people who will not let trouble make them turn back to Yahweh (9:13–17). They, too, risk being torn apart by their own greed (9:18–21; Ephraim and Manasseh are the two big clans within Ephraim—the northern kingdom—as a whole). They, too, make the legal system work against the interests of the needy (10:1–2). So they, too, stand in peril of Yahweh's anger.

10:5–23. The Downfall of Assyria and the Restoring of Israel (i)

10:5–19. The means for expressing Yahweh's anger and raising Yahweh's hand (v. 4) is Assyria and Assyria's hand (v. 5). Yet Assyria does not act like a law court judge, who is there simply to serve the people, but does what it does for its own reasons, pursuing its own expansionist policies. It treats Yahweh as just the same as any other "idol," and it is naturally but unwisely rather proud of its achievements. So Judah is not only just the same as Ephraim; in its natural pride in itself it is just the same as Assyria. But Assyria, too, must be put in its place. The Holy One is a threat to Assyria, just as the Holy One is to Judah. Remains of Assyria will be left, but only enough to witness to the fact that it once existed.

10:20–23. For Israel, the survival of some remains bears a more positive significance. Admittedly, 10:20–23 holds in sharp tension the fearsomely bad news and the gleam of good news. Catastrophic destruction is decreed in the land (so the note to v. 23 in NRSV). But something will be left. Isaiah does not imply that this remnant deserves to survive; they are simply people who are fortunate enough to escape. But they can then be the nucleus of a new Israel, if they choose to be. The question is whether the surviving remnant makes a commitment now to become the faithful remnant. The marker of that will be a commitment to leaning on Yahweh instead of leaning on Assyria, which turned into the one that struck them (v. 20). That is what the Judah of Isaiah's day has refused to do.

10:24–11:16. The Downfall of Assyria and the Restoring of Israel (ii)

Once again the sequences of prophecies come in pairs; this pair parallels 10:5–23.

10:24–34. Yahweh promises that Assyria's attacks and domination will not go on forever; in fact they will soon cease (10:24–27a). The model for the act of deliverance is again what Yahweh did at the exodus and in Gideon's day (Judg 6–8). The promise of speedy action makes this a good example of the possibility that later disciples of Isaiah were inspired to update his prophecies during the time when Assyria actually was about to fall, a century after Isaiah's own time. The imaginary account of the Assyrians advancing on Jerusalem from the north through the area now dominated by Ramallah (10:27b–32) does not correspond to any known attack, but it gives a vivid picture of what an advance might be like, to feed people's imagination. It culminates in the army's arrival at a point where they can see the city and plan to attack it next day. But Yahweh then intervenes. Once again, the Assyrian forces are pictured as a mighty forest (cf. 10:16–19), which Yahweh intends to cut down (vv. 33–34).

11:1–10. Related to that victory is the promise of Israel's restoration, initially focusing on the restoration of the Davidic monarchy. David's line, which goes back to David's father Jesse, has also become like a tree that Yahweh has cut down, as subsequently happened with the fall of Jerusalem in 587. But sometimes a felled tree can grow again, and Yahweh declares that this will indeed happen. This "shoot" or "branch" becomes an image for what was later called the Messiah. He will be all that a king is supposed to be, and more. He will have the insight to lead Israel, being the sort of person who acknowledges and reveres Yahweh. That will mean he governs the land with the right combination of concern for the needy, intolerance about the way they can be abused by the legal system, and ruthlessness with the people who do abuse them (vv. 3b–5: in the context, the "earth" likely refers to the "land" of Israel in particular, as in 10:23). Whereas his actual growth might be seen as a natural process (felled trees sometimes do produce new shoots), what he will do cannot be understood in that way. He will achieve what he achieves not because of his innate insight or spirituality but because Yahweh's spirit will rest on him. In this context, the vision in vv. 6–9 is likely then another image for the peace that the new David will achieve. The weak will be safe. Indeed, by implication there is here a positive message even for the people in power, the abusers. They can decide to live in peace with the weak rather than behaving with the ruthlessness that characterizes Judah's authorities.

11:11–16. What the "shoot" will achieve will draw the nations to him and to the place where he lives (v. 10; compare 2:2–4). That last note forms a segue to a vision of Yahweh not only drawing the nations themselves but commissioning them to bring back the peoples of both Judah and Ephraim from their dispersion around the Middle East and the Mediterranean (vv. 10–16). The mutual hostility of Ephraim and Judah will dissolve, they will be able to repossess the whole of the land, and the obstacles to their return will disappear.

As is commonly the case with prophecies, these promises in 10:24–11:16 saw some fulfillment in Isaiah's day and over succeeding centuries. Isaiah 36–37 relates some cutting down of Assyria to size, and Assyria fell to Babylon in the next century. When Babylon fell to the Persians, they freed Judean exiles and refugees to return to Judah. Such partial fulfillments are part of what encourages Israel to continue to look for more complete fulfillment. Similarly, the extent to which Christ fulfills something of these prophecies (see Rom 15:12) encourages us to look for his complete fulfillment of the promise expressed in (for instance) 11:1–10.

12:1–6. A Song to Sing in that Day

Giving Judah a song of praise to sing when those promises have been fulfilled is another way of underlining the certainty that fulfillment will come. Divine anger and thus chastisement will then have given way to comfort (see 40:1) and deliverance from Assyrian (and Babylonian) control (49:8). Withering will give way to wells for drawing from (41:17–18—"fountains" there is the same word as "wells" here). Whereas Isaiah has been unable to persuade people to trust, now they will do so, and they need not be afraid (cf. 44:8). It will be an experience like the Red Sea deliverance, and the song will be able to pick up the themes of Israel's song then (Exod 15:1–18). Like the thanksgivings in the Psalms, it will deserve to be sung so that the whole world can hear, because what Yahweh does for Israel is also good news for the whole world. Chapters 1–12 close with an acknowledgment of Yahweh as "the Holy One of Israel," Isaiah's signature way of proclaiming God.

II. The Nations (13:1–23:18)

Isaiah has already referred to nations other than Judah such as Aram and Assyria, but now these other nations come into focus. Sometimes the prophecies are addressed to these other nations, but even when that is so, they are directly intended for Judah's hearing. It is doubtful whether the other nations ever heard them, or were intended to do so. They are designed to help Judah to understand the nations of its day in the right way. Chapters 1–12 attest that Judah was naturally inclined either to fear them or to establish alliances with them. Isaiah 13–23 seeks to wean them from either attitude.

A. The Northern Powers (13:1–14:27)

The chapters begin with the two great empires that impinged on or controlled Judah from the late eighth century till 539.

13:1–14:23. Babylon

In Isaiah's day, Babylon was a medium-sized power south of Assyria, under Assyrian domination. It was interested in making common cause with Ephraim and Judah, which also had an ambivalent relationship with Assyria (cf. Isa 39). Yet this interest offers no explanation for its occupying nearly a quarter of the chapters concerning the nations. But it would make entire sense in the sixth century, when Babylon had taken Assyria's place as the imperial power, destroyed Jerusalem, and taken many Judeans to Babylon. Perhaps these prophecies come from Isaiah, but they have been arranged and/or expanded in that later context.

13:1–16. Here, with the exception of the heading, there is no overt reference to Babylon. Yahweh summons unnamed warriors to come and make a desolation of the earth. This could easily describe Yahweh's summoning Babylon itself to bring desolation to Assyria. But the lack of specificity makes it open to being applied to Babylon's own fall. By implication, Assyria's fall to Babylon and Babylon's fall to Persia are instances of a recurrent pattern in Yahweh's activity. Empires think the sun will never set on them, but Yahweh brings them down by using another empire that does not realize it is Yahweh's servant, an army made holy (v. 3) through being drafted by Yahweh. The sequence of superpowers is not meaningless chance but something in which Yahweh is involved, in their rise and their demise.

The superpower's fall occurs on "the day of the LORD" (vv. 6, 9). This is not a far-off day or a final one but one that happens in the experience of the hearers of this prophecy. Yet the fact that the protagonists are unnamed and Isaiah speaks about "the world" and "the whole earth" also implies that this particular day is one embodiment of Yahweh's ultimate purpose.

13:17–22. Only now does it become clear that it is the Medes whom Yahweh is stirring to put the Babylonians down. The Medes controlled an empire east of Babylonia (in roughly contemporary terms, Media was equivalent to Iran, Babylonia to Iraq). Yahweh is happy to use the Medes with their violent instincts as a means of bringing about Babylon's downfall. Like the imaginary picture of the Assyrians approaching Jerusalem (11:27b–32), the picture of the Medes conquering Babylon is not a literal prediction of what would happen. The people of Babylon wisely surrendered to the Medo-Persian army and the city was not destroyed. Scriptural thinking does not assume that prophecies need to be literally fulfilled; they are works of a divinely inspired imagination. The total collapse of the Babylonian Empire to the Persians was enough to count as fulfillment of this prophecy.

14:1–2. For Israel, the significance of Babylon's fall is that their oppression by Babylon will not be the final chapter. The ruled will become the rulers, the served will become the servants (TNIV; "slaves" is likely misleading).

14:3–23. Two related pictures portray the death of the Babylonian king. Verses 3–11 imagine a funeral dirge to lament this death, portraying the king's arrival in the abode of the dead. His victims rejoice at the security this brings; other world leaders comment on his ending up just like them. Verses 12–21 then take up an ancient Near Eastern myth to portray his fall. Each morning the Venus star (the "day star") rises just before the sun but is then eclipsed by the sun itself. In the myth, that suggested a subordinate god trying to become the chief god but failing. The prophecy turns this plot into an allegory of the Babylonian king who had wanted to be the king of the world, in effect to be God, but one who would be put down. The reason for this is the king's abuse of his own people (v. 20). For "Day Star," the KJV has "Lucifer," which presupposed and encouraged the assumption that vv. 3–11 refer to the fall of Satan. This interpretation corresponds to the meaning of the ancient Near Eastern myth but not to the meaning of this passage in Isaiah, where the myth has become a parable, a way of picturing the historical event of the king's pretensions and his fall.

14:24–27. Assyria

In Isaiah's own day, Assyria is the empire that matters. The prophecy again speaks in terms of "the whole earth" and "all the nations," showing how Yahweh's dealings with one empire express Yahweh's intentions for the entire world. This declaration concerning Assyria indeed came true; so Yahweh could also bring to fulfillment the declaration concerning Babylon.

B. Judah's Neighbors (14:28–17:11)

After paying attention to the imperial setting of Judah's situation, the book focuses on the people's immediate context. It moves through Judah's neighbors in a circle from Philistia in the west and southwest via Moab in the southeast to Aram and Ephraim in the northeast and north.

14:28–32. Philistia

The Philistines occupied an area on the Mediterranean including Gaza. The link with Ahaz's death (about 715 BCE) may mark this time as one of anxiety and uncertainty about what policy changes a new king will bring. Perhaps it is in this connection that Philistia is sending envoys to Jerusalem. But the reference to a broken rod indicates that the context also includes the recent death of an Assyrian emperor who had invaded the area. Philistia was more vulnerable to such attacks, sitting on the main route between Assyria and Egypt. It may hope to get Judah to ally with it against the imperial power. Isaiah resolutely opposes Judah's substituting political maneuvers for trust in Yahweh's commitment to Zion (v. 32b). Perhaps giving Philistia this message even invites them to put their trust in Zion.

15:1–16:14. Moab

The Moabites, Judah's neighbor to the southeast, occupied the territory across the Dead Sea. They, too, were inclined to try to get Judah to join them in rebelling against Assyria. For them, too, Isaiah warns of disaster; but the message is designed for the Judeans to hear, again to bolster their resistance to talk of alliance and rebellion. The passage brings together a sequence of originally separate poems about Moab, arranged so that portrayals of disaster (15:1–9; 16:6–14) stand on either side of a more promising vision (16:1–5).

15:1–9. Once more, the portrayal of disaster hitting Moab does not describe something that has already happened in the way that it happened, nor something that is to happen in the way it is to happen. It is an imaginary scenario, a picture of what another invasion could be like for Moab and what its implications could be for the people. In the aftermath of such devastation throughout the different Moabite cities and regions, people make pilgrimage to the land's sanctuaries to mourn and lament there. Paradoxically, Isaiah or Yahweh cries out for the Moabites in their suffering and declares that there will be even more.

16:1–5. This invitation makes more explicit than 14:32 that Judah's neighbors are invited to have recourse to Yahweh when they suffer disaster. They can bring gifts to the Davidic king and the God of Zion and seek their wisdom and refuge, fulfilling the vision of 2:2–4.

16:6–14. This picture of tough love or loving toughness adds a note of rationale for the disaster, which lies in Moab's majesty and self-assurance that need to be exposed. At the same time, the passage again grieves over the people's suffering, declares that even this will not be the end of disaster, and adds that having recourse to their sanctuaries (to have their gods to protect them) will not help them.

17:1–11. Aram and Ephraim

17:1–9. Completing the circle around Judah, Isaiah comes to Aram and Ephraim (cf. 7:1–9; 8:1–4). There is something shocking about the inclusion of Ephraim, which includes most of the clans that were supposed to comprise Israel (they are called Jacob in v. 4); they are thus bracketed with a foreign people. They stand together with them in their politics and they will be together with them in their fate. As with Moab, one of the disaster's consequences will be to convince Aram that its humanly devised religion is useless (vv. 7–8).

17:10–11. "You" is feminine singular, suggesting it addresses a city; the indictment implies an Israelite city that has turned away from Yahweh to use the methods of traditional religion to seek to ensure a harvest. Is this Samaria, Ephraim's capital? Or has Isaiah turned round to address Jerusalem itself? Or does either city have to ask, "Is it I?"

C. The Empire (17:12–14)

At the center of this sequence of declarations about individual nations is one about "the nations," which in the prophets is often a term for the imperial power of the day that comprises and controls many individual peoples. This multinational entity is pictured as thundering and roaring as it asserts itself and seeks to extend its tentacles over a little people such as Judah. Nonetheless, they will vanish with the dawn.

D. The Southern Powers (18:1–20:6)

Judah and its neighbors sat between the great powers to the north and east and the great powers to the south. In Isaiah's day an Ethiopian dynasty ruled in Egypt, so "Ethiopia" or "Egypt" refers to the same power. Egypt was sometimes a threat to Judah, sometimes a resource it relied on as it played one great power off against another, sometimes a temptation as it could itself seek to get Judah to collaborate in resisting Assyrian power and domination. Like the prophecies regarding Moab, 18:1–20:6 sit at the center of promises of a positive future for Egypt, but frame them with warnings of disaster.

18:1–7. Ethiopia

Isaiah himself was in no position to dismiss Ethiopian envoys seeking Judean cooperation to conduct their foreign policy. His message is for Judean politicians who would actually decide how to respond to these diplomatic approaches. Once again the political oracle closes by noting how these foreign peoples will come to recognize Yahweh.

19:1–25. Egypt

19:1–15. Initially everything is negative; Judah must not take Egypt too seriously as a potential ally. Egypt was famed for its intellectual resources, and intellectual resources are also a political resource; Egypt has plans for its role in the Middle East and Judah is inclined to go along with them in formulating its own plans. It is not surprising that Egypt ignores the fact that Yahweh also has plans. It is sadder that Judah does so: see vv. 3, 11 ("counsel" is the same word), 12, and 17 (also 5:19; 8:10; 14:24–27; 30:1). A major aim here is to get Judah to see that its own plans are based on false premises and that Egypt's policy-making will let it down. Egypt is destined to experience being under a "hard master" (maybe Assyria) just as it had long ago been a hard master over Israel. The Nile's affliction also recalls the exodus story. But the Nile was Egypt's great pride. Egypt never had to worry about drought as Judah did. But the resource Egypt thought it could always rely on will let it down.

19:16–25. These verses provide a transition to looking at Egypt quite differently. A bridge passage (vv. 16–17) continues the warning tone of vv. 1–15 and the theme of planning, but it is the first of five prose prophecies about features of "that day," a day that lies beyond current circumstances, a time when Yahweh's purpose will be fulfilled. That need not make it a far-off day, but it is marked off from the present, as the message in vv. 1–15 is not. On that day, confidence will be turned into fear, an appropriate stance to Yahweh (the words for "tremble," "fear," and "terror" can all have a positive meaning in connection with awe). Egyptians will speak Hebrew and swear allegiance to Yahweh. Yahweh will relate to Egypt in the same way as to Israel (vv. 19–22). Egypt and Assyria will worship together; they will be "my people" and "the work of my hands," like and with Israel. Thus Israel will fulfill its Abrahamic vocation to be a blessing in the midst of the earth as it stands between them geographically and mediates between them.

After the exile, Egypt became a major center of Jewish life and thus a place where Yahweh was worshiped. It was eventually the place at which the Scriptures were translated into Greek so that Greek-speaking Jews and Gentiles could read them. Nothing like vv. 24–25 came true, yet Israel held onto these promises and incorporated them in their Scriptures, apparently in the conviction that they were still true prophecies, expressions of Yahweh's purpose that would still be fulfilled one way or another.

20:1–6. Egypt and Ethiopia

In the context of events taking place in 711 BCE (also reported in Sargon's own records), Isaiah makes more concrete his declaration concerning Assyria's defeat of Egypt and Ethiopia, and dramatizes it. Since Isaiah's speaking of Yahweh's words is Yahweh's means of implementing them (cf. 9:8), so is acting out what Yahweh intends. Isaiah need not have spent three whole years going about virtually naked (in the freezing cold of a Jerusalem winter); perhaps he appeared from time to time like that. But perhaps that is to try to rationalize what he did and reduce it to something we can more easily envisage.

E. The Northern Powers, and Jerusalem Itself (21:1–23:17)

21:1–17. Babylon

21:1–10. In returning to the northern powers, only with v. 9 does one discover that the first message concerns Babylon; "wilderness of the sea" presumably meant something to Isaiah's hearers but it remains a mystery to us. Verse 1b describes the coming of an unidentified army, also conveying a tone of mystery and terror (cf. vv. 3–4). Once again Yahweh is commissioning conquerors to put Babylon down (cf. 13:1–22). This will apparently involve deceit; allies will turn into attackers (vv. 2, 5). Elam and Media are beyond Babylon to the east. Verses 6–9 describe the commissioning of a lookout on the walls of the city that sent off the attacking army, waiting for news to come of whether they have been successful; in v. 9b he declares that they have been. Babylon's fall in 539 would be a fulfillment of the vision, and v. 10 might reflect the way this is good news for Judah.

21:11–12. Dumah is an oasis near Babylon, perhaps inevitably sucked into the kind of conflict vv. 1–10 describe. Here, people who fear a surprise night attack wait anxiously for the morning; the lookout reminds them that surviving one night only means facing another.

21:13–17. Dedan and Tema in turn are oases near Dumah, and Kedar is a people (rather than a place) in that area. "Desert plain" is 'arav; these people live in northwest Arabia. They too are apparently affected by these events. Verse 14 attests to a need for people to have compassion on fugitives. Verses 16–17 recognize that these events in far-off lands take place within Yahweh's sovereignty.

22:1–25. Jerusalem

22:1–14. The audience might again be unsure what city the enigmatic heading refers to, but might assume it was another obscure foreign city, which apparently had a narrow but rather ignominious escape from destruction (vv. 1–3). Then they discover that the prophecy is talking about— themselves (vv. 4–14); see further chs. 36–37. This section also presupposes that the great escape is not the end. People have failed to learn the lesson from what happened. As usual, Isaiah berates them for thinking they were responsible for their own destiny and not letting a crisis make them turn to Yahweh. As usual, he puts the implications of their words into their mouths (they did not actually utter the words in v. 13b). By simply rejoicing in Yahweh's deliverance and not turning to Yahweh, they were signing the death warrant that would be delivered when Jerusalem fell in 587 BCE.

Ironically, Jerusalem's eventual captors are to be the same sort of people that in the previous chapter destroyed Babylon. They will not actually be the identical people, but referring to these people helps to underline a point. In one sense, and theologically, Jerusalem is a city with a very different status and significance from all the other places in chs. 13–23. But the unexpected incorporation of Jerusalem here suggests to its people that in a sense it is just another city. It behaves that way, and it will be treated in such a way.

22:15–25. Isaiah turns to Shebna, a senior politician of the day, who is building an impressive tomb for himself in the city. Because of his commitment to this memorial, he will be ignominiously cast out and replaced by Eliakim, who will exercise his important role.

23:1–18. Tyre

23:1–14. The declarations concerning the nations close with Tyre, south of modern Beirut. Tyre, the great trading and maritime power to the northwest of Jerusalem, and Babylon, the great political and military power to the northeast, thus form a bracket around these declarations. The prophecy works by imagining peoples' horror and astonishment when its trading and maritime power collapses. Sidon, its neighbor, is naturally associated with Tyre's fate. Like other powers, it is put down precisely because of its greatness, which causes it to be rather impressed with itself (vv. 9–12). And like other powers, it is thus the victim of Yahweh's capacity to make a plan and implement it (v. 9).

The old city of Tyre is a small island half a mile off the coast, located in a very strong defensive position. It is "the fortress of the sea" (v. 4), always hard to conquer. It was better placed than most Levantine cities to resist incorporation into one of the great empires or engage in successful rebellion against a superpower. Even Nebuchadnezzar failed to capture it (Ezek 29:17–18), and Alexander the Great did so only by building a causeway to the city.

23:15–18. Again paralleling other declarations, these final verses indicate that destruction is not the end of the story. Tyre can turn to Yahweh. After the regular "seventy years," it will eventually return to trading, but now dedicating its profits to Yahweh, supporting the worship of Yahweh. The declaration presupposes that trading is like prostitution (it turns relationships into a means of making money?). (Prophets can use bold imagery.)

III. The World (24:1–27:13)

Through chs. 1–23, the geographical and temporal horizon keeps broadening. Chapters 24–27 have a yet wider horizon. They make little reference to concrete peoples or events and talk rather about the wasting of the whole earth, about the swallowing up of death, and about Yahweh's dealing with cosmic forces of resistance. They do refer to Judah and Jerusalem (e.g., 24:23; 26:1). Those whom Isaiah addresses are still the people living there, confronted by a world that ignores Yahweh's expectations and purposes and by an empire with its great capital that abuses a little people such as Judah.

A. The Earth Laid Waste (24:1–16)

24:1–13. A Horrifying Vision (i)

The imagery is dominated by a wasting of the world, from which no one is protected by their status or resources (the "now" in v. 1 is a logical "now," not a temporal one). The author (vv. 5–6) assumes that Yahweh has made known basic expectations to the whole world, and in fact made an everlasting covenant with the earth. The passage refers to the Noachian covenant or something like it. Humanity's failure to live up to those basic expectations leads to a curse that devours the world. The language of curse also recalls Gen 3–4, though the word for curse here is different (strictly, it denotes an oath).

24:14–16. A Response of Praise and Dismay

The prophet hears voices praising Yahweh (vv. 14–16a). The passage does not indicate whose voices these are. Nonetheless, the prophet is unable to join with them, because of a sense of horror at the current state of affairs (v. 16b).

B. Earth and Heaven in Tumult (24:17–25:5)

24:17–23. A Horrifying Vision (ii)

The second vision of total devastation briefly recapitulates the first one (vv. 17–20), then adds another dimension (vv. 21–23). Whereas the first confined itself to this world and emphasized how the calamity affected all sorts of people, the second adds reference to "the host of heaven" and "the kings of earth." The former stand over against "the LORD of hosts" and the latter stand over against the idea of Yahweh "reigning" (v. 23; in Hebrew "king" is melekh, "reign" is malakh). This perspective offers a different way of describing the world's sin. "Transgression" is here pesha', which denotes rebelling against authority. The prophet sees the world's sin as lying in the way entities that were supposed to accept Yahweh's authority rebelled against it. There are such entities on earth; the passage assumes that there are similar heavenly powers. The reference to the sun and the moon perhaps reflects astrological religions' belief in the authority of heavenly powers, exercised via the stars and planets. There seems to be something demonic (we might say) about the way human authorities behave. Wittingly or unwittingly, they seem to be related to something bigger than themselves. But Yahweh will punish them as well. And thus Jerusalem will become the place from which Yahweh reigns (cf. 2:2–4).

25:1–5. A Willing Response

There is no equivocation about the response to the second vision (contrast 24:14–16). The putting down of the heavenly and earthly powers proved Yahweh to be the refuge of the needy, amongst whom Judah could see itself. Perhaps the implication is that the heavenly and earthly authorities are their oppressors. Or perhaps Yahweh has proved to be the refuge of the needy by protecting them in the midst of the calamity that overwhelmed the earth. Either way, even the strong and ruthless now acknowledge Yahweh. The parallelism with "glorify" suggests that "fear" has the common connotation of "revere/acknowledge/worship." Once again there is good news as well as bad news for the victims of Yahweh's judgment. They come to see the truth and acknowledge it.

C. The World Rejoicing, Moab Humiliated (25:6–26:19)

25:6–12. An Encouraging Vision (i)

All peoples will come to Mount Zion, as Yahweh brings war to an end. The ensuing celebration eliminates the experience of death, grief, and mourning associated with war. There will be a feast resembling a great festival such as Passover or Tabernacles or such as the Israelite elders feasting with Yahweh at Sinai (Exod 24). These occasions were not confined to people who were born Israelites; foreigners in Israel who chose to become full members of the community could participate. This celebration is more deliberately an occasion for all peoples (cf. 2:2–4), other victims of the power that is being destroyed. At the same time, it is still good news for Israel, because God removes the disgrace that has come upon Israel through its many military defeats. Yahweh's bringing peace to the world also means that he is delivering Israel.

God's decisive action does not remove from people the necessity to make their response to Yahweh. While the banquet is for all peoples and Moab has already been singled out and implicitly invited (16:1–5), if it prefers to hang onto its pride and its own strength, it will pay the price (vv. 10b–12).

26:1–19. A Response of Praise and Yearning

Whereas the responses in 24:14–16 and 25:1–5 come in the present, as reactions to what God intends to do, this response initially takes the form of a song that will be sung at the time when Yahweh does what the visions declare; cf. 12:1–6. But the response of praise (vv. 1–6) gives way to a response of yearning for God to act in accordance with the vision (vv. 7–19), cf. 24:14–16, which contained two comparable elements. When the people of God stand between God's making promises and God's fulfilling them, then both praise and prayer are appropriate.

26:1–6. Judah will be in a position to give praise for the strength of its city. It looks so much less impressive than a city such as Babylon, but is much stronger because Yahweh protects it (the word translated "victory" is yeshu'a, usually translated by words such as "deliverance"). Once again the prophecy pictures Jerusalem open to other peoples. The people who live there are to open its gates so that any nation that keeps faith can enter.

26:7–19. But all this lies in the future. In the manner of a psalm, vv. 7–8 go on to declare that the people believe those declarations, but do not experience them at the present time. Yahweh is the God of mercy and grace (the word translated "favor" also means "grace") and is therefore inclined to postpone the moment of putting down the oppressor, but if Yahweh does so forever, he would encourage people to think they can get away with anything (vv. 9–11). Verses 12–19 then mix future tense and past tense verbs, but vv. 14–15 denote what will be true when Yahweh has acted (as was the case in 9:2–4). Yahweh will have put down the nation's foreign overlords in such a way that they will never come back to life and power, and, as a result, Yahweh's own people, which seemed dead, will be brought back to life. The imagery of death and resurrection thus involves the entire people of God, as is the case with Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1–14), not those of a single person.

D. Israel Protected and Restored: An Encouraging Vision (ii) (26:20–27:13)

26:20–21. These verses, too, are similar to the discourse of psalms. When people pray, Yahweh responds; psalms sometimes include this response (notably, Ps 12). Here Yahweh responds to the reflections and yearning expressed in 26:7–19. People cannot see any sign that deliverance is coming or that the moribund nation is going to be revived as the "lofty city" is brought down. The prophecy declares that this is such a real and certain event that Yahweh's people need to prepare for that dire time.

Chapter 27 adds four more promises about how things will be "on that day" or "in days to come." Admittedly such expressions imply a disjunction between the present and the future. Things that will take place "on that day" may be certain, but there is no sign of them arriving. The people of God have to live by faith that Yahweh's word will indeed be fulfilled.

27:1. First, Yahweh will complete the task of subduing the powers of disorder and resistance that was begun at creation, the powers embodied in the "lofty city." When the OT refers to "Satan," it does not imply a figure with the profile of Satan in the NT, but when it speaks of Leviathan, the serpent, or the dragon, it can imply a figure rather like that (cf. Rev 12:9).

27:2–5. Second, the relationship between the vinedresser and the vine will be restored to one of protection rather than attack (contrast 5:1–7). As NRSV understands v. 4, the vine itself will still need to make sure it generates no thorns and briers; but other translations take these thorns and briers to be attackers of the vine, with whom Yahweh relishes the idea of fighting.

27:6–11. Third, the vine will thus flourish and so the fortunes of the people will be reversed. Israel has paid the price for its guilt, but that means it can now be restored; the destruction it has experienced means the forms of worship that offended Yahweh have been destroyed. The fortified city (vv. 10–11) is presumably again the lofty city that symbolizes the oppressive superpower, as in 25:2; it has proved unwilling to face the facts about its position and about God's expectations of it, and it pays the price, so that its oppression comes to an end.

27:12–13. Fourth, Yahweh will bring the scattered people home from both ends of the world to which they have been scattered so that they can join in worship again.

IV. Judah in the Time of Hezekiah (28:1–33:24)

Chapters 28–33 comprise five sections, all beginning hoy. The exclamation resembles the English "Hey" in drawing people's attention to what follows, but it can have various nuances (NRSV translates "Ah," "Oh," and "Alas"). Whereas earlier chapters have referred to King Ahaz, chs. 28–33 is the time of King Hezekiah, who will himself eventually appear in chs. 36–39. Isaiah's critique of the people in the context of Ahaz's reign in chs. 1–12 emphasized the way the haves were abusing the have-nots, though it also referred to the nation's need to trust in Yahweh rather than in political alliances. In this new context, the minor theme has become the major theme. Ephraim has fallen to the Assyrians, who are now threatening Judah. Judah is therefore inclined to look in the opposite direction for support, to Egypt (see 30:1–7; 31:1–3).

A. A Covenant with Death (28:1–29)

28:1–6. This chapter takes its time about revealing the real agenda, the theme of trust that will run through the chapters (see vv. 11–12, 15–16). First (vv. 1–4) it again expresses judgment on Ephraim, in a way that might be calculated to make the people of Judah cheer, though it also speaks about the way this act will not be Yahweh's last word (vv. 5–6). It is odd that by this time Ephraim has already fallen to the Assyrians. Perhaps Isaiah is referring to people living in the capital, Samaria, who escaped deportation, or perhaps he is recalling a message he delivered in those earlier decades.

28:7–13. Either way, the point lies in the way he turns to his own people to say "You are just as bad." His particular focus is the self-indulgence of the people who were supposed to guide people in the right way (vv. 7–8) and their related scorn for Isaiah's message (vv. 9–13). They think that message is too juvenile to take seriously. It means declining to take adult responsibility. But ignoring it will be their downfall.

28:14–22. In making treaties or covenants with a nation such as Egypt, they think they are safeguarding their lives but actually they are committing suicide. Of course they do not see themselves as having made an alliance with Sheol, the abode of the dead, but that is the implication of their having made a treaty with Egypt. They are bringing disaster on themselves; Sheol is where they will end up. Trust in Yahweh is the key to security, whereas trusting in something else will destroy the people. Yahweh in person will bring that about. It will be a great act such as the one described in 2 Sam 5:17–25 and 1 Chr 14:8–16; except that this time Yahweh will be acting against Israel, not for Israel. Isaiah notes that it seems strange that Yahweh would bring such a calamity on Israel. The natural thing for Yahweh to do is be faithful and merciful. But people need to be aware that Yahweh will enact punishment when it is appropriate.

28:23–29. Isaiah then speaks in the manner of a teacher whose insight appears in Proverbs. This is paradoxical because Isaiah has been challenging people not to rely too much on human wisdom. But he points out that the wisdom of a farmer, who knows how and when to plow as well as how and when to sow, illustrates the wisdom with which Yahweh operates in Israel's life (not surprisingly, because the farmer's wisdom comes from Yahweh). Yahweh plows, which is an unpleasant experience for the ground, but Yahweh also sows, and knows how to do both. The close of the chapter thus offers allusive encouragement after Isaiah has once again warned of disaster to come.

B. Disaster Threatened and Averted (i) (29:1–24)

29:1–8. This chapter unfolds dramatically. First it speaks of Jerusalem as the city David camped against and captured, so that it became the city where Israel worshiped. Now it seems as if David is again besieging Jerusalem, except that Israel is David's victim, and Yahweh's victim. Only here is Jerusalem called "Ariel"; the name sounds like the term for the hearth round the altar where animals were burned as a sacrifice. The whole city is going to be consumed by fire; except that, at the last minute, Yahweh reprieves it, changes sides, and defeats its attackers. The warning and promise correspond to two sides of Yahweh's relationship with Israel. The people's faithlessness means Yahweh has to take action against it, but Yahweh's faithfulness means Yahweh will finally be merciful.

29:9–16. The faithlessness and the imperative of chastisement are developed, with further paradox and an awareness of the mystery of human willfulness. The people are blind and deaf to what Yahweh is doing. They will not see the truth; indeed they seem unable to do so. What stops them? It is their own unwillingness to see and hear. Yet a person cannot help being blind and deaf. Yahweh has already told Isaiah that he is to be the means for making them deaf and blind; it is part of the punishment for their turning away from Yahweh (6:9–10). The people are engaged in joyful worship, they know all the words to sing, but their true attitude as expressed in their life does not correspond to what the words say. In the OT, the heart usually refers not to the emotions but to what one may call the mind, the inward person forming attitudes and making decisions about how to live. The people's hearts being far from Yahweh when they worship means there is a mismatch between their worship, which might be full of enthusiasm, and the way they live. In worship they acknowledge Yahweh's wisdom, but they live on the basis of their own wisdom. As in 28:15, they may not literally say that Yahweh has no understanding, but that is implied by the way they decide to run their political affairs.

29:17–24. In turn, the divine faithfulness and mercy reappear. The movement of forest becoming farmland and farmland becoming forest is another image for the way Yahweh's wisdom works (cf. 28:23–29). The time will come when the deaf and blind will see, the needy will have reason to rejoice, their abusers will be put down, the shamed will be honored, and the faithless will acknowledge Yahweh as the holy one.

C. The Wisdom of Relying on Yahweh (i) (30:1–33)

30:1–7. The context continues to be the Assyrian threat to Judah, but the focus moves to political policy in Jerusalem, seeking alliance with and support from Egypt. Isaiah presses the scandalous nature of this action in two ways. First, Judah is contravening the alliance it has already made with Yahweh. The words tell the story, especially the word plan: Yahweh is supposed to be the one who makes plans for Judah. Second, Yahweh is supposed to be the people's refuge, protection, shelter, shadow, help (cf. Ps 91). Once more, the words tell the story. It is blasphemous to treat Egypt as if it could have that significance (again, no doubt Isaiah is interpreting the politicians' actual words), and this will not only fail but have the opposite effect. Rahab (the name is differently spelled in Hebrew from the Rahab in Joshua) is another term for an embodiment of dynamic power asserted against God; it is associated with the battle at the Red Sea (cf. Isa 51:9). If Egypt could only live up to its reputation, it might be of some use to Judah, but it will turn out to be too weak to do so.

30:8–14. In further expounding the nature of Judah's rebellion and seeking to bring Judah to its senses, the prophecy invites them to see how their reputation for rebellion will haunt them forever. The words attributed to them reflect their behavior rather than constitute their actual words, but v. 11b is especially chilling. Isaiah indicts them for blasphemy, "trusting in" and "relying on" something other than Yahweh: indeed, in oppression and deceit. So disaster will follow. This process as described does not require the direct action of Yahweh but is the natural outworking and inevitable result of their own action.

30:15–17. Deliverance and strength lie in Judah's doing nothing on its own. It is very hard to make politicians live on the basis of that principle. They normally seek to take what they see as responsible action, but events will turn their aims upside down.

30:18. NRSV's layout of the chapter reflects the critically important role of v. 18; the verse reflects a paradox prominent in the book. The people's policies require that Yahweh is held back from showing grace. Yet there is another logic afoot: Yahweh will indeed show them compassion, one way or another. Yahweh is a God of justice—that is, one who takes the right kind of decisive action. So the negative waiting on Yahweh's part is paired with an encouragement to a positive waiting on the people's part.

30:19–22. The content or basis for hope is expressed in three ways. First, the people's relationship with Yahweh will be put back on its proper footing. At the moment they do not turn to Yahweh when they are under pressure, so Yahweh may not answer. However, when the people cry out and when they abandon their idols, Yahweh will respond graciously to them.

30:23–26. Second, the practicalities of their life will work out. Though this idyllic picture is interrupted by the reference to slaughter and towers falling, the people's restoration requires these events.

30:27–33. The time of well-being is developed, thirdly, in the promise of Assyria's downfall. Only then will Judah be able to enjoy full life. A people oppressed or controlled by an imperial power knows that putting down that imperial power is vital to its future.

D. The Wisdom of Relying on Yahweh (ii); Disaster Threatened and Averted (ii) (31:1–32:20)

These two chapters are about the same length as chapters 28, 29, 30, and 33, and they have one hoy in 31:1 to introduce them; that suggests chs. 31 and 32 belong together.

31:1–9. They begin by re-expressing the challenges in 29:1–8 and 30:1–7. Similar to 30:1–7, they again make the point by talk of trust, reliance, wisdom, and help; Judah associates these with its Egyptian policy rather than with Yahweh. Verse 3 reformulates the point by an instructive contrast of "human-God" and "flesh- spirit." In Paul, the latter would imply the sinfulness of the flesh, but in the OT, "flesh" simply suggests weakness over against the dynamic power of the spirit of God. Refusal to recognize this reality will mean Yahweh swooping down on Jerusalem like a lion or vulture (vv. 4–5). But then, as in 29:1–8, the attacker suddenly becomes the protector. Once again, Isaiah is addressing both the necessity for Yahweh to act against Jerusalem and the necessity for Yahweh to deliver it. Related to this is the necessity for Judah to turn to Yahweh (vv. 6–7). This action of the people may have to be a response to Yahweh's act of deliverance, not a reason for it; the deliverance issues simply from Yahweh's mercy (vv. 8–9).

32:1–8. Judah needs decent leadership to pull it away from the life-style that makes Yahweh take it to the brink of destruction. Yahweh promises to provide such individuals. Good leaders will protect the weak, make discerning decisions (that is, decisions that take God into account), and encourage the community to recognize villainy as villainy and goodness as goodness. Such actions will transform the society.

32:9–14. Whereas the willfulness that 31:1–32:8 presupposes may be traced to the male leaders in the society, vv. 9–14 turn to their wives, who have little opportunity to do anything but enjoy the fruits of their husbands' folly. "Complacent" comes from the verb "trust" and thus takes up Isaiah's recurrent critique of Judah; the women share the attitude of their husbands who reckon it is safe to trust themselves, their policies, or their allies. Everything in which they trust will collapse. In light of the catastrophe Yahweh is bringing, which will mean the end of their pleasant life-style, Isaiah bids the wives to prepare to behave like mourners. An invading army will destroy the fields as well as the cities and turn the cities themselves into wilderness.

32:15–20. Once more Isaiah turns things round. Verse 15 marks the transition by means of another reference to the power of God's dynamic spirit, which can transform the devastated landscape. Crops will flourish again, and so will proper relationships in the society. The nation will know the peace and security that the politicians seek by the wrong means, and proper trust will be possible. The last two verses presuppose the notion that urban life is really unnatural and that people will return to something more like the Garden of Eden.

E. Yahweh Exalted in Majesty (33:1–24)

Throughout chs. 28–33, the ratio of threat to promise keeps changing, with the stress on threat in chs. 28–29 and more of a balance in chs. 30–32, until in ch. 33 all the stress lies on promise. But the chapter does not develop in a logical way like chs. 28–32 because it takes up themes and expressions from throughout chs. 1–32 and turns them into a kaleidoscope of promise. There is no pattern to the arrangement of the pieces of glass or paper in a kaleidoscope (except the one produced by its mirrors). Verse 2, for instance, takes up 30:18–19; v. 8 compares with 24:5; 28:15, 18; v. 9 repeats 24:4 and summarizes 32:9–14; v. 11 takes up 26:17–18; and so on. These are only examples of the ways specific words and phrases from chs. 1–32 recur throughout the chapter.

Chapter 33 thus rounds off chs. 1–33, taking us halfway through the book. And whereas chs. 28–32, like the earlier part of the book, refer to specific times, people, and places, here there is little of that. The chapter is more broadly applicable. The opening words about the destroyer who has not been destroyed, for instance, can apply to any instance of such a superpower. Within OT times, that phrase might have been understood to refer to Assyria, Babylon, Persia, and Greece, but it has been applied to superpowers after OT times as well.

The chapter promises that the superpower will not stand (v. 1). It provides Yahweh the response and the testimony that Yahweh looks for but has usually not received (vv. 2–6). It laments the experience of hardship that the people bring on themselves but then declares that Yahweh will act decisively (vv. 7–12). It challenges Judahites to acknowledge Yahweh's deeds (vv. 13–16). Finally, it promises good leaders and a restored city (vv. 17–24).

V. Ultimate Redress and Transformation (34:1–35:10)

These two chapters continue the promise in ch. 33, which concluded the first half of the book: Yahweh's ultimate purpose will be fulfilled. Chapters 34–35 provide a double introduction to the book's second half. Whereas the first half reports considerable indictment of Israel for its waywardness, there is much less in the second half. And whereas there was less encouragement of Israel in the first half, there is more in the second. These changes presuppose a situation in historical context. In the early sixth century BCE, Yahweh brought on Jerusalem the kind of catastrophe that chs. 1–33 had threatened; many people from Judah were taken into exile. Now, after that catastrophe, the time has come to put down Judah's attackers and to restore Judah. These two chapters introduce those themes.

A. Redress (34:1–17)

34:1–4. The chapter begins by summoning the nations to hear of the doom that is to come on them and on their deities (cf. 24:21–23).

34:5–7. It then focuses on Edom. Edom is thus in the position occupied earlier in the book by the Assyrian and Babylonian superpowers. All are national embodiments of power and aggressiveness. They are unwitting servants of Yahweh in bringing calamity on Judah, but they act for their own reasons and they are subject to Yahweh's judgment. Edom was never a superpower but a power of similar status to Judah itself, with its heartland to the southeast of Judah and southeast of the Dead Sea. But it gradually took over vast areas of Judean land over a period beginning in the seventh century and extending through the Second Temple period.

34:8–17. Any restoration of Judahite land would require the removal of Edom (see the parallelism in 35:4); this is action undertaken "by Zion's cause." The action will give Judah its land back. The chapter gives no reason for Yahweh's anger, beyond the need to restore Zion to its land. It simply declares that Edom will become a kind of sacrifice. "Doom" translates the verb kharam, which refers to the total destruction that Israel reports took place when it conquered Canaan (see Josh 11:20). "Lilith" is a Mesopotamian demon or spirit or goddess; vv. 8–17 indicate that the land will be devastated in the manner of Sodom and Gomorrah and thus left for the wildest of animals and demons to inhabit.

"Vengeance" (naqam) does not suggest revenge but proper redress for wrongdoing (see the parallelism in 35:4). The destruction of Edom itself is not actually required to put right its occupation of Judean land; this action has melded into an act of final judgment on a serious evildoer. In Roman times "Edom" became a code word for the Roman Empire itself, and the focus on Edom here, standing for the nations as a whole, perhaps already suggests it has become a kind of cipher for an evil empire. Edom is mentioned only in vv. 5–7; no doubt it is assumed in vv. 8–17 (see NRSV in v. 9) but since it is not named explicitly readers should not focus exclusively on this particular embodiment of aggressiveness but understand that it symbolizes national aggression against God's will and people.

B. Transformation (35:1–11)

Edom's streams will be turned into pitch and habited land will be given over to wild animals, whereas Judah's streams will flow in the desert and the territory of wild animals will become habitable by human beings. These two chapters thus mirror each other. The deposition of Edom makes possible the restoration of Judah. The chapter brings together four separate pictures.

35:1–2. First, wilderness that grows only enough grass to support a few sheep will be transformed so that it resembles forested Lebanon or wooded and flowered Carmel; its splendor will thus proclaim Yahweh's splendor.

35:3–4. Second, Yahweh's coming with recompense will mean deliverance from Babylon or Edom or whomever, and mean that people who are discouraged by being in exile in Babylon, by living under Persian imperial control, or by having lost their land to Edom can have hope.

35:5–7. Third, these great acts of God will break through the people's blindness and deafness in relation to Yahweh, which Isaiah had lamented, and will cause people to jump and shout in praise. 35:8–10. And the people who have been cut off from Jerusalem by exile or flight will be able to return safely, grief at their fate being replaced by joy.

VI. Judah in the Time of Hezekiah (36:1–39:8)

Despite the presence of stories about Isaiah in chs 6–7 and 20, these chapters are the most sustained narratives in the book. They are actually variants of 2 Kgs 18:13–20:19, but they include more of Isaiah's prophecies (2 Chr 32 offers another, shorter version of the story). In each book the narratives have a logical place as part of the whole. In Isaiah they link both backwards to what has preceded and forwards to what will follow (and in that respect they parallel chs. 34–35). Insofar as they are about events in Hezekiah's reign, particularly the political and religious crisis of Assyrian invasion, they are related to chs. 28–32, which derive from Isaiah's activity in that period. But insofar as they close with the prospect of exile in Babylon, they belong with chs. 40–55, which presuppose the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy about that exile.

A. Sennacherib's Challenge to Hezekiah, and Isaiah's Response (i) (36:1–37:7) 36:1. The Assyrians' desire to extend their empire to include Judah, which occupies a strategic position at the tipping point between the area of Assyrian control and the area of Egyptian dominance, provides the background for these narratives. As chs. 28–32 indicate, Hezekiah saw alliance with Egypt as the lesser of these two evils, but he perhaps miscalculated the Assyrians' determination. Verse 1 summarizes their devastating achievement. Only Jerusalem remains for Sennacherib to conquer. Located on the top of the mountain ridge that runs north-south between the Mediterranean and the Jordan valley, it is less accessible than other cities such as Lachish, near the coastal plain. And it is in a strong position on a spur of that mountain ridge, so that when an army arrives there, it will have a hard time capturing the city; its best bet is to starve the residents into surrender.

36:2–10. From Lachish, then, the king sends his commanding officer and his army up to Jerusalem and he attempts negotiations for the city's surrender, shouting across one of the ravines that protect the city. He points out the fallacy (as he sees it) in relying on any of the resources on which the king might rely.

36:11–20. The king's staff amusingly ask him to speak in the international language, which they understand but ordinary people do not. That only prompts him to restate his case for the sake of the ordinary people who are going to be devastatingly affected by what happens.

36:21–37:7. His staff report to Hezekiah, who knows the two things he must do; he is the model king in this story. King and staff know that belittling Egypt is all very well, but the commander has made a fatal mistake in belittling Yahweh. In a situation of peril such as the city is in, a prophet's job is to mediate between the people and Yahweh by bringing their needs to Yahweh and bringing Yahweh's word to them.

B. Sennacherib's Challenge to Hezekiah, and Isaiah's Response (ii) (37:8–38)

The dynamics of this episode parallel those of the first (some interpreters think it is an alternative version of the first episode (vv. 37–38 report Sennacherib's return to his own land and his death, in fulfillment of v. 7). But the text presents this episode as following on the first.

37:8–20. The king indeed hears a rumor (v. 7) and goes off to pay attention to trouble elsewhere (the word for "rumor," shemu'a, usually means "report" and need not mean the news is untrue). Meanwhile Sennacherib sends Hezekiah a message implying "I'll be back." But his mistake is to speak even more disparagingly of Yahweh's capacity to protect Jerusalem (vv. 8–13). Hezekiah again knows what to do and how to press Yahweh to take action (vv. 14–20).

37:21–29. Isaiah brings a reply, which expands significantly on vv. 6–7, thus becoming the dominant feature of this second episode. The poetic message is formally addressed to Sennacherib, but it is a message to Hezekiah, encouraging him with the promise that Jerusalem is destined to see Sennacherib depart (v. 22) because of the mistake he has made in the way he thinks and speaks of Yahweh and of his own achievements (vv. 23–29). Isaiah thus takes up characteristic emphases of chs. 1–12, including the declaration that the key factor in these events is not the plans of the great Assyrian king but the plans of Yahweh, of which Sennacherib is the unwitting executor.

37:30–35. The prose supplement to the poetic message then addresses Hezekiah directly. Its opening presupposes the devastating effect that military invasion brings. The army both eats everything that grows and makes it impossible to plant and grow for the next year; still normal life is destined to resume. This might seem an unspectacular promise, but is actually a remarkable one, as is suggested by the declaration that the zeal or passion of Yahweh will accomplish it. It means that a "remnant" of the Judean people who have had to take refuge in Jerusalem will be free to take possession of the land again. Verses 33–35 re-express Yahweh's intention about Sennacherib, with the significant double theological rationale present in v. 35b.

37:36–37. There follows a devastating disaster, followed by events that fulfill Yahweh's words.

C. Hezekiah's Illness, and Isaiah's Response (38:1–22)

38:1–8. As is often the case, Isaiah mediates between the king and the heavenly cabinet, though (as in the psalms) the passage also assumes that the king himself can approach Yahweh with his pleas, and assumes that the object of that is not to conform his will to God's but to change God's mind; and he succeeds in doing that. Hezekiah's plea changes the divine decision announced in v. 1. As the NRSV margin notes, the meaning of vv. 7–8 is not clear, though evidently Hezekiah was given an extraordinary sign that Yahweh had heard his prayer.

38:9–20. The prayer of thanksgiving parallels such thanksgivings in the Psalter. Indeed, there is nothing that refers concretely to Hezekiah's own experience, which suggests that Hezekiah is using a "standard" psalm. Verse 9 could be translated "a writing for Hezekiah" and there is no need to think that he personally wrote it; it might be more natural to assume that it was written for him. Thanksgiving psalms are commonly dominated by a recollection of the straits from which God rescued a person, a feature that dominates this thanksgiving. Thus whereas it often looks as if the psalm is describing Hezekiah's current suffering, it is actually describing how things were when he was sick and how he prayed then. The poem also speaks of Sheol in the manner of a psalm, though in the book of Isaiah this motif recalls previous texts that mentioned Sheol (5:14, this is where the nation is bound; 14:9–20, this is where the Babylonian king is bound; 28:14–19, this is the fate the nation thinks it can avoid, in Hezekiah's time). Hezekiah knew he was bound for Sheol and that there he would not be able to praise Yahweh for showing faithfulness in delivering him; but actually Yahweh has delivered him from arriving in Sheol before his time, and he can therefore praise Yahweh.

As a prayer of thanksgiving, it sometimes addresses God (v. 17–19), but like other such psalms, it more often speaks of God in the third person because it is giving testimony to other people; this is how it opens and closes (vv. 10–11, 20). Such prayers encourage other people to acknowledge and trust Yahweh for themselves. That practice is reflected in the combination of "me" and "we" in v. 20, and in the comment about a father (the word is actually singular) and his children in v. 19.

38:21–22. The closing verses provide further background to vv. 9–20 and 1–8.

D. Envoys from Babylon to Hezekiah, and Isaiah's Response (39:1–8)

Babylon's dual roles emerge in this final scene about Isaiah ben Amoz. Babylon is both an up-and-coming power in Isaiah's own day and one destined to be the superpower one century later. Merodach-baladan's envoys reflect that earlier time and attest to Babylon's desire to encourage the various nations within the Assyrian Empire to assert their independence. (Chronologically, the invasion to which chs. 36–37 refers thus actually followed on the events in chs. 38–39, but the absence of a chronological order makes for a good link between chs. 39 and 40.) Isaiah is unhappy that Hezekiah reveals the character of his resources to Merodach-baladan; perhaps such action illustrates the kind of false trust that chs. 30–31 attack. Isaiah 39 thus contributes to an ambiguous portrait of Hezekiah. In chs. 36–37, he shows just the right attitude of commitment to Yahweh; here and by implication in chs. 30–31 his stance is different. And there is a further ambiguity in his response to Isaiah (v. 8): is it appropriately trustful or cynical? In the context of the entire book, 39:6–8 prepares the way for chapter 40.

VII. Israel in the Time of Cyrus (40:1–48:22)

The historical background of chs. 40–48 is very different from that of preceding chapters. After Hezekiah's day, the seventh century was dominated by the religiously bleak reign of Manasseh, who encouraged adherence to deities other than Yahweh and forms of worship very different from the ones the OT approves. Toward the end of that century, Josiah attempted to return the community back to the kind of stance taken by Hezekiah, but in the long term he failed. His own death came about as part of the process that led to Assyria's replacement by Babylon as superpower. Judean rebellion against Babylon led to a series of reprisals against Jerusalem, culminating in the city's catastrophic fall and destruction in 587 and the exile of much of its population. Around 540 BCE, however, Babylon was in turn about to be replaced by Persia as superpower. This is the historical context addressed by chs. 40–55. These chapters speak to the situation of Judeans in Babylon and those left behind in Jerusalem.

The prophet responsible for these chapters is not Isaiah ben Amoz, promising what Yahweh will do two centuries after his day, but someone actually living in the 540s when the moment for comfort has arrived. The author of these verses is not Isaiah ben Amoz himself but someone who takes up his prophetic work at a later time. This prophet might be with the exiles in Babylon or might be with the people who had stayed behind in Judah; the message would be relevant to both. This prophet—or perhaps prophets—remains anonymous. Likewise, the person's gender remains unknown (though a female perspective is more prominent in these chapters than anywhere else in the Prophets).

A. Introducing a Message of Comfort (40:1–31)

40:1–11. In chs. 1–39 Isaiah has confronted the people and warned them about punishment to come from Yahweh. All was not bleak; the people might avoid trouble if they changed their ways. Even if they did not do so and Yahweh did punish them, there could be comfort the other side of calamity. Isaiah 12 thus spoke about comfort as something belonging to "that day," the future day of restoration. In the meantime, after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BCE (see 2 Kgs 25), people lamented that the city has no one to comfort it (Lam 1:2, 9, 16, 17, 21).

Isaiah 40:1–11 brings a quite different message from chs. 1–39 as it declares that the time for comfort has arrived and the time of punishment is now past. Whereas Yahweh had said, "You are not my people and I am not your God" (Hos 1:9), now Yahweh says "my people ... your God" again (vv. 1–2). The prophet overhears an unidentified voice (probably one of Yahweh's heavenly aides) commissioning a great highway for Yahweh (vv. 3–5). Another voice commissions a proclamation to Jerusalem that Yahweh is coming back on this highway, along with the people (vv. 9–11). The poem presupposes that Yahweh had abandoned Jerusalem (cf. 49:14), but is now returning. The prophet is commissioned to proclaim this good news. But the people are too withered by the hot breath of Yahweh's wrath to be able to hear what is being said (vv. 6–7). Yahweh responds by pointing out that there is nothing wrong with the prophet's assessment of the people's state, but there is something else that needs to be taken into account (v. 8).

40:12–31. The opening to the chapters presupposes that the people will have a hard time accepting this message, and much of these chapters is a battle to help them to do so. This process starts in vv. 12–31. The prophet knows that people are naturally overwhelmed by an imperial power (vv. 12–17), of the images of peoples' gods (vv. 18–20), of the rulers of the nations (vv. 21–24), and of the planets and stars that these nations reckoned determined what happens on earth (vv. 25–26). In connection with each, the prophet declares, "Don't you realize Yahweh is greater than that?" All this provides anticipatory warrant for the exhortation in vv. 27–31. It begins by reformulating the idea of being like withered grass, and then summarizes the purport of vv. 12–26: Yahweh is capable of acting along the lines the prophet will promise; hence, the people who wait expectantly for Yahweh to act will find strength to walk on that highway.

B. Yahweh's Commitment to Israel as Servant (41:1–20)

41:1–7. Whereas 40:12–31 directly addresses Judeans during the exile, 41:1–7 addresses the surrounding nations and asks what they make of a victor from the east. In some ways the figure recalls Abraham (see Gen 14), in some ways Cyrus the Persian who is rampaging through the Middle East turning the Babylonian Empire into a Persian empire. The connotations of both individuals, both chosen by God, help the people understand that Yahweh's purpose is being achieved. The word "victory" is tsedeq, which more literally suggests what is faithful and right (cf. 45:19; 64:5), so that it issues in deliverance (cf. 51:5); NRSV regularly translates "righteousness." Abraham and now Cyrus are the means through which Yahweh executes a faithful, right, or righteous purpose in delivering Israel, one that will indirectly be an act of deliverance for the world as a whole.

41:8–13. Indirectly, of course, Yahweh was addressing the Judeans, and Yahweh now does that directly. Whereas the arrival of Cyrus seems like a threat to other peoples, the fact that Yahweh is behind him means it is not a threat to Israel, because as a people they are Yahweh's servant. Being someone's servant means being protected and supported. The head of another household will be punished for mistreating the servant. So Israel has no reason to fear anyone who oppresses it. The exile might have seemed to signify that Yahweh had thrown out this servant (who, after all, had not been very committed to his master), but the passage reassures Israel that this is not so. The assurance and security still hold.

41:14–16. Indeed, the prophet makes that point in a novel way. Isaiah ben Amoz wanted people, symbolized by an insect, to take seriously the fact that Yahweh is the Holy One of Israel. Verse 14 also wants people to take seriously this particular character of God. Yahweh is the Holy One of Israel. Yahweh is committed to this people as the Holy One. The claim that Yahweh is the Holy One of Israel appears throughout the book of Isaiah.

This Holy One is "your Redeemer." A redeemer (go'el) is the member of an extended family who has the resources to come to the assistance of someone in the family when they have difficulties and might (for instance) lose their land and their independence, or when they have been wronged. This person is under moral obligation to use these resources to help vulnerable persons to keep or gain their freedom and independence. Calling Yahweh Israel's Redeemer ("restorer" might be a better word) means viewing Israel as members of Yahweh's family to whom Yahweh has made a commitment that Yahweh intends to show by delivering them from their overlords. Verses 15–16 probably speak of the same mountains and hills mentioned in 40:3–4: the exiles will be able to overcome all obstacles in order to make the journey home.

41:17–20. Israelites are like people parched with thirst in the desert. Verses 17–20, particularly the notion of God answering the people, are similar to the discourse of psalms, in which Israel prays to God when they are in a crisis. Whereas Cyrus's coming arouses panic in other peoples (vv. 5–7), Yahweh's support means Israel's rejoicing in Yahweh (v. 16b), and the result of Yahweh's gift of abundant water will be the whole world's recognition of Yahweh (v. 20).

C. The Servant Commitment Yahweh Looks for (41:21–42:17)

This section repeats and then develops the argument of 41:1–20.

41:21–29. First, Yahweh asks another question about this victor, who can also be described as from the east (the literal direction across the desert). Yahweh now poses a question to the gods of the other nations rather than to the nations themselves. It is now a question concerning the identity of the one who said that this conqueror was going to come rather than about who made him come. Since Israel's God had proclaimed what would happen, Yahweh is truly God. "Do good, or do harm": do anything! Yahweh had declared the intention to put Babylon down by means of the Medes (Isa 13) and is now doing so. The other peoples' gods had not declared that intention. Further, since Yahweh through Isaiah ben Amoz had demonstrated being in control of such events, there is good reason to take seriously what Yahweh now says through this new prophet.

42:1–9. Second, the prophet returns to the image of Yahweh's servant, again taking the argument further. During much of the twentieth century, it was customary to link vv. 1–4 with some later passages that refer to Yahweh's servant and call these "servant songs." However, these passages make more sense when read in their individual literary contexts. In 41:8–16 the master-servant relationship was intended to encourage Israel; here it is a challenge. A servant is supposed to be committed to his master as the master is committed to the servant. The verses outline the nature of this commitment—the role Yahweh's servant is supposed to fulfill. He is to be the means by which Yahweh's "justice" is proclaimed in the world. Concerning this word, see the comment on 5:16. Proclaiming Yahweh's justice means making known in the world the way Yahweh is making decisions and implementing them in order to take the world to its proper destiny. Israel is to be a covenant to the people (vv. 5–9): that is, an embodiment of what being in covenant with Yahweh looks like. It is thus to be a light to the nations.

However, Israel is in no state to fulfill this vocation. Yahweh's servant will not cry out or grow faint (vv. 2–4), but Israel in exile is doing exactly those things. Thus the movement between 41:8–16 and 42:1–9 is significant. Here Israel is not actually named as Yahweh's servant. It is supposed to fulfill that role, but it cannot. So the servant vocation requires fulfillment; the Gospel of Matthew claims that Jesus is someone who ful-fills the role of servant (Matt 12:15–21).

42:10–17. Third, vv. 10–17 take up the image of the transformation of nature from 41:17–20, and makes this a topic for praise. The verses resemble a psalm of praise, with vv. 10–12 exhorting praise and vv. 13–17 giving the basis for it. Yahweh has been silent and holding back from action but is now bringing about the tumultuous events that will make Judah's restoration possible.

D. The Blind Servant Whom Yahweh Still Intends to Use (42:18–43:21)

42:18–25. The tension between calling Israel Yahweh's servant (41:8) and describing the role of Yahweh's servant in terms that Israel can hardly fulfill (42:1–4) now becomes explicit. Yahweh's servant is deaf and blind (in fulfillment of Yahweh's intention in 6:9–10). The plan was to commend Yahweh's teaching to the world through this servant (v. 21), but a people living in exile in Babylon or in the midst of devastation in Judah cannot do that (v. 22), especially when they do not comprehend what has been going on (vv. 23–25). "Why have you treated us thus?" they ask. "There is a perfectly coherent answer," Yahweh replies.

43:1–7. That confrontational response might have been expected to lead Yahweh to discharge this servant and find another. But Yahweh does not follow with logic. In Genesis, Yahweh bade people such as Abraham, Hagar, Isaac, and Jacob not to be afraid when they were faced with a difficult future; here Yahweh gives the same bidding to Jacob-Israel. The present Jacob-Israel is in the same frightening position as the Jacob-Israel Yahweh originally brought into being. Yahweh has not given up on the project initiated then and will not do so now. At the exodus Yahweh gave up claims on Egypt and its associates in order to have Israel (but see 45:14). Yahweh intends to bring the scattered people back to their land.

43:8–13. The prophet develops this point by repeating the challenge to the nations and their gods, cf. ch. 41. These gods had no one to testify to their having spoken and then acted. Israel's role as Yahweh's servant is to testify as Yahweh's witnesses. The blind and deaf witnesses will testify to what they have seen and heard.

43:14–21. The background to these chapters is the situation of Judah under Babylonian domination, with many of its people exiled to Babylon. Only now is Babylon actually mentioned for the first time. In stating that Yahweh intends to destroy Babylon, the prophet in effect promises an act that will be like the exodus, but then tells people to forget about those former events because what Yahweh intends to do now will eclipse Yahweh's previous deeds.

E. The Servant Who Made Yahweh Serve (43:22–44:23)

43:22–28. The argument of 42:18–43:21 is repeated but developed further, just as 41:21–42:17 moved beyond 41:1–20. So this accusation, or rather self-defense, corresponds to the one in 42:18–25. The language of 43:26 implies that Israel is trying to take Yahweh to court, and 43:28 contains the charge Israel is bringing (the "princes of the sanctuary" could be any sacred leaders in Jerusalem). "Yes, I did do that," says Yahweh, "and I had every reason." Further, since the fall of Jerusalem the people have not been calling on Yahweh to restore them, even though they did not have to offer sacrifices, because the Temple has been destroyed (vv. 22–23). Literally, they have not had to "serve" Yahweh in this way, though they have made Yahweh serve them—it is their sins that they have presented to Yahweh. Talking thus of "serving" appropriates ironically the "servant" language of, e.g., 42:1; 43:10. Against this background, v. 25 offers an extraordinary statement of grace.

44:1–5. That note continues in the passage corresponding to 43:1–7. The new promise it adds is the confession of Yahweh described in v. 5. The language might imply Israelites owing their allegiance to Yahweh or other peoples coming to acknowledge Yahweh. The latter will be more explicit in, e.g., 45:14–17, but the former would be significant in itself given the implication that many people had lost faith in Yahweh while they were in exile.

44:6–23. Verses 6–8 expand on the claims and argument of 43:8–13, with an unequivocal declaration that Yahweh is the only God. It is not merely a statement about monotheism. It does not merely say that there is only one God, but rather that Yahweh is the only God. The gods of Babylon with whom the Judeans were sometimes impressed are not worthy of such behavior. Yahweh alone has demonstrated the capacity to declare what will happen, so that Yahweh's witnesses can then say, "You see: Yahweh said this would happen, and it has." Talk in terms of mere "prediction" misses the point, which is that Yahweh can declare what will happen because Yahweh is the one who makes it happen.

The main body of this section (vv. 9–20) forms much the most extensive polemic against making images that appears in Isa 40–55. Through the centuries before the exile, Israel was tempted to make images of Yahweh in the way that other peoples made images of their gods and also to make images of those other gods. In Mesopotamia that temptation would take new form as people were impressed by the magnificent images of the Babylonian gods. In theory no one would ever think that the image was the deity; they knew that El or Marduk (or Yahweh) was much bigger than that. But in practice, that distinction could doubtless be hard to maintain. Here the prophet largely ignores it and satirizes the nonsensical implications of image-making. In closing this section (vv. 21–23), the prophet brings Israel back to thinking about its status in relation to Yahweh and the grace of Yahweh affirmed in 43:25. "Return" (shuv) is a verb commonly translated "repent"; it implies that people have indeed turned away from Yahweh to other deities and need to turn back. But the order of events is significant. It is not "return to me and I will forgive you and redeem you" but "return to me because I have forgiven and redeemed you." The renewal of the people and their relationship with Yahweh will not be complete until they return to Yahweh. But Yahweh's forgiving and redeeming is not contingent upon that return. Yahweh's relationship with Israel is not contractual. Yahweh's forgiving and redeeming provides the inspiration for their returning. The section concludes with an admonition for the cosmos to praise Yahweh for having redeemed Israel.

F. The Anointed Through Whom Yahweh Intends to Restore Jerusalem (44:24–45:25)

44:24–28. The initial verses depict Yahweh as Israel's creator, the world's creator, the one who is sovereign in political events and who thus fulfills the words of prophets such as Isaiah and frustrates the predictions of other supposed prognosticators (vv. 24–26a). These prophetic words are germane to the present situation and promise a new version of the deliverance at the Red Sea (vv. 26b–27). These claims are then followed by a quite new statement (v. 28). Though Cyrus's work has been presupposed, only now is he named. "Shepherd" is a standard ancient Near Eastern description of a ruler, so "my shepherd" would not be a very revolutionary way of describing Cyrus as Yahweh's agent. Yet prophets usually refer to foreign rulers as agents of punishment (e.g., 10:5–6). A foreign ruler commissioning the rebuilding of Jerusalem and its Temple bears a different significance.

45:1–8. The prophet now describes Cyrus in more revolutionary fashion as Yahweh's "anointed," the word that is Anglicized as "messiah." In the OT, this word does not refer to a future redeemer (the OT uses other words for that) but to an Israelite king such as David (or to an Israelite priest), who by his anointing is designated and authorized by Yahweh to fulfill that role. Using the word to refer to a pagan king, as if the pagan king takes the Davidic king's place, is extraordinary and unprecedented.

But the prophet declares that Yahweh will indeed give this king the kind of victories David had, even though Cyrus does not acknowledge Yahweh. Yahweh's aim is that Cyrus and the world as a whole will come to recognize Yahweh as the one who brings about weal (shalom) for people who are being delivered, such as the victims of the Babylonians, and woe (calamity) for the people Yahweh is putting down, which in this context means Babylon. (KJV has God creating "evil," but this gives a misleading impression.) In part, though only in part, all this does come true; Cyrus did in a formal sense recognize Yahweh (see Ezra 1:1–4), though not to the exclusion of other gods. The heavens and the earth are personified and summoned to enact this purpose of Yahweh (v. 8).

45:9–13. The Judeans will be scandalized at the idea that Yahweh can use a pagan king in such a fashion. The prophet thus acknowledges the people's challenge and reasserts its truth. Who are they to decide how Yahweh's purpose should be fulfilled?

45:14–17. An oracle offers a new perspective on the Egyptians and their neighbors. The peoples who held Israel in servitude and whom God gave up temporarily in order to deliver Israel at the beginning of its story (43:3) will now come to recognize Israel and Israel's God. Yahweh had been hiding from Israel by letting the people be ravaged, but now Yahweh is reversing course and delivering Israel. NRSV treats the confession in vv. 15–17 as the prophet's words, but there is no indication that the other peoples' words concluded at the end of v. 14; it makes better sense to construe vv. 15–17 as a continuation of the peoples' confession.

45:18–25. That spectacular series of declarations closes with another. Yahweh denies having truly hidden from Israel ("in secret," beseter, is related to the verb "hide," satar). Yahweh had always been speaking to the people; the problem was their inability to listen. Once more, the nations are commanded to assemble, to admit that their trust in their gods with their images was foolish, but in doing so they are also challenged and invited to find deliverance with Yahweh, the true God.

G. A Vision of Babylon's Gods Falling (46:1–13)

46:1–7. This chapter imagines what the fall of Babylon will be like: in a panic, the Babylonian priests move the precious divine images away from the city to prevent their being destroyed or desecrated. It did not happen that way. When the Persians came up against Babylon the priests changed sides and welcomed Cyrus, at least according to Cyrus's account on the "Cyrus Cylinder." But that version makes the prophet's point about the helplessness of the images and thus of their gods. Gods are supposed to support the people. What is the value of gods people must carry? The prophet once again underlines the difference between these so-called gods and Yahweh, the only real God. 46:8–13. The prophecies in chs. 40–45 have been implicitly critical of the Judean community during the exile and have grown increasingly so (see 45:9–13). They now confront it quite directly and with a growing sense of urgency and frustration. Yahweh's act of deliverance is near; the closer Cyrus comes, the nearer it becomes. The fact that he is a bird of prey is good news for the Judeans, since their overlords are his target. But they are "far from deliverance," in danger of missing out on it because of their unwillingness to recognize the way in which Yahweh is bringing it about. "Deliverance" is tsedaqa, virtually a synonym for tsedeq (see on 41:1–7). Thus one could say they are "far from righteousness," as other translations have it; they are far from recognizing that Yahweh is doing right by them.

H. A Vision of Babylon Falling (47:1-15)

47:1–4. The prophet depicts Babylon as a woman, the mistress of an impressive household or a queen, who is losing her position and being turned into an ordinary housewife. There is no inherent suffering or humiliation in the role she will have to perform. Her nakedness results from the removal of her ladylike apparel so that she can do her work; her shame lies in the contrast with the position she formerly held, and "vengeance" suggests redress for her oppressive rule.

47:5–7. Her demotion results from the lack of mercy she showed for Israel. She was Yahweh's agent in bringing punishment, but she behaved like a woman who did not care at all for an elderly person whom she ought to respect. It is an indictment of her womanhood, because "mercy" or compassion (rakhamim, the plural of the word for a womb), is a distinctive womanly virtue.

47:8–11. Like anyone in a position of power, she assumed she would be there forever, but she was wrong. "Lover of pleasures" could give a misleading impression; she is simply someone who is naturally used to the good life of a wealthy person. A more serious indictment is the way in which she understands herself: "I am, and there is no one besides me." Only God can say that (cf. 43:10, 13; John 18:6), and a human being or a human power that thinks in those terms takes a terrible risk.

47:12–15. Her conviction that she is unassailable stems in part from her vast resources that enable her to discern future events and the ways to cope with them before they happen. Babylon indeed possessed vast information that enabled it to project the future on the basis of the movements of the planets and other forms of divination. The prophet declares all this will be exposed as futile.

I. A Final Challenge to the Rebels (48:1–22)

48:1–11. The prophet's confrontational stance becomes most aggressive here. This section begins by addressing the community in the terms that should apply to it and that it no doubt claimed, but then questioning whether it has a right to them (vv. 1–2). The prophet recalls the way Yahweh has spoken to the people in the past but now says Yahweh spoke in this way only because they would otherwise attribute events to their images (vv. 3–5). Yahweh is saying new things now; if Yahweh had said them in the past, the community would have taken no notice (vv. 6–8). Yahweh has been merciful in the past, but only to avoid looking stupid by destroying Yahweh's own people (vv. 9–11). The passage vividly illustrates the desperate way the prophet is trying to knock some sense into the community, sometimes by speaking encouragingly, sometimes by depicting the downfall of its enemies, but here by trying to shake it to its senses.

48:12–19. The confrontation now takes gentler form. Familiar themes recur (vv. 12–16a): Yahweh as first and last, Yahweh as creator, Yahweh as the only one who had spoken of current events before they happened. Here these themes reaffirm Yahweh's intention to make Cyrus the means of overthrowing Babylon. This is re-expressed in another scandalous form as "the LORD loves him." That verb is the one that underlies the earlier description of Abraham as Yahweh's "friend" (41:8) and it thus again closely aligns the pagan conqueror and the great ancestor. Both of them have a vital place within Yahweh's purpose. Verse 16b then provides a special introduction to the solemn and striking words that follow in vv. 17–19. Here alone in the OT does Yahweh say "if only" about something that has happened (Yahweh does say "if only" in Ps 81:13, but there about something that could still happen). Alongside the aggressiveness of vv. 1–11 is a poignant divine sadness over Israel's condition. Yahweh is all-powerful, but does not treat people like puppets or children and thus cannot stop them from making stupid decisions.

48:20–22. There is a third challenge. Babylon is about to fall, and the Judeans there need to pack their bags, mentally and emotionally, convinced that they will soon be able to make the declaration in v. 20b and encouraged by the way Yahweh looked after Israel on their journey from Egypt to Canaan; Yahweh will surely do that again. But the chapter ends on a final confrontational note (v. 22). Unless they turn from their rebelliousness and their resistance to Yahweh's plans, they will not enjoy any of the fruit of these promises, any shalom, any flourishing and well-being. This solemn note brings the first half of Isa 40–55 to a close.

VIII. Jerusalem in the Time of Cyrus (49:1–55:13)

There is both continuity and discontinuity between chs. 40–48 and chs. 49–55. The context is the same. The Babylonian Empire is still about to fall to Cyrus. The prophet is still concerned to help the Judean community in Babylon or Jerusalem or both to wake up to the fact that these events are destined to bring about the freeing of the exiles and the restoration of the city. But the focus moves from the former to the latter, to the restoration of Jerusalem. Further, chs. 40–48 have made much of the place and calling of Israel as Yahweh's servant, but they have exposed a problem about that which they have not solved. The latter chapters alternate between a focus on one or the other of those two issues; there are passages in which Yahweh's servant speaks or is described and passages that bring encouragement to Zion.

A. A Servant to the Servant (i) (49:1–13)

49:1–6. The prophet once again gives testimony, but at greater length than in 40:6 and 48:16b, and thus more like Isaiah giving his testimony (6:1–13). It resembles Jeremiah's account of his call (Jer 1:4–10); Paul will take up the same way of speaking to describe his own call (Gal 1:15). The unfolding of this prophetic testimony further parallels the call of Jeremiah (and that of Moses) in relating how the prophet objected to the call, and how Yahweh overruled the objections; but here the objection is not "I won't be able to do it" but "I have tried to do it and failed (though I still trust Yahweh)." The testimony also parallels the description of Isaiah as Yahweh's servant in 20:3 (indeed, 44:26 assumes that every prophet is Yahweh's servant); this prophet, too, has that servant calling. The prophet is called to be a servant to the servant.

What is novel here is that Yahweh also declares, "you are . . . Israel, in whom I will be glorified."

What could that mean? Verses 5–6 make explicit that Yahweh is still concerned for the people Israel itself. So there is a sense in which the prophet is Israel and a sense in which Israel itself is Israel. We have seen that Israel is in no condition to fulfill its vocation as Yahweh's servant and Yahweh's witnesses, yet Yahweh is still committed to its doing so. But it has a long way to travel before it can fulfill this vocation. In the meantime, the prophet is called to fulfill it, to embody what it means to be Israel and what it means to be Yahweh's servant, and to do that for Israel's sake so as to bring Israel back to Yahweh and bring about its restoration as a people (vv. 5a, 6a). That is not all. By doing that, this prophet-servant will also be a means of bringing light to the world. Perhaps that implies people such as the Babylonians hearing the prophet's message; perhaps it refers to people seeing what Yahweh does in restoring Israel through the prophet's ministry. Paul sees this promise fulfilled in his and Barnabas's ministry (Acts 13:47).

49:7–12. We could see these subsequent promises to Israel as the prophet fulfilling this ministry. The Judeans are people despised by their overlords (v. 7a), they resemble people in dark imprisonment (v. 9a), they are scattered in exile (v. 12), they are suffering (v. 13). But Yahweh intends to restore them to honor (v. 7), the honor of being chosen, chosen to serve Yahweh. "Slave" is the word elsewhere translated "servant" ('ebed); the people will be taken out of this inappropriate service and restored to their proper position of servanthood. Reestablishing their land and nationhood will be a means of making them "a covenant to the people," the people in the world in general, the intention announced in 42:6–7. It will make them an embodiment of what it means to be in a covenant with Yahweh.

49:13. All that will be reason for celebration.

B. Encouragement for Zion (i) (49:14–50:3)

49:14. Jerusalem-Zion had a prominent place in 40:1–11 but has since been largely in the shadows. The prophet has focused on the events that will bring Babylon's downfall and immediately affect the Judeans living there. But these are also the events that will make possible Jerusalem's restoration. That claim is no more believable in Jerusalem than it is in Babylon.

49:15–50:3. Yahweh has four responses to the charge in v. 14. Necessarily, perhaps, they amount simply to further promises of what Yahweh intends now to do. There is no evidence that can be given except the evidence of who Yahweh is. First (49:15–21), it really is the case that people are coming back, so that instead of being devastated and bereft the people multiply. The prophet thus challenges people to look at Yahweh in a different way. Yahweh is like a mother who cannot avoid motherly feelings for her child even if it behaves inappropriately. And what Yahweh does will raise questions to which Zion will have no answer except that Yahweh has done it. Second (49:22–23), imperial powers that are Zion's oppressors will be turned into its servants, and that will convince Zion that Yahweh is Lord. Third (49:24–26), the victims of these imperial powers will be freed as the powers themselves turn to fighting each other; that will convince the world about who Yahweh is. Fourth (50:1–3), Yahweh does have the power to bring all this about. This final response also relates to that opening charge of having abandoned Zion. Yes, I divorced her, says Yahweh. You can look at her divorce certificate and see the basis for that act. But even divorce does not mean Yahweh is finished.

C. A Servant to the Servant (ii) (50:4–11)

50:4–9. One could say the prophet has been seeking to sustain the weary with an appropriate word in 49:14–50:3 and throughout 40:1–50:3. The weary are the Judeans in Babylon and/or in Jerusalem, and the word is the message that has run through these chapters. The prophet tried to keep them going in light of what Yahweh is doing and is about to do; it would be tragic if they are not ready to enjoy the fruits of it. To this end, the prophet has needed to have the tongue of people who are taught (see NRSV margin at v. 4), a disciple's tongue. "Disciples" (limmudim) is the same word that appeared in 8:16; the prophet is a disciple of Isaiah ben Amoz as well as a disciple of Yahweh. It is only because of being a disciple and a listener that it is possible to be a speaker. The trouble is that delivering this message has been very costly, not merely unsuccessful. The attackers of vv. 5–6 might be members of the Judean community who opposed the prophet; perhaps they were people who had come to live successful lives in Babylon and did not want trouble to be caused by someone taking the side of its attackers. Or perhaps they were Babylonians who could not tolerate that. Nonetheless, the prophet is sure of vindication (vv. 7–9).

50:10–11. The point of that testimony lies in vv. 10–11. It places a choice before the audience. People must either identify with the prophet or with the attackers. (It is usual to assume that the one who speaks in vv. 4–9 is the same "servant of Yahweh" as in 49:1–6, though only in v. 10 does the word servant come and thus confirm this.) There is no promise attached to identifying with the servant; in the short term, at least, it will mean darkness not light. There is a threat attached to identifying with the attackers. They will find that their actions work against them.

D. Encouragement for Zion (ii) (51:1–52:12)

51:1–8. This opening exhortation addresses people who "pursue righteousness" and "know righteousness." In what sense do they do that? "Righteousness" is tsedeq, the word also translated "deliverance" in v. 5. As usual in these chapters, this "righteousness" is not a human characteristic but a principle of divine action. It is Yahweh doing the right thing by Israel in delivering them from their overlords (see on 41:1–7). The verses address people who are pursuing righteousness in the sense that they are longing for Yahweh to bring about that deliverance. That is also the sense in which they are seeking Yahweh, seeking for Yahweh to act, and the sense in which they know righteousness and have Yahweh's teaching in their hearts. They know Yahweh is the only one who can deliver, and they know that Yahweh intends to be revealed to the world. They are seeking this, but they have a hard time believing in it. So vv. 1b–2 reminds them of a reason for doing so.

The rest of vv. 1–8 reaffirms Yahweh's promises. Yahweh will comfort Zion (v. 3). The parallelism in this verse makes clear that while "comfort" sometimes denotes offering words of encouragement, as in English, sometimes it denotes taking action to relieve people's sadness. Yahweh's teaching will go out to bring light to the peoples as they see Yahweh's "justice" at work. On "justice," see the comment on 42:1–4; vv. 4–5 as a whole reaffirm 42:1–9. The cosmos could dissolve, but Yahweh's deliverance will stand forever. The people who revile Israel and who look so threatening and impressive will turn out not to be so.

51:9–11. The words recall exhortations that come in prayers within psalms; they would then be the prophet's exhortation to Yahweh. But since Yahweh is the speaker in the preceding and following lines, the words are best understood as a self-exhortation on Yahweh's part. They add a further basis for people to believe that Yahweh will act: Yahweh brought them out from Egypt and through the Red Sea, defeating hostile forces there (on Rahab, see 30:1–7). Verse 11 repeats the promise in 35:10.

51:12–16. Israel therefore can stop fearing its current overlords. Yahweh can again exercise lordship over the sea, which symbolizes devastating forces that are actually under Yahweh's control.

51:17–23. Encouragement to Zion now becomes exhortation as the exhortation addressed to Yahweh's arm (51:9) becomes one addressed to Zion; the verb in v. 17 is a form of the same verb as 51:9. "Awake," says v. 9; "you need to rouse yourself, too," says v. 17. Zion is like a woman who has been knocked to the floor by disaster, a disaster brought about by Yahweh. But Yahweh does not remain in a disaster-bringing mode, and that stage in Zion's life is now over. Yahweh is now going to turn on the people who assaulted her. Externally nothing has changed yet, but everything is about to change. Zion has to adopt a new stance, ready for a new life to begin.

52:1–6. The verb awake appears in v. 1 in exactly the same form as 51:9. Zion is urged to see herself as not merely able to get up again after being assaulted but as able to make herself look lovely again. Her act of re-clothing is the converse of the fate envisaged for Babylon in Isaiah 47. And Zion will no longer be defiled. The uncircumcised and defiling people might be Israelites who are uncircumcised in heart or might be foreigners who treat her the way depicted in vv. 3–6. (Other nations that want to come to worship Yahweh will be able to come to the city, even though they are foreigners; uncircumcised and unclean foreigners will be the people who just want to destroy and defile it.)

52:7–10. The prophet imagines that the process whereby the city is to be liberated is imminent, rather in the way Isa 46–47 imagines the process of Babylon's fall is taking place. Isaiah 40:9–11 commissioned an announcement that Yahweh was coming back to Jerusalem, and here a messenger gives the announcement: Yahweh reigns (one could translate the verb "has begun to reign").

52:11–12. The same imperative verb, depart, introduces this section. The Judeans in Babylon are to be ready to leave there when the city falls, dissociating themselves from the impurity of the worship of other gods and bringing back to Jerusalem the vessels that had been taken from the Temple when the city fell, long ago. It will be a new exodus, even better than the first exodus (v. 12).

E. A Servant to the Servant (iii) (52:13–53:12)

Yahweh reverts to the way of speaking about a servant that appeared in 42:1–4; that is, the passage does not identify Israel as the servant (like, e.g., 41:8–9), nor does the servant speak as "I" and thus give us the impression it is the prophet (as in Isa 49:1–6 and 50:4–9). So 52:13– 53:12 is more a vision of a role to be fulfilled than a description of a person. The fact that Israel has been described as Yahweh's servant suggests that Israel might be being invited to see itself here. But in 42:1–4, the description made it look like a role that Israel needed to have fulfilled for its own sake before it could fulfill it for someone else, and the same is true here; if Israel appears in the passage, it is as the "we" who have to come to a new view of the servant. Yet the fact that Yahweh has kept affirming that Israel is still destined to be Yahweh's servant means that it is indeed entitled or invited to see itself here. The literary context also invites readers to see the vision as a description of the prophet, or at least as based in part on the prophet's experience as described in 49:1–6 and 50:4–11. Perhaps it is the prophet's self-description in the third person, as when Jesus refers to himself as "the Son of Man." Although the passage sees him as giving up his life and having been in a tomb, it need not imply that he is actually dead.

The poem focuses on the role rather than on the identity of the person. Whoever is Yahweh's servant, this is the role and the promise. One can see why Jesus found this passage playing a crucial role in enabling him to understand the nature of his ministry. The NT also understands it as offering the church a way of seeing itself and helping it to cope with its affliction.

52:13–15. Yahweh declares that like both Israel and the prophet, this servant is someone who has been humiliated but is to be taken to a place of great honor and to be recognized by the nations.

53:1–11a. The bulk of the description takes the form of testimony by people who understood this servant in a new way. He was someone totally unimpressive and dishonored, and people therefore thought he was under Yahweh's punishment, as his friends thought about Job. That he took his affliction so silently made them realize they must be wrong. He shared their affliction when he did not need to; for instance, they were transgressors or rebels against Yahweh; he was faithful to Yahweh. Indeed, he was experiencing affliction that they did not experience (cf. 50:4–9). But the fact that he experienced suffering that he did not deserve but that came from his faithfulness to Yahweh opened up a new possibility for the people. He lived as "an offering for sin" like the offerings in the Temple (the term 'asham usually refers to an offering that makes compensation for wrongdoing.)

53:11b–12. The vision closes with Yahweh speaking and affirming that this will be so.

F. Encouragement for Zion (iii) (54:1–17a)

54:1–3. The prophet goes back to addressing Zion with imperative verbs. Once again the basis for the imperatives is something Yahweh is going to do rather than something that has already happened. The imperatives invite the prophet's hearers in Babylon or Jerusalem to imagine Zion rejoicing now because she knows she is going to be surrounded by all these children—for instance, by the Judeans in Babylon who will have returned to Jerusalem.

54:4–8. Moreover, her husband has returned to her. Yahweh admits to having abandoned her and does not offer any defense for that here (50:1–3 has already provided the kind of defense Yahweh would offer) but offsets this by declaring that this abandonment is only temporary and that Zion's current suffering will be eclipsed by the compassion and love Yahweh will now show.

54:9–10. "Love" is khesed, suggesting "commitment," and that promise is then undergirded by one of the very few references to Noah outside Genesis. Yahweh's commitment to Noah had a similar background; people had proved incorrigibly willful and Yahweh had acted in devastating wrath, but had then sworn unconditionally never to do that again.

54:11–17a. Yahweh spells out the implications of Zion's restoration. It will be as if Zion is not merely rebuilt with stone but with precious stone. The problem that led to Yahweh's abandonment will not recur because her children will be turned into Yahweh's disciples (v. 13; the same word as in 50:4). NRSV assumes that shalom (v. 13) refers broadly to "prosperity" or well-being, but it also provides a segue to the promise of peace (vv. 14b–17a). In the past Yahweh has been the one who stirred up trouble for Zion, but that will not happen again; therefore any threats that come will not emanate from Yahweh and will, therefore, not succeed.

G. The Heritage of the Servants (54:17b–55:13)

54:17b. Zion's children, "Yahweh's disciples" (54:13), are now also "Yahweh's servants"; the expression appears in the plural form for the first time in Isaiah. Whereas 54:1–17a addressed Zion, 54:17b now addresses these people themselves, in the plural, which suggests it is the introduction to ch. 55 at least as much as the conclusion to ch. 54.

55:1–5. People are seeking to take responsibility for their own future. They need instead to look to Yahweh for that which truly satisfies. The prophet restates declarations about covenant and khesed, now given another new twist. Yahweh had made a covenant with David, but now there is no Davidic king. So where is the khesed Yahweh showed to David (Ps 89:49)? The answer is that Yahweh now intends to relate to and work with the whole community in the fashion Yahweh once worked with David. It will now be the whole community that witnesses to the nations through what Yahweh does with it, and draws them to Yahweh.

55:10–13. The people are to "seek Yahweh" in the sense of looking to Yahweh for their future, and to give up their sinful way of resisting Yahweh's thinking about how to take them to their destiny (vv. 6–9). Yahweh's plans are certain to find fulfillment (vv. 10–13).

IX. Judah After the Exile (56:1–66:24)

The last eleven chapters contain no references to Cyrus or Babylon. They focus on Jerusalem and provide even more glorious promises about the city's transformation. They also critique aspects of Judean worship and life. It makes sense to assume that the book is arranged in roughly chronological order and that these last chapters speak to Judah's life after the exile, the same context addressed by Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Some passages imply the time before the Temple has been rebuilt (see 64:11; 66:1), which would suggest the beginning of that period; others suggest a later stage. The prophecies are arranged in pairs, in ABCDEEDCBA order rather than in linear, chronological order. Reading them is like climbing stairs then coming down the other side.

A. An Open Community and Its Responsibility (i) (56:1–8)

56:1. "What is right" and "deliverance" are both used to translate the word tsedaqa, which in chs. 1–39 tended to refer to Israelites doing the right thing in light of relationships with one another (see commentary on 5:16), but in chs. 40–55 tended to refer to Yahweh doing the right thing in light of a relationship with Israel (see on 46:8–13). The beginning of these final chapters sets the two in vital relationship with one another, a motif that underlies the chapters. The community is to do what is right because Yahweh does what is right. As usual, it is not quite the case that their deliverance is conditional on their right behavior; rather, since Yahweh is committed to doing right by them, they must do what is right by one another. But if they fail in their obligation, they cannot complain if Yahweh's promise does not come true.

56:2–8. Observing the Sabbath is a practice unique to Israel. It is thus capable of being the marker of commitment to Yahweh, and if foreigners keep the Sabbath, they deserve to be regarded as true members of the covenant people. The same applies to eunuchs, who can make no biological contribution to the future survival and flourishing of Israel. The passage makes enthusiastic promises to foreigners and eunuchs whom some people in Judah might have excluded from membership in the community. In light of 58:13–14, these verses likely challenge Judeans about their own Sabbath practices.

B. Warnings and Challenges (i) (56:9–59:8)

56:9–57:2. Confrontation (i): The Leadership

This ironic invitation shows that in the Judean community nothing has changed. Unprincipled people can again take advantage of the weak because the people who should protect the "sheep" are stupid, asleep, and preoccupied by self-indulgence. With further irony, the fact that this malfeasance must issue in calamity means that people who are its victims are fortunate because they escape the calamity that must follow on this wrongdoing in the community.

57:3–13. Confrontation (ii): Dissolute Religion

57:3–4. There is another respect in which nothing has changed; people are still disposed to follow their traditional religious practices. Sorcery involves rituals of divination that are designed to discover what is going to happen, and then rituals to forestall any negative events that the divination reveals. Adultery and whoring suggest unfaithfulness to Yahweh and/or religious rites involving sexual activity designed to encourage fertility. People are inclined to scorn the narrow-minded faith that says one should simply rely on Yahweh in connection with such needs. That makes them rebels against Yahweh and deceivers who pretend to be committed to Yahweh but secretly practice heterodox rites.

57:5–9. The prophet is also scandalized by people's willingness to sacrifice a child to try to avert some disaster. Leviticus 18:21 bans such sacrifices to the god Molech, and here the parallelism in v. 9 suggests that Molech was a god in charge of the realm of the dead.

57:10–13. People have not recognized that their costly efforts to bring life into being or to ward off death have been in vain (v. 10). Yahweh's turning away from them in the exile has not driven them to return to Yahweh; in fact, just the opposite has occurred (v. 11). Their religious commitment is not something that impresses Yahweh when it is so misguided (vv. 12–13).

57:14–21. The Alternative that Stands Before People (i)

57:14–19. Yahweh again speaks of preparing a highway, as in 40:3–5, but this time it is "my people's way," cf. 35:8–10. By no means have the people arrived where they need to be in order to reach their destiny. But Yahweh is committed to getting them there. Being majestic and holy does not mean being unwilling to associate with ordinary mortals. Words such as "contrite" suggest a challenge to the hearers, though the word dakka' simply means "crushed," which suggests that this is another promise that Yahweh will be present with people who have been afflicted and broken by Yahweh's wrath in order now to revive them. So the people can look forward to real shalom.

57:20–21. But if v. 15 does not impose upon them the requirement of contrition, this does not mean nothing is expected of them. The prophet repeats 48:22. They cannot continue to behave as is described in 57:3–13.

58:1–14. Confrontation (iii): Fasting, Fraud, and Sabbath

58:1–9a. The prophet addresses people who indeed worship Yahweh. This does not preclude their also being involved in the kind of practices critiqued in ch. 57. The denunciation reflects their life in society rather than their religious life. They are, indeed, religiously observant. They seek blessing from Yahweh and celebrate what Yahweh has done for Israel, but there is a mismatch between their religious life and their life in society. The prophet castigates the same attitudes as prevailed before the exile; for biblical comments about this period after the exile, see Neh 5. Instead of caring for people who have become the victims of circumstances such as poor harvests, by making sure they have enough to eat and somewhere to live, they take advantage of them as employees who have no way of negotiating a living wage. Yahweh does not respond to the oppressors when they come to pray for Yahweh to restore their situation because they have ignored the cause of the poor. Only when they become more generous will Yahweh respond to them.

58:9b–12. There is another classic way whereby people who are doing well ensure they do better, by inappropriate legal activity, "pointing of the finger" (v. 9b, cf. Prov 6:13). In contrast, v. 10a describes the behavior that Yahweh expects, whereas vv. 10b–12 elaborate on the promises of restoration.

58:13–14. A further "if—then" challenge and promise follow, stressing the Sabbath (cf. 56:2–8). While letting people have a Sabbath rest is another way of treating them properly, the prophet emphasizes the significance of the Sabbath as a sign of revering Yahweh. This day belongs to Yahweh; it was not created for business or comparable pursuits.

59:1–8. The Alternative that Stands Before People (ii)

Verse 1 suggests that the people were asking in their prayers, "Is your hand too short to save, is your ear too dull to hear?" The prophet responds that Yahweh could raise a hand or lift an ear, but will not do so. The people cannot come into Yahweh's presence to pray. This is not because there are temporary ritual barriers between them and God such as are caused by contact with a corpse. These can be removed by time and/or by a cleansing ritual. The nature of their contact with death has generated barriers of the kind that rituals do not address. They do not behave with shalom; so they will experience no shalom (v. 8).

C. The Prayer that Needs to Be Prayed (i) (59:9–15a)

Nevertheless, a prayer follows. As a result of being admitted into Yahweh's council (see commentary on 38:1–8), a prophet is in a position to mediate in both directions, bringing Yahweh's word to people and people's needs to Yahweh. At the same time, putting this prayer here suggests that the prophet wants people to see the prayer as part of this message. This fits with the prayer's content. People pray as if they practice righteousness, but there is actually no justice in their paths (58:2; 59:8). That is why justice and righteousness are far from them (vv. 9a, 14a)—that is, Yahweh is not acting in relation to them with tsedaqa and mishpat. Verses 12–13 and 14b–15a thus offer contrition appropriate to the people's condition. Yet it seems that the prophet is making it on the people's behalf.

D. The Answer to Prayer (i) (59:15b–20)

When prophets such as Hosea and Jeremiah pray on behalf of the people, Yahweh is inclined to refuse to listen because the people themselves are not committed to acknowledging their wrongdoing before God in the way that the prophet does on their behalf (Jer 14:1–15:4; Hos 6:1–6). One would then expect that Yahweh would take the same stance in relation to the prayer in vv. 9–15a. However, instead of pointing out that there is every reason for Yahweh to ignore their prayer (cf. 1–8), the prophet declares that Yahweh is concerned for them and is dismayed that there is no justice, i.e., that no one is acting on their behalf. The prophet thus takes the same stance that appears in chs. 40–45: it is no good for Yahweh simply to wait until the people themselves change; that could mean waiting forever. Yahweh has to act on their behalf; then they will "fear the name of the Lord." The passage combines past-tense verbs (which declare that Yahweh has made a decision and that the act is as good as done) and future-tense verbs (which recognize that it has not actually happened).

Who did Yahweh think should act to restore Israel (v. 16a)? Perhaps it is a Cyrus-like figure. But in the absence of any such person, human or heavenly, taking action, Yahweh has determined to take action personally (cf. 42:13–17). It is not so much a matter of attacking Israel's enemies but of putting down Yahweh's own enemies, people who oppose Yahweh's purpose, with the aim that the rest of the world should come to acknowledge Yahweh. Yahweh will then act as Zion's redeemer or restorer (see 41:14–16). But this will be effective only for people who turn from their rebellion against Yahweh (v. 20). Yahweh takes the initiative, but the people must respond.

E. Zion's Transformation (i) (59:21–60:22)

The center of chs. 56–66 is a series of promises that Yahweh will gloriously restore Jerusalem. The events that followed the fall of Babylon had freed Judeans to return and had led to the rebuilding of the Temple, but sources such as Nehemiah indicate that this restoration fell far short of the promises in Isaiah 49–54. These chapters reaffirm those promises in even grander fashion. In these first promises about a gathering of the nations and of the city's children, the opening and closing sections (60:1–3 and 17b–22a) form a pair, as do the two central sections (60:4–8 and 9–17a). The entire chapter portrays a great reversal for the city, especially in its relationship with the nations.

59:21. The promises begin with a divine commitment. Yahweh makes a covenant with the people to keep speaking through the prophet and through the prophet's successors. Thus Yahweh promises to keep speaking to them.

60:1–3. This opening commission to "shine" is a figure of speech. The city cannot decide to shine, but it will do so involuntarily because Yahweh will shine on it and it will reflect Yahweh's brightness, as Moses once did. Such brightness will not scare the nations but attract them from their darkness.

60:4–8. The implications are spelled out primarily in three overlapping ways. The nations will bring the city's children (back). They will also bring fabulous wealth to the city. Not only will the city enjoy this wealth, but it will also take the form of flocks and other gifts to enhance the worship of Yahweh.

60:9–17a. The three themes are elaborated. The returning offspring will be so numerous they will fill scores of ships. The nations that shamed, destroyed, and domineered the city will rebuild, beautify, and serve it. Their resources will beautify Yahweh's house.

60:17b–22a. The last section in turn elaborates on the first. Devastation will be replaced by shalom (well-being) and tsedaqa (Yahweh doing right by the city). The brightness of the light that comes from Yahweh's presence will eclipse the light of sun and moon.

60:22b. Yahweh's own person stands behind these promises. And Yahweh will bring their fulfillment with speed. Yet that fulfillment will come "in its time." When Yahweh decides this time has come, the fulfillment will happen in an instant. But this does not mean the instant starts now. Evidently the people who received this prophecy had enough experience of something they could call a degree of fulfillment of it (e.g., in Nehemiah's building of the city's walls) to believe that it was a word from Yahweh and not mere fantasy. They then held onto it as a promise of something ultimate to which Yahweh was committed.

F. Zion's Transformation (ii) (61:1–62:12)

61:1–4. A distinctive feature of this parallel account of Yahweh's promises is the way the prophet speaks as a person, as in 49:1–6; 50:4–9. First comes testimony of the one commissioned to proclaim the promises. "The spirit of the Lord Yahweh is upon me" is an initial fulfillment of Yahweh's earlier promise (59:21); "Yahweh has anointed me" is a more surprising description, because anointing usually applies to priests or kings (cf. 45:1) not prophets. It is thus a distinctive way of claiming a divine commission. It undergirds the message that follows. The good news is that Yahweh is bringing redress to the city's overlords and thus liberation to its oppressed people.

61:5–11. Thus whereas other peoples have prevented Israel from offering proper worship of Yahweh, or have sought to do so (see Ezra 1–6 as well as the earlier story of the Temple's destruction), now they will make it possible for Israel to do so. Shame gives way to great honor, blessing, and joy. Yahweh will stop oppression by other peoples and implement the covenant relationship (v. 8). And for the prophet, proclamation to the people is accompanied by joy in Yahweh (vv. 10–11). In praising Yahweh with such enthusiasm, the prophet is doing what Israel is destined to do, behaving even now as if Yahweh's promises have been fulfilled. The verses recall psalms of thanksgiving, which also give anticipatory praise even before the event has actually happened (v. 11b).

62:1–5. The prophet next declares a commitment to pray that Yahweh will indeed fulfill these promises and to maintain that active prayer until it happens. The verses pick up and elaborate the promises in ch. 54, using similar words such as "sons" (banim) and "builders" (bonim).

62:6–9. As well as making a personal commitment to prayer, the prophet commissions other people to keep making a nuisance of themselves to Yahweh until the time of fulfillment comes, like the woman who keeps knocking on the judge's door (Luke 18:1–8). They are like lookouts since they are committed to the city's welfare and since they are committed to staying alert at all times to fulfill their task.

62:10–12. Finally the prophet commissions some people to leave the city and construct a road. The imagery is familiar (e.g., 35:8–10; 40:3–5; 48:20), but it is reworked in a new direction (cf. 57:14–19). The roadmakers are once more unnamed, but their road is for the people to come back to Jerusalem. Moreover, other peoples are accompanying them and presumably (to judge from other declarations in chs. 60–62) making that journey possible. As was also the case in passages such as 48:20, the declaration is designed to help the people of Jerusalem understand that Yahweh is committed to bringing its people back.

G. The Answer to Prayer (ii) (63:1–6)

These verses correspond to 59:15b–20, though they also follow on 59:21–62:12. The prophet imagines an anonymous questioner (perhaps a lookout) asking about an impressive warrior who arrives covered in red, which suggests blood, though it is literally grape juice. Although he comes from the direction of Edom, this need not mean he has been fighting Edom; indeed, the last verse indicates that this is not so, unless Edom stands for nations in general (as in ch. 34). The figure turns out to be Yahweh, who has acted to do right by Israel (tsedaqa, v. 1b) to put down these nations and thus redeem and restore Israel (see commentary on 41:14–16) because no one else was doing so (cf. 59:15b–20).

H. The Prayer that Needs to be Prayed (ii) (63:7–64:12)

The second prayer follows; it is parallel to 59:9–15a but much longer. Indeed, some time elapses before its character as a prayer becomes clear. Further, the passage implies that the Temple is still in ruins, which may suggest the prayer originally belonged in the exilic period, before the time during which Isa 40–55 was composed. Its presence here reflects the sense running through chs. 56–66 that the exile continues into what is often called the post-exilic period.

63:7–14. The prayer begins as a twofold review of Israel's story. First, it recalls Yahweh's deeds at the exodus, though Yahweh's hope that they would respond to such an expression of love was disappointed. But Yahweh's chastisement won their return and Yahweh delivered them again at the Red Sea. Yet that raises the question why Yahweh is not relating to them in this way now. Their experience in the exile and after the exile is very different from the experience of their ancestors. The references to Yahweh's "holy spirit" and "the spirit of Yahweh" are noteworthy. The phrase "holy spirit" comes in the OT only here and in Ps 51:11. It makes clear that "his holy spirit" was active in Israel, though the phrase is not a technical term in the OT as it became in Christian doctrine.

63:15–19. At this point the passage becomes overtly a prayer, addressing Yahweh in light of that difference between Yahweh's activity in Israel's life at the beginning and Yahweh's behavior now. As in vv. 7–14, the prophet moves between speaking as "I" and as "we"; once again, this is a prayer the prophet articulates on behalf of the people. As happens in the psalms, the first thing the prayer seeks is Yahweh's attention; in a way this is all it needs, because if the people gain Yahweh's attention, surely God will respond. So the prayer looks up to Yahweh's heavenly dwelling and urges Yahweh to look down on what is happening—or not happening—to Israel. Their unrestored state means that their great father-figures would not recognize them. If Yahweh is their father and redeemer, then certain actions should follow. In the typically bold nature of Israelite prayer, the people accuse Yahweh of making them stray from Yahweh's ways and hardening their hearts, as if they were Egyptians not Israelites. Accusing Yahweh in this way risks the danger of excusing ourselves, but it does take seriously the fact that Yahweh is Lord, i.e., a ruler responsible for Yahweh's people.

64:1–14. The second thing the prayer asks is for Yahweh to act. It is again typical of OT prayer that it does not request something in concrete terms. Although the prayer is bold in the way it confronts Yahweh, it is reticent in telling Yahweh what to do, perhaps in the conviction that if it can gain Yahweh's attention, then Yahweh will decide what course of action is needed. So it asks for Yahweh to come in spectacular fashion and take action against the nations—Israel's overlords—who oppose Yahweh in the world.

64:5–7. The prayer once more makes Yahweh responsible for the people's failure. It was after Yahweh got angry and chastised Israel that Israel sinned (the prayer ignores the causes of Yahweh's anger), so that the right deeds Israel might have accomplished it no longer does, and it risks paying the ultimate price for that. Yahweh has hidden and abandoned the people to their sins, so it is understandable if people have given up praying.

64:8–12. The prayer finally appeals once more to the fatherhood of Yahweh. Surely a father will care about his children. But the subsequent appeal to Yahweh as potter suggests that the prayer takes up Yahweh's own words—as expressed in 45:9–11—and turns them into a challenge for Yahweh. Yahweh allegedly has the wisdom to know when enough is enough (cf. 28:23–29), but is Yahweh displaying that wisdom? Yahweh has spoken of abandoning coolness, silence, and self-restraint (42:14–15), but when will this happen?

I. Warnings and Challenges (ii) (65:1–66:17)

This further set of warnings and challenges balances 56:9–59:8.

65:1–7. Confrontation (i)

Israel assumes that it can say anything to Yahweh in prayer, but also that Yahweh has the same freedom in replying. Thus this second set of warnings and challenges responds with a vigor and straightness that matches those of Israel's prayer. Yahweh indicts vigorously their inappropriate religious practices and promises that judgment will be the consequence.

65:8–16. The Alternative that Stands Before People (i)

The promised judgment (vv. 6–7a) will not mean indiscriminately destroying the people. Yahweh affirms the intention to restore the people and the land, but for the first time (with the book almost over) speaks overtly about distinguishing between the faithful and the faithless within Israel. Isaiah 54:17b, for the first time in the book, referred to Yahweh's servants (plural); moreover, the prayer in 63:17 appealed to the people's status as servants (cf. also 56:6). This chapter takes up the servant's talk but suddenly applies the terms to a group within Israel, set over against those who forsake Yahweh (vv. 8, 9, 13, 14, 15). It is the former who will enjoy Yahweh's blessing in the land. Being servants means responding when Yahweh summons; the others fail to respond and make up their own minds about what to do, how to worship, and how to find guidance (v. 12). That group will "be put to shame."

65:17–25. The Associated Promise

Yahweh now speaks to the people as a whole. Talk of a new heavens and a new earth (v. 17) in later apocalyptic literature came to suggest the creation of a new cosmos, but the present context makes clear that the prophet refers to a new Jerusalem (v. 18). Indeed, paradoxically, the distinguishing feature of the new Jerusalem will be that it realizes the intention of Yahweh's original creation—for humanity (vv. 20–23) and the rest of nature (v. 25).

66:1–6. The Alternative that Stands Before People (ii)

Whereas the people have attempted to use the devastated state of the Temple as a basis for encouraging Yahweh to take action (64:11–12), Yahweh again undercuts their argument. The verses thus take a very different attitude to the Temple from the one present in Haggai and Zechariah. Thus between them these prophets testify to the way having a temple both does and does not make theological sense. Indeed, one might have thought that vv. 1–2a would exclude any divine dwelling among humanity, but vv. 2b–4 rework the basis on which Yahweh chooses to live somewhere. People who offer the right sacrifices (the first alternative in each line in v. 3a) can be no more acceptable than people who offer abominations (the second half of each line). Verses 5–6 develop the motif of division within the community that appeared in 65:8–16 and make explicit that this is not a division between people who worship Yahweh and people who do not but a schism between two groups who worship Yahweh.

66:7–17. The Alternative that Stands Before People (iii)

The book almost closes with a series of further promises of Jerusalem's transformation, but these are now set in the context of the division within the community. These verses nuance what was said earlier about the transformation that the chapters have been describing by declaring that it will benefit only "his servants," only people who are properly committed to Yahweh.

J. An Open Community and Its Responsibility (ii) (66:18–24)

The book closes with the worldwide vision with which chs. 56–66 began. Once again Yahweh declares that the nations will bring the scattered Judean community back to Jerusalem, but here the emphasis is on the gathering of the nations to "see my glory." To that end Yahweh will commission some of the surviving Judeans to proclaim this glory and draw the nations into worship of Yahweh. The notion of being witnesses (e.g., 43:9–12; 55:4–5) thus receives sharper profile. Further, the role of priests and Levites will no longer be confined to Israelites; some of these Gentiles will be able to share in teaching and leading the worship in the new Jerusalem.

Such an inclusive verse would make for a fine ending to the book, but to the very end it refuses to stop surprising readers, ending with a warning that challenges them (v. 24).

JEREMIAH

JAMES M. KENNEDY

OVERVIEW

The book of Jeremiah takes its name from the prophet whose words it contains and whose actions it describes. No other prophetic book in the Old Testament gives as much biographical information about its namesake as the book of Jeremiah. Yet Jeremiah's biography is not the point. What one learns about his life in the book is related to the book's message. Interestingly, readers know nothing of how and when he died. Instead the book attests that he spoke God's word and performed God's directions, and for the compilers of the book that was enough.

The book began to take form in the exilic era, which commenced with the first deportation of Judahites to Babylon in 597 BCE. The Greek version, the Septuagint (LXX), exhibits a different order from the Masoretic Text (MT) in significant ways, most substantially in the sequence of the oracles against Israel's national neighbors. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls revealed the existence of Hebrew manuscripts of the book of Jeremiah that closely relate to LXX. Many scholars have concluded that the differences between MT and LXX are not from textual dislocation but involve two different Hebrew versions of the book. The New Revised Standard Version (NRSV) is a translation of MT and provides the basis of the following commentary.

Perhaps more so than the other two lengthy prophetic books—Isaiah and Ezekiel—Jeremiah displays sequences that seem unrelated. The implications of this are multiple, but of paramount importance is the necessity for patience on the part of readers. The commentary that follows views the difficult sequences as planned. The book of Jeremiah asks its readers to enter a world marked by confusion, fear, hope, despair, joy—a world of seriously ambivalent and conflicting emotions. It is the world of Judah's catastrophic fall to the Babylonian Empire and the events that led to it. Perhaps the book's complicated literary structure invites its readers to experience a mental simulacrum of the conditions that appeared to whirl out of control around its central human figure, a human being whom the God of history called on to do an impossible task.

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prologue (1:1–19)

A. Superscription (1:1–5)

The first two words in the book bear more significance than the simple translation "the words of Jeremiah" allows. The Hebrew word davar, "word," may mean "chronicle" or "event." As readers proceed through the book, it becomes clear that the superscription means more than "words," but something like "the events" or "deeds" of Jeremiah. The autobiographical and biographical elements are definitive components of the book.

The text dates the coming of the Lord's word to Jeremiah beginning in 628/7 BCE and lasting until the fifth month of 587 BCE. Jeremiah's hometown of Anathoth relates him to the ancestor, Abiathar, whom Solomon exiled there generations earlier (2 Kgs 2:26). Jeremiah's heritage of exile may have played a role in his enemies' reactions to what the Lord tells him to announce (Jer 29:27). Nevertheless, the book reminds its readers that Anathoth itself harbored many of the prophet's foes (Jer 11:21–23).

B. The Call of Jeremiah (1:6–10)

From before Jeremiah's birth, the Lord intended him to be "a prophet to the nations" but Jeremiah protests that his youth disqualifies him from such service. His demurral evokes an image of Moses' insistent argument with God at the burning bush in Exodus 3. Jeremiah's exact age does not figure, only that he asserts he is a na'ar, that is, a youth (Jer 1:6; NRSV, "boy"). God is unimpressed with his lack of credentials and insists that Jeremiah speak as commanded. The prophet has no choice. Readers learn of Jeremiah's underlying concern in the Lord's command "do not be afraid of them." To whom "them" refers is ambiguous. Such an ambiguity may be by design and so leave Jeremiah in a state of anxiety as well as communicate a similar mood to the book's readers. God has looked into Jeremiah's heart, seen his fear, and speaks to it; it is a lesson that will figure later in the book (Jer 17:9, 10; 20:12). Jeremiah informs his readers that God instilled the divine message by touching his mouth. Jeremiah's task as prophet will be both destructive and constructive. His words not only will participate in the dismantling of Judah but will exert their inexorable power over other nations and kingdoms as well (Jer 46:1–51:64).

C. Divine Promise and Warning (1:11–19)

With the vision of the "branch of an almond tree," the Lord secures Jeremiah's attention to the inevitability of the divine word's success. In Hebrew, the word for "almond" (shaqed) is phonemically similar to the word for "watching" (shaqod). Jeremiah understands what the almond branch means and instantly transfers the literal content of the vision into comprehending it as expressing the Lord's assurance of fulfillment.

The vision of "a boiling pot, tilted away from the north" unfolds the general message, namely, that the Lord is going to send a scalding destruction over the land from out of the north. Indeed, the Babylonian advance on Judah will be from the north because of the desert that lies to the east of Judah and west of Babylon. Tellingly, the Lord does not identify the attackers from the north but depicts them as "all the tribes of the kingdoms of the north." The reference to the multiplicity of kingdoms suggests that the Babylonians will use the empire's vast resources of conquered peoples to descend on Judah, like the varied contents of the pot set to boil.

With the threatening promise "I will utter my judgments against them" (v. 16), the Lord acts as both prosecutor and judge. This declaration exhibits the actions of a prosecutor making a case against a defendant as well as the judge pronouncing sentence. Here is the basic crime that Jerusalem and the cities of Judah have committed: by way of "offerings to other gods," they have offered sustenance to the other gods and have rendered adoration to their own creations instead of to the Creator. "Gird up your loins" is a figurative expression deriving from the need to secure the bottom part of one's garments to engage in toil or to do something quickly. What Jeremiah is about to do, that is, "tell them everything that" the Lord commands, will be toilsome and laborious. The labor finds expression in the Lord comparing Jeremiah to a city under siege that must make preparations to hold back a besieging army (here Jeremiah's own compatriots). As toilsome and troublesome as his situation may be, Jeremiah can only accept the Lord's promise of his eventual security. With the divine promise in v. 19, "for I am with you," the text alludes to the Lord's promise to Moses (Exod 3:12).

II. Destruction (2:1–25:28)

A. Oracles of Judgment (2:1–10:25)

Jeremiah 2–38 contains disparate materials that seem at times not to follow any logical sequence. Some scholars attribute the difficult order of the text to a complex textual history of copying and editing. As plausible as this is, the text's organization could also be by design. The text that seems to be disordered might reflect the disordered character of the situation to which Jeremiah must speak. Text and reality merge in the apparent jumble. Furthermore, the text's seemingly disordered nature provides readers with an experience that will compel them into imaginatively identifying with the kind of inner struggle Jeremiah will endure. Just as the prophet must deal with what may seem like a world out of control, the book's readers must work in unusual ways to make sense of what seems like a text out of control. There are a few clues along the way that provide useful guidance. Indeed, by the time one has read the entire book and viewed chs. 2–38 in their literary context, the end to which the text's editors arranged the material sheds light on its beginning. In part, the book of Jeremiah works on the assumption that a comprehensive understanding of what is happening can come only from the perspective of looking back, as an anonymous prophetic voice announces in Jer 23:20 and 30:24, "In the latter days you will understand this." Charles Tindley's hymn truly captures the essence of this interpretive maneuver with the famous line, "We will understand it better by and by."

2:1–4:31. Appeals for Repentance. In this section, the book of Jeremiah configures the Lord's accusations against Israel as a way to convince Israel of the need to turn back to God. Rhetorically, the accusations imply God's appeal for Israel to stop such behavior and to return. Verse 5 expresses the Lord's amazement that, instead of clinging closely to the divine guide through the desert, "they went far from me." Why would a migrating people simply abandon the knowing guide in such dangerous territory to follow "after worthless things"? If the ancestors had found wrong in the Lord, then there would be no question. "Wrong" ('awel) refers to mistreatment, malice, or crookedness. Although Israel cannot point to any maltreatment from God, they followed "worthless things." The term for "worthless things" is hebel, elsewhere translated as "vanity" (Eccl 1:2), and allows for the connotations of "breeze" or "wind." The accusation constructs a picture of people leaving off from following a guide to chase after dust devils and becoming just as confused in their whirling about as is the whirling wind. That the Israelites' ancestors followed wrong (hevel) alludes to the issue of the "wrong" ('awel) about which the Lord asks.

The description of the alien terrain in v. 6 only adds to the wonderment of Israel's leaving off from following the Lord. Navigating through such dangers, they never asked, "Where is the LORD?" That God brought them into the garden that was Canaan in v. 7 implies the character of God as gracious. Yet, once in Canaan, Israel's lack of concern for the Lord continues. Verse 8 reframes the question concerning the presence of the Lord in a liturgical context and as absent from the mouths of the priests. Furthermore, interpreters of the law did not know or recognize the Lord, Israel's rulers transgressed, and the prophets prophesied by Baal, the Canaanite god of fertility. In the desert, the ancestors scrambled after "worthless things"; in the land they "went after things that do not profit" (v. 8), most likely a reference to idols.

A brief excursus on idols in the Old Testament will clarify the book of Jeremiah's polemic against them. Readers of the Old Testament will know that it records God's denunciation of idolatry, as for example in Exod 20:4–6, 23 and Lev 26:1. Not just any statue could be an idol. An idol was a representation of a deity in animal or human form that served a focusing function in liturgy. Idols were cult statues. Throughout the ancient Near East, the statue destined to become a cult statue underwent a ceremony known by various names. In Egypt, it was called The Ceremony of the Opening of the Mouth. In Mesopotamia, it was The Ceremony of the Washing of the Mouth. Both were variations of the same basic concept, namely, that after the ceremony was complete, the spirit of the god the statue represented took up residence in it. Because the ancients thought of the spirit as giving life, the cult statue required care. This care amounted to a place to live, namely, a shrine in a temple and something to eat, namely, sacrifice. A key component of the use of the cult statue was divination. The ancients believed that the god could communicate with the appropriate cultic official through the statue. The prophets of the Old Testament protested the use of cult statues with vigor. Habakkuk 2:18–20 offers evidence that the Israelites had their own variation of the ceremony by which the statue could be summoned to divine life and offer instruction. In contrast, Habakkuk proclaimed, "But the LORD is in his holy temple" (Hab 2:20).

In Jer 2:9–11, God challenges the accused to look about them and to find a nation that has changed its gods. Framed as a rhetorical question, the Lord's challenge demands a negative answer. Yet, Israel has changed its supreme devotion—their glory—into "something that does not profit" (Jer 2:11). Here is a reference to cultic statues that denies them any ability to act. They are not capable of transmitting a divine oracle. In vv. 12–13, the Lord addresses the divine council (see Jer 23:18, 22). The vocative, "O heavens," exhibits the figure of metonymy, whereby a word represents a given entity or entities by association. The Lord uses strong verbs that depict deep horror at Israel's misdeeds. Jeremiah's readers learn that much more is at stake than one people. Jeremiah will express this later in ch. 4.

The Lord compares Israel's change of worship to their having dug out "cracked cisterns that can hold no water" when all along they have had available "the fountain of living water," an artesian well that forces its water to the surface and requires no descent into dark holes. The book may be foreshadowing one of Jeremiah's darkest moments—being abandoned to die in a muddy cistern (Jer 38).

Against the background of Josiah's death and Neco's triumph, the prophet examines Israel's condition. Second Kings 23:29–35 provides the background for the despoiling that vv. 14–19 describe. Jeremiah's pondering takes the literary form of describing the Lord continuing to speak to the divine council (see Jer 2:11). Like a master taking away the belonging of a slave, Neco has plundered Jerusalem and its surroundings, so Jeremiah fitfully muses on the question, "Is Israel a slave? Is he a homeborn servant?" These questions refuse an affirmative answer and so the Lord asks,

"Why then has he become plunder?" Verse 17 expresses the tragic answer. Israel invited the disaster by abandoning the Lord. The phrase "while he led you in the way" reprises the accusation from 2:6–8.

Presumably, v. 19 represents a component of the Lord's address that Jeremiah will convey to the people. The word "apostasies" translates the Hebrew word meshuvah, a noun that derives from the verb shuv, "to turn." It designates wandering or rambling around. It is the same root the prophet will employ (3:14, 22; 4:1) when he urges his people to turn to God, which, in effect would mean to stop wandering and to follow God. The phrase "evil and bitter" is the kind of condition that compels the Lord to summon the heavens to be shocked and horrified (v. 12). The Hebrew word for "evil" bears the sense of calamitous or catastrophic as well as evil. "Bitter" carries forward the conditions that prevail from having dug out useless cisterns that can yield only puddles of bitter water. Along with the word "forsake," "bitter" ties the thought more securely to 2:13.

That the Lord can assert "the fear of me is not in you" presupposes that Israel does not see itself as having abandoned the Lord. Verses 20–22 describe Israel's transference of loyalty from the Lord to the Canaanite fertility cults. Having planted a choice vine, the Lord expresses deep dismay at the results, namely, the choice vine becomes a wild vine, a quickly propagating, useless weed. The evidence of Israel's guilt is ineradicable (2:22) and prompts the Lord's troubled bemusement in v. 23, "How can you say, 'I am not defiled, I have not gone after the Baals'?"

Israel cannot deny its guilt. The nation's leaders, who call on the cult statues, will find them powerless (2:26–28). Verses 26–27 explain the nature of the shame the officials will suffer. The impotence of the idols will come to light and, thereby, the leadership's dereliction of duty will be obvious to all. Verse 29 implies that the Lord is having a conversation; someone has been complaining. The Hebrew word for "complain" (riv) suggests a legal argument. Presumably, the nation has lamented the disaster of Neco's victory and now, in vv. 30–32 the Lord corrects the record by reminding Israel that its rebellion against God is the cause of its military failure against Egypt. In v. 30, the Lord recalls unnamed moments in Israel's history in which punitive guidance has failed. The prophets who spoke God's word loyally met with violent death at the hands of their own people. Verse 31 recalls the imagery of the land as a garden (2:7) as God rhetorically asks if the care the land requires has not been given. Indeed, the question may assume the declarative form, "I have been neither a desert nor a land of darkness to Israel."

Behind the argument of v. 31 lies the sad truth that Israel has sought what it needs from Baal, as if the Lord were of no value. Completely unaware of their culpability in the national disaster, the people throw up their hands not in worship but in exasperation as they assume that God has failed them. They take the privilege of rejecting the Lord because they interpret the present crisis as a failure of the suzerain of Mount Sinai. Verse 32 expresses yet again God's bewilderment. How can a girl forget her jewelry or a bride her attire on the wedding day? Yet, Israel has neglected God "days without number."

Israel's wandering after Baal is so skillful that it can serve as an example to "wicked women," presumably, prostitutes (2:33). Yet, such skill cannot conceal the evidence of Israel's crime as "on your skirts is found the lifeblood of the innocent poor." The use of the adjective "innocent" to describe the poor suggests that persons without recourse to adequate defense have been falsely charged with crimes the punishment for which is death. Jeremiah sees a close connection between Israel abandoning God and the social elite's perversion of power to suit their own schemes. In spite of this evidence, Israel insists "I am innocent" and "I have not sinned" (2:35). Verse 36 describes Israel's turning from God as frivolous and carefree, with no forethought of consequences. Therefore, the Lord will nullify any help that may come from Egypt or Assyria. Israelite emissaries will return with their hands on their heads, a sign of shame and failure (cf. 2 Sam 13:19).

Jeremiah 3:1 alludes to a law about marriage in Deut 24:1–4. If a man divorces his wife, she may marry another man. If the second husband divorces her, the first husband may not take her back. The answer to the question of v. 1 is therefore "no," the land would be defiled. The Lord applies the conditions to Israel. Having "played the whore with many lovers," would the nation dare think of returning to the first husband, the Lord? In v. 2, the evidence for Israel's adultery from the Lord mounts. No place is clean from Israel's adultery. The term, "bare heights," renders a Hebrew word that can refer to caravan trails. The sense appears to be that Israel has lain in wait like a roadside prostitute to take advantage of the goods and services available along the trade routes. The second half of v. 2 carries this image forward by comparing Israel to just such characters. For this reason, the Lord has held back the rains (v. 3). God's explanation of drought conditions relates to 2:29, where the divine Lord reminds Israel of the real identity of the guilty party. God's acknowledgment of having heard Israel's call in vv. 4–5 continues a string of occurrences wherein the Lord quotes something Israel has said (2:20, 23, 25, 31). Regardless of the words God hears, v. 5 confirms that Israel's conduct has not shifted to exhibit sincere returning.

In 3:6–14, Jeremiah conveys what the Lord said to him in the days of King Josiah. The basic message is that, given the northern kingdom of Israel's apostasies (vv. 6–10), Judah has surpassed them. The fate of the northern kingdom should have been Judah's object lesson, but Judah's confession of loyalty to the Lord was "only in pretense." In the light of 3:4–5, Jeremiah's readers will see that Judah has habitually wandered away from the Lord. The implication of the Lord's command to Jeremiah to proclaim a divine plea to Israel in the north to return (3:11–14) seems to be that perhaps Judah will outdo her northern sister in sincere repentance. Unlike Judah, who will not acknowledge guilt, perhaps Israel will acknowledge its own (3:13) with the result of reunification with Zion.

In vv. 15–18, Jeremiah depicts the momentous character of what God ultimately promises to do. Instead of corrupt rulers, the Lord will install "shepherds after my own heart." These leaders will nourish the new kingdom with "knowledge and understanding." Verse 16 conveys a component of the message that may have shocked the priestly hierarchy in Jerusalem, namely, the absence of the ark of the covenant of the Lord in the future scenario. The ark functioned as the throne of the invisible Deity who dwelled over the cherubim (cf. 1 Sam 4:4). Instead of the ark as God's throne, Jerusalem itself will serve that role. The Lord's presence will be unmediated and obvious to all the nations who will assemble before God.

Verses 19–20 exhibit the theme of the divine pathos. With the imagery of a wife who abandons her husband, the text conveys the sense of bitter disappointment that God endures as Israel wanders away. Having given Israel a beautiful and productive land in which to live, the Lord muses, "I thought you would call me, My Father." In Jeremiah, the word father first occurs in 2:27 where Israel's leaders "say to a tree, 'You are my father.' " Reference to God as father in the Old Testament is not frequent, yet frequent enough to know that it functioned in a meaningful way to express the implications of God's covenant relationship with Israel (Deut 32:6, 19; Isa 64:8; Hos 11:1). In v. 20, the Lord accuses Israel of having "been faithless" (NRSV).

Verse 21 presents an anonymous voice in the divine council; perhaps it is Jeremiah, opining "A voice on the bare heights is heard." "Bare heights" may refer to the high ridges on which caravans made their way along trading routes. The imagery portrays Israel as orphaned children crying out for any sustenance they can find along the routes that wayfarers and caravans take. It is a heart-rending image. At v. 22, the Lord speaks up with the plea, "Return, O faithless children, I will heal your faithlessness." "Faithlessness" describes the act of wandering or meandering, turning this way and that (Jer 2:19, NRSV, "apostasies"). To return to the Lord is to reverse and to straighten the meandering course that led Israel into dire conditions. The promise "I will heal your faithlessness" parallels the divine promise that Hos 14:4 quotes.

Verses 22b–25 display the ideal response for which God hopes, but that will turn out to be unrealistic. As if responding to the divine appeal for repentance in v. 22a, the penitent nation alerts God to its intent to come to God. The Hebrew is emphatic (NRSV, "Here we come").

In v. 24, "the shameful thing" may refer to the cult statue in a way that underscores its complete failure to respond to Israel's needs. That it "has devoured all for which our ancestors had labored" alludes to the material sacrifices that were believed to maintain the presence of a deity's spirit in the statue. "Shame" in v. 25 is the same word that depicts the cult statue in the previous verse. It refers to Israel's failure to have heeded God's plea. To cover with "dishonor" (NRSV) conveys the awareness of anyone who sees an exhibition of shame. The ideal confession of sin admits that Israel's entire history has been one of rebellion against the divine sovereign. The admission, "We have not obeyed the voice of the LORD our God," is characteristically Deuteronomic and takes its substance from alluding to texts such as Deut 8:20; 13:4, 18; 15:5.

Israel, having correctly admitted its crimes against God and having accepted its shame and dishonor, must do more. Jeremiah 4:1–4 expresses God's instructions concerning what it means to return to obedience and how to regain honor among the nations of the world. The word "abominations" (4:1; NRSV) also bears the sense of "detestable thing" or "filth." Ostensibly, it refers to the cult statue. That Israel is to remove such things "from my presence" could mean that Israel must remove them from the Temple in Jerusalem as well as from the land itself. The further condition, "and do not waver" (NRSV), may also mean "wander" or "roam." Israel's devotion to repentance not only involves turning back to follow the Lord, but refusing to allow its resolve to weaken, which could then lead to wandering away from the Lord again.

The oath, "as the LORD lives," commits the one making the oath to live up to a prior agreement.

To swear it "in truth, in justice, and in uprightness" is to do so with integrity and commitment. In Jer 38:16, King Zedekiah will swear this oath as his guarantee that he will not allow harm to come to Jeremiah if Jeremiah will tell him the truth from God. Jeremiah is completely honest, but Zedekiah finally sets a condition of safety on his prior oath. Regardless of having sworn, "as the LORD lives," he warns Jeremiah to keep their meeting a secret, or Jeremiah will die. Verse 2b relates the consequences of Israel's sincere turning to God; the nation will regain its honor as the Lord's people among the nations of the earth. "Then nations shall be blessed by him" evokes the ancestral promise of blessing to all humankind in Gen 12:1–3; 26:1–5; 28:13–15.

The word "for" with which v. 3 begins relates vv. 3–4 to what has come before. The actions that the Lord urges in vv. 3–4 reinforce the appeal to repent in vv. 1–2. The appeal from God employs agricultural metaphors that describe actions taken to prepare land for sowing seed. "Fallow ground" (NRSV) describes land that once had been plowed and seeded but then allowed to go unattended for a time. Breaking up the fallow ground removes from it the thorns that would have inevitably grown in the meantime. Ostensibly, the command in v. 3, with its agricultural metaphors of breaking up the fallow ground and removing its thorns, carries forward and reinforces the description of true repentance that vv. 1–2 express.

Verse 4 conveys the command "Circumcise yourselves to the LORD" (NRSV) but could just as well be rendered "Be circumcised by the LORD." To the ancient Israelites, this command would not make sense insofar as Israelite boys were circumcised on the eighth day after their birth. The parallel text, "remove the foreskin of your hearts" (NRSV) reveals the symbolic nature of the previous command. The origins of circumcision are lost in the distant reaches of human history. The Hebrews were not the only ancient people to practice circumcision. It was common among other Semitic cultures of Syria and Palestine. The Israelites traced its origin to the divine command to Abraham in Gen 17. Exodus 12:48 reasserts the rite in the context of Israel's exodus from Egypt. Theories concerning the meaning of circumcision abound; this commentary works on the hypothesis that circumcision was a rite related to what the ancient Semitic peoples believed about human reproduction. The removal of the foreskin was the removal of a possible obstacle to the transfer of seed from the man to the woman. Circumcision essentially prepared the male human to father children. Because mystery and anxiety veiled the process of reproduction, anything related to it became a matter of ritual concern and control. In Jer 4:3–4, the agricultural imagery of preparing the ground for productivity and the removal of the foreskin of the heart therefore complement each other. To remove the foreskin of the heart is therefore a symbol of preparing the heart to receive the productive power of God's blessing. Verse 4b sets out the alternative. God's rage will erupt like an unquenchable fire and, to carry forward the agricultural metaphor, burn the thorns into ashes.

In vv. 4–8, the Lord's command to Jeremiah casts him as an informant, ostensibly from the divine council, who is to alert the appropriate authorities to sound an alert from Jerusalem regarding an advancing invading army. A warning is to go out to the settlements around Jerusalem for the inhabitants to flee into the city for refuge. Verse 6 recalls Jer 1:14–15, where the Lord informs Jeremiah that devastation will come to Judah from the north.

In v. 7, the metaphor of a lion depicts the disaster approaching from the north. A lion emerging from its cover to hunt for prey might seem a small matter to contemporary city dwellers, but in the ancient Near East, a marauding lion could strike terror in the hearts of the inhabitants of villages and settlements without walls. Proverbs 30:30 describes the lion as the mightiest of beasts, never backing down from pursuing what it wants. Second Kings 17:25 preserves the memory of a pride of lions attacking a settlement and killing many people. Jeremiah's ancient audience would have fearfully appreciated the metaphor.

Immediately the metaphor of a lion shifts to something much more ominous, "a destroyer of nations." The ambiguity of the actual agent of disaster (Jer 4:6; NRSV, "the evil") provokes anxious reflection. It will "make your land a waste" and depopulate the cities. Verse 8 calls for a response from the people. Wearing sackcloth suggests repentance, but mourning is also an occasion for wearing it (Gen 37:34). Here the emphasis falls on mourning. Verse 8 continues the oracle that God tells Jeremiah to "declare in Judah, and proclaim in Jerusalem" (v. 5). It is not an oracle calling for repentance but announces the imminent disaster to descend from the north. The only thing for the land's inhabitants to say involves the recognition that the Lord's burning rage (4:8; NRSV, "fierce anger") has not turned back.

Verse 9 offers a fuller description of "that day" of disaster; the social system disintegrates. Courage will fail the king and his cronies. As Jer 39:4 reports, when the Babylonians breach Jerusalem's defenses, Zedekiah and his guard flee in terror from the city under cover of night, hoping to find refuge in the desert to the south. They will not succeed.

Presumably standing in the divine council (Jer 23:18, 22), Jeremiah objects in v. 10. He accuses the Lord of having deceived the people with protestations of their security, knowing full well that "the sword is at the throat." To what promise of protection Jeremiah refers is a puzzle. To this point in the book, God has not assured Judah or Jerusalem of divine protection in any terms that do not presuppose the nation's repentance. The prophet's response may exhibit his own lack of perception of God's command. Jeremiah will become aware of his own need for instruction (Jer 10:23, 24).

Verse 11 portrays the Lord re-engaging the people in debate. A message will arrive from the advancing front with the dreadful announcement of a desiccating, destructive storm close behind. In v. 13, the Hebrew word translated "Look!" (hinneh) conveys both the suddenness and nearness of the invading force. The depiction of the enemies' chariots as "like the whirlwind" carries forward the metaphor of the desiccating, destructive wind from v. 11. As the Lord and Jeremiah confront each other, it is still not too late. Jerusalem may yet turn and "be saved" (v. 14). Verses 15–17 suggest, however, that the time of decision is short. The enemy may not yet be at the gates, but their advance is relentless. As if responding to Jeremiah's accusation of deceit from v. 10, the Lord lays the blame at the feet of the disloyal people. Verse 18 concludes with an assertion that Jerusalem's inhabitants finally comprehend the true nature of their dire predicament.

Verses 19–21 record Jeremiah's pained response and suggest that the prophet has himself learned something about the true nature of the situation. The painful, visceral reaction Jeremiah experiences compels him to speak out. The speech is not to the people, however, but is an exclamation of distress in the context of the divine assembly's deliberations. Jeremiah's distress is strong enough to induce physical pain. As if recognizing that etiquette in the council requires him to remain quiet, he cries aloud, "I will not be silent" (v 19; NRSV, "I cannot keep silent")! The verbs in v. 21 are difficult to translate. Jeremiah's question may express his dread of experiencing a prolonged time of suffering. Conceivably, he opines, "How long shall I have to see the standard and hear the sound of the trumpet?"

The Lord speaks in v. 22 and tells the troubled prophet that the people are vacuous, void of any awareness of God, prone to folly and without capacity for understanding. Nevertheless, they possess the wisdom (NRSV, "they are skilled") for doing evil. Their wisdom does not extend to doing what is good, i.e., to perform in such a way as to live in obedience to God's instruction. Against this background, readers may justifiably think that Israel's protestations of innocence (Jer 2:23) are sincere. Thus, Jeremiah faces a situation in which the Lord compels him to proclaim the divine word of judgment but to an audience that cannot respond obediently.

Jeremiah 4:23–26 conveys a vision of cosmic horror. Creation crumbles into the same state of chaos out of which Gen 1 portrays God as calling it. In the divine assembly, the Lord allows Jeremiah to witness the consequences of Israel's ignorance of the divine teaching and reveals to the horrified prophet that the consequences reach far beyond Israel's dissolution and exile. The vision expresses total destruction in several scenarios. The earth essentially liquefies and the luminaries of the heavens go dark (v. 23). The mountains quiver and collapse (v. 24). All life vanishes from the surface of the earth and the birds of the air flee (v. 25). Areas that once produced abundant agriculture become sterile, with the result that civilization collapses (v. 26). Other prophetic books in the Old Testament employ similar imagery to depict the juggernaut blast of the Lord's rage (Isa 24:1–8; Joel 2:1–11; Hab 3:2–16; Zeph 1:2–3).

In v. 27, the Lord brings the horrific vision to a close and then reveals that the vision was of something that could be, but that, mercifully, will not transpire. "I will not make a full end," the Lord states. Whether this is an editorial expansion by a late hand is possible, but it now functions to mitigate the scene of cosmic destruction. Indeed, God has proclaimed that the heavens will grow dark, but this is not of the same devastating quality that v. 23 describes; and indeed the earth shall mourn. From this the divine judge will not relent (v. 28).

Jeremiah 4:29 evokes the image of a panicked urban population fleeing into wooded areas and looking for refuge among rocky crags at the sound of an approaching cavalry with its steeds and archers, leaving towns depopulated. In a similar but lengthier text, Isa 2:10–21 describes the inhabitants of Judah's cities fleeing into desolate places to escape the terror of the Lord. Judges 6:2 refers to the oppressed Israelites as hiding from the Midianites in wild areas where there is cover in mountain caves.

In 4:30, the prophet poses a question that expresses amazement or surprise. Given the desolate conditions of having to flee the towns, the prophet is surprised to see women still concerned with their finery. In the final analysis, it will be in vain. The enemy has no romantic interests, but only in killing (vv. 30–31).

5:1–6:30. Indictment and Sentence. In Jer 5:1–2, the Lord challenges Jeremiah to canvass the streets of Jerusalem to see if he can find anyone "who acts justly and seeks truth." The presence of one such person will mean pardon for Jerusalem. The Lord warns Jeremiah not to take at face value hearing people say, "As the LORD lives" because it is a false oath. Imagining how Jeremiah's words to God in v. 3 relate to v. 2 allows any number of scenarios. This commentary envisions Jeremiah as returning to the divine assembly with a negative report. The streets are busy with people who have taken no heed to God's disciplinary acts in past times. Indeed, Jeremiah reports that they have only grown more stubborn (v. 3).

In v. 4, Jeremiah observes that the people he questioned "are only the poor" who "have no sense." The literacy rate in Jeremiah's time would not be high; most people had to spend almost every waking hour in making ends meet. Jeremiah decides to confront the rich, that is, the class of people who would be in a social situation more conducive to education. Verse 5a portrays the prophet as confident that the social elite will "know the way of the LORD, the law of their God." Yet even among the privileged that had access to the necessary documents and traditions, he finds transgression. With the image of yoke and bonds, the prophet implies the simile that the social elite are like a domesticated animal that has escaped its confines and run wild (v. 5b). Verse 6 carries this simile forward by reference to the kinds of dangers a recalcitrant domesticated animal will face in the wild.

Jeremiah 5:7 draws the readers' attentions once again to the divine assembly. The Lord's question, "how can I pardon you?" is related to Jeremiah's failure to find one righteous person in Jerusalem. As v. 1 indicated, if Jeremiah found a good person, God would pardon the city. That is now not an option. Verses 7–8 summarize God's indictment. In v. 9, the Lord asks two rhetorical questions that if answered negatively would mean that God would deny the validity of the divine commandment for Israel to be loyal.

In vv. 10–11, the Lord commands the divine assembly to disperse into Judah and cause havoc. The verses employ the metaphor of a marauding army despoiling its prey's agriculture. The Lord's instructions include a caveat in v. 10a; the havoc is to be limited. Verses 12–13 configure the Lord's command as a response to the people's confidence that God will not, in fact, do anything. Indeed, the prophets have promised national security, but God will reveal their promises as mere wind.

Verse 14b characterizes the divine word that Jeremiah must speak as a fire that will consume dead wood, a metaphor for the people. In vv. 15–17, the Lord promises to bring on the house of Israel an invading army that will consume both human and natural resources. However, God's purposes do not include total destruction (v. 18). Enough of the population will remain to ask the question "Why has the LORD our God done all these things to us?" Jeremiah will remind the people that they abandoned the Lord to worship foreign gods. Verse 19 concludes with a foreshadowing of the deportations that will begin in 597 BCE.

Verse 20 indicates that the Lord continues to instruct Jeremiah on what he shall say to the people. Following the summons to hear, Jeremiah is to address the people as "mindless" or "lacking a mind" (v. 21; NRSV, "senseless"). Having the ability to see and hear, they yet do not reverence the Lord. Just to the west, the Mediterranean Sea constantly pounds the sands of the coast, and yet it gains no foothold. "The waves toss," the Lord says, "they cannot prevail" (v. 22). This is the doing of the Lord and Israel lacks the intelligence to extrapolate from this phenomenon a sense of God's power. The Lord set a boundary the sea cannot cross and gives the rain in its appropriate season, but senseless Israel refuses to fear God (vv. 23–24). Israel fails to recognize that its sin has become as fast a barrier to the coming of rain as is the land to the rolling waves of the sea (v. 25).

Verses 26–28 portray Israel's social elite as scoundrels who have grown wealthy by treachery and deceit. The basic metaphor is that of a fowler who catches birds, creatures that find themselves unwarily trapped in snares. In v. 28, the phrase "fat and sleek" implies a nearly carefree life-style but it is one derived from depriving the most vulnerable in the land of justice. Ostensibly addressing the divine council, the Lord sets out a declaration clothed as a rhetorical question, "Shall I not punish them for these things?" The misdeeds of both prophets and priests have produced an "appalling and horrible thing," a phrase that describes one's hair bristling with horror. Incredibly, the people are content with the situation but they have not faced the question of its consequences (v. 31b).

If one thinks of its setting as the divine assembly, Jeremiah 6 presents a dramatic and emotional interchange between the angry Lord and a prophet who desperately wants to serve both. As vv. 27–30 will reveal, part of the Lord's agenda is to educate Jeremiah concerning the wayward paths of the people. In v. 1 the Lord bids trumpets to blare in Tekoa and directional signs on Bethhaccherem. Tekoa was approximately 10 miles south of Jerusalem. The exact location of Bethhaccherem is not known, but best estimates put it just under 5 miles south of Jerusalem. The flight takes place toward the opposite direction from which the disaster will break, namely, the north.

In vv. 2–3, the Lord compares "daughter Zion" to the best of pastures. Such lush abundance will attract aggressive shepherds who will bring their sheep. The implication is that the sheep will devour the resources of the land. Although the poetic image is of the shepherd's temporary tents, it evokes mental pictures of the tents the Babylonian army will pitch during the siege to come. Verse 4 turns to describing that specific context. This verse gives voice to an army eager to attack before the night falls. Verse 6 begins with the prophetic messenger formula and alerts readers that what follows is God's decree. Like a military field commander, God commands the setting up of the siege ramp against Jerusalem and, as if providing strategic intelligence to the enemy, points to Jerusalem's location. The Babylonians will be seeking plunder, but God's reasons for giving them the city are different. As the arbiter of true justice, he demands that "this city must bear the consequences" (Jer 6:6; NRSV, "this city must be punished"). Like a well that keeps its water fresh and cool (v. 7), Jerusalem contains oppression within her. The simile of a well implies that Jerusalem's corruption is deep and deliberate; wells are the work of human engineering. Verse 8 yields a hint that disaster can yet be averted. The Lord pleads with Jerusalem "to be disciplined" (NRSV, "take warning"). The Hebrew follows this plea with the word pen, literally, "lest I shall turn from you" (NRSV, "or I shall turn from you"), thus allowing for a different conclusion to the matter.

Verses 10–11 convey the prophet's sense of frustration as he complains before the Lord that Israel holds the divine word in contempt as the people refuse to listen and obey. Jeremiah, in contrast, is filled with the anger of God and has grown weary with not expressing it. God directs Jeremiah to pour it out into the streets on both young and old. Verses 13–15 describe greed as permeating every level of society, including priest and prophet. Nevertheless, the social elite insist that all is well (v. 14) by asserting "peace, peace." That the people do not blush indicates that they do not see their condition as embarrassing but their behavior dishonors the reputation of God.

Verses 16–17 portray God as having provided guidance and warning, but Israel has repeatedly refused. In vv. 18–19, all nations are addressed. The poetic figure of apostrophe allows God to address Israel obliquely as the Lord promises to bring disaster on the people. The refusal of Israel to follow the Lord's teaching invalidates the nation's public worship (v. 20). Insofar as the nation chose the wrong way (v. 16), they must follow a path studded with causes for stumbling. Verses 22–23 reprise the theme of the enemy from the north (1:13–15; 4:6; 6:1). Verses 24–25 portray an imaginary crowd of worriers whose fear of the foe from the north will impede the normal processes of society.

Ostensibly standing in the divine assembly (v. 6), Jeremiah verbally expresses his desire for the people to recognize the seriousness of their plight by engaging in the customary rituals of mourning and grief. The divine judge replies in vv. 27–30 that Jeremiah's role as assayer of the population is to educate him, implying that his task is not to side with the people. Verse 29 depicts a foundry worker ceaselessly bellowing the blaze of refinement but to no avail. There is nothing to gain from the refining process. Jeremiah must learn that there is nothing of value that remains among his people.

7:1–10:18. Corruption of the Temple. Knowing something about the symbolism of temples in the ancient Near East contributes significantly to one's understanding of these chapters. Ancient Near Eastern cultures generally thought of temples as models of the cosmos. They were microcosms of the greater cosmos that stretched out around them. The hierodules—persons in charge of a temple's various operations—saw in their temple an earthly manifestation of cosmic order. To desecrate a temple was to attack the very foundations of cosmic order as the hierodules of any particular temple would think of it. Thus, the destruction of a temple would have frightened its caretakers and the community of faith that revolved around it to a degree similar to how the threat of nuclear terrorism would evoke dread in contemporary times.

The ritual slaughter of appropriate animals was a central component of temple activity. According to the Priestly worldview in the Old Testament, a relationship existed between the appropriate disposing of the blood of a sacrificed animal and the maintaining of the cosmic order the temple symbolized. The Priestly documents give no theoretical explanation as to why the two are related except to imply that as long as Israel obeys the Lord and offers the divinely sanctioned sacrifices, the forces of impurity would remain powerless. Thus, Israel was to offer sacrifices because the Lord commanded it. The book of Jeremiah reflects the belief that sacrifices at the Temple were necessary. For Jeremiah verbally to assault the Temple of Jerusalem, and to do so claiming to be speaking on behalf of God, would have outraged the royal and priestly bureaucracies. As Jer 7 begins, the Lord tells Jeremiah "to stand in the gate of the LORD's house, and proclaim" a message of subversion related to the people's naïve assumption that the presence of the Lord's house guarantees the nation's continued survival.

God and people will dwell together in this place contingent only on Israel's making good (7:3; NRSV, "Amend") its ways. The prophet urges his hearers not to rely on what he calls "these deceptive words." The threefold exclamation of "the temple of the LORD" may have been meant to mock the repetitious nature of the liturgical words spoken there. Most likely, in a mimicking way, it echoes the claims of the priests, who in defense of the Temple, only feel the need to assert that it belongs to God.

Verses 5–6 amplify what it means to "truly amend your ways and doings." Here the prophet calls his hearers to cease their exploitation of the most vulnerable in Judahite society, namely, "the alien, the orphan, and the widow." "Innocent blood" suggests the execution of people for crimes they did not commit. Furthermore, recalling Jer 4:1, Jeremiah presses the people not to follow other gods, which can only lead to disaster (v. 6; NRSV, "your own hurt").

In vv. 8–12 the prophetic word confronts the people with the inconsistency between how they live (v. 9) and how they worship (v. 10). The prophet warns them (vv. 13–15) to consider the fate of Shiloh, where a temple of the Lord once stood. The Bible is not explicit about what befell Shiloh, but it is possible that the Philistine war that 1 Sam 4 describes may have resulted in the temple's destruction. Perceiving Jeremiah's sense of solidarity with Israel, the Lord commands the prophet not to speak on the nation's behalf (7:16). Jeremiah may not protest either Israel's innocence or ignorance as God points out that adoration of the "queen of heaven" is rampant (v. 18). The reference here is possibly to Asherah, whose likeness possibly appears on a potsherd from the ninth century BCE on which is etched the blessing, "May you be blessed by Yhwh and his Asherah." Verses 21–26 deliberate on the theme of obedience from the perspective of the Deuteronomic traditions. The book of Deuteronomy repeatedly underscores the necessity for Israel to obey the Lord's teachings (Deut 6:1–3, 17, 18; 8:1–3; 12:1), to remain in the land, and to receive the Lord's blessings. In Jer 7:21, the Lord mockingly encourages the Israelites to slaughter more and more animals in sacrifice; it will avail them nothing. Instead, it is the sacrifice of Israel's stubborn will that can fulfill the requirements God has set before the nation.

Jeremiah 7:27–8:3 continue the Lord's accusations of disobedience and refer to the horrific practice of human sacrifice (vv. 30–32). The destruction that will befall Israel will be so extensive that there will be no one to bury the dead (v. 33), the creation of new families will vanish (v. 34), and the bones of the social elite will be disinterred and scattered before the celestial objects that the Israelites venerated (8:1–2). Who remains will prefer to die than to live (8:3).

Jeremiah 8:4–10:25 seem to be a loosely stitched series of oracles on different topics. They address conditions that derive from the perversion of animal sacrifice from a means to an end as well as the use of the cult statue. Verses 4–7 set out God's argument against the people on the basis of the nation's stupidity. Normally, when someone falls down, he or she gets up again, but Israel falls and decides to keep falling (vv. 4–6)! As if in response to pleas from Jeremiah, the Lord informs the prophet (v. 6) that, having given heed and listened, God can find no honest intent in what the Israelites say. God tells the prophet that even birds know when to migrate and to return (v. 7) but "my people do not know the ordinance of the LORD." Here the Lord presses the central issue: Israel's ignorance. Thus, Jer 8:7 is related to Jer 4:22 and 5:4–5; together they create a picture of Israel as unable to turn back to God because the nation cannot comprehend itself as needing to return.

Verses 8–12 repudiate any claim the Israelites might make to support their having knowledge. The fact that scribes have purposely miscopied God's teachings (v. 8) leads logically to the nation's state of ignorance. Verse 9 promises that the mischief of the scribes and the wise will not remain hidden. Their perversion of the written record will rise up to shame them. Verses 10–12 delineate how the Lord will reveal their fraud. The wellbeing they promise (v. 11) will not occur; indeed, they themselves will be among the dead on the day of disaster (v. 12). In v. 13, the Lord uses the metaphor of a fruitless garden to describe Israel.

Verses 14–17 offer an imaginative scene depicting the response of people who live in outlying areas to the imminence of the arrival of the destruction from the north. In the face of invasion, such populations flood into cities to find protection behind the walls. "Poisoned water" (v. 14) renders a Hebrew phrase that also occurs in Jer 9:14 and 23:15. Its precise meaning is not known but it may refer to water that has come to have the taste of bile. Some older English translations render it as "water of gall." Such water would be impossible to stomach. It is a fitting metaphor to depict the bitterness of the situation of people having to abandon homes and farms for safety elsewhere. Verse 15 is related to the false proclamation of security in v. 11. Instead of peace, terror comes. Verse 17 uses a metaphor that evokes Num 21:6, where the Lord sends venomous snakes into the Israelite camp. The Lord releases snakes that "cannot be charmed" (NRSV), that is, no amulet can serve as a charm to ward off the snakes' infestation. In the ancient Near East, wearing charms inscribed with spells to ward off snakes was a widespread practice.

In these chapters, speakers change suddenly. Jeremiah 8:18–19a suggests that the prophet speaks, lamenting his loss of joy and describing the poor of the land reassuring themselves that they will find safety in Jerusalem; after all, they reason, "Is the LORD not in Zion? Is her King not in her?" Verse 19b conveys the Lord's exclamation of dismay concerning the peoples' use of the cultic statue. Then Jeremiah speaks out again in 8:21–9:2. Almost as if there had been no interruption, he continues in v. 20 with what he hears the refugees saying as they make their way to the city and its presumed safety. Even after the harvest, there is not enough to sustain. He expresses profound grief for his people and rhetorically inquires about the failure of the "balm in Gilead" (v. 22), by which he possibly refers to the mastic resin of the Pistacia mutica. Physicians applied the resin to seal wounds and it did so as it hardened. Essentially, v. 22 asserts that no medicine can answer the desperate need of restoring the nation's relationship to God.

Jeremiah's reputation as a weeping prophet probably stems from 9:1–2. He bewails having run dry of tears, he has wept so much; he wishes he had a desert retreat to which he might flee to get away from traitorous adulterers who are his people. In v. 3, the Lord accuses the people of speaking crookedly, hence the simile of the bent bow. Truth is a casualty in Israel's social structure, a condition deriving from Israel's failure to acknowledge God. In vv. 4–9, the Lord offers an extensive warning to Jeremiah not to trust his neighbors. Fraud is rampant and lying is a skill the Lord accuses the people of cultivating (v. 5). "Friendly words" mask deceitful intent (v. 8). As if alluding to Jeremiah's expression of grief in 8:21–9:2, the Lord tells the prophet to lament that even the dwelling place of wild animals has become devoid of life (v. 10). With a sterile countryside surrounding it, Jerusalem will become a pile of rubble fit only for jackals (v. 11).

Jeremiah speaks in v. 12 and bemoans in rhetorical questions the condition of his people. In v. 14, the plural "the Baals" designates the various cult statues of Baal found at his numerous shrines. The bitter wormwood (Artemisia absinthium) and poisoned water (8:14) will be Israel's only food, a metaphor for the bitterness of their situation.

Verses 17–22 urge what amounts to planning a funeral. Professional mourning women will have much to wail about as death has invaded the homes and streets of Jerusalem (v. 21). Not only will death prevail in the city but in the countryside as well (v. 22).

In vv. 23–36, the Lord subverts the standard signs of status and replaces them with knowledge of who God is (v. 23). To know the Lord implies an active concern for the things that concern God, namely, "steadfast love, justice, and righteousness in the earth, for in these things I base my policy" (v. 24; NRSV, "for in these things I delight"). Verses 25–26 promise destruction to "all those who are circumcised only in the foreskin" and not in the heart. To be circumcised in the heart is to be receptive to God's word.

Jeremiah 10:1–18 develops the theme of Israel's lack of knowledge. In vv. 2–5, the Lord encourages the people not to fear the divinatory practices of the nations; whereas in vv. 6–10, a member of the divine assembly speaks up to praise the Lord's incomparable wisdom and power and to denounce the cult statues. Verse 8 indicates that divination was indeed an important component of the cult statue's use.

B. Jeremiah's Response (10:19–22:30)

Jeremiah's response to the situation he faces is that of a finite human being struggling heroically to comprehend. Compelled to obey the Lord and deeply empathetic with his people, Jeremiah experiences emotions that to describe as ambivalent would be an anemic understatement. He is psychologically wounded from both his loyalty to God and his passionate feelings for Israel.

10:19–11:17. Covenant and Apostasy. Some scholars read Jer 10:19–22 as an expression of personified Jerusalem; this is plausible. Yet, just as plausible is to read it as displaying the prophet's empathy. He characterizes what will happen to his people as if it were happening to him. Unlike the shepherds who led Israel astray and did not inquire of the Lord (v. 21), Jeremiah is one with his people.

Jeremiah, ostensibly standing in the divine assembly and speaking in solidarity with his people, refers to his personal pain and its justice. He concedes, "I must bear it." The image of the tent and lost children derives historically from Israel's nomadic heritage and does not suggest that Jeremiah is actually living in tents. Using the metaphor of tent and lost children, Jeremiah establishes a sense of solidarity with this peoples' history. Their story is his story.

As noted earlier, "shepherds" alludes to kings, who typically portrayed themselves as their peoples' shepherd. In v. 21, the prophet muses on the shepherds' incompetence (NRSV, "are stupid"). Their ignorance is so profound that they do not know where to go for guidance; Jeremiah opines, they "do not inquire of the LORD."

Verse 22 continues to convey Jeremiah's voice as he pauses to note aloud the sound of a thundering rumble. It is the disaster from the north (Jer 1:14–16; 4:6; 6:1, 22). With the terms "desolation" and "jackals," the verse evokes the Lord's declaration of intent from Jer 9:11.

Verse 23 expresses a sentiment that seems to deny the authenticity of the prophet's appeals for Israel to turn back to the Lord. What seems to be a denial of human freedom is, in fact, an expression of the prophet's keen awareness that as an individual member of the nation, he cannot control or determine what will happen to him in the heart-wrenching days to come. He did not choose to be a prophet; he did not choose to be born; he did not choose to be in the situation where he finds himself. The acknowledgment of his finitude precedes a request that his chastisement be just (v. 24). He cannot escape the disaster that will come to the nation. He is in solidarity with his people in their sin and in their punishment (vv. 19, 20). As a result, he appeals to God's justice.

Verse 25 anticipates the oracles against the nations that are penultimate to the book's last chapter. It is also related to the first words that God directed to Israel in Jer 2:2, 3. Verse 25 portrays the prophet, perhaps tentatively, alluding to the Lord's memories and daring to introduce a nuance of hope into the situation. After all, why should he ask the Lord to punish the nations specifically for devouring Israel if Israel remains forever outside God's covenant loyalty?

Perhaps this is why the editorial plan of the book immediately takes its readers into a text, namely Jeremiah 11, in which God directs Jeremiah to address the inhabitants of Jerusalem about the responsibilities of the covenant relationship. Verses 1–8 sustain a strong Deuteronomic ambience as it closely associates God's blessings and curses with Israel's obedience or disobedience. The Lord commands Jeremiah to remind the people of Judah and Jerusalem of the exodus from Egypt (vv. 1–5), of solemn warnings against disobedience (vv. 6–7), and of Israel's history of disobedience (v. 8). Verses 9–13 bring the brief Deuteronomic recital of history to Jeremiah's contemporary situation. The basic disobedient act is the worship of foreign gods (v. 12–13). Verse 9 has configured this multiplication of deities as a deliberate act, that is, a conspiracy. As noted in the excursus on cult statues, one of the basic functions of the statue was to serve as a vehicle for divination. Essentially, the biblical prophetic literature accuses ancient Israel of taking its cues for social and religious order from a multiplicity of authorities, authorities that the prophets insist do not exist (Jer 2:11).

The Lord commands Jeremiah (v. 14) not to take the people's part in his role as prophet. As Gen 20:7 indicates, prophets were to intercede for other humans, but here God demands that Jeremiah not do so for Judah and Jerusalem. Possibly alluding to the covenant implications of Jeremiah's request regarding the nations in 10:25, the Lord counters with the question, "What right has my beloved in my house, when she has done vile deeds?" (11:15). The destruction of the olive tree—a metaphor of Israel—in vv. 16–17 evokes the practice of a besieging army setting fire to the agricultural areas that surround cities. Thus, when the army leaves, the devastation will inhibit the growth of resistance. After all, a hungry people may rebel, but unless they find a way regularly to satisfy their need for food, they cannot succeed.

11:18–22:30. Jeremiah's Debate with God. Jeremiah 11:18–12:4 presents what scholars often refer to as Jeremiah's first lament. The others occur in 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; and 20:7–18. This commentary depicts them as a part of a debate between God and Jeremiah in the divine assembly. In its current literary context, v. 18 refers to what the Lord says in v. 9 about a conspiracy, but it also fits well with earlier accusations that the Lord has made against Israel. Verse 19 conveys Jeremiah's awareness of a conspiracy against himself, describing himself as an innocent lamb about to be sacrificed. One cannot help but recall Jeremiah's first protest, "I am only a boy" (Jer 1:7) and read v. 20 as the prophet reminding the Lord of the divine promise of protection (Jer 1:18–19). Verse 21 surprises the reader with the Lord referring to Anathoth, Jeremiah's own hometown, as a site of conspiracy against Jeremiah's life. Why residents of Anathoth might want to silence Jeremiah could stem from their having suffered acts of retribution from Jerusalem because of the words of one of the town's sons. In any case, not even the prophet's hometown is safe for him, as the Lord concedes in vv. 5–6.

The forensic terminology of Jeremiah's statement in 12:1a—"lay charges . . . put my case"—again suggests the context of the divine assembly. In 12:1b–4, the prophet seeks to understand his situation. In v. 3, given that the Lord knows of Jeremiah's loyalty, the prophet ponders the apparent contradiction between the material realities that confront him and the Lord's commitment to his well-being. The Lord replies in vv. 5–6 in a way that does not appear to answer Jeremiah's questions. The basic gist of these two verses only confirms Jeremiah's sense of danger. If he is not safe in Anathoth, there is no place he can go to find refuge. God warns Jeremiah against trusting even his relatives. Who then can the prophet trust? The question attracts a more developed answer as the book unfolds (Jer 17:5–7).

Verses 7–17 convey the Lord's sentence of judgment on the wayward people. That the Lord asserts in v. 8 "therefore I hate her" (NRSV), namely Judah and Jerusalem—indeed greater Israel—is to assert that the people are no longer God's covenant people. The Hebrew imperatives that conclude v. 9 are plural. Verse 9 thus portrays the Lord commanding members of the divine assembly to disperse into the world to gather scavenging animals for a feast. Readers might initially think of "many shepherds" (v. 10), referring to past foreign kings who have beset Israel (Jer 6:3), but Jeremiah has elsewhere portrayed Israel's own shepherd-kings as exploiting the nation for their own gain (10:21). Ironically, there is ultimately no difference between how Israel's own kings have treated their people and how the foreign kings have at times ravaged them.

The symbolic act of burying a loincloth (13:1–11) works on the basis of its condition when Jeremiah digs it up again. It is ruined and so represents Israel's condition. Where Jeremiah buried the loincloth is not clear; the Hebrew word perath (vv. 6–7) may refer to a town near Anathoth. Nevertheless, the point seems clear: Israel is unfit to cling to the Lord. In vv. 12–14, Jeremiah's full wine jars lend themselves to the divine message that God will fill Jerusalem's leaders with wine, a metaphor that implies that they are incompetent. The decisions such leaders make will mean the death of many people (v. 14).

Verses 15–19 urge the social elite to humble themselves before the darkness of the times catches them, engulfing them in a darkness that will compel them into ruin. If they ignore Jeremiah, the prophet will weep bitterly in secret because of Jerusalem's pride. The essence of v. 18 is an appeal to the king and the queen mother to abdicate their positions; after all, soon there will be no kingdom to rule (v. 19).

Verses 20–21 urge the royal figures to look northward over a depopulated realm and ask about the whereabouts of their flock. They are to contemplate being under the rule of former allies who have turned to treachery (v. 21). The social upheaval will be like the pains of childbirth. Verses 22–27 portray Jerusalem with the image of a raped woman. Having abandoned the Lord's protection, Jerusalem is vulnerable to being violated.

A serious drought (Jer 14:1–6) compels Jeremiah to speak in the divine council on behalf of his people. Verses 7–9 appeal to the reputation of the Lord's name. The prophet asks why the Lord would act as if there were no history between God and the nation (v. 8) when, in fact, the prophet states, "we are called by your name." Verse 10 conveys God's response: the nation has grown fond of wandering. In v. 11 the Lord commands Jeremiah a third time not to intercede on Israel's behalf (Jer 7:16; 11:14); the divine judge will not change the decree. Jeremiah persists and blames the people's condition on lying prophets (v. 13). The Lord replies that the lying prophets will meet their end with the ones who took them as valid messengers from the Lord (vv. 14–16).

In vv. 17–18, the Lord instructs Jeremiah to make his expressions of grief public. Everywhere he goes there is death in the wake of the deceitful priests and prophets who, having no knowledge, convincingly pose as knowledge-mongers. Still Jeremiah persists in interceding for the people (vv. 19–22), but the Lord declares that not even Moses and Samuel could change the divine sentence of judgment (15:1). Warfare and scavenging animals are God's weapons (vv. 2–3). Verse 4, like 2 Kgs 21:10–15 and 23:26–27, traces the disaster back to the policies of Manasseh.

The Lord ignores Jeremiah's expressions of pity with the rhetorical question asserting the absence of pity for Jerusalem (v. 5) and with the comment that widowhood will permeate the nation.

Jeremiah's expression of woe focuses on his status as a troublemaker among the Israelites (vv. 10–12). In vv. 11–14, the Lord assures Jeremiah that he will be safe and describes the plundered city (vv. 13–14).

Jeremiah 15:15–21 conveys Jeremiah's second lament. He expresses joy at finding the words of the Lord (v. 16) and testifies that he did not participate in the frivolous merriment of his fellow Israelites. Nevertheless, he feels that God has betrayed him (v. 18). In vv. 19–21, the Lord tells Jeremiah to reorient his concerns so that he may remain in the divine assembly. God reassures the prophet of his security (vv. 20–21). The Lord then (16:1–18) commands Jeremiah to set aside his pathos for his people and to convey God's word with greater determination than before. Indeed, Jeremiah is to remain a bachelor to dramatize the nearness of conditions that will make starting a family a foolish endeavor (vv. 1–4). Jeremiah must not mourn regardless of the carnage around him (vv. 5–9). When asked why such a disaster has fallen, the prophet must confront the people with their history of rebellion, which included polluting the land with the cult statues (vv. 10–18). Jeremiah then denies that humans can make gods (vv. 19–20).

In Jer 17:1–4, the Lord characterizes Judah's apostasy as indelibly recorded in the celestial records of the divine assembly and follows with a description of that apostasy.

Verses 5–8 convey the Lord's curse on those whose hearts turn away and a blessing on those who are obedient. Because the people are deceitful, the Lord warns them that no one can fool God with false claims of repentance (vv. 9–10). Jeremiah then prays for restoration (vv. 12–18).

In vv. 19–27, the Lord instructs Jeremiah to give instructions to Judah regarding Sabbath observance. Refraining from carrying a burden on the Sabbath and honoring the Sabbath as holy will yield great prosperity (vv. 24–26), but failure in this regard will make Jerusalem into God's kindling (v. 27).

Jeremiah 18:1–11 presents the lesson of the potter. Just as a potter reworks a vessel to produce a useful one, so God will rework Israel to make the nation fit for its divine destiny. Verse 12 communicates the response, essentially declaring to God their independence. The cold streams from Lebanon's peaks do not run dry, but Israel has cut itself off from the source of life (vv. 13–17). A desiccating wind from the east will easily disperse the nation.

Verse 18 informs readers of plots to silence Jeremiah; plots to which he reacts by appealing to God for justice (vv. 19–23). In Jeremiah 19, God dramatically demonstrates the divine power to annul any plots. He commands Jeremiah to shatter an earthen pot in the presence of the people, drawing attention to the act as a symbol of the nation's immediate future. Part of that future means that so many people will die that disposal of the bodies will become a matter of simply dumping them at the Baal shrine in Jerusalem to be scavenged (vv. 7–8). Famine due to the siege will force Jerusalem's inhabitants to resort to cannibalism for survival. The image evokes the horrors that Deut 28:53–57 forecasts.

For such frightening words, Pashhur, a priest and the chief of the Temple's security forces, arrests Jeremiah and has him beaten and put in the stocks (20:1–6). Jeremiah unleashes a curse from the Lord on Pashhur to the effect that Pashhur and his family will die in Babylon. The Lord seals the curse by changing Pashhur's name to the similar-sounding "the encompassing terror."

Jeremiah 20:7–18 contains two laments from Jeremiah that express his inner conflicts while simultaneously displaying hope. He regrets that his message offers nothing but doom (v. 8), but when he tries not to speak the Lord's word, it bursts out like fire (v. 9). Although he complains of his enemies' treatment of him, he clings to God's promise of protection (vv. 11–13). Nevertheless, his burden is nearly unbearable, leading him to wish he had never been born (vv. 14–18).

Jeremiah 21–22 contains a series of oracles against Judah's royal family. The word "Chaldeans" occurs for the first time in the book in 21:4. Originally it referred to the ethnic or tribal background of the dynasty of Nebuchadnezzar, but over time it came to refer to the Babylonians as a whole. In ch. 21, Zedekiah asks Jeremiah to intercede with God to turn Nebuchadnezzar back (vv. 1–2); but Jeremiah announces the Babylonian king's victory (vv. 3–10). Jeremiah (ch. 22) urges the Judahite king to live up to the highest standards of royal justice to avert disaster; otherwise the Lord will send destroyers like loggers in Lebanon cutting down cedars and burning them (v. 7). The woe saying of vv. 13–17 implicates the king in the exploitation of labor to build large houses and in the denial of justice to the poor and needy. The details of Jehoiakim's death are not known, but the prophet promises an ignominious disposal of his body (vv. 18–19). Jehoiakim's successor, Coniah (Jehoiachin) will go into exile, never to return to Judah (22:24–30).

C. Prophetic Conflict (23:1–28:17)

23:1–7. A Glimpse of Hope. Jeremiah 23–28 does not consistently develop any one specific theme, but it comes close as it unfolds the drama of prophetic conflict that took place between 597 and 587 BCE. After the first deportation in 597, the understandable hope that God would reverse the Babylonian victory and return the deported Judahites and the royal family to Jerusalem found itself fueled by what appears to have been a sizable portion of the Judahite prophetic voices of the time. Along with a few companions, Jeremiah stood against this hopeful outlook with a message that the social elite easily cast as treasonous.

Jeremiah 23:1–8 offers a word of hope. The word of hope, however, says that Judah's plotting powerbrokers will endure a crushing defeat of their plans. The prophet utters an oracle of woe against the shepherds who destroy and scatter the sheep of God's pasture. Ostensibly addressing a situation of assigning blame for the Babylonian imposition of control, the oracle (v. 2) sets responsibility firmly at the feet of the highest levels of bureaucratic control, the kings. Shepherd was a term that ancient Near Eastern monarchs often used to present themselves as the beneficent protectors of the nation. Instead of guiding the nation to safety under divine guardianship, the shepherds have "driven them away" and not attended to their needs. For a shepherd to disperse the flock into a chaotic charge is an image that any culture would find ridiculous. Yet Judah's kings have done just that. God promises (v. 3) to gather the dispersed flock and set over them shepherds who will establish the kind of social conditions necessary for security and fruitful living.

Verse 5 conveys the Lord's declaration of the inevitable rise of a "righteous Branch" who will belong to the Davidic dynasty. Unlike the kings of whom Zedekiah will be the last (Jer 52:1–11), the new king will fulfill the job description the word shepherd implies. The designation Branch plausibly alludes to Isa 11:1 and is part of the tradition that eventually finds expression in Zech 3:8 and 6:12 as well. It builds on the image of a felled tree's stump growing a new shoot. The Branch will be "righteous," meaning that the shepherd will act in a trustworthy way and thereby evoke the confidence of the nation. Verse 4 sustains this description with the Lord's promise that the people "shall not fear any longer, or be dismayed, nor shall of any be missing." Verses 7–8 promise renewal comparable to the Lord's actions in the past. In the days to come, Israel's confession of faith will no longer commemorate the exodus from Egypt, but a new exodus involving the return of the "house of Israel out of the land of the north and out of all the lands" where the Lord had driven them. This new confession is related to Jer 3:15–18, which declares that the ark of the covenant will find no place in the future worship of God.

23:9–28:17. Jeremiah and Hananiah. A brief superscription, "concerning the prophets," opens the series of oracles and narratives that comprise 23:9–28:17. The word prophet (navi') does not involve the truth or falsehood of the one who speaks a message, but the claim of a divine origin for the message. In this instance, Jeremiah insists that the prophets are lying or deluded. The text reflects Deuteronomy's norms about prophetic behavior. Deuteronomy 18:15–22 contains Moses' instructions to Israel concerning prophetic leadership. If a prophet's word fails to come to pass, then the Israelites can know that the prophet has spoken a word the Lord did not send. Jeremiah 23:9–28:17 raises the question of whom the Lord has truly sent and concludes with a narrative that answers the question.

Jeremiah 23:9 introduces a compilation of texts that depict prophetic opposition to Jeremiah's message. As is the case in other parts of the book, these texts do not make clear where the prophet leaves off speaking and the Lord begins.

Judah's condition is lamentable in the deepest sense of the term. Jeremiah is nearly a broken man as he confesses that his "heart is crushed within me" (v. 9). The word crushed translates the same word as the Lord employs in 2:13 to describe Judah's cisterns as cracked. Conceivably, Jeremiah believes himself near death as not only is his heart failing, but his bones quiver. Like a drunken person, he experiences the world around him as whirling out of control. The reason is that "the land is full of adulterers" (v. 10). First occurring in Jeremiah at 9:2, the word adulterers summarizes the nature of what it means to abandon the Lord to worship foreign gods. The word for "curse" reflects the discourse of Deuteronomy. The Hebrew word 'alah may mean "oath" as well as "curse," as in Deut 29:12, 14, 19. The book of Deuteronomy consistently warns Israel that to worship foreign gods will mean, among other disasters, that the land will become unproductive.

In v. 10, "course" renders a Hebrew word that refers to the way someone or something runs. The word for "evil" not only designates moral evil but can involve the disastrous consequences that result.

"Their might is not right" speaks to the issue of how the prophets acquired their influence and power. They have stolen the people's trust and misplaced it with a "course" that will lead to disaster. With the phrase "in my house I have found their wickedness," v. 11 informs the reader that somewhere in the text the Lord has begun to speak. Conceivably, vv. 9–10 convey Jeremiah's lament, with the Lord speaking up in v. 11 to declare that both "prophet and priest are ungodly." Jeremiah and the Lord appear to be speaking to each other in the divine council.

Verse 12 unfolds in more extensive terms the ruinous consequences of the course that brings v. 10 to a conclusion. Paths and trails in the Judahite hill country are treacherous under good conditions. One wrong footfall and a traveler can plunge into a ravine and experience a shattering death. At night, with only a torch to light the way, the trails are particularly dangerous. In a downpour, they may become slippery or "smooth" and not allow a traveler to make a secure foothold. Verse 12 indicates that it will be along such ways the Lord will drive the prophets so that they will slip and plunge into the ravines and canyons below. The course they ran while in power led to disaster, and the way they will someday be compelled to run—"in the year of their punishment"—will lead to shattering.

What the Lord saw in Samaria's prophets was revolting. Samaria was the capital of the northern kingdom. There, the Lord declares (v. 13), the prophets "prophesied by Baal and led my people Israel astray." As if that was not bad enough, the Lord reports (v. 14) having seen "in the prophets of Jerusalem . . . a more shocking thing." From the Deuteronomic perspective, Jerusalem was the place where the Lord had put the divine name to dwell (Deut 12:5). The presence of the divine name in the Temple in Jerusalem made what the prophets did there even more appalling than what the prophets of Samaria had done. Verse 14 suggests that the prophets of Jerusalem have assisted in the consolidation of power in "the hands of evildoers." Instead of serving the needs of God's people, they have worked to enhance their own social and political positions by pandering to the unconscionable ways of Judah's social elite.

That the social elite and the prophets have become like Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19) bears ominous implications. Wormwood (Artemisia absinthia) is a noxious herb that can discourage other plants from growing near it and can repel some insects. For "poisoned water," see comment on Jer 8:14.

In vv. 16–17, Jeremiah conveys God's appeal to whoever will listen—that they not act on the basis of "the prophets who prophesy to you; they are deluding you." These prophets are declaring a message of well-being, asserting that "No calamity shall come upon you." The source of their message is their own imagination; it does not derive "from the mouth of the LORD." Interestingly, the Lord does not at this point accuse the prophets of deliberately lying.

Verse 18 explicitly mentions "the council of the LORD." Any prophet who, like Jeremiah, had stood there and listened, would know that a hopeful message about Jerusalem would not be forthcoming. More generally, v. 18 poses two questions. The answers are clear. No one but Jeremiah has stood in the divine council. His words are trustworthy, even if they are not being obeyed.

Verse 19 challenges readers to imagine the kind of scene the prophet points to when he cries out, "Look, the storm of the LORD! Wrath has gone forth, a whirling tempest; it will burst upon the head of the wicked." Texts such as Isa 30:30; Pss 50:3; 83:15 describe the Lord as surrounded by whirling winds, lightning, and dense clouds when the divine sovereign descends to earth. Elsewhere in the Old Testament, destructive weather occurs as a symbol of being under siege by an enemy army (Amos 1:14; Nah 1:3). The prophet may be pointing to an impending thunderstorm as an advance signal of the disaster the Lord is about to bring on Judah. Verse 20 promises that the rage of the Lord's anger will not dissipate—like a strong approaching storm—until "he has executed and accomplished the intents of his mind." Since humans cannot understand the "intents" of the deity, the prophet adds, "In the latter days [literally, after the days] you will understand it clearly." The book of Jeremiah hints that careful consideration of its contents will help people understand the disaster that befell Judah.

The description of the storm (vv. 19–20) seems to interrupt the divine council passage which, after v. 18, resumes in v. 21. Because the storm passage ends with a promise of eventual understanding, it underscores the significance of the divine assembly. The Lord, as the divine judge over the council, has decreed destruction for them. As herald of the divine council, Jeremiah announces that disaster is coming. Moreover, in the years that will follow, people will come to understand such celestial jurisprudence.

In vv. 21 and 22, as if pounding the arm of the divine throne, God describes the prophets as eagerly setting about the prophetic task; although they do so without having received a divine commission. That divine commission would have derived from their presence in the Lord's council, where they would have heard the Lord's words, would have told the people, and would have diverted them from the catastrophic path they chose. The book of Jeremiah unveils something of the divine pathos; the Lord sadly and angrily muses on what could have been.

Verses 23–40 underscore the serious harm that the lying prophets do. They are announcing an imminent end of the first deportation and the return of the exiles. Jeremiah 24 answers with the vision of the good and bad figs. The former represents Jehoiachin and the first of the deported Judahites, concerning whom the Lord says, "I will set my eyes upon them for good" (v. 6). The latter represent the partisans of Zedekiah and his handlers of whom the Lord says, "I will make them a horror" (v. 9).

Jeremiah 25 rehearses the Lord's many attempts to convince the people of Judah to turn back to God (vv. 1–7). No such turning having occurred, the Lord declares that "King Nebuchadrezzar . . . my servant" (v. 9) will bring disaster to the nation. In a visionary trance, the prophet receives a cup from the Lord's hand and gives it to the nations to whom the Lord sends the prophet (vv. 17–26). The nations will fall like drunken revelers. The Israelites must also drink of God's wrath (vv. 27–29). What follows (vv. 30–38) is an international drunken orgy of violence and destruction.

Jeremiah 26–27 set out a narrative revolving around the Temple sermon (Jer 7). The social elite among the people demand the death penalty for Jeremiah because of what he has said against the Temple (26:7–11). Some of the officials present, however, are sympathetic and remind the crowd about Micah of Moresheth and about the effective nature of his word, quoting Mic 3:12. This appeal to an earlier prophet saves Jeremiah's life. Jeremiah was remanded to Ahikam son of Shaphan who apparently was his friend. The reference to the death of an earlier prophet, Uriah son of Shemaiah, suggests just how close Jeremiah came to meeting a similar fate (vv. 20–23).

In Jer 27:1, the Hebrew manuscripts do not uniformly present Zedekiah as king. The Masoretic Text is the basis for most contemporary translations and reads Jehoiakim. The more likely reading is Zedekiah. The rest of the narrative names him as king. Envoys from the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon have arrived in Jerusalem ostensibly to plot a strategy against Babylon. Jeremiah is to wear a yoke of straps and bars as a symbol of the Lord's command for the nations to yield to Babylon and submit to Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah assures the envoys that their prophets are misleading them (v. 9). Verses 12–22 portray Jeremiah as turning the same word to the people of Jerusalem and Judah. He urges them not to heed the words of the prophets who speak in the Lord's name that the exiles of the first deportation and the vessels of the Lord's house will soon be returned. They are deceiving the people and themselves.

Jeremiah 28 narrates a showdown between Jeremiah and the prophet Hananiah. Hananiah breaks Jeremiah's yoke to demonstrate that God will break the power of Babylon. Jeremiah simply replaces them with a nearly unbearable yoke of iron. He confronts Hananiah about his false claims and announces that Hananiah will be removed from the earth within a year (v. 16). In what is possibly a deliberate understatement, the narrator tells readers that in the same year Hananiah died. The lack of details as to the cause of his death and any lack of reference to its effects testifies to the final vacuity of his words.

III. Promise of Restoration (30:1–33:26)

Jeremiah 30–36 comprise a collection of oracles and narratives that focus on Israel's destiny of redemption beyond the disaster of the nation's destruction. Readers at the beginning of the twenty-first century might consider it strange that such a text occurs where it does and not at the end of the book. Yet the book of Jeremiah's sequential arrangement is theologically significant. In part, the book is designed to involve readers' imaginations. The book of Jeremiah remains a sealed text to the impatient and incurious. For those who take the time and effort to plumb it, it can lead not only to a greater comprehension of the book's message to the ancient exiled Judahites, but also to a deepening awareness of how it speaks to the contemporary situation.

A. The New David (30:1–24)

The Lord commands Jeremiah to write in a scroll (30:2; NRSV, "in a book") all the words that the Lord has spoken. Presumably, these words comprise the Lord's accusations against Israel as well as the dreadful divine sentence of destruction. The word for at the beginning of v. 3 signifies that the Lord is about to give the reason for having Jeremiah write this text. If ancient or contemporary readers expected a continuation of indictment and judgment, there is a surprise waiting. Verse 3 portrays God as promising to reverse the deportation and bring both Israel and Judah back to the land sworn to the ancestors. In generations to come, therefore, there will be a written testimony of disobedience and destruction, but the future generations will also possess a written testimony of divine mercy.

In poetic form, vv. 4–7 encapsulate Israel's experience of destruction. Men are doubling over in pain like women about to give birth (v. 6). Verse 7 reinforces the incomparable nature of the horrors of "that day." Indeed "there is none like it." Verses 8–9 express the promise that the Lord will break the powers of oppression, that the people will serve God, and that God will raise a new David. Against the background of the incomparable nature of the disaster of "that day," this is all the more striking. Not even the oppression of Israel in Egypt is an appropriate analogue. There can be no hope for Israel to extricate itself from the suffering; yet what is not possible for Israel to achieve is possible for God.

Jeremiah 30:10–31:22 contains a series of poetic oracles that proclaim and reinforce the message of the good that God has planned for Israel's destiny beyond destruction. The admonition not to be afraid and God's reference to Jacob as "my servant" (Jer 30:10) may bring to many readers' minds texts such as Isa 41:8–10 and Isa 44:1–2. Jeremiah 30:11 makes clear that the grace v. 10 displays is not cheap. The Lord promises to chastise Israel "in just measure," that is, the divine punishment will not exceed what God intends to accomplish.

Verses 12–15 describe a shattering (Jer 30:12; NRSV, "hurt") that is beyond repair. From the human point of view, there is absolutely no hope. The words "enemy" and "merciless foe" underscore the implacable hatred and a corresponding level of violence that aims not simply to kill, but to render the victim into tangled flesh and pulverized bones. The depth and magnitude of Israel's rebellion against the Lord call for the divine chastisement to be profound.

A surprising shift occurs with v. 16. The Hebrew word that begins v. 16, lakhen (NRSV, "therefore"), may at times mean "in such manner" or "in similar manner." The Lord thus asserts that Israel's enemies will receive punishment that corresponds to the disaster they brought on Israel. Whereas vv. 12–15 underscore Israel's condition as beyond all hope, the case is not hopeless for God. Verse 17 addresses the issue of God's power to restore by evoking an image of divine jealousy on behalf of Israel. Israel's enemies devastated the nation on the assumption that none of the national powers would care: "It is Zion; no one cares for her!" God shows they are seriously mistaken.

The general image of Israel's destiny that vv. 18–22 conveys is one of joyful and productive autonomy from foreign power. "Their prince shall be one of their own" (v. 21). The divine assurance (v. 22) that Israel will be God's people and that the Lord will be Israel's God implies the establishment of a new covenant by which to consolidate and define the relationship. In the circumstances of the moment, the surviving Israelites might wonder how the imperial powers can possibly fall. The promise of divine restoration seems an unrealistic dream. Verses 23–24 speak to this issue. A prophetic voice declares that God's storm, fueled by the Lord's fierce rage, will accomplish God's purpose. The oracle concludes with the assurance of understanding in the days to come. Indeed, a key component of the canonical prophetic witness is that it is only from the perspective of the end, or the goal, that full comprehension of the mysteries of the apparent chaos of history can emerge.

B. Return of the Exiles (31:1–30)

Jeremiah 31 begins to lead the book's readers from a hint about a new covenant (Jer 30:22) to an explicit reference about such a covenant (31:31–34). Verse 1 reprises 30:22. Following this affirmation, the Lord explains why the redemption of the nation is not only possible but inevitable. Verses 2–3 remind readers of God's commitment to the ancestors and configure God's commitment as "an everlasting love." The Hebrew for "everlasting," 'olam, is significant. It not only refers to something as everlasting, but as of great antiquity. Jeremiah 31 moves beyond Israel having been destroyed and into a depiction of Israel "restored," as it were.

As Jer 3:1 indicates, a man who has divorced a wife may not take her back if she has married another man. Accusations of adultery abounded earlier in the book of Jeremiah (3:9; 5:7; 7:9; 23:14; 29:23). In v. 4, the Lord addresses the new nation as "virgin Israel!" Israel's virginity is a clear sign of a new reality, not merely a restored relationship. That the land of Israel will yield luxuriant productivity implies that God's love for Israel is not unrequited. Verse 6 makes this point explicit with the description of the people gathering to "go up to Zion, to the LORD our God." That this summons relates to the hill country of Ephraim speaks of the new unity between Israel and Judah.

Jeremiah 31:7–14 portrays a future of relentless joy. God promises to lead the remnant of Israel back to their ancestral home. The language evokes the exodus from Egypt, but the gathering of the people will encompass not simply one geographical area but the widest expanses of the earth (v. 8). Jeremiah 3:9 portrays God as bitterly disappointed that Israel did not cry out, "my father;" but 31:9 speaks of a day to come when God will say, "I have become a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn." Verses 10–14 focus on the blessing of agricultural bounty and suggest a sharp contrast between what shall be and the devastation that once was (Jer 5:15–17).

Jeremiah 31:15 seems out of place, but the juxtaposition of this brief note of grief is brilliantly executed. Rachel, whose story unfolds in Genesis 29, here personifies the voice of sorrow. The reference to such profound grief jars readers back to the tragedy of the moment. Jeremiah's editors will not permit the divine promise of restoration to reside in an idealistic framework, unrelated to tragic historical realities. Furthermore, the one who hears the voice is God. The prophetic messenger formula, "thus says the LORD," introduces the quotation. The book of Jeremiah thus conveys God's pathos for the suffering people.

In v. 18 God acknowledges having heard Ephraim's confession of gamboling off "like a calf untrained." The phrase "I struck my thigh" (v. 19) signifies an outward sign of the distress that leads to repentance. Presumably speaking to the divine council, God reveals deep emotion when saying, "I groan inwardly for him," (31:20; NRSV, "I am deeply moved for him"). In vv. 21–22, the metaphor for Israel shifts to the language of betrothal. God is not commanding here, but pleading with a relentless pathos that will not rest. The Lord directs Israel to consider the paths that led it astray and to retrace its steps. Israel wavers, unsure, frightened, and bewildered. Verse 22b conveys God's encouragement to virgin Israel's hesitation in terms that render void the standard patriarchal expectations of gender relations. The word created recalls Gen 1:1, thus reminding readers that the creator has the power and right to do something unheard of. The new thing that God has created is a situation in which "a female encircles a hero" (NRSV, "a woman encompasses a man"). This phrase bears multiple meanings. It can describe a woman making her way through dangerous territory without needing a male companion to ward off attackers. And it can just as well work on the metaphorical level: God as groom and Israel as the bride. In such a case, it describes the groom as a hero who stands before the woman's deciding gaze. God's deepest yearning for Israel to return will compel the Lord to act in surprising, creative new ways.

C. The New Covenant (31:31–40)

The prophetic literature in the Old Testament never allows Israel's rebellion against God and the nation's destruction at the hands of the Babylonians to be the final word. Uniformly, the prophetic books convey a portrait of God acting to redeem. The concept of covenant is often a component of such portraits. Isaiah 54:10; Ezek 34:25; and Hos 2:18 describe the Lord establishing a covenant of peace between all living things. Isaiah 55:3 promises that the Lord will make an everlasting covenant with Israel that will take the model of the Davidic covenant. In Isa 61:8, God promises to make an everlasting covenant that will lead to the blessing of the nations. In Jer 31:31–34, the prophet uses a distinctive phrase—a new covenant. The phrase "new covenant" occurs in the Old Testament only here. The prophet describes it as a thorough replacement of the covenant that God made with Israel when God "took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" (v 32).

The Lord reminds Israel of its having broken that earlier covenant. The Deuteronomic writers described that covenant as documented in writing and as requiring reading, study, meditation, and teaching (Deut 5:1; 17:19; 31:10–13). Under the stipulations of the new covenant, God will make all Israelites "know" the teaching (v 33; NRSV, "law"). The problem of ignorance about which Jeremiah complained (Jer 5:4) will cease to exist.

D. Signs of Assurance (32:1–33:26)

An exilic reader could have responded to Jer 30–31 with derisive laughter or, perhaps, with a cautious, fragile sense of hope.

These two chapters exhibit a future that is exceedingly difficult to imagine. The autobiographical narrative of Jer 32 speaks, in part, to the issue. God gives a sign to Jeremiah that confirms future restoration. Verse 1 sets the events Jeremiah is about to describe in Jerusalem's darkest days. In the tenth year of Zedekiah, the end is imminent. Engaging in business as usual seems a completely irrational act. The Babylonian army has besieged Jerusalem; Zedekiah has confined Jeremiah in "the court of the guard" (v. 2). Furthermore, Zedekiah had asked Jeremiah why the prophet claims that God gave him a message of disaster. The king even repeats the grim details about his own capture and deportation to Babylon (vv. 3–5).

Perhaps intentionally, Jeremiah's answer is cryptic and seems to avoid Zedekiah's concerns. Instead of preaching the same message that the earlier parts of the book contain, Jeremiah tells the doomed king about a real estate transaction. The Lord instructs Jeremiah to purchase the field of his cousin, Hanamel. Hanamel agrees and the appropriate papers are drawn up, signed, and witnessed. The Lord tells Jeremiah to store the documents of the transaction in an earthen jar, to preserve them for an extended amount of time. In v. 15, Jeremiah tells the king the point of the story. The land will someday be cultivated and normal real estate transactions will once again take place.

Presumably still in the presence of the king, Jeremiah then prayed "to the LORD" (v. 16). His petition began with praise, acknowledging the limitless capacity of God's power as creator. Zedekiah might not have understood what Jeremiah was doing, but the prophet is actually answering the question the king had posed in vv. 3–5. After testifying to Israel's deliverance from Egypt, Jeremiah praises the Lord for bringing Israel into a fertile land. At v. 23, the prophet more sharply focuses on Zedekiah's question. Israel disobeyed the teachings of the Lord and made no effort to do what God directed. Then the prophet describes the siege machines battering the walls and says to God, "What you spoke has happened." But to whom does the prophet address the words, "as you yourself can see" (v. 24)? One is tempted to imagine Jeremiah looking into the king's eyes and obliquely speaking to him. Jeremiah concludes his request for understanding by summarizing to God what God had told him to do.

At v. 26, the interview between Zedekiah and Jeremiah has presumably concluded. In Jer 32:17 Jeremiah admitted to God, "Nothing is too hard for you." Verse 27 recalls that confession with God asserting, "I am Yahweh" (NRSV, "the LORD"). Biblical scholars generally agree that the divine name signifies God's role as creator. Thus, it is as the creator that the Lord asks Jeremiah "is anything too hard for me?" Verses 28–35 offer the reason for Jerusalem's disaster.

IV. Judah's Last Days (34:1–45:5)

Following oracles that convey a message of consolation, Jeremiah 34–45 comprise a narrative of unrelenting tragedy. Perhaps the point is the contrast between an undeserved act of divine grace and the relentless march of Judah toward the consequences of its rebellion. Jeremiah's God simply will not give up, even though Judah refuses to turn from its course. As Jeremiah's readers move through 34:1–45:5, the light that is the grace of God shines brighter than it would had the texts of consolation appeared at the end of the book.

A. Collapse of Trust (34:1–22)

Mere weeks before the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem begins, the Lord commissions Jeremiah to tell Zedekiah of the king's fate. Zedekiah will not escape from Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 3–6). The Babylonian king will confront Zedekiah personally. Jeremiah is to let Zedekiah know that he will not die violently but "in peace" (v. 5). Furthermore, mourners will perform rituals of burning incense and lamentation. Verses 6–7 indicate that it was not until the actual siege of the city had begun that Jeremiah so informed the king.

Verses 8–22 convey a story of treachery that reveals Jerusalem's government as unworthy of trust and hopelessly riddled with the self-interests of the social elite. Zedekiah had issued a covenant of manumission concerning all Hebrew slaves. According to v. 9, the basic reason was "so that no one should hold another Judean in slavery." The manumission may have been intended to provide more human resources to resist the Babylonian siege. Approximately one and a half years after the siege began, word apparently came to Jerusalem that Pharaoh Hophra was on the way with forces to relieve the city. Conceivably, in the hope of such deliverance, the social elite broke the covenant of manumission and reclaimed the slaves. Hophra's advance forces a Babylonian retrenchment and the siege lifts but only for a brief time (v. 21). Hophra falls back and the Babylonian siege continues. The breaking of the covenant is the cause for a divine word of destruction in which the Lord promises that the covenant breakers will be split like sacrificial calves (v. 18). This punishment corresponds to the ceremony of the making of the covenant that involved the killing of a calf and cutting it into two pieces. The calves represented the fate of anyone who broke the covenant (cf. Gen 15). Zedekiah will fall into the hand of enemies and the Babylonians will decimate Judah and its towns (vv. 21–22).

B. Sign of the Rechabites (35:1–19)

Jeremiah 35 presents a narrative that describes the Lord instructing the prophet to gather the Rechabites in a room located in the Temple. One of the Rechabites' practices involved abstaining from wine, a regulation that the group's founder, Jonadab ben Rechab, had issued generations earlier. In the presence of selected leaders of the social elite, Jeremiah tells them to drink wine. They refuse and, in so doing, stand as an example of loyalty to an ancestral decree. In vv. 12–17, the Lord reiterates the sad story of Israel's failure to obey the divine sovereign as a stark contrast to the Rechabites' stubborn loyalty to their founder's directions. For their loyalty, the Lord rewards the Rechabites with a promise of generational continuity (vv. 18–19).

C. Jehoiakim and the Scroll (36:1–32)

Jeremiah 36 presents an intricate narrative about a prophetic text and a wicked king. In Jehoiakim's fourth year (605 BCE), Jeremiah dictated the Lord's words to the scribe Baruch son of Neriah. Barred from entering the house of the Lord, Jeremiah tells Baruch to read the scroll aloud there. Word eventually reaches the king, who calls for a personal audience. As Baruch reads, the king takes the section Baruch read and burns it until the scroll is gone. Why Jehoiakim burned the scroll is not revealed, but it may have been a demonstration of his disdain for the prophet. Perhaps he hoped that by burning the scroll its words would not come to pass; but Jeremiah simply dictated another and added more words to it. The new scroll included a description of Jehoiakim's death and something worse, namely, that his body would remain unburied and exposed (vv 30–31).

D. Jeremiah's Imprisonment (37:1–38:29)

In 588 BCE, Egyptian forces were able to force a brief halt to the Babylonian siege. Nine years earlier, Nebuchadnezzar had installed Zedekiah on the throne of Judah and deported Coniah (Jehoiachin) to Babylon. Zedekiah did not remain a loyal vassal, an act of treachery that brought Babylon back to Judah to besiege Jerusalem. Zedekiah sends messengers to Jeremiah to request the prophet's intercession. When the Egyptian forces then set out to rout the Babylonians, it appeared the Lord had answered the prophet's prayer.

According to Jer 37:6–8, the Lord instructs Jeremiah to inform Zedekiah that the Babylonian retreat is temporary. During the lull, Jeremiah attempts to go to Anathoth to claim the field he had purchased from his relative, Hanamel (Jer 32). A sentinel named Irijah arrests the prophet and accuses him of deserting to the Babylonians. Jeremiah is beaten and imprisoned. The "cistern house" (v. 16) would have been a small structure built over a cistern to protect it from the elements. Thus begins the ordeal that will mean the end of Jeremiah's freedom until the fall of the city.

Verses 17–21 report that Zedekiah secretly visits the prophet and consults with him. Jeremiah informs the king that Zedekiah will fall into the hands of the king of Babylon. Jeremiah successfully requests that the king move Jeremiah into "the court of the guard" (v. 21). The prophet is allowed a ration of bread until it finally runs out during the siege the Babylonians are soon to renew.

Jeremiah's enemies are powerful and are aware of the demoralizing effect the prophet's words might have on the city's defenders. Having spun Jeremiah's words into a cloak of treason, they force Zedekiah's hand to have the prophet left to die in an abandoned cistern (38:5–6). The cistern was a bottle-shaped chamber and was empty. It was damp enough, though; Jeremiah sank into the mud. The stench and vermin aside, the prophet was left in total darkness to die.

If not for the intercession of an Ethiopian named Ebed-Melech, a servant in Zedekiah's house, Jeremiah would never have been seen again. Ebed-Melech may have placed himself in serious jeopardy. The men to whom he refers as acting wickedly are powerful and privileged; as Zedekiah realizes, they wield greater influence than does the king himself (38:5). Nevertheless, Jeremiah is hauled out of the cistern and returned to the guard house.

Although Zedekiah promises Jeremiah's safety in return for his services as a prophet, the king nevertheless refuses to act on the oracular charges the prophet delivers. Surrendering to the Babylonians, the king would save Jerusalem from an inevitable conflagration (v. 17). The king threatens Jeremiah with death if the prophet reveals their secret meetings (vv. 24–28).

E. The Fall of Jerusalem and Aftermath (39:1–45:5)

Jeremiah 39 describes the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 587 BCE. The Babylonians capture Zedekiah trying to escape the city (vv. 4–6). Nebuchadnezzar decimates Zedekiah's family, blinds the fallen king, and orders his deportation to Babylon (v. 7). The king's palace and the Temple are dismantled along with the city's walls. There follows a redistribution of land among the poor who previously had owned nothing (v. 10). Nebuchadnezzar provides a security detail for Jeremiah, who conveys to Ebed-Melech a divine promise of safety (vv. 11–14).

The narrative in Jeremiah 40–45 carries forward an important theme of the book, namely, Israel's inability to obey the Lord's word. The death of Hananiah (Jer 28) and the fall of the city demonstrate Jeremiah's trustworthiness as a prophet of the Lord according to the standards provided in Deuteronomy 18.

The Babylonians appoint Gedaliah son of Ahikam governor of Judah and allow Jeremiah to choose to remain in the land (40:1–6). Ishmael son of Nethaniah was a member of the royal family and undertook a conspiracy to assassinate Gedaliah. Ostensibly, he hoped to rise to a position of power. Gedaliah ignores warnings of the plot (40:13–16) and unwittingly makes himself vulnerable to Ishmael as they ate together; Ishmael kills Gedaliah. Ishmael resorts to robbery and murder, essentially becoming an outlaw (41:4–8). Although Gedaliah's friends try to capture Ishmael, Ishmael escapes across the Jordan into Ammonite territory (41:11–17).

The remaining Judahites are terrified that Nebuchadrezzar will retaliate for Gedaliah's assassination; they ask Jeremiah for guidance from the Lord concerning whether they should flee to Egypt. They promise to do whatever the Lord says (42:1–6). When Jeremiah returns to them after ten days to tell them to remain in the land, they refuse to believe him. Jeremiah warns the refugees that the Lord will punish them in Egypt, but they resist the message, abduct Jeremiah, and flee (43:1–7). In spite of all they have witnessed, they take their rebellion against the Lord to Egypt where they continue to make offerings to the queen of heaven (Jer 7:18; 44:17–19, 25). As a consequence of their actions God denies them the privilege of calling on the divine name (vv. 26–27). Jeremiah 45 depicts a divine promise of safety to Baruch who had himself expressed lamentations to God (vv. 2–3). For his loyalty, his life shall be "a prize of war" wherever he goes.

V. The Nations (46:1–51:64)

This section bears a superscription, "The word of the LORD that came to the prophet Jeremiah concerning the nations." To some scholars, the superscription suggests that the oracles preserved here originally comprised a separate collection of sayings. Whatever the origins of these oracles, they bring the words of Jeremiah to an end. Jeremiah 51:64 concludes this section with the phrase, "Thus far are the words of Jeremiah." This notation complements the first verse in the book, and, consequently, could be translated "thus far the chronicles of Jeremiah" (see commentary on Jer 1:1). The prophet's name will not occur in Jeremiah 52. (The name "Jeremiah of Libnah" [52:1] does not designate the prophet from Anathoth.)

This section begins and ends with oracles concerning the competing empires of Jeremiah's time, Egypt and Babylon. The oracles are an elaborate figure of speech known as an apostrophe. The literary figure of apostrophe implies that the real audience for these oracles is the one to whom the book of Jeremiah originally spoke, that is, the exilic community in Babylon. Nevertheless, these oracles also demonstrate that the standards of human life that God demands are not peculiar to the Israelites and that all nations share in the responsibility of demonstrating righteousness and justice. Of the nations singled out, the Lord promises future restoration for Egypt (46:26), Moab (48:47), the Ammonites (49:6), and Elam (49:39). The other nations, Philistia (47:1–7), Edom (49:7–22), Damascus (49:23–27); Kedar and Hazor (49:28–33), and Babylon (50:1–51:64) do not receive words of consolation.

Readers must linger over these oracles to discern their significance. One important issue is the status of the Babylonian Empire. It had destroyed not only Israel but neighboring nations as well. From a human point of view, it brooks no rival and seemingly may last forever. As a result, it is no accident that the last oracle, which addresses Babylon, is the longest and most complicated. Its length and rich texture underscore for the exilic audience the Lord's superior power to determine Babylon's ultimate fate. Jeremiah 50:1–3 begins the oracle against Babylon with an ironic gesture. The prophet describes the destruction that will befall Babylon as something falling on the city from the north, thus recalling that Babylon was the foe from the north that decimated Judah (Jer 1:13–15; 4:6; 6:1, 22; 10:22; 25:9, 26). The northern origin of Babylon's destruction also finds expression in 50:9, 41, and 51:42.

When Babylon falls, Judahite exiles will be liberated and return to Zion, weeping as they seek God (vv. 4–5). Portions of this oracle describe the inevitability of Israel's restoration (50:4, 5, 17–20, 33–34; 51:5–10). These promises reinforce the literary and theological significance of the consoling texts in Jeremiah 30:1–33:26. Redemption lies at the literal and theological heart of the book of Jeremiah.

This section concerning Babylon includes an exclamation by an anonymous voice, possibly from a member of the divine assembly, acclaiming the Lord's incomparable majesty and power (51:5–19). The one who created the cosmos (v. 5) and sustains it (v. 6) will demonstrate the vacuity of the cult statues of Babylon. As a result, God has the power to bring about the Babylonian Empire's dissolution.

VI. Epilogue (52:1–34)

With minor variations, the epilogue of Jeremiah 52 duplicates the narrative of the destruction of Jerusalem and the disposal of the sacred vessels of the Lord's house found in 2 Kgs 24:18–25:30. Elsewhere, Deuteronomic language permeates the book of Jeremiah, thus suggesting that the editors were themselves proponents of Deuteronomic theology. Readers can surmise that those who edited the book of Jeremiah deemed Jeremiah to exemplify Deuteronomic thought. The Deuteronomic History portrays figures such as Joshua, Samuel, Elijah, and Elisha as prophets like Moses (see Deut 18:15–22). By concluding the book of Jeremiah with a variation of the conclusion of 2 Kings, the book's editors have set Jeremiah into that prophetic line.

LAMENTATIONS

CARLEEN R. MANDOLFO

OVERVIEW

The book of Lamentations consists of five distinct poems (the first four are alphabetic acrostics), commemorating the annihilation of Jerusalem in 587/6 BCE at the hands of the Babylonians, who are understood—both in this book and in much of the prophetic tradition—as doing Yahweh's bidding. The English title is a translation of the Latin (threni) and Greek (threnoi) meaning "laments." In Hebrew, quinot (also meaning "lamentations") is a title for the book attested in the Babylonian Talmud. Otherwise in Jewish tradition, as well as in the Hebrew Bible itself, the title is 'eykah, after the first word of the book, "How!" The alphabetic acrostic functions to give form and structure to otherwise unmanageable grief.

Unlike biblical prose texts devoted to recounting the events of the invasion (2 Kgs 24–25; Jer. 25), the poet (or poets) of Lamentations was far more interested in providing a series of visceral tableaux on the experience of devastation. Generically, it is simplest and most useful to categorize these poems as psalms of lament, i.e., they share formal and conceptual elements with laments in the biblical Psalter. It is also clear that they rely on other forms of ancient Near Eastern literature, such as the dirge and city lament—the latter of which was a common form of lamentation used by Israel's Mesopotamian neighbors in which the wounded party (i.e., the city itself) was frequently figured as a woman—often the consort of the city's deity. Nonetheless, biblical laments diverge from their Mesopotamian counterparts. The city laments of Sumer, for example, offer praise in response to the eventual restoration of the city by the gods. In contrast, the biblical book of Lamentations is devoid of any suggestion of rehabilitation. God is utterly silent throughout the book.

In the Jewish tradition, the book is placed in the latter third of the canon among the "Writings" and is recited in the Jewish liturgical calendar on the "Ninth of Av," which commemorates the destructions of the First and Second Temples in 586 BCE and 70 CE, respectively, as well as more recent catastrophes suffered by the Jewish people.

The first two poems were composed in a dialogic fashion, with the voice of Jerusalem appearing as a bereaved woman antiphonally responding to a second voice, sympathizing with and yet once removed from the woman's experience of anguish. The third poem most closely resembles a typical lament psalm, with a suppliant alternately lamenting, appealing to, and praising God. Chapter four reads like a cross between a lament psalm and a prophetic dirge in which the suffering of the people is recounted and blamed on the unjust and ritually impure actions of the city's leaders. The final poem paints a picture of complete political, economic, and personal upheaval. The poem (and book) ends on a note of near hopelessness. Still, the determined reader can find hope in a relationship between humans and the divine that persists against all odds.

While the book does not shy away from placing blame at the feet of the people, on the whole the tone is not so much penitential as overwhelmed with pathos.

B. Breakdown of All Social Structures (5:2–18)

C. A Final Plea for Mercy (5:19–22)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Poem One (1)

The chapter begins with a cry, "How!" ('eykah), which sets the tone for the entire book. Expressions of despair, anguish, and betrayal dominate the emotional terrain of these poems. Chapter one focuses on Jerusalem, personified as a princess who has been reduced to widowhood by her former lovers and friends (1:1–2), probably an allusion to former political and military allies. The female representation of the city recalls the prevalent use of the marriage metaphor in several of the prophetic books (e.g., Hos 1–3; Jer 2–3; Ezek 16:23). In those texts, Israel/Jerusalem is understood to be the adulterous wife of Yahweh, who, because of her betrayal and ingratitude, is punished by her "husband," who sends the nations against her and her children. It is impossible to know whether the poet(s) of Lam 1–2 was explicitly making reference to this tradition. However, the theological implications of such references are profound. Reading Lam 1–2 in relation to these prophetic texts sets up a dialogic encounter between voices—God's and Israel's. Whereas the voice of the people, now spoken by a woman, is nearly absent from the prophetic texts, the first two chapters of Lamentations permit the people to speak back to the deity, offering their point of view on the situation described earlier by the aforementioned prophets. Despite the extremity of Jerusalem's suffering, this human perspective does not deny the claims made against Jerusalem in the prophets, but rather offers a new perspective.

Although both the narrator's voice and Daughter Zion make reference to Zion's sins (vv. 5 and 14), the primary purpose of this lament is not to have Jerusalem appear as penitent, but rather to enable her to give voice to the extreme suffering she and others endured during the siege and destruction wrought by King Nebuchadnezzar's forces. Jerusalem's voice serves as a counterpoint to the main thrust of much of prophetic rhetoric, which is primarily concerned with establishing the culpability of the people, that justifies the destruction of the city. The poet(s) of Lamentations (with the possible exception of ch. 3) makes clear that the people are suffering more than they deserve to suffer.

Conspicuous throughout ch. 1 is repeated reference to the absence of a comforter for Zion (vv. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21). There has been much speculation about the identity of the comforter, but it is clear from the level of despair and hopelessness conveyed by the poet that only God could provide true comfort for Daughter Zion. Thus, that God seems utterly deaf to Zion's cries is the real tragedy of the book. Second Isaiah will try to rectify this sense of abandonment by proclaiming "comfort" to the people and insisting that their period of punishment is over (Isa 40:1).

The choice of gendered imagery in chs. 1–2 is theologically significant. In the book of Lamentations, women's suffering is closely related to their familial status—the loss of a husband meant the loss of prestige and security in ancient Israel. The heartbreak involved in the loss of a child meant then what it means now, perhaps the ultimate hardship a woman can endure, and thus a particularly effective way for the poet to express the magnitude of suffering experienced by the people, personified as Daughter Zion.

II. Poem Two (2)

The emphasis on suffering over culpability is even more pronounced in ch. 2 than it was in ch. 1. The vitriol unleashed at God is unparalleled in biblical literature (with the possible exception of sections of Jeremiah and Job). The verbs used in the first nine verses to portray the actions of the deity against Daughter Zion are relentlessly harsh: God "casts down," "lays waste," ravages," "slays," "rejects" to name just a few. In v. 4, God is described "like an enemy," a conflation of God with the Babylonians that reflects prophetic texts, which were wont to portray God as the source of Babylon's military successes. Prophetic rhetoric emphasizes divine power over mercy, a theological perspective that can be troubling for contemporary readers. This focus on God's might derives from the realities of ancient Near Eastern politics and religious rhetoric. Still, Lamentations should be seen as a text that reminds the deity of the human toll when power supersedes mercy. The Hebrew Bible is rife with examples of humans confronting God in order to remind him that covenantal values require a careful balance between divine justice and mercy to ensure that humans not be mortally overwhelmed (e.g., Gen 18 in which Abraham bargains with God to spare Sodom).

In v. 11, third-person speech switches to firstperson (a stylistic feature common to other biblical poetic texts, such as Psalms and the Prophets); readers may now be hearing the voice of Daughter Zion herself. The shift in voice lends a dynamic quality to the poetry that enhances the poignancy of the content. The poem provides different points of view from which to witness Jerusalem's wreckage. The more intimate tone of vv. 11–12 reflects the content of the passage—the focus is once again on the misery of the children. Babies perish in the arms of their mothers who are helpless to feed them. Echoing ch. 1, v. 13 reprises the impossibility of comfort. Instead, Daughter Zion is entreated to lift her hands in supplication to the only possible source of comfort, God (v. 18), which highlights both the dilemma and possibilities of monotheistic faith. That Israel does not have the option of turning to other deities for relief might be a terrifying reality, but such a situation provides the occasion for intense intimacy between God and the people. They are compelled to find a way to reestablish their bond or both will suffer the consequences of a failed relationship.

Daughter Zion responds with a series of passionate rebukes of the deity: "Look, O LORD, and consider!" (v. 20). Both the chapter and Daughter Zion's speech ends with a reprimand that refutes one of the main accusations brought against her in the prophetic texts—infanticide (Ezek. 16:20)—and turns it back on the deity, whom she accuses of being the actual murderer of her children.

III. Poem Three (3)

In ch. 3, the emphasis shifts away from women and children, and a male voice comes to the fore. The descriptions of extreme hardship continue, but this chapter takes the edge off some of the harsh rhetoric of the first two chapters. One of the ways in which this is apparent has to do with the formal characteristics of the poetry. Chapter 3, more than the other four poems in the book, is a typical lament psalm, albeit somewhat stylized. Lament psalms typically oscillate between grievance and praise, and Lam 3 shares this aspect with them. The beginning of the poem strikes a tone that is nearly indistinguishable from that in chs. 1–2, but in vv. 19–41 the tone softens to a degree that finds no parallel in chs. 1–2: "the steadfast love of the LORD never ceases, his mercies never come to an end" (v. 22).

The positioning of the praise portions at the center of the poem as well as the poem's centrality in the book suggests a deliberate attempt to concentrate attention on the positive qualities of God that are called into doubt in the remainder of the book. At the same time, the inclusion of praise gives the grievances formal legitimacy and ensures that protest not be equated with blasphemy. The poem never loses sight, however, of the overall theme of the book, which is the people's torment bordering on despair. Verse 42 renews the grievance, after which the poem expresses the hope that God will look and see the pain of his people (v. 50).
