The poem ends with an expression of confidence that God will do precisely that (vv. 55–58), followed by a final request that God bring retribution on those who have mistreated God's people (vv. 59–66). The request for revenge is reminiscent of the oracles against the nations, a prominent part of prophetic literature (e.g., Isa 13–23; Jer 46–51; Ezek 25–32; Amos 1–2). Both Lamentations and the oracles against the nations reflect Israel's covenantal theology, which understands God to be a protector of his people.

IV. Poem Four (4)

On the continuum between the unmitigated bleakness of ch. 2 and the more formally typical and theologically palatable complaint of ch. 3, the fourth poem edges closer to the former, but has faint echoes of the hope present in ch. 3.

The first five verses rehearse the poignant theme of starving children, but with a twist. The poet ascribes the suffering of the children to the "cruelty" of the people, whose maternal instincts are not as well developed as those of animals (v. 3). This claim is not meant to be an indictment of the people, but rather an attempt to demonstrate the degree to which the severity of Yahweh's wrath has diminished Israel's basic human instincts. The issue of class also emerges in this poem. Reference to gold, purple, and feasting on delicacies emphasizes the devastation experienced by the elite.

The comparison of Israel to Sodom (v. 6) not only emphasizes the totality of destruction but also implies a degree of arrogance on the part of the Israelites. This motif may be connected to the spotlight trained on the elite. This emphasis on the powerful citizens in Jerusalem continues with reference to the former physical prowess of the princes of the city, who have now become "blacker than soot" and "shriveled" (v. 8). The "cruelty" to the children is further defined in v. 10; women are described as feeding on the flesh of their own children.

The apparent compassion offered the rich and powerful who have fallen so far is nuanced and tempered in vv. 11–16. The priests and prophets, the religious and moral leaders of the people, are accused of shedding innocent blood in the midst of the city (v. 13). This indictment probably alludes to the sins of social injustice, so often inveighed against in the prophets (Isa 1:27; Amos 5:10–13). Whatever the details of the crimes, the priests and prophets are described as social outcasts, so impure that the people banish them from their midst.

The poem concludes with an oracle against Edom, which sets up a contrast with Israel that works to the latter's benefit. While Edom will continue to suffer God's wrath for their treatment of Israel, Daughter Zion's punishment will come to an end (v. 22).

V. Poem Five (5)

The fifth and final poem assumes the formal features of a fairly typical communal lament. It is the only poem of the five that is not composed in acrostic form, though it is made up of twentytwo verses, as are the first, second, and fourth poems (the Hebrew alphabet contains twenty-two letters). The absence of an alphabetic acrostic may signal a descent into chaos and serves as a fitting counterpart to the unresolved conclusion of this poem (and hence the book).

The poem opens with a plea reminiscent of many lament Psalms, "Remember, O LORD" (cf. Ps 74, which shares similar imagery and themes and probably reflects the exilic experience as well). This chapter is the only poem in the book that begins with a plea; the others all forcefully commence with images of affliction, though absent an explicit appeal. As a result, this poem exhibits a less rebellious tenor than the other poems (except arguably Lam 3).

The body of the poem rehearses many of the same themes as the rest of the book—the utter dissolution of social order and the unspeakable suffering of Jerusalem's people. More prominent, however, is the idea of communal culpability (vv. 7, 16). Taking some of the onus off the deity gives this poem a family resemblance to the penitential poems in the Psalter (e.g., Ps 130). This reference to the community's sins is another element that sets it off from the rest of the collection in this book. Nonetheless, unlike a typical penitential psalm, this poem ends on a note of despair, rather than praise or expression of hope common to laments in the Psalter (penitential or otherwise). The penultimate note struck, however, is faintly hopeful. God's power is highlighted, suggesting that if he should choose, he could alleviate the suffering of his people (v. 19). However, this glimmer of hope does little to mitigate what has come before and, especially, the tone on which the poem ends—the acknowledgment that perhaps Yahweh has "utterly rejected" his people (vv. 20–22).

In part due to its ending, Lamentations is Scripture particularly apt for the post-Holocaust world, in which it is no longer appropriate to attach meaning or salvation to radical suffering, such as that attested in this poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Berlin. Lamentations: A Commentary (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp. Lamentations. IBC (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002); E. Gerstenberger. Psalms, Part 2, and Lamentations. FOTL 15 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); N. Gottwald. "Lamentations." HBC (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988) 646–51; D. Hillers. Lamentations. AB 7A (New York: Doubleday, 1972; rev. ed., 1992); T. Linafelt. Surviving Lamentations: Catastrophe, Lament, and Protest in the Afterlife of a Biblical Book (Chicago: University of Chicago, 2000); N. Lee. The Singers of Lamentations: Cities Under Siege, from Ur to Jerusalem to Sarajevo. BI (Brill Academic Publishers, 2002); C. Mandolfo. Daughter Zion Talks Back to the Prophets: A Dialogic Theology of the Book of Lamentations. Semeia Studies (Society of Biblical Literature/ Brill, 2007); K. O'Connor. Lamentations and the Tears of the World (Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 2002).

EZEKIEL

JACQUELINE E. LAPSLEY

OVERVIEW

Ezekiel is one of the strangest books of the Bible. Bursting with bizarre symbolism and sexually explicit language, the book seethes with divine fury even while simultaneously offering some of the most powerful expressions within the OT of God's desire to restore humanity and creation to wholeness. Both Jewish and Christian traditions have long puzzled over what to do with this book, which fascinates even as it repels. Many have intuited that Ezekiel has something of considerable significance and power to say about God and about Israel's relationship to God, but have been frustrated by the book's seemingly deliberate obfuscations, by its raw anger, and by its apparent resistance to conventional modes of biblical interpretation.

Despite its length and canonical status as one of the major prophets, Ezekiel is not widely cited in the NT (apart from its significance in the book of Revelation, and perhaps an allusion in 2 Cor 6:16), nor are its texts favored by preachers, with the exception of Ezek 37 (the dry bones). It offers little by way of messianic hope or pithy, comforting, quotable thoughts about God's love and promises of redemption. It resists being used for the interpretive purposes of others; rather, it demands to be read as a whole, for the integrity of its profound claim that though humanity's relationship with God is broken, and indeed, that human moral agency itself is broken beyond repair, God nevertheless reaches into that seemingly irreparable brokenness and makes humanity whole again. Israel's long history has shown how human effort to maintain covenant relationship with God has failed, and indeed, it has shown how the endless human striving to contain and control God has failed. The book reveals Yahweh as one who cannot and will not be contained or domesticated. In its understanding of the human condition and of the divine-human relationship as being irremediably broken unless healed by divine unilateral action, the book of Ezekiel bears some resemblance to the writings of Paul in the NT.

Ezekiel was a priest and a prophet in the years leading up to and following the Babylonian invasion of Judah in the early sixth century BCE. The prophecies in the book are generally dated to the period 593–571 (though they do not follow a clear chronological pattern within the book). Having been deported from Jerusalem with the first wave of exiles in 597 (mainly composed of the leadership class), Ezekiel has been in Babylon for several years by 593. The end of Judah as a quasi-autonomous political entity occurs in 587 with the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple, along with further deportations, at the hands of the Babylonians.

These events provoked an unparalleled theological crisis in Israel's life, the depth of which is everywhere evident in Ezekiel. The Temple was widely understood in several of Israel's dominant religious traditions (Zion theology, Priestly theology) to be the unique locus of God's presence in and with and for Israel. The destruction of the Temple that looms on the horizon throughout much of Ezekiel's prophecies is thus tantamount to God's total abandonment of Israel—Israel whom God had chosen to be a "treasured possession" (Exod 19:5), with whom God was understood to be in a covenantal relationship of loving and enduring loyalty. For Ezekiel as a priest, the destruction of the Temple seems to signify both the end of his own identity (what does it mean to be a priest without the Temple in which to serve?) and, more importantly, the end of Israel as God's covenantal people.

The severity of this theological crisis requires language, imagery, and ideas that are out of the ordinary. (This theological crisis also involves political, social, and economic factors—these modern categories ill fit their indissolubility in the ancient context; basically, the crisis is theological, with political, social, and economic consequences.) So the bizarre and offensive features of the book should not surprise, for they are part of the attempt to articulate the depth of the crisis at hand—a crisis both bizarre and offensive. Ezekiel's language moves at the boundaries of meaning, because the situation he describes moves at the boundaries of what is expressible, even thinkable. Indeed, the book makes claims that, on the surface, seem to be inconsistent: that Israel must take responsibility for its failures, and that due to the irreparably damaged human condition, Israel is incapable of changing its behavior. Another paradox lies at the heart of the book as well: that where God seems most present, God is absent, and where God appears to be absent, God is present. Thus all human efforts to domesticate God will fail. These paradoxes lie at the heart of the book's theological power, for they are finally not contradictions, but productive tensions that lead to new insights about God and about human beings.

The book appears on the surface to fall neatly into three parts (God's judgment of Israel, God's judgment of the nations, God's restoration of Israel), but within that threefold structure it resists easy organization. Perhaps this is deliberate: one of Ezekiel's themes is to reject the way humanity attempts to tame and domesticate God. Frustrating our desire to divide the book into nice, digestible chunks emphasizes that God will not be controlled by human will.

OUTLINE

I. God's Judgment of the Covenant People and Departure of the Divine Presence (1:1–24:27)

- A. Divine Presence and Absence (1:1–11:25) 1:1–3:27. Divine Presence and the Prophet's Call
4:1–7:27. Signs of Impending Judgment
8:1–11:25. Judgment and Divine Absence

- B. Signs of the Judgment (12:1–24:27)
 - 12:1–23:49. Signs and Announcements of Judgment
 - 24:1–27. Two Signs Summarizing Israel's Predicament

II. God's Judgment of the Nations (25:1–32:32)

A. Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia, Tyre, Sidon (25:1–28:23)

B. An Explicit Word of Hope for Israel (28:24–26)

C. The Special Case of Egypt: Israel's Double (29:1–32:32)

III. God's Transformation of the Covenant People and Return of the Divine Presence (33:1–48:39)

A. After Disaster, Signs of Hope (33:1–35:15)

33:1–33. The Fall of Jerusalem

34:1–31. False Shepherds and the True Shepherd

35:1–15. Judgment on Mount Seir (Edom)

B. Transformation of Land and People (36:1–37:28)

36:1–38. The Re-Creation of Land

37:1–28. The Re-Creation of People and Nation

C. God's Final Triumph over All External Threats (38:1–39:29)

D. The Final Temple Vision—Divine Presence Restored (40:1–48:35)

40:1–43:11. Tour of the New Temple and Return of the Divine Glory

43:12–46:24. The Torah of the Temple

47:1–48:35. The Effect of the Divine Presence on the Land

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. God's Judgment of the Covenant People and Departure of the Divine Presence (1:1–24:27)

A. Divine Presence and Absence (1:1–11:25)

1:1–3:27. Divine Presence and the Prophet's Call

1:1–28. Visions of God at Chebar Canal. Ezekiel's inaugural vision is vital for understanding the theology of the book as a whole. The vision itself is stunning—there is nothing like it elsewhere in the Old Testament. It overpowers the prophet at the moment of the vision, and the description has continued to overwhelm believers who have received it over millennia. The elements of the vision tumble off the page, with the prophet consistently resorting to analogical language ("something like . . .") to convey what he sees: cloud, fire, amber, living creatures, wings, legs, bronze, hands, faces, lion, ox, eagle, burning coals, torches, lightning, wheels, rims, eyes, spirit, dome, deafening sound, throne, sapphire, human form, amber, fire, splendor. He can only give an approximate description of God's glory; the vision is both orderly and chaotic—it does not cohere in one clear depiction of what is seen. Ezekiel experiences the mysterium tremendum of God's presence in what he sees and hears, yet God is also not fully present in the vision. In this massive sensory overload, the prophet glimpses God, and yet that glimpse also points away from God; it simultaneously reveals and obscures. Ezekiel 1:28 sums up the vision: "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory [kabod] of the LORD." The paradox at the heart of the vision—the simultaneous presence and absence of God—is also one of the central paradoxes and main theological claims of the book itself.

It is 593 (five years after the first wave of deportations in 597), and Ezekiel and the other exiles have been in Babylon about five years. The prophet is by an irrigation canal in Babylon when the heavens are opened and he has a vision of the divine realm that exists above the earthly realm. Many modern readers now assume God can be present anywhere, but for Ezekiel and his audience the presence of God is closely tied to a particular place: the Temple in Jerusalem. For them, the possibility of a destroyed Jerusalem Temple and their exile to Babylon seemed to signal the unthinkable—namely, the defeat of their God, Yahweh, and the triumph of the Babylonian gods. To encounter Yahweh anywhere outside of the Jerusalem Temple would be not only unprecedented but difficult even to imagine. Thus Ezekiel's vision makes a powerful and astounding theological claim: Yahweh has not abandoned the exiles to foreign gods and is not bound by spatial limitations, as appearances suggest. On the contrary, extraordinarily, Israel's God is present with the exiles in the backwaters of Babylon itself! The vision itself thus serves as comfort to the exiles that they have not been abandoned, but God's continuing presence also bears ominous overtones: it means that God will not allow the people to forgo an accounting of their failures that have brought them to this point.

The vision has both troubled and fascinated believers for millennia. The early rabbis were concerned that the vision might lead the faithful into unsound mystical speculation, and those under thirty were forbidden, at least by some, to read the book, especially the beginning and the end (chs. 40–48 propose rules that seem to contradict the torah, or law/instruction, of Moses). And indeed, the vision was a catalyst for merkavah mysticism (merkavah refers to the throne-chariot of God), a rich and dynamic Jewish interpretive tradition. Christian traditions found the vision to be an important source of iconography; for example, the lion, ox, eagle, and human faces are understood to represent the four gospels in visual representations, and the wheels appear in everything from paintings to African-American spirituals.

2:1–3:27. The Prophet's Call. As in other prophetic books, Ezekiel offers a narrative of his call by God to the prophetic task. Ezekiel's response to the vision described in ch. 1 had been to fall down and worship, and it is from that posture that he is lifted by the spirit of God and set upon his feet to hear the divine commission. A new theme is introduced here: the sinfulness of Israel as the primary problem that God seeks to address through the work of this exiled prophet (2:3–4). Significantly, whether the Israelites will be responsive to the prophet's words and actions is irrelevant; Ezekiel's activity will let the people know that a prophet has been among them, not so they will change their behavior (2:5–7; 3:7–11). This signals another important theme: knowledge. The people have no genuine knowledge of who they are or of who God is—and the prophetic task is to fill these two voids in the people's understanding. Whether they are willing, or even able, to change their ways is a secondary matter, for behavioral change can only be achieved after the people understand the identity of God, and their own identity in relation to God.

Ezekiel literally eats the grim prophetic words he is to proclaim (3:1–3), an entirely fitting beginning to his prophetic activity since much of what he will convey to the Israelites throughout the book is symbolically enacted on his own body. He will literally embody God's word to Israel. In some ways, he points toward the beginnings of an incarnational theology—the word of God in human form.

Given the reservations expressed in these chapters about whether Israel will change their behavior, it seems odd to hear the emphasis on individual responsibility that characterizes 3:16–21. Yet Ezekiel consistently claims that both are true: people cannot change their behavior, yet they are responsible for their actions. But the issue in this particular section is not the people's response, per se; rather it concerns the prophet's responsibility to fulfill the divine commission. The image of Ezekiel as a sentinel—as one who proclaims the danger on the horizon—will appear again in 33:1–9.

Finally, God commands Ezekiel to engage in three sign-actions (the first three of many): to withdraw to his house, be bound with cords there, and to remain speechless except to deliver the word that God chooses (3:22–27). Ezekiel's dumbness has long puzzled commentators (since so much of the book is his speech!), but the point here is that Ezekiel is not to fulfill the traditional prophetic role of trying to bring the people to repentance for their sins. True, the people are accountable for the piteous state to which Israel has descended; but paradoxically, the prophet's task is not to make them shape up, for they are incapable of taking responsible action on their own. The prophet is only to offer to the people an account of the gravity of their situation and of how God will act to deliver them from it.

4:1–7:27. Signs of Impending Judgment

4:1–5:17. The Prophet's Sign-actions. Ezekiel continues to bear the word of God on his body in a series of sign-actions in chs. 4 and 5. A shift is noticeable from the sign-acts commanded in 3:22–27, however: there the acts pertained to the nature of the prophetic task itself, whereas beginning in 4:1 the prophet's sign-acts convey God's judgment of Israel, beginning with Jerusalem in particular, for its failure to live in covenantal relationship with God.

The brick diorama (4:1–3), the prophet's lying on his side for 430 days (4:4–8), and the shaving of his hair (5:1–4) all symbolically enact the siege and final fall of Jerusalem, which will take place between 589 and 587. The mixed-grain bread cooked over dung and eaten with a small ration of water symbolizes the deprivations of life under siege (4:9–17). Israel has broken its covenant with God (mainly by idolatrous worship, but also by breaking other commandments), and they will live out the consequences of that brokenness. The fear and wasting (4:16–17) that characterizes life under siege closely mirrors the curses imposed for breaking covenant (see Lev 26:26, 39).

Because the sign-acts encode the word of God on the prophet's body, they are rhetorically more effective than plain prophetic speech. The difference is a bit like that between hearing a script read and seeing the play performed on stage—the power is in the performance. That Ezekiel engages in so many sign-actions, that his body becomes the divine word because words alone are not effective, points toward one of the underlying issues in the book: the people have difficulty hearing what God is trying to get across to them, and this problem in communication cripples the divinehuman relationship. They are presently either unwilling or incapable, or both, of understanding the word of God. The problem is not that Jerusalem, in its total disregard of the requirements of God's covenant, has become like the nations around it; rather Jerusalem is more wicked than other nations (5:5–7)—an astonishing claim for an Israelite prophet to make about Israel! And one that forcefully articulates the depth of Israel's unfaithfulness.

While the main point of these sign-actions is to convey God's judgment on the people, a minor but significant feature of these sign-acts is the way in which they threaten the Priestly understanding of purity. At first, Ezekiel is to eat the bread cooked over human dung, which repels, of course, but also profoundly contaminates. The requirement is softened to cow dung, a common fuel; God's reduction of the command recalls the pattern of divine amelioration in Gen 1–11 (God sews clothes for the exiled couple, the mark on Cain, etc.). In the same way, the people will be defiled as they are carried off to live in a foreign land, and yet God promises to be present with them while they are exiled, not fully perhaps, but partially (11:16). Ezekiel himself, whose priestly identity is so central to him, is defiled along with the other deportees by the experience of exile.

6:1–7:27. Judgment on the Land. The next two chapters continue the theme of God's judgment of Israel, no longer by means of sign-actions, but by addressing the mountains of Israel (6:2). The choice of Israel's mountains as the object of judgment has puzzled modern readers (some scholars even accuse Ezekiel of contributing to environmental degradation). It is, of course, the people whom God judges for their failures, not literal mountains; thus here the mountains symbolize the people as a whole. Yet the prevalence of indictment language about the land itself reveals something significant about the way Ezekiel thinks: land and people are inextricably bound together. Ezekiel's view of land and people as an integrated part of creation is, in some ways, more in keeping with the views of modern environmentalists who argue for the interdependence of humanity and the environment. For Ezekiel it is precisely because they are bound together that the land may be appropriately personified and also suffer destruction along with the people.

This is no ordinary punishment, however. The land, along with the people, must suffer a totalizing destruction, a form of erasure, of death itself. Consider the verbs in 6:6: "In all your settlements the towns will be decimated [khrb], and the high places laid waste [yshm], so that your altars may be decimated [khrb] and may bear their guilt, your idols shattered [shbr] and destroyed [shbt], your incense altars hacked up [gd'], and your deeds wiped out [mkhh]" (author's translation). Ezekiel strains here to find more synonyms for destroy despite a relative wealth of options in the biblical Hebrew thesaurus. As the last verb makes clear, those deeds, and the land they were done on, must be completely annihilated. The land suffers for the sins of humanity. The same verb appears in Gen 6:7, 7:4 and twice in 7:23 to describe what God does by means of the flood: "He wiped out [mkhh] every living thing that was on the face of the ground, human beings and animals and creeping things and birds of the air; they were wiped out [mkhh] from the earth" (7:23, author's translation). Ezekiel's use of this verb in Ezek 6:6, as the final in a relentless series of synonymous verbs, contributes to the audience's sense of the inalterable force of the divine will to eradicate completely both the people responsible for polluting the land and the land itself. They are of a piece and cannot be extricated from each other.

This erasure of people and land seems, on the surface, theologically indefensible to modern readers, yet it is necessary within Ezekiel's theological framework: Israel has reached a point where remediation is not possible, only divine recreation can restore Israel as God's people. That will be the subject of the last part of the book, with the recreation of land and mountains in ch. 36 playing a crucial role in "answering" the devastation announced in ch. 6.

The refrain, "they/you shall know that I am the LORD"—often called the "recognition formula"—appears for the first time (of over 70 occurrences in the book) in this section (6:7, 10, 14). The central theme of the knowledge of God is underscored with every repetition. In what does such knowledge consist? To begin with the negative: it does not involve intellectual knowledge of Yahweh's transcendent being. Rather, it is the people's acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God following a divine action; it is the people's recognition that God is creator and redeemer of the world, and, crucially, that they are not. Knowledge of God for Israel means that they internalize completely the proper relationship between themselves and this God who made them, brought them out of Egypt, entered into covenantal relationship with them, and who still longs to be in that relationship despite Israel's sins (6:9: "you . . . shall remember me . . . how I was crushed by their wanton heart").

As John Calvin famously recognized, the necessary flip side to knowledge of God is knowledge of self, a concern that also appears in this section. Once the people remember clearly the truth of their history—how they abandoned the Lord—they will loathe themselves (6:9). Distressing as the language of self-loathing is to modern ears, this is Ezekiel's way of speaking about self-knowledge. The language of loathing (and later in the book, of shame) does not connote a psychologically damaging self-examination for Ezekiel. Rather, it involves the people's internalizing a truthful account of their history that leads them to see themselves as God sees them, and to experience an appropriate and healthy sense of humility and shame in light of that truth (more on shame in the discussion of ch. 16).

Chapter 7 introduces a new and important concern of Ezekiel's: the prevalence of violence in Israel and its connection to economic status. The first part of the poem refers to the disasters and destruction that will befall Israel as a result of the impending Babylonian invasion and makes clear that these events function as divine punishment for Israel's sins (7:1–9). The second half of the poem speaks specifically of the violence perpetrated by the wealthy and of the divine punishments that result. Here, as elsewhere in prophetic texts, Ezekiel makes a connection between wealth, pride, and violence. This toxic mixture leads to idolatry (7:19–20) and blood: "For the land is full of bloody crimes; the city is full of violence" (7:23). A lack of self-knowledge leads to an overreliance on wealth, and the desire to increase that wealth leads to violence.

8:1–11:25. Judgment and Divine Absence

8:1–9:11. Temple Abominations and Judgment. Chapter 8 begins the description of the second of the three structuring visions of the book (ch. 1; ch. 8; ch. 40). It is apparently the same figure described in the inaugural vision (1:26–27) who brings Ezekiel from Babylon to Jerusalem "in visions of God" (8:3). There he witnesses the abominations in the Temple that will ultimately drive the Lord out of it. It is difficult for contemporary readers, so far removed from the biblical worldview, to understand the gravity of the crisis at hand. God's presence among the people, dwelling first in the tabernacle, and then in the Temple once the people are settled in the land, has been a given in Israelite thought since the wilderness period (Exod 29:45; 1 Kgs 6:13). The people will thrive and flourish as long as God chooses the Temple as an earthly dwelling place. The idea that God might remove the divine presence from their midst was close to unthinkable for Israel. Yet Ezekiel's tour of the Temple, where he witnesses the unspeakably offensive idolatrous worship practices taking place there, provides the justification for God's abandonment of the Temple in ch. 10.

Ezekiel describes four scenes in the Temple (8:5–18), each one moving closer and closer to the holiest part of the sanctuary ("the holy of holies"), and each one describing an act more offensive and defiling than the last. The final scene depicts men, their backs to the altar, worshiping the sun, a total rejection of Yahweh at the very locus of the divine presence. Everything that Ezekiel sees in the Temple to this point has been a gross violation of the first and second commandments against worshiping other gods and against the making of images (see Exod 20:3–6; Deut 4:1–20; 5:7–12). Furthermore, all of these acts defile the holiness of the Temple. In the Priestly worldview that Ezekiel shared, the distinction between that which is holy (God, but also sacred space and that which is in it) and that which defiles holiness (human sinfulness among other things) is crucial. If the Temple becomes "polluted," even the sacrifices designed to cleanse the Temple would not be adequate and God would leave the Temple. The holiness of God cannot abide in a contaminated place.

Significantly, Yahweh names a further transgression after all these abominations have been described: the people fill the land with violence. Violence—crimes committed against other people—are considered on a par with the idolatry going on in the Temple (8:17). The Hebrew in 8:17c actually reads "See, they are putting the branch to my nose!" which seems to be a euphemistic way of saying—and this would have shocked Ezekiel's audience even more than it does modern readers—that they are sticking their penis in God's face! With their idolatrous worship and their violence, the people are making an unimaginably vulgar gesture in the Lord's face.

It is worth asking what the people involved in these rituals hope to accomplish by them. What has driven them to these acts that so flagrantly violate the covenant with God? The answer would seem to be desperation. As their world crumbles around them (the Babylonian invasion, the seeming absence of Yahweh), they cast about wildly for some means of controlling what is happening to them. Yet this urge to control is deeply misguided; the human desire to control the divine—to make the deity/ies "fix" things—must be decried and repudiated as nothing but the chaff of false hope.

In an extremely disturbing scene that recalls the devastating slaughter in Exod 32:26–28, the Lord calls for the slaughter of the old and the young in the city as punishment for the abominations in the Temple. As in the case of the golden calf, the slaughter reveals the depth of the crisis generated by the people's sin. The people say that God has abandoned the land and does not see, but the situation is precisely the opposite: God will hold them accountable for their idolatry and their violence (9:9-10). Here again is the paradoxical claim: God is in fact present when the people believe God to be most absent.

10:1–11:25. Departure of the Divine Glory. At the end of this first major section of the book, the event that was at once so menacingly certain and yet so impossible to conjure in the imagination, finally occurs: the divine "glory"—the very presence of God—departs from the Temple. While this is a previously unthinkable event, it is also a logically inevitable one given the situation in Jerusalem and in the Temple that Ezekiel has been describing to this point. The people's flagrant sinfulness, their violence and their idolatrous worship, has led the Lord to abandon the divine dwelling on earth. Whereas the first chapter of the book offered an overpowering image of the divine presence (in Babylonia no less!), this first section ends with an overpowering image of the divine absence (from the Temple, from Jerusalem!). Ezekiel is at pains to show that the divine glory he saw in Babylon is the very same that he now watches leave the Temple (10:15). The people sin through their idolatry, the misrepresentation of God's presence, and the result will be the removal of God's presence. Yet, by emphasizing the absence of God, both the absence of physical representations of God and the actual absence of God from the Temple, Ezekiel makes it possible for his audience to perceive God's presence in exile.

Prior to the final departure of the divine glory from the city itself (11:22–23), Ezekiel is privy to God's scathing indictment of Jerusalem's leaders, as well as a divine promise to the exiles of eventual return and restoration. The judgment against the leaders is in keeping with attention to the failures of leaders elsewhere in the book (chs. 12; 21; 34). They are indicted for gloating over the departure of those exiled in the first deportation and for taking over their homes (11:2–3), and again, for their violence ("You have killed many in this city," 11:6). These malignant rulers invoke the image of the city as a pot and themselves as the good meat in the pot, but the Lord refutes their claim (11:7–11), announcing judgment on them for their covenantal failures. The pot imagery will be completely reworked in 24:2–14 as Ezekiel struggles with the notion that the city, that is the people of the city, are inherently sinful and cannot be restored except by God's unilateral saving action. Thus the promise of God in 11:19–20 ("I will give them one heart, and put a new spirit within them; I will remove the heart of stone from their flesh and give them a heart of flesh, so that they may follow my statutes and keep my ordinances and obey them" [emphasis added]) stands in considerable tension with Ezekiel's repeated claim that the people are responsible for the disaster that is befalling them. The tension between these two claims, that the people are responsible and that they are incapable of changing their behavior, is ultimately a productive one theologically. Ezekiel's most profound claims about the human condition emerge from this paradox.

B. Signs of the Judgment (12:1–24:27)

12:1–23:49. Signs and Announcements of Judgment

12:1–17:24. Signs, Oracles, and Metaphors About the Nature of Israel's Failure and Obligations to God. The material in chs. 12–23 is an uneven mixture of poetry and prose. Dense allegories and sign actions intersperse with prose accounts of Israel's history. This analysis will be able to highlight only some of these chapters.

After a prophetic sign-action designed to emphasize that the events of the exile are at the instigation and under the control of God (12:15–16), attention once again focuses on the leaders of Israel: they are the primary target of the Lord's withering judgments in Ezekiel. God will punish those prophets who have misled the people into believing that all would be well, "who . . . saw visions of peace for [Jerusalem], when there was no peace" (13:16; cf. 13:10). Other prophets, this time specifically women, are also indicted for victimizing the people for their own economic gain (13:17–23).

In ch. 14 it is the elders' turn to hear a word of judgment. This theme of responsibility runs like a melody through Ezekiel (it appears in chs. 3; 14; especially in 18; and 33). In ch. 14 the prophet receives a divine word about the nature of Israel's accountability: in stark contrast to the situation in Gen 18:23–33 where Abraham argues with God about the number of righteous persons needed to save Sodom (the golden number is ten), in Ezekiel there is no golden number. The presence of even the most legendary righteous persons (Noah, Daniel, Job) will not save the people; righteous individuals (what few there are) will save only their own lives. The drumbeat of Israel's accountability for its sins beats steadily throughout the book, of which ch. 14 is but one example, yet another drumbeat, in apparent countertempo, also beats throughout the book: although the people are entirely accountable, they also are incapable of improving their situation on their own.

Even though ch. 23 appears in the next section, it is best addressed in conjunction with ch. 16 because they both portray Israel's history of sin in an extended allegory that is highly sexualized, even pornographic. There are two trajectories in recent interpretation of these chapters. First, ancient and modern readers alike have been offended by these chapters, and recently women scholars have drawn attention to the dangers of these difficult passages: the sexualized violence perpetrated against these metaphorical women seems to authorize male violence against real women, which is a serious, widespread, and ongoing global tragedy. Second, some scholars have suggested that the feminization of Israel depicted in these chapters is related to real experiences of victimization at the hands of imperial powers: being overrun by a massive army is emasculating, figuratively, and perhaps also literally as well.

It is entirely appropriate to be concerned about the effects of these texts on real women and yet still to ask how this appalling imagery functions in Ezekiel as a whole. These images are designed to shock those hearing or reading them. Ezekiel believes his audience to be suffering from a spiritual complacency and listlessness that can only be blasted away by rhetorical strategies that turn their theological assumptions upside down. In chs. 16 and 23, Ezekiel simultaneously depicts God as faithful and Israel as rapaciously and inherently unfaithful, worse even than the nations around her (see Ezek 5:7). Through these offensive images, Ezekiel helps his reader pay attention to the depth of the problem facing the people, who will not be able to save themselves.

The idea of self-loathing as a form of selfknowledge was introduced above regarding ch. 6, and the language of shame functions similarly here when, at the end of ch. 16, God promises a future deliverance (16:53–54, 60–63). Although it may be perplexing for modern readers, for Ezekiel feeling ashamed is part of the divine restoration and mercy; and the people will only begin to experience their shame once they are made new and are back in the land. For Ezekiel this kind of shame is not toxic, but restorative; it is a form of self-knowledge. To experience this kind of shame is to penetrate all the self-deception in which human beings tend to wrap themselves, to see themselves as God sees them. Thus, one of the hallmarks of the new identity of the restored people will be the self-knowledge resulting from the shame they experience.

18:1–23:49. More on the Nature of Israel's Failure and Obligations to God. Many scholars have been interested in ch. 18 because it seems to move from an understanding of corporate responsibility, that is Israel's dominant way of thinking about accountability, to an understanding of responsibility as accruing to an individual, which is a more modern way of thinking. Thus, for a time in scholarship, Ezekiel was thought to have initiated a fundamental shift toward individualism. But this reading has not stood up to scrutiny.

Ezekiel is instead disputing a view apparently widely held by his audience: that their own generation, the one currently suffering the disastrous punishment of exile, is not responsible for what is happening to them. Their view is that their ancestors sinned, and now they are suffering the consequences (18:2). The idea that the consequences of sin are transmitted generationally is not unbiblical—indeed it is prominently expressed in the Pentateuch (Exod 34:7; Lev 26:39–40; Deut 5:9). Ezekiel's position in ch. 18, which stands in some tension with these pentateuchal texts, is that each generation is responsible for its own sins—the exilic generation cannot get off the hook by blaming their parents and grandparents for their current predicament (18:4).

This text also affirms the possibility that at least some Israelites are capable of repentance (18:27–28). Indeed God exhorts the people: "Get yourselves a new heart and a new spirit!" (v. 31). The implicit theological anthropology assumes that people are capable of changing their behavior, their orientation to God, themselves, and the world around them. Yet, in other places in the book (e.g., chs. 16; 20; 23; 36; 37), it is precisely the people's incapacity to change themselves that is affirmed. So, twice God promises to give the people a new heart and a new spirit, a gift that will enable them to obey the torah (36:26–27; cf. 11:19) and, in ch. 37, the details of this promise are literally enfolded. The book wrestles with the tension between these views, but ultimately Ezekiel leans toward the idea that fundamental change in human moral agency must be a unilateral saving action on God's part. Yet even so, the paradox remains: human beings are entirely responsible for their sins even as they are incapable, without divine help, of fundamentally changing their situation.

In keeping with the more deterministic half of this paradox, ch. 20 offers a strikingly revisionist account of Israel's history with God (which is also in keeping with the grim allegorical readings of Israel's history in chs. 16 and 23). Many of Israel's prophets recall Israel's beginnings, its time in Egypt and the wilderness, as the golden "honeymoon" period when God and the people were in right relationship with each other, before the people fell into unfaithfulness (Hos 9:10; Isa 1:21, 26; Jer 2:2). Ezekiel's early history of Israel is at odds with the corporate memory of these other prophets: the version Ezekiel offers is one of Israel's unremitting failure from its very beginnings in Egypt (20:8). There was no honeymoon period; the people—every single one of them (v. 8)—have been incapable of faithfulness from the very outset. Forged in the fires of the exile, Ezekiel's reading of Israel's history is unlike that of any other biblical writer: it is a tale of unfaithfulness because the human condition is such that people can strive for obedience but they can never attain it.

As enigmatic and disturbing as it is, the divine pronouncement that God "gave them statutes that were not good and ordinances by which they could not live" (v. 25) underscores the total corruption of the human condition. Earlier in the passage God's gift of life-giving laws is affirmed three times (vv. 11, 13, 21), and Israel's incapacity to obey those life-giving laws is repeatedly decried. The "not good" laws they obey, however—in fact, perversely, the only laws the people obey are the ones that do not give life! The mystery of this verse (why would God give laws that were "not good"?) cannot be fully resolved, but the verse serves Ezekiel's purposes in that it emphasizes the hopelessness of the human condition under the present circumstances.

Ezekiel is not usually known for his emphasis on social justice, but his indictment of the way violence and oppression are wielded against the powerless is actually quite pronounced, as is evident in other chapters. In ch. 22, Ezekiel makes it especially explicit that violence (22:3, 6, 9, 12, 25, 27), the abuse and oppression of the weak (22:7, 10, 11, 29), and unjust economic practices that exploit the poor (22:7, 12, 13, 25, 27, 29), are all violations of what lies at the heart of covenant faithfulness and will not be tolerated—they are as serious as the idolatry and cultic violations with which Ezekiel is customarily more closely associated.

24:1–27. Two Signs Summarizing Israel's Predicament

24:1–14. The Filthy Pot and the Intractability of Sin. It is appropriate to highlight the two halves of ch. 24 because together they cogently summarize Israel's predicament and the divine judgment that has been proclaimed in the book up to this point. Once again, Ezekiel uses two highly symbolic, enigmatic images to communicate God's judgment: a filthy pot that cannot be cleaned (24:1–14) and sign-actions following the death of the prophet's wife (24:15–27).

On the day that the siege of Jerusalem is announced (24:2), Ezekiel is commanded to share an image with Israel ("the rebellious house" [24:3]) in words that echo a variety of phrases from the first half of the book, thus encapsulating in one metaphor many imagistic features of Ezekiel's judgments. The judgment apparently begins benignly, with a kind of cooking song (vv. 3b–5) that seems to confirm in the minds of its hearers the privileged relationship between Israel and the Lord. The Jerusalemites, and particularly those left in the city after 597, are the "good pieces" in the cooking pot (v. 4).

But this "happy cooking song" version of reality is vigorously disputed in the first rejoinder that follows (vv. 6–8). The messenger formula introduces a scathing indictment of the perspective espoused in the song: "Woe to the bloody city, the pot whose rust is in it, whose rust has not gone out of it!" (v. 6). Rust might be better translated as "corruption," and the question arises: what is corroded, the pot itself or the meat in it? Putrid meat is easily dumped out; a diseased pot poses a more serious problem. As the rest of the passage bears out, the corruption appears to be internal: the metal itself is corroded, rendering the pot useless for any purpose; the corrosion is intractable.

On the face of it, v. 7 poses a logical problem by simultaneously making two apparently contrary assertions: that "the blood she [the city] shed is inside it" and that "she placed it [the blood] on a bare rock." How is the blood both within the pot and placed on the rock? Just as in the vocative "Woe to the bloody city" (v. 6), the meaning of blood in this passage is multivalent: it refers both to the blood that Jerusalemites have shed, that is, violence, but also to the blood that contaminates and defiles according to the Priestly worldview. Once the blood (of the meat) has been poured out on the rock, the blood (violence) is still embedded in the pot as part of its corrosion. The blood here recalls the blood of the infant (actually the mother's blood) in ch. 16, and the blood of the menstruating woman (22:10), both of which are defiling. Blood, with its connotations of both faithless violence and impurity, functions a peculiarly appropriate image for the type of corruption that Ezekiel ascribes to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Instead of pouring out her blood on the ground and covering it, the pot/city has poured it out on the bare rock. This surely refers to the levitical law requiring the blood of an animal to be poured out and covered with earth (Lev 17:13). Israel's failure to comply with this basic law symbolizes the totality of its covenantal failures. In a literarily fitting retaliation for this sacrilege, Yahweh will spill their blood upon a bare rock (v. 8).

A second rejoinder (vv. 9–13) to the cooking song of vv. 3b–5 follows the first rejoinder of vv. 6–8. The second rejoinder is not a continuation of the first; rather each one offers a distinctive view of the pot, changing the angle of the lens in order to emphasize different aspects of the image. In the first rejoinder, the blood that is in the pot— seemingly permanently—is highlighted (vv. 7–8), whereas in the second it is the corrosion of the pot itself that takes over and dominates the rest of the rejoinder (vv. 11–13). Indeed, the first words of this second rebuttal announce that the disease of the pot is still within it. Thus what connects the two rejoinders is not so much the image of the pot, but the repeated emphasis on the intractable disease of the pot. Ezekiel picks up on the image of the pot's inherent corrosion in his refutation, and, by the end of v. 13, obsesses about its recalcitrant filth in the manner of Lady MacBeth.

When the contents of the pot have burned away, the pot is left on the fire empty, in a vain hope that its corruption will finally burn off (v. 11). But the disease inherent in the pot will not dissipate, becoming a source of deep frustration and weariness to God. "In vain I have wearied myself; its thick rust does not depart" (v. 12). By this time a slippage has occurred in the way the original metaphor of the pot and meat has evolved. In ch. 11, the people saw themselves as the meat and Jerusalem as the pot (11:3), and this division seems to have held true in the first rejoinder (the people, like the meat, were being emptied out by deportation, but the city itself remained). Although it is the pot that is addressed in v. 13, and therefore ostensibly the city and the people are conflated here. Thus the apparent distinction between the people and the city (cited in ch. 11), in the end, collapses. And if this distinction collapses, then the traditional belief in the inviolability of Jerusalem must also collapse, for the second rejoinder heralds the destruction of the city itself, since both the meat and the pot are to be destroyed.

With this image of the people's inherent and permanent wickedness that not even God seems able to correct, the passage forcefully yet poignantly summarizes the first twenty-four chapters of the book. The location of the disease within the substance of the pot itself (and not something that is stuck to the pot) suggests that to Ezekiel's mind the people's wickedness, the disease of their being, is inherent in them. And this disease within the nature of the people is permanent in that not even divine cleansing can remove the corrosion. Something more radical is called for, which is here envisaged as a complete expression of the divine fury (v. 13b), resulting in the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet in the same breath, Ezekiel hints that a different future lies ahead, in which the city will be cleansed of its disease ("you shall not again be cleansed until . . ."). But, as is frequently the case with Ezekiel, it is not clear how the movement from a disease to health will actually occur. Ezekiel is seeking to convince his hearers of the ineradicable truth that Jerusalem will be destroyed. The naive hope of the exiles that they might return to the city, and the even more naive hope of the present inhabitants of Jerusalem that they might escape punishment, must be exposed as false. Underlying this rhetorical strategy is an implicit belief that the people are indelibly wicked, diseased, like the pot.

24:15–27. Prohibition on Mourning and the Human Condition. The sign-act in 24:15–27, involving the death of Ezekiel's wife, and its interpretation are in some ways the last word of judgment against Israel before the oracles against the nations and the words of hope that mark the second half of the book. The power of the divine word here relies on an analogy between the death of the prophet's wife and the death/destruction of the city of Jerusalem. Most commentators on this passage understand Ezekiel to be prohibited from engaging in the customary mourning rituals following the sudden death of his wife (vv. 16–17), an act of suppression that serves as a sign in the second half of the passage (vv. 21–27)—that the Israelites too will be prohibited from ritually expressing their grief over the loss of the Temple, as well as the loss of their children. But why prohibit mourning a loss so deep? The answer is intimately connected to Ezekiel's struggle to articulate the problem of human nature and what he views as its inherent defectiveness. Ezekiel understands the people's love and desire to be once again misdirected (within the book, Ezekiel never depicts the people's desire as appropriate)—but here he leaves open the possibility that their love might one day find its true object, i.e., God.

A classic critique of the pervasive Temple theology is evident here. The people idolatrously placed their confidence in this "stronghold," and now Yahweh will be the one to destroy that confidence along with the Temple. While the passage relies on the wife/Temple analogy for its power, the language describing the people's feelings for the Temple suggests an intensity of feeling that is not present in the description of Ezekiel's feelings for his wife. The people's passion for the Temple is extreme, as the piling on of appositional phrases suggests ("the pride of your power, the delight of your eyes, and your heart's desire" [v. 21]). If these are indeed the passionate feelings of Ezekiel for his wife and even more so of the people for the Temple, then their anguish at the loss of wife and Temple respectively must be equally intense. Yet Yahweh wills that such intensity of feeling not be permitted traditional expression. Neither the prophet nor the people are allowed to perform the customary rituals mourning the dead, nor are they even allowed to weep. Every customary human action expressing loss, and especially the conventional rituals of structured mourning, are actions denied both prophet and people.

Understanding mourning and weeping as distinctively human behaviors is important for seeing the contrast to what follows. In v. 17, the prophet is commanded to "Groan softly [NRSV: Sigh, but not aloud]; make no mourning for the dead." The type of groaning this verb envisions is the primal, inarticulate groaning of the wounded (Jer 51:52; Ezek 26:15) or the equally primal groaning of those who react viscerally to the abominations in the Temple (Ezek 9:4). The primal nature of this type of noise contrasts with the now prohibited, but structured, "mourning" (sapad) from the previous verse. This is made quite explicit in the subsequent clause: "make no mourning for the dead." "Mourning" ('ebel) here includes all of the conventional mourning customs from the beginning to the end of the mourning period. Inarticulate "groaning" is permissible, then, but formal mourning is not. A quiet primal moan is allowed, but nothing that might provide a structure within which the prophet and people might make sense of their overwhelming experience of loss.

Those actions that might provide a framework within which the prophet could assign meaning to his wife's death are prohibited (v. 17). Human beings are meaning-makers, but it is specifically this human desire for meaning that is excluded here. The accrual of prohibitions against specifically human activities, however, suggests something beyond the simple withdrawal of human structures for interpreting experience. It goes further to evoke a process by which the prophet is dehumanized; he is stripped of those features that make him human. The prophet must confront loss without those structures of meaning that human beings need in order to interpret their complex experience. Instead, the Lord requires him to have the complex experience, but withdraws the means of interpreting it: he feels the loss of what he loved, but is incapable of anything but inarticulate groaning.

And so it will be for the people when Yahweh pollutes the object of their desire, the Temple. The language becomes even more vivid. Like the prophet confronting the death of his wife, the people, faced with the loss of their beloved Temple, will "not mourn or weep" (v. 23). But new elements appear here that were absent earlier. Not only will there be no customary mourning ritual, but the people shall "rot" (nemaqqotem; NRSV softens to "pine away") in their iniquities. This verb is elsewhere used to describe the decaying and festering of organic substances (Ps 38:6; Isa 34:4; cf. Lev 26:39; Ezek 4:17; 33:10). The image of organic decay evoked by this verb in 24:23 contributes to the sense that the people are undergoing a process of dehumanization—they are literally decaying. The very last phrase of v. 23 intensifies this effect. As they decay, the people will "groan (nehamtem) to one another." The English translation disguises a significant difference between this type of groaning and the groaning in v. 17. With the earlier verb (he'aneq), the sound was animallike in its inarticulacy, but the attested subjects of the verb were human. By contrast, the verb in v. 23 almost always occurs with non-human subjects (e.g., animals, the sea). This choice of verbs is thus crucial: now the people will be rotting away and groaning explicitly as animals groan. The progressive dehumanization of the people, and of the prophet as a sign to the people, has now reached its completion.

What is the point of prohibiting mourning rituals? Why this diminishment of the human to what is less than human? For punishment alone, or for some larger purpose? Ezekiel continually reiterates that all of God's actions have one goal: so that the people may know God. But how does the stripping away of human categories of meaning here serve this end? How does the resulting emotional chaos help the people gain knowledge of God? For Ezekiel, the people's love/desire for the Temple, intense as it is, is misdirected. They loved the Temple, but they failed to love the One whom the Temple represents. The only cure for this, in Ezekiel's view, is radical indeed: it is a process by which the people are stripped of what makes them human, reduced to an animal-like state.

Strong emotions related to the death of a loved one require ritual acts of mourning in order to rein in the potential chaos of uncontrolled emotions. Yet Ezekiel skewers the Israelites' tendency to make order out of chaos for its naive self-sufficiency; it leaves no room for the activity of God. This critique of the human propensity for order is reminiscent of the divine speech in Job, in which Job's desire for structures of value and meaning is contrasted with the chaos represented by Leviathan. In Ezekiel the stripping away of orders of value and meaning to the point where people resemble animals embodies the unstructurable, unorderable elements of the cosmos. For Ezekiel, human-generated categories are closing the people off, shielding them from knowing the presence and activity of God. Eliminating these meaning-making forms leaves the people with the chaos of their raw emotion, and so prepares them to receive the activity and knowledge of God. The Israelites' tendency is to resolve their grief over the Temple too easily and only by means of their own ritualized mourning, a mourning in which God is not an active player. Their reduction to an animalistic state allows them to feel their loss with all its attendant pain. The irresolvability of their grief leaves open a space for the radical action of God, space that was previously closed off in the wellordered culture of ritualized mourning.

This is a very hard ethic. The necessity of being denuded of precisely that which makes us human cannot, should not, be integral to anyone's theology. Having examined this austere logic, should one not reject its claims? Possibly, but not without first considering what insights it might reveal. Ezekiel relativizes all human categories of meaning—they are inadequate and insufficient to deal with reality, and they deny the radical action of God. For Ezekiel, only through a progressive dehumanization can the people be prepared for new life. Nothing of the old nature can be retained. Later in the book (ch. 37), the re-creation of humanity can only be initiated after the people are declared dead—they are brought to new life with nothing of the old life remaining except their bones. The people must be crushed so low that they no longer seek piecemeal solutions for their desperate situation, such as setting their hearts on the Temple, or mourning its loss in the usual, customary ways. The symbolic ordering of experience (religion, culture) must be violently disturbed before the people can perceive the divine action that ultimately seeks to restore them to their full humanity.

II. God's Judgment of the Nations (25:1–32:32)

A. Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia, Tyre, Sidon (25:1–28:23)

As in many other prophetic books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Amos), Ezekiel includes a set of chapters in which judgments are directed at nations other than Israel. These chapters appear to be directed at seven different nations, yet it is clear that the nations themselves are not the real intended audience at all (nor was Ezekiel in a position to present these oracles to them!): it is Israel in exile who is to "overhear" these judgments and to be comforted by the knowledge that God, despite the harsh judgments in the first half of the book, has not abandoned Israel to its enemies, but rather is holding these nations responsible for their actions just as Israel is held accountable for its failures.

What word of hope is this that consists of bad news for a neighboring country, albeit a historic enemy? Yet this is not an opportunity for smugness on Israel's part. Rather, God's judgment of the surrounding nations demonstrates that the Lord is sovereign over all lands, that God is in control of historical events that, to Israel's eyes, seem to be spinning out of control. The oracles against these nations signal that God's will is unfolding, and Israel's fate is therefore not subject to the whims of any nation. For the exiles, this is a word of hope. But the hope is mixed with warning. The foreign nations are judged for their economic and military ambitions, for their overweening pride, and for the idolatry that undergirds it all (this is particularly true for Tyre, Sidon, and Egypt). Israel cannot but observe that divine judgment for these failings is both swift and complete.

Israel's immediate neighbors (Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Philistia, 25:1–17) appear first among the seven nations. They are smaller than the nations further along on the list, and neither their presence on the international scene nor their transgressions are as prominent as those of Tyre, Sidon, and especially Egypt, which is the subject of the fiercest expressions of divine wrath. Significantly, Babylon nowhere is judged, though it is the dominant imperial power of the moment, has deported the exiles—Ezekiel's audience!—to its own lands, and is about to destroy the Temple along with Jerusalem. Ezekiel understands Babylon to be operating at the Lord's behest; that empire does not act independently but only as the means by which God punishes Israel (in much the same way as Isaiah understood Assyria to be an agent of the divine will in the eighth century BCE).

The small but economically prosperous island city-state of Tyre, situated off the coast of Lebanon, is the subject of a lengthy judgment, followed by an ironic, mocking lamentation over its fall (26:1–21; 27:1–36). These are immediately followed by a lengthy proclamation against, and subsequent mocking lament over not the city, but the king of Tyre (28:1–10, 11–19). Why does the small kingdom of Tyre get such lengthy treatment? Tyre had become very prosperous from its seafaring merchant economy and, according to the prophetic accusation, therefore set itself above other nations, subtly claiming to be a seat of the gods. The prophetic judgment skewers this claim, and with a high degree of literary artistry employs a metaphor that Tyre might use to understand itself (as a great ship carrying a grand cargo) in order to reveal the city's true fate—to be crushed and destroyed as even the finest ship will be by a powerful storm.

Sidon, a city on the Phoenician coast just north of Tyre, is often paired with the great island city-state, which perhaps explains its role here as recipient of a very brief and generic accusation and proclamation of judgment (28:20–24). Worth lifting from this short oracle is the divine motivation: God acts so that all people will perceive rightly the holiness of God. For Ezekiel, divine action, whether of judgment or deliverance, always occurs in order to reveal the holiness and the glory of God. Part of the problem with the nations, as with Israel, is their failure to perceive and respect the chasm that differentiates the unholy human realm of ambitious self-interested politics and avaricious economic scrambling from the unfathomable holiness of God.

B. An Explicit Word of Hope for Israel (28:24–26)

The oracles against foreign nations, so characteristic of the prophetic material, have long been understood as implicit words of comfort to Israel. But here, when the first six of the seven nations subject to judgment have been identified and accusations against them enumerated and decisions rendered, Ezekiel inserts an explicit word of hope: "The house of Israel shall no longer find a pricking brier or a piercing thorn among all their neighbors who have treated them with contempt" (v. 24). Thus the previous chapters, laying out the charges that God holds against Israel's enemies, are explicitly understood as signs of hope for Israel: God is sovereign over these foreign nations, and God is still, in spite of everything, for Israel.

This brief, but important, message of comfort concludes with a promise that in the future Israel will dwell securely in their land (repeated twice in v. 26), the same land from which they have been forcibly removed and which is currently under foreign occupation. The idea of living securely, in safety, is one Ezekiel repeats eight more times in chs. 34–39 to describe Israel's future. They will once again build houses, plant vineyards, and enjoy the life of shalom that comes from being in right relationship with God and with one another. Their neighbors will no longer threaten them. Ezekiel discloses a glimpse of this future of safety without spelling out the details of how such a future will be realized. The details of how to get from the despair of exile to this vision of new life in the land remain murky.

The placement of this expression of comfort is odd. It occurs, as a kind of summary of the meaning of the oracles for Israel, after the judgments against six of the seven nations. Why doesn't it come after the final nation, Egypt, has been targeted for divine accusation and punishment (chs. 29–32)? Of the seven nations, Egypt receives far and away the most attention (half of the total number of chapters), yet the summary statement of the meaning of the oracles comes in the middle of the set, not at the end. I suspect that the function of the oracles against the first six nations is precisely to comfort Israel—its enemies will be punished; God acts on Israel's behalf still. But the oracles against Egypt do not serve this purpose and thus the summarizing message of 28:24–26 would be ill-placed at the end of ch. 32, despite appearances to the contrary. In Ezekiel's mind, Egypt serves a much more complicated, tortured, and unique relationship to Israel than any of the other nations.

C. The Special Case of Egypt: Israel's Double (29:1–32:32)

While Egypt—the nation out of which Israel first emerged as a people via the exodus—is the focus of the second half of the oracles against nations, the nation has appeared before in the book. Indeed, the revisionist history of ch. 20 focuses obsessively on Israel's time in Egypt as the crucible in which Israel's (mal)formation as a people took place. Chapter 23 likewise reveals an unusual fixation with Egypt and its decisive, torturous effect on Israel's corporate identity. Ezekiel zeroes in on Egypt and its Pharaoh with four chapters of relentless, scathing judgment oracles. Why such an intense negative spotlight on Egypt?

The most obvious answer is that during the period Ezekiel is writing, Israel turned to Egypt repeatedly as a political ally in the ultimately futile hope of avoiding Babylonian hegemony. But something deeper is going on than the customary prophetic repudiation of political alliances that demonstrate a lack of trust in the Lord. Ezekiel returns repeatedly to Egypt, in chs. 17, 20, 23, and then relentlessly in chs. 29–32. As he describes Egypt's failings, and Israel's failings in connection with Egypt's failings, the line between Israel and Egypt grows fuzzier. Israel begins to look much like Egypt, which for Ezekiel is symbolized by the primordial chaos monster (29:3–7). Egypt's idols become Israel's idols, Egypt's corrupt ways, Israel's corrupt ways (20:7, 8, 16, 18, 24, 31, 39; "So I will put an end to your lewdness and your whoring brought from the land of Egypt; you shall not long for them, or remember Egypt any more," 23:27). Furthermore, the announcement that God will "scatter" Israel among the nations (11:16; 12:15; 20:23; 22:15; 36:19; cf. the sheep in ch. 34) is echoed by a promise to "scatter" Egypt (29:12; 30:23, 26). And where God will "gather" Israel back together after such scattering (11:17; 20:34, 41; 28:25), so Egypt too will be gathered (29:13–14) after having been scattered (albeit as the lowliest of nations).

Ezekiel seems to understand Egypt as a kind of double for Israel, a dark "other self" through which Ezekiel explores the underside of Israel's identity—the part of Israel that troubles Ezekiel's God so: the proud, faithless idolaters with rapacious appetites (esp. ch. 23). By subtly identifying Israel with Egypt in this way, Ezekiel works through what he perceives as Israel's deepest flaws, and then by casting Egypt down into the pit of Sheol (32:17–32), Ezekiel symbolically binds and controls the part of Israel's character that too closely resembled Egypt. Egypt, the chaos monster who unleashed chaos within Israel's very identity and who has haunted Israel since the exodus, is finally brought under the sovereign control of the Lord.

III. God's Transformation of the Covenant People and Return of the Divine Presence (33:1–48:39)

A. After Disaster, Signs of Hope (33:1–35:15)

33:1–33. The Fall of Jerusalem

As the first half of the book prepared for the destruction of Jerusalem (through ch. 24) and struggled to express the reality and meaning of divine absence in Jerusalem, so now the second half of the book, beginning in ch. 25 with the first oracle against a foreign nation, but gaining more focus in ch. 33 and following, looks toward the restoration of Jerusalem, the Temple, and the return of the divine presence into the heart of Israel's life. More specifically, ch. 33 is a hinge chapter between the two halves of the book. Chapters 34–37 announce the transformation of Israel, both land and people; chs. 38–39 develop the claims of chs. 25–32 by announcing God's victory over all other powers, even cosmic ones. All of this is by way of preparation for the return of God's glorious presence to Jerusalem and for a new Temple (chs. 40–48).

As a hinge chapter, ch. 33 points back to the first half of the book with its unrelenting judgment and also toward the future, since the tragedy of Jerusalem's fall no longer looms as it did in the first half of the book, but is now announced as something already accomplished. Chapter 33 is related directly to ch. 3. First, Ezekiel's responsibility to be a sentinel for the people, warning them of the impending divine judgment, is reiterated (see 3:17–21). As in ch. 3, the emphasis on the prophet's responsibility to warn the people that God does see and judge is part of the drumbeat of human responsibility running throughout the book. The prophet's responsibility is a model for the people's responsibility explicitly articulated in vv. 10–20: as the prophet is responsible to God for his actions, so the people are responsible to God for their actions.

A second connection to ch. 3 concerns the prophet's ability to speak: where Ezekiel's mouth had been shut in 3:26, God now opens it, thus inaugurating a new phase in his ministry. This startling reversal occurs at the precise moment when the news of the fall of Jerusalem reaches Ezekiel and the exiles in Babylon (33:21–22). The date in the text suggests that the news of Jerusalem's fall in July 587 reaches Ezekiel in January of 586, so in the twelfth year of the exile of the first round of deportees. The meaning of the prophet's temporary muteness from ch. 3 until ch. 33 has been much debated. After all, Ezekiel has been quite vocal during the intervening chapters! It seems that while Jerusalem and the Temple still stood, the prophet was authorized to speak the deity's words announcing the coming judgment and the reasons for it, but was prohibited from speaking any words of hope because the Temple had become a false symbol of divine presence. Now, with the Temple fallen and any misconceived notion of having captured God's presence in Jerusalem fallen with it, Ezekiel may now speak genuine words of hope for the future to his fellow exiles, based not on false claims to control God's presence and action in the world, but on God's will to transform the people (chs. 34–37) and to return in glory to Jerusalem (chs. 40–48).

But first, any notion the remaining survivors in Judah may harbor that they are somehow entitled to restoration (relying on cheap grace, v. 24) is here disabused, as Ezekiel affirms that all of Judah and Jerusalem will be decimated and laid waste (vv. 27–29). Why such harsh judgment at this particular moment, on the cusp of a new era of hope? While it seems excessive at first glance, to scathe Israel without remainder at this moment serves an important function: it eliminates any lingering, vestigial thought that some remnant of the old Israel will continue into the new era. On the contrary, nothing is left of the old people or land (even the mountains will be desolate, v. 28), and thus God will have to start anew, re-creating both land and people from scratch. This final announcement of the irrevocability and totality of the judgment bears theological implications: the people and even the land are too corrupt, too damaged (see the pot in ch. 24) to be repaired; what is required is re-creation de novo, a completely new beginning, a divine transformation of the human condition, creating the possibility for a new relationship between God and humanity.

The chapter ends with a revealing vignette of life in exile, of the challenges facing Ezekiel as he seeks to convey the divine word to a people finally unable to hear it. They seem willing to attend to what the Lord might be saying through the prophet ("Come and hear what the word is that comes from the LORD," v. 30), but the words do not sink in ("they hear your words, but they will not do them [NRSV, obey them] v. 31). The people do not act upon the prophetic words because "lust is in their mouths and their heart goes after unjust gain" (v. 31b, a more literal translation than NRSV, "for flattery is on their lips, but their heart is set on their gain"). The lust and the unjust gain both denote conditions where something normal has been carried to an abnormal excess (uncontrolled desire; profit gained by violence). While the following verse suggests that the word 'agabim is something lovely and pleasant, in this verse it denotes something lovely and pleasant that has been carried to such an extreme that it is worthy of condemnation (lust). Both the people's speech (external behavior) and their heart (internal disposition) are distorted by excess desire.

Because inordinate desire is in the people's own mouths ("lust," v. 31) their hearing is impaired and they consequently hear only what they want to hear, which, not surprisingly, is the same thing which is on their own lips ("lust," v. 32). They hear a song of sensuous lust because that is what they hear coming from their own mouths; it sounds very beautiful to them (v. 32). In v. 32 they listen to the prophet's words, which are harsh words of judgment, but they do not, cannot, accurately perceive the negative as negative. The distortions of normal human behavior (profit and desire become greed and lust, respectively) have in turn distorted the people's capacity to understand correctly what they hear and see.

This is another occasion where Ezekiel's implicit view of human motivation is apparent. This text, along with others, notably chs. 16 and 23, suggest that the people seek primarily the fulfillment of their own desires. For Ezekiel, however, human desire is never depicted as normal; on the contrary, it is always excessive and monstrously out of control. This is unusual in Israelite traditions. In Deuteronomy, just to take one example, desire has a proper role when it is directed toward God ("You shall love the LORD your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might," Deut 6:5). But Ezekiel does not speak in these terms; the language of love, whether divine or human, is missing from the book—it is an appropriate motivating force for neither God nor human beings.

As in the earlier passages dealing with the prophetic vocation (2:5, 7; 3:11, 27), whether the people are capable of hearing the prophet's words or not is irrelevant to the prophetic call in ch. 33. The judgment, that is, the events the prophet proclaims in his words, will take place irrespective of the people's response ("When this comes—and come it will!" v. 33). It is at this moment, "when it comes," that the people "shall know that a prophet has been among them." This sequence of events bears a curious consequence for thinking about time in Ezekiel. The whole point of the prophetic mission cannot be understood from the point in time of the prophet's speaking; it can only be understood from a vantage point in the future, once the events to which the prophet refers have taken place. At that time, the people will be able to look back on the past and understand that the prophet had been sent by the Lord and had been speaking the Lord's words. This is why Ellen Davis views Ezekiel's writing as marking a shift away from the oral and toward the textual, toward an archival function. The word of God can no longer be frustrated by one generation's inability to hear it; the text will wait until a generation comes who can hear its word(s). Thus the purpose of the prophet's activity is not to bring about a change in the people's behavior in the present, but to instill a particular kind of knowledge in them in the future.

34:1–31. False Shepherds and the True Shepherd

While ch. 33 marks the shift from judgment toward hope, that hope is not unalloyed. Rather it is mixed with judgment in chs. 34 and 35. Or, to be more precise, hope for the people as a whole is inherently connected to judgment of particular groups who have wielded power abusively and stand under God's judgment. Such is the case for Israel's leaders in ch. 34 and their neighbors to the southeast, the Edomites, in ch. 35.

Ezekiel takes up the classic Israelite metaphor of the people of Israel as sheep, with shepherds representing Israelite kings (e.g., 2 Sam 5:2; Jer 3:15; 10:21; 12:10), as well as other leaders (e.g., 2 Sam 7:7; Isa 44:28; Jer 17:16). In Ezekiel, it seems that the shepherds refer to Israelite kings, but also more broadly to other members of the ruling elite (those who wield political, religious, and economic power). The indictment, laid out in 34:1–8, is not simply that the powerful have been tending to their own needs instead of the needs of the people, but that they have been using the sheep for their own unjust gain—the failure is not one of neglect, but of abuse: "You eat the fat, you clothe yourselves with the wool, you slaughter the fatlings; but you do not feed the sheep" (34:3). This particular accusation has appeared repeatedly in the book, that the political, economic, and religious establishment use their power for their own gain, at the expense of those whose interests these elites are supposed to serve (22:12, 13, 27; 33:31).

The accusation acquires even more specificity: Israelite leaders have not healed the sick, bound up the injured, or gone in search of the lost sheep (34:4). The metaphor of the shepherd is powerful because of the range of duties of an effective shepherd: not simply to herd and feed the sheep, but to tend them all, the vulnerable and lost as well as the strong, with care and compassion. Instead of tenderness, those in power in Israel have ruled with "force and harshness."

The result is that the sheep, God's people, have become prey to wild animals (34:5) and are scattered over all the earth without the protection they should expect from a shepherd (34:6). This indictment suggests that due to not only incompetent but also malign leadership, the people have been subject to economic and political injustice and violence, as well as the incursions of foreign powers. The responsibility for the "scattering" of the people over the earth, that is, the exile, is also here clearly laid at the feet of Israel's leadership (as opposed to the widespread belief among Ezekiel's audience that Yahweh's defeat at the hands of foreign gods explains the exile).

The judgment on these actions begins in v. 10 and is shocking in its imagery: "I will rescue my sheep from their mouths, so that they may not be food for them." Again, the reader is startled to imagine these shepherds as guilty not of neglect, but of the outright villainy of exploiting their power and authority for their own pleasure. They do not feed the sheep, they eat the sheep. This situation is even more dire than the one depicted in Matt 9:36, where the sheep suffer with no shepherd at all; there they are "harassed and helpless." Better to have no shepherd than the ones Ezekiel describes!

More startling still is what comes next: "I myself will search for my sheep, and will seek them out" (34:11). Through the shepherd metaphor, God is revealed as one who searches for a people who are scattered and lost (v. 12), brings them home again (v. 13), nourishes them with good food and a healthy environment (vv. 13–14), and heals them by binding up their wounds and strengthening the weak and vulnerable (v. 16). In v. 16 the metaphor shifts: where the elite had been cast as the malevolent shepherds, now with God as the shepherd the powerful become the strong, fat sheep who will not escape punishment because they made life miserable for the leaner, weaker sheep (vv. 17–22). The governance of this divine shepherd, who is both compassionate to the vulnerable and committed to justice for the oppressors, provides a stark contrast to life under Israel's leaders.

The image of God as the one to shepherd God's people with compassion and love is, of course, present elsewhere in Scripture, most famously in Ps 23 and in John 10, where Jesus is depicted as the good shepherd. The relationship of the various OT texts to each other is uncertain, but the imagery in Ezek 34 was very likely a resource for the writer of John 10. Not only do a number of parallels appear (the bad shepherd/hired hand, the vulnerability of the sheep to predation, etc.), but in both texts the role of shepherd passes from God to a trustworthy vice-regent, one who can care for the people as God would care for them. In John this is Jesus, of course, whereas in Ezekiel this is "my servant David" (vv. 23–24)—a more muted messianic hope than those expressed elsewhere in the prophets, especially in Isaiah, where the messianic figure is a king of the Davidic line. Ezekiel does not understand this shepherd as a king, but as a prince (nagid). Not only is Ezekiel's terminology less politically fraught, but it expresses the need to imagine a shepherd/leader to care for the sheep/people who is not a king (since the disastrous leaders included Israel's kings), but who still represents God's commitment to the house of David.

35:1–15. Judgment on Mount Seir (Edom)

The transition from the promises to Israel of a compassionate shepherd, with its renewal of covenant relationship with God, to the judgment on Mount Seir, in Edom, seems abrupt. What does one have to do with the other? The judgment against Edom is especially puzzling since an oracle against Edom already appears in 25:12–14 with all the other oracles against foreign nations. The oracle in ch. 35 is sandwiched between the promises to Israel in ch. 34 and the promises to Israel in ch. 36, a strange arrangement. Of course, the oracles against nations also serve as implicit promises to Israel, but still, why Edom, and why here?

First, Edom is one of Israel's neighbors who apparently took most advantage of Israel's dire situation at the time of the first Babylonian incursions by actively participating in their destruction (vv. 5, 10). They are accused of nurturing an ancient grudge, verbal abuse (v. 12), and acting from hatred and envy (v. 11), all of which evokes the brotherly rift between Jacob and Esau (Gen 25:22–23; 27:41–45; 32:4–22; 33:1–16; Amos 1:11–12), the eponymous founders of Israel and Edom, respectively. Edom's actions toward Israel (saying, e.g., "They are laid desolate, they are given us to devour," v. 12), and toward God ("you magnified yourselves against me with your mouth," v. 13) are all the more egregious for being, in a sense, within the family.

So Edom's attitude and behavior toward Israel are particularly heinous, but still one may wonder why this oracle against Edom appears here. The key lies in the connections between this oracle, against Mount Seir in Edom, and the promises to the mountains of Israel in ch. 36. Judgment against Edom's mountains and promises to Israel's mountains are an implicit connection, but that connection becomes explicit in 36:5: "I am speaking in my hot jealousy against the rest of the nations and against all Edom, who, with wholehearted joy and utter contempt, took my land as their possession, because of its pasture, to plunder it." The language of punishment against Edom ("I will make you a perpetual desolation, and your cities shall never be inhabited," 35:9; repeated in vv. 3, 4, 7, 14, 15!) is repeated as a promise to Israel: it is precisely Israel's "desolate wastes and . . . deserted towns, which have become a source of plunder and an object of derision to the rest of the nations all around" (36:4) that will once again become lush and populated (36:34, 35, 36). Edom will suffer the same fate that they inflicted on Israel, even as Israel's land will become abundant once again.

One final detail is worth noting: Edom is accused of claiming Judah and Israel for itself, even though the Lord was there (35:10). Three words ("Yahweh was there") appear almost as an afterthought here, yet they subtly express one of Ezekiel's main claims: that though the Lord is not constrained by Israel to "be" in the Temple in Jerusalem, neither is God absent from Israel even at its most desperate moment. God can be in Babylon with the exiles (ch. 1) as well as in Israel when all appears to be death and destruction. And the claim that God was present at one of Israel's darkest moments anticipates the claim of eternal divine presence with which the book concludes (48:35).

B. Transformation of Land and People (36:1–37:28)

36:1–38. The Re-Creation of Land

To understand the promises to the mountains of Israel, one must return to the judgment against the mountains in ch. 6. There the Lord announced that the mountains would be stripped bare and laid waste, that they would undergo a kind of erasure, becoming a tabula rasa. The totality of that destruction recalled that of the primeval flood— nothing was left. Now the promise is to renew the land, in fact, to re-create it all over again. The language of creation that saturates chs. 36 and 37 only makes sense when one recognizes that for Ezekiel human identity (as it was previously conceived), along with the land itself, have been wiped away. The intensity and extent of the eradication—its totality—is not simply a function of the intensity of the divine wrath. Rather, from Ezekiel's point of view, nothing of the old is usable; God must start from scratch. A new earth and a new humanity are possible, but only by the unilateral action of God that begins the work of creation all over again. In chs. 36 and 37, God acts not simply to renew Israel and the land, but to re-create them entirely. Chapter 36 has the recreation of both people and land in view, whereas 37:1–14 famously focuses on the rebirth of the people alone. Both are deeply connected.

Of particular interest is the creation imagery present, especially in 36:8–11. Although the vocabulary is not identical, the imagery is very similar to that found in the creation accounts of Gen 1–3:

But you, O mountains of Israel, shall shoot out your branches, and yield your fruit [cf. Gen 1:11, 12, 29] to my people Israel when they draw near to enter. See now, I am for you; I will turn to you, and you shall be tilled [cf. Gen 2:5, 15; 3:23] and sown [cf. Gen 1:11, 12, 29]; and I will multiply human beings [cf. Gen 1:22, 26, 27, 28] upon you, the whole house of Israel, all of it; the towns shall be inhabited and the waste places rebuilt; and I will multiply human beings and animals upon you [cf. Gen 1:24–26; 2:20]. They shall increase and be fruitful [cf. Gen 1:22, 28; 9:1, 7] and I will cause you to be inhabited as in your former times, and will do more good [cf. Gen 1:4, 10, 12, 14, 18, 25, 31] to you than ever before. Then you shall know that I am the Lord. (author's translation and emphasis)

The italicized words reflect vocabulary and images found in the Genesis accounts of creation. The promise in v. 11 is particularly striking: "I will cause you [i.e., the mountains] to be inhabited as in your former times and will do more good to you than ever before." The language of the goodness of creation is echoed here, but with the twist that this new creation will be better than the first one, which, as Genesis 1 was at pains to claim, was not only good, but very good (Gen 1:31; emphasis added). For Ezekiel, the new creation really must be better than the first one if all the dismal history of failure, idolatry and torah violation are not to be repeated. This new creation has to be better than "very good."

With the mountains restored, the second part of ch. 36 turns to God's creation of a new humanity. Not surprisingly, the Priestly language of purification is important (v. 25), but the metaphor shifts in the next, oft-quoted verse: "A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and I will remove from your body the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh" (v. 26). The result of this divine surgery is that the people will be able to obey the torah: "my spirit I will set within you, and I will make it so that in my statutes you walk and my ordinances you keep and do" (v. 27, author's translation). Although the original creation was good, it was not good enough, in Ezekiel's view. Now the unilateral action of God to re-create human beings results in their new capacity to live as God's people (v. 28); it was precisely that capacity that was lacking in the original human nature.

The rest of the chapter returns to the image of the land as newly fruitful: an abundance of grain, fruit, and other produce removes the threat of famine (vv. 29–30), and the land will once again be tilled as it was in the original garden of Eden: "This land that was desolate has become like the garden of Eden; and the waste and desolate and ruined towns are now inhabited and fortified" (v. 35). This new land is an Eden for this new people.

37:1–28. The Re-Creation of People and Nation

Much has been said about the dry bones in 37:1–14, probably the most famous passage in Ezekiel, and certainly one that has nourished Jewish and Christian faith communities for millennia. Immediately one realizes that this passage expands in great detail the concise promise of 36:26–27 (and 11:19–20) that the people will be made new by the gift of a new heart and a new spirit, indeed the very spirit of God. In much the same way that the imagery in ch. 36 recalled other Israelite creation traditions, so 37:1–14 also evokes God's first creation of humankind: the spirit/ breath/wind of Yahweh animates this people, created from the dust of their bones instead of the dust of the earth.

The passage depicts the corporate re-creation of Israel. As God's people, Israel has died, which explains the totality of the destruction language elsewhere in the book, and the presence of the birth imagery in the re-animation of the bones here. John Kutsko, in claiming that the process of revivification in Ezek 37 uses imagery of human creation, cites its similarities to Job 10, where Job accuses the deity of destroying what God had made:

"Your hands fashioned and made me;
and now you turn and destroy me.
Remember that you fashioned me like clay;
and will you turn me to dust again? . . .
You clothed me with skin and flesh, and knit me together with bones and sinews." (Job 10: 8–9, 11)

Kutsko cites this text, with its birth imagery, to argue that what Ezek 37 describes is in fact a new birth. God redeems Israel from death by birthing a new Israel. This act of re-creation, not quite ex nihilo, but certainly from bones alone, transforms a people who were previously incapable of obedience into a people—now for the first time!—capable of obeying the torah, of living in covenantal relationship with God. No simple resuscitation, this rebirth morally and spiritually transforms the people into something new.

The form of the vision mirrors its content. This is no static image; rather, it leaps across the imagination of the hearer in a dynamic movement. Four elements of this movement are worth noting. First, the inadequacy of the old self has led to its death. The description of the bones as "very dry" (v. 2), the people as "slain" (v. 9), and the Lord as bringing the people up from their graves (v. 12, 13) all make clear that the old self is quite literally dead. Second, the importance of knowledge is reiterated when Ezekiel announces that God possesses knowledge that he, Ezekiel, does not have (v. 3). This helps to align Ezekiel with his audience, which both lacks knowledge and is surely incredulous at the possibility of life for these bones. Yet, when the people are made new, they will have the crucial knowledge of God's identity (vv. 6, 13–14) and power. The rhetorical goal of this whole vision, as in so many other places in Ezekiel, is to instill this knowledge in the people.

Third, the new human creation is incomplete with only the sinews, flesh, and skin; it requires a new spirit to give it life (vv. 8–10). And finally, as in 36:27, the spirit that gives life must come from God (v. 14), in keeping with the idea, negatively articulated in the first half of the book, that human beings do not have it within themselves to regenerate; new life must come unilaterally from God. The inpouring of the divine spirit is not a mere restoration of a previous existence, but a transformation of the very character of the people. The mistakes of the past will not be repeated because the old self will be replaced by a new and improved self, filled with the knowledge of God.

At the moment when the bones come together, there is a tremendous shaking (ra'ash, the NRSV's "rattling"; cf. Ezek 3:12; 38:19). The Septuagint calls it a seismos, an earthquake, recalling the thunderous seismos that shakes the foundations of the earth when Jesus breathes his last (Matt 27:51; cf. 28:2). It is the sound of life coming out of death. Of course, the people initially find the notion of new life from death ridiculous. "Our bones are dried up, and our hope is lost; we are cut off completely," they say (v. 11). Their imaginations are crippled in that they think death is always an end, not a beginning. Certainly the god they have tried to control (through their Temple rituals, their belief that God would always be in the Jerusalem Temple) would not be able to do much about their dry bones. But Ezekiel holds up for them the vision where death becomes the occasion for new life. They rise as a vast multitude, transformed and animated by the very breath/wind/spirit—ruach—of God, to become the people of God, now ready to embody God's covenantal justice for the sake of the world.

This is an absurd vision—it defies all logic. How can Ezekiel make such a vision compelling to the withered imaginations of his audience? Walter Brueggemann speaks of the prophetic task as precisely one of re-imagining, of slicing through the layers of numbness that encase us, to pierce our self-deception, "so that the God of endings is confessed as LORD." How does Ezekiel do this?

He does not do it by rational argumentation, by appealing to the people's reason. Instead, Ezekiel affirms the absurd by offering them an image that re-organizes their view of reality. While he has an important role in the vision itself, speaking the words that bring the bones to life, it is a curiously passive role, one devoid of ego. Ezekiel does not function here as the quintessential prophetic messenger, as one who bears God's words aimed at a particular audience: "Thus says the Lord GOD." Rather Ezekiel stands with his audience, aligned with them, and points to the image without advocating for its truth value. He simply shares with them the vision that he saw of what God is doing, making a new creation, forming a new people for God's mission in the world.

As one can see in so many passages in the book, the old Israel—people and land—have been destroyed because they were not capable of being God's covenant people—that is Ezekiel's ghastly message. Yet that corporate death makes it possible for God to intervene decisively in their catastrophic freefall and to make a way for them to once again be the covenant people. Understanding Ezekiel's claim in this way helps to make sense of what otherwise seems to be needlessly horrific and unrelenting judgment language in the book.

The second half of chapter 37 (vv. 15–28) seems anti-climactic. Indeed, of the myriad interpretations of the dry bones passage, very few continue into the second half of the chapter. Yet the two halves are connected, for where the people are created anew as God's people in the first half, in the second half that people, historically divided into two separate nations, are permanently reunited and gathered back into the land.

Two features of the passage are especially important. First, unlike his previous circumspection in speaking of a future Davidic leader (in 34:24 David is the promised "prince"), Ezekiel here emphatically promises reunited Israel a king (37:22) who will be in the Davidic line (37:24, though he is again dubbed "prince" in the following verse). So although heavily muted in Ezekiel, the messianic promise of an endless reign of just kings who will also be shepherds does make its quiet appearance in Ezekiel ("they and their children and their children's children shall live there forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever" (v. 25).

Having been newly transformed by the spirit of God, this people will now be able to "follow my ordinances and be careful to observe my statutes" (v. 24). What had been Israel's struggle and its failure, keeping the torah, is now firmly asserted. Infused with the spirit of God, a new people is equipped for a new life.

As in 34:25, when God promised a covenant of peace (berit shalom) to the "sheep," here the Lord renews the promise to make with this new people an everlasting covenant of peace (v. 26). The relationship between God and God's people will be devoid of strife when God acts to bless and multiply the people, and promises to be present in the sanctuary forevermore (v. 26). It is possible to envision such a covenant of peace only when it is God who makes it, not the people. It is a glorious vision of the divine-human relationship, but it is one in which human beings are strangely passive. It is characteristic of Ezekiel in the latter part of the book to conjure a vision of the future that is gloriously re-created and made new, complete with a newly transformed people of God, but it is almost always one in which human beings have almost no active part. Ezekiel cannot imagine a "covenant of peace" in conjunction with an active human will; bitter experience constrains his imagination on this point.

C. God's Final Triumph over All External Threats (38:1–39:29)

These chapters read quite differently from all that has preceded, or indeed, that follows them. They are widely considered to be proto-apocalyptic because in their description of the Lord's defeat of a distant, symbolic figure (Gog of Magog) and his massive army of allies, there is no effort to establish these events within history, and Israel's role is to remain patient and trust in the sovereignty of God over all forces. It is Yahweh who summons Gog to battle, ironically with the goal of inflicting a massive defeat on this epitomic, fierce enemy bent on Israel's destruction. While markedly different in style and tone from the other material in the second half of the book, Yahweh's defeat of Gog and defense of Israel vividly underscore God's commitment to Israel's protection, and God's power to make good on that commitment. The ultimate goal, from the divine perspective, is for all nations to perceive the sovereignty and holiness of Yahweh. In this sense, although the Gog pericope can be sharply distinguished from the rest of Ezekiel in terms of its literary features, it stands in thematic continuity with what precedes and follows it.

In the depiction of Gog of Magog and his devastation of Israel and subsequent defeat by Yahweh, three elements are of particular interest. First, the Israelites are depicted as living a very subdued and peaceful existence in the land. Indeed they are described as the "quiet ones, living in safety, all of them" (38:11, author's translation). The Israelites are essentially bystanders in what is depicted as a massive military spectacle. This depiction of the people as placidly watching events unravel by the hand of Yahweh may be contrasted to Ezekiel's portrayals of the people's previous history, when they themselves raucously and dangerously made history (e.g., chs. 16; 20; 23). The people's new disposition to trust God in quiet tranquility thus distinguishes them from their old selves. On this day the people live quietly and safely, acting only when the word of Yahweh compels them to do so, not on their own initiative (such as burning weapons and burying enemies, 39:9, 12).

The second element of note in these chapters is the recurrence of shame language at the end, which leads to self-knowledge. In the final section (39:21–29), a truncated summation of exile and return, the first several verses (vv. 21–24) give the reasons for exile, followed by, beginning in v. 25, a description of the quality of life in the restoration. It is a time of reconciliation: Yahweh will show mercy to the whole house of Jacob, bringing it out of captivity (v. 25). This mercy paradoxically means that the people will experience shame: "They shall bear [NRSV wrongly says "forget"] their shame, and all the treachery they have practiced against me, when they live securely in their land with no one to make them afraid" (v. 26). As noted before in the discussion of chs. 6 and 16, the knowledge of self afforded by a searing experience of shame is prerequisite to a renewed life with God.

The third element of note is related to selfknowledge: it is the knowledge of God. Using proto-apocalyptic elements, these chapters reflect a concern for Israel's restoration in so far as they highlight the vital importance of both Israel's and the nations' knowledge of Yahweh (38:23; 39:6, 7, 13, 21, 22, 27, 28). In this respect, the Gog episode is in keeping with chs. 33–37 and 40–48, where the knowledge of God as a goal of divine action is reiterated. The recognition formula appears seven times in these two chapters—more densely than anywhere else—thereby linking these chapters closely to the rest of the book. As elsewhere, the recognition formula reveals a concern for a moral, spiritual, and thus holistic knowledge of God (as opposed to merely cognitive knowledge). With the defeat of Gog, who represents any and all enemies Israel might ever have, both the nations and Israel will come to a knowledge of Yahweh that will transform the way they understand themselves in relation to the deity and to one another—it will be life-changing knowledge.

D. The Final Temple Vision—Divine Presence Restored (40:1–48:35)

40:1–43:11. Tour of the New Temple and Return of the Divine Glory

Ezekiel's book began with a vision of the presence of the Lord (chs. 1–3), continued with a vision of the departure of that presence (chs. 8–11), and now ends with a vision of God's return to a transformed Temple and a transformed people (chs. 40–48). Another way of putting it: At the beginning of the book one learns that God is not in the Temple but on the move (ch. 1), then Ezekiel is taken on a tour of the Temple to find out the reasons for God's absence (chs. 8–11), and now the prophet is taken on another Temple tour, this time one which reveals the Lord's return. Thus the promises of divine return and restoration, offered throughout the book (e.g., 20:40–44; 37:23–28), are now realized. With this vision, the drama of presence and absence is complete. The vision forms a fitting conclusion to the "story" that began in the first chapter with Ezekiel's overwhelming encounter with God by the Chebar canal.

Many interpreters understand the legislation in these final chapters to be casting itself as a second giving of the divine law, with Ezekiel in the role of Moses. Thus the vision forms a fitting sequel to the new creation of people and land promised in chs. 36–37. This pattern of new creation followed by new law further supports the idea that Ezekiel believes the life of Israel must begin all over again, with a new human identity capable of fulfilling the new laws. Only with a new humanity on a regenerated land is God's continuing presence both possible and assured.

The vision is dated to 573, about fourteen years after the fall of Judah and about two years before the end of Ezekiel's prophetic career. The nature of the material in chs. 40–48 has been the subject of much discussion, without winning anything approaching unanimous support. The attention to detail is certainly in keeping with Ezekiel's Priestly background (and vividly recalls the construction of two other divine places of indwelling—the tabernacle in Exod 25–31; 35–40 and Solomon's Temple in 1 Kgs 6–7). Most interpreters concur that the temple described in the vision is not meant to be a blueprint for the actual Temple that was rebuilt in Israel around 520. Rather, as Susan Niditch argues, the vision functions more as a verbal icon—it symbolically orders and categorizes the world, much in the way that Gen 1–11 symbolically orders the world and allows the viewer to see the transcendent. Like that earlier creation account, Ezekiel's vision conjures a new world ordered by hierarchy and work roles, geographic boundaries, and the divisions between peoples and places, which make for a coherent map of reality. This world is marked by harmony between God and humanity (so like the Priestly Gen 1, but unlike the non-Priestly Gen 2–11), a harmony established by the reordering of sacred time and space and sustained by meticulous attention to the new laws of the Temple.

The vision offers Ezekiel's audience a symbolic picture of the future that is hopeful because it is centered on God's life-giving presence. As throughout the book, God's presence or "glory" (Heb: kabod) is not construed as passive or static; rather the presence of God is always active, demonstrating God's desire to be in relationship to God's people, whether expressed in acts of judgment or of deliverance. In the final vision, the Temple is first restored (40:1–42:20), making possible the return of God's kabod to the new sanctuary (43:1–11). In the next section, Ezekiel receives the instructions (the torah of the Temple, 43:12) for how people will live in such a way that their sin does not once again drive God from the sanctuary (43:12–46:24). The return of God's life-giving presence described in 43:1–4 literally gives life to the land (see 47:1–12) and restores the relationship between people and land to a healthy interdependence, undergirded by their mutual dependence on God's presence. The final part of the vision describes, with the Priestly concern for detail characteristic of the whole vision, the boundaries of this newly fertile land (47:13–48:35). The last line encapsulates one of the book's major themes, the presence of God, by concluding with a new name for the city: "The LORD is There" (48:35).

This first section (40:1–43:11) recounts the prophet's tour of this new Temple, as he is guided by an ethereal man equipped with a linen cord and a measuring reed, the presence of which testifies to the significance of order and precision in the new creation. The details of the arrangement of space in the new Temple, seemingly arcane to most readers, are designed to create a buffer between the sacred and the profane: a core goal of this new space is to protect the holiness of God from the contaminating potential any human activity may bring. God departed the Temple in ch. 10 because it had become too defiled to host the presence of a holy God any longer. Ezekiel 43:8 explains that part of the problem was the architecture itself of the first Temple: "In their setting of their threshold by my thresholds, and their post by my posts, and the wall between me and them, they have even defiled my holy name" (author translation). The walls were just too thin to maintain the appropriate boundaries between holy and that which defiles. The new Temple architecture addresses that danger: it has multiple layers that protect the holiest inner sanctum like layers of an onion, beginning with an outer wall that is about ten feet high and amazingly, equally as wide.

Ezekiel witnesses the divine return to the Temple in 43:1–11, and he is careful to connect it to his two other encounters with the divine kabod recounted in chs. 1–3 and 8–11 (43:3). While several promises of God's future presence appear in the book, here that promise is at last realized: "I will reside among the people of Israel forever" (43:7, 9). Yet, one may well wonder how Ezekiel imagines this harmonious relationship between God and the people to be sustained, given the unmitigated disaster of Israel's history. However, God created the people anew, gave them a "new heart" and a "new spirit," and infused them with God's own spirit (37:14)—this will make it possible for the people of God to obey the torah and live in covenantal faithfulness with the Lord.

There are not a lot of people in this last vision, which suggests that Ezekiel is not too sure how it will all work out "on the ground." It seems that Ezekiel is very concerned about the capacity of human beings to destroy the paradise envisioned, and steps must be taken to avoid this eventuality. Throughout the final vision, for example, the behavior and even the movement of human beings are severely restricted (e.g., ch. 46 prescribes precisely how the people are to enter and exit the Temple, never exiting whence they entered [46:9–10]). Those groups chosen to lead the restored Israel are those who were among the least guilty in the past (the Zadokites), while those deemed especially at fault are demoted (the Levites; 44:10–16). The people themselves play no significant role in the new Temple because their sins were so egregious in the past. The dearth of people is thus meaningful in and of itself: Ezekiel is deeply concerned not to let human actions result in a repeat of Israel's disastrous history.

One way to prevent problems is to hit the theme Ezekiel has drummed many times: knowledge, both of God and of self. For Ezekiel, knowledge of God and self is the necessary prerequisite to any right action. In the final vision as elsewhere in the book, the people cannot faithfully be the people of God until they know themselves and know their God. The task of both priest (44:23) and prophet (40:4; 43:10–11) is to convey knowledge to the people because it is knowledge that will shape their moral understanding of the new reality and their place in it. The new humanity does not obviate the need for a sacrificial system—Ezekiel retains the cultic system, much as the priests had conceived it, which is in some tension with his claims elsewhere that the new heart and new spirit infused by God will make the people obey divine commands (36:27).

As elsewhere (chs. 6; 16; 38–39), shame plays a vital and positive role in forming the new moral identity of the people of God; it is a means of liberating self-knowledge. The order of events is important: "When they are ashamed of all that they have done, make known to them the plan of the temple" (43:11). For Ezekiel, the self-knowledge facilitated by an experience of shame—the internal realization and acceptance of the people's responsibility for the past—is a prerequisite for receiving the knowledge of the divine plan for a harmonious future relationship with God. Without true understanding of the past, a different future is not possible.

43:12–46:24. The Torah of the Temple

The tour of the Temple has been moving progressively inward, peeling the "onion" of the Temple layers, each layer growing in holiness. In this middle section of the vision, Ezekiel and his guide arrive at the altar, which is described with meticulous attention to detail and is followed by directions for its consecration and purification (43:13–26). At the end of seven days, the altar is ready, and divine favor is bestowed (43:27). The gate by which the Lord enters the Temple is shut (44:2–3), so that no one else may enter by that same way, again preserving the necessary space between holy and profane. Yet for Ezekiel the closing of this door also symbolizes the fulfillment of God's promise to reside amongst the people forever; its sealing means that God will never again depart from the Temple—the closed door is a potent architectural sign of the hope at the core of Ezekiel's Temple vision. Ezekiel also devotes considerable attention to the Temple personnel, with the stock of the Levites falling and that of the Zadokite line of priests rising (44:4–31). Unifying the various directions concerning the holy district, weights and measures, offerings, festivals, and assorted other commandments (45:1–46:24) is the Priestly focus on holiness and appropriate boundaries, but also a pronounced concern for economic justice (45:8–9, 10–12; 46:18). The future will not be marked by the voracious, uncontrolled appetites and resulting oppression that characterized the past.

All this detail and precision is entirely in keeping with the Priestly framework in which Ezekiel operates. But it also testifies to a strained desire for the control that meticulous order confers, a desire to address the threat posed by any potential chaos (and Israel's history suggests to Ezekiel that there is enormous reason to be concerned!) with a maximum of control and regulation. The detail and precision in Ezekiel's vision bespeaks a regulated architecture of hope, that is, the orderliness and structure of the Temple vision work to guarantee that what happened before—human sin contaminating the holiness of the Temple—will not happen again. For Ezekiel hope lies in sound architectural plans, good construction, precise directions for building use, and crucially, really thick walls. For him, God's power and promise are reflected in the closed door, in the thick walls that allow God to be present amidst the people.

There is an irony here. One of Ezekiel's indictments of Israel was its attempt to control God by Temple rituals, by its misplaced trust that God would not desert the Temple (see discussion for chs. 8; 12). The Israelites' rage for order in a chaotic world had become an impediment in their relationship to God, yet is Ezekiel not trying the same gambit here? The Temple vision projects a world in which order and structure are the keys to salvation—they will reconcile God with God's people.

Nonetheless, for Ezekiel a key difference separates the Israelites' efforts to control the Lord, and the "regulated architecture of hope" in the last vision: the problem with the false hope that the people clung to through order and structure was that that order and structure was of their own making. In the Temple vision, Ezekiel transfers the order and structure to the architecture of the Temple itself—for Ezekiel this is a source of genuine hope. Moreover, the similarity between the people's sin in trying to control God and Ezekiel's effort to regulate the future through precise architecture, reveals unresolved issues in the book. The strained precision of Ezekiel's ending discloses his continuing ambivalence over human identity, his doubt that even God's action can recreate people in such a way that the threat to the holiness of God, and thus to the continuation of the divine-human relationship, can be adequately defused. The tidiness of Ezekiel's ending belies the unresolved conflicts that characterize the rest of the book. He wants everything to be wrapped up neatly in a "happy marriage" between people and deity.

The ending of Ezekiel is not only about order and containment, however. In the midst of so much measured, static imagery, one immeasurable, extremely dynamic, image bursts forth: the water that flows from the sanctuary itself, bringing life to everything around it (47:1–12).

47:1–48:35. The Effect of the Divine Presence on the Land

Water gushes out of the Temple (47:1). This crucial aperture in the Temple contrasts sharply with the otherwise restricted space and movement in this exact and exacting structure. Not surprisingly, given the role of measurements in the rest of the vision, the first half of the passage (47:1–6) describes the mysterious guide's efforts to measure the water, with prophet in tow. The measurements suggest that the water begins gently—the disruption of the closed sanctuary surface is only a small one—but it gathers tremendous force once outside of the sanctuary. At first, the water is only ankle deep, then knee deep, then up to the waist, and finally too deep to cross. The impassibility is repeated twice in one verse: "it was a river that I could not cross, for the water had risen; it was deep enough to swim in, a river that could not be crossed" (47:5). This gushing water—a potent symbol of God's saving power—is the only immeasurable thing associated with the Temple. Initially just a trickle, these waters gushing forth from the Temple to revivify the land are simply too powerful to be appraised by a yardstick (so /to speak). "Do you see, mortal?" the guide asks (47:6, author translation)—do you see that what God is doing now can neither be contained nor measured by instruments or calculations? This is God's healing power on the loose, unleashed from the Temple, now on the same side of the Temple wall as the people.

The second half of the passage conveys the way the river revivifies both land and sea—"everything will live where the river goes" (47:9). The creation vocabulary of Genesis is prominent here—a withered world is re-created by the life-giving water, in much the same way the withered bones were re-created by the life-giving breath/wind/spirit of God in ch. 37. The growth that the water initiates is also immeasurable: "a great abundance" of trees and fish, in "many" kinds (47:7, 9, 10; cf. the dry bones in ch. 37). Here precise measurements cannot express the immense hope unleashed by the torrent of the life-giving river.

The salvific action of divine water (ch. 47) and breath (ch. 37) cannot be quantified; the imprecision of their description indexes the power of God, in much the same way that the imprecise language of Ezekiel's vision of God in ch. 1 discloses the divine power and transcendence. Ezekiel's ending thus contains and reveals some of the same tensions stirring under the surface of the rest of the book: hope for the future is manifest in the controlled environment of the Temple, but also in the dynamic power of God to burst through the Temple walls and heal both land and people with an incalculable flow. The hope embodied in the quantifiability of the Temple measurements thus stands in some tension with the unquantifiable power and reach of both the healing water (ch. 47) and the life-giving breath (ch. 37).

After the land has been made fertile in this way, Ezekiel ends the book by describing its equitable distribution (47:13–23; 48:1–29). The land is apportioned without regard for geography, topography or hierarchy (other than the necessity of appropriate boundaries to keep the Temple holy); the principle of distribution is equality. Thus the end of the book recalls the Jubilee year, with its ample provision for all (Lev 25). In the very last verse, the city, peopled by God's newly formed people on God's newly formed land, is renamed: "The LORD is There" (v. 35). So Ezekiel's last words proclaim that the Lord dwells in this place, banishing all the sins that have plagued the people and that Ezekiel has so forcefully catalogued in earlier chapters. Gone forever are the violence, oppression, and idolatry; in their place God and God's people are bound together in a covenantal life of justice, equity, and peace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. Block. The Book of Ezekiel. 2 vols. NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); W. Brueggemann. The Prophetic Imagination (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); E. Davis. Swallowing the Scroll: Textuality and the Dynamics of Discourse in Ezekiel's Prophecy. JSOTSup 78 (Sheffield: Almond, 1989); M. Fox. "The Rhetoric of Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of the Bones." Hebrew Union College Annual 51 (1980) 1–15; R. W. Jenson. Ezekiel. Brazos' Theological Commentary on the Bible (Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2009); P. Joyce. Ezekiel: A Commentary. Library of HB/OT Studies 482 (London; New York: T&T Clark, 2007); J. Kutsko. Between Heaven and Earth: Divine Presence and Absence in the Book of Ezekiel (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 2000); J. Lapsley. Can These Bones Live? The Problem of the Moral Self in the Book of Ezekiel. BZAW 301 (New York: W. de Gruyter, 2000); . "Doors Thrown Open and Waters Gushing Forth: Mark, Ezekiel, and the Architecture of Hope." The Ending of Mark and the Ends of God: Essays in Honor of Donald Harrisville Juel. B. R. Gaventa and P. D. Miller, eds. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005); A. Mein. Ezekiel and the Ethics of Exile (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); S. Niditch. "Ezekiel 40–48 in a Visionary Context." CBQ 48 (1986) 208–224; M. Odell. Ezekiel. Smith & Helwys Bible Commentary (Macon, Ga.: Smith & Helwys, 2005).

DANIEL

MATTHIAS HENZE

OVERVIEW

The apocalypse is a form of revelatory literature. It is governed by the view that salvation from this alien and threatening world is possible only through the revelation of divine secrets. These secrets include information about the end of time, which is thought to be imminent, and about a new eon, a perfect reality that awaits the faithful and that will replace this imperfect and broken world. These divine secrets are typically transmitted by an angel to an individual chosen by God to receive and to record for future generations what he has learned.

The book of Daniel is such an apocalypse. In it, Daniel is told "what is inscribed in the book of truth" (Dan 10:21). An interpreting angel appears to Daniel and explains that he has come to help Daniel understand what will happen to all of Israel "at the end of days" (Dan 10:14). And even though the angel strengthens Daniel physically and interprets for him his apocalyptic visions, in the end even Daniel has to concede, "I heard but could not understand" (Dan 12:8). The words and their ultimate meaning remain a secret until "the time of the end" (Dan 12:4).

Not all modern readers will be comfortable reading an apocalypse, a text which, according to its self-understanding, is esoteric rather than exoteric. The fact that in the modern world apocalypses have become the domain of extremist millennial movements does not make apocalyptic literature any more endearing. But a book like Daniel should be read on its own terms. Then the reader will discover that Daniel is not so difficult to understand after all, that this is not a violent text of fire and brimstone but a book deeply rooted in the prophetic tradition of ancient Israel that gives encouragement and hope to its readers. The attentive reader will immediately notice that the book of Daniel readily falls into two halves, the cycle of court legends about Daniel and his three companions in chs. 1–6, and Daniel's apocalyptic visions in chs. 7–12. The two parts are connected in several ways. Dreams are an important vehicle for divine revelation, for King Nebuchadnezzar in chs. 2 and 4 and for Daniel in chs. 7, 8, and 10–12; and the division of the last installment of history into four kingdoms is introduced in ch. 2 and then repeated in ch. 7. But there are also important differences between the two parts. The predominant theme of the cycles is the life of the Jews in the Diaspora and the question of how they can preserve their Jewish identity and still make a career at the foreign court. The encounter of the Jewish and the non-Jewish world is amicable. Also, there is nothing apocalyptic in chs. 1–6. All this changes dramatically in the second half of the book. Daniel begins to have visions in which Gentile empires turn into apocalyptic beasts (ch. 7), and the main topic now is the eschaton, that is, the fate of Israel in the end time.

The biblical narrator is explicit about when chs. 7–12 were composed. At the center of his attention one finds Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE), the Seleucid king who appears in Daniel either as "the little horn" (7:8, 11; 8:9–12, 22–25) or simply as "a contemptible person"

(11:21). In 167–164 BCE, Antiochus persecuted the Jews and profaned the Jerusalem Temple. The persecutions led to the Maccabean revolt, and scholars agree widely that Dan 7–12 was composed, and the book of Daniel reached its present form, toward the end of the revolt, possibly in the year 164 BCE. This makes Daniel the youngest book in the Hebrew Bible. The legends in chs. 1–6 are older and most likely circulated independently, possibly in smaller collections first, before they were added to the visions, possibly by the same circles who composed the visions. The tales now introduce Daniel and explain why God chose this wise and righteous man (cf. Ezek 14:14; 28:3) to be the recipient of the apocalyptic lore.

The book of Daniel has been popular and influential in early Judaism and early Christianity, in spite of—or, perhaps, precisely because of—its esoteric nature. In the library of Qumran, home of the Dead Sea Scrolls, eight fragments of the book were discovered. The worldview and language of Daniel had been a major influence on the Qumran group and on its own thinking. Early Christians found in the son of man figure in Dan 7 a prophecy about Jesus, and so "Son of Man" has become a messianic title in the New Testament Gospels (Mark 2:27; Matt 8:20; 18:11).

OUTLINE

I. The Court Tales (1:1–6:28)

A. The Four Youth at the Babylonian Court (1:1–21)

B. Nebuchadnezzar's Dream: The Composite Statue (2:1–49)

C. The Fiery Furnace (3:1–30)

D. Nebuchadnezzar's Dream: Nebuchadnezzar's Madness (4:1–37)

E. Belshazzar's Feast (5:1–31)

F. Daniel in the Lions' Den (6:1–28)

II. The Apocalyptic Visions (7:1–12:13)

A. The Vision of the Four Beasts and the Son of Man (7:1–28)

B. The Vision of the Ram and the He–Goat (8:1–27)

C. Daniel's Prayer (9:1–27)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Court Tales (1:1–6:28)

The story of Daniel and his three companions stands at the beginning of the book and introduces not only the cycle of court legends in Dan 1–6 but the book as a whole. It may well have been composed specifically for that purpose. Chapter 1 introduces the book's fictitious setting, its main characters, and the central theme of the court tales: the youth have to negotiate how to preserve their Jewish identity while cooperating closely with, and indeed working for, the foreign monarchs at whose courts they serve.

A. The Four Youth at the Babylonian Court (1:1–21)

1:1–2. The first verses of the book connect the narrative of Daniel with the description of King Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BCE as found in the other books of the Bible (2 Kgs 23–25; Jer 39–45; 52). By telling the story of Daniel and his three friends, the biblical narrator gives the exiles a face and picks up the story where the historian in 2 Kgs 25 left off. In a sense, the transition from 2 Kgs to Daniel is emblematic of the history of Judaism in general: for Daniel and his three companions, the temporary exile imposed by the Babylonian king has turned into a permanent Jewish Diaspora.

The date in v. 1 has long puzzled interpreters. The "third year of . . . Jehoiakim" is the year 606 BCE (2 Kgs 23:36–37), whereas Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem only in 597 BCE. Such historical inaccuracies are not uncommon in post-exilic Jewish legends (2:1; Jdt 1:1–6) and underscore the fictional character of the literature. Shinar is a traditional name for Babylon (Gen 10:10; 11:2; Zech 5:11).

1:3–7. The four youth receive a three-year training in the "literature and language of the Chaldeans" (v. 4), which is Akkadian. The term "Chaldean" either refers to the Babylonian courtiers as a professional group (2:4–10; 3:8–12; 4:7), or it is used as an ethnic designation for the Babylonians (5:30; 9:1; 2 Kgs 25:4; Jer 24:5; Ezek 1:3). As is customary in such situations, the youth receive new names (Gen 41:45; Esth 2:7), which, unlike the royal food rations they are given, they receive without any objections, presumably because they are able to keep their Hebrew names (2:17; the Prayer of Azariah).

1:8–17. Life in the Diaspora meant that dietary restrictions played an especially important role (Tob 1:10–11; Jdt 10:5; 1 Macc 1:62–63; 2 Macc 5:27; cf. Lev 11 and Deut 14). Daniel refuses to "defile himself" (v. 8). The concern for proper food clearly overrides any concern Daniel has about the Babylonian education and his Gentile name. The narrator emphasizes that the youth's health is God's doing and not the result of their diet.

1:18–21. The story ends as it began, with a chronological notice. The "first year of King Cyrus" (v. 21) is 538 BCE. Daniel 10:1 dates Daniel's final apocalyptic vision recorded in chs. 10–12 to "the third year of King Cyrus of Persia." The note in 1:21 anticipates that Daniel will outlast Nebuchadnezzar and serve monarchs from subsequent empires.

B. Nebuchadnezzar's Dream: The Composite Statue (2:1–49)

The story of Nebuchadnezzar's first dream (cf. ch. 4) introduces a recurring motif in the court tales, the contest between the Babylonian courtiers and Daniel. In this case, however, the Babylonian sages never threaten Daniel but, instead, benefit from him. It is only because of Daniel's unique ability both to tell the content of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and to interpret it that they are pardoned and are given their lives.

2:1–12. Since Daniel was trained for three years at Nebuchadnezzar's court before he was brought before the king (1:5, 18), he can hardly have interpreted the dream "in the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign" (2:1). It could be that Daniel is interpreting the dream while still in training, though it is more likely that the author of our story did not know ch. 1, which was added later as an introduction to the collection of court tales as a whole.

There are numerous reports in the ancient Near East about the interpretation of royal dreams (Gen 40–41), though no courtier is ever asked to recount the dream itself first. The impossibility of the task sets the stage for Daniel to shine and, more importantly, for the biblical narrator to make the point that the situation is resolved because of the God of Israel, not because of Daniel's gifts.

The chapter begins in Hebrew and switches abruptly to Aramaic in the middle of v. 4 (Aramaic in 2:4b–7:28; Hebrew in 11–12:4a and 8:1–12:13).

2:17–23. Nebuchadnezzar's dream is a "mystery" (2:19, 27–30, 47; 4:9), which only becomes intelligible when Daniel receives "a vision of the night" (2:19; 4:5; 7:1). The Aramaic word for the dream's interpretation, peshar (in 2:4–7; 4:18–19; 5:12; 7:16), in the library from Qumran is used for a special kind of biblical interpretation known as peshet.

Daniel responds with a prayer (vv. 20–23), a hymn in praise of the God of Israel, who possesses the qualities Nebuchadnezzar was initially seeking in his courtiers: he "reveals . . . hidden things" and "knows what is in the darkness."

2:24–45. Brought before the king, Daniel agrees with the courtiers that Nebuchadnezzar's demands are unreasonable (v. 27) but then adds that it is his God alone "who reveals mysteries" (v. 28; similarly Gen 41:16). The enormous statue is made of different metals of declining value, which represent four kingdoms: Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Greece (the "prince of Greece" in 10:20 brings the four-kingdom schema to its conclusion). The feet of iron and clay represent the Greek empire divided into Ptolemaic and the Seleucid kingdoms. The four kingdoms recur in ch. 7, though there the emphasis is on the succession of the kingdoms; they also increase in their use of violence rather than decrease in value.

The stone "cut out, not by human hands" (v. 34; see the similar phrase in 8:25) signifies the divine intention to destroy the kingdoms. Early Jewish and Christian interpreters have found in the stone a symbol of the messiah (Matt 21:42–44; Luke 20:17–19).

2:46–49. Nebuchadnezzar's euphoric response seems awkward, not least because Daniel has just predicted the demise of the Babylonian kingdom. Also, the Gentile monarch and tyrant now worships Daniel and even brings him offerings (v. 46). Jewish and Christian interpreters were at pains to explain Daniel's rather friendly and close rapport with Israel's archenemy. The episode demonstrates Nebuchadnezzar's acceptance of, and implied conversion to, the God of Daniel, who is the "God of gods" (v. 47).

C. The Fiery Furnace (3:1–30)

The motif of the conflict between the courtiers and Daniel's companions, introduced in the previous chapter, is here propelled to its extreme. The story is filled with gross exaggerations, used primarily for their satirical effect: the statue's proportions are gigantic (v. 1), the list of court officials is unnecessarily repeated verbatim (vv. 2, 3), the list of instruments appears multiple times (vv. 5, 7, 10, 15), the furnace is heated up seven times (v. 19), so that the executioners themselves die in its flames (v. 22). The tale is both hilarious and deeply revealing. It sharply contrasts Jewish monotheism with Babylonian idol worship, a popular theme in post-exilic literature—with deep roots in Isa 40–55—and ridicules the king's idolatry with much irony.

Daniel is conspicuous for his absence from the tale. Some scholars therefore hold that originally the story circulated independently and was only later incorporated into the cycle of stories about Daniel because of its thematic resemblance.

3:1–18. King Nebuchadnezzar erects a golden statue (Isa 40:19–20; Jer 10:2–4; Bel). The Greek historian Herodotus reported a massive statue of solid gold in a temple in the center of Babylon (History 1.183). Dedication ceremonies are well attested in the ancient world (1 Kgs 8:63; Neh 12:27), but the religious intolerance at the center of our tale is not. The accusation and interrogation of the three youth by the Gentile tyrant seems fabricated and provides the narrator with a formidable opportunity to have the three men bear witness to their God. Nebuchadnezzar's exclamation, "Who is the god . . .?" (v. 15), nicely captures his own presumptuousness.

The response of the youth (vv. 16–18) has long puzzled interpreters. Their reply, "If our God . . .

is able to deliver us" (v. 17), implies that they harbor some doubt whether their God is willing, or even able, to save them. By contrast, "the wise" in Dan 11–12 chose death, confident that they will be rewarded in the resurrection of the dead (see 11:33 and 12:3; also 1 Macc 1:62–63; 2:19–22; 2 Macc 6:27–28; 7:1–2).

3:19–30. Nebuchadnezzar comes across as a dullard, whose extreme emotional responses quickly shift from total rage to profound devotion in just a few verses. The religious intolerance toward the youth is simply replaced by another form of religious intolerance in the final decree (v. 29). Similarly, the transition from the king's fury in v. 19 to his astonishment in v. 24 to see four men walking in the fire seems rather abrupt, and so the Greek and Latin versions insert at this point the Prayer of Azariah, one of three Additions to Daniel. As in 2:49, the youth are promoted again in 3:30.

D. Nebuchadnezzar's Dream: Nebuchadnezzar's Madness (4:1–37)

Scholars have long assumed that the king of the story's original version was not Nebuchadnezzar but Nabonidus (556–539 BCE), the last Neo-Babylonian king and father of Belshazzar (the author of Daniel erroneously claims that Belshazzar is the son of Nebuchadnezzar; see chapter 5). Nabonidus spent ten years in Teima, an oasis in the Arabian peninsula, while his son Belshazzar served as regent. This assumption was then corroborated with the discovery of the "Prayer of Nabonidus" (4Q242), a fragmentary text from Qumran, in which Nabonidus relates how he was afflicted for seven years while praying to his gods of silver and gold (cf. 5:23), until an anonymous Jew cured him and told him of the God of Israel.

4:1–3. The story about Nebuchadnezzar's second dream is framed in vv. 1–3 and 34–37 by two doxologies (a doxology is a "praise of God"; cf. 6:26–27). The doxologies are expressions of Nebuchadnezzar's newly found faith and, at the same time, capture the main message of the stories: they demonstrate the absolute sovereignty of the God of Israel. Nebuchadnezzar, architect of the Babylonian exile, looms large in the collective memory of ancient Israel. By putting two doxologies in honor of the God of Israel into the mouth of Israel's archenemy, the biblical author strips the Babylonian villain of his gruesome qualities. Instead, the king becomes rather benign, even comical, and in the end turns into a faithful proselyte.

The chapter begins and ends as a first-person account of Nebuchadnezzar, a literary style known elsewhere from Neo-Babylonian inscriptions and letters, which here lends the story the character of a confession of faith. The story takes the form of a royal edict, sent "to all peoples" (v. 1; cf. 6:26), in which the king relates the story that provoked the two doxologies.

4:4–18. Whereas Nebuchadnezzar never told the diviners his first dream (2:5), he willingly gives Daniel a detailed description of his second dream. The "tree at the center of the earth" (v. 10) is a common motif in the ancient Near East, representing great emperors (Ezek 17:1–24; 31:1–14; see also Herodotus 1.108 about Cambyses' vision; and 7.19 about King Xerxes). The "holy watcher" (vv. 13, 17, and 23) is an angelic figure not attested elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible. Watchers appear in several Jewish texts of the late Second Temple period and at Qumran (Jub 4:22; 7:21; 10:5), though they are perhaps best known from the Book of the Watchers (1 En 1–36).

4:19–33. Daniel again articulates the main lesson to be learned, that God is sovereign and gives dominion "to whom he will" (v. 25). When Nebuchadnezzar is stripped of his royal power, transformed into an animal and forced to roam the steppe, he remembers Daniel's words (vv. 33–36) and is promptly reinstalled on his throne.

Daniel is visibly troubled by the dream and the interpretation he has to give. Not only is he reluctant to speak (v. 19), he readily offer his advice on what the Babylonian king can do to postpone the divine sentence. Early interpreters were divided over their reading of the story. The rabbis saw in Nebuchadnezzar's transformation into an animal a just and well-deserved punishment for Israel's worst enemy, whereas Christians noted that the king is reinstalled in the end and hence saw in him a model penitent.

E. Belshazzar's Feast (5:1–31)

The tale of Belshazzar's feast picks up and develops further stylistic elements and motifs from the preceding stories: as in ch. 3, there are several exaggerations, most of all the description of the royal banquet (cf. Esth 1), which is blasphemous, idolatrous, and excessive; Belshazzar's profanation of the Temple implements, which will cost him his life (v. 23), harks back to Nebuchadnezzar's original sacrilege (1:2; Isa 52:11; Ezra 1:7–11); the queen (probably the queen mother, wife of Nebuchadnezzar) alone remembers Daniel and his God-given endowment (v. 11), which in turn leads to a brief recollection of Daniel's promotion under Nebuchadnezzar; and the first part of Daniel's oration recalls in detail the events of the previous chapter (vv. 18–21).

5:1–12. Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus, the last Neo-Babylonian king, and viceroy during his father's absence in Teima (cf. ch. 4), not the son of Nebuchadnezzar. Readers are not told why the banquet is celebrated, though the reference to "the gods of gold and silver" (v. 4) brings up the familiar topic of idol parody (Isa 44:9–20; Wis 13–15; Bel).

5:13–31. Only Daniel is able to read the writing on the wall. The three words—MENE (erroneously repeated by a scribe?), TEKEL, and PARSIN—can be read as nouns or as verbs. As nouns, they refer to three weights. MENE in Aramaic is a mina or about 600 grams, a TEKEL is a shekel or 10 grams, i.e., less than half an ounce, and PARSIN is a half (some interpreters read the ending -IN as a dual, hence two halves, which seems unlikely), though the text does not make clear whether this means a half-mina or a half-shekel. By themselves, the measurements make little sense. In his interpretation, Daniel takes the three terms to be verbal forms, in which case MENE means "numbered," TEKEL "weighed," and PARSIN "divided." Together, they predict the fate of the Babylonian empire. Some scholars have proposed that each is associated with the fate of an individual monarch (e.g., Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, and his viceroy Belshazzar), but this is unwarranted. The point of the omen is to predict the imminent end of the Babylonian kingdom.

As in 2:46, the king responds favorably and rewards Daniel, as he had promised. Unlike the previous tales, however, this one does not conclude with the king's doxology and conversion but with his death. The God who "desposes kings" (2:21) put an end to Belshazzar's life and kingdom. His successor is "Darius the Mede" (v. 31), the protagonist of the next tale. No such figure is known to have existed. The Persian king who defeated Nabonidus, Belshazzar's father, was Cyrus the Great (560–530 BCE), who was followed by his son Cambyses II (530–522 BCE). Darius then succeeded Cambyses and was king of Persia from 522 to 486 BCE. The Greek historian Herodotus reports that Darius divided the Persian Empire into twenty provinces and determined their tributes (Herodotus, 3.89–90; Dan 6:1; Est 1:1; 8:9).

F. Daniel in the Lions' Den (6:1–28)

The conflict between the courtiers and Daniel escalates in the tale of Daniel in the lions' den. The initial equilibrium among the three presidents (compare the seven counselors in Est 1:14 and Ezra 7:14) is disturbed when the king plans to appoint Daniel "over the whole kingdom" (v. 3; 2:49; cf. Gen 41:45; Est 3:1).

The story of Daniel in the lions' den has some close parallels with the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon, one of the three Additions to Daniel: both legends revolve around a conflict at a foreign court, both have as their central motif the lions' den, and in both tales the accusers are thrown into the den in Daniel's stead. Daniel 6 and Bel have therefore been called "variations" or "duplicate narratives" of the same original story. Some scholars think that Bel and the Dragon is the more developed of the two narratives. But one should be careful not to exaggerate the similarities, nor do the parallels imply that one version developed out of the other. Neither story shows clear signs of depending on the other.

6:1–9. On Darius and his efforts to divide the kingdom into twenty provinces, see the comment on 5:31. The numbers here are gravely overdrawn (Est 1:1; 8:9). The Persians, who brought an end to the Babylonian exile and, upon defeating the Neo-Babylonians, allowed the Jews to return home, are well known for their religious tolerance. The edict calling for the deification of the king and the prohibition to pray to other gods is historically implausible and serves the dramatic purpose of setting the stage for the legend. The presence of a lions' den, a pit to be closed with a stone (vv. 17, 23–24), may have been inspired by Ezek 19:4, 8–9; Ps 57:6–7.

6:10–18. Daniel retreats to the "upper room" (Judg 3:20; 1 Kgs 17:19), a quiet place for his prayers (Jdt 8:5; Matt 6:6; Acts 1:13; 9:37). Daniel prays three times a day (Ps 55:17; Jdt 9:1) "toward Jerusalem" (m. Ber. 4.5).

Like Nebuchadnezzar before him, Darius shows sincere concern for Daniel's wellbeing. Still, like Cyrus in Bel, Darius comes across as a weakling, who lacks the capacity to resist his own advisors and is easily manipulated.

6:19–28. In the end, it is not Darius but the God of Israel who rescues Daniel. The legend ends, like the one in chapter 4, with a doxology (6:26–27), which again takes the form of an edict sent "to all peoples" (v. 25; cf. 4:1), in which the king confesses the supremacy of the God of Daniel.

The quasi-martyrdom of Daniel enjoyed great popularity with later interpreters (1 Macc 2:60; Heb 11:33–34).

II. The Apocalyptic Visions (7:1–12:13)

A. The Vision of the Four Beasts and the Son of Man (7:1–28)

Placed at the center of the book of Daniel, ch. 7 serves as the transition from chs. 1–6, the first part, to chs. 7–12, the second part of the book (see Introduction). Speaking in the first person, Daniel relates the first of his three end-time visions (the first vision is in ch. 7, the second in ch. 8, and the third in chs. 10–12). From now on, the book's main topic is no longer the life of Daniel and his companions in the Diaspora but God's eschatological plan for Israel. According to its literary genre, narrative voice, and content, ch. 7 marks a clear shift from the didactic court tales in the first to the apocalyptic visions in the latter half of the book.

All the while, Dan 7 has several close links with the six preceding chapters. Indeed, the parallels are so obvious that they must be considered intentional. Like chs. 2–6, for example, ch. 7 is written in Aramaic, and the shift back to Hebrew only occurs with ch. 8. The affinities are especially close between Dan 2 and 7. Both stories include a dream interpretation that revolves around the division of history into four kingdoms: in Dan 7, the lion represents the Neo-Babylonian, the bear the Median, the leopard the Persian, and the beast the Greek empire. The fourth kingdom is the fiercest and most destructive. The eleventh horn in 7:8 and 7:11–12 (see also 8:9) clearly refers to Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE; see the account about him in 1 Macc 1:16–28), the focal point of the vision. Daniel 7 is also linked to ch. 4 (the description of the first beast in 7:4 refers back to Nebuchadnezzar's madness in 4:33), as well as to ch. 5 (through Belshazzar, who is mentioned in 5:1 and 7:1). Since the first half of the book predates the visions, Daniel's initial vision is an appropriation of the four kingdom schema already introduced in Dan 2 in light of the persecutions under Antiochus.

7:1–8. Daniel's nocturnal Vision of the Four Beasts is dated to "the first year of King Belshazzar" (7:1). However, Belshazzar already died at the end of chapter 5 (5:30). Chapter 7 thus begins a new chronological sequence: 8:1, the third year of Belshazzar; 9:1, the first year of Darius; 10:1, the third year of Cyrus; and 11:1, the first year of Darius.

As is characteristic of all early Jewish apocalyptic visions, the Vision of the Four Beasts blends imagery from the Hebrew Bible with images from ancient Near Eastern myths. The scriptural basis for the historical scheme, including the Medes, is Isa 13:17; 21:2; Jer 51:11, 28; the motif of the four winds representing the four points of the compass (in a vision about four kingdoms!) are also found in Jer 49:36; Ezek 37:9; Zech 2:6 and 6:5; the great sea refers to the primordial ocean mentioned in Gen

7:11; Isa 51:10; and Amos 7:4 (also 4 Ezra [2 Esd] 13:2); and references to sea monsters are found in Isa 27:1; 51:9; Ps 74:13–14; and Job 41:1 (for composite creatures in general see also Ezek 1). As for the ancient Near Eastern background of Dan 7, some have found allusions to the Babylonian creation epic Enuma Elish, in which Marduk defeats the sea monster Tiamat, while others point to Canaanite mythological imagery, and specifically to the myths from Ugarit, in which Baal, the storm god, overpowers Yam, the sea god. Most significantly, ancient mythology here supplies the imagery for the final sequence of world history. The current persecutions under Antiochus, which mark the beginning of history's final installment, conjure up images of the primordial conflict.

7:9–14. The blend of biblical and ancient Near Eastern images continues into the next section, Daniel's Vision of the Heavenly Throne Room, in which Antiochus, the blasphemous little horn, is put to death and eternal governance is given to the "one like a human being." The scene as a whole is reminiscent of the heavenly assembly of gods in ancient Near Eastern texts (see also Ps 82; Job 1), though the parallels are particularly striking with the Ugaritic texts, in which El, the supreme god, also known as the "the eternal" and "father of years," sits on the throne to preside over the divine council.

Daniel sees God sitting on his throne, with wheels of burning fire. Once again, the scene combines diverse motifs from Isa 6; Ezek 1; 10; and 1 En 14 (for fire in association with a theophany, the "appearance of God," see also Exod 24:17; Deut 4:24). God is surrounded by the ministering angels (Dan 10:20–21; Deut 33:2; 1 Kgs 22:19; 1 En 1:9; 71:8, 13). The extreme arrogance of the little horn (similarly 5:2–3, 30) is here contrasted with the righteousness of the "one like a human being," lit. the "son of man." The identity of the son of man is never disclosed. Within the narrative logic of the book, the son of man is most likely a heavenly agent, possibly the archangel Michael (10:13, 21; 12:1). Early Jewish interpreters understood "son of man" to be a messianic title (4 Ezra [2 Esd] 13:3; 1 En 46:1; 62:14). Similarly, in the Gospels, "Son of Man" is a Christological title of Jesus (Mark 2:27; Matt 8:20; 18:11; et al.).

7:15–28. Greatly disturbed by what he saw in his dream (2:1; 4:5), Daniel, whose ability to interpret the dreams of others set him apart in chs. 1–6, is now in need of an interpreter himself (note the visions in Zech 1–6). The anonymous interpreting angel (perhaps Gabriel, see Dan 8:16) explains that dominion will be given to "the holy ones of the Most High" (7:18, 27). This could be a reference to the angelic host (1 En 14:22–23). Alternatively, it could designate the persecuted Jews (the list of Antiochus' offenses in vv. 19–27 supports this reading), or, more narrowly interpreted, "the holy ones" could be the circle of Jews that produced the book. In any case, Daniel is terrified by the angelic announcement, but keeps the matter in his mind (cf. 8:27; 12:4; Gen 37:11; Luke 2:19).

B. The Vision of the Ram and the He-Goat (8:1–27)

8:1–2. In ch. 8, the book reverts to Hebrew. Daniel's Vision of the Ram and the Goat follows directly on the heels of the Vision of the Four Beasts in ch. 7, and the two visions are closely connected. Indeed, the latter is set only two years after the former (see dates in 7:1 and 8:1), and in its opening verse Daniel, who is still speaking in the first person, explicitly refers back to the vision "that had appeared to me at first." Both chapters have a similar literary structure (date formula, vision report, interpretation by the angel, and Daniel's bewilderment) and largely overlap, as both predict the downfall of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the "little horn" (7:8, 11; 8:9–12, 22–25). And yet, ch. 8 is considerably more specific in its reference to Antiochus' tyrannical behavior.

8:3–14. The apocalyptic beasts of ch. 7 have been replaced by two domestic animals. The two horns of the ram represent the empire of the Medes and of the Persians, the great horn of the goat represents Alexander the Great, who in 323 BCE suddenly died, "at the height of its power" (8:7), and the "four prominent horns" represent the Diadochi, i.e., the four generals who succeeded Alexander. All of this culminates in the description of Antiochus' defilement of the Jerusalem Temple (8:9–12; the same events are told in greater detail in 1 Macc 1:54–61). In his arrogance, Antiochus "grew as high as the host of heaven," an allusion to Isaiah's song (Isa 14:12–15), in which the prophet taunts a Babylonian king (2 Macc 9:9–10). According to 7:14, the desolation of the Temple will last 1,150 days, roughly the length of the three-and-a-half years in 7:25; 9:27; and 12:7 (1 Macc 4:52–54).

8:15–27. Whereas the heavenly interpreter in 7:16 remained anonymous, Daniel now learns that the name of the interpreting angel, is "Gabriel," meaning "man of God" (or, possibly, "God is my warrior"). The name is a play on his description in 8:15 as having "the appearance of a man" (v. 15; repeated in 9:21 in the phrase "the man Gabriel"). Gabriel (8:16; 9:21; also Luke 1:11, 19, 26; 2:9) and Michael (10:13, 21; 12:1) are the only two angels in the Hebrew Bible with proper names (1 En 9:1; 20:5, 7).

Gabriel explains that "the vision is for the time of the end" (8:17, repeated in 8:19, likely modeled after Hab 2:3; see also 9:26; 11:27, 35, 40; 12:4, 9, 13). This could mean that the defeat of Antiochus will usher in the end of history in general, but it is more likely that "the time of the end" here refers specifically to the end of Antiochus' oppressive reign. The point of the vision, then, would be to provide the persecuted community with the assurance that Antiochus' fate has already been sealed in heaven.

Gabriel's interpretation of Antiochus' reign in 8:23–25 is a good example of an ex eventu prophecy, that is, an after-the-fact "prophecy": the biblical author "predicts" events that have already happened in the past or are currently unfolding. This includes Antiochus' surprise attack on Jerusalem (8:25, "without warning he shall destroy many"; cf. 1 Macc 1:29–30) and Antiochus' blasphemous behavior (8:25, "he shall even rise up against the Prince of princes," a reference to God). But the author errs in his prediction of the tyrant's death in 164 BCE (see also 11:45), when he claims that Antiochus died "not by human hands" (8:25; an allusion to Zech 4:6). Such an error on the part of the author is helpful for the modern interpreter, since it shows that the vision was written while Antiochus was still alive.

The announcement of Antiochus' imminent death provides little relief for Daniel, who falls sick (8:26) and, even after his recovery, remains dismayed and bewildered (8:27; cf. 7:28). Daniel's strong, even physical, reaction and his lack of understanding, made explicit again in 12:8, have important implications for an understanding of the apocalypse. It shrouds the book in a veil of mystery and preserves the sense of secrecy characteristic of this literature (see Overview).

C. Daniel's Prayer (9:1–27)

Daniel's prayer in ch. 9 interrupts the sequence of visions in the second, apocalyptic part of the book of Daniel and clearly stands out in several ways. What distresses Daniel now is not a vision but what he "perceived in the books" (9:2), namely Jeremiah's prophecy that the devastation of Jerusalem would last seventy years. Also, Gabriel does not assist Daniel with an angelic interpretation of a symbolic dream vision but instead talks about the events of the end time. Jeremiah's prophecy serves as his point of departure, though it is hardly interpreted in detail like the dreams in the previous chapters. Most strikingly, Daniel's lengthy prayer is a penitential prayer whose Deuteronomic language is strangely at odds with its apocalyptic context.

9:1–3. The chapter begins with a date formula (1:1; 2:1; 7:1; 8:1; 10:1). On Darius the Mede, see the commentary on 5:31 (he is mentioned again in 11:1). Ahasuerus is Xerxes, King of Persia (485–465 BCE), son and successor of Darius I, also not a Mede (cf. Ezra 4:5–6).

The scene begins when Daniel reads Jeremiah's seventy-year prophecy (Jer 25:11–12; 29:10; see also Zech 1:12; like Daniel, 2 Chr 36:20–22 also explicitly refers to Jeremiah); that is, Daniel "perceived" (9:2, NRSV) the number of years. The Hebrew, binoti, literally means "understood" (cf. 10:1). For Daniel, there is nothing unclear about Jeremiah's prophecy, he therefore does not ask for an interpretation. In a sense, it is precisely because he understands Jeremiah's promise of restoration (Jer 29:10–14) that he responds in prayer.

9:4–19. Daniel's penitential prayer, a communal confession of Israel's sin, consists of the initial confession (vv. 4–10), followed by an acknowledgment of divine justice (vv. 11–14, Daniel confesses that Israel has suffered what Moses had already predicted), and a plea for mercy (vv. 15–19). The theology of Daniel's prayer is Deuteronomic: it is predicated on the notion that the desolation of the Temple is the result of Israel's sin, and that, if Israel repents, God will forgive. Such penitential prayers are common in post-exilic literature (Ezra 9:6–15; Neh 1:5–11; 9:5–37; Bar 1:15–2:19; and the Prayer of Azariah), but Daniel's prayer seems strangely out of context here.

Interpreters who have questioned the authenticity of Daniel's prayer point out that its deterministic, apocalyptic understanding of history stands in conflict with the Deuteronomic notion that penitence can alter the course of historical events. They also observe that the Hebrew of the prayer is smooth and Deuteronomic and lacks the Aramaisms we find in the rest of Dan 8–12. Those who argue in favor of the text's unity observe that the prayer is linked to its context by several key words (e.g., desolation in vv. 17 and 27) and that Daniel's penitence is a direct response to his reading of Jeremiah. It is likely that the author of Daniel adopted a traditional prayer and integrated it into his book.

9:20–27. Gabriel (see 8:16) arrives and, rather than interpreting Jeremiah's prophecy, asks Daniel to consider the following "vision" (9:23) about future events. Gabriel's historical scheme is based on the revocalization of the Hebrew text. Jeremiah's number of "seventy" (Heb.: shiv'im) years, Gabriel explains, really means seventy "weeks" (Heb.: shavu'im) of years, i.e., 490 years, a periodization of time based on the jubilee year (Lev 25). The time of Jerusalem's destruction has been predetermined by God.

During this time, an "anointed prince" (v. 25; Heb.: mashiah) will come, a reference either to the governor Zerubbabel or to Joshua the high priest (Zech 3–4; Ezra 3:2). The "anointed" (Heb.: mashiah) in v. 26 who will be assassinated is most likely the high priest Onias, who was murdered in 171 BCE (also 11:22; 2 Macc 4:30–34). The violent prince in v. 26, finally, is Antiochus. He is responsible for "an abomination that desolates" (v. 27; 11:31; 12:11; also 1 Macc 1:54–58; 2 Macc 6:1–5), the incident during which Antiochus put pagan altar stones on the altar in the Temple.

D. The Final Revelation (10:1–12:13)

Daniel's final revelation in chs. 10–12 regarding the last days, the longest unit in the book, recounts in considerable detail the course of Hellenistic history as inscribed in "the book of truth" (10:21). The vision takes the form of a prophetic commissioning, which is to be recorded in a book but has to remain secret and sealed "until the time of the end" (12:9; 1 En 14–15). The vision is clearly structured: an anonymous angel appears (10:1–9) and speaks of a celestial battle between Michael and the princes of Persia and Greece (10:10–11:1). He then gives a historical "preview" from the Persian and Hellenistic rulers down to Antiochus IV Epiphanes (11:2–45). The vision ends with a prediction of the resurrection of the dead (12:1–3) and the book's epilogue (12:5–12), which is framed by the final address to Daniel (12:4, 13).

10:1–9. The unit begins with a date formula (the "third year of King Cyrus of Persia," 536 BCE) and the note that the vision concerns "a great conflict"; the celestial (10:10–11:1) and terrestrial (11:2–45) warfare are two sides of the same conflict. 10:2–4 describe the setting of the vision. Daniel prepares himself through mourning and fasting (4 Ezra [2 Esd] 5:13, 20; 6:35; 2 Bar 9:1; 12:5; et al.). While standing along a river (already in 8:2; also Ezek 1:1–3), Daniel sees a man—possibly Gabriel—whose appearance is like that of an angel (Ezek 1:4–14; 9:2–3; Rev 1:13–16; see also the birth of Noah in the Genesis Apocryphon from Qumran), though only Daniel can see him (10:7; Acts 9:7).

10:10–11:1. The angel explains that he has come to Daniel to help him understand what will befall Israel "at the end of days" (10:14; however, see 12:8). He speaks of a celestial conflict between the angelic princes that is currently raging, in which each prince represents a nation: the "prince of Persia" and the "prince of Greece" are fighting against Michael, the warrior and defender of Israel (12:1; 1 En 9:1; Rev 12:7; see also the War Scroll from Qumran).

11:2–45. Whereas the angelic description of the war in heaven remains somewhat sketchy, his after-the-fact "prophecy" about the current earthly conflict is much more detailed and increasingly so as we approach the time of the actual author of the vision. The divine interpreter divides his account into two parts; he begins with the war between the Seleucid empire of Syria, the "king of the north," and the Ptolemaic empire of Egypt, the "king of the south" (11:2–20), and then in the second part follows the career of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, "a contemptible person," to his death (11:21–45).

The angel begins in 11:2 with a terse reference to four kings of Persia; the fourth could be Artaxerxes I (465–424 BCE; also mentioned in Neh 2:1), or, more likely, Darius III (336–331 BCE; he is not mentioned elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible). 11:3–4 summarize the reign of Alexander the Great, the "warrior king," whose kingdom was divided after his death.

In 11:5–20 the interpreter turns to the period in between the death of Alexander (323 BCE) and the reign of Antiochus IV (175–164 BCE). The "king of the south" (11:5) is Ptolemy I Soter (323–285 BCE), founder of the Ptolemaic Kingdom in Egypt. Another of Alexander's officers, Seleucus I Nicator (358–281 BCE), founded the Seleucid Kingdom. The "alliance" in v. 6 refers to Ptolemy II Philadelphus, who married his daughter Berenice to Antiochus II; however, Berenice and her son were later murdered. 11:7–9 tells the story of Berenice's brother, Ptolemy III Euergetes (246–221 BCE), king of Egypt, who launched several campaigns against Seleucia. Then, in 11:10–13, the author refers to the sons of Seleucus II, the "king of the north" (v. 7): Seleucus III (227–223 BCE) and Antiochus III the Great (223–187 BCE). Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–203 BCE) recaptured Seleucia in 219 BCE. 11:15–19 relate how in 200 BCE Antiochus III initially launched a campaign against Egypt and was able to capture "the beautiful land," i.e., Judea, and then went on to take control of territories in Asia Minor. He died in 187 BCE.

11:20 relates the story of Seleucus IV Philopator (187–175 BCE), successor of Antiochus III, who, according to 2 Macc 3, sent one of his officers, a certain Heliodorus, to Jerusalem to rob the Temple, where Heliodorus is repelled because of a divine intervention and converts to the God of Israel.

11:21–45. The account turns to Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE), successor of Seleucus IV, a "contemptible man" (11:21; cf. 1 Macc 1:10), and the "little horn" of 7:8 and 8:9. Verses 22–28 provide a quick summary of his reign. Antiochus rose to power by eliminating those who were in his way, including "the prince of the covenant" (v. 22), probably a reference to the murder of the high priest Onias III (9:26; 2 Macc 4:34–35).

11:25–28 relate how, in 170 BCE, Antiochus invaded Egypt and, on his way home, plundered the Temple in Jerusalem (1 Macc 1:20; 2 Macc 5:11–21). In 168 BCE, 11:29–30 reports, Antiochus moved again against Egypt, but this time was repelled by the ships of Kittim (v. 30; the term is derived from Citium, a city on Cyprus, and used here and in the scrolls from Qumran as a designation for Rome). In frustration, he turns against the Jerusalem Temple.

In 11:31–39 Antiochus desecrated the Temple (2 Macc 5:23–27), abolished the daily offerings (9:27; 1 Macc 1:54), and "set up the abomination that makes desolate" (see comment on 9:27). He tried to "seduce" (v. 32; 1 Macc 2:17–22) some Hellenizing Jews but was opposed by the faithful. One of the resisting groups is referred to as "the wise" (11:33–35; 12:3). Their task is to instruct others, presumably in their resistance, and among them will be found the first martyrs in Jewish history (v. 35; 1 Macc 1:31–38, 54–64; 2 Macc 6:11; 7:1–41). Unlike the Maccabees, however, "the wise" do not appear to have propagated the use of violence. Some modern interpreters argue that the book of Daniel stems from the circle of "the wise."

Antiochus grew exceedingly arrogant, rejecting "the gods of his ancestors" (v. 37), imposing the worship of Zeus Olympios instead (2 Macc 6:2), and paying no respect to the god "beloved by women" (v. 37), the Mesopotamian god Tammuz (Ezek 8:14). In 11:40–45, the after-the-fact "prophecy" switches to become genuine, albeit erroneous, prophecy. The biblical author predicts that Antiochus will die in a cataclysmic battle "at the time of the end" (v. 40; Ezek 38–39; see also the War Scroll from Qumran). The inaccuracy of the predictions implies that the author was composing his account while Antiochus was still alive, i.e., between 167 and 164 BCE (other legendary accounts of Antiochus' end are found in 1 Macc 6:1–17; 2 Macc 1:14–16; and 2 Macc 9:1–29).

12:1–4. The last chapter opens with a judgment scene, not unlike 7:10. Michael, the protector of Israel (8:15–16; 10:13), "shall arise" (v. 1), presumably in the divine assembly, to advocate for those "found written in the book" (v. 1). The book (10:21) keeps a record of those destined for life (Exod 32:32–33; Isa 4:3; Rev 20:12, 15), though it may not include everybody but "many of those who sleep in the dust" (v. 2). Earlier prophets have used resurrection language metaphorically for the rebirth of Israel (Isa 26:19; Ezek 37). In Dan 12:1–3, however, one finds the first unambiguous expression of the belief in the physical resurrection of the individual, a belief that became central in both Judaism and Christianity. "The wise" (see 11:33–35) are singled out; they will "shine . . . like the stars," that is, assume a quasi-angelic status (8:10; Mark 12:25; 1 En 104). Daniel is advised, once again (8:26), to keep the revelation a secret.

12:5–13. The book's epilogue includes a final vision, though it is not formally introduced as a new unit. Daniel sees two individuals, presumably angels, standing by a river, their hands raised in a gesture of swearing (Deut 32:40; Rev 10:5–6). The angels offer several schedules for the advent of the end, which is imminent: three and a half years (7:25; 9:27; and 12:7; compare the 1,150 days in 8:14), 1,290 days (12:11), and 1,335 days (12:12). The exact meaning of the dates remains obscure, and, understandably, Daniel remains confused (12:8). Since the number of days increases, it may be that, once the previous prediction had proven to be wrong, a higher number was added. The book ends with the promise to Daniel that he will be included in the resurrection.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. J. Collins. Daniel, With an Introduction to Apocalyptic Literature. FOTL 20 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); . Daniel. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. E. Goldingay. Daniel. WBC 30 (Dallas: Word Books, 1989); M. Henze. The Madness of King Nebuchadnezzar (Leiden: Brill, 1999); G. W. E. Nickelsburg. "Apocalyptic Texts." Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls. L. H. Schiffman and J. C. VanderKam, eds. (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000) 29–35; . Jewish

Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah. 2nd ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2005); C. Rowland. The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); C. L. Seow. Daniel. Westminster Bible Companion (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); E. Ulrich. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Origins of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); L. M. Wills. The Jewish Novel in the Ancient World (Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1995).

HOSEA

BETH L. TANNER

OVERVIEW

The book of Hosea is the first of the twelve minor prophets. The title of "minor" is not a measure of significance but of length. Like many of the Minor Prophets, the message of the book of Hosea is powerful and moving. Among all the prophetic books, Hosea is predated only by the book of Amos. Its origin lies in the northern kingdom, Israel, before its destruction in 722 BCE, so it stands as a reflection on a great loss that changed the fortunes of both Israel and Judah forever.

The Hebrew text of the book is difficult with multiple differences between Hebrew and early Greek manuscripts. This situation accounts for the significant differences among contemporary English translations; but, although the translation of individual lines varies, the overall message of the book remains clear.

The text was edited early in its history, possibly in Judah after the destruction of Israel and again after the exile in 586 BCE. The process by which the book grew testifies to the fact that these words spoke to communities of the faithful long after Hosea's prophetic mission to Israel ended.

Everything known about Hosea is contained in verse 1:1, which reports his father's name as "Beeri" and the kings who reigned when he was active as a prophet. It is curious his work is identified with only one northern king, Jeroboam II (786–746), but four Judean kings (approximately 750 until 698). These southern kings could have been added when the book was brought to Jerusalem after 722 to make the point that all Hosea said came to pass, but this suggestion is far from certain. Because of the unusual way Hosea's activity is reported, an exact date of his prophetic activity is impossible to pinpoint, but it was probably near the end of Jeroboam II's reign until sometime before the Assyrian invasion in 722. This period reflects great changes in Israel's history; from a time of independence and peace, through the rise of the powerful Assyrians when Israel becomes a vassal state, and finally up until the destruction of the northern cities and scattering of the people (2 Kgs 15:1–17:41).

Hosea's prophecies are directed at Israel and Ephraim. Ephraim is often a synonym for Israel, but it also is a specific region that consists of the heart or center of Israel, including its major cities and worship centers. Indeed, if the cities mentioned in Hosea are plotted on a map, they run in a line almost up the middle of the country, which means he is prophesying to the geographic, economic, and religious heart of Israel.

One of the greatest controversies concerning the book is Hosea's marriage (chs. 1–3). Hosea 1:2 reports that God told Hosea to "go, take for yourself a wife of whoredom." Scholars and the faithful alike have struggled to decide if this command is an actual command from God or if its language is symbolic. While the debate still continues, a reading of the full verse is enlightening, "go, take for yourself a wife of whoredom and have children of whoredom, for the land commits great whoredom by forsaking the LORD." It seems anyone who lives in God's promised land is involved in the same "great whoredom" against the Lord. In other words, the unfaithfulness includes all of the people, not just one particular woman. No matter whom Hosea marries, the woman would be part of this broken system. Indeed, Israel's unfaithfulness to God is the primary theological theme of the entire book. The book of Hosea describes the people's forsaking of the Lord in terms that are designed to demonstrate the pain in the heart of God, even as the judgment falls.

OUTLINE

I. Superscription (1:1)

II. Israel Goes After Other Gods (1:2–5:7)

A. Report of Hosea's Prophetic Acts (1:2–11)

B. Second Prophetic Act (2:1–13)

C. Restored Relationship (2:14–23)

D. A Future for Unfaithful Israel (3:1–5)

E. God's Indictment (4:1–19)

F. God's Coming Judgment (5:1–7)

III. Israel Has Turned from God and Places Trust in Other Nations (5:8–7:16)

A. Announcement of Exile (5:8–15)

B. Call for Repentance (6:1–3)

C. God's Agony (6:4–7:10)

D. Lament over Israel (7:11–16)

IV. Israel Has Broken the Covenant (8:1– 13:16)

A. Broken Covenant (8:1–14)

B. The Coming Exile (9:1–17)

C. Israel Depends Only on Israel (10:1–15)

D. God's Broken Heart (11:1–11)

E. Sin that Stretches Back to the Ancestors (12:1–13:16)

V. A Final Plea to Return (14:1–8)

VI. Later Wisdom Addition (14:9)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

Verse 1 provides the only information given about Hosea. It orients the reader to the historical period during which Hosea prophesied but offers no information on Hosea the person. The absence of such information reminds readers that the point of the book is not to present information about Hosea, but to convey the words of the Lord contained in this book.

II. Israel Goes After Other Gods (1:2–5:7)

The first major section is set against a background of Canaanite religion generally and the fertility cult specifically. This religion was the greatest rival to the worship of Yahweh in preexilic times (see 1 and 2 Kings). Baal was the storm and fertility god, and most myths and rituals associated with him centered on fertility. Fertility of the land was of central importance to people who scratched out a living in arid lands. Canaanite religion included the practice of cultic imitation where human sexual acts were part of the ritual believed to cause Baal to mate with his consort bringing the rains necessary for the crops to grow. The references to prostitution or whoredom in Hosea are in response to these Baal rituals. The metaphor operates on two levels. The first condemns the ritual act of sexual encounter (Hos 4:11–19), and the second symbolizes the central metaphor of broken relationship experienced by God as the people turn to Baal, other gods, and other nations. The people have broken their covenant promises to God by turning to the fertility cults. This prophetic word is vivid and shocking and meant to get the attention of the people in the strongest way possible.

A. Report of Hosea's Prophetic Acts (1:2–11)

This opening section is not an oracle, but a report of God's instructions to Hosea concerning his wife and children. As noted in the Overview, Hosea does not necessarily marry a prostitute. All of the people of Israel are unfaithful (v. 1:2). Verses 3–9 narrate the birth of Hosea and Gomer's three children; each is given a name that reflects God's anger at the people: Jezreel signifying the place where Jehu slaughtered two other kings in a coup (2 Kgs 9:14–29); Lo-ruhamah meaning "not pitied"; and Lo-ammi meaning "not my people." Symbolic names are common during this period; these reflect God's message to the people. The chosen people of God are reminded that because of their unfaithfulness they are no longer God's children.

Without any transition, vv. 10 and 11 report the eventual restoration of the people using imagery similar to promises made to Abraham (Gen 22:17). In addition, v. 11 tells of a time when the north and the south will be reunited under one king (1 Kgs 4:20). It is the hope of a future restoration as "You are not my people" become "children of the living God" (v. 10). Just as Hosea's children will pass from memory so will the time of Israel's exile from God.

B. Second Prophetic Act (2:1–13)

There may be no more shocking words in the entire Bible than here. If read literally, its language is violent. It treats women as property that can be abused and imprisoned, and children as something that can be discarded (vv. 2–7). However, what is clear by vv. 8–11 is that the mother and wife here is not Gomer, but Israel. The oracle begins with sympathy for the betrayed spouse and anger toward the wayward Gomer; but, beginning at v. 8, Hosea's audience is the unfaithful spouse and God is the one crying out in sorrow and anger. The poetry evokes the intense feelings and then turns those feelings into a powerful lesson about God's love. The image works as well today as it did in ancient days, for most people know the deep pain of being betrayed by those with whom we share the most intimate of relationships. Hosea's words illumine the sort of feeling that God must have had when dealing with a disobedient Israel. God does not automatically punish all who stray, but exists in a loving and committed relationship that is often very painful to both parties.

C. Restored Relationship (2:14–23)

Just as ch. 1 transposed judgment and hope, vv. 14–23 depict a God who will indeed have a change of heart toward wayward Israel, and the loving relationship will be restored with a new covenant (v. 18). Today it is hard to imagine that a betrayed spouse would choose to enter into a new covenant of love, but in ancient times this act would have been unbelievable. The price for adultery was death (Lev 20:10–11). This shocking chapter also attests to God's great capacity for love and grace toward the people who have transgressed to the point of receiving a sentence of death. The chapter takes a reader from sympathy and judgment to a conviction of his or her own sin and a hope of restoration—all in twenty-three verses.

D. A Future for Unfaithful Israel (3:1–5)

God again speaks to Hosea telling him to marry an unfaithful woman because "the LORD loves the people of Israel" even though they follow other gods. The message here is the same as ch. 2. Israelites will lose their independence because of their unfaithfulness (vv. 1–4) but will be restored by God in the future (v. 5). The point is not to speculate on the identity of the woman but to realize this is a metaphor for God's own hurt when God's people break the covenant relationship.

E. God's Indictment (4:1–19)

This oracle was created in the form of a lawsuit that God brings against the people (v. 1). Hosea contends that the elders have no loyalty to God and are not teaching the next generation; as a result, there is no knowledge of God among the young (vv. 6, 13, 14). The priest and the prophets have failed in their responsibilities to teach the people to remain faithful to God (vv. 4–10). As a result, all of creation suffers (v. 3).

Verses 11–19 should be understood as a response to Canaanite fertility rituals. They took place at sacred places on mountains (v. 13), were marked with wooden idols (v. 12), and sexual intercourse was part of the ritual (vv. 13–14, 17–18). These acts were an abomination to God, not only because they involved sexual behavior but because they were a complete abandonment of the covenant and a violation of the commandment to "love the LORD your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might" (Deut 6:5). The people have shown they do not trust God to bring the rains that allow life to continue. They would rather consult "a piece of wood" (v. 12). Others may worship multiple gods, but Israel was to venerate only Yahweh.

F. God's Coming Judgment (5:1–7)

This pronouncement is chilling. It opens by calling on the priests, kings, and others to hear the proclamation (v. 1). Hope is lost as Hosea declares God's message that "their deeds do not permit them to return to their God" (v. 4). When Israel turns and seeks the Lord, the Lord will not be found (v. 6). The betrayal is too great, and God has finally left the people to their own devices. Verse 7 matches ch. 1, since Israel, just like Hosea, has birthed a generation of illegitimate children, illegitimate because they do not even know enough to realize their actions are wrong. This first section ends with the verdict delivered. God has finally turned away.

III. Israel Has Turned from God and Places Trust in Other Nations (5:8–7:16)

The next major section has a specific historical referent. As the Assyrians became more and more of a threat, Israel was forced to pay heavy tribute (2 Kgs 15:19) and became a vassal state to them. Seeing the Assyrian threat grow stronger, Pekah, Israel's king, joined with Remaliah of Syria to form a coalition to remove the threat. Judah wanted no part in this coalition. In 735 BCE, Pekah and Remaliah sent an army to attack Jerusalem to remove the king and force Judah to join the coalition (2 Kgs 16:1–5). This is known as the Syro-Ephraimite war. Judah turned to Assyria for help against this coalition, and the result was that both Syria and Israel were destroyed by 722 and Judah became a vassal state of Assyria, paying heavy tribute as had the Israelites (2 Kgs 15:7–17:41). In these chapters, the focus is not on going after other gods but after other nations.

A. Announcement of Exile (5:8–15)

This oracle opens with a cry of alarm moving through the heart of Israel from the far south to the north (vv. 1–2). The blowing of the shofar signals either a festival or an alarm, and in this case it is the announcement of the Lord's judgment on the people. Verses 8–9 deal with Israel, and in v. 10 Judah is also condemned. Reference to a "landmark" (v. 10) may reflect God's two countries— Israel and Judah—fighting each other. God is not sending punishment for the sake of punishment but so the relationship can be restored (v. 15). The horn blast is not a call to arms and war, but a call to return to God.

B. Call for Repentance (6:1–3)

The speaker changes from God to one of God's people, probably the prophet who calls on "us" to return to God. The plea offers one last opportunity to prevent the coming armies by making an aboutface to the Lord. Verse 2 refers back to the fertility cults attested in ch. 3. In Canaanite mythology, the god Baal rises up from the world of the dead to bring the needed rain. The prophet is warning that there will be a time of alienation from God because of the people's actions, but God will not abandon them forever and will soon come with the needed rains that will revive the lives of the people.

C. God's Agony (6:4–7:10)

God's voice returns with questions of bewilderment in v. 4, "what shall I do with you?" Verse 6 echoes other passages in which God explains that what God desires from the people is not ritual and sacrifice, but love and faithfulness (Isa 1:10–17; Ps 51:17; Mic 6:6–8). God does not have a problem with ritual itself, but with ritual that is done only for the sake of ritual. Verses 7–11 tell the tale of how the people have responded to God's love, and the focus again is on a broken covenant. The multiple geographic references, as in previous texts, demonstrate that all of the land of promise is under indictment and, also, that the problem is ongoing, since Adam is the site where Israel first crossed into the promised land (Josh 3:16). The people are compared to a burning fire, a fire that destroys all the rulers (7:7), which is probably a reference to the succession of kings who were murdered by military officers as the country fell into a state of anarchy at the end of Israel's existence (2 Kgs 15–16). Hosea 7:10 summarizes Israel's behavior in this period of history. In contrast to God's questions at the beginning of the section, the speaker is probably now a narrator or the prophet. As God wonders what to do, Israelites keep right on doing the very same things they had always done, oblivious to the searching questions posed by God about their future.

D. Lament Over Israel (7:11–16)

Description of Israel's behavior turns into lament when God sees that, instead of returning to the Lord, the people turn to Egypt and Assyria to seek aid (v. 11). Verses 12–13 describe God's dilemma: the wayward people will be punished, but God's desire is to "redeem them" (v. 13). The people are in despair and cry out, but not to God even though it is God that trained them and gave them strength (vv. 14–16). Instead, they plot and turn to Egypt, and so their fate is sealed by their own acts. They turned to other gods and now to other nations, and all the while God is standing by waiting for them.

IV. Israel Has Broken the Covenant (8:1–13:16)

The final large section turns from the Syro-Ephraimite crisis to the time immediately before Israel's destruction and scattering. All of the previous themes reappear: Israel's infidelity, Israel's transgression of the covenant, Israel's turning to other nations, Israel's dependence on themselves and their institutions instead of God, and a history lesson on Israel's long pattern of disloyalty. These chapters present vivid imagery about Israel's sin and punishment. The voices alternate between description of Israel's acts and words of the heartbroken God. Even as the Assyrians approach, God is still calling the people to return.

A. Broken Covenant (8:1–14)

This chapter begins with another trumpet call (cf. 5:8). Israel has broken the covenant and ignored God's laws. They have done this by setting up rulers without consulting God (vv. 1–6). "The kings" (vv. 4, 10) are those who ruled in quick succession during the final years of the northern kingdom. The instability in government was clear. The leaders were busy grabbing power by assassination, relying on their swords instead of on God (2 Kgs 15–16). Hosea also refers to idols or calves in Samaria (vv. 5–6). Reference to a calf may imply that this generation is like the generation in the wilderness, which worshiped a calf that Aaron had made (Exod 32). Or it may allude to the calf idols that Jeroboam set up in Dan and Bethel (1 Kgs 19:16). In either case, Hosea indicts breaches of the covenant and also attests that God has continued to be loyal to the covenant even while the people continued to sin.

Verses 7–10 focus on Israel's turning to other nations. Israelites may think they are powerful, but their prosperity is like stalks of straw with no heads of grain (v. 7). Even if there was something to harvest, other nations will take it for their own (v. 7). Israel may not know it yet, but they are already under the control of other kings (v. 10).

The prophet tells the people the more altars they build, the more sin there is in the land (vv. 11–14). This does not necessarily mean that they are worshiping other gods, but that the Lord does not accept their sacrifices because sacrifice without fidelity to God and justice to neighbor is meaningless. The reference to Egypt (v. 13) is a look backward to a time when they were slaves and foreshadows what is coming. Verse 14 makes clear that Israel and Judah will suffer the same fate. They have built up their own human-made cities and fortifications instead of building up their relationship with God.

B. The Coming Exile (9:1–17)

The prophet's words continue in vv. 1–9 and return to the topic of Israel's worship. The background here is one of a festival (vv. 1, 5), probably the harvest festival of Sukkoth (v. 2). This is a seven-day festival, celebrating the harvest and all of its bounty, an ancient type of Thanksgiving. The sermon begins with a start (vv. 5:8, 8:1) and calls on those present to stop rejoicing (v. 1). The message—Israel's infidelity to God (v. 1)—has been prominent through the book. They will go into exile, whether to Egypt or Assyria (v. 3). Verses 4–9 interpret their celebrations as useless and their sacrifices as more like the elements at a funeral. God is coming not in a great festival but in judgment (v. 7).

God speaks in vv. 10–17; the words are even harsher than those of the prophet. Verse 10 moves from tender beginnings to Israel's first encounter with Baal while still in the wilderness (Num 25). The rest of the oracle is as harsh as any words in the Bible, declaring barrenness and death for Israel's children. As in ch. 4, this oracle needs to be understood in terms of fertility religion and the veneration of Baal. The people are going to Baal to secure the fertility of the land and their future children, but it is the Lord who is the Creator (v. 10). Their acts with Baal will yield "no birth, no pregnancy, no conception" (v. 11). Even if the children live, they will die in the coming destruction and exile (v. 13). These words are as surprising as the ones in ch. 2 and are designed to shock the hard hearts of the people into changing their course.

C. Israel Depends Only on Israel (10:1–15)

Verse 1–8 are spoken by the prophet and begin positively with the image of Israel as a luxuriant vine. Verse 2 attests that, as Israelites prospered, so did their building of worship centers. What could be better? But vv. 3–4 make clear, that with the growth of the country, the people begin to depend on themselves instead of the Lord. They spend their time speaking with empty words and clogging the courts with nonsense. The signs of their prosperity will be destroyed, including the big and ornate places of worship for they have put their trust in ornate shrines instead of in God.

God's speech begins at v. 9; it offers another history lesson. The days of Gibeah refer to either the tribal war in Judg 19–21 or to its function as an important city during the time of Saul. Either way, God declares that since the very beginning Israel has violated its covenant. Verses 10–11 interpret this long history as a time when God often "spared her fair neck": now it is time for the people to work at breaking up the hard-packed soil of their hearts. Verse 12 offers an invitation for the people to sow righteousness in that hard soil. Despite their long history, God is still calling them back. Verses 13–15 depict Israel's response to God's calling. They will continue in their ways and trust not in God but in themselves, and for this they will be destroyed.

D. God's Broken Heart (11:1–11)

This chapter may be the most deeply emotional poetry in all of the prophetic literature. It presents familial imagery, this time with God as the longsuffering parent to the rebellious child Israel. As was the case with the familial imagery in the first three chapters, this poetry is also meant to create strong feelings and to show the pain of God as Israel continues to sin and turn away from the deity.

Verses 1–3 offer a reprise of God's long history with Israel, this time with the metaphor of a parent helping a young child, a metaphor that represents Israel in Egyptian slavery and in the wilderness. The prophet characterizes God as calling, teaching, leading, and feeding Israel, diction consistent with God's interactions with the people during the exodus period as God called them out of Egypt, guided them with the pillar and cloud, and fed them with manna. But even despite all of these gifts, Israel still venerated other gods.

Verses 5–7 are not unexpected since Hosea has consistently affirmed that Israel will be exiled and scattered. The reference to both Egypt and Assyria (cf. 7:11) may either signal Israel's earliest (slavery in Egypt) and final (exile to Assyria) moments or allude to the exile to Assyria and the later presence of Judahites in Egypt (Jer 43). In either case, the people will be taken by force from the promised land.

The next four verses (vv. 8–11) offer vivid insight into the very heart of God. God is in agony over the coming exile of the people. As in 6:4–10, God is having a conversation with God's self, wondering how it might be possible to punish Israel and let it become like "Admah" and "Zeboim," two cities destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Deut 29:22–23). At the thought of destruction, God's heart churns as compassion and love grow within the divine breast. The image painted with words is one known to most people who have been hurt by a child. It is that sinking, hollow feeling as anger and love crash against each other in the soul of the suffering parent. This is not a God who simply punishes without remorse; leaving the people to what they have long deserved is agonizing for God. Verse 9 summarizes the very heart of God. The great Creator king who could destroy everything with a word, uses the restraint that humans do not possess. God's power is manifest in grace and love, not in the ability to destroy. There will be a time of exile, of punishment, but this God is not a god of retribution but restoration; those sent away will come trembling back home.

E. Sin that Stretches Back to the Ancestors (12:1–13:16)

These oracles return to the theme of Israel's long history of turning away from God. Verses 1–6 open by declaring that Israel is faithless while Judah remains steadfast in its fidelity to the Lord. The prophet recounts moments in the life of their ancestor Jacob, which serve as a plea for the people to return to God and what is right (v. 6). Without missing a beat, the oracle switches to Israel's dependence on its own resources (vv. 7–8) and God's pronouncement that they will return again to living in tents (v. 9), not as a show of God's favor as in the wilderness but as a punishment for their infidelity.

Chapter 13 once again tells of God's long-suffering love for the sinful people. It begins with the people going after Baal (vv. 1–3), followed by God telling them exactly how God has cared for them, but they turn away (vv. 4–6). Consistent with the wilderness theme, God will become a wild animal and pounce on the defiant Israel with no one to come to their aid (vv. 8–13). Verse 14 presents the third instance in which God questions that which is about to happen (cf. 6:4, 11:8). Even at this late hour, God agonizes over the coming judgment. The meaning of the second half of v. 14 is ambiguous: does it mean that God has given up and summoned death and "Sheol" to swallow the people, or should it be read as God wondering when these things will come to pass? In either case, God is still struggling with the decision. Verses 15–16 offer a gruesome and realistic picture of war. Like the images of the unfaithful spouse, these images are shocking and meant to shake Israel out of its confidence in everything other than God.

V. A Final Plea to Return (14:1–8)

The prophet begins his final plea of the book with the imperative cry, "Return, O Israel!" Hosea's shocking images of betrayal and war are meant to stop Israel from what they have been doing, and lead them to ask forgiveness from the Lord (v. 2) and to renounce dependence on other nations (v. 3). It is not too late. As confirmation of the prophet's plea, God's final words offer forgiveness (vv. 4–8). God wants to heal and love Israel "freely" (v. 4). God wants to restore Israel and their land. God's final word in the moments before the destruction offer mercy. God cannot turn away, for, as the deity states, "I am God and no mortal" (11:9).

VI. Later Wisdom Addition (14:9)

This final verse is an addition from a later time. Hosea's words were delivered to a country on the brink of destruction, and in a few short years all that Hosea anticipated came to pass. When the book was brought to Judah after the destruction of Israel by the Assyrians, it ceased to be prophecy and became a lesson on what happened when the people turned away from God. This final verse encourages later generations to learn their lesson from Israel's past behavior and fate and to see the grace that God continued to offer even as the Assyrians marched into Israel.

Hosea's words are indeed shocking with images that are dangerous and powerful. Yet as shocking as they are, the images are meant to show just how radical God's love and grace really are. Hosea's words can speak today just as they did in ancient times as a call to return to the God who loves humanity instead of choosing other things that pave the way to death and destruction.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. Ben Zvi. Hosea. FOTL (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); B. Birch. Hosea, Joel, and Amos. Westminster Bible Companion (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); J. Limburg. Hosea–Micah. Interpretation (Atlanta: John Knox, 1988); R. Patterson. "Parental love as metaphor for divine-human love." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 46.2 (June 2003) 205–216; D. Stuart. Hosea–Jonah. WBC 31 (Waco, Tex.: Word, 1987).

OVERVIEW

The name Joel ("Yahweh is God") is present in many OT texts (1 Sam 8:2; 1 Chr 5:4, 8, 12; 7:3; 27:20; also in the post-exilic community: Ezra 10:43; Neh 11:9), but none of them refers to the prophet of this book. Though the book presents minimal information about this prophet, it provides clues to the time the book was composed. The book attests to the important role that the elders and priests played in that society (1:2, 13–14; 2:16–17). They function as role models and are authoritative for the population of the city. When the prophet summons the people, the absence of any reference to a king points to a period when the monarchy no longer existed. As a result, the most probable date for the final redaction of the book is during the Persian period (539–333 BCE).

As part of the Book of the Twelve, Joel sits between Hosea and Amos, probably because of the continuity of expressions (4:16 with Amos 1:2). The NT includes many quotations from Joel, especially in apocalyptic texts. Matthew 24:29 quotes 2:10 and alludes to 2:31 (also Mark 13:24–25; Luke 21:25). Paul quotes 2:32 in Rom 10:13 as proof that salvation is given to all who invoke the name of God. There is a long list of citations in Revelation (6:12–13, 17; 8:7, 12; 9:7–9; 14:5, 8; 19:15; 22:1). The most important quotation is Joel 2:28–32, which is found in the words of Peter during the feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem (Acts 2:14–36); he interprets the text as a prophecy fulfilled in that moment. These references show that Jews in the first century were awaiting a realization of the promises in the book. The book's structure orients readers to its message. The prologue (1:2–4) announces a tragedy of such magnitude that it will be remembered for many generations. The next section describes a locust plague, but there are some hints that lead the reader to think of an army invasion (v. 6). Reference to the Day of the Lord, a theme that will grow in importance as the book develops, first appears (v. 15). The devastation of nature follows the pattern of a military invasion, as it is built on the description of hungry locusts (2:1–11), which attack Jerusalem in a way that resembles a professional and well-trained army. The first major section of the book ends when the people are summoned to call upon God and ask for compassion, and where they are called to return with sincerity to the Lord (2:12–17).

The call of the people presented in the first part receives a response in the following section (2:18–3:17). Joel 2:18–27 declares the promise of God to restore everything that was destroyed by the army/locust invasion: food, peace, and cult (v. 27). The desolation will be transformed into fertility and prosperity. The next unit (2:28–32) describes the blessings promised by God to the whole people, especially those who are marginalized and poor, and concludes with the promise of liberation forever from foreign domination (3:17). The end of 2:18–3:17 provides the answer to the call in the book's first section. However, the scope of the text has broadened—from an initial reference to a locust plague to the judgment of the oppressed nations (3:19). The epilogue that closes the book describes a new situation created by the intervention of God.

OUTLINE

I. Prologue: The Tragedy (1:1–4)

II. The People Call to God (1:5–2:17)

A. Summoning the People (1:5–14)

B. Devastation of the Land (1:15–20)

C. Military Invasion (2:1–11)

D. Asking for Mercy (2:12–17)

III. God's Answer (2:18–3:17)

A. Restoration of Life (2:18–27)

B. Promise of the Spirit (2:28–32)

C. God's Judgment (3:1–17)

IV. Epilogue: God's Justice (3:18–21)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prologue: The Tragedy (1:1–4)

The prologue announces an extraordinary event that grabs readers' attention. Many imperative verbs appear together in vv. 2–3: "hear," "give ear," "tell." They create a dramatic expectation for something that has not yet been revealed. The reader has to reach v. 4 to understand that there has been a powerful invasion of locusts. It is described using a formula that is repeated: what one left, another has eaten. The poetry presents a nightmarish scenario.

The locusts are mentioned with four different names, probably referring to the insect's life cycle. But the contemporary reader senses that the ancient audience does not encounter an ecological and short-lived disaster—one which occurs periodically and is followed by renewal—but instead confronts a great tragedy that needs to be remembered and recorded because nothing like it has ever happened. The prophet is certain that, even in the future, nothing comparable will take place.

II. The People Call to God (1:5–2:17)

A. Summoning the People (1:5–14)

This unit is made up of four stanzas headed by imperative verbs and addressed to different sectors of the population. The first (vv. 5–7) begins with "wake up" and is addressed to the drunkards. These are the drinkers who will wake up to discover that there is no more wine for them. This theme permits the reader to see—even if it is not explicit—that the absence of wine will affect ritual activities in the Temple. The second stanza (vv. 8–10) begins with "lament" and is addressed to the wife who cries for the lost husband of her youth. This widow, who symbolizes those who have survived the disaster, will no longer receive the love that she deserves. In the next stanza (vv. 11–12), the farmers and vinedressers are called to lament and wail for the tragedy. Four verbs in v. 12 derive from the same Hebrew root with the meaning "to be dry." This diction reveals that the experience reflected in this text is a drought in which the temperature and the lack of moisture have killed not only crops but all plants. The final stanza addresses the priests with many imperative verbs: "put on sackcloth," "lament," "wail," "sanctify," "call," "gather." The text emphasizes that the priests are responsible for the destiny of the people.

B. Devastation of the Land (1:15–20)

The text opens with the announcement that the Day of the Lord is imminent. Next come five stanzas in which the victims of this tragedy are listed. In the first place are the people and the Temple (v. 16). Then come crops and plants (v. 17), and after these the cattle (v. 18). Verses 19–20 mention pastures, trees, wild animals, and streams. This gradual buildup in the description of all that is being destroyed demonstrates that the disaster affects all known reality. It is important to note that there is no reference to locusts in this unit.

C. Military Invasion (2:1–11)

The description of the army—using imagery inspired by a plague of locusts and by the consequences of a long drought—provides the literary context for developing the theme of judgment on the oppressor nations in the next part of the book (2:18–3:17). It is well known that ancient Near Eastern authors often made the comparison between armies and locusts. The Ugaritic legend of King Keret reports that his army was "like locusts that dwell in the land." Sumerian and Assyrian texts also used this image: "In huge numbers, like locusts, they covered the land," is said of the Gutean soldiers in a text from the third millennium. In the Bible one finds similar statements. Judges 6:3–5 speaks of the Midianite people as "thick as locusts," and Jer 46:23 describes the army of the Assyrian king as "more numerous than locusts."

D. Asking for Mercy (2:12–17)

This first part of the book closes with a summons to ask God for mercy. These verses present a call to every group and generation of the people; it is astonishing that even children and babies are mentioned. This inclusive call affirms that no one lies beyond the judgment of God or beyond God's blessing. At the end of this unit, the question, "Where is their God?" exemplifies Israel's status in the eyes of foreign nations. They mock Israel, challenging the power of Israel's God.

III. God's Answer (2:18–3:17)

The second part of the book clarifies the characters at work in the first part. Specific nations are now named. Specific acts of violence against Israel—e.g., the sale of its citizens into slavery—allow the reader to understand the actual dimensions of the tragedy described earlier in more general terms. This second part must be understood as an outgrowth of the book's first part.

A. The Restoration of Life (2:18–27)

This unit is built on a parallel structure:

18	Introduction	A	The Prophet Speaks
19–20	1 st stanza	B	God Answers
21–24	2 nd stanza	A'	The Prophet Speaks
25–27	3 rd stanza	B'	God Answers

Following a brief introduction announcing that God will now speak are three stanzas in which the voice of God alternates with that of the prophet. God acts by restoring the natural environment that had been destroyed by the enemy. In v. 25, the voice of God refers to the prologue (1:4), saying that the people will be repaid for the years of destruction created by the locusts, "my great army, which I sent against you." This reference is part of the continual semantic play in Joel where the text continually moves between the historic and the eschatological realms.

B. The Promise of the Spirit (2:28–32)

The irruption of God in the middle of the community will transform it. The spirit will be poured over all people, even over those whose life is normally excluded from the divine blessing. To give the spirit to "sons and daughters . . . old people . . . youths . . . male and female slaves" stands in tension with some of Israel's religious traditions, especially since the priests are not included in this list. The primitive Christian community read this text as prophecy fulfilled before their eyes in the events of Pentecost (Acts 2:17–21).

C. God's Judgment (3:1–17)

From a literary point of view, this unit may be divided into two subunits: an announcement (vv. 1–8) and a call (vv. 9–17) to judgment. The first part proclaims that God will judge the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The location of this valley is unknown (the naming of the modern Jehoshaphat Valley occurred at a much later time). The nations will be judged because they destroyed the land, sold Israelite children as prostitutes, and sent youths to the Greeks as slaves. They have taken the treasure of the Jerusalem Temple to use as ornamentation for their own temples. The subsequent call to war stands in direct contrast to the famous texts of Isa 2:4 and Mic 4:3, as it here urges the people to "beat your plowshares into swords."

IV. Epilogue: God's Justice (3:18–21)

There are many points of contact between the prologue and epilogue. For example, the tragedy (1:2b) corresponds with the blessing (3:20); the devastation of the land (1:4) corresponds with the promise of fertility (3:18). In the prologue, there is a reference to the origin of the disaster (1:3) whereas now a better future is envisioned (3:18a; 21b). At the beginning of the book, the locusts/army brings destruction and death, while now God is the giver of restoration and salvation. The text moves from a time of catastrophe to a time of well-being, making clear the basic message of the book: There will be justice for those who have suffered oppression, and that day will be one of abundance and blessing for them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

P. Andiñach. "Joel." Global Bible Commentary. Daniel Patte, ed. (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004) 272–76; J. Barton. Joel and Obadiah (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); J. Crenshaw Joel. AB 24C (New York: Doubleday, 1995); G. Ogden and R. Deutsch. A Promise of Hope: A Call to Obedience: A Commentary on the Books of Joel and Malachi. ITC 10 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); M. Sweeney. The Twelve Prophets. Berit Olam. 2 vols. (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 2000) 147–87; H. W. Wolff. Joel and Amos: A Commentary on the Books of the Prophets Joel and Amos (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977).

AMOS

M. DANIEL CARROLL R.

OVERVIEW

The book of Amos is renowned for championing social justice. Its best-known verse perhaps is 5:24—"Let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an everflowing stream." Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. appealed to these powerful words as part of his "I Have a Dream" speech at the Lincoln Memorial in August, 1963.

Amos often is considered to have been the first writing prophet, and not a few commentators defend the authenticity of much of the book. Critical scholars have suggested successive stages of editorial expansion of the original prophet's words. A recent trend is to attribute the production of Amos, along with much of the Old Testament, to a circle of scribes in Jerusalem during the post-exilic, or Persian, period. There also is a growing appreciation for the literary artistry of the book. Several verses connect Amos to surrounding Minor Prophets (1:2, Joel 3:16 [Heb 4:16]; 9:12, Obadiah).

The heading (1:1) and other historical allusions place the prophet in the long reign of Jeroboam II, who ruled Israel during the first half of the eighth century BCE. For a portion of that time the nation was prosperous and strong. As the years progressed, the country began to suffer military setbacks. The internal situation also was precarious. The luxurious lifestyles enjoyed by those in power came at the expense of the poor, and the court system was corrupt.

Scholars have tried to identify specific features of Israel's socioeconomic system that resulted in the exploitation of certain segments of the population, e.g., rent capitalism, a tributary mode of production. Such suggestions may help readers understand particular passages, but there is not enough archaeological or textual data to identify with certainty the realities of eighth-century Israel. The book provides moral commentary, not sociological analysis. Nonetheless, the external pressures on and the domestic problems within Israel took their toll. After the death of Jeroboam the political situation quickly unraveled. In 722 BCE, the Assyrian armies conquered Samaria, the capital of Israel, after a lengthy siege, and the region became a province of the Assyrian empire.

The central focus of the book is the person of God. Amos' favorite name for God is "the LORD [God] of hosts" (Heb.: yhwh ['elohe] tseba'oth; 3:13; 4:13; 5:14–15, 27; 6:8; 9:5). In climactic declarations, three hymn-like passages assert that God is powerful (4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6). The fundamental message is that the all-powerful God will judge Israel because of its social injustice and military pride. The national religion propounded a view of the Lord that sanctioned a distorted view of reality (7:10–13). Confident in God's sure provision and protection, the people crowded the sanctuaries for celebrations (4:4–5; 5:4–6). But the god of their rituals and temples was a very different deity, not the God of the exodus (2:9–10; 3:1–2). Israel's political, economic, and religious system stood condemned: the military pretense would be exposed as groundless, the powerful punished for their oppression of the poor, and the sanctuaries destroyed. Beyond the judgment lay the hope of a restored land and a proper relationship with God (9:11–15).

OUTLINE

I. The Preface (1:1–2)

II. The Oracles Against the Nations (1:3–2:16)

A. The Oracle Against Surrounding Nations (1:3–2:3)

B. The Oracle Against Judah (2:4–5)

C. The Oracle Against Israel (2:6–16)

III. The Words of God and the Prophet (3:1–6:14)

A. Divine Exposure of Israel's Guilt (3:1–4:13)

3:1–4:3. The End of Samaria and Bethel

4:4–13. Religion Can Be Blind

B. Lament for the Death of Israel (5:1–6:14)

5:1–17. What Is in a Name?

5:18–27. The Delusion of Religion

6:1–14. The Delusion of Power

IV. Visions of Israel's Future (7:1–9:15)

A. Two Visions of Natural Disaster (7:1–6)

B. A Vision of Military Defeat (7:7–9)

C. Expansion: The Confrontation at Bethel (7:10–17)

D. A Vision of Religious Failure (8:1–3)

E. Expansion: The Cost of Religious Perversion (8:4–14)

F. A Vision of Divine Sovereignty in Judgment (9:1–6)

G. Expansion: The Hope Beyond the Ruins (9:7–15)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Preface (1:1–2)

This is one of the most complete superscriptions among the prophetic books. Tekoa is a town in Judah, about ten miles south of Jerusalem. Amos was a southerner commissioned to prophesy against the northern kingdom of Israel. The term translated "shepherd" (noqed) is not the usual word for shepherd (ro'eh) and appears in only one other passage (2 Kgs 3:4). The significance of the term is debated, but at the very least it suggests that Amos was not a poor sheepherder (cf. 7:14–15).

Verse 1:2 introduces the entire book. In so doing, it includes words and motifs that appear throughout the book: the roar of the Lord (3:4, 8; cf. 3:12); the hymnic tone (4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6); the mourning; and Carmel (9:3). God is the Divine Warrior, who comes in might to judge (cf. Judg 5:4–5; Mic 1:3). The roar portends disaster, which will be manifest in an earthquake (cf. Zech 14:5) and war. There is death in the offing. A better translation of "wither" is "mourn" ('abal'; cf. NASB, ESV). This verb reoccurs in 8:8, 10; 9:5 (cf. 5:16–17).

The Lord speaks from Jerusalem, the capital of Judah, implying that the government and religion of Israel are illegitimate. In addition, 9:11–15 announces that hope lies with a Davidic kingdom, not with Israel's present regime. This Judean perspective can explain the accusation of conspiracy leveled against Amos by Amaziah (7:10).

II. The Oracles Against the Nations (1:3–2:16)

This section contains oracles against eight nations, including Judah and Israel. Many scholars consider the oracles against Tyre (1:9–10), Edom (1:11–12), and Judah (2:4–5) to be secondary. There is historical evidence, however, to connect them to the period during which Amos was active. Moreover, catch-words link these three oracles to others, creating a coherent literary pattern.

The opening formula uses an $x/x+1$ pattern, with three as "x" (cf. Prov 30:18–19, 21–23, 29–31), and the phrase "I will not revoke the punishment." "Punishment" is an interpretive translation of the Hebrew, which actually reads, "I will not cause it to return" (NRSV note). The oracles are inconsistent in the number of transgressions listed, perhaps citing those considered the most heinous.

A. The Oracles Against Surrounding Nations (1:3–2:3)

There are several possible reasons for these judgments. It may be that God is responding to actions taken against his people (1:3, 13). Yet, not all these barbarities were directed at Israel. For example, the tomb of the king of Edom had been violated (2:1). In several oracles the victims are not identified (although they could be Israelites, e.g., 1:6, 9). The moral vision of the book reflects a concern for all peoples.

Cruelty in warfare is condemned throughout these oracles. The threshing of Gilead in Transjordan (1:3) could refer to physical torture or could be a figurative expression for brutality (cf. Isa 41:15). The buying and selling of slaves (1:6, 9) also correspond to that context. While in the ancient world some fell into slavery because of debts (2:6; 8:6), many slaves were the victims of armed conflicts. The similarity of vocabulary in the oracles concerning Philistia (1:6–8) and Tyre (1:9–10) and the similar fate of Edom suggest that these nations will be punished in a coordinated way.

The punishment in every case involves defeat. These nations' important cities would be razed (1:7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2) and their own people and leadership punished and sent away (1:8, 15; 2:3). Cruelty would beget cruelty, a judgment in kind. The instrument of divine chastisement is not specified. These words found fulfillment when the Assyrian Empire conquered the nations of this region.

B. The Oracle Against Judah (2:4–5)

The fact that the oracles against Judah and Israel begin with the same formula indicates that at one level these two nations were no different than those who did not claim the Lord as their god. In addition, although Amos was from Judah, he was not reluctant to rebuke that nation as well. The prophet is not a narrow-minded nationalist.

Many readers assume that religious defection—following after other gods—is indicted in v. 4, but another interpretation is possible. Judah had rejected the law (torah) of the Lord, and that law covered every sphere of life. Parallels in Isaiah about rejection of divine instruction confirm that such sin is not limited to cultic matters (Isa 5:24; 30:9). "Lies" could refer to words of false prophets (Mic 2:11) or to wrong-headed decisions of national leaders (Hos 7:13; Isa 28:15, 17), which would result in destruction (Mic 3:5; Isa 3:12).

C. The Oracle Against Israel (2:6–16)

This indictment is the longest and most detailed. The transgressions of Israel do not include military violence, however. Seven abuses are enumerated in 2:6–8. Commentators differ on the meaning of each, but there is no doubting that they all constitute some sort of injustice against the vulnerable.

The nation had forgotten the Lord's gracious acts in its past (2:9–10; cf. 3:1–2) and now tried to compromise his representatives (2:11–12). Consequently, Israel's army would be routed (2:14–16).

Seven kinds of soldiers are listed: perfect sin (2:6–8) yields perfect defeat. Israel's "day," like that of the other nations (1:15), will be a time of military disaster (cf. 5:18–20).

III. The Words of God and the Prophet (3:1–6:14)

This major section is usually associated with the "words of Amos" (1:1). It can be subdivided into two parts, 3:1–4:13 and 5:1–6:14. Chapters 3–5 begin in similar fashion: "Hear this word."

A. Divine Exposure of Israel's Guilt (3:1–4:13)

3:1–4:3. The End of Samaria and Bethel. This subsection can be divided into various segments. The first two verses emphasize that Israel has violated its unique relationship with the Lord, which had been certified at the exodus (cf. 2:9–10). The seven questions in 3:3–6 describe a series of encounters. They move from a vague question to an encounter with God, and all but the first involve death. An inclusio connects 3:1–2 with 3:3–8 ("the LORD [God] has spoken"), while the "roars" of 3:4, 8 remind the reader of 1:2.

This ominous tone continues in 3:9–4:3. There is a call for other nations to witness the sin in Samaria, the capital, where abuses abound (3:9–10). An invasion has been decreed as Israel's punishment. The enemy will destroy the strongholds, the sanctuary at Bethel, and the fine homes of the royal family (3:11–15). The powerful, who coldly take advantage of the poor, will lead the way into exile (4:1–3). This is the doing of the roaring divine lion, who has caught his prey and left but scraps (3:12).

4:4–13. Religion Can Be Blind. These verses censure religious practices. The Lord evaluates the rituals at the sanctuaries as sin. They were designed to fulfill the religious desires of the people. There was no sacrifice for sin, just thanksgiving for the goodness of God (4:4–5). This religion was totally disconnected from the realities of hunger, drought, agricultural failure, and defeat (4:6–11).

These five disasters are accompanied by the fivefold refrain, "yet you did not return to me." The afflictions had been designed to force the people to seek the true Lord, but they preferred the religion of national blessing. Israel must prepare for an encounter with God, who is described with five participles that emphasize his incomparable might (4:12–13).

B. Lament for the Death of Israel (5:1–6:14)

This section is made up of three parts, each of which includes a chiasm—that is, a concentric ring structure whose climax is at its center.

5:1–17. What Is in a Name? The announcement of an encounter with the Lord in 4:13 is followed by a lament (5:1–3). This woe concerning a terrible defeat in battle is matched with mourning in city and countryside alike (5:16–17). The charge to seek God instead of the historic sanctuaries (5:4–6) is echoed in 5:14–15, a charge that makes clear that genuine faith requires establishing justice. The metaphor of twisting God's demands in poisonous ways (5:7) is made concrete by the accusations in 5:10–13.

The first hymnlike passage appears in 5:8–9. This powerful God will destroy the defenses of Israel. At the center of these lines, and of the entire passage, is the statement "The LORD is his name." He is the main point of the prophetic message. The misrepresentation of God has yielded—and authorized—an oppressive society.

5:18–27. The Delusion of Religion. A second woe hits at the conviction that the day of the Lord would be the occasion of victory. It would be nothing of the sort! Instead, it will be utter darkness and inescapable ruin (5:18–20). These verses are matched with 5:26–27, which reiterate that military defeat would result in exile (cf. 4:1–3). Verse 26 is difficult to translate but probably refers to Mesopotamian astral deities that would accompany the people into exile.

5:21–23, 25 condemn the religious practices of Israel. 4:4–6 had urged the people not to look for God at the holy places; these verses denounce every kind of ritual (seven are listed in 5:21–23). The visceral response of God to this unacceptable worship is manifest in the verbs. True worship had not been like this in the past; it cannot be that way now (5:25). The center of this passage is v. 24. It underscores the inseparable connection between ethics and worship.

6:1–14. The Delusion of Power. The last segment of this section also begins with an expression of woe. The opening verses that decry the complacency of the leaders find their parallel in the false confidence in military might in 6:13–14. They had conquered Lo-Debar, literally "no-thing"!

6:4–7 describe a marzeach feast. These were gatherings of the well-to-do, perhaps to honor the dead. They were renowned for excessive drinking and consumption. The corresponding verse (6:12) questions the nonsensical nature of this lasciviousness (cf. 5:7). God rejects this state of affairs and will tear down their cities (6:8, 11). The center of this chiasm is 6:9–10. Although the details are hard to reconstruct, the scene seems to portray a kinsman who must burn the corpses of those who have died (in the war or an earthquake).

IV. Visions of Israel's Future (7:1–9:15)

The final three chapters contain five visions (continuing the penchant for series of five). Visions three through five are followed by explanatory expansions.

A. Two Visions of Natural Disaster (7:1–6)

In the first two visions the prophet pleads with the Lord, asking him to "forgive" and "cease" (7:2, 4). Amos intercedes when he sees the agricultural devastation to be wrought by locusts (cf. Deut 28:42; Joel 1) and a fire strong enough to dry up the cosmic deep (cf. Gen 7:11). Some scholars suggest that these visions come from early in Amos' career, when there was still the possibility that God might not punish Israel. Such reconstructions are hypothetical. The literary mood is one of impending doom that is withheld only momentarily. In stark contrast to the proud self-assurance of the nation, Amos understands that Israel is "small," incapable of defending itself against the coming enemy invasion and helpless before these natural disasters.

B. A Vision of Military Defeat (7:7–9)

Although the traditional translation for the term 'anak is "plumb line," this Akkadian loan word actually means "tin." The image again is of self-delusion. The walls of the strong fortresses are like walls of tin. The Lord has torn off a piece and thrown it in scorn amongst the people.

C. Expansion: The Confrontation at Bethel (7:10–17)

This passage illustrates how compromised the religion of Israel had become. Amaziah accuses Amos of conspiracy and makes clear the bond between the national ideology and the worship of God (7:10–13). The high priest and his family will personify Israel's judgment of death and exile (7:16–17).

There is further information concerning the prophet. He was not from a prophetic guild before his calling by God. He had been a "herdsman" (boqer, a term that implies he owned sheep and cattle). In addition, he worked with sycamore trees (there is little agreement as to what this entailed). These do not grow in the area of Tekoa, so it is possible that the prophet owned multiple properties. This reinforces the impression of 1:1 that Amos was a man of means.

D. A Vision of Religious Failure (8:1–3)

The fourth vision is a basket of summer fruit (qayits). This term offers a word play with "end" (qets). Israel's hour had come; the joyous celebrations in the temple decried earlier will be replaced by wailing for the dead.

E. Expansion: The Cost of Religious Perversion (8:4–14)

Amos 8:4–6 recalls the avarice and the exploitation of the poor in 2:6. The Lord's response is swift. Prior vocabulary and themes reappear in 8:7–13, such as the descriptions of God in 5:8, the mourning of 5:16–17, the "day" of 5:18–20. Ironically, those who silenced the prophets (2:11–12) will not find a word; the "pride of Jacob" does not refer here to the arrogance of Israel (6:8) but to the glory of God.

Scholars disagree about whether 8:14 refers to other deities or whether these were various names for the Lord in different sanctuaries. This decision depends in part on the translation of 'asmat semeron, whether as the goddess "Ashimah" (NRSV) or as the "guilt of Samaria" (NASB, NIV, NKJV). The former would point to syncretism, the latter to a heterodox Yahwism.

F. A Vision of Divine Sovereignty in Judgment (9:1–6)

The fifth vision shows the Lord beginning to punish Israel at a temple, most likely the sanctuary at Bethel (cf. 3:15; 5:5; 7:10). He strikes at the center of the religious system, which consecrated the social world of Israel in God's name. Although such destruction could stem from an earthquake, reference to "the sword" suggests a war (9:1). Again, there is no escaping (9:2–4; cf. 2:14–16; 5:19). Like the other hymnic passages, 9:5–6 emphasizes the power of the Lord of hosts, who commands the earth and the heavens.

G. Expansion: The Hope Beyond the Ruins (9:7–15)

God disabuses Israel of any misplaced confidence in its election (9:7–10). That special relationship left the nation without excuse (2:9–10; 3:1–2), and it did not mean that the Lord was not involved with other peoples. All nations must respond to the demands of God. Israel would suffer at his hand, but some from Israel would survive. This motif had been hinted at earlier (3:12; 5:14–15; 6:9–10).

Amos 9:11–15 declare that a future lay beyond the catastrophe. Many scholars attribute these verses to an author other than Amos. Still, one must recognize that the oracle reverses the conditions wrought by earlier disasters. There will be food and drink, not hunger and thirst; the towns will be rebuilt, and the land tilled and harvested in contrast to the dismantling of the fortresses and homes in the invasion. This is a picture of plenty and of a people at peace. This will occur under the rule of a Davidic monarch, and those nations with whom Israel had been at war (chs. 1–2) will become members of that kingdom. "On that day," the Lord of hosts will become "the LORD your God." The relationship with his people will be fully restored.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman. Amos: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 24A (Garden City: Doubleday, 1989); M. D. Carroll R. Amos—The Prophet and His Oracles: Research on the Book of Amos (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); J. H. Hayes. Amos the Eighth-Century Prophet: His Times & His Preaching (Nashville: Abingdon, 1988); J. Jeremias. The Book of Amos: A Commentary. OTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); P. J. King. Amos, Hosea, Micah: An Archaeological Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); S. M. Paul. Amos: A Commentary on the Book of Amos. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1991); G. V. Smith. Amos: A Commentary (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989); H. W. Wolff. Joel and Amos. Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977).

OBADIAH

CAROL J. DEMPSEY

OVERVIEW

The shortest of all the Old Testament books, Obadiah consists of twenty-one verses. Nothing is known about the prophet. His name, which means "worshiper of Yahweh," was common in Israel. The book of Obadiah was written sometime between the late sixth century and the early fifth century BCE. The prophet's message, which is directed primarily against Edom, focuses on the "day of the LORD." For Edom, this day will be dreadful; for Israel, it will be hopeful and promising.

Obadiah's prophecy against Edom is part of a series of prophecies against foreign countries. An invective against Edom appears in several prophetic texts, including Isa 34:5–17; 63:1–6; Jer 49:7; Ezek 25:12–14; Amos 1:11–12; and Mal 1:2–4. In Obadiah, the Edomites are guilty of deeds that exploit Judah in its time of weakness. Edom reaps God's righteous anger on account of its deeds.

The book focuses on justice, power, and divine sovereignty. God will exercise divine justice on Israel's behalf. Together with the other nations, Edom will be made to suffer when the day of the Lord dawns. Embedded in the text is the ancient belief in lex talionis—eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth, fracture for a fracture, life for a life (see Obad 1:15; cf Lev 24:18–21). What Edom has sown, Edom will reap: the strong and powerful become the powerless, while the one restrained from exercising power, namely Judah, becomes powerful (v. 18). God will vindicate Israel through a display of power that brings liberation for one group of people at the cost of another. The text betrays the violent climate of the day, and shows how violence can be used to color religious imagination. Finally, not only will the exiles be restored to their land but also, and perhaps more importantly, the kingdom will be restored to God (v. 21). Obadiah's vision celebrates a new world order, with God reigning over all people and nations.

OUTLINE

I. Introductory Statement (1a)

II. Prophecy Against Edom (1b–14)

A. Divine Indictment Against Edom (1b–4)

B. Proclamation Outlining Edom's Demise (5–9)

C. Description of Edom's Transgressions (10–14)

III. Prophecy Concerning the Day of the Lord (15–21)

A. Word of Judgment Against Edom (15–16)

B. Word of Hope and Promise to Israel (17–21)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

Verse 1a indicates that Obadiah's prophecy originated in a vision, most likely an intuitive experience that engaged the prophet's entire being. Verses 1b–14, a divine indictment against Edom, features the prophet delivering God's message in poetry. Multiple voices can be heard throughout the text. The poet begins with God quoting the Edomites (v. 1c), a technique that provides the poet's audience with the necessary material to set the stage for subsequent proclamations. The Edomites have heard a "report from the Lord"—presumably a bad one (v. 1c)—and responded in a hostile manner (v. 1d). Here the poet depicts God quoting the Edomites directly. Verses 2–4 describe God's response: God will make Edom "least" among the nations; Edom will be despised (v. 2). Edom is then shown to be proud and self-exalted, two characteristics captured metaphorically through the image of a soaring and high-roosting eagle. This people, however, will suffer humiliation (v. 4). Central to Edom's downfall is the people's haughty "heart," the seat of intelligence and central place for all relational activity in ancient Israel (see, e.g., Deut 6:4–6; 7:7; 10:16).

Verses 5–9 outline Edom's demise. Edom will be plundered (v. 5), pillaged (v. 6), deceived by trusted allies (v. 7), stripped of wisdom and understanding (v. 8), and defeated militarily (v. 9). Edom will become weak and vulnerable.

Verses 10–14 expose Edom's transgressions, which include brutality against the Israelites, symbolized by the reference to Jacob (v. 10), participation with other nations in treachery against Jerusalem and Judah (v. 11), and most detestably, the gloating over and boasting about Judah's misfortune (vv. 12–13b), not to mention Edom's looting of Judah, along with handing over Judah's survivors during its time of distress and misfortune (vv. 13c–14). Edom is guilty of abusing "Jacob" in countless ways, all of which incites divine fury that comes to a climax in vv. 15–16.

Verses 15–16 focus on the day of the Lord and begin the second part of the book (vv. 15–21). God warns Edom and the nations that "the day of the LORD" is imminent and that those found guilty of injustice and oppression will reap what they have sown. Implied in the imagery of drinking is the metaphor of God's cup of wrath from which Edom and all the nations will have to drink on the day of the Lord. The cup's contents will cause suffering, pain, helplessness, and disgrace (cf. Isa 51:17, 22; Jer 25:15–29).

Images shift in vv. 17–21. The poet proclaims God's message of hope and promise to a community scorched by military invasions, deportations, the loss of land and Temple, and exile. These verses outline the various territories that Judah will acquire, and foreshadow a day of celebration and jubilation when Judah is liberated from exile and restored to the land. The graphic metaphor in v. 18 depicts Jacob and Judah as representative of the Northern and southern kingdoms, respectively. With this metaphor, the poet points to a time when Judah will overtake Esau (Edom) and all the other countries that Esau represents. The "fire" and "stubble" symbolize divine judgment on Edom. Judah's resurgence as a country is linked to its restoration to the land which, in turn, is related to covenant renewal with God. A people once oppressed by an enemy will now govern that enemy. Although hopeful, the text reflects the imperialistic attitudes embedded in an ancient world and culture, many of which remain present in today's world and which require transformation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. Ben Zvi. A Historical-Critical Study of the Book of Obadiah. BZAW 242 (New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1996); W. P. Brown. "Obadiah." Obadiah through Malachi. Westminster Bible Companion (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1996) 7–14; C. J. Dempsey. The Prophets: A Liberation Critical Reading (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); P. R. Raabe. Obadiah. AB 24D (New York: Doubleday, 1996); M. A. Sweeney. "Obadiah." The Twelve Prophets. Volume One. Berit Olam (Collegeville, Minn. The Liturgical Press, 2000) 279–98; H. W. Wolff. Obadiah and Jonah. CC. Margaret Kohl, trans. (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1986).

JONAH

BARBARA GREEN

OVERVIEW

It is difficult to know when the book of Jonah was written. A Jonah ben Amittai appears in 2 Kgs 14:23–27, but, given the Bible's propensity to assign fresh adventures to its heroes, it is possible, though not necessary, to hypothesize an eighth-century backdrop for the book. Assyrian Nineveh was a bitter enemy of Israel from the ninth to seventh centuries, possibly before and not afterward. Those favoring a post-exilic date for the writing of most biblical material will be persuaded that the anxiety of post-exilic Jerusalem, threatened, spared, but existing under further threat, may find in the city of Nineveh—also condemned, reprieved, but destroyed—a provocative analogue. Some scholars have claimed that a theme of universalism in the book helps to date it as exilic, in opposition to the more restrictive viewpoints of Ezra and Nehemiah. However, such a view represents a primarily Christian assessment of the book, with centuries of Jewish commentators reading the story quite differently. The book of Jonah is wonderful literature. The literary structure of the book is symmetrical and balanced. Its two halves are closely related at both the macro and micro-levels. The genre of the book has been variously understood—as a parable, a riddle, a satire. The plot of the story has been scrutinized and anomalies uncovered. If earlier commentators tended to rearrange the story where logic seems deficient, now scholars highlight these moments: That Jonah does not leave the environs of Nineveh after many think he should (4:5) and that he provides information about his motives tardily (4:1–3) afford space for the interpretation of the character and meaning of the book. Scholars draw attention to use of words that tie sections together (great, appoint, wicked, hurl), the book's tendency to use unusual vocabulary (show concern in 4:10–11), and the ambiguity of the central word, overthrow, with which Jonah addresses the city at 3:4. Such literary analysis has displaced some of the attention once paid to historical questions.

Scholars offering diverse opinions about the meanings of the book have pointed out the vast network of choices any interpreter must face and have shown that reading is more a matter of the stance of the interpreter than had once seemed the case. The characterization of the prophet as churlish or fearful, the importance accorded to the Gentile sailors and Ninevites, and the nature of the relationship between deity and prophet can be and have been read in ways that seem contradictory.

OUTLINE

I. In Flight (1:1–17)

A. Superscription (1:1)

B. Call and Flight (1:2–5)

C. On Board the Ship (1:6–14)

D. Overboard (1:15–17)

II. In the Fish (2:1–10)

A. Swallowed (2:1)

B. At Prayer (2:2–9)

C. Landed (2:10)

III. In Nineveh (3:1–10)

A. Preaching (3:1–4)

B. Response of Nineveh (3:5–9)

C. Response of God (3:10)

IV. Outside Nineveh (4:1–11)

A. Response of Jonah (4:1–4)

B. Awaiting Results (4:5–8)

C. Final Questions (4:9–11)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. In Flight (1:1–17)

1:1. The superscription identifies the object of the address as Jonah son of Amittai.

1:2–5. Jonah is commanded to cry out against the city Nineveh, whose wickedness was evident to God. Neither the content of the cry nor the nature of the evil is specified. Jonah's response is acted rather than spoken: he flees to Jaffa, finds a ship, pays the fare and boards, heading away from Nineveh to escape God's commission. God hurls such a storm that the sailors begin to jettison the cargo to lighten the ship and keep it from sinking. Jonah sleeps, the word conveying a condition beyond natural slumber (1 Kgs 19:5) or, alternatively, irresponsible laziness (Prov 19:15).

1:6–14. The captain rouses Jonah and asks him to pray to his deity in the hopes that God might respond. Throughout the book, the deity is variously named: as God/Elohim, as Yahweh, or with both names, allowing—in a book involving both Jews and Gentiles—appropriate ambiguity. The word Elohim does double duty as distinctive designation for the one God and as a common plural for others. The sailors cast lots, assuming correctly that the guilty party will be selected. Jonah is identified and questioned urgently about his mission, origin, homeland, and ethnic identity. The interrogation generates not name and mission but Jonah's ethnic and religious commitment: a Hebrew with allegiance to the God who made heaven and earth. Commentators point out the irony in Jonah's readiness to identify the God from whom he has sought to escape overland and by sea as master of just those realms. Also provocative is Jonah's admission of responsibility for the storm, which the narrator summarizes rather than letting us hear just how Jonah would describe his behavior for his fellow-travelers. Such reticence is one of the ways the narrator manages to keep complex and uncertain the character of the hero. The sailors evidently recognize the deity in question, for their fear and their outrage increase. They ask Jonah what they might do. He offers one option: that the sailors throw him overboard—whether as appeasement to the deity or removal of a sinner is not clear. He does not volunteer to jump but hints that he would not resist their action. They seem loath to do it and attempt to return to shore, but to no avail. Finally, with conditions worsening, they pray to not be held guilty of shedding innocent blood, acknowledge God's sovereignty, and hoist their troublesome passenger overboard.

1:15–17. The sea calms at once, and the sailors are last seen revering God, offering sacrifices, and making promises to Jonah's deity who has assisted them. The deity who hurled the storm accepted the jettisoning of Jonah and appointed a large fish to swallow him. For three days and three nights the prophet remains within the fish and prays to his deity from there. The identity of the fish has been a question for centuries; translations starting with the Septuagint specify it as a whale. The ancients—Jewish and Christian—understood it allegorically as the underworld, death, a synagogue, or the like.

II. In the Fish (2:1–10)

2:1–9. Some commentators have thought that the prayer was extraneous, different in tone from the tale in which it was embedded. It recalls in form and phrasing various laments and thanksgivings (e.g., Pss 31:22; 69:1–2; 88:7–8). The language suits sojourn in the sea better than within a fish. Others note that Jonah never specifically asks for rescue. The fish tends, on the whole, to be viewed negatively by commentators, though nothing in the story demands such a view; the fish saves Jonah.

2:10. At God's prompt, the fish disgorges its passenger onto dry land.

III. In Nineveh (3:1–10)

3:1–4. The narrative resumes without reference to Jonah's previous effort to evade the commission. Nor is the content of Jonah's preaching specified. A string of verbs characterizes Jonah's obedience: He proceeds to the large city and begins his preaching at once; its effect is immediate. Jonah's pronouncement is most terse: "Forty days more and Nineveh shall overturn" (3:4, author's translation; NRSV, "shall be overthrown"). The utterance is a mere five words in Hebrew, making Jonah the Bible's most laconic prophet, and possibly the most direct! What remains unspecified is the significance of the word overturn. The Hebrew word was used to depict the violent fate of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 18). But the verbal form in question here occurs in the reflexive or passive aspect of the verb, allowing for the possibility that the overturning can be the city turning itself around.

3:5–9. The words have a phenomenal impact on the citizens of the city. The people believe God. And then first the citizenry and then the king fast and don sackcloth. Though people and animals have already done so, the king and nobles issue a decree commanding the fast and the turning from violence contemplated against others. The king concludes, like the captain of the ship, that God may repent and turn away from anger so that the city will not perish.

3:10. Readers learn from the narrator that God observed the Ninevites' deeds, changed his mind, and did not carry out the threatened destruction.

IV. Outside Nineveh (4:1–11)

4:1–4. Jonah is upset at something not precisely specified in the Hebrew, though clarified in translation: it was very displeasing (4:1) should refer to something Jonah witnessed, plausibly the Ninevite behavior (alternatively, though popularly in commentary, God's change of mind that Jonah learns outside the narrative). Jonah, ruminating on his experience in prayer, offers a flashback from his moment of flight, revealing that he fled toward Tarshish because of God's propensity toward mercy and habit of relenting from disaster. The encomium describing God's ways in 4:2 occurs numerous times in the Bible, with similar wording (e.g., Exod 34:6–7; Deut 4:31; Ps 145:8). Jonah ends this prayer with no request but that his life be taken. Readers may choose to infer negativity about the Ninevites, but it is explicit in neither discourse nor narrative. God responds, querying the appropriateness of the prophet's anger. Jonah maintains the justification of his feelings.

4:5–8. The narrator provides fresh information about Jonah's actions: he leaves the city going east (rather than homewards), builds a shelter, and waits to see what will happen next. God appoints a plant (of disputed type) to shelter him. Jonah rejoices. But God next appoints another animal (worm rather than fish) to attack the plant, which is vulnerable under the hot sun and fierce east wind, also appointed by God. Jonah opines that death is better than life.

4:9–11. The book's final section features a final intervention from God, in the form of an analogy. God remarks that the prophet's distress over the plant resulted from neither labor nor long acquaintance. It emerged quickly and disappeared as rapidly. Yet Jonah evinced concern for it. God now asks Jonah: Should not I show concern for a whole city of creatures, unable to distinguish right hand from left? Jonah remains silent. Scholars have for millennia speculated about the meaning of the analogy. It seems a matter of relationship: Jonah's experience with the plant was brief; yet he felt concern for it. God has, arguably, been in a relationship with a city of people for a longer time, has expended labor on its behalf, thus justifying God's concern for the city. Readers may also find here evidence of God's care for Jonah, given the time and energy expended on him!

Jonah's non-response to God's question (v. 11) provides readers with another conundrum. Can one imagine what Jonah would have said? That Jonah is deeply upset is clear. That he has reproached God about mercy is also clear, though he stopped short of wishing God had not spared the city. That Jonah has not left the environs is apparent, though what he expects to see is not stated. The book ends somewhat in the manner of a NT parable, which prompts response from those who heard it. If Jonah's silence is to be broken, interpreters must do it. Readers can think about the book in various ways: To struggle to understand God's ways with large cities that do evil but turn from it as well; to contemplate the nature of prophecy itself. A Hebrew and Gentiles (mariners and Ninevites) exist in the book. How do they interact? What possibilities of change of heart are manifest here, and what may one learn from such behavior? There are many ways to interpret this short narrative, though it may be better to ask the kind of probing questions that conclude the book rather than to assert firm conclusions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. K. M. Adam. "The Sign of Jonah: A Fish-Eye View." Semeia 51 (1990) 177–91; E. Ben Zvi. Signs of Jonah: Reading and Rereading in Ancient Yehud (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2005); B. Green. Jonah's Journeys (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2005); J. M. Sasson. Jonah. AB 24B (New York: Doubleday, 1990); P. M. Trible. Rhetorical Criticism: Context, Method, and the Book of Jonah (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994).

MICAH

CAROL J. DEMPSEY

OVERVIEW

Rich in imagery, metaphors, and intricate wordplays, the book of Micah presents itself as a word addressed to the people of Israel and Judah in the latter half of the eighth century BCE during the reigns of Jotham (742–735 BCE), Ahaz (735–715 BCE), and Hezekiah (715–685 BCE). Though Micah's career as a prophet appears expansive, most likely it spanned only the last quarter of the century when Hezekiah reigned. Together with Amos, Isaiah, and Hosea, Micah was one of the four great prophets of the eighth century BCE. Little is known about his person. His name means "Who is like the Lord," and although the name is common in ancient Israel, he is distinguished from others by being identified with Moresheth—otherwise known as Moresheth-gath (1:14)—located twenty-one miles southwest of Jerusalem.

The book reflects a period in Israel and Judah's history that was plagued by Assyrian military invasion, beginning with the Syro-Ephraimitic War (734–732 BCE) down through Sennacherib's invasion of Judah in 701 BCE. In the midst of these turbulent years, however, Judah experienced religious reforms and an economic revolution that left the wealthy landowners growing in prosperity at the expense of small peasant farmers. Religious and political leaders began to view their vocations and positions as business careers with opportunities to assert their power for purposes of self-interest instead of for the common good. The times, then, became fraught with injustice, oppression, and corruption. The prophet Micah addresses the political, social, and religious climate of his day as he rails against the perpetrators of graft (see, e.g., Micah 1–3) while offering not only a vision of a new world order (see 4:1–5) but also a message of hope (e.g., 2:12–13; 4:6–8).

Micah makes clear that Israel's God will not tolerate injustice rooted in and flowing from apostasy, idolatry, hypocrisy, the disregard for the Torah, and a break in the covenant relationship. Divine justice will be meted out, and yet, the final word of the book as a whole offers a word of universal compassion (7:18–20), but not before the prophet intercedes on behalf of the people (6:6–8) and, in so doing, creates one of the most-oftenquoted passages of the entire Bible (see 6:8).

The book of Micah grew over time. Micah 1–3 is generally accepted as authentic to Micah; Micah 2:12–13 could be a later addition, but evidence remains inconclusive. Micah 6:1–7:6 may also be attributed to Micah with the remainder of the book consisting of a compilation of later additions. The book includes a wide array of literary forms and techniques, i.e., judgment speeches (1:2–7; 3:1–2), laments (1:8–16; 7:1–7), a lawsuit (6:1–5), prayers (7:14–17, 18–20), reflections (6:6–8), and metaphors (e.g., 1:2–4; 2:12–13; 3:1–3; 4:1–5, 8–13; 7:1).

OUTLINE

I. Superscription (1:1)

II. Proclamation of Judgment; Word of Hope (1:2–3:12)

A. Judgment Speech (1:2–7)

B. Dirge-Lament (1:8–16)

C. Woe Proclamation (2:1–5)

D. Disputation Prophecy (2:6–11)

E. Salvation Proclamation (2:12–13)

F. Address to Israel's Political Leadership (3:1–4)

G. Proclamation concerning the Prophets (3:5–7)

H. Interlude: Statement of Confidence (3:8)

I. Address to Israel's Leadership (3:9–12)

III. Proclamation of Future Restoration (4:1–5:15)

A. Prophetic Vision (4:1–5)

B. Divine Promise (4:6–5:15)

IV. Words of Judgment, Lament, Trust, Promise, Petition, and Compassion (6:1–7:20)

A. Covenant Lawsuit (6:1–5)

B. Torah Lawsuit (6:6–8)

C. Judgment Speech (6:9–16)

D. Lament (7:1–7)

E. Statement of Trust (7:8–10)

F. Divine Promise (7:11–13)

G. Petition (7:14–17)

H. Statement of Divine Love (7:18–20)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

The book of Micah opens with a superscription (1:1) typical of many prophetic books (see, e.g., Isa 1:1; Jer 1:1–3; Hos 1:1; Amos 1:1; Zeph 1:1) that situates both prophet and proclamation in a particular time period, and here specifically in the latter part of the eighth century BCE. All three kings mentioned ruled over Judah. The prophet's proclamation is the result of something that "came" to him, which he "saw" concerning Samaria and Jerusalem, the capital cities of the northern and southern kingdoms, respectively. The prophet seems to have had an intuitive experience that involved a vision.

II. Proclamation of Judgment; Word of Hope (1:2–3:12)

A. Judgment Speech (1:2–7)

The first major section of the book (1:2–3:12) includes a proclamation of judgment (1:2–2:11; 3:1–12) and a word of hope (2:12–13). Micah 1:2–7 is a judgment speech. The poet calls his listeners and the whole earth to attention, and also calls upon God to be a witness among the inhabitants of the land (v. 2). With metaphorical language he next describes an impending theophany (vv. 3–4). God's coming is imminent and will have devastating effects. The poet uses imagery from the natural world as metaphors for Israel and Judah, which will eventually be destroyed through military invasions. Together, vv. 3–4 disclose the power of God and the powerlessness of creation before God.

With two rhetorical questions (v. 5), the poet next indicts Israel and Judah, and specifically their capital cities Samaria and Jerusalem, the seat of leadership. Both cities were associated with idolatry in the latter part of the eighth century BCE (cf. Mic 1:6–7). In Mic 1:6–7, God, speaking through the prophet, announces a plan to destroy Samaria because of its transgressions (v. 5b) and idolatry. Samaria represents Jacob/Israel, the northern kingdom. Samaria's fate symbolizes the fate of the entire kingdom.

Micah 1:2–7 presents a hierarchical and patriarchal picture of God and God's power. This God dwells in "his holy temple" (v. 2), enthroned in the heavenly court, who will "come down" (v. 3), creating quite a different picture from the God who walked in the garden in the cool of the evening (Gen 3:8) and who spoke with Moses as a friend (Exod 33:11).

B. Dirge-Lament (1:8–16)

Micah 1:8–16 is a dirge-lament. Verse 8 is a pivotal verse that looks backwards to vv. 5–7 and forward to v. 9. God will lament, wail, go barefoot and naked, make lamentation like the jackals and mourning like the ostriches because of the peoples' transgressions, the impending loss of the kingdoms, and the sad state of Jerusalem. Here nakedness is associated with sin (see Gen 3:10). God will perform all of these actions and sounds of lamentation through the prophet who will be a sign to the community of its sinfulness, while also being a sign of God's presence and an expression of God's righteous anger yet steadfast love. The "incurable wound" is the blow dealt by God (see Jer 15:18; 30:12–15; and Jer 1:14) that Judah and Jerusalem will soon endure, specifically, devastation at the hands of the Babylonians.

Verses 10–15 resemble a funeral song. All of the cities mentioned are located in the Shephelah—the lowlands of the region. When God comes down and treads upon the high places of the earth (1:3), not only will the mountains and the hilltops of Samaria and Jerusalem be destroyed but also the lowlands. The historical setting for this dirge-lament is most likely the Assyrian invasion by Sennacherib in 701 BCE (see v. 15b).

Verse 16 closes the dirge-lament. The poet exhorts his listeners to lament. The verse foreshadows the exile after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BCE. The use of the present perfect tense, otherwise known as the prophetic perfect tense of vision, for an event that has not yet happened, signifies that what is predicted will, in fact, happen.

C. Woe Proclamation (2:1–5)

Micah 2:1–5 is a woe proclamation. Together with Mic 2:6–11, these verses convey a stinging message of judgment. In v. 1, the poet proclaims a warning to those guilty of premeditated injustices, which he enumerates in v. 2. Verses 3–5 are an announcement of judgment composed of a proclamation of intended chastisement (v. 3), a prediction of disaster (v. 4), and a threat (v. 5). Here the poet depicts God as a schemer of actions that will take place to "get even" with those who have transgressed others. Those who have taken land will lose their fields (v. 4) and be banned from further acquisition of property. The text makes the point that God asserts divine power on behalf of those victimized by the abuse of power of others. Lastly, vv. 1 and 3 exemplify the principle of lex talionis (see Lev 24:18–21), which was part of Israel's social culture and which became part of its religious culture and Torah. Those who used power oppressively will experience the punitive power of God.

D. Disputation Prophecy (2:6–11)

Micah 2:6–11 is a disputation prophecy. God, speaking through the prophet, quotes the prophet's adversaries, a comment that reveals a strained relationship between God and some of the Israelites due to the Israelites' smug attitude (v. 6) and their deeds of injustice (vv. 8–9). The rhetorical question in v. 7 highlights the distance that exists between the people and their God. Verses 8–9 add new transgressions to the list already begun in Mic 2:1–2. The punishment for wickedness is expulsion from the land (v. 10). Hence, the people's ill-gotten land will provide no place for the guilty to rest, especially because it has become "unclean" because of the people's sinfulness (see Lev 18:24–25). The poet ends the prophecy on a note of sarcasm (v. 11), which is God's final response to the objection raised by the opponents in v. 6 who do not want to hear an honest prophetic word proclaimed.

The tone of the poet's message changes in Mic 2:12–13, a salvation proclamation that promises divine care to those exiled, the remnant of "Jacob." Here "Jacob" does not refer to the northern kingdom; instead, "Jacob" refers to Judah as the remnant of Israel which, in turn, sets the stage for restoration promised in Mic 4–5. Verses 12–13 will serve as a consolation for the people when they are exiles, if only they remember them.

E. Salvation Proclamation (2:12–13)

Micah 2:1–13 makes several theological points. First, the community addressed is struggling and living under a divine threat (vv. 1–11) and divine promise (vv. 12–13). Second, even those people closest to God are liable to sin and must accept the consequences of their actions. Third, since land is a divine gift, others' property rights and boundaries must be respected (see Exod 20:15, 17; Deut 15:4–5). Fourth, power, wealth, and status are not to be used to exploit others. Last, Israel's God is a God of justice who will not tolerate injustice.

F. Address to Israel's Political Leadership (3:1–4)

G. Proclamation concerning the Prophets (3:5–7)

The poet now returns to his proclamation of judgment (3:1–12). This new unit consists of an address to Israel's political leaders (vv. 1–4), a proclamation concerning the prophets (vv. 5–7), an interlude (v. 8), and another address to Israel's leadership (vv. 9–12). The poet exposes the overt and subtle abuse of power. In vv. 1–4, 5–7, and 9–12, the poet outlines the injustices and sins of Israel's political and religious leadership. The rhetorical question in v. 1 indicts Israel's leadership who do not act justly and who are the "haters of good and the lovers of evil" (v. 2a; author's translation). The poet continues his invective with a brutal metaphor in vv. 2b–3 that compares Israel's leaders to savage butchers and voracious cannibals who treat people like animals ready to be consumed. The poet next assaults verbally Israel's prophets (vv. 5–7), who are guilty of leading the people astray, who have corrupted their prophetic office for personal satisfaction and gain, and who will lose their prophetic gifts on account of their corruption.

H. Interlude: Statement of Confidence (3:8)

In v. 8, the poet sets himself apart from those whom he has been attacking and, in so doing, he becomes a refreshing contrast to the corrupted leaders of his day. To be filled "with power" is to be filled with God's Spirit and, consequently, with justice and might; such a person is responsible for exposing injustice. Thus, the prophet performs his tasks, proclaims God's word, and lives his life in the power and Spirit of God.

I. Address to Israel's Leadership (3:9–12)

In Mic 3:9–12, the poet again rails against the political and religious leaders of his day, inclusive of the community's priests (v. 11). He lists the wrongs of which his addressees are guilty and then mocks them by quoting their own words. He proceeds to inform his audience that because of the leaders' injustices, and all the other social injustices (see Mic 2), Jerusalem and the Temple—symbols of God's presence—will be destroyed. And yet, the presence of the Spirit-filled prophet remains among the people as a sign of God's enduring love for the people.

III. Proclamation of Future Restoration (4:1–5:15)

A. Prophetic Vision (4:1–5)

B. Divine Promise (4:6–5:15)

The second major section of the book (4:1– 5:15), a proclamation of future restoration, consists of a prophetic vision (4:1–5) and a divine promise (4:6–5:15). Verses 1–5 offer a vision in which weapons are destroyed and transformed into tools of production at the peoples' initiative. The prophecy promises (v. 1) the reestablishment of Mount Zion—the Lord's mountain—which was considered a sacred mountain that had great importance for the whole world. The image of all the countries streaming to Zion to learn God's ways suggests a sense of unity as well as a certain religious solidarity that the countries will have with Judah (v. 2). Verse 3 depicts God as a judge who arbitrates in an effort to establish universal peace and security among all peoples of the earth (v. 4). Verse 5 suggests and celebrates a common vision of faith shared among world religions. In this poem, the poet offers a prophetic message: the peace that can exist among all countries and the unity with the Divine can be a goal and can become a reality for world politics and world religions.

Micah 4:6–5:15 is a divine promise of restoration after exile. God will heal and transform the weak and afflicted into a strong nation, and will establish divine reign over them on Mount Zion (4:6–8). The mention of God having caused the affliction of the people harks back to Mic 1:9. Images of childbirth in 4:9–10 hint at the new life soon to be experienced. The language of harvesting in 4:11–13 symbolizes Israel's victory over hostile nations.

The language of Mic 5:1 is curious. Here the poet points to the time when Jerusalem will be invaded and its present ruler will be insulted by a slap on the face. The image shifts quickly in vv. 2–

5, where the poet describes a new messianic ruler soon to be born in Bethlehem, who will be "the one of peace" (v. 5a). Verses 5b–6 offer another reference to peace, this time when Assyria is conquered. Verses 7–9 continue the theme of Israel's transformation heard earlier in Mic 4:6–8. The remnant of Jacob, once weak, will now be made strong like a lion, capable of defeating all its enemies. The poet closes this section of the book with a description of what God intends to do to Israel in the "new day." God will cleanse Israel of all its idols (vv. 10–14) and, in anger and wrath, will execute vengeance on the nations that did not obey (v. 15). This last verse is harsh. The poet is proclaiming that Israel's God—the sovereign one—is not only Lord of creation but also Lord of history. Again, language about God reflects the historical background and backdrop of life lived in the latter part of the eighth century BCE.

IV. Words of Judgment, Lament, Trust, Promise, Petition, and Compassion (6:1–7:20)

A. Covenant Lawsuit (6:1–5)

B. Torah Lawsuit (6:6–8)

The third major section of the book (6:1– 7:20) includes words of judgment, lament, trust, promise, petition, and compassion. Micah 6:1–5 is a covenant lawsuit. In vv. 1–2, the poet prepares the audience to hear God's case against Israel, which a bewildered God lays out in vv. 3–5 in conciliatory fashion while recounting past events (see Exod 1–15; Num 22–24). The people have forgotten their story and, in the process, have forgotten the graciousness of their God. Verses 6–8, a torah liturgy, are a response to God's questions, plea, and demand for an answer. Here the prophet stands in a humbled, self-reflective, penitential state, representing his people who have yet to come before the Lord. Micah raises three soulsearching questions aimed at atonement. Each question reflects a willingness to offer some sort of sacrifice, culminating in the offer to sacrifice one's firstborn for the sake of one's sin. What God requires, however, is justice, lovingkindness, and a humble walk together (v. 8). The humble walk with God will reveal what needs to be done by way of justice and lovingkindness.

C. Judgment Speech (6:9–16)

A raging voice from God, angered over the people's transgressions, is heard once again in vv. 9–16, a judgment speech. Following an initial statement that calls his listeners to attention (v. 9), the poet depicts God enumerating a list of the Israelites' unjust behaviors, and the divine plans to be executed upon the guilty parties (vv. 10–16). The poet describes a punitive God who uses the natural world to chastise a wayward people. This situation triggers a lament from the poet (7:1–7).

D. Lament (7:1–7)

E. Statement of Trust (7:8–10)

F. Divine Promise (7:11–13)

G. Petition (7:14–17)

In Mic 7:1–7, the poet uses similes and metaphors created from the natural world to describe the condition of his society; it is a wasteland, totally corrupt. The prophet, however, does not lose heart: he places his confidence in his God (v. 7) and utters a profound statement of trust (vv. 8–10). Another divine promise of restoration follows next (vv. 11–13; cf 4:6–5:15), accompanied by the prophet's petition that God care for the people as in the days of old (vv. 14–17), which in turn would serve as an instruction to all the nations.

H. Statement of Divine Love (7:18–20)

The book of Micah closes with what is, perhaps, the most poignant of all words within the prophetic corpus. In Mic 7:18–20, the prophet asks a simple rhetorical question (v. 18a) that leads into a heartfelt statement that describes God's compassionate and faithful love for all time (vv. 18b–20). Although the text as a whole is filled with biting words of judgment, with some sections sprinkled with promises of restoration, the final word of the prophet and the text is a word of hope, a word of love, and herein is revealed the true God of Israel.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. Ben Zvi. Micah. FOTL 21B (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); C. J. Dempsey. "Micah." The Prophets: A Liberation Critical Reading (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000) 23–33; W. McKane. The Book of Micah (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998); M. A. Sweeney. "Micah." The Twelve Prophets. Volume 2. Berit Olam (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2000) 339–416; B. K. Waltke. A Commentary on Micah (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007).

NAHUM

JAMES D. NOGALSKI

OVERVIEW

The prophet Nahum comes from Elkosh (1:1), a town whose location is not known. The prophet's name, ironically, means "comfort," yet the bulk of Nahum presents a message of devastation. Nineveh/Assyria is the primary object of God's wrath in Nahum (though it is explicitly mentioned only in 1:1; 2:8; 3:7, 18). This concentration on Assyria, and its capital Nineveh, is explained by historical circumstances of the seventh century BCE. The book appropriately comes after Micah (the last eighth-century prophet) and before Habakkuk (a book that anticipates the rise of Babylon). Nahum represents Judah's seventh-century concern about Assyria before Nineveh passes from the political scene in 612 BCE.

Judah became a de facto vassal of Assyria in the last third of the eighth century and remained so for the better part of a century until Assyrian hegemony weakened to the point at which Josiah was briefly able to assert some level of political independence at the beginning of his adult reign (622), well before his death at the hands of the Egyptian Pharaoh Necho II (609).

The book of Nahum consists of three independent poetic pieces joined together by editorial transitions. The structure of Nahum probably represents a post-exilic expansion of an earlier collection of poetic pronouncements celebrating Assyria's downfall. The expansion incorporated the theophany (1:2–8) as a theological reflection upon divine punishment of the wicked, thus interpreting the judgment that follows as part of God's cosmic justice—overthrowing even powerful nations who dare to act against the God of creation.

OUTLINE

- I. Superscription (1:1)
- II. Semi-acrostic Theophany Anticipating God's Wrath and an Editorial Transition (1:2–8, 9–15)
- III. First Song of Destruction and Transition (2:1–12, 13)
- IV. Second Song of Destruction and Conclusion (3:1–17, 18–19)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

The superscription of Nahum actually contains two titles, a clue that it may result from more than one level of editorial activity. The first part of the superscription focuses on the object of the following judgment ("an oracle concerning Nineveh"). Nineveh was the capital city of Assyria for much of the period of Assyrian domination, from the end of the eighth century to Nineveh's destruction at the hands of the Babylonians and Medes in 612 BCE. The second part introduces the prophetic figure to whom the message is attributed (the book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite). Neither this prophet nor his hometown is mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament.

II. Semi-acrostic Theophany Anticipating

God's Wrath and an Editorial Transition (1:2–8, 9–15)

1:2–8. Semi-acrostic Theophany. Nahum 1:2–8 has been placed at the beginning of the book by editors for literary, historical, and theological purposes. Nahum 1:2–8 was originally an independent poem that used an acrostic style to describe the awesome power of Yahweh's appearance as a threat to Yahweh's enemies. Unlike other acrostic poems in the OT (see Lam 1–4; Pss 9–10; 119), however, Nah 1:2–8 appears to have been designed to proceed only halfway through the alphabet with each subsequent line beginning with the next letter of the alphabet (though this pattern is disturbed in four lines (vv. 2b, 2c, 4b, 6a). These disruptions to the acrostic pattern echo ideas from Mic 7 and other texts in the Book of the Twelve. The theophanic orientation likely prompted the poem's incorporation into the Book of the Twelve. A similar theophanic poem, probably added at the same time, concludes the book of Habakkuk (3:1–19).

In addition to the acrostic pattern, Nah 1:2–8 exhibits a clear rhetorical logic. Yahweh's character (jealous and avenging) provides the rationale for a description of Yahweh's appearance in a storm that also draws upon traditional creation images of the Divine Warrior battling the forces of chaos to reestablish order in the world (1:2a, 3b–4). This action causes all creation (the mountains, hills, land, and world, 1:5). to tremble. Nahum then calls for a response with a rhetorical question (who can endure Yahweh's wrath?) while 1:7–8 respond to this question from two directions. Those who take refuge in Yahweh will find protection (1:7) while Yahweh's enemies will be utterly destroyed (1:8).

Editorial Transition (1:9–15). Nahum 1:9–15 functions as an editorial transition between the theophany proclaiming Yahweh's vengeance on his enemies and the introduction to the earlier collection celebrating the demise of Nineveh. Parts of 1:9–15 presuppose the theophany of 1:2–8 by addressing those plotting against Yahweh. For example, Nah 1:9–10 uses plural verbs. In contrast, other portions of the passage address three different characters using singular pronouns: (1) the personified Lady Nineveh (indicated by second-person, feminine singular "from you") address in 1:11, 12a ; (2) her king ("one has gone out who plots evil against the LORD" in 1:11)¹ who will soon be destroyed for his (third-person, masculine singular in 1:13) hostility toward Yahweh; and (3) Lady Zion (1:12b, see also 1:15 about the removal of her oppression). The presence of these separate characters makes the passage difficult to follow in English translation. The address to Lady Nineveh and her king probably constitute an earlier introduction to the corpus before the addition of the theophany. However, the combination of the theophany with this expanded introduction equates the enemies of Yahweh in 1:2–8 with Assyria, its king, and its capital city as it announces reprieve for Jerusalem. Nahum 1:9–15 thus provides a theological framework from which to understand Assyria's destruction so powerfully depicted in the two poems that comprise the bulk of Nah 2–3. Two motifs in the editorial transition reappear at the end of the book (thereby creating an inclusio): the futility of Assyrian might (1:12; 3:15b–17) and the direct address of the Assyrian king regarding his imminent death (1:14; 3:18–19).

III. First Song of Destruction and Transition (2:1–12, 13)

2:1–13. First Song of Destruction. Chapter 2 forms the first of two composite units setting forth graphic descriptions of the downfall of Nineveh. The extent to which this chapter represents a single composition is debated, but there is little doubt that both chs. 2 and 3 are compiled in such a way as to portray two parallel descriptions of Nineveh's destruction. The subunits in ch. 2 include an address to Lady Nineveh announcing the impending attack as the work of Yahweh to relieve Jacob/Israel (2:1–2); a description of the warriors (2:3); the initial onslaught of chariots and the hapless Assyrian nobles (2:4–5); a poetic depiction of the city destroyed (2:6–8); a description of the aftermath of the city's destruction (2:9–10); and a satirical reflection on the illusion of Assyrian power using the metaphor of Assyria as a lion whose strength is no match for Yahweh (2:11–12). This poetry functions more like an impressionist painting than a narrative account. Image is piled upon image to create the sense of Nineveh's inevitable destruction, the futility of its defenses, and the totality of its defeat. The descriptive language is framed by claims that the destruction is the work of Yahweh, against whom earthly power is no match (2:1–2, 13). The concluding verse, placed in the mouth of Yahweh, summarizes the message using the images of chariots, lions, prey, and messengers from the preceding text, while at the same time anticipating the image of the sword in 3:3.

IV. Second Song of Destruction and Conclusion (3:1–17, 18–19)

3:1–19. Second Song of Destruction. Nahum 3 functions similarly to Nah 2. Its three subunits (3:1–7, 8–17, 18–19) each have their own internal logic, but function together within this context by depicting Nineveh's destruction, before returning to the motifs of the inadequacy of Assyria's strength (3:15–17) and the death of its king (3:18–19) with which the early corpus began (1:12, 14).

Nahum 3:1–7 conforms to typical patterns for a woe oracle: the initial accusation beginning with "alas" (3:1); a description of the disaster (3:2–3); a rationale for the punishment (3:4); and a divine response (3:5–7). Like 2:3–8, Nah 3:2–3 produces a series of images that convey a battle scene of deadly proportion. The rationale in 3:4 personifies Nineveh as a prostitute whose seduction of other nations leads them into slavery and debauchery. The divine response (3:5–7) depicts Yahweh abusing and humiliating this prostitute. Rhetorically, the shocking images of sexuality and violence underscore the severity of Assyria's punishment for the ancient reader even while they will likely offend the sensitivity of modern readers more accustomed to speaking of God's judgment in less explicit terms.

Nahum 3:8–17 is a composite taunt song made up of two main sections. It begins in 3:8–11 by drawing an analogy between the destruction of the mighty city of Thebes, the capital of the Egyptian empire (destroyed in 663 BCE) and the impending destruction of Nineveh in 612 BCE. Both cities were capitals of these powerful empires. Both cities were strategically situated on rivers that were used for defensive purposes. And both cities were thought to be impenetrable. Yet, both cities succumbed to the onslaught of superior power. The satire of this unit should not be lost. It was Assyria who destroyed Thebes in 663, but now the tables will be turned according to 3:8–11, with Assyria now destroyed. Nahum 3:12–17 begins and ends with botanical metaphors depicting Nineveh as a ripe fig tree whose fruit is ready for the taking (3:12), but it will be devoured by locusts (3:15–17). In between, Nineveh's troops (3:13) and its defenses (3:14) are mocked as ineffectual. The locust imagery in 3:15–17 functions in two ways: (1) locusts are used to convey Assyria's power through numerical superiority; (2) Assyria's locusts will be overrun by more powerful locusts.

Nahum 3:18–19, like 1:14, addresses the king of Assyria directly, using second masculine singular forms of address to speak of his imminent demise. Whereas Yahweh prepares the grave of the king in 1:14, Nah 3:19 speaks of the king's mortal wound, thus bringing death closer.

The book of Nahum, read in isolation, has sometimes been interpreted as a xenophobic rant, its message reduced to a celebration of the downfall of a hated enemy. Undoubtedly, the almost gleeful presentation of a nation's destruction should be assessed critically. However, recent work concerning the editorial shaping and placement of Nahum for the Book of the Twelve suggests that a broader purpose was at work in the incorporation of Nahum into its current canonical setting. The editorial hands that compiled the vivid depictions of Nineveh's destruction emphasized two theological claims, which need to be heard when one interprets Nahum. First, Assyria was not an innocent bystander on the political stage. For more than a century, Assyria's expansionistic and militaristic tendencies had terrorized the region and impoverished smaller nations from whom it exacted exorbitant taxes. Judah was no exception to this oppression. The editorial shaping of Nahum interprets Assyria's destruction as a potential end to Judah's oppression (1:12b, 15; 2:2). Second, the downfall of Assyria is portrayed as the work of Yahweh. Theologically, the power of God used to thwart the brutality and oppression of so powerful a force as the Assyrians is presented as a source of hope and justice. The book assumes that if God is a just God, then at some point God must intervene against a country that so blatantly flaunts its own power to do as it chooses. In the logic of the theophany at the beginning of the book, God appears in order to bring judgment against the guilty (1:3), while offering refuge to those who seek God (1:7). In this sense, Nahum makes a theological affirmation that Yahweh ultimately controls the powers of this world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. Coggins and S. P. Re'em. Israel Among the Nations: A Commentary on the Books of Nahum, Obadiah, Esther. ITC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. O'Brien. Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. AOTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004); J. J. M. Roberts. Nahum, ¹ Unless otherwise indicated by NRSV, the quotations from Nahum are direct translations by the author.

HABAKKUK

JAMES D. NOGALSKI

OVERVIEW

The name Habakkuk is unusual; it derives from an Akkadian word for a garden plant. Thus, unlike many prophetic names (e.g., Isaiah), it has no theophoric element. The plant name attests to the way in which Mesopotamian culture influenced Judah in the seventh and sixth centuries BCE.

Nothing is known about the individual named Habakkuk, although he is mentioned in Bel and the Dragon (1:33–39), a Greek Addition to the book of Daniel. There, Habakkuk is the prophet miraculously transported by the messenger of God to deliver food from Palestine to Daniel who is in the lions' den in Babylon.

At its canonical place in the Book of the Twelve, the book named for Habakkuk is presumed to have a seventh-century setting, though the final form of the book may date to the exilic or post-exilic period. The internal literary flow of the book and its position in the Twelve should be taken into account when interpreting Habakkuk. The bulk of the first two chapters functions as a prophetic complaint against the prosperity of the wicked and Yahweh's subsequent promise to send the Babylonians to punish them. Habakkuk 3 consists of a theophanic description of the Divine Warrior battling the elements of chaos (3:3–15) followed by the prophet's affirmation of confidence in Yahweh's decision (3:16–19).

Habakkuk is closely related to themes prominent in surrounding books, particularly the literature that extends from Micah to Zephaniah. Habakkuk follows Nahum's pronouncement of the end of Assyrian hegemony, but portrays the situation in Judah in terms similar to Mic 6:1–7:7 (note especially the similarity of Mic 7:7 and Hab 3:16). In the chronology and logic of the canonical order, a reader of the Book of the Twelve finds that the behavior confronted by the prophet remains virtually unchanged from the accusations that occur in Mic 6:1–7:7, even though the reader must assume that nearly a century has passed. Hence, the severity of Yahweh's response to the prophet's complaint (Hab 1:2–4), namely, that Yahweh will send the Babylonians (Hab 1:5–11), can be interpreted as part of Yahweh's ongoing frustration with people who continue to turn their back on Yahweh and on their covenantal obligations.

The book reflects multiple historical contexts. It presumes traditions regarding Babylon's rise to prominence in the seventh century BCE, but the theodicy comprising the foundational core of the book has parallels in exilic/post-exilic literature, the time when it reached its final form. However, the core of the third chapter (3:3–15) is a theophanic poem that exhibits archaic linguistic characteristics, though the frame around it may be attributed to a later setting.

OUTLINE

- I. Superscription (1:1)
- II. Complaint About the Wicked (1:2–4)
- III. Divine Response (1:5–11)
- IV. Renewed Complaint (1:12–17)
- V. Vision Recounted (2:1–5)
- VI. Five Woe Oracles (2:6–20)
- VII. The Prayer of Habakkuk (3:1–19)
 - A. Theophanic Petition and Vision (3:1–15)
 - B. A Prophetic Response (3:16–19)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

The first superscription (1:1; see also 3:1) functions as a title attributing chs. 1–2 to a prophet named Habakkuk. No other biographical information is provided.

II. Complaint About the Wicked (1:2–4)

In its current form, 1:2–4 begins with a prophetic complaint regarding the prosperity of the wicked and Yahweh's failure to act against them. The prophet articulates accusations of violence and wrongdoing as a perversion of the orderly world expected by God. Similar ideas are taken up again in 1:12–17 in what may have been the original continuation of this complaint.

III. Divine Response (1:5–11)

A divine speech comprises 1:5–11 by announcing impending punishment (1:5–6a) and describing the perpetrators of that punishment (1:6b–11). Even though addressed to a group, this unit responds to the prophetic complaint of 1:2–4. The unit begins with an admonition to read the signs of Yahweh's activity in the world, then identifies the Chaldeans (Babylonians) as the instrument Yahweh will use to punish the wicked in Judah (1:5–6a). The remainder of this response focuses its attention upon the fierceness of the Babylonians. The description of the Babylonians in 1:6b–11 appears designed to trump the description of Nineveh in Nah 3 with an even more imposing portrayal of Babylon as a ruthless, brutal enemy whom no one can stop. Its army marches through other lands as if they were not there (1:6–7), it relies on its own massive military power (1:7–8, 11), and it mocks those who stand in its way (1:10).

IV. Renewed Complaint (1:12–17)

Habakkuk 1:12–17 returns to the prophet confronting God regarding the prosperity of the wicked as in 1:2–4. However, in places, 1:12–17 expands this message to include the Babylonians among the wicked. Thus, while the prophet pleads that Yahweh rid the world of the wicked (1:12–13), the enemy is also described in corporate terms as one who conquers nations (1:17). This artful blending of wisdom motifs with prophetic judgment creates a theological paradox dealing with the question of God's role in history: Why would Yahweh allow the wicked in Judah to prosper and then punish them by sending the Babylonians?

V. Vision Recounted (2:1–5)

In Hab 2:1–5, the prophet continues to speak, announcing his decision to await a response from Yahweh (2:1), which the prophet announces (2:2a), then recounts (2:2b–5) as a message to resolve the theodicy question. This "vision" admonishes patience to the righteous, because a time of judgment will come even though it may seem to be delayed. The vision pronounces judgment upon the proud and arrogant whose greed leads them to Sheol and death. The righteous, by contrast, are those who live by faith (2:4). Embedded in this description of the fate awaiting the wicked, one hears an implied response to the initial complaint of 1:2–4: God will punish the wicked, but in God's own time. The final line of 2:5, however, appears to have in mind the punishment of the wicked nation sent by God who will "gather all nations to [himself]/and collect all peoples for [himself]." Thus, Hab 2:1–5 anticipates not one but two judgments in its final form: one for the wicked against whom the prophet railed at the beginning of the book, and one for the Chaldeans who will invade Judah. This same image of two stages of judgment comes back into play at the end of Hab 3. This image derives from theological reflection upon the events that transpired in the sixth century. Jerusalem's destruction in 587 was interpreted as punishment from God, as was Babylon's implosion as a regional superpower replaced by the Persians in 539 BCE.

VI. Five Woe Oracles (2:6–20)

Habakkuk 2:6–20 contains a collection of five small units organized around the formulaic presence of "woe" or "alas" (NRSV; Heb.: hoy) as an introductory marker (2:6, 9, 12, 15, 19). These oracles begin with an introduction (2:6a) to orient the reader to the collection's role. The content demonstrates the same dual focus on wisdom and political elements that appeared in Hab 1. A foundational composition warns readers to avoid certain destructive behaviors (greed, lust, violence, and idolatry). An application of this admonition to a corporate entity follows, which in the context of Habakkuk can only be interpreted as Babylon. The first thematic focus has as much in common with the wisdom tradition as with the prophetic tradition, whereas the second likely serves as the reason for incorporating Habakkuk into the Book of the Twelve. Habakkuk 2:6–8 begins with an introductory statement (2:6a) orienting the reader to the collection that follows as "mocking riddles." Habakkuk 2:6–7 admonishes against greed. Greed leads to overextending credit in the perpetual desire to increase one's tangible assets, only to find that one's own creditors suddenly appear to collect their due. Habakkuk 2:8 expands this admonition onto the political level by condemning the greedy as one who has "plundered many nations" and has caused bloodshed and violence to the earth. This application refers back to the violence about which the prophet complained in 1:2–3 as well as the description of the Chaldeans who mercilessly attack other countries (see 1:6–10).

The second woe (2:9–11) initially warns against powerful persons who oppress others to build their own houses, only to find that these actions will bring shame upon their own house. The house they build will itself become a testament to their greed, as noted in the language of personification: the stones and plaster crying out. The rationale expressed in the last half of 2:10b, however, once again expands the horizon of the wicked to one who has "[cut] off many peoples" as a means of applying this admonition, not to a wealthy individual, but as a warning to Babylon.

The third woe (2:12–14) differs from the first two in two ways. First, it focuses attention on acts of a powerful oppressor (one who builds a city with bloodshed and iniquity) and needs no reformulation to evoke the image of Babylon's impending attack. Second, it does not offer an explicit word of judgment. Rather, the result of the woe is a statement of confidence that the earth will recognize Yahweh's glory.

The fourth woe (2:15–17) returns to the pattern of condemning ethical misdeeds, in this case condemning the prurient behavior of getting one's neighbors drunk with the purpose of seeing them naked (2:15). The act will bring punishment from Yahweh by bringing shame upon those who perpetrate it (2:16). This fourth woe is also reinterpreted to apply to Babylon in 2:17, whose actions have devastated humanity and the animal kingdom.

The final woe (2:18–20) deviates from the stylistic and thematic pattern of the previous four. It is the only one of the five that does not begin with "alas" as the first word of the unit. Instead, it first introduces a new topic, idolatry, a religious rather than an ethical violation. Then, 2:19 condemns those who worship idols. The unit concludes (2:20) with a theological affirmation functioning as an implicit warning. In this sense, it has a universal theological point to make, like the end of the third woe: Yahweh is in his holy temple, and all the earth should keep silent before him.

These woe oracles, like Hab 1:5–2:5, show evidence that ethical and religious admonitions have been reinterpreted as judgments against Babylon. In their final form, they accuse a nation (Babylon) of behavior (greed, lust, and idolatry) worthy of judgment in the eyes of God. A foreign nation stands accountable to Yahweh's ethical pronouncements.

VII. The Prayer of Habakkuk (3:1–19)

Habakkuk 3 offers numerous interpretive challenges due to its linguistic difficulties, tradition history, and transmission. Portions of Habakkuk 3 are often cited as some of the oldest Hebrew poetry in the OT, though some argue this linguistic style imitates ancient patterns rather than presenting an authentic archaic form. This archaic poetic style is made more complicated due to the presence of ancient mythical traditions, which have been used to describe Yahweh. Finally, the transmission of this chapter is unusual on two fronts. First, this chapter bears the hallmarks of cultic transmission, which make it resemble a psalm more than a prophetic pronouncement. The chapter has a psalm-like superscription (3:1), a subscription (3:19b), and a triple use of selah (3:3, 9, 13)—an enigmatic musical notation that elsewhere appears only in the Psalter. The ritual character of the chapter makes it unusual for prophetic literature in general, not just the book of Habakkuk. Second, Hab 3 is nowhere attested in the Qumran scrolls. The Habakkuk Pesher (an ancient biblical commentary found at Qumran) stops at 2:20, despite having more room on the scroll, and no other fragment contains verses from Hab 3. Despite the absence of Hab 3 from the Qumran scrolls, most scholars think the chapter was an integral part of the book long before the time of the Qumran community.

A. Theophanic Petition and Vision (3:1–15)

Habakkuk 3:1–2 contains the second superscription of the book (see 1:1) and introduces the following verses as a prayer, a designation that reflects the function of the language of the chapter's framing elements (3:2, 16–19). The frame contains a petition to Yahweh (3:2) and an affirmation of confidence in Yahweh's strength and power to deliver (3:16–19). The first-person speaker petitions Yahweh for mercy even while anticipating judgment "in the midst of years" (not "in our own time" as NRSV in 3:2).

Habakkuk 3:3–15 conveys a complex theophanic portrait in two parts. The first part (3:3–7) functions as a theophany report proper in which God's appearance from Teman/Paran is announced (3:3), followed by a description of God's appearance (3:4–5) and a recounting of its effect on the created order (3:6) and the regions of Cushan and Midian (3:7). These place names are associated with the mountainous Sinai region, a place frequently present in theophanic portrayals. The responses of creation and the nomads of Cushan/Midian convey the fear that Yahweh's presence elicits. Nonetheless, these areas are not the target of the Warrior. This language of fear and the mountain regions are quite at home in Divine Warrior texts in which Yahweh goes to battle against an enemy (Judg 5:4–5; Deut 33:2; Pss 18:7–15; 114:3–8; Isa 30:27–28; Jer 25:30–31).

The second portion of the theophanic portrait, 3:8–15, provides a hymnic description of Yahweh's battle against the enemy, a description that draws upon Divine Warrior traditions to depict Yahweh's defeat of chaos. These ancient images have roots in Canaanite and Mesopotamian mythology where the respective deities battle the Sea and the River in narratives recounting creation. However, the Canaanite and Mesopotamian traditions in Habakkuk have been transformed into a story of Yahweh defeating the enemy. In the context of Habakkuk, the unnamed "enemy" is appropriately interpreted as Babylon—even if it was not originally the opponent (see reference to the nations [plural] in 3:12 and "the people [singular] to attack us" in 3:16b).

The second theophanic element begins with a rhetorical question (3:8). It presumes a negative response, turning the imagery of chaos on its head (since in the non-Israelite versions, a deity did battle Sea and River).

In Hab 3:9–11, the Divine Warrior attacks (3:9) and cosmic imagery attests to the fear of those who stand in Yahweh's way. The cosmic elements in 3:8–11 (river, sea, earth, mountains, the waters, great deep, sun, moon) evoke the ancient story of the deity taming the elements of creation.

The response implied by the rhetorical question of 3:8 is finally answered explicitly in 3:12–13. The target of Yahweh's appearance is "the nations" and the purpose of the battle is "to save your people" and "your anointed." How the reference to the nations is interpreted depends largely upon the context one identifies. Those paying attention to the entire canonical context of Habakkuk or its position in the Book of the Twelve tend to interpret the nations as those nations involved in the destruction of Jerusalem and its aftermath. Those who interpret Hab 3 as a separate poem tend to interpret the nations' relation to Yahweh as primarily a theological issue.

Habakkuk 3:13–14 make clear that the people and king are the ones for whom Yahweh does battle. Nevertheless, tension remains with the larger context of Habakkuk, which anticipates that this deliverance will happen only after the Babylonians punish Judah. Thus, the book assumes a twofold judgment, one from Babylon roused by Yahweh to attack Judah (1:5–11) and the second against Babylon by Yahweh (3:14, 16).

Habakkuk 3:15 reflects tension concerning the question with which the second part of the hymn opened (3:8). Verse 15 highlights the reinterpretation of the chaos battle hymn in 3:8–14. While 3:8 implied that Yahweh came against his enemies, not against the Sea, the allusions to the chaos battle reinterpret the enemy as the nations (3:12), meaning the statement that Yahweh did trample the Sea becomes a statement about the ultimate destruction of the enemy (Babylon).

B. A Prophetic Response (3:16–19)

Habakkuk 3:16–19 constitutes the remaining portion of the editorial frame that surrounds the theophany. Like 3:2, Hab 3:16–19 anticipates a time of inevitable judgment, which causes great consternation and trepidation. Nevertheless, this speaker also affirms trust in Yahweh (3:18–19) even while acknowledging difficult days ahead (3:17). These verses appear designed to comment on the theophanic vision of 3:3–15. The prophet recognizes Yahweh will ultimately prevail against the enemy (assumed to be Babylon when read with Hab 1–2), but the enemy will still attack the prophet's people.

The response to the vision (3:16–19) framing the theophany appears to have been expanded in two ways in 3:16b–17. First, 3:16b shows awareness that the independent hymn (3:2–15, 16a, 18–19) has interpreted the enemy as Babylon as in Hab 1–2 (note the enemy is "the nations" in 3:12, but one people in 3:16b). Second, this additional material demonstrates awareness of other writings in the Book of the Twelve in two specific ways. First, the reference to God's appearance as a "day of calamity" recurs in three successive prophetic books (Nah 1:7; Hab 3:16; and Zeph 1:15; see also Obad 12) referring to the downfall of Assyria, Babylon, and Jerusalem respectively. Second, the (for Habakkuk) unusual motif of the land's fertility draws on imagery from Joel 1–2, as do other texts in the Book of the Twelve. In such editorial expansions, editors invite readers to contemplate the ways in which various texts in the Book of the Twelve reinforce each other. This literature perceives the continuity of God's message to the prophets, proclaiming that God is at work in and through history.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. I. Andersen. Habakkuk. AB 25 (New York: Doubleday, 2001); J. M. O'Brien. Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. AOTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004); J. J. M. Roberts. Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah. OTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991); M. A. Sweeney. "Habakkuk." The Twelve Prophets. Vol. 2. Berit Olam (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2000).

ZEPHANIAH

JAMES D. NOGALSKI

OVERVIEW

The name Zephaniah means "the LORD hid" (i.e., "hid from danger"). Following the superscription, the book may be divided into three thematic groupings of short sayings and speeches (see outline). In many respects, Zephaniah functions as the southern counterpart to Amos in the Book of the Twelve, with the bulk of the message pronouncing judgment against Judah (instead of Israel) and the nations. From the beginning, judgment is inevitable, unavoidable, and imminent. Judgment against Judah (1:4–6, 9–13) intertwines with words of universal judgment (1:2–3) and pronouncements concerning the day of the Lord (1:7, 8, 14–18; 2:1–3). Like Amos, Zephaniah's oracles against the nations (2:4–15; 3:8) essentially end with judgment against God's own people (3:1–7). Zephaniah concludes with a series of promises, both for the world at large (3:9–10) and for Zion (3:11–20). Unlike Amos, however, Zephaniah depicts the Lord, not a Davidic monarch, as king of the restored Zion.

OUTLINE

- I. Superscription (1:1)
- II. Judgment Against Creation and God's People (1:2–2:3)
- III. Oracles Against the Nations and Judgment Against God's People (2:4–3:8)
- IV. Promises of Deliverance for the Nations and for Zion (3:9–20)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Superscription (1:1)

The superscription of Zeph 1:1 contains three elements: a word-event formula, a regnal formula, and an extended genealogy. Mention of the word of the Lord is a recurring element at the beginning of prophetic books (see Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Mic 1:1); it emphasizes the source of the prophet's authority.

The presence of Zephaniah during Josiah's reign is significant on two fronts. First, it sets the historical context for reading Zephaniah (even though the final form reflects a later period). Second, reference to Josiah and Hezekiah accounts for Zephaniah's placement as the final prophetic writing in the Book of the Twelve that presumes a pre-exilic literary setting.

Other prophetic superscriptions cite a prophet's ancestry (Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jonah 1:1; Isa 1:1; Jer 1:1; and Zech 1:1 [two generations]), but only Zeph 1:1 traces a prophet's heritage back four generations, presumably to demonstrate his royal lineage by portraying Zephaniah as a descendant of Hezekiah (the last Judean king mentioned in the Book of the Twelve [Mic 1:1]).

II. Judgment Against Creation and God's People (1:2–2:3)

A series of sayings pronounces judgment on creation (1:2–3) and Judah (1:4–6), then explores various features of the day of Lord (1:7–17) before calling Judah to seek the Lord (2:1–3).

Zephaniah 1:2–3 draw upon language from the Priestly story of creation (Gen 1) and the flood story (Gen 6–9) to introduce the book's message. In so doing, 1:2–3 pronounce judgment upon the created elements in reverse order to their appearance in Gen 1. By itself, 1:2–3 suggest universal judgment, but, given its position at the outset of the book, this cosmic language interprets the significance of the judgment to follow as something akin to the undoing of creation. Zephaniah 1:2–3 does not speak of a universal judgment followed by a second stage of judgment on Judah and Jerusalem (1:4–13). The integration of allusions to the Priestly account suggests a post-exilic provenance for the composition and placement of these verses.

The next subunit, 1:4–6, pronounces judgment upon Judah and Jerusalem because a number of groups have broken faith with the Lord (the remnant of Baal, the idolatrous priests, those worshipping astral deities, and those blending the worship of the Lord and other deities). The actions condemned fit relatively well in a late seventh-century setting, at least as described by the biblical accounts of Josiah's reforms. Given the previous reference to Josiah (1:1), 1:4–6 give the impression of judgment pronounced for many of the same behaviors that motivate Josiah's reforms in 2 Kgs 23.

The next thematic group, 1:7–18, revolves around the impending day of the Lord and its implications. Many short sayings (1:7, 8, 9, 10–11, 12–13, 14–18) are loosely connected by "on that day/time" formulas, but together they paint a portrait of impending disaster sent by the Lord. Zephaniah 1:7 introduces the theme to follow by calling for silence in anticipation of the day of Lord as a cultic sacrifice. In 1:8, the day of sacrifice will result in punishment of the political leaders for their tendency to ingratiate themselves to foreign overlords (the officials, the sons of the king, and all those wearing foreign garments). Zephaniah 1:9 announces punishment "on that day" for the superstitious (or syncretistic) practice of jumping over thresholds out of fear of evil spirits who might reside there (see 1 Sam 5:5). Zephaniah 1:10–11 changes the focus of judgment to the broader community of Jerusalem's inhabitants, an emphasis that continues into 1:12–13. Given the specific judgments against particular groups in the preceding "day of the LORD" statements, the inclusion of various districts in Jerusalem as the object of destruction eliminates any suggestion that the impending day of Lord will only affect a select few.

In Zeph 1:14–18, a series of short statements reflects upon the nature of the impending day of the Lord. Several phrases associated with the day of the Lord have parallel expressions elsewhere in the Book of the Twelve. The end of this unit (1:18) exhibits the same universal perspective concerning the day of the Lord as that in 1:2–3, but most of 1:14–18 coincides with the previous pronouncements against Jerusalem and Judah, again suggesting the judgment's scale and significance.

Zephaniah 2:1–3 calls on the pious in Judah to seek the Lord in the hope that the Lord will allow them to survive the coming destruction on "the day of the LORD's wrath." This oracle presumes the possibility of a remnant that will survive, surviving because they seek the Lord, righteousness, humility, and justice (mishpat). Since the idea of judgment on all the earth (1:18) serves as an introduction to the oracles against the nations (2:4–3:8), 2:1–3 seem out of place.

III. Oracles Against the Nations and Judgment Against God's People (2:4–3:8)

The oracles against the nations (OAN) in Zephaniah cover four regions: two smaller kingdoms to the west (Philistia) and east (Ammon/Moab) followed by two major powers of the seventh century (Egypt and Assyria) with whom Judah had to contend prior to the rise of Babylon. Inclusion of the larger powers distinguishes Zephaniah's oracles from those of Amos (Amos 1:3–2:16), but the surprise ending of the OAN switches to judgment against Jerusalem, much like Amos' OAN conclude with judgment against Judah (2:4–5) and Israel (2:6–16). Despite reference to Zephaniah as a prophet from the time of Josiah (Zeph 1:1), several allusions to Judah as a remnant suggest these oracles have been edited for an exilic/postexilic community.

The oracle against the Philistines (2:4–7) uses eight names to identify the region: the same four Philistine cities mentioned in Amos 1:6–8 (Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron); two ethnic terms (Philistines and Cherethites); and two geographic terms (Canaan and the seacoast). In its current form, 2:4 and 2:5 are oddly positioned since the opening of 2:4 ("for . . .") does not make sense as the cause for seeking the Lord in 2:3, and the first word of 2:5 (hoy) usually signals a new unit. Zephaniah 2:4–7 provides no reason why the Philistines are singled out for judgment. This oracle promises that the "remnant of the house of Judah" will take over the land and houses of Philistia (2:7). As such, this oracle probably presumes the destruction of Jerusalem, though this has been debated.

The next oracle (2:8–11) pronounces judgment against the Moabites and Ammonites for taunting the people of the Lord (2:8) who are again called a "remnant" (2:9), suggesting an exilic or early post-exilic date. Ammon and Moab will suffer the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, an allusion to the destruction recounted in Gen 19:24–29.

The oracle against the Ethiopians (2:12) is generally interpreted to mean Egypt. The reasons for referring to Egypt as Cush (Ethiopia) are not entirely clear since Ethiopia was not a major power in Josiah's time. At any rate, the brief, vague, ungrounded judgment against Ethiopia (meaning Egypt) suggests a symbolic function, since Assyria is the next nation mentioned. The Assyria/Egypt polarity is common in many prophetic texts, especially Isaiah and the Twelve (see 2 Kgs 17:4; 23:29; Isa 7:18; 11:11, 16; 19:23–25; 20:4; 27:13; Jer 2:18, 36; Lam 5:6; Hos 7:11; 9:3; 11:5, 11; 12:1; Mic 7:12; Zech 10:10–11), and Cush appears elsewhere in Zephaniah (1:1; 3:1).

The oracle against the Assyrians (2:13–15) comments on the fall of Assyria. The latter half of the seventh century saw a gradual decline in the power of Assyria, until its final demise in 612 when Nineveh was destroyed. During its latter years, Assyria allowed Egypt to control parts of the trade routes. Only 2:15 implies a reason for judgment: Assyria's pride in its own strength. This charge appears elsewhere in prophetic literature (see Isa 10:12–15; Nah 3:8–13), but it is leveled against other countries as well, including Edom (Obad 3) and Babylon (Hab 1:15–17). The motif of nations mocking Assyria concludes Nahum (3:19). This oracle portrays Nineveh's destruction as a past event, which means it would have been written sometime after 612.

The oracle against Jerusalem appears unexpectedly in 3:1–7. When a woe oracle against the "soiled, defiled, oppressing" city begins in 3:1, nothing prepares the reader for the realization that the nation being condemned has changed. At first the reader assumes Nineveh continues to be addressed, but the accusations that it has not trusted in the Lord (3:2) and that its prophets and priests have broken faith with torah make clear that 3:1–7 concerns Jerusalem. This oracle against Jerusalem thus evokes a reminder of the main focus of 1:2–2:3, that Jerusalem will be punished.

Zephaniah 3:8 concludes the OAN with a statement characterizing judgment against the nations as a result of the Lord's indignation toward their behavior. The effect of the oracle against Jerusalem (3:1–7) followed by the conclusion to the OAN (3:8) implies the same dialectic with which Zephaniah began—pronouncements of broader judgment—and thus frames the specific pronouncements against Jerusalem. This judgment also anticipates motifs similar to those in the first vision of Zechariah, combining punishment of the nations after Jerusalem's judgment with the Lord's zeal (see Zech 1:14–15).

IV. Promises of Deliverance for the Nations and for Zion (3:9–20)

The last major section of Zephaniah (3:9–20) focuses upon Yahweh's salvific acts, both for the nations and Jerusalem, rather than on judgment. These promises have long been treated as postexilic additions to the book. The first unit (3:9–10) reverses the message of the OAN by pronouncing a blessing upon the nations (even using an artful allusion to reverse the situation of the tower of Babel story; cf. purified speech [brr + sph] in Zeph 3:9 and confused speech [bll + sph] in Gen 11:7).

The next unit, 3:11–13, addresses the personified Lady Zion directly (using second-person, feminine singular speech) announcing an end to the punishment in the distant future ("on that day") when Zion will be filled with a humble remnant that seeks Yahweh (3:12).

The address to Lady Zion continues throughout most of 3:14–20 (only 3:20 changes to a plural addressee). Zephaniah 3:14–17 announces the return of the victorious Warrior, calling Jerusalem to rejoice over the removal of the enemies (3:15) and twice reiterating the Lord's presence in the city (3:15, 17). The final promise (3:18–20) has likely been created for this particular place in the Book of the Twelve, since it draws upon Mic 4:6–7 and Joel 3, books that precede Zephaniah, while anticipating a return of the exiles, which reflects the situation in Haggai, a book that follows Zephaniah. The final verses of Zephaniah expect an eschatological renewal of the Lord's kingdom with Jerusalem as its center.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Berlin. Zephaniah. AB 25A (New York: Doubleday, 1994); J. O'Brien. Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. AOTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004); J. J. M. Roberts. Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah. OTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991); M. Sweeney. "Zephaniah." The Twelve Prophets. Vol. 2. Berit Olam (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2000).

HAGGAI

STEPHEN L. COOK

OVERVIEW

The prophet for whom the book of Haggai is named was an important Persian-era figure, principally responsible, along with Zechariah, for the rebuilding of the ruined Temple of Jerusalem (cf. Ezra 5:1; 6:14). In 520 BCE, near the start of the reign of King Darius I of Persia, he insisted that work on the Temple resume after two decades of stalled progress. The Persian ruler Cyrus the Great had conquered Babylon and allowed a return of Judean exiles in 539–538 BCE, but their efforts to raise a new Temple had faltered after the erection of an altar and a repair of the shrine's foundations (Ezra 3; 5:16). The exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah resulted in a new Temple's dedication in the spring of 515 BCE.

Although the Scriptures reveal little biographical information about Haggai, his perspective coheres closely with the Priestly theology behind Ezekiel and portions of the Pentateuch known as the Holiness School. Thus, he may have been among Ezekiel's followers in Babylonian exile. Neither clericalism nor ceremonialism drives his temple-centeredness, but a cogent insistence that buildings and rituals really do matter in cementing a transformative relationship with God. For Haggai, nothing is more crucial than the Temple, because it represents God's indwelling presence.

OUTLINE

- I. A Call to Rebuild the Ruined Temple (1:1–11)
- II. The People Begin Work (1:12–15a)
- III. Encouraging the Workers Through Apocalyptic Imagination (1:15b–2:9)
- IV. Preparing for Ceremonial and Ethical Wholeness (2:10–19)
- V. Expecting the Messiah (2:20–23)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. A Call to Rebuild the Ruined Temple (1:1–11)

On August 29, 520 BCE, Haggai launched a prophetic dispute with the governor and high priest of the Persian province of Yehud, once called Judah, over the dismal state of the Temple, destroyed by the Babylonians in 586 BCE. The people enjoyed sturdy, "finished houses" (v. 4; NRSV, "paneled houses"), he noted, but God's house lay desolate. They experienced futility at agriculture, a direct result of their misplaced priorities. No automatic linkage of sin with natural calamity was causing their frustrations but their neglect of the divine covenant of the Holiness School, which included specific "futility curses" for unfaithfulness (see Lev 26:20, 26). Haggai uses a Hebrew pun to stress God's application of covenantal sanctions: since the Temple is in "ruins" (v. 9), he says, God has sent a "drought" (v. 11).

A particular point of dispute was over timing. The Hebrew of v. 2 emphasizes the problem of relating any rebuilding effort with God's consummation of history. A new Temple that did not cement God's permanent presence would do more harm than good (see Ezek 43:7). Learned study of Jer 25:11–12 and 29:10, however, left Haggai with no doubts that God's prescribed seventy-years of exile were concluding, that God was now coming to Jerusalem (cf. Hag 2:4–7; Zech 8:3). A new global stability under King Darius, which allowed for Temple construction, was the first stage of God's advent.

II. The People Begin Work (1:12–15a)

On September 21, 520 BCE (v. 15a), within one month after Haggai's initial exhortation, the people began to work. The Lord's stirring (v. 14) aroused a people reluctant to arouse themselves to grasp hold of God (see Isa 64:7, 11). Both here (v. 13) and in 2:4–5, God spurs the people on with a promise that God will dwell with them (viz. Exod 29:46): God is present, guiding their steps, determined to dwell openly among them in a Temple. This is the theological heart of Haggai: God among us, sanctifying us (cf. Ezek 37:28).

III. Encouraging the Workers Through Apocalyptic Imagination (1:15b–2:9)

On October 17, 520 BCE, during the Festival of Booths, Haggai fielded concerns the new Temple would not measure up (v. 3; cf. Ezra 3:12). In response to grave doubts, he upheld God's transcendent perspective (v. 4 repeats "says the LORD" three times). He offered an apocalyptic imagination to the people (cf. Zech 4:10), invigorating their resolve (cf. Zech 8:9, 13).

Just "one moment yet" and the construction effort will issue in unimagined "splendor" (vv. 7–9). The tribute of the nations will adorn Jerusalem, and God's presence will perfect the Temple. The Hebrew of v. 7 echoes the ideal of God's glory filling God's house (Exod 40:34–35; cf. Ezek 43:5; 44:4; Zech 2:5). In v. 9b, an idiom of the Holiness School points ahead to an ideal messianic harmony between God, people, and environment (see Lev 26:6; cf. Ezek 34:25–28).

IV. Preparing for Ceremonial and Ethical Wholeness (2:10–19)

On December 18, 520 BCE, Haggai argued that ongoing Temple construction should become a spiritual discipline preparing for holiness (see Lev 19:2). Priestly rulings were his pedagogical device. Defilement germinated at present like corpse contagion (vv. 13–14; cf. Zech 3:3; Lam 4:14–15; Isa 64:6), necessitating God's planned indwelling and cleansing of the land (cf. Zech 3:9; 13:1). Religious discipline would be needed as groundwork, however. The workings of ritual show that sanctity is not haphazard (v. 12).

Verses 15–19 reveal that Haggai is speaking at a re-foundation ceremony for the new Temple (cf. Zech 4:9). Echoing points made in 1:1–11, Haggai describes the day as a turning point from covenantal curse to covenantal blessing.

V. Expecting the Messiah (2:20–23)

The same day, December 18, Haggai asked governor Zerubbabel to consider himself God's Messiah (cf. Zech 4:10). His allusive language explicitly reversed Jer 22:24–30, where messianic hopes were put on hold. An apocalyptic breakpoint was imminent, he said; the time for rekindling hope had come (see Jer 23:5).

Haggai's word was not false prophecy. Zerubbabel remained a mere governor, but he earned a place in Scripture as a micro-christus, a figure presaging God's Messiah. A son of David in both blood and spirit, his work at Temple building brought to focus an earthly Zion indwelt by God's glory, radiating wholeness. In his labors, messianic reality received a preview (cf. Mark 9:1–4).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. G. Baldwin. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi: An Introduction and Commentary. TOTC (Leicester, England: InterVarsity, 1972); C. L. Meyers and E. M. Meyers. Haggai, Zechariah 1–8. AB 25B (New York: Doubleday, 1987); J. A. Motyer. "Haggai." The Minor Prophets. Volume 3: Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. T. E. McComiskey, ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1998); D. L. Petersen. Haggai and Zechariah 1–8: A Commentary. OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984); J. E. Tollington. Tradition and Innovation in Haggai and Zechariah 1–8. JSOTSup 150 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993).

ZECHARIAH

STEPHEN L. COOK

OVERVIEW

In the early restoration era (520–518 BCE), the prophet Zechariah urged returning exiles and those who had never left to rebuild God's house, purify their community, and await the dawning of God's reign. He shared the zeal of Haggai for getting the Temple ready for God's tangible presence (1:16; 4:9–10; cf. Hag 2:7, 9). Although sharing a common goal with Haggai (see 8:9), Zechariah never mentions him by name. Embracing his position as a Temple official (see 7:2–4), Zechariah may have felt some distance from prophets outside God's sacral establishment.

Zechariah was likely a Zadokite priest, aligned with portions of the Pentateuch known as the Holiness School (see Lev 17–26). This corpus prioritizes an ideal sacral wholeness of people and land centered on God's indwelling presence. Zechariah echoes Ezekiel, a Zadokite (see Ezek 44:15–16), who treasured the Holiness School Scriptures. He was eventually priest-in-charge of an entire priestly household, the clan of his grandfather Iddo (Neh 12:16; cf. Zech 1:1, 7; Ezra 5:1; 6:14; 1 Esdr 6:1), which he probably accompanied in its return from exile (cf. Neh 12:4).

Seventy years or so after Zechariah's time, his disciples added the apocalyptic prophecies of chs. 9–14. His protégés advanced his Priestly theology, so 11:4–17. True to their founder, they remained Temple officers, wedded to the Holiness School. Times had changed, however. The Greco-Persian wars were upturning the world. Persia's defeats at Marathon in 490 BCE and at Salamis in 480 BCE were shaking the empire, throwing everything off balance. Egypt revolted in the 450s. What is more, Yehud's civil leaders, now unconnected to David's royal line, were failing their people (10:2–3). To those who knew the Scriptures, it felt as if God's new world was kicking in the womb.

OUTLINE

I. First Zechariah (1–8)

A. A Call to Repentance (1:1–6)

B. The Eight Visions of Zechariah (1:7–6:15)

1:7–17. First Vision: Horses and Riders

1:18–21. Second Vision: Four Horns and Four Workers

2:1–5. Third Vision: A Surveyor's Work Aborted

2:6–13. A Summons to the Exiles 3:1–10. Fourth Vision: The Cleansing of High Priest Joshua
4:1–14. Fifth Vision: A Lampstand and Two Olive Trees
5:1–4. Sixth Vision: A Flying Scroll
5:5–11. Seventh Vision: A Woman in a Ephah
6:1–8. Eighth Vision: Four Chariots
6:9–15. The Two Crowns

C. An Inquiry About Fasting and Prophetic Responses (7:1–8:23)

7:1–6. An Inquiry About Fasting
7:7–14. The Causes of the Exile
8:1–17. Envisioning Jerusalem's Future
8:18–23. Fasts Will Give Way to Feasts

II. Second Zechariah (9–14)

A. The First Burden (9:1–11:17)

9:1–8. The Lord Takes Control from North to South
9:9–10. A Humble Messiah
9:11–17. God's Victory of Abundant Life
10:1–12. Reviving Lost Israel
11:1–3. Toppling All Proud "Trees"
11:4–17. Playing the Part of Israel's Shepherds

B. The Second Burden (12:1–14:21)

12:1–9. The End-Time Assault on Jerusalem
12:10–13:1. The Sacrifice of the Pierced One
13:2–6. Holiness Spreads Through the Land
13:7–9. The Good Shepherd Stricken
14:1–21. The Divine Warrior's Triumph at Jerusalem

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. First Zechariah (1–8)

A. A Call to Repentance (1:1–6)

In October/November 520 BCE, around the time of Hag 1:15b–2:9, Zechariah called on the people of Yehud to turn to God and abandon their ancestors' entrenched disobedience. "Did the prophets talk idly to them?" Zechariah asked (v. 5¹; NRSV, "do they live forever?"). Clearly not! They marched into exile for not listening (v. 5; cf. 7:14), finally admitting their thoroughgoing culpability (v. 6b; cf. Lam 2:17).

As in Hag 2:17, Zechariah's call to return is a summons to renew the covenant relationship of the Holiness School and to rebuild Jerusalem's Temple. Such tokens of repentance would invite God's radical presence, God's "return" (v. 3) to "dwell in the midst of Jerusalem" (8:3; cf. the Holiness School in Exod 25:8; 29:45; Num 35:34).

B. The Eight Visions of Zechariah (1:7–6:15)

1:7–17. First Vision: Horses and Riders. On February 15, 519 BCE, apocalyptic revelation illumined the "night" (v. 8), probing God's hidden mystery. Zechariah received a series of eight apocalyptic visions, each with a touchstone in the structures, symbols, and rites of the Temple. Empowered through revelation, Zechariah even saw colors in the dark! An interpreting angel (here, a horseman) assists him (v. 9; cf. Dan 8:16; 9:22; Rev 1:1; 22:6), revealing heaven's keen awareness of how much work remains preparing for God's new world (vv. 11, 15–16).

Before the prophet's eyes, the Temple's floral décor (cf. 1 Kgs 6:18, 29) and molten sea (cf. 1 Kgs 7:23) transfigure, unveiling their deeper significance. Zechariah finds himself in God's garden, decked with "myrtle trees" (cf. Isa 55:13), irrigated by "the cosmic deep" (v. 8; NRSV, "the glen"; cf. Ezek 28:2). The grounds quarter God's steeds, which have been out on patrol (v. 11). Their riders have returned with disappointing news. The anticipated cosmic shakeup of Hag 2:6–9 is nowhere in sight. Heaven must get to work.

1:18–21. Second Vision: Four Horns and Four Workers. Heaven's work is unveiled to Zechariah in a transfiguration of the altar's "horns," projections extending in the cardinal directions and signifying God's cosmic might. God's enemies arrogate this might to themselves (cf. Dan 7:7–8, 20–21), sealing their doom on judgment day (cf. 1:15; 2:9; 6:8; 8:2).

The "horns that scattered Judah" are obliterated, the wicked are cut off (cf. Ps 75:10); this is hope with teeth! Significantly, "construction workers" (v. 20, cf. Ezra 3:7; NRSV, "blacksmiths") initiate the apocalypse. Temple construction is no sideshow in earth's widescreen drama, but a sacrament of kingdom come (cf. 1:16).

2:1–5. Third Vision: A Surveyor's Work Aborted. Ezekiel had envisioned an angel surveying Jerusalem for walls and gates (Ezek 40:3; 47:3; cf. Zech 1:16), and Zechariah is shown this very angel. Ezekiel also envisioned Jerusalem electri-fied by holiness, bustling and ballooning (Ezek 36:37–38). As Zechariah looks on, ballooning holiness trumps wall building. A glowing, bustling city "without walls" will host God's glory, fulfilling expectations of the Holiness School for divine glory to dwell amid the people (v. 5; cf. Exod 29:45; 40:34–35). This future will break with the present; Jerusalem's current population was under five hundred.

2:6–13. A Summons to the Exiles. All remaining exiles must hurry home from Babylonia, the "land of the north" (cf. Jer 3:18; 31:8). The divine glory that commissioned Zechariah (v. 8; cf. Ezek 1:28) will soon overthrow Zion's plunderers (vv. 8–9) and come home to dwell (shakhan, vv. 10, 11; language of the Holiness School). God's concrete, tangible indwelling will create a "holy land" arrayed about a holy center, the supreme hope of the Holiness School (Ezek 37:28; Lev 22:32; Num 5:3; 35:34). This shining land (cf. Zech 9:16) will attract the nations to become God's people (v. 11; cf. 8:20–23).

3:1–10. Fourth Vision: The Cleansing of High Priest Joshua. Having been exiled outside the Temple's umbrella of holiness, the priesthood was now "filthy" (v. 3; see Ezek 4:12–13; Amos 7:17). God's planned land of holiness must have pure priests (cf. Num 18:7), so heaven plucks their representative Joshua from oblivion (v. 2; cf. Amos 4:11) and purifies him (vv. 4–5).

To ward off clericalism and complacency, the Temple's inner cabinet must concentrate on being "stewards of key symbols" (v. 8; NRSV, "omen of things to come"). They must hold vigil for King Messiah, the "Branch" (v. 8; 6:12; cf. Jer 23:5; 33:15; Ezek 29:21), ever mindful of such symbols as the Branch's unclaimed crown (6:14) and God's messianic inscription on the Temple's foundation stone (v. 9; cf. 4:7). Unlike Hag 2:23, this text neither mentions Governor Zerubbabel nor reifies the messianic ideal in any way.

4:1–14. Fifth Vision: A Lampstand and Two Olive Trees. The Temple's tree-shaped lampstand (the menorah, cf. Exod 25:31–40) now unveils itself as an archetypal cosmic tree (cf. Dan 4:10–12). Its "seven lamps" (v. 2) transmute into God's all-seeing eyes (v. 10b; cf. 3:9; Ezek 1:18; 10:12). The archetype marks the Temple as an axis of earth and a conduit of God's presence. Just as a cosmic tree fructifies everything within reach (see Dan 4:12), this menorah blesses God's dyarchy, both high priest and son of David (the "two olive trees," vv. 3, 11–14). They become "children of bounty/fresh oil" (v. 14; NRSV, "anointed ones"), witnessing to God's power, assisting in God's outreach.

An oracle inserted in vv. 6–10a interrupts the vision with words of hope and messianic imagination. Temple construction is but a prelude, a "day of small things" (v. 10; cf. Hag 2:3). God's open reign is coming, and the community's overtures toward it brim with grace and favor. Shouts of "Grace, grace" rightly accompany Zerubbabel's presentation of the Temple's "foundation stone" (v. 7; NRSV, "top stone"; cf. 3:9). Still, until the vision is fulfilled, vigilance (cf. 3:8–10) and humble reliance on God's spirit (v. 6; cf. 9:9) are required.

5:1–4. Sixth Vision: A Flying Scroll. The Temple vestibule (cf. 1 Kgs 6:3), used for reciting the covenant, transfigures into a flying embodiment of the Holiness School's theology and covenantal sanctions. The sanctions root out all stubborn immorality (e.g., stealing) and all sacrilege (e.g., swearing falsely), creating a "whole land" fit for God's indwelling (cf. 2:12; 9:16).

5:5–11. Seventh Vision: A Woman in a Ephah. God's holy land is rid of demonic, counterfeit worship in a vision with its touchstone in a typical jar-housed figurine, of the sort used in ancient Near Eastern shrines as deposits and offerings. Desecrating its symbolic homeland, "Wickedness" returns to roost in idolatrous Babylon. Occupying its own anti-temple, its jar serves as its ark and weird storks serve as its cherubim.

6:1–8. Eighth Vision: Four Chariots. Sun chariots of the Temple (see 2 Kgs 23:11) transfigure and are hitched to God's horses (cf. 1:7–17). Twin peaks on earth's horizon, freshly morphed from Temple pillars (see 1 Kgs 7:15–16), grant them entrance into space-time. Particularly in the north, the fabled terrain of evil (cf. 2:6; Ezek 39:2; Joel 2:20), they "vent the anger of [God's] spirit" (v. 8; NRSV, "set my spirit at rest"). They win apocalyptic victory.

6:9–15. The Two Crowns. Zechariah fashions two symbolic "crowns" (v. 11; see NRSV note), since a dyarchy of king and priest will preside in God's coming new era (see 4:11–14). At that time, harmony will reign between "the two" leaders (v. 13). For now, to keep Persia appeased, Governor Zerubbabel takes no crown. Joshua is crowned as high priest, but is cautioned to hold vigil for God's royal "Branch" (v. 12; see 3:8) and to sit as "a priest by his throne" (v. 13) when he is revealed.

C. An Inquiry About Fasting and Prophetic Responses (7:1–8:23)

7:1–6. An Inquiry About Fasting. On December 7, 518 BCE, Zechariah responds to an inquiry from longtime inhabitants about whether their mourning rites over the Babylonian destruction of Judah should continue. He raises the question of motives (cf. Isa 58:3): Was their fasting merely self-pity? Was it jockeying for favor? He postpones specific counsel until 8:18–19.

7:7–14. The Causes of the Exile. The people's fasting should (but did not) reflect the lessons of exile and aim to undo the type of "adamant" heart that caused the disaster (v. 12; cf. Ezek 3:7–9). A truly penitent spirituality would rend the heart, opening it to "love truth and peace," "compassion and supplication" (see 8:19; 12:10).

8:1–17. Envisioning Jerusalem's Future. God's presence will come "dwell in the midst of Jerusalem" (v. 3; cf. 2:10–11), fulfilling the deepest hopes of the Holiness School (see Exod 25:8; 29:45; Num 35:34). The promised indwelling should occasion the sort of moral reformation that the people's fasting had not begun to achieve (vv. 16–17).

8:18–23. Fasts Will Give Way to Feasts. Inquiries about fasting (viz. 7:3) will soon be obsolete. "Impossible" joy is in the wings (see 8:6), the joy of harvest feasting (8:12; 14:16). The prospects for joy should spawn shalom, the very shalom to which a genuine penitence would have aspired (see Isa 58:4).

Verses 20–23 depict a contagious excitement about joining God's worshiping community spreading among the nations (cf. the similar universalism of 2:11; 14:16).

II. Second Zechariah (9–14)

A. The First Burden (9:1–11:17)

9:1–8. The Lord Takes Control from North to South. God's word first "focuses in" on Syria/ Aram (vv. 1–2a; NRSV, "is against"), which willingly joins forces with "all the tribes of Israel." Further south, an obstinate Phoenicia digs in and is overthrown (vv. 2b–4). Then Philistia's pride is broken and a purified Philistine remnant integrates with Israel (vv. 5–7). Thus, God establishes security for an ideal Israel in the end times.

9:9–10. A Humble Messiah. Enacting Gen 49:10–12, fulfilling archetypal hopes for Judah's royal dynasty, the Messiah enters fair Zion on the sacred donkey of lore. He inherits a peaceable world, for God declares, "I will cut off the chariot" (v. 10; NRSV, "He will . . ."). Beyond peaceable, his nature is "humble" (v. 9; a biblical ideal: Num 12:3; Prov 3:34; 16:19). He embodies the same reliance on God's spirit advocated in 4:6 and 7:12. In accordance with Ps 33:16–17, his mount is no warhorse. He knows that salvation comes to earth only through deflating the self, not through horse power (cf. v. 10; 10:5; 1 Kgs 1:5). His commitment to withdraw the ego climaxes later in the book, in 12:10 and 13:7.

9:11–17. God's Victory of Abundant Life. Plundering Sheol, God restores dispersed Israel (v. 11). Incarnating the Divine Warrior of lore (cf. Ps 68; Hab 3), God defeats all powers holding back the new age.

The Divine Warrior's victory brings bounty, banqueting, and brilliant new life (vv. 15–17; cf. Ps 68:7–10; Deut 33:26–29). Having conquered "like slingstones" (v. 15a, cf. Josh 10:11; NRSV, "the slingers"), God's people now shine like crown jewels (v. 16). Emulating a brimming Temple basin, they now "drink and get boisterous" (v. 15b; NRSV, "drink their blood").

10:1–12. Reviving Lost Israel. As Ezekiel observed, Israel suffers like scattered sheep. Two main ingredients formed a recipe for chaos: failure to seek God directly (vv. 1–2a; cf. Ezek 13) and a failure of leadership (vv. 2b–3; cf. Ezek 34:2–4). God intervenes, raising up messianic commanders out of Judah (v. 4; cf. Ezek 34:23–24). Under new command, a victimless victory is won. What is conquered is the chaotic sea of dispersion and oblivion (v. 11).

11:1–3. Toppling All Proud "Trees." The thought of Lebanon deforested at an inrush of returnees (10:10b) conjures a vista of human pride toppling like timber at God's apocalyptic appearance. The haughty cedars of Lebanon and the lofty oaks of Bashan are paradigmatic of the hubris and tyranny to be felled by God (see Ezek 27:6; 31; Isa 2:12–13). The Hebrew translated as "thickets . . . destroyed" (v. 3) also means "pride brought to ruin" (as in Ezek 32:12).

11:4–17. Playing the Part of Israel's Shepherds. Zechariah, given new life as a literary construct, plays two separate shepherds in a symbolic drama about failed leadership (see 10:2b–3). Verses 4–6 recount the self-centered rule that brought on the exile (cf. Ezek 34:1–10). Verses 7–14 have Zechariah enact the part of God, the ultimate shepherd (Ezek 34:15), who corrected Israel in pre-exilic times by destroying "three shepherds" (i.e., the totality of failed rule) in "one month" (i.e., decisively). The staff "Favor" represents the broken covenant (v. 10; cf. Ezek 16:59); "Unity" symbolizes the "family ties" of Judah and Israel (v. 14; Ezek 37:15–23). The symbolic actions of vv. 12–13 convey what minimal value everyone seemed to place on God's interventions. Truly, this flock was doomed to exile.

In vv. 15–17, the action shifts to the future, when a "worthless shepherd" will arise as an anti-messiah. The mounting messianic fervor of Zechariah has brought an archetypal shadow of the Messiah to consciousness. Now activated, this shadow will reappear later as the boastful horn of Dan 7 (second century BCE) and as the "wicked Branch" of the "Vision of Gabriel" (first century BCE).

B. The Second Burden (12:1–14:21)

12:1–9. The End-Time Assault on Jerusalem. The book's final section (Zech 12–14) is chiasmic in structure, with paired passages arrayed symmetrically. Paired with Zech 14, this passage portrays the overthrow of an end-time horde swarming against Zion (see Ezek 38:9, 16; Joel 3:11–13). The Holiness School guards the dignity of the rural populace (see Lev 25:10, 23–24; Ezek 45:8–9; 46:18), so the clans of the countryside, besieged along with Jerusalem, are first in victory.

12:10–13:1. The Sacrifice of the Pierced One. A future godly ruler of Israel dies sacrificially according to both this passage and 13:7–9, its twin within the book's chiasmic structure. He is representative of an ideal Israel and is mourned in a manner befitting the fall of God's entire elect (see Amos 8:10; Jer 6:26). As God mercifully pours out the spirit on the perpetrators (12:10), the death of the messianic "shepherd" (see 13:7) brings on a massive mourning that is both cathartic (13:1) and restorative. Restoring the fundamental connectedness of community was the aim of all traditional mourning in tribal Israel. Mourning was an act of re-mem-bering, in which all community members, both living and dead, were united, healed, and redeemed.

13:2–6. Holiness Spreads Through the Land. Idolatry, false prophecy, and the "unclean spirit" are all banished here at the heart of the chiasm of Zech 12–14 (cf. 14:20–21), fulfilling the dreams of the Holiness School for a pure land (Num 5:3; 35:34). In a wondrous age when all people are visionaries (cf. 12:10; Joel 2:28–29), claimants to privileged revelation are God's clear enemies. To fail to "pierce" them is effectively to "pierce" God (12:10 and 13:3 use the identical verb, daqar).

13:7–9. The Good Shepherd Stricken. God invites the tragedy that emerged in the matching passage, 12:10–13:1. God's royal vicar (see Ezek 34:23), God's interlocked companion (Ezek 34:24), dies as a means to catalyze the rebirth of the covenant people (v. 9c; Ezek 34:25). Such catalysis is archetypal: to create afresh, one grapples with chaos; to birth new life, one suffers through labor; to make space for new being, one deflates the ego, rending the self.

14:1–21. The Divine Warrior's Triumph at Jerusalem. The tribulation is more painful and the vision of rebirth more cosmic in this radical reprise of 12:1–9. God wins apocalyptic victory and "living waters" restore paradise to earth (v. 8; cf. 13:1; Gen 2:10; Ezek 47:1–12; Joel 3:18). A universalistic worshipping community (cf. 2:11; 8:20–23) now joins in celebrating Judah's new preternatural fertility (cf. 4:12–14; 8:12; 9:15) at the Festival of Booths.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. G. Baldwin. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi: An Introduction and Commentary. TOTC (Leicester, England: InterVarsity, 1972); M. J. Boda and M. H. Floyd, eds. Bringing Out the Treasure: Inner Biblical Allusion in Zechariah 9–14. JSOTSup 370 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003); S. L. Cook. Prophecy and Apocalypticism: The Postexilic Social Setting. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); C. L. Meyers and E. M. Meyers. Haggai, Zechariah 1–8. AB 25B (New York: Doubleday, 1987); . Zechariah 9–14. AB 25C (New York: Doubleday, 1993); D. L. Petersen. Haggai and Zechariah 1–8: A Commentary. OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984); . Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi: A Commentary. OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1995); E. J. C. Tigchelaar. Prophets of Old and the Day of the End: Zechariah, the Book of Watchers and Apocalyptic. OtSt 35 (Leiden: Brill, 1996); J. E. Tollington. Tradition and Innovation in Haggai and Zechariah 1–8. JSOTSup 150 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993).

¹ Unless otherwise indicated by NRSV, the quotations from Zechariah are direct translations by the author.

MALACHI

STEPHEN L. COOK

OVERVIEW

A repeating superscription—"An Oracle" (Mal 1:1)—links Malachi with the sections of Zechariah immediately before it (see Zech 9:1 and 12:1). Like the preceding oracles, Malachi presents rich, Persian-era apocalyptic prophecy. "The great and terrible day of the LORD comes," he announces (Mal 4:5).

At the same time, Malachi's "oracle" has its own integrity. His personal life is obscure, since his book volunteers no biography; his name may be only a title ("my messenger"). Malachi's message, however, has unique contours that reveal how differently from Zechariah he thinks about the endtimes. His stance is that of a Levite.

In contrast to Zechariah, Malachi orients himself on the Sinai covenant and functions as its mediator in the tradition of Moses and other Levites of renown (see Deut 18:15–19). He links his title, "my messenger," with the Levitical duty to teach the covenant (Mal 2:7). He holds all priests to the standard of the "covenant with Levi" (Mal 2:4–6).

Repeatedly, Malachi's words align with Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, Hosea, and the Elohist source (E hereafter), which derive from likeminded Levites. The Levites are the heroes of E, as texts such as Exod 32:26–29 (E) show; Deuteronomy robustly advocates for the Levites (e.g., Deut 12:12, 19; 14:27; 17:18; 18:6–8; 26:12); and Jeremiah and Hosea, whose books resonate with Deuteronomy, seem to have been Levitical priests.

Like Zech 9–11 and 12–14, the book of Malachi likely stems from the difficult period leading up to the mid-fifth century BCE. Perhaps it was written during the reign of the Persian king Artaxerxes I (465–424 BCE). Many experienced this era before Ezra and Nehemiah as a time of "great trouble and shame" (Neh 1:3). Religious apathy had set in as a result of Persian pluralism, faded dreams, loss of messianic and eschatological vision, and a revival of pre-exilic syncretistic and occult practices. Malachi's chief concern was the unfaithfulness of worshipers and priests at the Temple, rededicated in 515 BCE. From within Temple circles, Malachi countered the current malaise with a Levitical and apocalyptic ideal of worship and covenantal community, which, he proclaimed, would triumph suddenly despite all current skepticism (Mal 2:17).

OUTLINE

I. The Lord's Covenant Love for Israel (1:1–5)

II. Rebuking Faithless Temple Priests (1:6–2:9)

III. Three Examples of Judah's Covenantal Infidelity (2:10–16)

IV. God's Coming Day: Countering Disillusionment and Cynicism (2:17–3:5)

V. A Call to Repentance (3:6–12)

VI. Judgment and Vindication (3:13–4:3)

VII. Moses and Elijah, the Famed Covenant Mediators (4:4–6)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Lord's Covenant Love for Israel (1:1–5)

Following a superscription in v. 1, the book launches the first of a series of six back-and-forth disputes. These interchanges, which counter the people's lapsed faithfulness, typically begin with a statement of God's perspective (here, v. 2a), turn to quote the audience's objections (here, v. 2b), and then lay out a prophetic response (here, vv. 2c–5). Renewing the covenantal relationship with God is central to each dispute.

Malachi's first dispute insists that covenantal election (God's "love"; cf. Hos 11:1; Deut 10:15) and privation (God's "hate"; cf. Hos 9:15) make a real difference in history. In particular, no one can ignore that the land of Jacob's twin Esau now lies in ruins. The Babylonian emperor Nabonidus campaigned against Edom in 553 BCE (cf. Obad 7), and the Nabateans were now overrunning it. The "Esaus" of the world—profane and without covenantal tutelage—have no future. The "Jacobs," in contrast, will benefit from the reign of God, not via worth or merit (see Deut 7:7–8), but due to God's summons. With the advent of God's reign, people far and wide will worship God (see Mal 1:5, 11, 14). The covenant's expansive goal will burst "beyond the borders of Israel!" (v. 5).

II. Rebuking Faithless Temple Priests (1:6–2:9)

At the beginning of the second dispute (1:6–11), Malachi rebukes his fellow priests for despising God's "name" (1:6). Their shoddy, defiling worship (1:7) is degrading God's uniquely chosen shrine, where God's "name" dwells (see Deut 12:11; 16:2, 6). They plead ignorance, but God's standards for sacrifice leave them without excuse (1:8; cf. Deut 15:21). In fact, a closed Temple would be preferable to their lax, grudging service (1:10)! As in 1:5 (and cf. 1:14), God's imminent reign proves to be the ultimate reference point (1:11). Though contested at present (see 1:4; 2:17), God's reign offers a doxological and eschatological truth, unmasking the audacity of lackadaisical worship. God is lord from east to west (cf. Ps 50:1). All around the world, sacrifice and pure oblation are "about to be offered" God (1:11 author's direct translation; NRSV, "is offered").

The Temple is now corrupt, vv. 12–14 reiterate. The priests practically stick up their noses at God (1:13). The cheap worship they conduct is a nuisance to them and an open invitation for fraudulence among the populace (1:14a). How can this be happening, given the doxological truth that God inspires universal reverence (1:14b; cf. Ps 76:12)?

In 2:1–9, Malachi reminds the priests of their special clerical covenant, which includes sanctions for unfaithfulness (2:2; cf. 3:9; Deut 28:15–68). Shocking language about "dung" (2:3) personalizes the looming threat. Malachi argues that all priestly subgroups (the Zadokite and Aaronide lineages included) are bound by the overarching "covenant of Levi" (see Deut 18:5; 33:8–11; Jer 33:20–22; Ps 16:4–6). All are responsible for teaching God's covenantal ways (2:6–7; see Deut 17:8–11; 31:9; 33:10; Jer 2:8). The grim current reality (2:8–9) could not contrast more sharply with Malachi's covenantal ideal.

III. Three Examples of Judah's Covenantal Infidelity (2:10–16)

Malachi's third dispute confronts his audience with three specific examples of covenantal betrayal. First (v. 10), he cites the betrayal of the covenant of Levi (cf. 2:4, 8). How can the current vitriol between priests (cf. 2:3) be acceptable, given their "one father"? Father points to several figures: Levi (cf. Exod 3:6; 1 Sam 2:27–28), Abraham (cf. Josh 24:3), and God, Israel's true parent (1:6; cf. Deut 32:6) and creator (Deut 32:6).

Second (vv. 11–12), Malachi cites spiritually mixed marriages. Neither parochial thinking nor ethnic bias propels his concern (see 1:5, 11, 14). Marrying foreigners was fine (see Num 12:1), just not devotees of a "foreign god" (v. 11; cf. Deut 31:16; 32:12; Ps 81:9). Israel's binding, exclusive relationship with the "one God" (v. 10; cf. Deut 6:4) was easily undermined by marrying outside the covenant (see 1 Kgs 11:2).

Third (vv. 13–16), Malachi cites the affront of letting enmity break up a legitimate marriage, considered a covenant in the Scriptures (Prov 2:17; Jer 31:32; Ezek 16:8). The text is uncertain at places. The "one" in v. 15 is likely father Abraham (see the comments on v. 10; cf. the NET and the NIV's alternate reading), not "one God" (NRSV). As long as "flesh and spirit" (v. 15) were his, Abraham maintained covenant loyalty with Sarah, "the wife of his youth." He swallowed his anger at her and dismissed Hagar (Gen 21:11–12 [E], even though Hagar had met his "desire" for "offspring." Verse 16 likely reads: "If one hates one's wife and divorces her . . . then one covers one's garment with violence" (cf. ESV, LXX, Vulg.; vs. NRSV, "For I hate divorce . . ."). The language of hating and divorcing has Deut 24:3 in mind. "Covering one's garment with violence" means "wearing" a crime openly, like a scarlet letter.

IV. God's Coming Day: Counter ing Disillusionment and Cynicism (2:17–3:5)

Malachi's fourth dispute confronts disillusionment at the delay of God's justice. Observing an apparent triumph of evil, people felt defeated. Judgment felt so unreal, some virtually dared God to punish their sin (3:15; cf. Zeph 1:12). The prophet fires back with an apocalyptic vision forged on the basis of Deuteronomy and E.

Even now, God's messenger waits in the wings, ready to clear the way for God. The E strand describes this same messenger blazing the hoary exodus trail (Exod 14:19; 23:23; 32:34; Num 20:16; cf. Josh 5:14). Marked verbal parallels between this disputation and Exod 23:20 and 33:2 betray Malachi's reliance on E in describing the figure. The loaded language assures readers that God's apocalyptic advent will result in a new exodus, renewing the people as God's "special possession" (Mal 3:17; cf. Exod 19:5 [E]; Deut 7:6).

The mission of the messenger is merely preparatory. There follows a momentous arrival of the Lord, God's self, in an epiphany (3:2–5). Present despair of judgment ever arriving will vanish "suddenly" (3:1), as a reverent "fear" of God washes over the land (3:5; cf. Gen 20:11 [E]; 22:12 [E]; 28:17 [E]; Deut 4:10; 5:29; 8:6). At God's chosen shrine, all priests, no matter their lineage, will become ideal Levites, their previous grudging manner a casualty of lye soap and smelting heat (3:3).

The passage also announces the arrival of a third eschatological figure, "the messenger of the covenant" (3:1; cf. 2:7; 4:5). He plays the mediatory role of Moses (see Deut 18:15–19 and Num 12:6–8 [E]), standing in for a people who must hide from God's numinous, awe-inspiring epiphany (see Exod 19:16 [E]; 20:19 [E]; Deut 5:26; 18:16). He trains the people in the covenant's structures for right living.

V. A Call to Repentance (3:6–12)

Malachi's fifth dispute urges a return to God. What other response makes sense, given the coming apocalypse he has described? The divine arms are open to receive the people back, he stresses, because the God of the covenant does not "change" (v. 6; cf. Num 23:19 [E]). Because of God's unswerving commitment to the Sinai covenant, it is open to renewal by those who return heart and soul (see Deut 30:2). (An alternative translation of v. 6, "I, the LORD, have not hated [you]," equally stresses the Lord's covenantal commitment [see above on Mal 1:3; cf. Deut 1:26–27].) God's constancy is downright eerie (cf. Hos 11:9), given how often the people have "turned aside" and "have not kept" the covenant (v. 7; cf. Deut 5:32; Josh 1:7; 23:6; 2 Kgs 18:6).

The people ask what they are supposed to do, and Malachi confronts them with their betrayal of Temple worship. In Deuteronomy's spirituality, the people's tithes and offerings in support of God's one sanctuary honored God's singular claim on their lives and the integrity of their communal life under the covenant (v. 8; see Deut 12:5–7). If they would only start embracing God's claim in a wholehearted and materially tangible way, Malachi argues, they could resurrect the covenant both economically and spiritually.

In calling for a "test" of God's will to bless (v. 10; cf. Ps 34:8), Malachi is far from encouraging a selfish spirit ("What do we profit?" 3:14). Rather, he doggedly maintains that the covenantal relationship makes a positive difference in the real world (see the first dispute). His emphasis on successful agriculture (vv. 10–12) is no "prosperity gospel," but a stress on the relationship between human faithfulness and flourishing soil. Human reverence and mutuality set the stage for the good earth's recovery.

VI. Judgment and Vindication (3:13–4:3)

Malachi's sixth (concluding) dispute counters a knee-jerk impatience with his theology. People wanted the Sinai covenant to be a "prosperity gospel," guaranteeing that each person would inevitably get ahead. They wanted a "test" that would box God in, forcing God to meet their terms and their timetable (vv. 13–15; cf. 1:2; 2:17).

Happily, not everyone misheard Malachi. Some of his contemporaries knew a reverent "fear" of God (v. 16; 4:2; cf. 1:14; 2:5; 3:5). Awe of God evokes the kind of right living that brings spacious, fulfilling life.

As in E, God's day of discrimination holds no threat for the God-fearing remnant, whose names are in God's book of life (v. 16; Exod 32:33–34 [E]). Until that day, when righteousness dawns upon them, they will embody God's covenantal purposes as God's "special possession" (v. 17; cf. Exod 19:5 [E]; Deut 7:6; 14:2; 26:18).

VII. Moses and Elijah, the Famed Covenant Mediators (4:4–6)

Verses 4–6 draw Malachi, and the Bible's entire collection of prophecy, to a close. They remind readers to attend to both past and future. Deuteronomy 34:10–12 concludes the Torah on a similar note: The Sinai experience will remain foundational, but the covenant has a prophetic future. The revelation to Moses was definitive, but Moses was himself a prophet, and he had prophets as successors (cf. the comments on Mal 3:1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. G. Baldwin. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi: An Introduction and Commentary. TOTC (Leicester, England: InterVarsity, 1972); S. L. Cook. The Apocalyptic Literature. IBT (Nashville: Abingdon, 2003); A. E. Hill. Malachi. AB 25D (New York: Doubleday, 1998); J. M. O'Brien. Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. AOTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004); D. L. Petersen. Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi: A Commentary. OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1995); D. Stuart. "Malachi." The Minor Prophets. Volume 3: Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. T. E. McComiskey, ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1998).

TOBIT

LOREN STUCKENBRUCK

OVERVIEW

The book of Tobit is a fictional story of pious and faithful Jews exiled in Assyria. Tobit, the alleged author, is the subject of the first part of the book. He suffered blindness and financial ruin because of his exemplary piety. The story then moves to Sarah, a blameless young woman who was unable to marry because a demon was killing her fiancés on their appointed wedding days. These two stories are linked when Tobit's and Sarah's prayers are answered at the same time by the sending of the angel Raphael, who helps Tobit's son Tobiah marry Sarah, heal Tobit, join the families, and bring about financial security. It is an entertaining tale that emphasizes the importance of piety and familial loyalty, making the point that ultimately God protects and rewards the righteous.

OUTLINE

- I. Tobit's Exemplary Piety in Israel and in Exile (1:1–2:1)
 - A. Tobit's Blindness and the Problem of Piety (2:2–3:1)
 - B. Tobit's Prayer (3:1–6)
 - C. Sarah's Plight and Prayer (3:7–15)
- II. The Angel Raphael is Enlisted to Help Tobit and Sarah (3:16–17)
 - A. Tobit Instructs Tobiah and Tells Him about the Invested Money (4:1–21)
 - B. Azariah Hired to Accompany Tobiah to Media (5:1–6:1)
 - C. Tobiah and Raphael at the Tigris River (6:2–9)
 - D. Raphael's Instructions to Tobiah near Media (6:10–18)
 - E. Tobiah and Raphael's Arrival at the House of Raguel (7:1–17)

F. Deliverance from the Demon on the Wedding Night (8:1–21)

G. Raphael Collects the Money from Gabael in Rages (9:1–6)

III. Tobiah and Sarah's Departure for Nineveh (10:1–13)

A. Tobiah's Return to Nineveh (11:1–9)

B. Tobit's Blindness is Healed (11:10–19)

C. Raphael Reveals His Identity (12:1–22)

IV. Tobit's Song of Thanksgiving (13:1–18)

A. Tobit's Final Instructions and Death (14:1–11)

B. Hannah's Death, Tobiah's Return to Ecbatana and His Death (14:12–15)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Tobit's Exemplary Piety in Israel and in Exile (1:1–2:1)

The book opens in the third person (1:1–2), claiming to be the words of Tobit, the main character who is later told to record all the events which happened to him in the story (12:20). Tobit is presented as a Jew who belongs to the tribe of Naphtal (in the northern kingdom of Israel). Though his capture during the reign of the Assyrian king Shalmanesser (726–722 BCE, but see 2 Kgs 15:29) locates most of the story's events in the Eastern Diaspora, the first part of Tobit's life is lived out in the land of Israel. The chronology is confused: Tobit was young when his tribe, along with Israel, revolted against the Jerusalem Temple (late 10th cent. BCE, after Solomon's death), while his capture to Nineveh corresponds to events two centuries later. Tobit's wide-ranging chronological and geographical profile is constructed to emphasize his impeccable religiosity. This lends a certain timelessness and consistency to his piety, the expression of which does not depend on location or an ability to make pilgrimages to Jerusalem.

What aspects of Tobit's piety does the story consider so exemplary? For one thing, he worshipped at the Temple as long as that was possible (1:4). His trips to Jerusalem would involve him in the bringing of tithes and offerings to the Temple, as well as his giving to the poor while there (1:6–8). Though worship in Jerusalem is not emphasized in the main part of the book, the theme is picked up again at the end (chs. 13–14) when Tobit sings in praise of the heavenly Jerusalem and anticipates its future glory. Further activities, directed at other Israelites, play a more prominent role in the following narrative: almsgiving, familial loyalty, and burying the dead. As a giver of alms, Tobit would feed the hungry and give clothing to the naked. Loyalty to family, developed later in the book, is already implied as he follows his grandmother's instructions (1:8), marries Hannah who is from his tribe (1:9), and gives alms to his kinsmen (1:16–17). Tobit's burying the dead is specifically linked to his exilic setting, when the corpses of murdered Jews were left exposed and unburied by Gentile persecutors (1:17–19). It is thus because of burying the dead that Tobit finds himself persecuted and loses the prominence and possessions he had acquired under Shalmaneser.

By the end of this section, Tobit has been presented as a pious Jew who is acquainted with suffering. His good deeds are rewarded after a frightening period of persecution. Tobit is also presented as a savvy caretaker of his wealth, some of which he entrusts to Gabael as an investment during his business trips to Media (1:14). It is on the basis of Tobit's established character as a righteous sufferer who has already experienced vindication that the book begins to explore the problem of suffering and piety in more depth.

A. Tobit's Blindness and the Problem of Piety (2:2–3:1)

In ch. 1 Tobit seems to have overcome problems that resulted from his burial of the dead. Chapter 2 takes a different turn: Tobit's burial of the dead leads to further troubles, this time to blindness, ridicule from other Jews, and a sharp rebuke from his own wife! The story, then, is not simply about someone who suffers for being obviously righteous; Tobit even finds his own character being questioned and thus reaches the point of despair. Instead of being rewarded for his fidelity to Jewish tradition, he is blinded.

The occasion that inaugurates the episode is the Feast of Weeks (Gk.: "Pentecost," meaning "fiftieth"), which celebrates the presentation of the first sheaf of wheat seven weeks after the initial planting. The sumptuousness of the festal meal (2:1–2) serves to highlight Tobit's ardent piety; his search for someone poor to share the meal with leads to a report about the corpse of a Jew lying in the street. Tobit is not only prepared to leave the feast to organize the burial (2:4,7), but also demonstrates his piety by scrupulously observing purity regulations (2:5,7,9)—through washing, delaying the burial itself until sundown, and not re-entering his home that night.

The immediate cause of Tobit's blindness, the droppings of sparrows, is at once humorous and problematic. The randomness of his condition makes the question of theodicy (i.e. how could God allow something like this happen to a pious person?) all the more acute. The force of Tobit's physical impairment is compounded as the efforts of doctors to heal him with their "medicines" only worsen the condition (2:10; cf. Mk. 5:26), and his wife questions the value of his piety (2:14).

B. Tobit's Prayer (3:1–6)

In his despair, Tobit utters a prayer, the first of six formal prayers in the book. Tobit has a twofold petition: (1) he asks God, in his justice, to forgive and hold him responsible for his wrongdoings, including unintentional sins (3:3–5); and (2) he begs God to let him die so he will be liberated from his physical distress and social ridicule (3:6). Tobit's plea for forgiveness also acknowledges Israel's disobedience to God and need for pardon. In this way, the text presents Tobit as a figure with whose ups and downs Jewish readers were meant to identify.

C. Sarah's Plight and Prayer (3:7–15)

The scene shifts from Tobit's predicament in Nineveh to that of another pious Jew, a young woman named Sarah who lives in Ecbatana of Media. The story is no longer from Tobit's point of view. Sarah's troubles, on the surface, seem of a very different kind from Tobit's. An only child, she has been unable to marry, since seven men engaged to her died on their wedding nights before they were able to consummate the marriage. For this Sarah is accused by one of her father's maidservants of killing (the Old Latin says "suffocating") each of her husbands. Like Tobit, she begs God to let her die (3:13), she is the target of reproach (3:7, 15), and she petitions that she not have to suffer reproach (3:15). However, unlike Tobit, her prayer suggests a more straightforward character: the direction of her "face" and "eyes" toward God (3:12) implies a Temple piety; she protests her innocence and does not ask for forgiveness (3:13–14; see the elaboration in the Vulgate), and she reasons that it would ultimately be best not to die since she would then dishonor her father by leaving him without an heir (3:15). Readers are not yet informed that the cause of the men's deaths is demonic (cf. 3:17).

II. The Angel Raphael is Enlisted to Help Tobit and Sarah (3:16–17)

A temporal literary device (3:16, "at that very moment"; cf. 3:17) links the stories of Tobit and Sarah, whose prayers are finished, heard and answered at the same time by the same means: the sending of Raphael "to heal them both." The description of Raphael's activity would almost have been superfluous for a Hebrew speaking audience, since the angel's name itself means "El has healed."

In this section the narrator's voice provides readers with a bird's eye view of most of the storyline. Readers are told in advance that the demon Asmodeus lies behind the deaths of Sarah's husbands, and they now know for the first time that Tobit's son Tobiah will play a vital role in the story and become Sarah's husband.

A. Tobit Instructs Tobiah and Tells Him about the Invested Money (4:1–21)

Chapter 4 is framed by Tobit's decision to send Tobiah away to collect the invested monies from Gabael in Rages of Media (4:1–2, 20–21). The collected investment will serve as Tobiah's inheritance, as Tobit thinks the death he prayed for is imminent. Tobit's instructions suggest a concern with the handling of money, whether through the enjoinder to give to the needy (4:6–11, 16), the payment of employees' wages (4:14) or, implicitly, through the directive that Tobiah bury him and, after his death, not to neglect his mother (4:3–4). The advice, however, ranges more widely: a caution against having illicit sex, which is interpreted as marrying outside one's own tribe and related to arrogance and time-wasting (4:12–13); a command to avoid drunkenness, which is combined with a saying that sounds like the Golden Rule, "Don't do to anyone what you don't like to be done to you!"

(4:15); and general exhortations to seek advice from sensible people and to praise God and seek his counsel (4:18–19). The latter advice to praise God is a salient feature of each of the six main prayers recorded in the book (cf. 3:2, 11; 8:5,15; 11:14; 13:1).

B. Azariah Hired to Accompany Tobiah to Media (5:1–6:1)

From here until the end of the book, Tobit's son Tobiah takes over as its main character. As Tobiah does not know the way to Rages, Tobit sends him out to hire a guide. Tobiah finds a man who identifies himself first as an Israelite relative (5:5) and then with the name "Azariah" (5:13, meaning "Yahweh has helped"), though readers are informed from the start that he is the angel Raphael (5:4). Again, as in 3:16–17, readers are openly given a perspective on the story that its characters do not share. Tobiah's travelling companion is approved by Tobit, especially when Tobit learns that he is a relative (5:13–14). The "recognition" of Azariah as a relative reinforces the emphasis of the book on the advantages of family loyalty.

As the parents send Tobiah and his companion on their way, the impression is left that Tobit's wife Hannah approves of the journey (5:17). Again, however, she argues with Tobit, stating her fear that the journey is too much of a risk to take simply for the sake of money. She contrasts her view that one ought to be content with what one has (5:18, 20) with the claim that Tobit is overly interested in money. Tobit's reassurance that all will be well with their son is uttered ironically: "a good angel will go with him" (5:22).

C. Tobiah and Raphael at the Tigris River (6:2–9)

As the two travellers, joined by a dog (6:2; cf. 11:4), approach Ecbatana (east of Nineveh), they come to the Tigris River (which in fact was west of Nineveh). This reinventing of geographical details serves the storyline, as it is at the river where the solution to Tobit's and Sarah's problems becomes apparent: parts of a fish. The angel's role is primarily to give Tobiah instructions about what to do. Thus when the fish attacks Tobiah as he nears the river to wash, Raphael does not subdue the fish himself but rather tells Tobiah to overpower it. The angel's instructions about what to do with the fish's heart and liver in 6:5 are taken from a widely circulating recipe: when heated to smoke, they liberate "a man or woman under attack by a demon or an evil spirit" (6:8). Similarly, it is possible that using gall on the eyes was a common remedy (6:9). Readers, however, will already be aware from 3:17 that these fish parts will be used as "medicine" to cure Tobit's blindness (11:11–13) and to help Sarah become a wife (8:2–3).

D. Raphael's Instructions to Tobiah near Media (6:10–18)

Again, Raphael's special knowledge comes into play: he tells Tobiah about Sarah, who lives with her father and mother in Ecbatana, and announces that it has been predetermined that she should become his wife. The case for Tobiah to marry Sarah, however, is also a legal one that the angel explains (6:11–13). Tobias has the legal right to marry her as her closest remaining male relative and to become her father's heir. The legal reasoning described here (6:12; cf. 6:13 and 7:10–12, where the practice is expressly derived from "the book of Moses") finds a more tightly defined counterpart in the law for levirate marriage in Deut. 25:5–10, according to which the closest single brother is required to marry his widowed sister-in-law (cf. Gen. 38:6–26). Tobiah, however, is not a brother, nor have any of the seven dead men consummated their marriage to Sarah. A tradition that better approximates the practice adopted in this book may be found in Ruth 3:9–13, according to which the nearest kin after the parents can marry the widow.

Great care is taken, both in 6:12 and 8:7, to emphasize that marriage is not based on lust after beauty, but on character. Though Sarah is initially described as "beautiful" in 6:11 (Gk. omits "beautiful"), the following verse mentions her beauty only after she is portrayed as "sensible and courageous."

E. Tobiah and Raphael's Arrival at the House of Raguel (7:1–17)

When Tobiah and Raphael enter the house of Sarah's father, the first thing they establish is that they are relatives (7:2–8) close enough to have recognizably similar appearances. This lays the basis for the negotiations of terms for marriage to Sarah that follow between Raguel and Tobiah. Raguel, having acknowledged his legal responsibility to give Sarah to Tobiah (7:10), goes on, as did Raphael in the previous chapter (6:14–15), to rehearse Sarah's troubled history.

Until now, Tobiah has essentially been following the instructions of his father and the angel in the story. A point of transition in his character occurs in 7:9–10. Despite Raguel's bad news about Sarah's past, Tobiah proceeds confidently, much in contrast to the worries he expressed to Raphael in 6:14–15. Thus by the time he marries Sarah and consummates his marriage to her, Tobiah is a pious and responsible adult.

The story is sensitive to the feelings of the women. Having prepared the bedroom, Edna shares in her daughter's tears as she seeks to encourage her. Her words, "May the Lord of Heaven give you joy in place of your pain" (7:17), signal a reversal of the quotation from Amos 8:10 in 2:6. Edna's words thus occur at the cusp of the U-turn about to unfold on behalf of the righteous.

F. Deliverance from the Demon on the Wedding Night (8:1–21)

As Tobiah enters the bridal chamber, he follows Raphael's instructions on what to do with the fish's heart and liver: he smokes them over the incense coals to produce a pungent odor that drives Asmodeus away to distant "parts of Egypt," where the angel binds him with chains. The demon now gone, consummation of the marriage happens only after both Tobiah and Sarah utter a prayer of praise (which in 8:6 alludes to the institution of marriage in Gen. 2) and petition for deliverance. The oddity of a deliverance prayer after the demon is gone is explained by the petition for continued protection so that as a couple they might "grow old together" (8:6). Marriage is not simply for having children; significantly, the text celebrates the value of the husband-wife relationship within marriage.

Irony, even humor, comes through in the activities of Raguel during the wedding night. Raguel, thoroughly expecting Tobiah to meet the same fate as his predecessors, has a grave dug to receive and bury husband number eight during the night (8:9–11). Readers, of course, know these efforts are going to be unnecessary! Upon learning that Tobiah and Sarah are soundly asleep together, Raguel has the grave filled before dawn (presumably to keep up appearances), though not before he and Edna have uttered a threefold praise to God and have begged that mercy and deliverance ("to bring both their lives to completion", 8:16) be shown the couple.

The chapter closes with Raguel requesting that Tobiah stay an additional fourteen days to celebrate the marriage. He promises, in addition, that Tobiah will inherit his possessions, half now and the other half after he and Edna have died.

G. Raphael Collects the Money from Gabael in Rages (9:1–6)

The marriage, the wedding feast, and the events leading up to the occasion have distracted the story from the original purpose of Tobiah's journey. The collection of Tobit's deposit of money from Gabael comes as something of an anticlimax. Tobiah finds himself unable to leave the wedding feast, and so asks Azariah to complete the task for him.

III. Tobiah and Sarah's Departure for Nineveh (10:1–13)

The first scene (10:1–7a) constitutes the last of three arguments between Tobit and Hannah (cf. 2:11–14; 5:18–6:1). Readers would not have missed the husband and wife telling each other, "Be quiet!" Since Tobiah has not yet returned him, Hannah's old worries return as she expresses regret that she let her son go (10:6, an allusion to 5:18) and thinks her son must have died (10:6). Though Tobit, as before (5:19–22), reassures his wife that Tobiah will return safely, the text makes clear that he too is worried (10:1–3). The couple's tension, then, is the result of their shared concern.

The second scene (10:7b–13) continues to reflect Tobiah's character as one who is now acting with initiative and responsibility (cf. 7:9–10). Whereas Raguel attempts to persuade Tobiah to stay a little longer while sending news to his parents through messengers that all is well (10:8), Tobiah, knowing his parents (10:7b), insists that he himself must go (10:9). Coming through with his promise, Raguel gives Tobiah half his possessions. In presenting the farewell, the storyteller does not miss the opportunity to include admonitions, first by Raguel to Tobiah and Sarah in turn (10:11,12a) and then by Edna to them both together (10:12b). Raguel instructs Sarah to honor her parents-in-law, while Edna directs Tobiah not to be a source of grief to Sarah.

The chapter concludes with Tobiah praising God and calling upon God to honor his parents-in-law (10:13). This is the first time in the book that Tobiah calls for a blessing upon others.

A. Tobiah's Return to Nineveh (11:1–9)

As Tobiah and Sarah draw near to Nineveh, Raphael once again seizes the initiative. Since Tobiah's parents do not yet know about his wife, the angel suggests that he and Tobiah, with the fish's gall in his hand, go ahead of the group (11:2–4). In addition, Raphael instructs Tobiah more precisely than before (cf. 6:9) in how to apply the medicinal gall when he sees his father (11:8). In the meantime, Hannah has spotted them coming from a distance (11:5), and announces their arrival to her husband; she then receives her son, declaring her readiness now to die (11:9).

B. Tobit's Blindness is Healed (11:10–19)

When the sightless Tobit stumbles out to greet his son, Tobiah applies the medicine to his father's eyes, following Raphael's instruction. The burning effect of the gall makes it possible for Tobiah to peel off the white film so that Tobit can see. As Hannah has done before (cf. 10:5), Tobit calls Tobiah "light of my eyes" (11:14). In the story, then, both the smoked liver and heart and the gall are regarded and treated as "medicine" (11:11; cf. 6:5, 8); procedures used to drive away a demon and to peel off film causing blindness in the eyes are not distinguished in kind.

Tobit then utters praise, not only to God but also to God's "holy angels" (twice in Codex Sinaiticus). Sarah, who has arrived a little later, is welcomed into the household by Tobit, who blesses her and praises God (11:16–17). Celebrations "among all the Jews of Nineveh" ensue, attended by Ahikar and Nadin, thus making the joy a matter for the extended family. The mention of "Jews" (i.e. "Judaeans") is anachronistic, as at this time (late 8th cent. BCE) no Judaeans had been exiled. The designation betrays the period of the storyteller who expects his readers to resonate with the activity of this group.

C. Raphael Reveals His Identity (12:1–22)

The chapter begins with Tobit wishing to settle accounts with Azariah by paying him the promised wages (12:1–5). From v. 6 until the end of the chapter, the meeting between Azariah, Tobit and Tobiah is presented as private, signalling that information (much of which is already known to the reader) will be divulged. However, before Azariah discloses his true identity to the characters, the text has him give out a few more ethical instructions (12:6–10), which include the importance of praising God, keeping a king's secret, praying while fasting, doing good, and giving alms. This last mention in the book of almsgiving underscores its significance as a marker of piety: in addition to saving "from death" (an echo of Tobit's earlier instruction to Tobiah; cf. 4:10), it also "purifies (from) sin."

In 12:11–15 Raphael finally reveals his identity to Tobit and Tobias. He is the one who brought to God the requests of Tobit and Sarah (ch. 3) and the report about Tobit's burying the dead (ch. 2). Raphael was then sent "to test" Tobit and to heal him and Sarah (12:13). At this Tobit and Tobiah's response is a combination fear and reverence. To readers this response may have seemed appropriate, not only given Raphael's determinative role in the storyline but also because of the inclusion of angels in Tobit's prayer of praise in 11:14. Raphael, however, clarifies to both the characters (and the readers) that they should praise God. Though Raphael was with them, it was the will of God which made all of this possible (12:17–18). As an aside, the angel also explains what readers do not know: he did not actually eat anything, but only appeared to do so (6:6, only "he" i.e.

Tobiah eats, a detail changed in the shorter Greek version to "they").

IV. Tobit's Song of Thanksgiving (13:1–18)

Chapter 13 follows on from the angel's instruction to praise God in 12:20 and provides formal expression to the statement in 12:22 that Tobit, together with Tobiah, continued to praise God. Its text is easily divided into two parts. The first is a hymn of praise to God (13:1–8) for his discipline and mercy, which essentially weaves together the story of Tobit with that of Israel (who are scattered now on account of sin, but will be the object of divine mercy when they turn to God). The theology of the song is not entirely consistent with the angel's description of what happened to Tobit as a "test" (cf. 12:13), though in 3:1–6 Tobit confesses his own wrongdoing (alongside that of Israel). The second part, in the wake of the theme of God's mercy on Israel, focuses on Jerusalem, which will be restored in all her glory as the eternal dwelling place for God (13:9–17).

A. Tobit's Final Instructions and Death (14:1–11)

What transpires here is what Tobit originally thought he was doing in ch. 4: giving last instructions to Tobiah before his death. In the ancient world, this kind of written instruction was called a "testament," an influential and widespread literary genre. The patriarch or venerable figure's words of advice were disseminated to his offspring at the moment before death, that is, when he had gained maximum wisdom.

Oddly, Tobit's death (14:1, at 112 years) is narrated before the presentation of his final instructions to both Tobiah and his grandsons (cf. 1 En. 91:1–2). Initially, Tobit's words are primarily concerned with the immediate and longer term future. He advises Tobiah, after his parents' deaths, to leave Nineveh with his family for Media, appealing to Nahum's prediction of Nineveh's destruction (Nah. 1:1; 2:8–10, 13; 3:18–19). Tobit insists that the prophets' predictions will not go unful-filled (14:4). And so, beyond this, Tobit is made to predict that after a period of exile, the returnees will rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem, but not to the same standard as the first one (14:5), bringing Tobit's words to bear on the time of the narrator and his contemporary readers. The storyteller is clearly unimpressed by the Jerusalem Temple of his day, and goes on to have Tobit predict an event that lies in the future to both narrator and readers: the rebuilding of Jerusalem and Temple to a grandeur that outclasses anything that has come before (cf. 13:16–17). This unprecedented event will lead to a turning of "every nation of the whole earth" to worship (literally, "fear") God, leaving behind the idols that have deceived them.

B. Hannah's Death, Tobiah's Return to Ecbatana and His Death (14:12–15)

After Hannah's death, Tobiah buries her next to his father and, heeding Tobit's instructions, leaves for Media where he takes care of Sarah's parents and buries them honorably. The story rounds out the loyalty and responsibility shown towards the parents of both the husband and wife. Tobiah's age at death is given at 117 years. The advanced ages of Tobit and Tobiah at their deaths, as well as their privilege of seeing grandchildren—in Tobiah's case, children to the fifth generation—signals a happy outcome and reward for the piety and values commended in the book.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

M. Bredin, ed. Studies in the Book of Tobit: A Multidisciplinary Approach. Library of Second Temple Studies 55 (London: T&T Clark, 2006); J. A. Fitzmyer. Tobit. Commentaries in Early Jewish Literature (Berlin/New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2003); L. L. Grabbe. "Tobit." Eerdmans Commentary on the Bible. J. Rogerson and J. D. G. Dunn, eds. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 736–47; M. Hallermayer. Text und Überlieferung des Buches Tobit. Deuterocanonical and Cognate Literature Studies 3 (Berlin/New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2007); C. Moore. Tobit. AB 40A (Garden City: Doubleday, 1996); L. T. Stuckenbruck. Angel Veneration and Christology. WUNT 2/70 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1995); . "'Angels' and 'God': Exploring the Limits of Early Jewish Monotheism." Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. North, eds. JSNTSup 263 (London: T&T Clark International, 2004) 45–70; S. Weeks, S. Gathercole, and L. T. Stuckenbruck. The Book of Tobit. Texts from the Principal Ancient and Medieval Traditions. Fontes et Subsidia 3 (Berlin/ New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2004); G. G. Xeravits and J. Zsengellér, eds. The Book of Tobit. Text, Tradition, Theology. JSJ Supplements 98 (Leiden/Boston: Brill, 2005).

JUDITH

SIDNIE WHITE CRAWFORD

OVERVIEW

Judith is a Jewish novel, a work written by one author and meant to be read. Although the book survived in only Greek and Latin, its original language was Hebrew, and it was written in Palestine between 135 and 100 BCE. While it did not become part of the Jewish canon of Scripture, as part of the LXX it was part of the Christian Bible and is found in the Apocrypha; it is considered deuterocanonical by the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches.

The literary artistry of the anonymous author of Judith is evident. The book falls neatly into two parts, each with its own "envelope" construction (see Outline). Nebuchadnezzar, the powerful pagan king, dominates the first half; Judith, the pious Jewish widow, the second. The author uses humor, irony, and double entendre to make his theological points.

Judith is a work of historical fiction; the historical "mistakes" that introduce the book (1:1) would have been obvious to its original audience, and one can imagine the author "winking" at them, inviting them to share the joke (see Detailed Analysis). Judith is fiction and meant to be enjoyed as such, but it is fiction with a serious purpose.

The theological message of Judith is disarmingly simple: God will protect his people provided that they remain loyal to the covenant. The importance of observing Jewish law is a frequent motif, and the centrality of the Temple and the Jews as a worshiping community are emphasized.

To accomplish the divine purpose, God can and does use the apparently weakest instruments. Judith, the heroine, is a Jew, a woman, and a widow. In a reversal of gender roles, she defeats Holofernes and thus Nebuchadnezzar, ruling Gentiles and powerful men. Further, she does this by her own action; no miracle is required. The message is clear: God acts through human initiative, and a person of faith, no matter how lowly, can perform the seemingly impossible. To drive his point home, the author draws on the stories of earlier biblical heroines who saved their people: the judge Deborah and Jael, who slew the general Sisera by driving a tent peg through his skull (Judg 4–5), and Esther, who saved the Jews of Persia from annihilation. In later Christian tradition Judith becomes a model of fortitude, chastity, and humility, often compared with the Virgin Mary and St. Joan of Arc.

OUTLINE

I. First Half (1:1–7:32)

A. Campaign Against Disobedient Nations (1:1–3:10)

1:1–16. Campaign Against Arphaxad

2:1–13. Plan to Punish Disobedient Nations

2:14–3:10. Holofernes' Campaign

B. Israel Prepares for War (4:1–15)

C. Holofernes Expels Achior (5:1–6:13)

5:1–21. Achior's Speech

5:22–6:13. Holofernes' Response

C'. Achior Is Taken into Bethulia (6:14–21)

B'. Holofernes Prepares for War (7:1–5)

A'. Campaign Against Bethulia (7:6–32)

II. Second Half (8:1–16:25)

A. Introduction of Judith (8:1–8)

B. Judith Plans to Save Israel (8:9–10:9a)

8:9–36. Judith Speaks to the Elders

9:1–10:9a. Judith's Prayer and Preparations

C. Judith and Her Maid Leave Bethulia (10:9b–10)

D. Judith Overcomes Holofernes (10:11–13:10a)

10:11–12:9. Judith in Holofernes' Camp

12:10–13:10a. Judith Kills Holofernes

C'. Judith and Her Maid Return to Bethulia (13:10b–13:11)

B'. Judith's and Israel's Victory (13:12–16:20)

13:12–14:10. Judith's Plan and Achior's Conversion

14:11–16:20. Israel's Victory and Celebration

A'. Epilogue Concerning Judith (16:21–25)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. First Half (1:1–7:32)

A. Campaign Against Disobedient Nations (1:1–3:10)

1:1–16. Campaign Against Arphaxad. The story begins with an obvious historical error, signaling to its audience that it is fiction, not fact. Nebuchadnezzar was the king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, not the Assyrian Empire, and his capital was Babylon, not Nineveh. Nineveh was the capital of the Assyrian Empire, but it had been destroyed in 612 BCE. The combination of the two "evil empires" of Assyria and Babylon into one overwhelmingly evil symbol makes its eventual defeat an even greater illustration of God's power. Arphaxad is also a fictitious character. The measurements given for Ecbatana's walls are immense, and meant to emphasize King Arphaxad's glory and Nebuchadnezzar's overwhelming power. Nebuchadnezzar's war involves the entire known world; Samaria and Jerusalem, the ancient capitals of Israel and Judah (v. 9), are only a tiny piece of it.

2:1–13. Plan to Punish Disobedient Nations. Nebuchadnezzar instructs his general Holofernes to destroy those nations that refused to act as his allies in his war with Arphaxad. The rhetoric of these verses is inflated, meant to convey the power and threat of Nebuchadnezzar. His revenge is purely political; it has no religious overtones. However, the author's use of irony is visible in his use of the title "the Great King, the lord of all the earth" in v. 5; he will use the word lord, Gk. kyrios, with double intention throughout the story, as a title for the earthly rulers Nebuchadnezzar and Holofernes, and more importantly for Israel's God.

Several references in these verses had negative implications for the readers, setting them up for the crisis to come. The eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar (v. 1) was 587 BCE, the year in which he destroyed the kingdom of Judah, exiled its inhabitants, and razed Jerusalem and its Temple to the ground. The name Holofernes also had negative associations for the Jews. Artaxerxes III Ochus, a Persian king who campaigned against Judea in 350 and 343 BCE, had a general named Holofernes, who in turn had a servant named Bagoas (see 12:11). And vv. 8–9 would remind the reader of the historical Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Judah and the exile of its inhabitants in 587 BCE, as well as the Assyrian exile in 722 BCE (2 Kgs 17:5–6) and the first Babylonian exile in 597 BCE (2 Kgs 24:10–16).

In verse 12, Nebuchadnezzar's boast that he will accomplish his plan "by my own hand" stands in ironic contrast to Judith's statement in 8:33 that "the Lord will deliver Israel by my hand." God's hand is used throughout the OT as a symbol of God's power (e.g., Exod 15:6; Deut 6:21). Judith's hand literally becomes God's instrument. The question is raised: Who is more powerful, Israel's God or Nebuchadnezzar?

2:14–3:10. Holofernes' Campaign. The focus of these chapters gradually narrows from the entire earth to the western region of the empire to the small seacoast towns that are Israel's neighbors. The size of Holofernes' army is emphasized by the author's use of biblical metaphors. A "mixed crowd" accompanies the Israelites in their flight from Egypt during the exodus (Exod 12:38). The metaphor comparing an army to a "swarm of locusts" occurs in Joel 1:4. The phrase "dust of the earth" is actually "sand of the earth" in Greek, thus mixing the two metaphors "dust of the earth" and "sand of the sea," common biblical phrases for an innumerable multitude (e.g., Gen 13:16; 32:12). These metaphors are used ironically; Holofernes is not coming to save, like the God of Israel, but to destroy. Holofernes' initial campaign is striking in its rapidity, violence, and success. The author piles up synonyms of destruction, creating the impression that Holofernes is conducting a "scorched earth" campaign.

The geography of these verses is confused. Some of the locations are known (e.g., Put and Lud), while others are unidentified (e.g., Bectileth). If these geographic locations are taken literally, Holofernes and his army accomplished a three-hundred-mile march in only three days; they then began marching back and forth across northern Mesopotamia and Syria in a zigzag fashion, destroying nations as they went. These details should not be taken seriously, but as artistic license to illustrate the fearsomeness of the Assyrian attack. In v. 28, Holofernes reaches the Mediterranean coast, thus drawing closer to Israel, which lies just inland of these cities. When these cities surrender, Israel is left unprotected to the north and west.

In v. 8, religion enters the narrative and with it a threat to Israel's single-minded loyalty to its God. Nebuchadnezzar had not ordered Holofernes to destroy cultic establishments, and he certainly had not demanded to be worshiped as a god. The demand, however, intensifies the threat to the Jews.

Holofernes reaches the borders of Israel in v. 9. Esdraelon (Jezreel) is a great valley that separates the hills of Galilee from those of Samaria. Dothan lies to the south of Esdraelon; Geba lies at the western end of the valley, while Scythopolis (modern Beth Shean) lies at the eastern entrance. Holofernes is thus approximately forty miles north of Jerusalem.

B. Israel Prepares for War (4:1–15)

The Israelites react to the news of Holofernes' victories by praying, performing acts of ritual penitence, and preparing for war. The emphasis shifts from the political to the religious implications of Holofernes' threat; the Israelites have heard that Holofernes had destroyed the temples of the coastal cities, and they fear for their own Temple in Jerusalem. Thus the author of Judith identifies the Jews as a worshipping community centered on the Temple.

The identification of the inhabitants of Judea as "Israelites" rather than "Jews" in v. 1 is an anachronism, indicating a hope for a return of the united kingdom of David and Solomon, and perhaps a gesture toward the Samaritan community, who actually inhabited the central hill country north of Judea; the district of Samaria is mentioned by name in v. 4. The office of high priest was an important one all throughout the post-exilic period, but only the Hasmonean high priests Jonathan, Simon, and John Hyrcanus I exercised the broad civil and military powers demonstrated by the high priest in vv.

6–8. Both Bethulia and Betomesthaim are unknown and probably fictional. Their importance lies in their location, guarding the mountain passes that were the only access route to Jerusalem.

The Jews' first line of defense is God, to whom they turn in prayer and penitence. Fasting is an act of humility, while the wearing of sackcloth is a mourning gesture (see Esth 4:1–3). In this emergency, the Israelites take this gesture to extremes, even putting sackcloth on their cattle and the altar (cf. Jon 3:8)! The prayers have their desired effect; God "hears" and "has regard for" the Jews. At this early stage of the book, the outcome is no longer in doubt; God will rescue the Jews. The remaining question is "How?" The performance of all the required ritual activities indicates that this generation of Jews, unlike previous ones, do cleave to the Law and therefore deserve God's protection and care (Deut 28:1, 7).

C. Holofernes Expels Achior (5:1–6:13)

5:1–21. Achior's Speech. Achior, an Ammonite general, recites Israel's history to Holofernes and explains that God defends them. The Moabites, Ammonites, and Canaanites, all mentioned in vv. 2–3, were historical enemies of Israel, so it is ironic that Israel's sacred history is articulated so well by an Ammonite. Achior is an example of a wise, righteous Gentile such as the prophet Balaam (Num 22–24), who speaks the truth about Israel regardless of its political expediency.

Holofernes unknowingly articulates, through his questions in vv. 3–4, the book's central message: Israel's power and strength reside in God, who is their king and rules over them. Therefore, they will not submit to any earthly ruler. Achior gives a brief synopsis of Israel's history, extending from Abraham through Joshua. The mention of the Shechemites in v. 16 ties his statement to Judith's in 9:2, where she recounts the vengeance of Simeon and Levi upon the Shechemites. In his recital, Achior embraces the Deuteronomic theology, which argues that obedience to the Law will bring prosperity for the Israelites, while disobedience will bring punishment (Deut 28–32). Achior's final statement in v. 21 is prophetic; Holofernes and his army will become a laughingstock.

5:22–6:13. Holofernes' Response. Holofernes recognizes Achior's words as prophetic, but he rejects them in favor of a prophecy of his own. Holofernes' speech is unintentionally ironic; many of his questions and statements carry double meanings recognized by the reader. He speaks in the name of a false god, but makes true statements about the actual God. In v. 2, Holofernes asks the question that underlies the whole book; the answer, of course, is the God of Israel. The language that Holofernes uses to describe Israel's anticipated destruction is reminiscent of the language of holy war used to describe Israel's destruction of its enemies (e.g., Josh 8:24–29; Isa 34:2–7).

Holofernes' speech in vv. 5–9 is ironic in the extreme; his words will come true, but not in the way that he anticipates. The next time Achior sees his face, Holofernes' head will be severed from his body!

C'. Achior Is Taken into Bethulia (6:14–21)

Holofernes has shown no mercy to Achior; but the Israelites, although they are in a dangerous situation, are merciful toward him. The story's focus narrows to the small town of Bethulia.

In 6:14–15, the leaders of Bethulia are introduced. The author again employs irony by naming the chief magistrate Uzziah, which means "my strength is the LORD." Uzziah's strength will prove no match for Judith's. The tribe of Simeon is obscure; although it is one of the twelve tribes, it disappears early from the tribal lists (e.g., Judg 5; Deut 32), and its territory shifts around. The Israelites' reaction to Achior's tale is humble and pious, in sharp contrast to the arrogance and braggadocio of Holofernes and his men.

B'. Holofernes Prepares for War (7:1–5)

Holofernes now prepares for the siege of Bethulia. The mention of the spring is ominous, since towns in the ancient world were built next to natural water sources on which they were absolutely dependent. Although the Israelites are terrified, they are still braver than the peoples of the seacoast, since they prepare to defend themselves instead of surrendering.

A'. Campaign Against Bethulia (7:6–32)

Holofernes' seizure of the springs dooms the Bethulians to slow torture by thirst. The list of Holofernes' allies now includes the Edomites, another ancient enemy of Israel (Jer 49:7–22). Once again Israel's adversaries are unintentionally ironic; the Israelites don't rely on their spears (v. 10), but on God. The advice to Holofernes to seize the springs is a little strange, since he has already done so in v. 7, but the intention is the same: to force the Israelites to surrender because of lack of water.

The plan of Holofernes and his advisors begins to work; the Israelites are perishing from thirst (vv. 20–22). They have held out for more than a month, but their courage has finally deserted them, and they wish to surrender. Their complaint to Uzziah that slavery is preferable to death by thirst is similar to that of the Israelites in the wilderness to Moses (Exod 17:1–7). Uzziah is hoping for a miracle (as at Meribah), so he strikes a compromise with the Bethulians. When the miracle comes, it will take an unexpected form.

II. Second Half (8:1–16:25)

The events of the second half of the book focus on the heroine Judith and the destruction of Holofernes. An important theme in this half of the story is the reversal of gender roles, culminating in the beheading of the mighty man by the supposedly weak widow.

A. Introduction of Judith (8:1–8)

The heroine Judith is finally introduced. Like Deborah (Judg 4–5), Judith arises in a scene with erotic overtones. And like Esther, she uses her beauty and wits to achieve her goal. The name Judith means "Jewess" and identifies her as the ideal type of the Jewish heroine. Judith is given the longest genealogy of any female character in the Bible; it is significant that the last ancestor mentioned is Israel, the eponymous ancestor of all Israelites. Her genealogy also connects Judith to the tribe of Simeon (Num 1:6).

Judith's husband, Manasseh, is a shadowy character, only important for giving Judith her status as a wealthy widow. Judith's status as a widow is important to the story, since only a widow would have the freedom of action to carry out her plan. An unmarried girl was controlled by her father, a wife by her husband, but a widow was under her own control. Judith also appears to be childless. Thus Judith's situation as a Jewish woman is anomalous in several ways. As a pious widow, Judith practices a rigorous asceticism. She only breaks her fast on festival days when fasting was forbidden. Her rooftop tent may be a reminder of the booths used in the Festival of Sukkot (Lev 23:42) and of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod 26). However rigorous her asceticism, Judith is still beautiful, as befits a heroine in the ancient world. Judith's reputation for piety and devotion allow her to flout the conventions of women's behavior in that time period without negative ramifications.

B. Judith Plans to Save Israel (8:9–10:9a)

8:9–36. Judith Speaks to the Elders. Judith's speech to the elders comprises one of the major theological statements in the book. Judith upbraids Bethulia's leaders for their lack of faith and cajoles them into permitting her to carry out her plan. Her high standing in the community is demonstrated by the fact that the leaders drop everything and go to her tent. When they arrive, Judith rebukes them for acquiescing to the people's demand in 7:23–31. While the people understood the situation through the lens of the Deuteronomic theology, according to which God was punishing them for sins, Judith understands the situation differently. According to Judith, Uzziah's five-day deadline puts God to the test. This is wrong, because God is beyond human comprehension; God may have some purpose behind the siege that the Bethulians do not understand. God has the choice of saving the Bethulians or destroying them, but it is according to God's own timetable. While prayer is efficacious because it pleases God, bargaining is not, and the Bethulians risk God's wrath by resorting to it.

Judith goes even further in vv. 18–23 by declaring that the people's interpretation of the situation must be wrong, since they have renounced idol worship. It was idol worship that led to both the Assyrian and the Babylonian destructions (2 Kgs 17:7–18; 21:5–10), but since now the people are innocent, they have no reason to suppose God wishes to destroy them. Using the language of honor and shame, Judith states that Israel's defeat in this situation would shame God in the eyes of other nations. The implication is that God will not allow this to happen. In v. 24, Judith reminds her listeners that Bethulia is the only obstacle between Holofernes and Jerusalem, so their actions affect not only themselves but also the Temple.

Judith understands the present situation as a test of faith, much as God tested Abraham and Isaac in the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen 22:1–14). According to this theology, faith is refined through hardship. Uzziah's response (vv. 28–31) reveals only partial understanding. He realizes that Judith is wise, in the tradition of Joseph, Solomon, and Lady Wisdom from the book of Proverbs. However, he only asks her to pray for rain, at best a temporary reprieve. Although Uzziah's oath was wrong, since he swore it to God he cannot break it. Judith once more attempts to make them understand that the situation calls for much more drastic action than a mere prayer for rain. She makes an astonishing statement: if they allow her to leave the besieged town (making her an easy target for the enemy forces), she will deliver them within the allotted five days. Further, they must trust her enough not to question her intentions. Judith, like Esther, intends at this time of crisis to take matters into her own hands. Even more astonishingly, Uzziah and the others agree. Although their faith in God is weak, they are willing to put their faith in Judith.

9:1–10:9a. Judith's Prayer and Preparations. Before undertaking her mission, Judith naturally turns to God. Her prayer is humble, but no mention is made of sin or repentance; according to Judith the Jews are innocent victims. The prayer's theology is typical of Second Temple Judaism: God is omniscient and omnipotent, a defender of the downtrodden. The prayer embraces the doctrine of retributive justice, in which even a weak woman could prevail.

The time of Judith's prayer aligns her with the Temple ritual, thus continuing the Temple focus. She begins by recalling with approval the episode of the revenge of Simeon and Levi on Shechem for the rape of Dinah (Gen 34). She is identifying herself not with Dinah, but with her ancestor Simeon; she too will be an avenger. The reminder that she is a helpless widow is a superb touch.

Verses 5–6 emphasize that God is the omnipotent Creator, and thus the outcome of this struggle is already decided. To emphasize this message, v. 7 contains a quotation of Exod 15:3, the Song of the Sea, which celebrates God's victory over the Egyptians in the exodus. The Temple focus returns in v. 8.

In vv. 9–14, Judith emphasizes her feminine frailty; for a man to be defeated by "the hand of a woman" would be an unbearable shame, but God is the god of the weak and powerless, and Judith the Jewess here stands for the weakness of all the Jews against the might of Holofernes. Judith asks for the ability to deceive with words, which may seem an ethical lapse, but is consistent with the doctrine of retributive justice.

Following her prayer, Judith leaves the safety of both her old self and Bethulia by changing her persona from pious widow to beautiful seductress and by stepping through the gates of Bethulia into enemy territory. Judith's toilette is voyeuristic; bathing scenes became popular in Second Temple literature, e.g., the Additions to Esther and Susanna. The lack of water in Bethulia does not deter the author. Judith's beautification ritual is elaborate, emphasizing the great transformation taking place. She can be compared to a warrior putting on his armor for battle. Judith also prepares ritually pure food to take with her to the enemy camp. The town elders are astonished at Judith's now-revealed beauty, as are all who encounter her from now on.

C. Judith and Her Maid Leave Bethulia (10:9b–10)

The gate is opened, and Judith and her maid make their symbolic way through the gate, down the mountain, and through the valley. They will retrace their steps exactly when they return (13:10b).

D. Judith Overcomes Holofernes (10:11–13:10a)

We have now reached the denouement of the central conflict in the book: the struggle between Judith and Holofernes, the proxies for the God of Israel and Nebuchadnezzar.

10:11–12:9. Judith in Holofernes' Camp. Judith is promptly captured by the enemy and taken to Holofernes. From now on Judith will employ "deceptive speech"; all of her dialogue will be ironic, full of double meanings and outright lies. Her beauty works to lull the Assyrians' suspicions, enabling her to carry out her plan without hindrance. Judith's promise to the guards to give a "true report" of the situation in Bethulia is only truthful from the point of view of an Israelite. The use of the word lord in verse 15 and in the ensuing scenes will always have a double meaning: the literal one of the human potentate, Nebuchadnezzar or Holofernes, and the hidden one of Israel's God. In Judith's initial dialogue with Holofernes she continues to speak deceptively, successfully employing irony and humor to disarm him. Holofernes on the other hand unwittingly speaks the truth, although the truth is apparent only to the reader. He also reveals himself as vain, obtuse, and a braggart. His twofold admonishment to Judith to "take courage" is humorous; Judith is in no need of courage. For her part, Judith employs gross flattery. 11:6 is particularly ironic; God will accomplish his purposes through Holofernes, but not in the way Holofernes imagines!

Judith's tale includes references to Jewish law that Holofernes cannot have understood. It was forbidden to eat meat that was improperly slaughtered (Lev 17:10–16). The tithes of the first fruits were considered sacred to the priest and the Levites (Num 18:8–32). However, at least one strand of Jewish interpretation then, and the prevailing one today, declared that any violation of the Law was acceptable to preserve human life (1 Macc 2:29–41).

In vv. 16–19, Judith speaks as a prophet, making several references to OT texts (Ps 89:4; Ezek 34:1–10; Isa 56:10–11). However, her prophecy is a false one. Holofernes also speaks prophetically; Judith is indeed "renowned throughout the whole world." What he means by "your God shall be my God" is unclear; does he intend to worship Judith's God as pagan kings did in the book of Daniel? Or does he anticipate Judith's worshiping Nebuchadnezzar?

In 12:1–9, Judith establishes a routine in the enemy camp that will eventually allow her to escape without hindrance. Judith continues to evince concern for the proper observance of ritual purity.

12:10–13:10a. Judith Kills Holofernes. Judith has only five days in which to accomplish her mission. On day four Holofernes decides to seduce her, thus unwittingly setting in motion the final events of the plot. Holofernes uses the language of honor and shame in v. 12; although he means to shame Judith, she is about to shame him. Bagoas' invitation actually invites Judith to become Holofernes' mistress; Judith's response is as usual laced with ironic double entendres. The author must intend for his readers to laugh at v. 18; we know what Judith means, although Holofernes does not. Holofernes, although he appears to be controlling the situation, is rapidly losing control, as evidenced by v. 20.

Judith, while seeming to relinquish control, actually continues to control both herself and Holofernes.

In 13:1–10a the long-anticipated climax to the story occurs. Judith cuts off Holofernes' head and escapes back to Bethulia.

The translation "dead drunk" in 13:2 captures the Greek well and delivers a good pun, for Holofernes will soon be dead period! At the climactic moment, Judith pauses for prayer, reminding us that her action is not motivated by personal vengeance but by the safety of the Israelites and the Temple. Judith's action is loaded with sexual innuendo; the line between sex and death was very close in pre-modern times. Holofernes' decapitation is a symbolic castration; he loses his potency and his power to harm the Israelites.

C'. Judith and Her Maid Return to Bethulia (13:10b–13:11)

Judith and her maid, retracing the same path they took in 10:10, reenter the symbolic safety of Bethulia's gates. Judith displays her trophy and, together with the Bethulians, blesses God, who is the true victor. Judith's victory cry is reminiscent of Ps 24, which also calls for gates to be opened in triumph.

B'. Judith's and Israel's Victory (13:12–16:20)

13:12–14:10. Judith's Plan and Achior's Conversion. In 9:2, Judith had prayed for this result; now she praises God for bringing it about. Holofernes' defeat is made more shameful because Judith is a woman. Uzziah's blessing recalls other OT blessings: Jael (Judges 5), Ruth (Ruth 3:10), and Melchizedek's blessing of Abram (Gen 14:19–20).

The danger is not completely gone, however. Now the Bethulians must defeat the Assyrian army. In 14:1–10, Judith reveals herself as not only a cunning assassin but also a military strategist. Judith's strategy includes a ruse that will lead to the discovery of Holofernes' headless body, thus sending the Assyrians into a panic (cf. 2 Kgs 19:35; 2 Chr 32:21).

Achior reappears to bear witness to the fulfillment of the prophecy he gave in 5:20–21. His faint, in contrast to Judith's fortitude, once again illustrates the reversal of gender roles in the book. Achior's conversion, symbolized by the physical act of circumcision, is an example of a strand in Judaism that welcomed conversion, illustrated by the books of Ruth and Jonah. Deut 23:3, in contrast, forbids the conversion of Ammonites.

14:11–16:20. Israel's Victory and Celebration. The Assyrians discover Holofernes' headless body and are routed by the Israelites. The Israelites win a military victory against the seemingly invincible Assyrian army, and Judith leads them in celebrations at the Temple.

Bagoas' final statement in 14:18 summarizes the reversal of honor and shame that has taken place:

the least powerful member of a powerless group has defeated the representative of the most powerful force on earth. The oppositions of female/male, Hebrew/Assyrian, and one/many are all present. Now that the Assyrians are "headless," they flee in panic, and the Israelites are able to defeat them easily. The slaughter and plunder are typical of warfare in the ancient Near East.

Beginning in 15:8, Judith, the Bethulians, and all Israel rejoice and praise God for Judith's victory. The reader is constantly reminded that God is the real victor, the power behind Judith. The centrality of Jerusalem is emphasized. It was unusual for the high priest and his entourage to leave Jerusalem for any reason; thus the extraordinary nature of this victory is emphasized. However, Judith is given full credit for her deed; it was not divine intervention but human initiative that saved the day, and God fully approves.

In 15:12–16:17, Judith leads the women of Israel in celebration. There is a strong tradition in Israel of women leading celebratory processions (see Exod 15:21; Judg 11:34; 1 Sam 18:7; and, in the NT, Mary's hymn in Luke 1). Judith's hymn of victory is modeled on other victory hymns such as Exod 15 (Miriam) and Judg 5 (Deborah). The song falls into three parts: Introduction (vv. 1–2), narration of the event (vv. 3–12), and response of praise (vv. 13–17). Verse 2 contains a quotation of Exod 15:3; see also 9:7.

Judith, the childless widow, speaks in maternal terms about her people. In 16:5, the phrase "hand of a woman" appears for the third time, again with connotations of shame for the defeated (9:10; 13:15). The dichotomy of the downtrodden and the powerful is reiterated in vv. 11–12. Although the reference to "sons of slave-girls" is not literally true, it emphasizes the shame of the Assyrian defeat.

Verses 13–17 are replete with biblical allusions: God as creator (Gen 1:2; Ps 33:6), the upheaval of nature in the face of the Divine Warrior (Exod 15:18; Ps 18:7–15; Isa 64:1), and God as avenger (Isa 66:24).

The worship of God, including sacrifice, which takes place in 16:18–20, is centralized in Jerusalem, as mandated by the book of Deuteronomy. Holofernes' canopy falls under the ban (Heb.: kherem), according to which the spoils of war belong to the true victor, God (Josh 6:19).

A'. Epilogue Concerning Judith (16:21–25)

The epilogue describes the remainder of Judith's life. She retires to Bethulia, although not specifically to her rooftop tent. She refuses to remarry; in Christian tradition Judith is upheld as a model of chastity, although in Jewish tradition her unmarried state is anomalous. Judith reaches a very old age and is exemplary to the end; she frees her maid and gives generous bequests. Finally, like the judge Deborah (Judg 5:31), her legacy to Israel is a long period of peace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

T. Craven. Artistry and Faith in the Book of Judith. SBLDS 70 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars, 1983); A. LaCocque. The Feminine Unconventional: Four Subversive Figures in Israel's Tradition (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); C. A. Moore. Judith: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 40 (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1985); L. M. Wills. "The Book of Judith." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999) 3: 1073–1183.

THE ADDITIONS TO ESTHER

NANCY BOWEN

OVERVIEW

The story of Esther exists in both a Hebrew (MT) and Greek version. The NRSV translates the text of the major Septuagint (LXX) manuscripts, which are fairly faithful renderings of MT's Esther plus six extended Additions. The Additions derive from different contexts and languages, and were probably added at different times. They add religious elements lacking in the Hebrew, most notably references to God and elements of Jewish piety, and enhance the theme of conflict between Jews and non-Jews.

OUTLINE

I. Addition A (11:2–12:6)

A. Mordecai's Dream (11:2–12)

B. The Eunuchs' Plot (12:1–6)

II. Addition B, Haman's Decree (13:1–7)

III. Addition C (13:8–14:19)

A. Mordecai's Prayer (13:8–18)

B. Esther's Prayer (14:1–19)

IV. Addition D, Esther Approaches the King (15:1–16)

V. Addition E, Mordecai's Decree (16:1–24)

VI. Addition F (10:4–11:1)

A. Mordecai's Dream Interpreted (10:4–13)

B. Greek Esther Authorized (11:1)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Addition A (11:2–12:6)

A. Mordecai's Dream (11:2–12)

Addition A consists of two sections. The first reports a dream that Mordecai had (11:2–12). There will be a "fight" between two "dragons," a creature symbolizing danger and chaos (Isa 27:1; Dan 7:23–27; Rev 12:3–4). The encounter is "a day of darkness and gloom" (11:8) like the "day of Yahweh" (Joel 2:1–2; Zeph 1:15). God responds to the righteous nation's cry (11:10) as God did in Egypt (Exod 2:23–24; 3:7–9). The dream's language establishes a theme of conflict between righteousness and evil, where, with God's help, righteousness prevails. The dream reveals "what God had determined to do." In the MT humans control the outcome; here God controls the future.

B. The Eunuchs' Plot (12:1–6)

Addition A also recounts a plot by two eunuchs to kill the king (12:1–6). Mordecai successfully thwarts the plot, and the king rewards him. A similar story occurs in 2:19–23. The suggestion that Haman is behind the plot and seeks revenge against Mordecai for his interference (12:6) differs from his motivation 3:1–6. The MT identifies Haman as an Agagite, a historic enemy of the Jews (1 Sam 15:8–33). Here he is identified as "a Bougean," an uncertain identification. He will later be identified as a Macedonian, a historic enemy of the Persians (16:10).

II. Addition B, Haman's Decree (13:1–7)

Additions B (13:1–7) and E (16:1–24) fill gaps in the MT by providing copies of the royal decrees dictated by Haman and Mordecai respectively (3:12–13; 8:9–10). Addition B records Haman's proposal to destroy the Jews with harsher language than in 3:8. It is cunning propaganda, demonizing the Jews as Other (cf. 3 Macc 3:12–29). They are depicted as different, and therefore dangerous. Homeland security motivates taking action—difference threatens the empire's stability (13:4–5). Typical of racist propaganda, the accusations are false. There is no evidence that the Jews threatened the Persian Empire. Accusation alone becomes sufficient cause for annihilation "without pity or restraint," language that ironically echoes what Israel is commanded to do to the Canaanites (Deut 7:16) and contradicts Artaxerxes assertion of "kindness" (13:2).

III. Addition C (13:8–14:19)

Addition C records prayers by Mordecai (13:8–18) and Esther (14:1–19), portraying them as devout Jews. The prayers are similar to individual complaint psalms, which petition God to save from the "enemy" (e.g., Pss 3; 6; 22). They differ on why God should act. Mordecai appeals to covenant; God's special "inheritance," or "portion," is in danger (13:15, 16–17), terms characterizing Israel's special relationship to God (e.g., Deut 32:9; Zech 2:12; 2 Macc 1:26; 3 Macc 6:3). Esther appeals to the people's needs; they are in trouble and have no escape (14:5, 9, 19). God is omniscient and omnipotent in the prayers, knowing the situation and having the power to change it (13:9, 11–12; 14:12, 15–16, 19). Indeed, these prayers are answered, establishing a theology of prayer's efficacy in dire circumstances and removing MT's ambiguity as to God's knowledge or power.

The prayers provide motivations and feelings absent in the MT. Mordecai refuses to bow to Haman because, though willing to debase himself to save Israel (13:13), he will bow only to Yahweh (13:14). This is still ambiguous since no law prohibits honoring foreign rulers. The desire not to elevate human glory hints that Haman may have claimed divine status, rendering bowing a form of idolatry (Exod 20:3–5; Dan 3:1–18). Esther hates her royal life. Her attitude toward Gentiles in general, and Persians in particular, is one of overt hostility. She strongly identifies with the Jewish people (14:5) and seems obsessed with separating herself whenever possible from court life, including regarding her crown as unclean as a menstrual rag (14:16; "filthy rag"; cf. Lev 15:19–24). She abhors having sex with the king (14:15), perhaps reflecting post-exilic anxiety about intermarriage. Sadly, this shows the same demonization of the Other as does Addition B.

IV. Addition D, Esther Approaches the King (15:1–16)

Addition D elaborates MT's much briefer account of Esther's approach to the King (MT 5:1–2). Additions C and D emphasize Esther's fear. It drives her to prayer, overwhelms her before the king, and heightens the sense of danger she, and her people, face. This emotion presents several possibilities for describing her character: she is an accomplished actress, pretending to be something she is not, "happy"; she is stereotypically female, physically and emotionally weak; or she is a courageous hero, carrying on with her mission though afraid. Esther's initial approach to the king is successful because God actively intervenes to change his spirit from anger to gentleness (15:7–8), an answer to her prayer (14:13).

V. Addition E, Mordecai's Decree (16:1–24)

Addition E details Mordecai's decree countermanding Haman's previous decree (Addition B). The empire changes its view of the Jews by judging them "with more equitable consideration" (16:9). A minority group is seen as contributing to the empire's peace and stability; difference becomes an asset. Jews are permitted to live under their own laws, removing the threat of annihilation through cultural assimilation (16:19). There is solidarity as Persians defend Jews and celebrate victory with them (16:20, 22–23). Addition E offers a peaceful model of tolerance and cooperation between groups, except that it proceeds to vilify the Macedonians who replace the Jews as Other (16:10–14). Repeating the dynamic that started the conflict suggests violence will continue as long as there are those who scheme and rulers who can be persuaded.

VI. Addition F (10:4–11:1)

A. Mordecai's Dream Interpreted (10:4–13)

B. Greek Esther Authorized (11:1)

Mordecai's dream is interpreted in Addition F. Mordecai credits God for everything that has happened, affirming the theology that God saves the righteous when they cry out in distress. Purim celebrates God's victory instead of human victory. The interpretation of Esther as the river that grew from a tiny spring perhaps references her growing maturity and authority in the story. Addition F closes with a note intended to authenticate the Greek version of Esther, or maybe just the Purim festival (11:1). The existence of multiple authoritative versions and the freedom to change and add to the story reveals the dynamic process of canonization. Because of the story's importance, new generations adapted the text to offer new interpretations in new contexts. Contemporary communities should consider whether new interpretations might be needed to reflect contemporary issues and experiences of God.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

S. W. Crawford. "The Additions to Esther." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999) 3:945–72; L. Day. Three Faces of a Queen: Characterization in the Books of Esther. JSOTSup 186 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995).

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON

WALTER T. WILSON

OVERVIEW

Neither part of the title of this work should be taken at face value. To begin with, scholars agree that the author is not in fact the Israelite king and renowned patron of wisdom, but an anonymous Jew writing in the late first century BCE or early first century CE. Composed in an eloquent, sometimes lyrical, Greek, this book is among the most Hellenized works of the Apocrypha. As such it evidences numerous interactions with Greek culture, especially Greek philosophy (e.g., 7:22b–8:1). The vehement attack on Egyptian animal-worship in 15:14–19 suggests that the author is writing in Alexandria, where conflicts between Jews and non-Jews were common. The language of 6:3 indicates a date of composition sometime after the Roman occupation of Egypt in 30 BCE, but precision beyond this is difficult to achieve.

Questions have also been raised as to what type of "wisdom" this work represents. To be sure, the author draws freely on classic wisdom texts like Proverbs and Sirach, and the figure of divine wisdom plays a prominent role in his reflections (e.g., 6:12–20). At the same time, Wisdom also incorporates ideas and imagery familiar from Jewish apocalyptic literature (e.g., 3:7–9), and in this the book resembles certain wisdom writings found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. As with these writings, Wisdom represents an effort to transform earlier genres and traditions into a vehicle for conveying a more complex worldview, one that integrates sapiential and apocalyptic perspectives.

In the hands of our author, such integration is pressed into the service of his overarching theme: the deliverance of the righteous, specifically, those who obey "the law" (see on 6:4), and the punishment of their ungodly oppressors. In an environment where Jews were often viewed with suspicion and often faced with inducements to abandon their distinctive way of life, the pertinence of such a theme would have been obvious. The book encourages the readers' adherence to their faith traditions in difficult circumstances by dramatizing how divine judgment is manifested in human existence. The wicked experience divine retribution, while those who remain faithful will be vindicated and exalted, enjoying immortality (see on 3:4).

Like Sirach, Wisdom enjoys canonical status in the Roman Catholic Church, while in Protestant denominations it is relegated to the Apocrypha. A number of ancient Christians, including Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–211/215 CE), regarded the book as Scripture.

OUTLINE

I. The Righteous and the Wicked Contrasted (1:1–6:25)

A. Appeal to Seek Wisdom and Righteousness (1:1–15)

B. The Deluded Reasoning of the Unrighteous (1:16–2:24)

C. Reward and Retribution After Death (3:1–4:19)

D. The Final Judgment (4:20–5:23)

E. Appeal to Seek Wisdom and Righteousness (6:1–25)

II. Solomon's Quest for Wisdom (7:1–10:21)

A. The King's Need for Wisdom (7:1–14)

B. Wisdom's All-Embracing Excellence (7:15–8:1)

C. Solomon's Love Affair with Wisdom (8:2–20)

D. Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom (8:21–9:18)

E. Wisdom's Agency in Salvation History (10:1–21)

III. Divine Justice in the Exodus Story (11:1–19:22)

A. First Comparison: The Plague of the Nile and Water from the Rock (11:1–14)

B. Second Comparison Begun: The Plague of Small Animals and the Sending of the Quail (11:15–20) Digressions on the Nature of Divine Justice (11:21–15:19)

B'. Second Comparison Concluded: The Plague of Small Animals and the Sending of the Quail (16:1–4)

C. Third Comparison: The Plague of Insects and the Bronze Serpent (16:5–14)

D. Fourth Comparison: The Plague of Storms and the Rain of Manna (16:15–29)

E. Fifth Comparison: The Plague of Darkness and the Pillar of Fire (17:1–18:4)

F. Sixth Comparison: The Destruction of the Egyptians and the Deliverance of the Israelites (18:5–25)

G. Seventh Comparison: Death and Salvation at the Red Sea (19:1–21)

H. Concluding Doxology (19:22)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Righteous And The Wicked Contrasted (1:1–6:25)

A. Appeal to Seek Wisdom and Righteousness (1:1–15)

The address of "King Solomon" to his Gentile peers ("you rulers of the earth," 1:1; cf. 6:1–2) belongs to the book's fictional setting; the actual readers are Jews governed by such rulers. Advice on kingship is a prominent feature of another book attributed to Solomon, Proverbs (e.g., 16:10–15; 20:26–28; 25:1–7; 29:4, 12–14). The author begins by identifying the basis of right rule: wisdom (cf. Prov 8:15–16).

1:6–11. The description of wisdom as a "kindly spirit" that "has filled the world" and "holds all things together" (1:6–7) and that can "dwell" in the righteous (1:4) reflects Stoic teachings on the world soul, the rational principle that pervades and sustains the universe (cf. 7:22b–8:1). Here the author emphasizes wisdom's role as an instrument of divine justice that holds people accountable for their words and deeds (cf. 4:20; 11:20; 12:25–26; 14:31).

1:12–15. In contrast to certain biblical traditions according to which death is an aspect of human existence decreed by God (e.g., Deut 32:39; 1 Sam 2:6), our author asserts that God created humanity "for incorruption" (2:23) and is not the direct source of death (cf. 1:16; 2:24; Jas 1:13–15).

B. The Deluded Reasoning of the Unrighteous (1:16–2:24)

In a manner familiar from the Hellenistic diatribe, the author ascribes to his opponents an imaginary speech that expresses their views about life in an exaggerated form (2:1–20). The comments in 2:12 may suggest that the opponents are apostate Jews, though it is more likely that they include "the ungodly" in general (1:16). It is their "covenant" with death (1:16; cf. Isa 28:15) and not any direct action on God's part that accounts for how death corrupted the world (2:24).

2:1–5. Similar laments about the finality of death can be found especially in the book of Ecclesiastes, e.g., 2:16; 3:19–22; 4:2–3; 6:12; 9:5–6.

2:6–20. The failure of the ungodly to recognize the true nature and purpose of life leads them into three forms of unrighteousness, each more deplorable than the last: they revel in sensual pleasures (2:6–9), they exploit the weak (2:10–11), and they persecute the righteous unto death (2:12–20).

2:21–24. The author now gives his assessment of the speech that he has just put into the mouths of the ungodly. Blinded by their unrighteousness, it is impossible for them to comprehend God's "secret purposes" (2:22; cf. 13:1; 14:22; 16:16). Instead they have been corrupted by the "devil's envy" (2:24, a reference to the temptation story of Gen 3:1–24). The righteous, by contrast, are by definition those who possess such knowledge (2:13; cf. 6:22; 10:10). They are destined for "incorruption," i.e. immortality (2:23; cf. 1:15; 3:4), which represents the true purpose of human life (cf. 2 Esd 7:113; 1 Cor 15:42–54; 1 Pet 1:3–6, 23).

C. Reward and Retribution After Death (3:1–4:19)

The views expressed in 2:1–20 are now refuted by alternating descriptions that contrast the rewards conferred on the righteous (3:1–9; 3:13b–15; 4:1–2; 4:7–15) with the punishments meted out to the unrighteous (3:10–13a; 3:16–19; 4:3–6; 4:16–19). Even if the righteous lack the blessings customarily associated with success (a long life, a life free from suffering, many children), they will be more than compensated for this at the final judgment. The unrighteous, meanwhile, are miserable in both this life and the next.

3:1–9. Lacking knowledge of God's ultimate purpose for humankind (2:22), to the ungodly the righteous people that they condemned to death "seemed to have died" (3:2), but in fact their souls were in God's care all along (3:1). Their suffering is not punishment, but a brief moment of divine testing and discipline (3:5–6; cf. 11:9–10; 16:6, 11; 18:20; Deut 8:5; Prov 3:11–12; 17:3; Sir 2:1–5; 18:13–14; 32:14; 2 Macc 6:12–16), while their death is the inauguration of a higher form of existence: they will "shine forth" (3:7; cf. Dan 12:3; Zech 9:16; 2 Esd 7:97; Matt 13:43) and "govern nations" (3:8; cf. Dan 7:22; Rev 20:4). No indication is given as to the condition of the righteous between the moment of death and the time of their "visitation" (3:7), indicating that the author is not operating with a fully developed eschatology.

3:10–13a. The unrighteous acts of the ungodly listed in 2:6–20 are now depicted as rebellion against God.

3:13b–4:6. In the ancient world, children were considered a blessing (e.g., Ps 127:3–5), while barrenness could be interpreted as a sign of divine displeasure (e.g., Gen 30:23). The author counters this by arguing that true blessedness and renown do not derive from physical progeny but from the fruit of virtue (3:15; 4:1). Similarly, in response to the biblical injunction barring eunuchs from the cultic assembly (Deut 23:1), he draws on Isa 56:4–5 to promise them a place in God's heavenly temple (3:14). The quest of the righteous for virtue is represented figuratively as an athletic "contest," immortality being one of its "prizes" (4:2; cf. 4 Macc 17:11–16; 1 Cor 9:24–27). For the condemnation of parents who bear illegitimate children (3:16–17; 4:3–6), cf. Sir 16:1–4; 23:22–26; such people will have no hope on "the day of judgment" (3:18; cf. 2 Esd 7:38; 2 Pet 2:9).

4:7–19. It was customary to associate old age with wisdom (e.g., Job 15:7–10; Prov 3:16). The author counters this by alluding to the story of Enoch (Gen 5:24), who is identified as a paradigm of righteous individuals "taken up" (4:10) by God in order to preserve their souls from "the fascination of wickedness" (4:12). From this perspective, premature death is not a curse but an act of divine mercy (4:15). It is also interpreted as an act of retribution: in the afterlife, the righteous will condemn the ungodly (4:16), just as the ungodly had condemned them to death (2:20).

D. The Final Judgment (4:20–5:23)

Many elements of this depiction derive from the book of Isaiah. When the unrighteous witness the deliverance of the righteous, they are filled with fear and amazement (for the eschatological scenario, cf. 2 Esd 7:36–38; Luke 16:22–25). The author juxtaposes their remorseful speech of self-condemnation in 5:4–13 with the arrogant speech that they had delivered earlier in 2:1–20. The assertion made there that "our allotted time is the passing of a shadow" (2:5) is now ironically fulfilled (5:9).

4:20–5:8. The astonished reaction of the unrighteous to the righteous is modeled after the fourth Servant Song (Isa 52:13–53:12), which portrays the vindication of "the righteous one" after enduring affliction and death at the hand of his oppressors. The confession of guilt uttered by the unrighteous in 5:6–8 is paralleled also by Isa 59:2–3, 7–10, and for the idea in 4:20 of being convicted by one's sins, see Isa 59:12.

5:9–14. The ephemeral nature of human life is a recurring theme of biblical literature, e.g., Isa 40:6–8; Hos 13:3; 2 Esd 7:61; Jas 4:14. The comparisons in 5:10–11 may be adapted from the riddle in Prov 30:18–19.

5:15–23. We now learn that divine judgment will occur on a cosmic scale, when God "will arm all creation" (5:17) in order to crush the forces of unrighteousness (cf. 19:6; Sir 39:28–31). The righteous, meanwhile, will be numbered among the heavenly hosts (5:5; cf. Dan 12:2–3) and receive a divine crown and diadem (5:16; cf. Isa 62:3). The imagery in 5:17–20 of the Divine Warrior donning various attributes as armor is based on Isa 59:17–18; cf. Ps 7:12–13; Eph 6:13–17. The author will use this imagery again in 18:14–16. The descriptions in 5:21–23 recount some of the standard trappings of divine judgment; cf. Isa 28:2; 29:5–6; 41:15–16; Ezek 13:11; 38:22; 2 Esd 15:40–44; Rev 16:18.

E. Appeal to Seek Wisdom and Righteousness (6:1–25)

The previous section had concluded by raising the prospect of God overturning the thrones of unrighteous rulers (5:23). This provides an occasion for Solomon to renew the appeal for his fellow kings to pursue wisdom (cf. 1:1–15).

6:1–11. Since their sovereignty is granted them by God (cf. Prov 8:15–16; Sir 10:4–5; Rom 13:1), the actions of kings are subject to divine scrutiny. Indeed, "the mighty will be mightily tested" (6:6; cf. Jer 25:15–29; Ezek 21:25–27; Sir 10:8–18). The reference in 6:4 to their failure to observe "the law" is ambiguous. Since he expects even pagan rulers to follow it, the author is probably referring to the law of nature, i.e., universal principles of justice, though, like other philosophically inclined Jews of the era, he probably believed that this law comes to expression most perfectly in the law of Moses (cf. 6:18; 16:6; 18:4, 9). The Greek term for "dominion" in 6:3 is used elsewhere in ancient sources for the Roman conquest of Egypt.

6:12–20. The personification of wisdom as a desirable woman is based on Prov 8:1–21. The sentence in 6:17–20 is a good example of a chain argument, or "sorites" (cf. Rom 5:3–4; 2 Pet 1:5–7). In this case it connects the acquisition of rule and immortality with the observance of wisdom's laws.

6:21–25. The switch to the first-person singular signals a transition to the second major part of the book. For the idea that wisdom played a role in "the beginning of creation" (6:22), see on 8:2–8.

II. Solomon's Quest for Wisdom (7:1–10:21)

A. The King's Need for Wisdom (7:1–14)

Even though Solomon is a king, he is still a mortal, a "child of earth" (7:1; cf. Gen 2:7; Sir 17:1; 1 Cor 15:47), and so must pray to God for wisdom like anyone else. His story thus serves as a model for all those who desire wisdom.

7:1–6. The description of the king's birth in 7:1–2 reflects ancient assumptions about human pregnancy; cf. Job 10:9–11; Ps 139:13–16. For the idea in 7:6 that everyone enters and exits life the same way, cf. Sir 40:1.

7:7–14. The section's opening reference is to the prayer of Solomon in 1 Kgs 3:6–9, which our author paraphrases in 8:21–9:18. Not only is wisdom greater than power, wealth, health, or beauty, Solomon learns that she is the source of these and of "all good things" (7:11; cf. Job 28:15–19; Prov 2:4; 3:13–16). She can even be referred to as the "mother" of all blessings (7:12), an image that extends the personification of wisdom as a female figure in 6:12–20.

B. Wisdom's All-Embracing Excellence (7:15–8:1)

This encomium of divine wisdom combines earlier biblical descriptions with concepts derived from Greek philosophy.

7:15–22a. Since wisdom is "the fashioner of all things" (7:22a; cf. 8:4–6), those who possess her understand all forms of human knowledge, including everything from cosmology to botany (7:17–20; cf. 1 Kgs 4:29–34).

7:22b–8:1. In antiquity divine beings were believed to have many names and appellations. Most of the twenty-one (the product of three and seven, numbers signifying perfection) attributes listed in 7:22b–23 are familiar from Greek philosophical writings, e.g., Pseudo-Aristotle, On the Cosmos 400B–401B. The depiction of wisdom as "a pure emanation" pervading all things (7:24–25) reflects the influence of Stoic philosophy in particular; see on 1:6–11; cf. Sir 1:9–10. For wisdom's function as a "reflection" of the divine (7:26), cf. Heb 1:3.

7:27. Abraham was known both as a friend of God (2 Chr 20:7; Isa 41:8; Jas 2:23) and as a prophet (Gen 20:7; Ps 105:15); that status is now available to anyone who possesses wisdom; cf. 7:14.

C. Solomon's Love Affair with Wisdom (8:2– 20)

Having described wisdom in general terms, the king now recounts the many benefits that he has personally obtained from his relationship with wisdom, whom he loved like a bride (cf. Prov 7:4; Sir 15:2; 51:15, 21).

8:2–8. That wisdom was God's agent in the creation of the world (8:4–6; cf. 6:22; 9:1–2, 9) is a fundamental tenet in the Jewish tradition, e.g., Prov 3:19; 8:5, 7, 22–31; Sir 24:4–6, 9. As such she bequeaths everything that is necessary for "life," including the four forms of moral excellence mentioned in 8:7, which constitute the standard "canon" of virtues in Greek philosophy.

8:9–18. On account of his superior wisdom, Solomon earned both the admiration of his people and the respect of his fellow rulers (cf. Job 29:7– 11, 21–23; Sir 15:4–6). Achieving personal "rest" (8:16), or tranquility, is an important goal of the sage, as in Sir 6:28; 28:16. Greek philosophers held that human beings have a "kinship" with the gods by virtue of their common possession of reason; in 8:17 this extends to the sage's possession of immortality (cf. 6:18–19; 15:3).

8:19–20. Solomon's description of his birth may be influenced by Platonic doctrines concerning the pre-existence of the soul; cf. 4 Macc 18:23.

D. Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom (8:21–9:18)

This section, notable for its lyrical expression, is an expanded version of the prayer in 1 Kgs 3:6–9; cf. 2 Chr 1:8–10.

8:21–9:3. After an introduction (8:21; cf. Sir 1:10), the prayer opens with an address to God (9:1–3) that recounts how humankind was created through God's wisdom to "rule the world" (9:3; cf. Gen

1:26, 28; Ps 8:6; Sir 17:2–4). In order to do so rightly, they need wisdom.

9:4–12. The body of the prayer consists of two parallel petitions, 9:4–9 and 9:10–12. Each begins with a request that God send Solomon the wisdom that resides beside the divine throne (9:4, 10), further personifying wisdom as God's female consort (cf. 6:12–20; 18:15; Prov 8:30; Sir 24:4).

9:8. That Solomon's Temple (see 1 Kgs 6:1–38) was only a copy of a heavenly archetype may be inferred from Exod 25:9, 40; 26:30 (cf. Heb 8:5; Rev 11:19).

9:13–18. The prayer concludes with a meditation on the futility of human efforts and humankind's dependence on God; cf. Job 38:31–38; Isa 40:12–14; Jdt 8:14; Sir 1:2–6; Bar 3:29–31. That the human body "weighs down the soul" (9:15) is an observation borrowed from Platonic philosophy.

E. Wisdom's Agency in Salvation History (10:1–21)

The preceding section concluded with the claim that people are "saved by wisdom" (9:18). This gives the theme of the current section, which offers seven illustrations of wisdom's providential ordering of history. In each case a righteous hero is contrasted with one or more unrighteous adversaries. Personal names are eschewed throughout, indicating that they all are to be understood as generic types. For a similar catalog of biblical figures, see Sir 44:17–45:26 (cf. Heb 11:4–31).

10:1–3. Adam and Cain (Gen 1:26–5:5).

10:4. Noah (Gen 5:28–9:29). The author interprets Cain's sin as the cause of the flood (cf. 14:6).
10:5. Abraham (Gen 11:26–25:10) contrasts with "the nations" of the Tower of Babel story (Gen 11:1–9).

10:6–8. Lot (Gen 19:1–29) escaped the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

10:9–12. Jacob and Esau (Gen 27–33). The "arduous contest" is a reference to Gen 32:22–32 (cf. Hos 12:3–4).

10:13–14. Joseph (Gen 37–50) contrasts with those who falsely accused him (Gen 39:6a–23).
10:15–21. Moses (Exod 1–17) prevailed over Pharaoh and his armies.

III. Divine Justice in the Exodus Story (11:1–19:22)

11:1–20; 15:20–19:22. The discussion of Moses in 10:15–21 leads seamlessly into an elaborate comparison (or "synkrisis") of God's dealings with the Egyptians and the Israelites during the exodus. Although it is much longer, this section follows the same principle as that of 10:1–21: the respective fates of the righteous and the unrighteous are contrasted through a series of seven historical illustrations (supplemented by a series of digressions in 11:21–15:19), with no personal names being used. The author's apologetic interests are evident in the manner in which he consistently magnifies the Egyptians' culpability while never mentioning any of the Israelites' failures.

A. First Comparison: The Plague of the Nile and Water from the Rock (11:1–14)

The logic informing all of the comparisons is announced in 11:5: God employs the same means for saving the righteous and punishing their adversaries (cf. 11:13; 16:24; 18:8). In this case the former drink while the latter thirst. The idealized portrait of the Israelites in 11:4 may be inspired by Ps

107:6; cf. Exod 7:14–24; 17:1–7; Num 20:2–13.

11:9–14. On the surface, the suffering of the righteous and the unrighteous might appear to be the same. The former, however, experience suffering as an expression of divine discipline and testing (11:9–10; cf. 3:5), while the latter experience it "in a different way" (11:14) because they recognize that their suffering benefits the righteous (11:13).

B. Second Comparison Begun: The Plague of Small Animals and the Sending of the Quail (11:15–20)

The comparison will not be concluded until 16:1–4. The author's interpretation of the exodus story (cf. 12:23) assumes the biblical principle of retribution in kind, for which see Exod 21:23–25; Lev 24:18–20; Deut 19:18b–21. For the "unknown beasts" of 11:18, see Job 40:15–41:34.

Digressions on the Nature of Divine Justice (11:21–15:19)

The second comparison is interrupted by a string of loosely connected arguments meant to demonstrate that the unrighteous deserve the punishment that they receive.

11:21–12:2. Since they are part of God's creation, God shows love and mercy to all people, especially by granting them the opportunity to repent when they sin (cf. 12:10, 13, 16, 19; 15:1; Sir 17:24; 18:11–14; Pr Man 1:7; 2 Esd 7:132–33; 8:45).

12:3–11. God showed mercy even to the "accursed race" of the Canaanites (12:11; cf. Gen 9:25–27) and demonstrated forbearance by sending wasps against them in advance of human armies (cf. Exod 23:28). Their failure to recognize God's displeasure with them and repent (12:10) is seen as justification for the Israelites' "colonization" of the holy land (12:7). Among the Canaanites' most heinous practices was child sacrifice (12:5–6), in observation of the Molech cult (Lev 20:2–5).

12:12–18. Legal terminology is employed to depict God as a righteous and merciful judge (cf. Job 9:12, 19; Ps 76:7–9; Isa 40:13–14; Rom 9:14–21). In this capacity God will "rebuke any insolence" among those who doubt the reality of divine justice (12:17; cf. Ps 119:21; Isa 13:11; Jer 48:30; Sir 35:22b–24; Bar 4:34).

12:19–22. God's forbearance toward the wicked serves as a model for the righteous, who should be merciful in their dealings with them as well (12:19). If God makes repentance available to the unrighteous, it is all the more available to God's children (12:20–22).

12:23–27. Animal worshipers receive "mild rebukes" from God at first (12:26) when they are punished by the very creatures they think to be gods (cf. 11:15–16). But when they continue in this abomination, they receive "the utmost condemnation" (12:27).

13:1–15:19. The author reproves, with increasing severity, the worship of nature (13:1–9), of idols (13:10–15:13), and of animals (15:14–19).

13:1–9. The worship of the heavenly bodies was common in antiquity (cf. Deut 4:19; 2 Kgs 21:3–5; 23:4–5; Gal 4:3, 8–9). While the effort to find God in the created world is understandable (13:6), it is misguided, because it puts too much confidence in what can be seen (13:7), and therefore fails to discern the world's Creator (13:5) and Lord (13:9).

13:10–19. In constructing this section the author would have had a long tradition of Jewish polemic against idolatry upon which to draw, e.g., Ps 115:3–8; Isa 40:18–20; 44:9–20; Jer 10:1–16. He begins with a sarcastic description of how idol "gods" are crafted from discarded wood (13:10–16;

cf. 15:7–19). To pray to such worthless and helpless objects is preposterous (13:17–19).

14:1–11. Safety in a voyage is assured not by a flimsy piece of wood, but by divine providence (14:1–5; cf. 17:2; 4 Macc 9:24), just as Noah and his family were saved from the waters that destroyed the "arrogant giants" (14:6–7; cf. Gen 6:1–9:29; 3 Macc 2:4). The idolater is just as hateful to God as what he worships, upon which there will be a divine "visitation," i.e., judgment (14:8–11; cf. 3:7; Sir 16:18; Luke 19:44).

14:12–21. In contrast to divine wisdom (see on 8:2–8), idols have not existed since the beginning of creation (14:13). They are, instead, the product of human vanity. The arguments of 14:17–21 resemble those of the Greek writer Euhemerus (ca. 300 BCE), who suggested that the "gods" were in fact human kings who after their deaths had been deified by their subjects.

14:22–31. Idolatry is seen to lead its followers into other sins, especially murder, adultery, and perjury, a fact that only increases their culpability; cf. Jer 7:9; Rom 1:28–31.

15:1–6. Idolaters are briefly contrasted with those who are God's own, i.e., those who know God's power and righteousness (15:3). The allusion to Exod 34:6–9 in 15:1–2 indicates that the latter are the Israelites.

15:7–13. A second attack on those who manufacture idols (cf. 13:10–19). Here the emphasis is on the cynicism and greed of those who sell what they know to be "counterfeit gods" (15:9). To them life is nothing more than "a festival held for profit" (15:12; cf. Isa 22:12–13). That human souls are only borrowed and must someday be returned (15:8) was a popular concept of Platonic origin (cf. 15:16).

15:14–19. The series of digressions culminates with an attack on the Egyptians, who are castigated as the "most foolish" (15:14) both because they oppressed God's people and because they worship animals, indeed the most vile and senseless of animals (15:18).

B'. Second Comparison Concluded: The Plague of Small Animals and the Sending of the Quail (16:1–4)

The series of comparisons that had begun in 11:1–20 resumes here. The Egyptians are tormented by the very creatures they worship (16:1; cf. Exod 8:1–15), while the Israelites enjoy delicacies (16:2–3; cf. Exod 16:9–13; Num 11:16–23, 31–34). The author assumes that both the Israelites and the Egyptians are aware of what the other side is experiencing (16:4; cf. 11:13–14; 16:8, 22; 18:1).

C. Third Comparison: The Plague of Insects and the Bronze Serpent (16:5–14)

The bites are a warning to the Israelites, who quickly find healing (16:5–6, 10–11; cf. Num 21:4–9), but to the Egyptians they are death (16:9, 13–14; cf. Exod 8:20–32; 10:1–20). The author is careful to point out that the bronze serpent was only "a symbol of deliverance" (16:6): the real Savior was God (16:7).

D. Fourth Comparison: The Plague of Storms and the Rain of Manna (16:15–29)

The Egyptians endure "unusual rains" that destroy their crops (16:16, 19; cf. Exod 9:13–35), while heavenly food descends on the Israelites like snow (16:20, 22; cf. Exod 16:1–8, 14–36; Num 11:4–9). The author apparently believed that the plague of thunder and hail occurred simultaneously with the plagues of frogs, gnats, and flies (16:18; cf. Ps 105:30–32). The idea that the manna was "suited to every taste" (16:20) is found also in later rabbinic sources. At this point an explanation for how the miracles were accomplished is also provided: the very elements of creation itself undergo internal transformations (16:23–25) so that the fire sent upon the Egyptians was not extinguished by the relentless rains (16:16), while the snow-like manna "withstood fire without melting" (16:22; 19:18–21).

E. Fifth Comparison: The Plague of Darkness and the Pillar of Fire (17:1–18:4)

The longest of the comparisons, this section is noteworthy for its unusual, poetic language and its attention to the psychological dimensions of terror. Features of the narration in 17:2–21 are familiar from the "descent into Hades" genre, of which Book 6 of Virgil's Aeneid was a well-known example. Thinking that their sins were hidden, the Egyptians themselves are enveloped in darkness (17:3; cf. Exod 10:21–29), afflicted by their guilty consciences (17:11; cf. 1 Tim 4:2; Titus 1:15), and forced to endure nightmares (17:14–16; cf. 18:17–19; Job 7:14; Dan 4:5; Sir 40:5–7). Those who had imprisoned God's holy ones (18:4) are now bound by a "chain of darkness" (17:17). The righteous, meanwhile, are led through the wilderness by a pillar of fire (18:3; cf. Exod 13:21–22; 14:24) so that they might become instruments through which "the imperishable light of the law" might shine on the world (18:4; cf. Isa 49:6; Bar 4:1–2; 2 Esd 14:20–22).

F. Sixth Comparison: The Destruction of the Egyptians and the Deliverance of the Israelites (18:5–25)

Both groups experience death, though the reasons and ends are different. In retribution for killing the Israelites' male children (18:5; cf. Exod 1:22), the Egyptians' firstborn are killed on the night of the first Passover (18:6–19; cf. Exod 11:1–12:32) so that they finally "acknowledged your people to be God's child" (18:13; cf. 5:5; 12:27; Exod 4:22–23; Hos 11:1). The enigmatic "destroyer" of Exod 12:23 is personified in 18:15–16 as the word of God, which earlier had been identified with divine wisdom (9:1–2). The Israelites experience a plague of death as well (18:20–25; cf. Num 16:41–50) though, unlike the Egyptians, they have a savior to intervene on their behalf, i.e., Aaron. No mention is made of what caused the plague, i.e., the Israelites' rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num 16:41).

G. Seventh Comparison: Death and Salvation at the Red Sea (19:1–21)

The water of the Sea drowns the Egyptians' armies, filling up their punishment (19:1–5; cf. Dan 8:23; 2 Macc 6:14), while it parts for the Israelites, allowing them to pass through on dry land (19:6–9; cf. Exod 14:1–31). The author explains that this and the other miracles were accomplished when the material elements "changed places with one another" (19:18–21), i.e., they were transformed so as to accomplish divine providence; cf. 16:23–25.

H. Concluding Doxology (19:22)

The main point of the section and the book is summarized: God's people will always receive "help."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

S. Burkes "Wisdom and Apocalypticism in the Wisdom of Solomon." HTR 95 (2002) 21–44; S. Cheon. The Exodus Story in the Wisdom of Solomon: A Study in Biblical Interpretation. JSPSup 23 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); J. J. Collins. Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age. OTL. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997) 178–221; P. Enns. Exodus Retold: Ancient Exegesis of the Departure from Egypt in Wisdom 10:15–21 and 19:1–9. HSM 57 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); L. L. Grabber. Wisdom of Solomon. Guides to Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); M. Kolarcik. The Ambiguity of Death in the Book of Wisdom 1–6: A Study of Literary Structure and Interpretation. AnBib 127 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1991); M. McGlynn. Divine Judgement and Divine Benevolence in the Book of Wisdom. WUNT 2.139 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); A. Passaro and B. Giuseppe, eds. The Book of Wisdom in Modern Research: Studies on Tradition, Redaction, and Theology. Deuterocanonical and Cognate Literature: Yearbook 2005 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2005); J. M. Reese. Hellenistic Influence on the Book of Wisdom and Its Consequences. AnBib 41 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1970); S. Schroer. "The Book of Sophia." Searching the Scriptures, Volume Two: A Feminist Commentary. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, ed. (New York: Crossroad, 1994) 17–38; D. Winston. The Wisdom of Solomon. AB 43 (New York: Doubleday, 1979).

SIRACH

BENJAMIN G. WRIGHT III

OVERVIEW

The Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach, also known as Ecclesiasticus (often Sirach for short). This Jewish wisdom book goes by three different names depending on the language tradition. The title above derives from superscriptions to Greek manuscripts. The Hebrew title was evidently "The Wisdom of Joshua son of Eleazar son of Sira," hence the short title the "Wisdom of Ben ('son of') Sira." The name Ecclesiasticus derives from the Vulgate (Latin) version and means "belonging to the church."

Sirach was written by a sage who identifies himself as Jesus son of Eleazar son of Sirach of Jerusalem (50:27). He wrote at the beginning of the second century BCE, probably between 200 and 180, and he likely witnessed the turbulent changeover of control of Judea from the Ptolemies in Egypt to the Seleucids in Syria.

The original language was Hebrew, but the primary form of transmission was the Greek translation made by the author's grandson around 117 BCE. The book was not accepted into the Jewish biblical canon, and although the rabbis knew proverbs connected with Ben Sira, the Hebrew fell into obscurity and disuse. The Greek translation, included in the Septuagint, became part of the scriptures of the Christian church. Sirach survives in important Latin and Syriac translations. In the late nineteenth century, a discovery of Hebrew manuscripts in a genizah (storeroom) of a Cairo synagogue brought to light six fragmentary medieval manuscripts. Excavations at Masada revealed a first-century BCE manuscript containing portions of 39:27–44:17. At Qumran, 2Q18 preserves only a few words of 6:20–31 and some letters at the ends of lines that could be 6:14–15 or perhaps 1:19–20. 11QPsa preserves parts of 51:13–20, 30b. In all, the Hebrew manuscripts preserve approximately two-thirds of the book.

The foundation for Ben Sira's literary efforts is the proverb (mashal), expressed mostly in twoline couplets called bicola. He often combines these bicola into larger units of poetry on thematic topics typical of ancient Near Eastern wisdom, like speech, friends, women, and business. In addition to practical advice, Ben Sira instructs his students about more speculative topics, such as the wonders of creation. Besides the proverb, he employs other literary forms, including prayers, autobiographical poems, and woes (often found in prophetic books).

As a wisdom teacher, Ben Sira draws on diverse sources for his teaching. Traditions of wisdom transcended ancient Israel and were common to most of the ancient Near East, and Ben Sira knows wisdom material from other contexts, particularly from Egypt. He also seems to be acquainted with some Greek traditions. Another major source of Ben Sira's wisdom is observation of the natural world. In a long poem on the wonders of nature, he begins, "I will now call to mind the works of the Lord and will declare what I have seen" (42:15). Most important, Ben Sira has command of the literary heritage of ancient Israel, many works of which were later included in the Jewish and Christian biblical canons. While scholars do not know exactly what would have constituted scripture in Ben Sira's time, he certainly valued the Pentateuch highly. He undoubtedly had access to other literary works and traditions, but at times it is difficult to determine their exact form, partly because Ben Sira does not explicitly quote other literature. He uses his source texts to suit his agenda, shaping them in ways that often obscure the precise form in which they came to him.

OUTLINE

The Wisdom of Ben Sira has no discernible structure on which scholars agree. The praise of Wisdom (ch. 24) occupies a pivotal position in the center of the book, dividing it roughly in half. Scholars recognize larger sections with sub-units on specific topics. I have followed that practice below.

The Prologue (to the Greek translation)

I. Sirach 1:1–4:10

A. Praise of Wisdom (1:1–10)

B. Fear of the Lord Is Wisdom (1:11–30)

C. Trusting in God (2:1–18)

D. Duty to Parents (3:1–16)

E. Humility and Almsgiving (3:17–4:10)

II. Sirach 4:11–6:17

A. Submission to Wisdom (4:11–19)

B. Shame and Speech (4:20–31)

C. Practical Wisdom—Presumption, Speech, Passion (5:1–6:4)

D. Friendship (6:5–17)

III. Sirach 6:18–14:19

A. Submission to Wisdom (6:18–37)

B. Miscellaneous Advice (7:1–17)

C. Household, Priests, the Poor (7:18–36)

D. Circumstances to Avoid (8:1–19)

E. Women and Friends (9:1–16)

G. Rulers (9:17–10:5)

H. Pride (10:6–18)

I. Honor and Humility (10:19–11:6)

J. Deliberation (11:7–28)

K. Friends and Associates (11:29–13:24)

L. Happiness (13:25–14:2)

M. Wealth (14:3–19)

IV. Sirach 14:20–23:27

A. Seeking Wisdom Brings Happiness (14:20–15:10)

B. Free Will and God's Justice (15:11–16:23)

C. Wisdom and God's Creation of Human Beings (16:24–18:14)

D. Self-Control and Speech (18:15–19:17)

E. Wisdom Contrasted with Cleverness (19:20–30)

F. Topics Related to Speech (20:1–31)

G. Sin (21:1–10)

H. Wisdom and Folly (21:11–22:18)

I. Preservation of Friendship (22:19–26)

J. Prayer for Protection from Sin (22:27–23:6)

K. Speech and Sex (23:7–27)

V. Sirach 24:1–33:18

A. The Praise of Wisdom (24:1–34)

B. Praiseworthy Things (25:1–11)

C. Evil and Good Women (25:13–26:18[27])

D. Integrity (26:28–27:15)

E. Relationships with Companions (27:16–28:26)

F. Lending and Surety (29:1–20)

G. Home and Children (29:21–30:13)

H. Food and Health (30:14–25)

I. Wealth (31:1–11)

J. Table Manners (31:12–32:13)

K. Divine Providence (32:14–33:18)

VI. Sirach 33:19–39:11

A. Independence (33:19–24)

B. Slaves (33:25–33)

C. Dreams (34:1–8)

D. Education, Experience, Fear of the Lord (34:9–20)

E. Sacrifices and True Worship of God (34:21–35:26)

F. Prayer for the Deliverance of Israel (36:1–22)

G. Wives, Friends, Counselors (36:23–37:15)

H. Deliberative Speech and Moderation (37:16–31)

I. Sickness, the Physician, Mourning (38:1–23)

J. The Superiority of the Scribe (38:24–39:11)

VII. Sirach 39:12–43:33

A. Praise of the Creator (39:12–35)

B. Life's Joys and Miseries (40:1–41:13)

C. Shame (41:14–42:8)

D. Daughters (42:9–14)

E. The Works of God in Nature (42:15–43:33)

VIII. Sirach 44:1–50:24

- A. Introductory Praise of the Ancestors (44:1–15)
- B. The Early Covenantal Figures: Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (44:16–44:23e)
- C. The Later Covenantal Figures: Moses, Aaron, Phinehas (44:23f–45:26)
- D. Joshua, Caleb, the Judges, Samuel (46:1–20)
- E. Nathan, David, Solomon (47:1–22)
- F. The Establishment of the Northern Kingdom, Elijah, Elisha (47:23–48:16)
- G. Hezekiah and Isaiah (48:17–25)
- H. Josiah and Succeeding Ancestors (49:1–13)
- I. Miscellaneous Ancestors (49:14–16)
- J. Simon II (50:1–24)

IX. Sirach 50:25–51:30

- A. Epilogue (50:25–29)
- B. Ben Sira's Hymn of Thanksgiving (51:1–12)
- C. Ben Sira's Search for Wisdom (51:13–30)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

The Prologue (to the Greek translation)

Ben Sira's grandson introduces his translation with three Greek sentences. In the first he speaks of his grandfather's reasons for writing. When Ben Sira had become proficient in the "Law, the Prophets, and the other books of our ancestors," he wrote in order to assist others who wanted to live "according to the law." Some have identified these three categories with the three divisions of the Hebrew canon, although this is unlikely. While "Law" probably intends the Pentateuch or Torah, we do not know what constituted the prophets for Ben Sira, and certainly there was no identifiable third group in his time. In the second sentence the grandson reflects on the problems of translation. Here he offers an apologia for his translation should anyone think it lacking, noting that the translations of the Scriptures have the same character. The third sentence gives the circumstances of the translation. The grandson attributes to his own work the same motivation as his grandfather.

I. Sirach 1:1–4:10

A. Praise of Wisdom (1:1–10)

Ben Sira sets the stage with a poem emphasizing Wisdom's cosmic nature, in which he personifies her, the first of God's creations (cf. Prov. 8:22–30), as a woman. The rhetorical questions focus on her hiddenness from human ken (cf. Job 28), since God alone knows the answers to these questions. Yet, she is at the same time "poured out" on all creation and "lavished" on "those who love him" (v. 10).

B. Fear of the Lord Is Wisdom (1:11–30)

Already in 1:8, Ben Sira notes that God is to be feared, that is, to be regarded with awe. In this poem, he links wisdom to "fear of the Lord," another central theme. In an identical construction in vv. 14, 16, 18, and 20, he says that fear of the Lord is the "beginning," "fullness," "crown," and "root" of wisdom. The one who fears God finds wisdom and reaps benefits such as long life. Several important topics of wisdom teaching that occur frequently in Sirach reinforce the importance of fearing the Lord, especially control of anger, speech, and the importance of honor. In contrast to earlier Israelite wisdom literature, Ben Sira also enjoins "keeping the commandments," and in the programmatic vv. 26–27 he creates a central nexus of ideas that undergird all of his teaching: wisdom, fear of the Lord, and keeping commandments (Mosaic Law).

C. Trusting in God (2:1–18)

Verse 1 begins in the usual manner of a wisdom teacher addressing a student—"my son." In this three-stanza poem, Ben Sira observes that even the one who fears God will experience trials.

The remedy is to "cling to him" (v. 3), since God will show mercy to such a person. In claiming that faithfulness will bring prosperity, Ben Sira accepts the deuteronomistic view that God blesses the faithful. As he does elsewhere, here Ben Sira appeals to the past—"consider the generations of old" (v. 10)—to illustrate the truth of what he says. Verses 12–14 employ the prophetic form of the "Woe."

D. Duty to Parents (3:1–16)

Ben Sira comments on the commandment to honor parents unconditionally (Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16). His appeal to his students as their father effectively establishes his parental authority over them (v. 1). As in the pentateuchal commandments, honoring parents brings reward, including "long life" (cf. Deut. 5:16). Ben Sira accepts that God keeps an account of one's sins and good deeds, and thus, honoring parents "atones for" (v. 3) and counts against one's sins, melting them away (v. 14–15). The last stanza (vv. 12–16) discusses care for elderly parents, and in the comparison to blasphemy (v. 16), Ben Sira reinforces the religious duty of honoring them.

E. Humility and Almsgiving (3:17–4:10)

This passage concludes a three-section discussion of obligations to God, parents, and society. Humility is an important virtue in wisdom instruction (cf. Prov 15:33). Ben Sira warns against speculation into the secrets of the universe and the future (vv. 22–24), a likely target being Jewish apocalyptic speculation like that in 1 Enoch. Yet knowledge is necessary for wisdom, and the knowledge revealed to his students is the Torah. As with honoring parents, almsgiving, a central ethical/social act, "atones" (cf. Tob 4:10–11). As in the Torah and earlier wisdom teaching, care for the marginalized—the poor, hungry, orphans—is obligatory. On God hearing their cries, see Exod 22:22–23; Deut 15:7–11.

II. Sirach 4:11–6:17

A. Submission to Wisdom (4:11–19)

In Hebrew this section is a first- person speech of Wisdom resembling passages from Prov 1–9. Although she is pictured as a teacher, remarkably v. 14 uses the Hebrew verb sharath, a cultic term (cf. Deut 10:8), to equate service to Wisdom with service to God. The claim that those who obey Wisdom "will judge the nations" indicates that Ben Sira was training a professional class of scribes, a class to which he belonged. Wisdom is a stern taskmistress, who, like human teachers, severely tries her pupils before revealing her secrets (v. 17–19).

B. Shame and Speech (4:20–31)

Sayings beginning with "do not" are typical of wisdom instruction. The section's overarching topic is shame oriented mostly around proper and improper speech. Accruing honor and avoiding shame determined one's social status in ancient Mediterranean society. Ben Sira counsels that some types of shame are appropriate—so, for example, confession of sin—which ironically bring honor (Heb.: kavodh; Gk.: doxa). Negative kinds, such as displaying ignorance, must be avoided. Verse 24 points to the primarily oral context of ancient wisdom instruction.

C. Practical Wisdom—Presumption, Speech, Passion (5:1–6:4)

Ancient wisdom teachers spoke about wealth frequently (cf. Prov 13:11, 22). In ancient Israel it was sometimes thought to indicate God's favor. Here Ben Sira warns against the presumption of relying on wealth. Yet, his is not a blanket criticism, as the qualifier "dishonest" suggests (v. 8). The adjective "double-tongued" (v. 14) likely refers to slander, which brings not only shame but destruction. Finally, sexual relations comprised another popular wisdom topic, and Ben Sira warns against unbridled or uncontrolled passion. Throughout the book he uses a variety of euphemisms for human sexuality; here the language is agricultural (6:3). Note the relationship between shame and a "bad name" or reputation. Ben Sira highly values cultivating a good reputation, which equals accruing honor.

D. Friendship (6:5–17)

The mention of friendship in 6:1 might have precipitated the placement of this longer poem. Ben Sira holds faithful friends in high regard (vv. 14–16), comparing them to "treasure." He also understands that one must test potential confidants before trusting them with secrets, since many will be fair-weather friends. Verse 17 provides one example of how interpersonal relationships can influence others, so a literal translation of 17b (Hebrew): "for like himself, so is his neighbor."

III. Sirach 6:18–14:19

A. Submission to Wisdom (6:18–37)

This poem has three parts: (1) the discipline of wisdom (vv. 18–22), (2) the benefits of wisdom (vv. 23–31), (3) the student-teacher relationship (vv. 32–37). Wisdom is acquired through discipline and life experience (note the reference to "gray hairs" in v. 18). Verse 22 contains a play on words. The Hebrew word musar, discipline/ instruction (Gk.: sophia [wisdom]), can also be construed as coming from the verb meaning "withdrawn"—thus, "she is not readily perceived." The references to a "glorious robe" and "splendid crown" symbolize both royalty and priesthood (cf. 50:11). For "purple cord," see Num 15:38–39. The last section shows that education in antiquity was fundamentally a disciple-teacher relationship.

B. Miscellaneous Advice (7:1–17)

The material in 7:1–9:16 is characterized by the negative injunction, translated "do not." Ben Sira personifies evil in vv. 1–2, but not in the form of the strange woman of Proverbs, as might be expected. Verses 4–7 emphasize the difficult position of the scribe/sage, since holding public office brings with it attendant dangers. Ben Sira understands the value of hard work (cf. 38:24–34). Verse 17 does not point to post-mortem punishment, which is not in Ben Sira's worldview. The Hebrew reads "the expectation of humans is worms," that is, decay.

C. Household, Priests, the Poor (7:18–36)

Administering one's household is an important wisdom topic. The list of cattle, sons, daughters, and wives constitutes a man's "possessions" (also including slaves). Wives and daughters are especially noteworthy, because they have tremendous influence on a man's honor and social status. Ben Sira was a strong supporter of the priests in Jerusalem. Here he connects proper worship of God with proper respect for his priests. "All your heart" and "all your strength" allude to Deut 6:5. Caring for the socially marginalized forms an important aspect of God's covenant with Israel (see Exod 22:21–23; Deut 15:7–11).

D. Circumstances to Avoid (8:1–19)

Ben Sira counsels caution, a frequent topic for him, when dealing with a range of different people and situations. The section points to Ben Sira's social context. He has to deal with the wealthy and powerful (v. 1–2), but he also serves those same people. As such he is part of a retainer class—he works for the upper elites, but is not one of them. At the same time he is not counted among the poor.

E. Women and Friends (9:1–16)

Ben Sira warns his male charges about the dangers of relationships with women. For an example of the image of the "loose woman," see Prov 7:4–27. The reference to "destruction" in v. 9 might be to the penalty for adultery—death (see Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22). Perhaps the proverbs about drinking with another's wife forged the connection to choosing friends, since new friends are like "new wine." The exhortation to avoid sinners and be intimate with the righteous reinforces the influence that associates can have.

G. Rulers (9:17–10:5)

Ben Sira expresses confidence in God's control over human government. Most of the "offices" enumerated here are likely to be local Temple-state officials—magistrate, judge, ruler—with whom Ben Sira would have been familiar. A good ruler is known through wise words and education. The idea of the "right time" occurs frequently in Sirach (cf. 1:23, 24).

H. Pride (10:6–18)

Pride and sin go together and begin when one forsakes God. Ben Sira's warnings treat primarily those in power, following up on the previous section. He might be commenting on contemporary politics, but this is not certain. He argues that no one should be proud, not even kings, since everyone suffers the same fate—"maggots," "vermin," and "worms." In vv. 14–17, Ben Sira establishes that God can reverse human circumstance by replacing the powerful with the humble.

I. Honor and Humility (10:19–11:6)

The use of rhetorical question and answer is a popular wisdom device. Ben Sira reorients true honor to mean fear of the Lord. Even though the rich and the powerful receive human honor, the one truly worthy of honor fears the Lord—and that could be a poor person just as readily as a rich person. Later, in his meditation on the sage, Ben Sira will argue that the person in the best position to accrue such honor is the wise scribe (38:34b–39:11). The following sayings extend the idea by linking true honor to humility.

J. Deliberation (11:7–28)

Ben Sira holds that piety brings prosperity and God's blessing. In fact, every human condition is God's responsibility (v. 14). Verses 26–28 contain Ben Sira's thoughts on individual theodicy. Even if the pious do not appear to prosper, God will reward them at death. Since he does not believe in post-mortem rewards and punishments, "reward" likely refers to the persistence of one's good reputation and pious children, which elsewhere constitute immortality (see 30:4–5; 40:19; 41:12–13). Verse 28 suggests that a good death signals a pious person.

K. Friends and Associates (11:29–13:24)

Ben Sira's ethic of caution characterizes this section. One needs to be careful when trusting others. The image in 12:11 is of a copper mirror—keeping it polished enables one to see better. The value of caution extends especially to sinners. In order not to be harmed by them, one should not help them in any way—an idea that extends Ben Sira's conviction that God repays both the pious and the evil. Ben Sira also warns about the troubles that attend attempts to bridge social gaps, particularly between rich and poor. Even though 13:24 leaves room for righteous wealth, this passage intimates that riches "free from sin" are very rare.

L. Happiness (13:25–14:2)

The word heart (13:25, 14:2) forms an inclusio for this short section. The heart is the seat of emotion and thought, hence its effect on one's countenance. Notice the continued importance of speech.

M. Wealth (14:3–19)

For Ben Sira, greed makes no sense in the face of the finality of death. Therefore, one should make responsible use of wealth—particularly by being generous with others. Hades is the Greek term for she'ol, the place of the dead in Hebrew thought. Ben Sira encourages his students to enjoy what they have, since, proverbially, they cannot take it with them. For the phrase "old like a garment" (v. 17), see Isa 50:9. The decree, "You must die," alludes to the story of Adam and Eve in Gen 2 and 3.

IV. Sirach 14:20–23:27

A. Seeking Wisdom Brings Happiness (14:20–15:10)

Sirach 14:20–27 forms a complex beatitude, beginning with "Happy is the person." The following verbs metaphorically emphasize the importance of single-mindedly seeking wisdom. Ben Sira returns, in 15:1, to the connections between fear of the Lord, obeying commandments, and acquiring wisdom, which forms the transition from seeking to the results of finding wisdom. The portrayal of Wisdom as a young bride evokes sexual imagery that occurs often in Sirach. Verse 7 introduces the fool, who in traditional wisdom literature serves as a foil/anti-type to the wise.

B. Free Will and God's Justice (15:11–16:23)

Even though Ben Sira attributes all of human fortune to God (11:14), he holds human beings responsible for their sin. People have always had "free choice," the translation of the Hebrew yetser. In later rabbinic literature, the word means "inclination," and humans are thought to have two competing ones, the inclination for good and the inclination for evil. That humans choose between "two ways," such as life and death, is a common feature of Jewish and early Christian ethical instruction. Ben Sira dismisses the idea that many children signify God's favor. Dying childless would significantly compromise one's chances at an eternal memory, so important to Ben Sira. In 16:5–9, Ben Sira appeals to "historical" examples to show that God does not overlook sin.

C. Wisdom and God's Creation of Human Beings (16:24–18:14)

Ben Sira's meditation emphasizes the orderliness of the created order, which reinforces God's control. In 17:1–8, he relies on the two Genesis creation stories, freely intermixing them. He also departs from Genesis in one important respect. Whereas Genesis understands death as an aberration, 17:2 suggests that a limited lifespan was always God's intention. A hierarchy of God, humans, and animals is built into the structure of the passage. Verse 17:11 collapses the time between creation and the Sinai event, thus moving from universal humanity to the particularity of Israel's relationship to God. In calling people to repentance, Ben Sira notes the insignificance of a human life span and human inability to fathom God's ways. For this reason, God "pours out his mercy upon them" (18:11).

D. Self-Control and Speech (18:15–19:17)

This section contains practical proverbs on almsgiving, self-control, and holding one's tongue. Verse 18:27 encapsulates Ben Sira's view: "One who is wise is cautious in everything." The repeated use of the verb question in 19:13–17 makes for a memorable refrain, which could represent Ben Sira's reflections on Lev 19:17. Note the contrast of the fool and the intelligent/wise so common in wisdom literature.

E. Wisdom Contrasted with Cleverness (19:20– 30)

This section is characterized by the Greek word panourgia, translated "cleverness," a morally neutral or even positive term elsewhere in Sirach (cf. 1:6; 6:32). Here it is associated with people who use their cleverness for morally suspect ends. Moreover, Ben Sira claims that appearances really do provide insight into someone's character.

F. Topics Related to Speech (20:1–31)

Speech dominates this section. For the most part, line one of a proverb states the opposite of line two, employing the contrast of the wise and the fool. Silence generally is virtuous, but sometimes one should speak. The wise know the appropriate time (kairos) for both (v. 7). The appearance of words such as hated, ridicule, shame, and disgrace testifies to how central the system of honor and shame is to Ben Sira's instruction.

G. Sin (21:1–10)

In several places Ben Sira claims that God hears the prayer of the poor (e.g., 4:5–6), but he does not argue that God prefers the poor due to their poverty. The theme of vv. 8–10 restates the idea that the death of sinners will not be a good one, even if they appear to have prospered in this life.

H. Wisdom and Folly (21:11–22:18)

The overall topic of this passage is education and the inability of fools to learn. "Fulfillment of the fear of the Lord" reprises the connection between fear of God, wisdom, and obedience to the law. Water as a metaphor for wisdom (v. 13) returns in 24:25–33. Note the contrast with the broken-jar mind of the fool. Since Ben Sira's students were to enter public service as scribes, good manners were vital (vv. 18–24). Sirach 22:3–5 highlights Ben Sira's notorious misogyny. A daughter's behavior can bring shame to father or husband—therein lies the "loss." Ancient parents and teachers apparently did not hesitate to use corporal punishment (v. 6).

I. Preservation of Friendship (22:19–26)

Ben Sira comments on the bonds of friendship, which can survive many difficulties. He does note, however, that some actions, like revealing secrets or treachery, will destroy a friendship. The switch from third person to first person reinforces the importance of being true to a friend, since, even if one suffers for it, the one inflicting the harm will be revealed publicly as untrustworthy.

J. Prayer for Protection from Sin (22:27–23:6)

The first person continues in this short prayer for God's protection from sins of the tongue, sinful thoughts, and wrong desire. The theme of not falling before adversaries is common in the Psalms (cf. Ps 39). The prayer contains three separate invocations: "Lord" (likely the four-letter name), "Father," used in Jewish literature as both a corporate and personal invocation, and "God/ Master of my life."

K. Speech and Sex (23:7–27)

The verses on oaths concern proper use of God's name and making false oaths. Ben Sira thinks that habitually swearing oaths inevitably leads to breaking them and misusing the name of God. On such abuse, see Exod 20:7; Lev 19:12; Deut 5:11. Foul language brings shame, and it reflects on one's parents (v. 14). The specific note that one cannot hide sexual sins from God follows on passages like 15:18–19 and 17:19–29. Note how the woman's sin is said to be against her husband, but not vice versa. That punishment extends to children (vv. 24–26) could mean that they will die prematurely or suffer shame throughout their lives (cf. Wis 3:16–19; 4:3–6).

V. Sirach 24:1–33:18

A. The Praise of Wisdom (24:1–34)

Verses 1–22 form a praise of personified Wisdom in the tradition of Prov 8:22–31 and Job 28. Wisdom is the first of God's creations (see ch. 1) and spreads across the earth—that is, she has a universal aspect. She also has a particular aspect in that God chooses her dwelling place among the Israelites where she serves in the holy tent, i.e., the Temple in Jerusalem. The comparisons to plants and spices in vv. 13–17 symbolize beauty, fragrance, and usefulness. The substances in v. 15 also connect to the Temple, since they were used in cultic ritual there. Some of these images reemerge in ch. 50 in the description of Simon II. In vv. 19–22, Wisdom issues an invitation to a feast where she is the food. Ben Sira then makes the remarkable claim that not only is Wisdom found in the Temple, the provenance of priests, but she is embodied in the "book of the covenant of the Most High God," which is accessible to the entire people but especially to the scribe. The rivers call to mind paradise and fecundity, since the Gihon, Pishon, Tigris, and Euphrates surround Eden in Gen 2:10–14. In a continuation of the fluvial metaphor, Ben Sira derives his own teaching from that same wisdom, and he likens it to prophecy. In this way, he forges a relationship between cult, Torah, and the sage, whose wisdom constitutes a type of revealed knowledge, largely derived from study of the Law and traditional wisdom.

B. Praiseworthy Things (25:1–11)

Ben Sira employs numerical proverbs and beatitudes. Usually a numerical proverb has the form a and a+1 (see 23:16–17, 25:7), although vv. 1 and 2 do not have the a+1. On plowing with an ox and ass together, see Deut 22:10. Most significantly, at the end of the list of beatitudes, Ben Sira claims that nothing surpasses fear of the Lord, not even social status, which ideally levels the social playing field. Thus a scribe like himself might actually be higher on the ideal social ladder than the rich and powerful whom he serves.

C. Evil and Good Women (25:13–26:18 [verses 19–27 are a later addition])

A discourse on wives that alternates evil wife–good wife–evil wife–good wife, with much more attention paid to the evil wife. Ben Sira adopts what became the standard interpretation of Gen 3:1–24, that the woman's disobedience caused human death. This view differs from ch. 17 where limited days were God's intention from the start. The subject of 26:10 is likely a wife as in the Syriac version, not a daughter. The images in v. 12 are transparently sexual. Most significantly, all the actions described here are either good or bad depending on how they affect the husband, a reflection of an honor/shame culture that revolved around men.

D. Integrity (26:28–27:15)

Honesty and integrity are important wisdom topics. 26:29–27:3 contains a harsh criticism of business. Usually honesty in business, such as using accurate scales, is a central wisdom idea (see 42:4; Prov 11:1; 20:10), but Ben Sira seems convinced that sin is potentially inherent in any transaction. Ben Sira often takes his examples from the life of artisans and farmers (27:4–6; see 38:24–34a). A person's speech reveals one's interior condition, both good and bad.

E. Relationships with Companions (27:16–28:26)

Ben Sira observes that betraying a secret will certainly destroy a friendship (cf. 22:19–26). Winking is a sign of duplicity (Prov. 6:13; 10:10). Since Ben Sira does not recognize post-mortem reward and punishment, his notion of theodicy requires that God knows people's sins so that God can repay them before or at death. The idea that God's forgiveness depends on forgiveness of neighbor is widespread in early Judaism and Christianity (cf. Mark 11:25). Verse 28:5 makes effective sacrifice dependent on righteous behavior (see ch. 35).

F. Lending and Surety (29:1–20)

The Torah forbids taking interest on loans (Exod 22:25; Lev 25:35–37). Ben Sira encourages lending to a neighbor in need as an act of mercy, even though it is fraught with danger. The Torah also enjoins almsgiving (cf. Deut 15:7–11), which Ben Sira values highly. On v. 12, see 3:30. Surety, providing collateral, could be doubly dangerous, since the one guaranteeing the loan was dependent on both lender and borrower to regain his property. Ben Sira expresses his ethic of caution in v. 20.

G. Home and Children (29:21–30:13)

Ben Sira warns against being dependent on others; thus, one must be content with life's necessities. He recognizes that the poor have some means, which separate them from destitution and begging (cf. 40:28). His advice about children is harsh, but consistent with ancient attitudes towards childrearing (cf. Prov 13:24). A disciplined son will carry on the father's name and uphold the family. The comparison of an unbroken horse to a son reveals Ben Sira's attitude to discipline, which insures against shame for both parent and child.

H. Food and Health (30:14–25)

The thought continues the previous idea of contentment with one's circumstances. Throughout his book Ben Sira advises his students to enjoy what they have (cf. 14:11–16). The images in vv. 18–20 illustrate those who cannot enjoy "good things": for the dead and idols—food, for the eunuch—sex. Ridicule of idols is common in biblical and early Jewish texts; see Isa 44:9–20; Bel and the Dragon; the Letter of Jeremiah. The point of the passage is to assure long life, since after death there is only Sheol.

I. Wealth (31:1–11)

Inability to sleep signals anxiety (see also 42:9). Ben Sira does not condemn wealth, but the series of rhetorical questions in vv. 9 and 10 indicate that he thought the combination of righteousness and wealth highly unlikely at best. After all, what rich person does not "go after gold" (v. 8)? The Hebrew word translated "gold" is the earliest example of the term mammon, which appears as a loan word in the New Testament (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13).

J. Table Manners (31:12–32:13)

These three discreet sections on food, wine, and banquet behavior emphasize moderation and modesty. Ben Sira trained his students for public careers, and banquets could be filled with social land mines that could affect them. Thus, proper social etiquette was essential. He also includes the value of generosity with one's resources. His advice concerning food and wine is eminently practical. Banquets, however, had formal rules of etiquette, which Ben Sira reinforces, such as when one can/should speak.

K. Divine Providence (32:14–33:18)

Verse 32:23 forges an odd connection between caution and fulfilling the law. Perhaps Ben Sira has something like Deut 4:9 in mind. The idea that no evil comes upon the one who fears the Lord ignores reality, but it appears often in wisdom literature and in Sirach. In 33:7–15 Ben Sira illustrates how God's works come in pairs: festival versus ordinary days, blessed (Abraham) and holy (priests) versus cursed (Canaanites) people, good versus evil, and life versus death (see 42:24–25). The first person conclusion links Ben Sira to earlier prophets and sages.

VI. Sirach 33:19–39:11

A. Independence (33:19–24)

Ben Sira observes that independence depends on control of property, and doing so brings honor. Distributing property "in the hour of death" enables one to enjoy it throughout life, but also to determine how it will pass to the next generation.

B. Slaves (33:25–33)

Slave systems were normative throughout antiquity. Israelite law recognized slavery, even if Israelite slaves were thought to be different from Gentile slaves (see Exod 21:2–11, 20–21, 26–27; Lev 25:44–46; Deut 15:12–18). Ben Sira's advice is thoroughly practical, since idle slaves will try to get away. For the person who has only one slave, Ben Sira recognizes his/her importance. The phrase "bought him with blood" equates life with resources. (For this idea see also 4QInstruction from the Dead Sea Scrolls.)

C. Dreams (34:1–8)

Ben Sira rejects the idea that knowledge comes through dreams and visions. He may be reacting against apocalyptic dream visions like those reported in 1 Enoch. He also rejects divination and omens (see Deut 18:10–11). In arguing that dreams are a projection of the dreamer, his attitude sounds modern. He does make room for dreams sent by God (e.g., Joseph), although he does not say how one can differentiate legitimate from illegitimate dreams. In his view, God has shown everything necessary in the Torah (v. 8).

D. Education, Experience, Fear of the Lord (34:9–20)

By affirming that education comes from wide experience and then claiming such experience for himself, Ben Sira establishes his own credentials. Verses 14–20 further explicate his idea of fear of the Lord. God will protect the one who fears God and will make him or her prosper (vv. 19–20).

E. Sacrifices and True Worship of God (34:21–35:26)

This section weaves together ethical/moral and Temple piety. Although God desires sacrifices, only the righteous offer acceptable ones. To offer sacrifices from property taken from the poor is the moral equivalent of murder, as is depriving the poor of a living generally (34:24–27). Offering kindness is the same as offering a cereal sacrifice (35:3). The remark that God does not accept bribes segues to remarks about God's justice, similar to those in other places in the book. Ben Sira's claim that God will do justice (35:22) transitions to God's protection of Israel and the prayer in 36:1–22.

F. Prayer for the Deliverance of Israel (36:1–22)

Ben Sira's prayer is in the style of a number of Psalms. In the context of a wisdom book, this prayer surprises with its emotional tone. It has an eschatological orientation that is national— Ben Sira implores God to "gather all the tribes of Israel"—but not messianic. Verses 6–7 allude to the story of Israel's deliverance in the exodus. Verse 20 reflects a developing idea, also found in other early Jewish literature (especially some of the Dead Sea scrolls) and early Christianity, that the prophets were predicting future events.

G. Wives, Friends, Counselors (36:23–37:15)

Ben Sira returns to practicality in this section. Verse 29b recalls the description of Eve in Gen 2:18 and further reinforces that a woman's importance revolved around her husband. The phrase "a fugitive and a wanderer" describes Cain in Gen 4:12. Finding and keeping true friends is an important topic in Sirach; see, for example, 6:5–17. Ben Sira warns against trusting counselors, since they will act out of self-interest. As proof, he offers a list of nine examples of people to avoid. In the end, God and one's own heart prove most trustworthy.

H. Deliberative Speech and Moderation (37:16–31)

Ben Sira moves from choosing counselors to effective public speech. Wisdom characterizes the difference between an effective teacher or public speaker and an ineffective one. Verse 26 invokes the idea that honor brings reputation ("his name"), which constitutes a kind of immortality. The short unit on moderation in eating leads to the next section on physicians and illness.

I. Sickness, the Physician, Mourning (38:1–23)

Ben Sira combines a traditional notion that sin causes illness, which then requires God's forgiveness, with consultation with a physician, whom God "created" (Heb.: "allotted"). In vv. 9–12, he recommends prayer and sacrifice to atone for sin before seeking a doctor. Verse 5 alludes to the story in Exod 15:23–25 as proof of the inherent healing properties of natural substances used by both physician and pharmacist. Ben Sira next enjoins the traditional religious duties of mourning and burial. Verse 17 is unusual in that the normal period of mourning was seven days not one or two (cf. 22:12). He gives the practical advice that overwrought mourning does neither the mourner nor the departed any good.

J. The Superiority of the Scribe (38:24–39:11)

Ben Sira praises the scribe in two poems (38:24–34b; 38:34c–39:11). The first has been compared to the Egyptian Satire of the Trades, but Ben Sira does not engage in satire. In fact, he shows high regard for farmers, artisans, smiths, and potters. They cannot be scribes, however, because the required attention to their tasks does not provide the necessary leisure time. They enable society to survive, but they do not serve as rulers or in courts and assemblies. The scribe differs in this respect. He plumbs the depths of the tradition, and in v. 6, Ben Sira employs the language of prophecy, as he has elsewhere, to characterize the scribe's words. The result for the wise scribe is eternal renown and a lasting memory—immortality in the community.

VII. Sirach 39:12–43:33

A. Praise of the Creator (39:12–35)

Following the description of the ideal scribe, Ben Sira reverts to the first person as if to emphasize his own scribal achievement. The images of vv. 13–14 recall the flourishing of Wisdom in ch. 24. He calls his students to recite this hymn praising God. All of creation is "very good" (cf. Gen 1), obeys its creator, and has a purpose. The righteous receive good things from God and the wicked, bad things. Even life's necessities turn out evil for the wicked—how Ben Sira does not say. Verse 17 could refer to the crossing of the sea (Exod 15:8) or to creation (Gen 1:9–10). Verse 23 alludes to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24–28).

B. Life's Joys and Miseries (40:1–41:13)

Ben Sira notes that people of all social strata share the same exigencies of life, particularly the certainty of death. Yet, given his concept of theodicy, he insists that sinners suffer seven times worse. Several biblical allusions inhabit the initial section: Gen 3:17–19 ("hard work"); Gen 3:20 ("mother of all the living," but here the earth not Eve); Gen 6–8 ("the flood"); Gen 3:19 ("returns to earth"). Sirach 40:18–26 consists of a series of "better than" proverbs, where two initial elements (here good things) are compared to a third, which is superior. These proverbs culminate in the highest value, fear of the Lord. For Ben Sira, begging constitutes a form of social death, and he prefers real death to it. He contrasts the attitudes toward death of the rich and healthy with those of the poor and frail, but since death is inevitable, one should not fear it. Finally, in 41:11–14 Ben Sira reemphasizes the importance of a lasting name and reputation as a way of transcending the end that comes to all.

C. Shame (41:14–42:8)

Shame can be both proper and improper. The section highlights the centrality of the honor/ shame system to Ben Sira's understanding of social status and relations, and it follows, probably intentionally, right after mention of the importance of a virtuous name and reputation. The topics treated vary widely, from table manners to business to lechery. Most remarkable is the injunction not to be ashamed of the law of the Most High and the covenant. Some scholars think that not sinning to save face reflects competing Jewish and Hellenistic values, although it might just as readily refer to any social situation in which one compromises one's values in order to gain approval or acceptance.

D. Daughters (42:9–14)

A section that might offend modern sensibilities, the main point is that a father needs to do everything he can to avoid shame that comes via a daughter's possible misbehavior. The key is v. 11 where the daughter puts her father to public shame. Even though the general sentiment is consistent with ancient codes of honor and shame, v. 14 is an unusually harsh assessment and reveals something of Ben Sira's personal attitude toward women.

E. The Works of God in Nature (42:15–43:33)

A three-part hymn of praise that leads to the Praise of the Ancestors (chs. 44–50)—first, marveling at God's omniscience (42:15–25), second, describing the wonders of nature (43:1–26; showing the influence of texts like Job 38 and Pss 104; 105), and third, calling others to praise God (43:27–33). By referring to creation by God's word, Ben Sira alludes to Gen 1:1–31. God knows all of creation, including past and future as well as the human heart. Thus, Ben Sira's theodicy makes sense, since by knowing everything, God can mete out reward and punishment justly. On the idea of opposites in creation, see 33:15. Among the natural wonders, the moon stands out for its role in determining the calendar, but see Gen 1:14 where sun and moon together set the signs, seasons, days, and years—perhaps Ben Sira's response to Jews who advocated a solar calendar. His claim that God's word holds the cosmos together and that God is "the All" may reflect knowledge of Stoic notions of the logos (cf. the Gospel of John and Philo of Alexandria) that brings order and stability to the world. At the same time, Ben Sira takes pains to note that God and creation are different—God is "greater than all his works."

VIII. Sirach 44:1–50:24

A. Introductory Praise of the Ancestors (44:1–15)

Ben Sira introduces his Praise of Famous Ancestors (author translation) by mentioning a series of types of people who have gained renown, among them kings, prophets, and scribes/sages. He also notes that some have died and left behind no memory; they thus have truly perished. The text does not make clear whether these are pious people, as some scholars think, or wicked people who deserve such a fate. Given Ben Sira's theology elsewhere, it seems likely that they are wicked or impious people and that the pronoun "these" in v. 10 refers not to the people of v. 9, but to those already singled out in vv. 1–8. The main point of the poem comes in vv. 14–15—their names and memory still live on, and they exemplify the immortality that the pious earn through their faithfulness.

B. The Early Covenantal Figures: Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (44:16–44:23e)

Enoch's status in the list is debated. While many scholars think it original, others consider it a later addition, in part because Enoch does not have a covenant made with him, as do the seven figures after him. In light of Enoch's widespread presence in Second Temple literature, the notice itself is rather unremarkable. He is the only person in the Praise to be called an example—of "repentance" (Greek) or "knowledge" (Hebrew). The short section on Noah focuses on his continuation of the human race. For Abraham, the covenant in the flesh is circumcision and the test was the offering of Isaac. Ben Sira claims that Abraham kept God's commandments, even before they had been given to Moses. Jacob's inheritance is the land, which gets divided among the twelve tribes.

C. The Later Covenantal Figures: Moses, Aaron, Phinehas (44:23f–45:26)

Ben Sira concentrates on Moses' role as the one to whom God gave the law. Although he notes Moses' great glory and respect, his brother Aaron, who receives a perpetual priesthood, garners more attention. The focus on Aaron is primarily two-fold: his cultic and teaching roles. The reference to Korah's rebellion might be addressed to contemporary conflicts within the priesthood. Ben Sira notes specifically that Aaron and his sons can wear the high priestly vestments. The verses on Phinehas parallel the biblical information, but Ben Sira contrasts David's and Phinehas's covenants. David's only extends to one son at a time, whereas Phinehas's covers all of his descendants. This observation probably reflects Ben Sira's historical situation in which there was no king, but a high priest who also served as the leader of the people. The second-person address of v. 26 is probably directed at contemporary priests.

D. Joshua, Caleb, the Judges, Samuel (46:1–20)

In the Praise Ben Sira emphasizes faithfulness. Joshua and Caleb were the two who "opposed the congregation," that is, believed that God would give the land to the Israelites (see Num 14:6–10). Ben Sira praises judges who "did not fall into idolatry." The hope that the judges' bones bring forth new life could be an allusion to a story like 2 Kgs 13:20–21 in which Elisha's bones revivify a corpse. Because he was faithful, Samuel was proved to be a prophet, whose prophecies came true. He anointed two kings, Saul and David, although Ben Sira does not mention Saul.

E. Nathan, David, Solomon (47:1–22)

The appearance of Nathan leads directly to David, whom God "set apart" to be king, as vv. 2–11 demonstrate. Even as a youth, David displayed kingly characteristics, especially in his defeat of Goliath. Ben Sira also mentions David's installation of Temple singers, a tradition known from Chronicles. The reference to God removing his sins alludes to the incident with Bathsheba. Solomon, however, faces more explicit criticism. Although he built the Temple and was wise, Ben Sira highlights his failings. Yet, despite Solomon's problems, Ben Sira claims that God will not destroy David's line—perhaps a reference to the promise in 2 Sam 7.

F. The Establishment of the Northern Kingdom, Elijah, Elisha (47:23–48:16)

Ben Sira turns to the division of Solomon's kingdom. Jeroboam sins because he set up cult shrines at Dan and Bethel (1 Kgs 12:25-33). Elijah operated in the northern kingdom (see 1 Kgs 17-19; 2 Kgs 1-2). The intent of v. 11 is unclear due to textual problems. For Elisha's career, see 2 Kgs 2-13. Verse 15 refers to the destruction of Samaria, the capital of the North. A Davidic ruler remained in Judah (the southern kingdom), even if most of them sinned; and in fact, Ben Sira singles out only two, Hezekiah and Josiah, for praise.

G. Hezekiah and Isaiah (48:17-25)

Hezekiah famously constructed a water tunnel to supply Jerusalem with water throughout an Assyrian siege. On the manner of rescue, see 2 Kgs 19:15-35//Isa 37:21-38. The prophet Isaiah counseled Hezekiah, so they are praised together. In the verses on Isaiah, Ben Sira reveals his understanding of prophecy as prediction of future events and the end of time (v. 25).

H. Josiah and Succeeding Ancestors (49:1-13)

Ben Sira remembers Josiah for eliminating idol worship and removing the "high places" in favor of the Temple in Jerusalem. Somewhat surprisingly, he does not mention the discovery in the Temple of a book of the law that prompted the reforms (see 2 Kgs 22-23). Ben Sira attributes the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem to abandonment of the law. He singles out Jeremiah as one who predicted these events, and in v. 7 he alludes to Jer 1:5 and 10. Ben Sira's remark that Ezekiel saw God's chariot is the first mention in Jewish literature of the merkevah, God's chariot-throne, which in later Judaism became an object of mystical speculation. He also mentions "the Twelve," indicating that in this period the Minor Prophets already existed together in a single corpus. Finally, Ben Sira offers brief notes on post-exilic reestablishment of the Temple under Zerubbabal and the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls under Nehemiah. Curiously, he does not mention Ezra, a priest and scribe and a central figure in the narratives of postexilic Jerusalem.

I. Miscellaneous Ancestors (49:14-16)

This unit sits uncomfortably in its present place. Four of the six figures are predeluvian. Adam ends the unit, making the transition to Simon II in ch. 50 difficult, even though Simon probably concludes the Praise.

J. Simon II (50:1-24)

Ben Sira portrays his contemporary as the ideal royal high priest. His eulogy of Simon is reminiscent of Wisdom's self-praise and of his praises of Aaron and Hezekiah. Like a beneficent king, he repaired Jerusalem (probably after the Seleucid-Ptolemaic conflicts over Judea)—fortifying city and Temple and bringing in water. The ritual described in vv. 14-21 has been variously identified as being for the daily offering, for Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), or Rosh Hashanah (the New Year). The "blessing of the LORD" could refer to the priestly blessing given in Num 6:24 –27 (cf. Lev 9:22–23). The benediction in vv. 22–24 differs between Greek and Hebrew—the NRSV translates the Greek. The Hebrew reads: "May his kindness to Simon be enduring; may he fulfill for him the covenant of Phinehas that it not be cut off for him or for his seed, for the days of heaven."

IX. Sirach 50:25–51:30

A. Epilogue (50:25–29)

Ben Sira takes a short opportunity to excoriate the Edomites, the Philistines, and the Samaritans. The epilogue provides us with the author's name and ends with the characteristic idea of the fear of the Lord.

B. Ben Sira's Hymn of Thanksgiving (51:1–12)

Ben Sira offers a prayer of thanksgiving for deliverance from enemies that employs the language of psalms. Some have questioned its authenticity, but nothing suggests decisively that Ben Sira did not compose it. The long litany that appears in Hebrew MS B between v. 12 and v. 13 is not original.

C. Ben Sira's Search for Wisdom (51:13–30)

The book's final poem describes the sages's search for Wisdom with a decidedly erotic tinge—although scholars disagree about the extent of the eroticism. The language is similar to other places where Ben Sira encourages his students to pursue Wisdom. Fragments of the poem in 11QPsa demonstrate that it was originally an acrostic. Verse 23 mentions Ben Sira's house of instruction (beth midhrash). What such an institution would have looked like is debated, but it certainly indicates some context for educational purposes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. A. Argall. I Enoch and Sirach: A Comparative Literary and Conceptual Analysis of the Themes of Revelation, Creation and Judgment (Atlanta: SBL, 1995); P. C. Beentjes. The Book of Ben Sira in Modern Research (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1997); C. V. Camp. "Understanding a Patriarchy: Women in Second Century Jerusalem through the Eyes of Ben Sira." "Women Like This": New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman World. A. Levine, ed. (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991) 1–39; J. J. Collins. Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); J. L. Crenshaw. "The Book of Sirach." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1997) 5:603–867; R. A. Horsley. Scribes, Visionaries, and the Politics of Second Temple Judea (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); B. L. Mack. Wisdom and the Hebrew Epic: Ben Sira's Hymn in Praise of the Fathers (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985); B. L. Mack. Introduction and

Notes to "Ecclesiasticus, or the Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach." B. G. Wright III. Harper Collins Study Bible. H. W. Attridge, ed. (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2006); L. G. Perdue. Wisdom Literature: A Theological History (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007); J. T. Sanders, Ben Sira and Demotic Wisdom (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press, 1983); P. W. Skehan and A. A. Di Lella. The Wisdom of Ben Sira (New York: Doubleday, 1987); G. G. Xeravits and J. Zsengfeller, eds. Studies in the Book of Ben Sira (Leiden: Brill, 2008).

BARUCH

PATRICIA K. TULL

OVERVIEW

The deuterocanonical book of Baruch, written most likely in Jerusalem in the second century BCE, is associated with the book of Jeremiah in the Septuagint and Latin Vulgate. It is considered canonical by Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, but not by Jews or Protestants. The final chapter appears during advent in Catholic and Anglican lectionaries.

Like many works written during and after the Second Temple period, the book introduces an authorial fiction: that it was composed by Jeremiah's friend and scribe Baruch, son of Neriah (see Jer 32:12–16; 36:4–32; 43:3–6; 45:1–5). According to Jer 43:6, Baruch and Jeremiah were taken to Egypt after Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem. But according to this book's opening, Baruch lived and wrote among Babylonian exiles. Several other historical inaccuracies reflected in the introduction suggest that Baruch's biographical and historical features are fictional.

Baruch is deeply scriptural and theological, however, freely partaking of themes and language from Deuteronomy, which is echoed throughout the book, as well as from several other major sections of the Hebrew Bible. The book sets side by side five genres well known from Scripture: (1) prose narrative (1:1–9), which introduces (2) a letter (1:10–14), modeled on Jer 29:1–23, which contains (3) a prayer of repentance (1:15–3:8), modeled on Dan 9; (4) a poetic hymn to divine Wisdom, who is the Torah of God (3:9–4:4), modeled on Job 28; and finally (5) poetic words of consolation addressed from and to Mother Jerusalem, modeled on Isa 40–66 (4:5–5:9).

Because obvious transitions at 3:9 and 4:5 are lacking, and because of the genre shifts, many readers view Baruch as a composite document comprised of pieces written by at least three authors. But citing especially the echoes of Deuteronomy and Deuteronomic theology throughout the book, some recent commentators have seen continuity among the book's parts. Even though the medium of communication changes over the course of the book, as do the names by which God is remembered, all sections share common characteristics: concern for Jerusalem and traditional understandings of the human relationship to God, responsiveness to Torah, exegetical reutilization of Scripture, and a chastened quest for God's will and for Israel's restoration. Unlike some other roughly contemporary works, Baruch exhibits no interest in messianic or apocalyptic discourse. Rather, its author offers the community models for learning from their ancestors' mistakes and living in humble piety in the here and now.

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1:1–14)

II. Baruch's Prayer (1:15–3:8)

III. Wisdom's Call (3:9–4:4)

IV. Jerusalem's Consolation (4:5–5:9)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1:1–14)

The book is presented as the words of Baruch, writing in Babylon "in the fifth year," probably, that is, five years after the destruction of the Temple in 587 BCE. After Baruch reads the book that follows to the exiled King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) and all the Judeans in Babylon, they weep, pray, fast, and take up an offering to be sent to Jerusalem, along with the Temple vessels that had been carried to Babylon. Ezra 1:7–11 presents Cyrus of Persia restoring these implements much later, but the story here requires this action, since the funds being sent to Jerusalem are intended to buy sacrifices for offering on the altar.

Beginning in v. 10, a letter from the exiled community addresses Jerusalem's high priest Jehoiakim, who is otherwise unknown, and the people with him. This letter asks them to offer incense, burnt, grain, and sin offerings on the altar, praying for the exiled community as well as for King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon and for his "son" Belshazzar—whom Dan 5:2 likewise erroneously identified as Nebuchadnezzar's son, though he was actually the son of Nabonidus, Nebuchadnezzar's son-in-law's son's successor. The introduction evokes Jeremiah's letter exhorting the exiled community in Babylon to reconcile themselves to their new life (Jer 29), as well as Ezra's public reading of Torah, inspiring repentance (Neh 8). The Jerusalemites are asked to read the contents of this scroll aloud as a confession of sin on behalf of both the exiles and themselves.

II. Baruch's Prayer (1:15–3:8)

The fifty-one verse prayer of confession that follows is similar to Daniel's much briefer prayer in Dan 9:4–19. The prayer's opening in Bar 1:15–18 echoes Dan 9:7–10 rather precisely, and the supplication at the prayer's turning point in Bar 2:11–18 echoes the conclusion at Dan 9:15–19. Interwoven with this prayer, a retrospective of Deuteronomistic theology, are a variety of phrases from the books of Deuteronomy and Jeremiah. Prominent especially in Bar 2:21–26 are echoes of Jeremiah's exhortation in Jer 27 to serve the king of Babylon.

The prayer is general rather than specific, and all-encompassing in its scope. Israel's sin began with the ancestors who were brought out of Egypt, and includes all the people of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem along with all their public leaders. Sins include disobedience (1:18, see Dan 9:10), serving other gods and doing evil in the Lord's eyes (1:22; see Deut 4:25; 11:16), and failing to heed God's command to submit to Babylon (2:24; see Jer 27:13). As a result of this sin, Israel has incurred the curses Moses warned of in Deut 28: cannibalism (Bar 2:3, see Deut 28:53), being scattered among the nations (Bar 2:4; see Deut 28:64), and being left few in number (Bar 2:29, see Deut 28:58, 62). Now, recognizing divine justice in the calamities they have endured, they quote a pastiche of passages from Exodus, Deuteronomy, 2 Kings, and Jeremiah, as divine promises that in exile they will come to recognize, obey, praise, and remember God, and will return to their ancestral land forever (Bar 2:29–35). The prayer concludes with a plea for mercy and a reassurance that the people have repented.

Remarkable in both its humility and its exegetical study of Scripture, the prayer recalls the entire story of Israel's birth, prosperity, destruction, and struggling rebirth as a nation that was, by the author's time, "exiled" within its own borders.

III. Wisdom's Call (3:9–4:4)

Baruch 3:8 concludes with a reminder to God that "we" are in exile. After a call that repeats precisely the Deuteronomic phrase "Hear, O Israel" (Deut 5:1, 6:4, obscured in the NRSV translation, which reverses the word order), Israel is asked rhetorically why the people are in enemy land. The answer is supplied immediately: "you have forsaken the fountain (see Jer 2:13, 17:13) of wisdom." Indeed, in Deut 4:5–6 Moses had drawn a close link between obedience to the law and wisdom, and this link is exploited in a poem that draws upon the personification of wisdom in Job 28, with assistance from Deut 30, Job 38, and Prov 3:13–18.

The poem progresses through a series of questions and answers concerning the quest for wisdom, based on Job 28's poem concerning where wisdom is to be found, with generous contributions from the poem about finding God's commandments in Deut 30:11–14. It was not found by rulers who schemed to gain wealth (Bar 3:16–19, see Ezek 28:2–10 on the wise ruler of Tyre), nor by those in Teman, who were likewise renowned for wisdom (Bar 3:22–23, see Jer 49:7 and Obad 8–9), nor by the giants of old (Bar 3:26–27, see Gen 6:4). God alone has found the way to wisdom (Bar 3:32, 36, see Job 28:23). But whereas in Job, wisdom was simply the fear of the Lord, Baruch agrees with the understanding found in Sirach 24, in which Wisdom searches for a dwelling place and is told by God to make her dwelling with Israel (Sir 24:8): God has found the way to Wisdom and has given her to Israel. Baruch also agrees with Sirach that wisdom is "the book of the commandments of God" (Bar 4:1, see Sir 24:23). Although Deut 30:11–14 does not spell out why Israel need not go to heaven or beyond the sea to find God's decree, Baruch draws the exegetical connection: "the word is very near to you" (Deut 30:14) because God has already sought it out and given it to Israel, who must now hold it fast and live (Bar 4:1, see Prov 3:18).

In this section God is no longer called kyrios, "Lord," but "the one who knows all things" and "the one who prepared the earth for all time," "the one who sends forth the light," and "our God" (Bar 3:32–33, 35). Wisdom is known by other names as well. She is not only sophia (wisdom, 3:12, 23; see Prov 1:20), but also phronēsis ("understanding" or "prudence," 3:9, 14, 28; see Prov 3:13), synesis ("intelligence," 3:14, 23, 32; see Prov 9:6), ischys ("strength," 3:14; see Prov 8:14), and epistēmē ("knowledge," 3:20, 27, 37; Job 28:12)—all feminine nouns. In Baruch she is not presented, as in Proverbs, as a quasi-sexual partner for a male audience, but is commended to "you, Israel" (second person common plural). If her appearing on earth to live with humankind sounds familiar to Christians, it is because the idea of Wisdom as the divine Torah dwelling with Israel is echoed in John's formulation "the Word became flesh and lived among us" (John 1:14). Indeed, many patristic writers, including Irenaeus, Clement, Origen, Tertullian, Ambrose, and Hilary, used this poem, especially "she appeared on earth and lived with humankind" (3:37; see John 1:14) to support their understanding of the preexistent Christ.

The nature of life-giving wisdom is important to this writer. It is not information, nor is it cleverness. Wealth and power cannot buy it. It does not even consist of aphorisms based, like much of the wisdom of Proverbs, on observations concerning the created world or human behavior. Here, not only is reverence for God the beginning of wisdom, but wisdom entirely consists in adherence to God's commandments revealed in the Torah. Following the law is posed not simply as a means to avoid divine punishment, but as the only way to gain a coherent grasp of life itself.

IV. Jerusalem's Consolation (4:5–5:9)

Wisdom is only one of the two major personified female figures in the Hebrew Scriptures. The other is the city of Jerusalem, or Zion, who appears in Psalms, 2 Kings, and several biblical prophets, but is best known from Lamentations and Isaiah 40–66. Nowhere else in Scripture do the two figures, Wisdom and Zion, appear side by side as they do in Baruch.

As in the previous two sections, the topic announced from the beginning is exile, still understood in Deuteronomic terms. An anonymous speaker (presumably Baruch) addresses "my people," reminding them that they were handed over to their enemies because they angered God (Bar 4:5–6). Combining the claims of Deut 32:18 ("you forgot the God who gave you birth"), Isa 1:2 in which God says, "I reared children and brought them up, but they have rebelled against me," and Lam 2:22 where Zion says, "those whom I bore and reared my enemy has destroyed," the speaker poses God and Zion side by side as grieving co-parents: "You forgot the everlasting God, who brought you up, and you grieved Jerusalem, who reared you" (Bar 4:8). The verb used of God, tropheuo, is otherwise attested in the LXX only to describe Moses' mother, the "nursing woman" (Exod 2:7). The verb used of Zion, ektrepheō, describes God in Ps 23:2 (see also Isa 49:21; Prov 23:24). A subtle wisdom theme emerges in the reminders of the hopes and expectations of both father and mother (see Prov 1:8, etc.).

The next verse introduces Zion's own speech, which continues through Bar 4:29. Following her speech the anonymous observer resumes, this time speaking to Zion herself. This structure of interaction between Zion and a sympathetic observer who speaks both about and to her resembles that found in Lam 1 and 2. Unlike Lamentations, however, Baruch presents both Zion and the other speaker as articulating hope and comfort. The refrain "take courage" structures this poem, appearing first in the mouth of "Baruch" (4:5), speaking to the people, and subsequently twice more in Zion's words, also addressed to her children (4:21, 27), and finally directed back to Zion herself (4:30).

The theology is the same as in previous sections of Baruch. Only the perspective from which it is viewed differs. Zion's sorrow is caused by the sins of her children (Bar 4:12; see Isa 50:1). Here Zion endures none of the sexually abusive imprecations of Hosea, Jeremiah, and especially Ezekiel, in which gender is integral to sin and God is the jealous husband. Instead, Baruch holds the mother city to be the innocent victim of her children's disregard for God's commandments. Daughters are specifically mentioned along with sons (4:10, 14, 16), and "children" appears seven times as the neuter term tekna rather than huiot, "sons." Confession of sin and the hope for restoration have already been articulated in the initial letter and prayer; the alternative path of wise obedience has already been traced. Here the pathos of a mother longing for her children's return creates a relationship within which wayward Israelites can envision themselves assuming responsibility for the welfare of their society as a whole.

Baruch 4:5–20 presents the sin and exile of Zion's children as a situation over which Zion mourns, though she considers herself helpless to assist them except by her prayers. "I have taken off the robe of peace/and put on sackcloth for my supplication;/I will cry to the Everlasting all my days" (4:20), she says. However, she does more than simply pray. She expresses confidence in God's deliverance and recommends patient endurance with prayer. A turning point is reached midway through her speech when Zion finds joy in God's mercy and articulates hope for the future in tones similar to those of Second Isaiah: "I sent you out with sorrow and weeping, but God will give you back to me with joy and gladness forever" (4:23, see Isa 49:22; 51:11).

In Baruch Zion offers her most fully reasoned understanding of herself, her children, and her God, who in this section is also called "Holy One" (Bar 4:22, 37; 5:5) and "Everlasting" (Bar 4:8, 10, 14, 20, 22, 24, 35; 5:2). She advises her children to "endure with patience the wrath that has come upon you" (4:25) until they are remembered by God and brought to everlasting joy. Though weeping and sorrowful (4:11), widowed, bereaved, and desolate (4:12), Zion neither accuses nor excuses her children, but urges acceptance, repentance, and expectancy. Though the book echoes the suffering of Zion that was articulated so brutally in Lamentations when the Babylonian exile was still fresh and shocking, time and distance have conferred on Zion more dignity, control, and motherly counsel.

In Baruch's first section the people are forced to articulate their own sorrow, and in the middle section a more dispassionate speaker touches only briefly on present sufferings. In the final section, however, Zion as mother represents transcendent compassion, moved by human suffering, grieving both over and with her children. She mediates the tension between respect for divine order, which moves her to plead with her children, and compassion for human failure, which moves her to plead with God.

As Zion has comforted, so she too is comforted. The sympathetic voice that introduced her speech returns in the conclusion of this section and of the book of Baruch, reassuring her of God's comfort (4:30, see Isa 51:12 and Lam 1:2, etc). As in Isa 47, a wretched fate is predicted for Jerusalem's unnamed enemies who "rejoiced at your fall" (Bar 4:31) and especially for the city that "received your offspring" (Bar 4:32) and will be "grieved at her own desolation" (v. 33). In expressions echoing Isa 43:5, 49:18, and 60:4, Jerusalem is told to "look toward the east" to see her children returning to her from east and west (4:36–37). They are carried in glory (5:6; Isa 49:22; 60:4) and led joyfully by God (5:9; Isa 52:12; 55:12). Zion herself is invited to don new clothing (5:1–3; Isa 52:1–2) and receive her new name (5:4; Isa 62:2, 12). The poem concludes with creation's response: helped by hills that become low and valleys that fill up to make level ground (5:7; 40:4), and shaded by woods and fragrant trees (5:8; Isa 55:12–13), Zion's children are led back by God in "the mercy and righteousness that come from him."

Unlike Isa 40–66, in which Zion is told to sing aloud (Isa 54:1) but never actually speaks, Baruch represents Zion as a theologically articulate figure whose conversation partner complements her speech and transforms her hope into immanent reality. By the conclusion of the book, hearers in a century quite distant from the Babylonian exile, who are nevertheless still suffering foreign domination, have been beckoned by Torah, prophets, and wisdom, all three speaking in concert, to reclaim their scriptural and religious heritage, to repent of sin, to seek wisdom through obedience, and to be rejoined with their consoling Mother Jerusalem.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. Burke. The Poetry of Baruch: A Reconstruction and Analysis of the Original Hebrew Text of Baruch 3:9–5:9. SBL Septuagint and Cognate Studies 10 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press, 1982); W. Harrelson. "Wisdom Hidden and Revealed according to Baruch (Baruch 3:9–4:4)." Priests, Prophets and Scribes. E. Ulrich et al., eds. JSOTSup 149 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992); C. A. Moore. Daniel, Esther, and Jeremiah: The Additions. AB 44 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); A. Saldarini. "The Book of Baruch." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 2001); E. Tov. The Book of Baruch (Missoula, Mont.: Scholars Press, 1975).

THE LETTER OF JEREMIAH

PATRICIA K. TULL

OVERVIEW

The Letter of Jeremiah, a treatise on the absurdity of idol worship, was originally written in Hebrew, but was passed down from ancient times in Greek translation. In some LXX manuscripts it was placed after Lamentations, but in others it appeared as the final chapter of the book of Baruch.

Modeled on Jer 29:1–23, it purports to be a letter of instruction from Jeremiah to Judahites soon to be exiled to Babylon. As many commentators note, however, it is neither a letter nor is it Jeremiah's. Its date is uncertain, but most scholars place it in the Hellenistic period, no later than 2 Macc 2:1–3, which refers to it. The book expands upon criticisms of idolatry found not only in Jer 10:1–16, but in several chapters of the exilic portion of Isaiah (40:18–20; 42:17; 44:9–20; 45:16–20; 46:1–7) as well as some late Psalms (115:3–8; 135:15–18).

OUTLINE

- I. Introduction (6:1–7)
- II. The Gods Are Made, Dressed, and Treated Like Human Beings (6:8–16)
- III. The Gods Are Powerless to Offer Protection, Even for Themselves (6:17–23)
- IV. Humans Have to Care for Them and Carry Them Around (6:24–29)
- V. The Gods Can Do Nothing for Their Worshipers (6:30–40a)
- VI. Even Their Own Worshipers Dishonor Them and Show Them No Real Reverence (6:40b–44)
- VII. Human Hands Made the Gods, and Humans Are Mortal (6:45–52)
- VIII. The Gods Do Not Control Nature and Cannot Protect Even Themselves (6:53–56)
- IX. Thieves Can Steal or Disfigure the Gods (6:57–65)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

In the introduction, Jeremiah explains that the exiles will remain in Babylon up to seven generations (revising the "seventy years" in Jer 29:10), and warns them against fearing the Babylonian gods, which are made of silver, gold, and wood, and are carried about on human shoulders. The rest of the book debunks these gods, using a variety of arguments for their lifelessness and uselessness, as well as for the dishonesty of their priests and the ritually objectionable practices that surround their worship.

The arguments are punctuated by a summarizing refrain that appears at irregular intervals. The first three and final two instances of the refrain exhort: "From this it is evident (or from this you will know, etc.) that they are not gods, so do not fear them." The middle several refrains are formulated as rhetorical questions, such as "Why then must anyone think that they are gods, or call them gods?" Along with implicit negative comparisons with the God portrayed in the OT, the "do not fear" refrains keep the contrast alive between the gods who are too powerless to inspire fear and the invisible God whom they must worship (v. 6). The rhetorical questions invite readers to ponder the evident ignorance of those who fear these gods.

Although the letter calls them "gods" (theoi) throughout, and "idols" (eidola) only in the final verse (NRSV's wording in vv. 44 and 63 notwithstanding), it is clear that the author follows biblical polemics in equating Babylonian gods with the human-made icons that represent them. Several arguments are mounted against fearing these objects. First, they are made by mortals out of earthly materials, and as such they are perishable: their gold tarnishes, their clothing rots, their hearts are eaten by crawling creatures from the earth. Second, and most prevalently, these gods are powerless. They cannot speak, much less make or depose kings, give wealth, save anyone from death, rescue the weak, restore sight to the blind, answer prayers, provide rain, judge, or deliver. They cannot even take care of themselves: others must keep the dust and tarnish off of them, protect them from thieves, light lamps for them, carry them about, pick them up if they fall, and protect them from harm. Even the weapons in their hands are useless, and they are unaware of the smoke that blackens them and the bats, swallows, birds, and cats that sit upon them. Common household objects such as columns and doors are more useful than these gods. The sun, moon, and elements of nature, though they are not gods themselves, through their obedience to God serve greater purposes than these gods. Even wild animals are better, since they can protect and care for themselves.

As if these arguments are not enough, the writer also impugns the integrity of those who serve them. Priests steal from worshipers by appropriating the gold and silver, sacrificial meat, and clothing offered to the gods, and they do not share with those in need. They also "sit with their clothes torn, their heads and beards shaved, and their heads uncovered," howling and shouting before the gods (vv. 31-32)—several practices foreign and even forbidden (Lev 10:6; 21:5; Ezek 24:17).

Ritually unclean women touch the sacrificial meat. Prostitutes compete with one another to solicit sexual partners. From a Judahite perspective, practices surrounding the worship of these gods are ethically and ritually abhorrent.

Although some of the satirical images it conjures up can be amusing, the book has been roundly criticized for its repetitive, sarcastic, and even imperious style. The writer's aim is to render the worship of other gods thoroughly unpalatable and implausible to readers. No attempt is made to understand the foreign practices on their own terms.

While such arguments must have served the social and theological purpose for which they were intended, their intolerant tone would be met with objections today. Though demonstrating detailed knowledge of the mundane aspects of the gods' creation and maintenance, the writing exhibits no interest in worshipers' own understanding of the cult objects' meaning.

Fortunately, contemporary archaeologists are well informed about the initiation rituals of Babylonian idols. According to texts from the library of Ashurbanipal, each image was initiated in an elaborate symbolic ritual in which the craftsmen denied having manufactured it, and it was taken back to its origin as a tree in the forest, so that the god could be created not by human hands but by the deities in heaven, and descend to earth to "participate" in the image, transubstantiating it. While aspects of the care of these cult objects did verge on fetishism, analogies to later Jewish and especially Christian attachments to objects such as Torah scrolls, the eucharistic host, and icons—even the Bible itself—help modern readers understand the extent to which humans rely on inert objects that we can see and touch to bring us into communion with the invisible God.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

T. Jacobsen "The Graven Image." Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross. P. D. Miller et al, eds. (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987); C. Moore. Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: The Additions. AB 44 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1977); A. J. Saldarini. "The Letter of Jeremiah." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 2001); P. K. Tull. "The Letter of Jeremiah." Women's Bible Commentary. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, eds. Expanded ed. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998).

THE PRAYER OF AZARIAH

MATTHIAS HENZE

OVERVIEW

The apocryphal Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews is the first of three extended Additions to the book of Daniel in the Greek and Latin versions of the Bible (the other two are the story of Susanna and the story of Bel and the Dragon). Composed originally in Hebrew, no Semitic source text survives, and, like the other two Additions, the Prayer is now preserved in two Greek versions, the Old Greek (LXX) and the younger Theodotion, which has since replaced the Old Greek in the Bibles of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches. The two Greek versions diverge only slightly from one another, which suggests that they both go back to the same Semitic original.

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews is inserted into the Aramaic narrative between Dan 3:23 and 3:24 (Dan 3:24–90 in the Greek and Latin Bibles). Daniel 3 tells the story of Daniel's three companions, who refuse to worship a golden statue set up by Nebuchadnezzar in the province of Babylon. In Dan 3:23 the three young men are tied up and thrown into the fiery furnace, and in 3:24–25 the Babylonian king is astounded to see four men, the three companions and an angel, walking freely and unharmed in the flames. The insert in the Greek text bridges the somewhat abrupt transition from Nebuchadnezzar's fury to his astonishment and tells the reader what happened in the furnace. It also shifts the emphasis in Dan 3 from prose narrative to liturgical poetry, and underscores the miraculous nature of the episode.

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews consists of three parts, the Prayer of Azariah, one of Daniel's three friends (vv. 1–22); a short prose insert, describing the extreme heat of the furnace and explaining the mysterious appearance of the angel (vv. 23–27); and the Song of the Three Jews (vv. 28–68).

OUTLINE

- I. The Prayer of Azariah (1–22 [24–45 in the Greek])
- II. Prose Interlude (23–27 [46–50 in the Greek])
- III. The Song of the Three Jews (28–68 [51–90 in the Greek])

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Prayer of Azariah (1–22 [24–45 in the Greek])

The Prayer begins with a brief narrative introduction (vv. 1–2). As the three young men walk around unharmed in the midst of the flames, Azariah begins to pray and blesses God. The names of Daniel and the three youth, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, were changed to Belteshazzar, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in Dan 1:7, but the Prayer only uses their Hebrew names (vv. 2 and 66). Daniel is conspicuous for his absence from both Dan 3 and the Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews.

In form, the Prayer of Azariah is a communal confession of sin, with the community (not Azariah, as the narrative introduction would suggest) as its subject. Such prayers are common in post-exilic literature, and parallels are found in Dan 9:4–19; Ezra 9:6–15; Neh 1:5–11; 9:5–37; and Bar 1:15–3:8. The Prayer closely adopts the covenant theology that was characteristic of its period. It follows deuteronomic theology (see especially Deut 28–32), according to which obedience brings the blessings of the covenant and disobedience its curses. The psalm begins in vv. 3–10 with an affirmation of God's justice. God is just, and his judgment is true. Israel is currently delivered to their enemies and lives under an unjust king. Israel deserves her present plight, however, because the people have broken the law and have not kept the commandments.

The prayer proceeds in vv. 11–13 with a plea to God not to abandon Israel or to annul the covenant, for the sake of God's name, and for the sake of God's covenantal promise to Abraham to make him a great nation (v. 13; Gen 15:5). In vv. 14–17, the psalmist continues his plea for mercy. Israel has become the smallest of all nations, without a leader, a prophet, or even the possibility of bringing offerings. In language borrowed from David, the finest biblical poet and model penitent (Pss 51:16–17; 141:2), the psalmist asks that "a contrite heart and a humble spirit" be acceptable to God in place of the sacrifices of lambs and bulls (vv. 14–17). Some modern interpreters assert that the three men not only offer their contrite hearts but their lives to God, as they are ready to die in the fiery furnace so that sacrifice in the Prayer is replaced with martyrdom (Dan 11:33–35), but this ignores the fact that the Prayer was not composed for its present context.

The Prayer of Azariah ends in vv. 18–22 with a prayer of deliverance. The congregation is now ready to seek God's presence and appeals to God to be merciful. Instead of putting them to shame, it is Israel's enemies who deserve to be shamed (Pss 25:3; 40:15). The call in vv. 21–22 for their enemies to be overthrown so that all nations come to realize that the God of Israel alone is God fits well with the present literary context of the Prayer, since the stories in Dan 1–6 frequently end with a doxology from the foreign monarch in praise of the universal sovereignty of the God of Daniel (Dan 2:47; 3:28–29; 4:35–37; 6:26–27; Bel 41).

There are several reasons why the Prayer was most likely not composed for its present context but at some point existed independently and only later was interpolated here. One is its deuteronomic theology with its belief that the people's current affliction is the result of Israel's sin, a theology nowhere to be found in Dan 1–6 (it has a striking parallel in Dan 9:4–19, however). Another reason is that the situation presumed in the Prayer is at odds with the present plight of Azariah. According to the Prayer of Azariah, Israel is currently living among her enemies under a wicked king. The king in question could of course be Nebuchadnezzar, the king in Dan 3, but in Dan 1–4 Nebuchadnezzar's encounter with Daniel in general is rather amicable. The Prayer's implied context fits better the general conditions of the Jews during post-exilic times, particularly during the time of Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century BCE, when the Prayer may have been composed, though this has to remain conjectural. Yet another reason why the Prayer is most likely a secondary insertion is its very form, a communal confession of sin and a petition for mercy, not exactly the kind of prayer one would expect from a youth in the fiery furnace.

II. Prose Interlude (23–27 [46–50 in the Greek])

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews are bridged by a short prose narrative. The prose section links not only the two psalms but also the Addition as a whole to its narrative context in Dan 3.

Verses 23–25 exaggerate the gigantic proportions of the blaze and relate how the king's servants keep adding more fuel to the fire, including naphtha (possibly petroleum, 2 Macc 1:36), pitch, tow, and brushwood. As a result, the flames reach a height of close to 80 feet, or 49 cubits, so that even some of the royal workers are consumed by the fire (Dan 3:22). Verses 26–27 speak of the surprising appearance of the angel, also noticed by Nebuchadnezzar in Dan 3:24–25 (see also Sus 44–45 in the Old Greek). The angel appears in order "to be with Azariah and his companions" and to drive the flames out of the furnace so that the men can survive. His intervention makes the three sing hymns and glorify God.

III. The Song of the Three Jews (28–68 [51–90 in the Greek])

The Song of the Three Jews is a hymn of praise that calls on the entire creation to join in the praise of God, much like Ps 148, which may have inspired its composition. Unlike the Prayer of Azariah, the Song does not presuppose a situation in which the community is persecuted and lives under a wicked king. Apart from an editorial gloss at the end (vv. 66–68), it has nothing in common with Dan 3. The Song of the Three Jews therefore is most likely an independent composition that may well have originated in a context different from the Prayer of Azariah, though given its timeless motifs and the lack of any historical references it is difficult to determine when it was written.

The Song of the Three Jews begins in v. 28 with a brief introduction. Verses 29–34 open the hymn with a sequence of blessings that amount to a majestic doxology in praise of God who is enthroned in the heavenly temple and who is praised by the universe (Pss 96 and 97).

Verses 35–65 are distinct in form, in that each line ends with an identical antiphonal refrain, "sing praise to him and highly exalt him forever," a liturgical form known from Ps 136 in the biblical psalter. This part of the Song can further be subdivided into three roughly parallel sections. Verses 35–51 call on the heavens and all that is in them—angels, waters above the heavens, powers, sun, moon and stars, rain and wind, etc.—to join in the hymn of praising God. Verses 52–60 then turn to the earth and all that is in it—mountains, all that grows on the ground, seas and rivers, whales and all that swim in the waters, etc. The last to be called on to praise God are "all people on earth" (v. 60). The order in which the constituents of creation are listed roughly follows the order of the same groups in the creation account in Gen 1 (also Ps 104). Verses 61–65, finally, presents an appeal to Israel to join in the hymn—Israel, the priests of the Lord, the servants of the Lord, the spirits and souls of the righteous, and those who are holy and humble in heart.

The conclusion of the Song of the Three Jews in vv. 66–68 brings the reader back to the situation that provoked the Song in the first place. The three men call on themselves to exalt God and to thank him for delivering them from the fiery furnace. Verses 67–68 recall Ps 136:1–3. This last section feels somewhat strained. It interrupts the cadence created by the recurring refrain and may well have been added by a redactor who adopted a previously existing hymn and tried to tie it to its new literary context.

The liturgical character of the Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews is evident, though we do not know of any employment of either text in the Jewish liturgy. However, the Song of the Three Jews is attested in some Christian hymnals and liturgies, where it is known as the Benedicite opera omnia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. Harrington. Invitation to the Apo crypha (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 185–206.

SUSANNA

MATTHIAS HENZE

OVERVIEW

The apocryphal and popular story of Susanna and the Elders is one of three extended Additions to the book of Daniel in the Greek and Latin versions of the Bible (the other two are the Prayer of Azariah and Bel and the Dragon). The tale is about a devout Jewess in Babylon, who is wrongfully accused of adultery, condemned to death, but vindicated due to Daniel's last-minute intervention. Modern interpreters have found in Susanna the Jewish reworking of a pagan folklore about the wise and righteous protagonist, who is accused and condemned to death but rescued by God and ultimately vindicated (Gen 37–50; Ahiqar; Wis 2–5).

Not much is known about the origin of the story. Composed originally in Hebrew, or perhaps in Aramaic, no Semitic source text survives, and, like the other two Additions, the story is now preserved in two Greek versions, the Old Greek/the Septuagint and the younger Theodotion, which has since replaced the Old Greek in the Bibles of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches. In genre and setting, the story of Susanna resembles the legends about Daniel in Dan 1–6 as well as other Jewish novels of the period, such as Esther (including the Greek Additions) and the apocryphal books of Judith and Tobit. The fact that a woman plays a leading role links this book to the books of Esther, Ruth, and Judith, though by comparison Susanna remains surprisingly passive. She is set apart not by her deeds (it is Daniel, after all, who rescues her) but by her piety.

Susanna's date of composition is not known, though the third or second century BCE is likely. The two Greek versions diverge significantly from one another. In the Old Greek, Susanna follows the book of Daniel as the thirteenth chapter together with Bel and the Dragon, whereas Theodotion places Susanna before ch. 1, presumably because Daniel is here called "a young lad" (v. 45). Theodotion is significantly longer than the Old Greek and adds numerous details.

OUTLINE

- I. Introduction (1–4)
- II. Introduction of the Elders (5–14)
- III. The Attempted Seduction of Susanna (15–27)
- IV. The Trial (28–43)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1–4)

These verses, which are only attested in Theodotion (the Old Greek lacks an introduction), set the scene for the book. Susanna, the daughter of righteous parents, is the wife of Joakim, an eminent Jew living in Babylon. Three of Susanna's attributes are emphasized from the outset, all typical of the Jewish novel and with parallels in related literature, and all essential for the plot of the story: Susanna is "a very beautiful woman" (repeated in v. 31; see Esth 2:7; Tob 6:12; Jdt 8:7–8); she was trained by her parents "according to the law of Moses," which means that she is very pious, even in the face of persecution (Jdt 8:6–8; Dan 3:17); and she is married to a husband of great wealth and social standing, in whose house the Jews gather frequently (Esth 2:15–18; Jdt 8:7).

Unlike the other Jewish novels to which Susanna can be compared—Esther, Dan 1–6, Tobit, Judith—the story of Susanna and the Elders unravels entirely in the Jewish world of the Diaspora community. There is no Gentile king here, no threat to Jewish existence, and no rivalry between the Jewish protagonists and the Gentile court officials. Such a portrayal of a fully autonomous, self-governing, and highly affluent Jewish Diaspora community at the time of the Babylonian exile was probably not intended to be historically accurate. Rather, the story of Susanna wants to delight and entertain the reader. More importantly, by focusing exclusively on the Jewish community, the story teller exposes some of its most precarious shortcomings: in spite of their social standing, the two elderly judges are corrupt; the community's judicial system is defunct; and the same assembly that is quick to condemn Susanna only a few verses later has the elders executed and praises God "who saves those who hope in him" (v. 60).

II. Introduction of the Elders (5–14)

Two of the appointed judges that year, who gather daily in Joakim's house to administer justice, fall in love with Susanna and, without telling anyone, lust after her (Exod 20:17). One day, when they discover their unchecked passion, they conspire how they can find Susanna alone.

The storyteller prefaces his account of the two elders with a derogatory saying, so the reader already anticipates their wicked intentions. The origin of the saying is unknown, though the portrayal of the two scoundrels is remarkably reminiscent of the two false prophets mentioned in Jer 29, which contains a letter sent by Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon. In it the prophet accuses the two prophets of telling lies and committing adultery with their neighbors' wives (Jer 29:20–23). Earlier in the same chapter of Jeremiah, the prophet encourages the exiles to build houses and plant gardens (Jer 29:4–7), which reinforces the impression that the setting of the story of Susanna presupposes a world similar to that of Jeremiah's letter and may even have been modeled after it.

III. The Attempted Seduction of Susanna (15–27)

The scene is rather terse in the Old Greek. There the elders simply approach Susanna and try to force her into having intercourse with them, with no further description of the circumstances. Only Theodotion has the famous episode of Susanna's bath in the orchard (vv. 15–18), which is well known from artistic and musical depictions of the story.

On a hot day, Susanna takes a bath in the garden. As soon as she sends her two maids away, the two elders, who had been spying on her, seize the opportunity and force her to make a decision: either to have intercourse with them or be accused by them of adultery with a young man. Susanna refuses them, as this would entail "sin[ning] before the Lord" (v. 23), and so she cries out for help.

The erotic element of the bath scene has been compared to the Greek romance. But the first crucial moment in the story is not a scene of sexual pleasure or violence but of theological decision (Gen 39:9). Being raised according to the Law of Moses (v. 3), Susanna knows that the punishment for adultery is death (Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22)—though her wording suggests that it is not death she fears but sin against God, another indication of her piety. Susanna cries out "with a loud voice" (v. 24), which in and of itself is an affirmation of her innocence (Deut 22:24); and at once the elders too begin to shout, though not out of innocence, but, as the text puts it, "against her." When help rushes in, it is only the elders who tell their fabricated version of the story.

IV. The Trial (28–43)

The next day during the gathering of the community, the elders bring their case against Susanna and again tell their story. The narrator leaves no doubt about their true intentions and again introduces the scene with a derogatory remark, the elders came to Joakim's house "to have Susanna put to death" (v. 28). The scoundrels claim that, when they perchance witnessed Susanna's sexual encounter with an unidentified young man in the garden, they rushed to the scene, yet found themselves unable to restrain the young man because he was stronger than they. However, they were able to seize "this woman" (v. 40), who refused to tell them who the young man was. Since they are elders of the people and judges, their testimony is well received by the assembly, and Susanna is promptly condemned to death. Once again Susanna cries out "with a loud voice" (v. 42), though this time in prayer (vv. 42–43). The prayer is not a prayer for intercession, as is sometimes asserted (Susanna does not ask God to intercede), but another affirmation of Susanna's innocence. Susanna chooses to defend herself against the twisted accusations of the elders, not by addressing the elders directly or, for that matter, by bringing her plea before the assembly that just condemned her. Instead, she says a prayer before God, the supreme Judge (Jdt 9:2–14; Add Esth 14:3–19). Since God knows all secret things, she prays, God surely knows that Susanna is innocent. Before she prays, Susanna "looked up toward Heaven" (v. 35), which recalls the earlier description of the two lecherous elders, who, overcome by their lust, "turned away their eyes from looking to Heaven" (v. 9). The contrast between them could not be starker.

The scene of the trial differs in the two Greek versions. The Old Greek specifies, for example, that Susanna came to her trial together with her parents, four children, and five hundred maids. In the Old Greek, the elders demand that Susanna be stripped naked in front of the assembly, "in order that they could be sated with lust for her beauty" (v. 32 author's trans.; see Ezek 16:37–39; Hos 2:3; m. Sotah 1:5–6), while Theodotion inserts the phrase, "for she was veiled" (v. 32), implying that Susanna merely had to take off her veil to expose her face. In the Old Greek, Susanna prays before the elders testify against her, whereas in Theodotion her prayer comes after the accusations.

As the elders get ready to deliver their arraignment, they lay their hands on Susanna's head. The gesture carries a wide range of meanings in the Jewish Bible, and its meaning here is not clear. This is the only explicit bodily contact between the seducers and Susanna, though it is also possible that the gesture follows an ancient rite, according to which witnesses lay their hands on the victim's head in a capital case before the punishment is carried out (Lev 24:14); two witnesses are required for a capital punishment (Deut 17:6; 19:15).

V. Divine Intervention (44–64)

Susanna is vindicated. Just as Susanna is being led to her execution, God stirs up the holy spirit in Daniel (in the Old Greek an angel gives Daniel a spirit of understanding), and so it is now Daniel who shouts "with a loud voice" (v. 46), rebuking the assembly for not having cross-examined the elders properly on their false testimony. The community leaders quickly realize that "God has given [Daniel] the right of an elder" (v. 50 author trans.). Daniel separates the two judges and interrogates them independently (Deut 19:15–21). Each questioning consists of two parts: Daniel first denounces each of the elders for his lifelong perversion of justice and effectively convicts him prior to the interrogation, but then proceeds to ask him under which tree the purported sexual encounter took place. Each gives a different location, and so their perjury is quickly exposed. Each interrogation has a certain comic effect and revolves around a pun: the name of each tree anticipates the elder's punishment. It has been suggested that the Greek wordplay proves that the story of Susanna was originally composed in Greek, but this ignores the possibility that the Greek translator introduced the pun into the story. The punishment of the elders corresponds to the punishment they had intended for Susanna, they are executed in her stead (Dan 6:24; Bel 22, 42; Esth 7:10). Modern interpreters often point to Deut 19:16–21, which stipulates that one shall do to the false witness as he intended to do to the wrongly accused. By the time of the Mishnah, i.e. about four or five centuries after Susanna was written, the ways of dealing with false witnesses had been much mitigated, and the witnesses would hardly have been executed (m. Mak 1:1; m. Sanh 5:1–2).

The two Greek versions end on different notes. The Old Greek ends in praise of the youth and with the admonition, "let us watch out for young able sons" (v. 62), whereas Theodotion concludes with a praise of Daniel, who became great from that day onward.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. J. Collins. Daniel. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); E. S. Gruen. Heritage and Hellenism (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998); C. A. Moore. Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: The Additions (New York: Doubleday, 1977).

BEL AND THE DRAGON

MATTHIAS HENZE

OVERVIEW

The apocryphal story Bel and the Dragon is the last of three extended Additions to the book of Daniel in the Greek and Latin versions of the Bible (the other two are the Prayer of Azariah and the story of Susanna). Bel and the Dragon consists of two, roughly parallel tales. In the first (vv. 1–22), Daniel uncovers the fraud of the Babylonian priests of Bel, who secretly consume the daily food rations prepared for their idol while claiming that it was Bel who ate them. In the second tale (vv. 23–42), Daniel kills a large serpent that is worshiped by the Babylonians. Daniel is then thrown into the lions' den but survives miraculously, while the prophet Habakkuk provides him with food.

The two tales may well have originated independently (in the Old Greek the king remains anonymous; in Theodotion the king of the first tale is Cyrus the Persian, whereas in the second episode he remains nameless), yet in their present form they are woven into a single story by a number of elements: the central topic of both tales is the satirical polemic against idols and idolatry, a prominent theme in exilic and post-exilic literature (Isa 40:18–41:7; 44:9–20; 46:1; Wis 13:1–15:17; Ep Jer; Apoc. Ab. 1–8; Jub. 12:2–5; 20:8–9); both tales draw a sharp contrast between the worship of idols and Jewish monotheism, insisting that only Daniel worships "the living God" (v. 25) besides whom there is no other God (v. 41; Isa 45:5–6); and the tales are linked by the motif of food, which Bel cannot consume, which promptly destroys the giant serpent, and which Daniel receives from Habakkuk.

The original language of Bel and the Dragon is unknown, though Hebrew, or perhaps Aramaic, seem most likely. No Semitic original survives, however, and, like the Prayer of Azariah and the story of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon is preserved in two Greek versions, where it is placed at the end of the book of Daniel. The Greek versions are the Old Greek (the Septuagint) and Theodotion, which has replaced the Old Greek in the Bibles of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches. The date of composition is likewise unknown, with most scholars proposing the third or second century BCE.

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1–2)

II. Daniel Exposes the Fraud of the Babylonian Priests (3–22)

III. Daniel Kills the Serpent (23–27)

IV. Daniel in the Lions' Den (28–32)

V. The Prophet Habakkuk feeds Daniel (33–42)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1–2)

Both versions introduce the story rather differently. The Old Greek begins in v. 1, "From a prophecy of Habakkuk,"¹ thereby attributing Bel and the Dragon to the corpus of texts associated with the prophet Habakkuk; even though the two tales were originally independent, the superscription treats them as a unit. Verse 2 introduces Daniel as if he was unknown to the reader, "There was a certain person, a priest, whose name was Daniel." The verse then continues to speak of Daniel as "a companion of the king of Babylon," suggesting that the king in Bel and the Dragon is a Babylonian king. Theodotion, by contrast, begins in v. 1 with a superscription that is modeled after the prophetic books of the Bible, "And King Astyages was added to his ancestors, and Cyrus the Persian received his kingdom." According to Theodotion, then, the king of Bel and the Dragon is the Persian King Cyrus. In 550 BCE, Cyrus dethroned Astyages (585–550 BCE), the last king of Media. Here Bel and the Dragon differs from the book of Daniel, where Cyrus replaced an otherwise unknown "Darius the Mede" (Dan 5:31; 6:28).

II. Daniel Exposes the Fraud of the Babylonian Priests (3–22)

The Babylonians worship the god Bel, whom they serve daily with lavish portions of flour, sheep, and wine. Confronted by King Cyrus about why he does not join in the worship, Daniel replies that he only reveres his God, the creator of heaven and earth, not "idols made with hands" (v. 5; Jdt 8:18). Thereupon the king confronts the priests with an intimidating proposition: unless they tell him who eats the provisions they will die, but if Bel is eating them, Daniel shall die (vv. 8–9). One evening, when Bel is again brought his food rations, Daniel has ashes scattered secretly on the floor of the whole shrine. When the king returns early the next morning, the food is gone and the king rejoices. But Daniel points to the traces on the floor, whereupon the king has to concede that he has been tricked, and the seventy priests of Bel reveal the hidden door through which they used to enter at night to consume the food. In the Old Greek version, their fate remains unclear, and the king destroys Bel, whereas in Theodotion the king puts the priests to death together with their families, as he had previously ordained (vv. 8–9), and delivers Bel into the hand of Daniel, who destroys both the idol and his temple.

This brief episode is a fine example of an idol parody. The idol in question is Bel (meaning "lord"), the Akkadian pendant to the Canaanite god Baal. In Babylon, the same deity is known as Marduk, or Merodach (Isa 46:1; Jer 50:2; 51:44). Herodotus (History 1.183) describes a massive statue of solid gold, sitting at a golden table on a golden chair in a temple in the center of Babylon, which still received offerings in the days of Cyrus and was later destroyed by Xerxes. Daniel shows no sympathy for Bel and ridicules the idol, which, in his words, merely has "clay inside and bronze outside" (v. 7; Dan 2:33), a phrase reminiscent of the idol polemic in Isa 40:18–20. The God of Daniel, who alone is the living God, emerges the clear winner. But Bel is not the only loser in this story; the Gentile king is likewise portrayed in a less than favorable light. Cyrus comes across as gullible and easily manipulated. In fact, Daniel outright laughs at him twice in this short episode, first after the king claimed that Bel is truly a living god, since he consumes the food he is served (v. 7), and then again when the king sees the food gone and hastily proclaims that "there is no deceit" in Bel (v. 17–19)—only to discover, of course, that he had been deceived all along by the priests. Thus, both Bel and the Gentile monarch become the target of our author's penetrating ridicule (1 Esd 3–4).

III. Daniel Kills the Serpent (23–27)

The second tale begins somewhat abruptly, without any transition. It can be further subdivided into three scenes: Daniel blows up the serpent (vv. 23–27); Daniel survives in the lions' den (vv. 28–32); and Daniel receives food from the prophet Habakkuk and is vindicated (vv. 33–42).

The key phrase in the first of the three scenes, like in the previous one, is "living god" (in Theodotion). The king (he remains anonymous from now on, though interpreters generally assume that he is still Cyrus) points to a giant snake revered by the Babylonians as a god and challenges Daniel. Since this one plainly does consume food, Daniel won't be able to claim that "this is not a living god" (v. 24). Daniel, once again unimpressed, counters that only his God is a "living God" (v. 25) and asks for permission to kill the dragon without the aid of a weapon. As soon as the king agrees, Daniel boils together pitch, fat and hair into a cake and feeds it to the serpent, which promptly bursts open. The episode ends when Daniel exclaims, not without a little Schadenfreude, "See your objects of reverence!" (v. 27).

The serpent as a deity has deep roots in the ancient Near East. In the Babylonian creation myth Enuma Elish, Bel/Marduk, the chief deity of Babylon, is said to have vanquished Tiamat, the embodiment of primordial chaos. Remnants of the motif of the serpent as a mythological monster are found in the Hebrew Bible (Job 7:12; Pss 74:13–14; 104:26; Isa 27:1).

Some interpreters have suggested that Bel and the Dragon is drawn in part from Isaiah 45–46: there the God of Israel speaks to Cyrus too (45:1–3); there is not other god besides the God of Israel (45:5–6), who is the creator (45:18); and Isaiah 46:1 opens with the words, "Bel has fallen!" (LXX)—all theologumena with close parallels in Bel and the Dragon. Other interpreters have pointed to Jer 51:34–35, where the inhabitants of Zion mourn their own defeat by King Nebuchadnezzar by comparing the Babylonian tyrant to a monster, who "has filled his belly with my delicacies" (Jer 51:34). There is, of course, no reason why Bel and the Dragon can't have been inspired by more than one motif or text. The reader is struck, above all, by the lightheartedness and humor of Bel and the Dragon, which is completely absent from any of the alleged biblical base texts such as Job, Isaiah, and Jeremiah.

IV. Daniel in the Lions' Den (28–32)

Greatly outraged by what Daniel has done to their god, the Babylonians conspire and now turn against the monarch. The destruction of their god is for them a clear sign that the Gentile king has become a Jew. Threatening to kill the king, they demand that Daniel be delivered into their hands. The monarch is compelled to comply, and they throw Daniel into the lions' den. The Old Greek adds, not without irony, that the pit was intended for the king's conspirators, and that Daniel was thrown to the lions in order to deprive him of "the good fortune of a burial" (v. 32).

The accusation that the Gentile king has become a Jew is reminiscent of the story in 2 Macc 9:17, in which Antiochus Epiphanes promises to convert to Judaism, if the God of Israel cured him of his affliction (Jdt 14:10; Dan 4).

Bel and the Dragon has some obvious affinities with Daniel 6: both have as their central motif the lions' den; both are legends set at the court of a foreign monarch; in both stories the king's signet ring is instrumental (vv. 14 and 17); and both stories end with the death of the accusers and their families. Bel and the Dragon and Dan 6 have therefore been called 'variations' or 'duplicate narratives' of the same story, with Bel and the Dragon the more developed of the two narratives. But we should be careful not to exaggerate the similarities, nor do the parallels imply that one version developed out of the other. Neither story shows clear signs that it depends on the other.

V. The Prophet Habakkuk Feeds Daniel (33–42)

An angel appears to Habakkuk in Judea and tells him to take the food he has just prepared to Daniel in Babylon. When the prophet responds that he doesn't know the place, the angel transports him "by the hair of his head" (v. 36) straight to the lions' den (Ezek 8:3). The king arrives at the den on the seventh day, rejoices to find Daniel unharmed, pulls him out, and has the villains thrown into the den instead, who are devoured at once.

The Habakkuk scene begins abruptly and may well be an interpolation. Its main connection with Bel and the Dragon is the subject of food. There are more affinities with Daniel 6 here: Daniel's confession in v. 38, for example, that God has not forgotten him (Dan 6:22), and the reversal of fortunes in vv. 40–42 (Dan 6:24).

Bel and the Dragon concludes with the king's solemn acclamation of the uniqueness of Daniel's God, "You are great, O Lord, the God of Daniel, and there is no other beside you" (v. 41; Isa 45:3–5). Similar doxologies are found in the book of Daniel (Dan 2:47; 3:28–29; 4:34–37; 6:26–27). The story as a whole thus has the ending of a conversion story.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. J. Collins. Daniel. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); E. S. Gruen. Heritage and Hellenism (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998); C. A. Moore. Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: The Additions (New York: Doubleday, 1977); G. W. E. Nickelsburg. Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah. 2nd ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2005).

¹ Unless otherwise indicated by NRSV, the quotations from Bel and the Dragon are direct translations by the author. where Cyrus replaced an otherwise unknown "Darius the Mede" (Dan 5:31; 6:28).

1 MACCABEES

JOHN B. F. MILLER

OVERVIEW

First Maccabees is one of the most important primary sources for a fascinating period in Jewish history. It describes the Maccabean revolt and the initial stage of its aftermath: a brief period of Judean independence in an epoch otherwise marked by foreign rule under the Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, and finally the Romans. This is a text that helps one understand what Jews in the time of Jesus may have been hoping for in their expectations of the long-awaited Messiah. The freedom and autonomy enjoyed during this brief period of independence (142–63 BCE) loomed large in the historical memory of some Jews suffering under the yoke of Roman rule in the first century CE (see, for example, Josephus, J.W. 7.253–55).

The text receives its title from the nickname of one of its principal figures, Judas Maccabeus; similarly, Hasmoneus is mentioned by Josephus as an ancestor of Judas's father, Mattathias (Ant. 12.265). Thus, Maccabean and Hasmonean have come to be used as terms describing the family and political dynasty that lie at the center of 1 Maccabees even though neither adjective appears in the text itself. The precise meaning of "Maccabeus" remains a matter of debate; some have suggested that one possible meaning, "Hammer," is a descriptive reference to Judas's physical appearance or personality.

Focusing on the period from 169 BCE to 134 BCE, 1 Maccabees describes the following: a persecution of observant Jews during the reign of the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes; the response to that persecution, now known as the Maccabean revolt, under the leadership of a priest named Mattathias; the exploits of Mattathias's sons (especially Judas, Jonathan, and Simon) in an ongoing struggle with Seleucid rulers; the initial stages of a period of Judean independence under Mattathias's last surviving son, Simon; and the beginning of the reign of Simon's son, John Hyrcanus. There is general agreement among scholars that 1 Maccabees functions propagandistically as a pro-Hasmonean version of the period of history it describes.

First Maccabees was probably written shortly before or after the death of John Hyrcanus (104 BCE). Although scholars agree that the text was composed originally in Hebrew, the earliest extant version is in Greek. There are also texts bearing the titles 2, 3, and 4 Maccabees, but they do not share the same author. First Maccabees offers significant details concerning the early stages of the Maccabean revolt—events that figure prominently in Dan 7–12. The style of presentation bears strong similarities to biblical "histories" (e.g., 1–2 Samuel). Indeed, the author of 1 Maccabees frequently connects events described in the text with God's saving acts at earlier points in Israel's history. The absence of divine intervention and miracles in the text is, therefore, striking. Scholars have commented frequently on the writer's familiarity with the geography of the region; reading this text with a map at hand will illuminate the experience considerably.

OUTLINE

I. Persecution of Israel under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (1:1–64)

A. Alexander the Great and the Diadochi (1:1–9)

B. The Rise and Corruption of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (1:10–64)

II. Rebellion of Mattathias (2:1–70)

A. Mattathias Laments and Refuses to Acquiesce (2:1–27)

B. The Uprising (2:28–70)

III. Leadership of Judas Maccabeus (3:1–9:22)

A. Judas Defends Judea Against Retaliatory Attacks and Cleanses the Temple (3:1–4:61)

B. Judas Attacks Territories Outside of Judea and Brings Jews to Safety (5:1–68)

C. Death of Antiochus IV Epiphanes and Succession of Antiochus V Eupator (6:1–17)

D. Encounters at Beth-zur and Beth-zachariah (6:18–63)

E. Coup of Demetrius and New Internal Struggles Within Judea (7:1–50)

F. Fame of Rome and Judas's Alliance with the Romans (8:1–32)

G. Judas Dies in Battle Against Demetrius's Commander, Bacchides (9:1–22)

IV. Leadership of Jonathan (9:23–12:48)

A. Distress in Judea and the Selection of Jonathan (9:23–31)

B. Jonathan's Battle Against, and Eventual Treaty with, Bacchides (9:32–73)

C. Jonathan Exploits the Rivalry Between Demetrius and Alexander Epiphanes (10:1–66)

D. Demetrius II, Ptolemy's Shifting Alliance, and Jonathan's Alliance with Demetrius II (10:67–11:53)

E. Jonathan's Alliance with Antiochus VI Epiphanes and Battle Against the Forces of Demetrius II (11:54–74)

F. Jonathan Renews Earlier Alliances with Rome and Sparta (12:1–23)

G. The Ongoing Struggle with Demetrius II and Trypho's Deception (12:24–48)

V. Leadership of Simon (12:49–16:3)

A. Distress in Judea and Simon's Successful Bid for Power (12:49–13:9)

B. Simon Faces Off Against Trypho (13:10–24)

C. Simon Establishes a Memorial to Honor His Family (13:25–30)

D. Simon Renews Alliance with Demetrius II and Achieves Judean Independence (13:31–42)

E. Peace and Prosperity in the Reign of Simon (13:43–14:49)

F. Simon Encounters the Treachery of Antiochus VII Sidetes and Passes Leadership to His Son John (15:1–16:3)

VI. Leadership of John (Hyrcanus) (16:4–24)

A. John Repels the Advance of Antiochus's Commander, Cendebeus (16:4–10)

B. Murder of Simon (16:11–22)

C. Summary Conclusion (16:23–24)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Persecution of Israel under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (1:1–64)

A. Alexander the Great and the Diadochi (1:1–9)

1:1–4. Alexander Establishes His Kingdom. Alexander ascended to the Macedonian throne in 336 BCE. In just over twelve years, he amassed one of the largest empires the world had ever known; it extended from Macedonia and Greece to the western regions of India. Compared to other Jewish writers (e.g., Dan 7:7, 23), the author of 1 Maccabees describes Alexander in somewhat neutral terms. More severe judgment is reserved for Alexander's successors, who "caused many evils on the earth" (1:9).

1:5–9. Alexander Establishes Generals as His Successors and Dies. Alexander died young, lacking a legitimate heir. In this power vacuum, Alexander's generals (often referred to as the Diadochi, "successors") carved up his empire; he did not divide the empire among his generals, as 1:6 suggests. The two who took the most territory, and who were of greatest concern for the history of Judea, were Ptolemy and Seleucus. Ptolemy took Egypt; Seleucus took the eastern portion of Alexander's empire. Both Ptolemy and Seleucus had designs on the other's territory. Because it lay between these two kingdoms, Judea and the surrounding region was regarded by both as an important buffer zone and staging area from which to launch attacks on the other. During one such campaign, dating roughly from 200–198 BCE, Antiochus III (the Great) wrested control of Judea from the Ptolemaic kingdom. Judea then remained under Seleucid control until the events described in 1 Macc 13.

B. The Rise and Corruption of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (1:10–64)

1:10–15. Antiochus's Rise to Power and Collusion of "Renegades" in Israel. Time was designated in antiquity according to the reign of a particular ruler, or the number of years since a particular kingdom had been established. The "kingdom of the Greeks" (1:10) is a reference to the establishment of the Seleucid kingdom. Converting the dates given in 1 Maccabees into our own chronological standard is complicated by two factors. First, there are disagreements in the source material as to when precisely the "kingdom of the Greeks" began. Some suggest the equivalent of 312 BCE, others the equivalent of 311 BCE. Second, people in the eastern portion of the Seleucid kingdom observed the new year in spring, while those in the western portion observed it in autumn. The dates provided in the present discussion, therefore, should be read as commonly accepted approximations.

Antiochus IV usurped the Seleucid throne in 175 BCE, and had grand designs for expanding his kingdom. Helpful for this endeavor were pro-Hellenistic Judeans (i.e., Jews who were more concerned with assimilating into Hellenistic culture, and less concerned with observing Torah, which required a degree of separation from certain aspects of Hellenistic culture). 1 Maccabees 1:11 refers to such Jews as "renegades" (paranomoi literally means "one who acts contrary to the law"). The author does not dwell on the political machinations of these "renegades," whose exploits are described in 2 Macc 4–5.

1:16–19. Antiochus's Successful Military Incursion into Egypt. With Judea more securely allied to his cause, Antiochus launched a successful campaign into Egypt in 170 BCE. Antiochus's forces took much of lower Egypt, with the exception of Alexandria, and Antiochus briefly controlled this territory using his nephew, Ptolemy VI Philometor, as a puppet ruler.

1:20–40. Antiochus Robs the Temple of Jerusalem and Establishes the Citadel. Temple-robbing was a tempting endeavor for the successors of Alexander. It was a relatively quick, albeit dangerous, way to acquire funds. Antiochus's own father, Antiochus III, died attempting to rob a temple in 187 BCE.

Antiochus's forces fortified an area near the Temple and garrisoned "renegade" Jews there in 167 BCE (1:33–34). Referred to more than two dozen times in 1 Maccabees, this "citadel" became a lasting point of contention. Despite the many victories of Judas Maccabeus and his brothers, the citadel was held by Seleucid forces until 141 BCE (see 1 Macc 13:49–51). The exact location of the citadel continues to be a matter of debate.

1:41–64. Antiochus Attempts to Compel Jews to Forsake Their Religious Customs. According to 1 Maccabees, the final straw leading to the Maccabean revolt is an ever-intensifying environment of religious persecution. Although religious persecution is mentioned from time to time in Jewish Scripture (e.g., Esth 3–9), it was rare in the Hellenistic period. Tolerant polytheism was the general rule for the Macedonians. Josephus, for example, describes an edict from Antiochus III that granted Jews the freedom to observe their ancestral religion (Ant. 12.142). Oddly, 1 Maccabees ascribes no particular motivation for Antiochus IV to overturn such a decree, nor does it ascribe a significant motive for the persecution that ensues. Indeed, despite the straightforward manner in which 1 Maccabees presents a causal relationship between Antiochus's persecution and the Jewish revolt against that persecution, there are reasons to suspect a different sequence of events. Many scholars are more convinced that Antiochus's persecution was an attempt to restore order during a period of infighting between differing Jewish factions (see earlier comment on "renegades" in 1:10–15).

II. Rebellion of Mattathias (2:1–70)

A. Mattathias Laments and Refuses to Acquiesce (2:1–27)

2:1–14. Mattathias's Lament. The general tone of Mattathias's lament is similar to that found in a number of biblical passages. See, for example, the reference to the "destruction of my people" in Lam 2:11.

2:15–27. Mattathias's Initial Clash with the Officers of Antiochus. The explicit comparison drawn between Mattathias's and Phinehas's respective acts of zeal (see Num 25) invites a comparison of the more implicit similarities between the two. Both are of priestly lineage (Num 25:7; 1 Macc 2:1), and both kill an Israelite/Jew who is in collusion with worshipers of false gods (Num 25:8; 1 Macc 2:24–25). The implied connection pertains to the results of their zeal. Phinehas's act pleased the Lord so much that the Lord granted Phinehas a covenant of peace and perpetual priesthood (Num 25:11–13). Thus, the author of 1 Maccabees creates a sense of legitimacy for the way in which Mattathias's sons will ultimately be granted the position of high priest later in this narrative (see 1 Macc 10:20). Although 1 Maccabees is silent on the subject, there was significant Jewish opposition to the Maccabean high priesthood. Scholars have argued convincingly, for example, that it was a reaction against the high priesthood of Jonathan or Simon that led some Jews to establish a religious community at Qumran—a community that would be responsible ultimately for the Dead Sea Scrolls.

B. The Uprising (2:28–70)

2:28–41. Flight into the Wilderness and the Question of Fighting on the Sabbath. Even defending oneself was regarded by some Jews as profaning the Sabbath (cf. 2 Macc 6:11). The decision of Mattathias and his followers to defend themselves against attack even on the Sabbath is vindicated later in the narrative (see 1 Macc 9:43–49).

2:42–48. Mattathias and Hasideans Form an Army and Begin a Rebellion. The "Hasideans" are a group of pious Jews who initially join Mattathias's revolt. Some scholars have argued that this was a sect within Judaism that would eventually become known as the Pharisees.

2:49–70. Testament of Mattathias. The testament of a patriarchal figure on the verge of death is common (see, for example, Gen 49). The individuals selected in Mattathias's final exhortation are remarkable primarily for their willingness to keep the commandments of the Lord even in the face of death.

III. Leadership of Judas Maccabeus (3:1–9:22)

A. Judas Defends Judea Against Retaliatory Attacks and Cleanses the Temple (3:1–4:61)

3:1–9. Heroic Depiction of Judas. In these verses Judas takes on an almost mythical dimension. Note, for example, the term giant, which is used of the Nephilim in LXX Gen 6:4, and of the Anakim (i.e., the "giants" in the promised land) in LXX Num 13:33. This poem also contains other biblical allusions, including the turning away of God's "anger from Israel" in v. 8. The same language is used in Num 25:4, introducing the story of Phinehas's zeal (see comment above on 2:15–27).

3:10–4:35. Judas Secures Judea. The author of 1 Maccabees never uses the words "God" or "Lord" to refer to the God of Israel, but instead prefers the more reverent circumlocution "Heaven" (see 1 Macc 3:18, 19, 50, 60,; 4:10, 24, :40, 55; 5:31; 9:46; 12:15; 16:3). This is very similar to the language found in the Gospel of Matthew (e.g., "kingdom of heaven," Matt 5:3 and passim).

One finds the author's first extended depiction of a cultic ritual sandwiched between accounts of Judas battling Apollonius, Seron, Gorgias, and Lysias (1 Macc 3:42–53). Since the Temple has been profaned, Judas and his followers go to Mizpah to entreat the help of "Heaven." This passage is an unmistakable allusion to 1 Sam 7, which describes the Israelites at Mizpah before they engaged the Philistines in battle. Language of the "sanctuary" being "trampled" is allusive as well: Isa 63:18 makes a similar reference to the Temple in an entreaty for the Lord to avenge Israel against its enemies. It is important to notice both that Judas and his followers are invoking God's assistance, and that the depiction of this invocation draws heavily on earlier accounts of God's saving acts in the history of Israel.

4:36–61. Judas Cleanses the Temple and Dedicates the New Altar. The peculiar reference to a "prophet" who might come "to tell what to do with" the profaned altar stones alludes to references in Deut 18:15, 18 of God raising up a prophet like Moses. A similar reference is made in 1 Macc 14:41 as part of the author's attempt to legitimize the Maccabean high priesthood (see also the comment above on 2:15–27).

The narrative presents the celebration of dedication taking place three years to the day (25 Chislev 167–25 Chislev 164) after the Gentiles profaned the altar by offering sacrifice on it (1 Macc 1:54–59; 4:52–54). The dedication of this new altar in the Temple is to be celebrated for eight days each year. This marks the inception of the Jewish festival of Hanukkah.

B. Judas Attacks Territories Outside of Judea and Brings Jews to Safety (5:1–68)

This portion of the narrative makes explicit what has been a pervasive implication in 1 Macc 2–4: Mattathias and his sons are specially designated to bring deliverance to Israel (see comment above on 2:15–27 and compare 5:61–62). It is because they do not share this familial distinction that Joseph and Azariah are said to be defeated in battle (5:60–61). Furthermore, the narrative clearly indicates that Judas is not merely fighting for the sake of territory, but to cleanse the land of pagan worship (see, for example, 5:44, 68; cf. the similar actions of Mattathias in 2:45, and see Exod 34:13 and Deut 7:5).

C. Death of Antiochus IV Epiphanes and Succession of Antiochus V Eupator (6:1–17)

The claim that Antiochus's death was a direct result of his disappointment and worry over the wrongs he did to the Jews (6:8–13) is a tendentious fabrication. The historian Polybius states that Antiochus IV was repelled in his attempt to rob the temple of Artemis in Elymais. Antiochus retreated and died at Tabae in Persia. Interestingly, people of that region also claimed that Antiochus was struck down by a divinity, only they claimed it was Artemis (Histories 31.9).

Antiochus V Eupator was still a young boy at the time of succession. Real power lay in the hands of his guardian, Lysias.

D. Encounters at Beth-zur and Beth-zechariah (6:18–63)

6:18–27. Judas Assails the Citadel, and the Besieged Appeal to Antiochus V Eupator. As one reads about Mattathias's and Judas's military feats within Judea in the early chapters of 1 Maccabees, it can be easy to forget about the citadel near the Temple in Jerusalem and the Seleucid forces and renegade Jews who continue to occupy it. Brief references in the text, however, indicate it was a perpetual source of danger (1 Macc 1:33, 36; 3:45; 4:2, 41; 6:18, 20, 24, 26, 32; 9:52–53; 10:6–7, 9, 32; 11:20–21, 41; 12:36; 13:21).

6:28–46. Battles at Beth-zur and Beth-zechariah, and the Death of Eleazar. Aside from being noted as sons of Mattathias in 2:2–5, Eleazar and John are mentioned only in their respective deaths (6:45–46 and 9:36). Despite the fact that his sacrifice did not bear the fruit he had hoped, Eleazar is depicted as one who gave his life "to save his people" (6:44); similar language of "saving Israel" is used to describe Judas after his death in 9:21.

6:47–63. Lysias Routs the Forces of Judas, but then Persuades Antiochus V Eupator to Return to Antioch. The rescue of fellow Jews described in 1 Macc 5 now threatens the safety of Judas and his followers in Judea. Lysias's siege being executed during a sabbatical year for the Judean farmlands, combined with the significant influx of refugees, creates a food shortage. For a brief moment, the Maccabean revolt seems to be in grave jeopardy. The circumstances described in 6:47–61, however, presage events that will lead ultimately to Judean independence. Despite the advantage of superior numbers and the very real potential to crush Judas and his followers, Lysias must counsel Eupator to make terms quickly so that they can turn their attention to internal political threats within the Seleucid government at Antioch. Through various savvy political alliances with competitors for the Seleucid throne, Jonathan and Simon will win eventual autonomy for Judea (see 11:30–37 and 13:31–53).

E. Coup of Demetrius and New Internal Struggles Within Judea (7:1–50)

7:1–20. Demetrius Usurps Seleucid Throne and Appoints Alcimus as High Priest. This passage marks the first time the author of 1 Maccabees addresses the significance of Seleucid appointments to the high priesthood. The position of high priest was paramount from the time of the Persian empire to the Seleucid reign: during this period of occupation and foreign rule, the high priest in Jerusalem was both the highest religious authority and highest civic authority in the area (see, for example, 1 Macc 7:20).

The author of 1 Maccabees, who only rarely offers direct quotations or paraphrases of Jewish Scripture, suggests in vv. 16–17 that the actions of Alcimus were "in accordance with" the words of Ps 79:2–3. Not surprisingly, this psalm invokes God's wrath on those who have harmed Israel.

7:21–50. Judas Exacts Vengeance on Alcimus and Defeats Nicanor. When Demetrius sends Nicanor to exact retribution for the expulsion of Alcimus, both the Temple priests (7:36–37; cf. 1 Kgs 8:20 and Isa 56:7) and Judas (7:41–42; cf. 2 Kgs 19:35) offer invective prayers reminiscent of those in earlier Jewish Scripture entreating God's help in battle.

F. Fame of Rome and Judas's Alliance with the Romans (8:1–32)

The narrative space devoted to an overwhelmingly positive depiction of Rome (8:1–16), and Judas's subsequent success creating an alliance with this western power (8:17–32), strikes a note of tragic irony; in 63 BCE, it will be the Romans who bring an end to the Judean independence that 1 Maccabees celebrates.

G. Judas Dies in Battle Against Demetrius's Commander, Bacchides (9:1–22)

First Maccabees 9:22 offers a striking play on statements found in 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles. In those texts, it is customary to conclude the description of a figure with a statement about where the rest of the individual's deeds are recorded (see, for example, 2 Kgs 14:18; 15:11, 15, 21, 26; 20:20; 24:5; and 2 Chr 13:22; 25:26; 32:32). Instead, the author of 1 Maccabees states that other deeds of Judas "were not recorded because they were so numerous" (author's trans.).

IV. Leadership of Jonathan (9:23–12:48)

A. Distress in Judea and the Selection of Jonathan (9:23–31)

As problems of famine continue (see comment above on 6:47–63), the situation in Judea turns from bad to worse in the absence of Judas's leadership. "Renegades" (see comment on 1:10–15 above) are once again powerful and "the country went over to their side" (9:24), a shift the author attributes to the famine rather than to a lack of faith. "Since the time that prophets ceased to appear among them" (9:27) refers to the belief that Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi were the last of the prophets.

B. Jonathan's Battle Against, and Eventual Treaty with, Bacchides (9:32–73)

In 159 BCE, Alcimus attempts to remove the wall separating the inner court of the sanctuary. Precisely what this means is unclear and remains a subject of debate. In any case, he is prevented from completing this outrage by a paralyzing illness. The narrative does not state that God struck Alcimus down, but such is implied.

Following the failed plot of the "renegades," described in 1 Macc 9:58–69, Jonathan is able to create a treaty with the retreating Bacchides—a treaty that leads to five years of peace for Jonathan and his forces in Judea. This marks the first of several treaties or alliances that Jonathan will create during his period of leadership.

C. Jonathan Exploits the Rivalry Between Demetrius and Alexander Epiphanes (10:1–66)

10:1–47. Respective Offers of Alexander Epiphanes and Demetrius. In 152 BCE, another claimant to the Seleucid throne, Alexander Epiphanes (referred to in other sources as Alexander I Balas), son of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, challenged the rule of Demetrius. In return for Jonathan's loyalty, Alexander offers Jonathan the office of high priest, which Jonathan accepts. (On the significance of this position in terms of both religious and civic authority, see earlier comment on 7:1–20.) Wanting the help of Judea, Demetrius makes an even more elaborate offer. Jonathan does not trust Demetrius (10:46), but the terms of his offered alliance (10:27–45) illuminate the Judeans' situation under Seleucid rule. Very high taxes on produce (10:30), other taxes and tributes (10:29–33), and confiscation of personal property (10:43) were regular burdens on the Judeans.

10:48–66. Jonathan Honored by Alexander Epiphanes. Although the benefits bestowed on Jonathan by Alexander will be challenged soon enough, this event marks a significant step in the road to Judean independence: Jonathan is made a "Friend" of the king and a legitimate "governor" of his province (10:65).

D. Demetrius II, Ptolemy's Shifting Alliance, and Jonathan's Alliance with Demetrius II (10:67–11:53)

The same nephew, Ptolemy VI Philometor, through whom Antiochus IV Epiphanes briefly ruled parts of Egypt (see comment above on 1:16–19) now attempts to gain control over Seleucid territory by repudiating his alliance with Alexander Epiphanes in favor of one with Demetrius II (11:8–18).

Jonathan's tenuous alliance with Demetrius II is tested quickly, when Demetrius requests Judean troops. Although the numbers in 11:47 are surely hyperbolic, the loyalty, valor, and military might of these troops in 11:47–51 is juxtaposed with Demetrius's refusal to honor his agreement with Jonathan.

E. Jonathan's Alliance with Antiochus VI Epiphanes and Battle Against the Forces of Demetrius II (11:54–74)

The alliance offered by Trypho through Antiochus VI (11:57–59) around 145 BCE expands the territory under Maccabean control significantly. The outlying areas of this territory must be taken with force, however, as indicated by Jonathan's battles in Gaza and the plain of Hazor. Although the description of Jonathan's prayer (11:71) is more perfunctory than that found in earlier passages like 3:50–53, it nevertheless includes God in the focus of this military success.

F. Jonathan Renews Earlier Alliances with Rome and Sparta (12:1–23)

Although the narrative describes alliances with both Rome (cf. 1 Macc 8) and Sparta, the latter is far more intriguing. Scholars disagree on the veracity of this material. Some argue that the letter from Arius (12:7) is a complete fabrication, while others attempt to demonstrate the plausibility of some communication between King Areus I of Sparta (309–265 BCE) and either Onias I or Onias II.

G. The Ongoing Struggle with Demetrius II and Trypho's Deception (12:24–48)

As Jonathan and Simon continue the struggle to maintain their territory, Jonathan succumbs to the treachery of Trypho in approximately 143 BCE.

V. Leadership of Simon (12:49–16:3)

A. Distress in Judea and Simon's Successful Bid for Power (12:49–13:9)

The transition of leadership from Jonathan to Simon parallels that from Judas to Jonathan (cf. 1 Macc 9:23–27). As the people mourn the loss of a great leader, enemies inside and outside of Judea seek to take advantage of their dire circumstances. The people's reply, "all that you say to us we will do" (13:9), echoes the people's response to Moses in the recounting of the Sinai theophany in Deut 5:27. The connection between Simon and Moses will become even more explicit later in the narrative, when it is determined that Simon should hold both civic and religious authority over the independent state of Judea, "until a trustworthy prophet should arise" (14:41; cf. Deut 18:15, "The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among your own people").

B. Simon Faces Off Against Trypho (13:10–24)

Simon is portrayed as a very shrewd political figure, navigating a delicate situation with an enemy he cannot trust (13:17) and with his own people, who may turn on him (13:17–18).

C. Simon Establishes a Memorial to Honor His Family (13:25–30)

Simon's lavish memorial honoring his family presages the independence to be described shortly in the narrative. Such memorials were common in antiquity, both as a means to honor individuals and as a means to commemorate military victories.

D. Simon Renews Alliance with Demetrius II and Achieves Judean Independence (13:31–42)

In 142 BCE, Simon was able to obtain freedom from taxation and tribute to the Seleucids. For the first time since the Babylonian exile, Judea experiences true independence: "the yoke of the Gentiles was removed from Israel" (13:41).

E. Peace and Prosperity in the Reign of Simon (13:43–14:49)

13:43–53. Simon Takes Gazara and the Citadel. Gazara is mentioned less frequently than the citadel in the narrative of 1 Maccabees, and the problems surrounding it are described less clearly. A careful look at passages like 4:15–16 and 9:52, however, reveals the city's importance. It is described as the point at which Judas's pursuit of his enemies must cease, and as one of the cities fortified by Bacchides to "harass" Israel.

The citadel had been a threat in Jerusalem from the days of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Its final capture and cleansing are celebrated, understandably, with great joy.

14:1–49. Repeated Descriptions of Simon's Accomplishments. From the perspective of the author, Simon's reign marks the golden years of this new period of independence. The effect of repeating Simon's accomplishments and hard-won popularity in the statements of alliance renewal from Sparta and Rome is to emphasize Simon's significance dramatically.

The depiction of life in Judea during Simon's reign is filled with possible scriptural allusions. Some scholars argue that the author of 1 Maccabees is describing something akin to a messianic age. In the mention of the land giving forth its produce in 14:8, for example, one may find an allusion to the eschatological language of Zech 8:12. On the other hand, one could suggest that it is an allusion to Lev 26:4, a passage portraying the benefits that will come to Israel when it keeps God's statutes and commandments (Lev 26:3; cf. 1 Macc 2:27, 64). Other verses in 1 Macc 14 allude more clearly to biblical passages describing times of peace and prosperity (cf., for example, 1 Macc 14:12 and 1 Kgs 4:25).

F. Simon Encounters the Treachery of Antiochus VII Sidetes and Passes Leadership to His Son John (15:1–16:3)

In a way that closely parallels the tenuous alliance between Demetrius II and Jonathan (11:24–53), Antiochus VII initially confirms his alliance with Simon, only to become "estranged" from him (15:27).

VI. Leadership of John (Hyrcanus) (16:4–24)

A. John Repels the Advance of Antiochus's Commander, Cendebeus (16:4–10)

John's pursuit of Cendebeus to Kedron, approximately twenty miles southwest of Modein, again suggests the difficulty of controlling the territory surrounding Judea.

B. Murder of Simon (16:11–22)

Ptolemy is Simon's son-in-law. The author of 1 Maccabees glosses over the aftermath of the assassination, a grizzly affair in which John was prevented from exacting revenge on Ptolemy because the latter held John's mother hostage. According to Josephus, Ptolemy eventually escaped after killing John's mother; John was too busy dealing with another siege being executed by Antiochus VII to pursue him (Ant. 13.230–237).

C. Summary Conclusion (16:23–24)

As noted by many scholars, the summary statement contained in the last two verses suggests that the narrative of 1 Maccabees was written near the end of John's life, or shortly after his death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

H. Attridge. "Historiography." Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus. M. Stone, ed. CRINT 2 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984). B. Bar-Kochva. Judas Maccabaeus: The Jewish Struggle Against the Seleucids (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); J. Bartlett. 1 Maccabees. Guides to Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); E. Bickerman. The God of the Maccabees: Studies on the Meaning and Origin of the Maccabean Revolt. Translated by H. Moehring. SJLA 32 (Leiden: Brill, 1979); J. Goldstein. 1 Maccabees. AB 41 (Garden City: Doubleday, 1976); L. Grabbe. Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian. Volume One: The Persian and Greek Periods (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); D. Harrington. The Maccabean Revolt: Anatomy of a Biblical Revolution. OTS 1 (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1988); M. Hengel. Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period. J. Bowden, trans. (London: SCM, 1974); D. Mendels The Land of Israel as a Political Concept in Hasmonean Literature: Recourse to History in Second Century B.C. Claims to the Holy Land. TSAJ 15 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1987); P. Schäfer. "The Hellenistic and Maccabean Periods." Israelite and Judaeon History. J. H. Hayes and J. M. Miller, eds. (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1977); V. Tcherikover. Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews. S. Applebaum, trans. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1959. Repr., Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1999); S. Tedesche and S. Zeitlin. The First Book of Maccabees. JAL (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1950).

2 MACCABEES

SHANE BERG

OVERVIEW

Second Maccabees provides an account of the military successes of Judas Maccabeus in the mid-second century BCE against the forces of the Seleucid kingdom, to whom Judea was subject. It also relates some of the events that led up to the outbreak of the fighting. The book is characterized by a strong theological outlook, especially in comparison with 1 Maccabees. The God of Israel is portrayed as actively working in and through the events and people described to reward faithful obedience to the covenant and punish those who act wickedly. On occasion God even sends angelic beings who mete out punishment to evildoers or bring timely aid to the faithful.

God's defense of the integrity of the Temple is a prominent theme in 2 Maccabees. Attacks on the Temple are featured in three key episodes in the book, and in each case God intervenes to ward off the threat or, in the case of the sacrileges of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, to bring about restoration after defilement. The purification of the Temple by Judas Maccabeus in 164 BCE gives rise to the annual eight-day Hanukkah commemoration. One of the primary rhetorical goals of the author of 2 Maccabees is to legitimate the festival of Hanukkah and recommend its observance by Jews in the Diaspora.

The author explains at the outset that his book represents an abridgement of a five-volume history by a certain Jason of Cyrene (a city in North Africa). Second Maccabees was written in Greek, and most likely the history of Jason of Cyrene was also a Greek work. This longer historical work is not extant, so it is difficult to assess its nature and purpose, especially since the author of 2 Maccabees acknowledges that he has added his own literary and rhetorical embellishment to the details he culls from Jason's history (2:29).

It is not possible to fix the date of 2 Maccabees precisely. Jason of Cyrene must have composed his historical work after 161 BCE, the year of the latest events described in 2 Maccabees. The book opens with two letters addressed to Jews living in Egypt; it is not clear whether these letters were included by the author or added by a later hand to the completed work. The first of the letters prefixed to Second Maccabees is dated 124 BCE (1:9), and it is likely, though not certain, that the entire work was completed at that point. 2 Maccabees was thus most likely written between 161–124 BCE.

First and Second Maccabees recount many of the same events, though it does not appear that either one was a source for the other. Despite their overlapping content (2 Maccabees covers roughly the same time period as 1 Macc 1–7), 1 and 2 Maccabees differ in key ways. First Maccabees covers a longer span of time and covers events related to several members of the Maccabeus family, while 2

Maccabees is focused on a relatively short stretch of time and is concerned with the deeds of Judas Maccabeus alone. Another important difference is the view of history in the two books. First Maccabees conforms in many ways to the principles of causality typical of Hellenistic historiography, while 2 Maccabees exhibits a more explicitly religious view of causality in which history is regarded as the working out of divine punishment and reward.

OUTLINE

I. Preliminary Material (1:1–2:32)

A. A Letter to the Jews of Egypt (1:1–9)

B. A Letter to Aristobulus and the Jews of Egypt (1:10–2:18)

C. The Author's Prologue (2:19–32)

II. Events Leading up to the Maccabean Revolt (3:1–7:42)

A. A Thwarted Attempt to Rob the Temple (3:1–4:6)

B. The Hellenistic Program of Jason (4:7–22)

C. The Crimes of Menelaus (4:23–50)

D. The Desecration and Pillage of the Temple by Antiochus IV (5:1–27)

E. Persecution of the Jews Under Antiochus IV (6:1–7:42)

III. The Wars of Judas Maccabeus Against the Seleucids (8:1–15:36)

A. The Campaigns of Judas Against the Forces of Antiochus IV (8:1–9:29)

B. The Purification of the Temple (10:1–9)

C. The Campaigns of Judas Against the Forces of Antiochus V (10:10–13:26)

D. Nicanor's Treachery and the Campaign of Judas Against Nicanor (14:1–15:36)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Preliminary Material (1:1–2:32)

A. A Letter to the Jews of Egypt (1:1–9)

This first prefixed letter is brief and conforms to typical epistolary conventions. It is dated 124 BCE, and refers to a previous letter sent in 143 BCE in the tumultuous period that followed on Jason's usurpation of the office of high priest (1:7–8; see 4:7–29, 5:1–14). In the letter the "Jews in Jerusalem" exhort "their Jewish kindred in Egypt" (1:1) to observe the festival of Hanukkah (1:9).

B. A Letter to Aristobulus and the Jews of Egypt (1:10–2:18)

This second prefixed letter is much longer than the first and purports to be written by the "people of Jerusalem and Judea and the senate and Judas" just prior to the first celebration of Hanukkah in 164 BCE (1:10, 18). This claim is uncorroborated by any other independent evidence, however, and the letter is more likely to be dated to the decades following the purification of the Temple in 164 BCE. In addition to the "Jews of Egypt," the letter is addressed to Aristobulus, who is described as a teacher of King Ptolemy (1:10). Aristobulus is a Jewish philosopher of the second century BCE from Alexandria known from several ancient sources, but the claim that was a teacher of Ptolemy is not attested outside 2 Maccabees.

The author of the letter seeks to highlight historical precedents for the festival of Hanukkah, which would seem to indicate that there was some dispute at this time concerning its inclusion in the Jewish festal calendar. The somewhat long and meandering series of episodes from Israel's past recounted in 1:19–2:15 are intended to legitimate two central aspects of the Hanukkah celebration—its eight-day length and the lighting of the menorah. In order to demonstrate that the fire of the Hanukkah lamps is an appropriate symbol for the purification of the Temple, the author recounts several stories—most of them not attested anywhere else—associated with what he calls the "festival of the Fire" (1:18). This otherwise unknown festival commemorates Nehemiah's purification of the slabs that would become the altar in the Second Temple. This task was accomplished by means of a fire fueled by a thick liquid that was the residue of the fire from the altar of the First Temple, which had been hidden by the priests in advance of the Babylonian invasion (1:19–36). The examples of sacrifices being consumed on the altar by heavenly fire in the times of Moses, Solomon, and Nehemiah are offered as further justification for the propriety of the symbolic purifying light of the Hanukkah festival (2:9–13).

The author also attempts to legitimate the length of Hanukkah—eight days—by suggesting that Moses, Solomon, and Nehemiah observed eight days of purification and sacrifices after erecting their respective temples (2:11–13). The point of all these vignettes is that the Jews of Egypt should observe Hanukkah (2:16–17) because its symbolism is grounded in the precedents of Moses, Solomon, and Nehemiah, who each purified the sacred altar with fire for eight days.

C. The Author's Prologue (2:19–32)

The author claims that the five- volume history of Jason of Cyrene that he has condensed treated the wars of Judas Maccabeus against Antiochus IV and V and Judas' purification of the Temple (2:19–23). This statement would seem to suggest that Jason's historical account was limited to the same time period and range of topics presented in 2 Maccabees. The alternative is that Jason's historical account was a broader work, an excerpt of which was epitomized by the author of 2 Maccabees. If indeed Jason's history was limited to the time and events covered by 2 Maccabees, then his five- volume work must have been characterized by staggering detail.

The author states that his purpose in condensing Jason's history is to make for a more enjoyable experience for the reader, to facilitate the memorization of the text, and to reach a broader readership (2:24–25). In an artful characterization of his abridgement of Jason's history, he compares Jason to the builder of a house while he likens himself to one who merely paints and adorns it (2:29). A similarly self-deprecating rhetorical flourish is found at the very end of the work (15:38–39).

II. Events Leading up to the Maccabean Revolt (3:1–7:42)

A. A Thwarted Attempt to Rob the Temple (3:1–4:6)

This account of a successfully defended assault on the Temple sets the stage for the rest of the narrative by emphasizing God's willingness to intervene in human affairs to protect the holy site. During the high priesthood of Onias III, whom the author presents as exemplary in every way, a disgruntled Temple official named Simon falsely reports to the provincial governor, Apollonius, that incredible sums of money had been deposited in the Temple that could easily be confiscated (3:4–6). Simon appears to have wished to cause trouble for Onias III, who had denied him an appointment to a desired post.

Apollonius takes the bait and informs the king, Seleucus IV, who dispatches a high-ranking aide, Heliodorus, to make his way to Jerusalem and procure the Temple deposits (3:7–8). Though upon his arrival in Jerusalem Heliodorus discovers that the amount of money held in the Temple fell far short of what Simon had claimed, Heliodorus decides that he must take it nonetheless to satisfy the king (3:9–14). Despite the fevered prayers of the residents of Jerusalem (3:14–22), Heliodorus makes his way to the Temple treasury. In what is probably a conflation of two stories, Heliodorus is run down by a divinely sent war horse ridden by an angelic armor-clad warrior who is seen by all present (3:25), and then he is beaten by two young angels who seem to be visible only to him (3:26). Heliodorus is rendered paralyzed and mute by his encounter, and he and his retinue recognize the "sovereign power of God" (3:28; cf. 3:24, "Sovereign of spirits"). Onias III prays for Heliodorus, who recovers and makes vows and sacrifices to the God of Israel and bears witness to all concerning what happened to him (3:31–36). This episode foreshadows one of the central themes of 2 Maccabees—that those who attack God's Temple will suffer divine retribution.

B. The Hellenistic Program of Jason (4:7–22)

Jason, the brother of Onias III, took advantage of the accession of a new king, Antiochus IV, to secure the high priestly office that belonged to his brother by offering a considerable sum of money to Antiochus (4:7–9). Though commentators often refer to this payment as a bribe, bidding for important offices was in fact a fairly standard practice in Hellenistic kingdoms.

Jason secured the right to establish a gymnasion and an ephebeion, key social institutions in Greek cities that provide a public place for exercise and socializing (the gymnasion) and a formal course of training in Greek culture for adolescents (the ephebeion). He also requested that the residents of Jerusalem be enrolled as citizens of the city of Antioch (4:9–10; cf. 1 Macc 1:11–15).

The author of 2 Maccabees presents Jason's actions as an assault on the Jewish way of life under God's Torah for which he will be divinely punished (4:11–17). But Jason's actions are quite comprehensible in light of the general tendency in the Hellenistic age for citizens of small or remote cities to attempt to elevate their status by formally adopting the institutions and customs of more cosmopolitan Greek cities. Scholars tend to take as historically accurate the state of affairs in Judea presented by the author of 2 Maccabees—namely, that a Torah-observant populace was forced to adopt a foreign culture by a few radical advocates of "Hellenism." This simplistic historical portrait, however, can and should be subjected to critical scrutiny. It is more judicious to assert that in this era there was a "culture war" raging between those who wanted to advance Judea's standing in the Seleucid kingdom by adopting cosmopolitan institutions and customs and those who wanted to reject such cultural changes and instead adopt Torah as the governing charter for Judea. The populace of Judea was caught in between these zealous parties with robust agendas.

C. The Crimes of Menelaus (4:23–50)

In 172 BCE Menelaus, the brother of Simon (see 3:4–12, 4:1–6), outbid Jason for the high priesthood and drove his supplanted rival into exile in Ammon (4:23–29). Menelaus and his brother Lysimachus turn out to be cruel and greedy. Menelaus, for example, sells off precious Temple objects in order to pay off the tribute he owes to the king and then arranges for Onias to be murdered when he exposes this vile act (4:30–38). Menelaus and Lysimachus, according to our author, gained a notorious and widespread reputation for theft, murder, and all sorts of other evil deeds.

It is important to note that unlike the description of Jason's tenure as high priest, no mention is made of "Hellenizing" on the part of Menelaus, a distinction that scholars sometimes fail to make. Menelaus and Lysimachus are presented as simply resorting to violence and deceit to satisfy their greed, not as implementing some Hellenistic cultural agenda.

D. The Desecration and Pillage of the Temple by Antiochus IV (5:1–27)

When Antiochus IV is away preparing for a second invasion of Egypt (presumably in 169 BCE; according to 1 Macc 1:16–28, this second invasion took place in 168 BCE), Jason gathers some forces and attempts to drive Menelaus from Jerusalem (5:1–5). Menelaus retreats to the citadel, however, and Jason engages in reckless slaughter of the residents of Jerusalem (5:6). Jason eventually flees into exile and dies unmourned and unburied abroad, which the author considers a fitting punishment for his crimes (5:10).

This fighting in Jerusalem leads Antiochus to fear that Judea is in revolt, so he breaks from his preparations for invading Egypt and leads his troops into Jerusalem, where they engage in the indiscriminate slaughter of thousands of inhabitants (5:11–14; the author's figure of 80,000 slain or enslaved is certainly grossly exaggerated). Despite the magnitude of the carnage, the author counts Antiochus' entry into the forbidden areas of the Temple and his plundering of the holy vessels and Temple deposits as even greater crimes (5:15–16; cf. 1 Macc 1:21–24). In the wake of this desecration and plundering, Antiochus leaves deputies in charge at Jerusalem and Samaria who continue to persecute and murder the inhabitants (5:21–26; cf. 1 Macc 1:29–40).

The author's theology of divine retribution is prominent in the description of Antiochus' crime against the Jewish people and the Temple. Antiochus, overwhelmed by glee, fails to perceive that his success was not of his own doing but rather brought about by God in order to punish the sins of the Jerusalemites (5:17–18). This state of punishment is not permanent, however, and the Temple will be restored when God again exercises mercy toward the people (5:19–20). The Temple's restoration, and Antiochus' well-deserved downfall, are foreshadowed by the brief mention that Judas Maccabeus and a few compatriots escaped the onslaught and made their way up into the remote parts of the hill country (5:27).

E. Persecution of the Jews Under Antiochus IV (6:1–7:42)

Not long after his brutal siege of Jerusalem, Antiochus IV takes steps to alter the Temple worship of both the Samaritans at Gerizim and the Jews at Jerusalem (167 BCE). Both were renamed in honor of Zeus, and new ritual activities like sacred prostitution were introduced and existing customs such as Sabbath observance and the celebration of traditional festivals were forbidden (6:1–11; cf. 1 Macc 1:41–64; Dan 11:31). While conflation of Greek and indigenous religious practices was common in Hellenistic kingdoms, Antiochus IV seems to have been particularly aggressive and confrontational in these policies, and the author of 2 Maccabees regards them as almost unspeakably evil.

The suffering of the Jews that resulted from the compulsion to participate in pagan rituals and the prohibition of their traditional practices is explained by the author in terms of the logic of divine retribution. That the Jews are suffering, according to the author, is in fact a sign of God's favor; that God punishes the Jews immediately for their transgressions curbs further sinfulness and thus prevents a catastrophic future punishment such as the Gentiles will receive for the accumulated mass of their evil deeds (6:12–17).

This rationalization of the suffering of the Jews is necessary to mitigate the impact of the two gruesome scenes of martyrdom that immediately follow it. Both accounts seem to be independent tales that have been incorporated into the present work. The first is the story of Eleazar, an elderly and venerable scribe who refused the order to eat a piece of pork (6:18–21), for which he was tortured and killed on the rack (6:29–30). He steadfastly refused an offer, made in light of his stature and dignity, to substitute a piece of kosher meat and so only feign to eat pork (6:21–22). He refuses this accommodation, expressing his concern that the young Jews who see it will be disheartened by seeing an old man adopt a foreign religion, and so he chooses a noble death in order to remain faithful to God's laws to the very end (6:23–28; Eleazar's martyrdom is related in greater length in 4 Macc 5–7).

The second martyrdom tale relates the torture and execution of seven brothers and their mother, a longer account of which is found in 4 Maccabees 8–18). This story, which has been famous in both the Jewish and Christian traditions since antiquity, unfolds in a most grizzly fashion. Like Eleazar, this entire family is compelled by Antiochus to eat pork (7:1). The brothers refuse, professing loyalty to the laws of their ancestors, and each in turn is cruelly dismembered and roasted alive on a pan over an open fire (7:3–39). The mother encourages each boy to face death courageously, and finally is killed herself (7:41). One of the distinctive features of this tale is the prominence of the hope in bodily resurrection as a reward for faithful to God's laws (7:9, 11, 14, 23, 29). There are also several references to God's retribution for evildoers (7:14, 17, 19, 31–36), a theme that grows ever more prominent as the narrative of 2 Maccabees proceeds.

III. The Wars of Judas Maccabeus Against the Seleucids (8:1–15:36)

A. The Campaigns of Judas Against the Forces of Antiochus IV (8:1–9:29)

Having established the dire situation for Jews under Antiochus IV, the stage is set for the military actions of Judas Maccabeus, whose exploits are the focal point for the rest of 2 Maccabees. The rise of Judas is associated by the author as a major turning point in the narrative in which God's wrath gives way to mercy in the form of divine aid to Judas' cause. Judas is portrayed as God's chosen deliverer who is faithful to God in every way (8:16–24, 36), and 6,000 loyal soldiers are represented as the models of courage, piety, and compassion (8:1–4, 12–14, 24–29).

One of the difficulties of interpreting 2 Maccabees is assessing the historical accuracy of the stark contrast set up by the author between the noble and courageous Judas and the depraved Seleucid officials and their lackeys. It makes little sense for a ruling overlord like Antiochus IV to harass a subject people with such cruelty and wanton abandon, and it seems hard to believe that Judas' motives were as disinterested as they are represented here. The Maccabees won this contest, and the histories that we have in 1 and 2 Maccabees are written from the victor's perspective. It is probably much more plausible to imagine that Judas and his followers were a theocratic faction whose rhetoric about absolute fidelity to "ancestral traditions" was an agenda they were pursuing rather than a description of "facts on the ground" in Judea at the time. This theocratic party opposed the cosmopolitan agenda of individuals like Jason, and they were willing to fight for their vision of Judea under no law but God's.

Judas and his small fighting band of 6,000 square off against the Seleucid general Nicanor and his 20,000 troops and rout them in short order (8:24–29; cf. 1 Macc 4:13–25), and soon thereafter win surprising victories over other forces (killing 20,000 in the process) under the control of Timothy and Bacchides, both Seleucid commanders (8:30–34; cf. 1 Macc 5:6–7 and 7:8–25).

Turning from these various conquests, the narrative shifts to Antiochus IV, who, while carrying out a humiliating retreat from an unsuccessful campaign in Persia, decides to find a vent for his rage by turning Jerusalem into a "cemetery for the Jews" (9:1–4, author's trans.). On his way to Jerusalem, however, he is stricken with a series of gruesome maladies and injuries that bring him to his deathbed, all of which the author attributes to God's righteous punishment of Antiochus for his arrogance and wickedness (9:5–10). Being at death's door humbles Antiochus, who even attempts to forestall God's wrath by promising to lavish the Jews with privileges, honors, and gifts, and even to become a Jew himself (9:11–17).

When this attempt to win God's favor fails, Antiochus resigns himself to death and writes a letter to the Jews (9:18), the text of which is given by our author (9:19–27). The content of the letter, however, does not seem to match the narrative description that leads up to it. Antiochus refers to his illness as "annoying," and states that recovery is likely (9:21–22). He announces that he has decreed that his son, Antiochus (V), will be king his place, and he asks the Jews to maintain good relations with him. The likely explanation for the lack of fit between the letter and the narrative is that the letter is in fact authentic, and our author has taken the liberty of constructing a dramatic and exaggerated literary context for it that emphasizes the theme of divine retribution. For other versions of the death of Antiochus IV, see 1:13–17, 1 Macc 6:1–17, and Dan 11:40–45.

B. The Purification of the Temple (10:1–9)

This section of 2 Maccabees appears to have been displaced from its original sequence in Jason of Cyrene's history, evidence for which can be seen in the awkward notice in 10:9, "Such then was the end of Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes." This concluding statement should follow directly on 9:28, where Antiochus' death is narrated. It would appear that the brief account of the purification of the Temple (10:1–8) should come immediately after 8:36 and be followed by the chapter on the death of Antiochus (9:1–28). This arrangement of the sections would also bring the chronology of events into line with 1 Maccabees.

The victories of Judas and his forces results in the liberation of Jerusalem and the purification of the Temple in 164 BCE. They construct a new altar and resume the suspended sacrifices, light the lamps, and celebrate for eight days (10:6). The whole of 2 Maccabees has been building to this climax, and indeed one of the central rhetorical purposes of the book seems to be to elevate the festival of Hanukkah to the same status as other major Jewish holidays.

C. The Campaigns of Judas Against the Forces of Antiochus V (10:10–13:26)

The narrative now begins to relate a series of military victories by the increasingly powerful Judas Maccabeus and this army. After the death of Antiochus IV, his nine-year-old son Antiochus V Eupator took the Seleucid throne, and Lysias became the regent for the child king after forcing out Philip from the role, who had been chosen by Antiochus IV (see 1 Macc 6:55–56).

Shortly after the accession of Antiochus V, Judas engages in a successful campaign in Idumea (10:14–23; cf. 1 Macc 5:1–54) and crushes an army of mercenaries commanded by Timothy, whom he had defeated before (see 8:30–33), not far outside Jerusalem (10:24–31); Timothy himself is eventually cornered and killed (10:32–38). During this battle against Timothy, five riders on horses appear from heaven and give aid to the forces of Judas (10:29–30).

The episode found in 11:1–15 is out of place in the narrative and belongs to the time before the purification of the Temple (cf. 1 Macc 4:26–35). In it Lysias, who is nursing a desire to turn Jerusalem into a respectable Hellenistic city (11:2–3), invades Jerusalem and besieges Beth-zur, a Judean fortress. A heavenly horseman appears and sends Lysias and his men into panicked retreat in response to the prayers of Judas and his men for God to intervene in the siege (11:6–12).

A collection of four brief letters is found in 11:16–38. Though the author associates them with the peace agreement forged by Lysias with the Jews, the scholarly consensus is that these letters are out of chronological order; they should most likely be arranged in order as follows: 16–21, 34–38, 27–33, 22–26. Furthermore, the first three of these letters belong to the reign of Antiochus IV, but here they are placed in the reign of Antiochus V. All four letters deal with some aspect of peace negotiations between the Seleucids and the residents of Judea.

A number of Judas' military victories are described in rapid-fire fashion in 12:1–45. He avenges the persecution of the Jewish populace in Jamnia and Joppa (12:2–9), wins several battles in Gilead (12:10–16; cf. 1 Macc 5:9–36), and then decisively defeats the army of Timothy (12:17–25; cf. 1 Macc 5:37–43), who presumably is a different Timothy than the one defeated twice and then killed by Judas earlier in the narrative (8:30–33, 10:24–37). Other military successes are described in 12:26–37 (cf. 1 Macc 5:46–54). Judas pauses after these campaigns to gather up his dead and to make a sin offering (12:43), an act that in Scripture is intended to be effective for the living (see Lev. 4:13–21) but that is interpreted by the author as made on behalf of the dead and thus gives evidence of Judas' belief in the resurrection of the dead (12:43–45).

Another instance of the author's emphasis on fitting retribution for evildoers is found in the account of the death of Menelaus, who inadvertently angers Antiochus V and Lysias while trying to promote his self-interest with them and is scapegoated and executed for the unrest in Judea (13:1–8). As Antiochus V prepares for a vicious attack on the Jews, Judas calls for three days of fervent prayer, after which his forces rout the king's troops in a series of skirmishes (13:9–21). In light of these defeats, as well as news of a potential revolt in Antioch, Antiochus V negotiates a hasty treaty with the Jews and withdraws (13:22–26).

D. Nicanor's Treachery and the Campaign of Judas Against Nicanor (14:1–15:36)

After Demetrius I usurps the throne from Antiochus V in 161 CE, he installs a man named Alcimus as high priest and sends Nicanor to lend military support to the installation of Alcimus in Jerusalem and to put an end to Judas once and for all (14:1–14; the events in 14:1–15:36 are paralleled in 1 Macc 7). Alcimus refers to Judas as leader of the "Hasideans" (10:6; they are regarded as distinct from Judas' band in 1 Macc 2:42, 7:13), whom he characterizes as a guerilla force that destabilizes and harasses the Seleucid-appointed government in Judea (10:6–10).

Nicanor decides to strike up a friendship with Judas rather than risk facing him in open battle (14:15–25), a narrative element that is not mentioned in 1 Maccabees. This stratagem seems to have been designed to keep close tabs on Judas, whom Nicanor convinces to settle down and start a family (14:23–25), thereby ensuring that he is not in the field carrying out attacks on Seleucid forces.

The goodwill between Nicanor and Judas does not last because Alcimus reports to Demetrius that Nicanor has not followed through on the order to kill Judas (14:26–27). Nicanor is reluctant to heed Demetrius' reiterated order, but knows that he must do so or face dire consequences (14:28–29). Judas perceives Nicanor's change in attitude and withdraws into hiding (14:30; 1 Macc 7:29–30 blames Nicanor rather than Alcimus for this development). Nicanor tersely demands that the priests in the Temple disclose Judas' location, and in response to their refusal he stretches forth his arm and threatens to destroy the Temple and set up a cult of Dionysus (14:31–33), a threat for which he later receives what the author considers an apt punishment (see 15:28–35, where the tongue and arm of Nicanor's corpse are mutilated because of his arrogant words and gestures).

After a description of the martyrdom of a certain Razis (14:37–46; it does not fit well into the narrative and seems primarily aimed at making yet another defense of the notion of bodily resurrection), Nicanor's inglorious defeat and death at the hands of Judas and his men is related (15:1–35; cf. 1 Macc 7:40–50). God's favor and aid for Judas is again a prominent narrative motif; Judas sees a vision of Onias III praying for the Jews, who is then joined by the prophet Jeremiah who gives Judas a golden sword with which to slay his enemies (15:12–16).

The author chooses to bring the narrative to a close on a high note with Judas and his compatriots celebrating their victory in Jerusalem rather than moving on to Judas' death at the hands of Bacchides nor his brothers' difficult and lengthy struggle to win full independence for Judea (for which see 1 Macc 9–13).

IV. The Author's Epilogue (15:37–39)

The author closes with a brief and playful epilogue that compares his literary achievement to a strong wine (=Jason's history) that is mixed with water (=his editing and abridging of Jason's history) in order to create a sweet and pleasing drink.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. Bickerman. The God of the Maccabees. Trans. H. Moehring. (Leiden: Brill, 1979); J. J. Collins and G. Sterling, eds. Hellenism in the Land of Israel (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001); J. Goldstein. II Maccabees. AB 41A (New York: Doubleday, 1983); M. Hengel. Judaism and Hellenism. 2 vols. John Bowden, trans. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); E. Schürer. The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. Vol. 1. G. Vermes, F. Millar, P. Vermes, and M. Black, eds. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973); M. Smith. "Hellenization." Palestinian Parties and Politics That Shaped the Old Testament (New York and London: Columbia University Press, 1971); V. Tcherikover. Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews. S. Applebaum, trans. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973).

1 ESDRAS

CAMERON HOWARD

OVERVIEW

The LXX contains two texts bearing the name "Esdras," the Greek form of "Ezra." First Esdras, known as "Esdras a" in the LXX, precedes "Esdras b," the canonical text of the biblical books of Ezra and Nehemiah. First Esdras is a book of the Apocrypha, and the Eastern Orthodox traditions consider it deuterocanonical, part of the "second canon." Although 1 Esdras is not considered authoritative by the Roman Catholic Church, the book, labeled as Third Esdras in the Vulgate, is appended after the New Testament in Bibles that are based on the Vulgate.

Much of 1 Esdras aligns closely with the material in canonical Ezra, as well as with small portions of Chronicles and Nehemiah. The book begins with an account of the last kings of Judah, largely identical to 2 Chr 35–36. It then includes the entire text of Ezra, with some minor variants and one major addition: the "Story of the Three Youths" (1 Esd 3–4), which has no canonical parallel. The book ends with the account of Ezra's reading of the law paralleled in Neh 8, but that account breaks off in mid-sentence, indicating that the original conclusion to 1 Esdras has been lost.

Most scholars date 1 Esdras to the mid- to late second century BCE. It appears that its "author" was more like an editor, choosing the relevant Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah passages from Hebrew and Aramaic, translating them into Greek, making small alterations to the narrative, and adding the Story of the Three Youths. First Esdras adds little historical clarity to the reports of the return to Jerusalem in Ezra and Nehemiah; in fact, the chronology of Persian kings and Jewish leaders in 1 Esdras is even murkier than in the canonical accounts. Instead, the book subtly recasts the details of Chronicles–Ezra–Nehemiah to offer a differently nuanced perspective on Judah's path from righteousness into exile and ultimately to its reconstitution as a faithful community.

OUTLINE

I. The Last Days of Judah (1:1–58)

A. Josiah's Kingship (1:1–33)

B. Apostate Kings (1:34–58)

II. The Return Begins (2:1–30)

A. Cyrus' Authorization of the Return and Rebuilding Projects (2:1–15)

B. Correspondence with Artaxerxes Regarding the Return (2:16–30)

III. The Story of the Three Youths (3:1–4:63)

A. The Contest (3:1–4:41)

B. The Aftermath of the Contest (4:42–63)

IV. The Return Continues (5:1–7:15)

A. The Returnees (5:1–46)

B. Progress in Rebuilding (5:47–65)

C. Opposition (5:66–34)

D. Completion of the Temple (7:1–15)

V. Ezra's Return (8:1–9:55)

A. The Details of Ezra's Mission (8:1–90)

B. The Renouncement and Expulsion of Foreign Wives and Children (8:91–9:36)

C. Ezra Reads the Law (9:37–55)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

Because 1 Esdras is dominated by the text of Ezra, it echoes many of that book's themes: the persistence and success of the returnees in the face of repeated opposition, the difficulties of defining the "insiders" and "outsiders" of the new community, the reinstitution of right religious practices, and the sovereignty of God—the God who "stirred up the spirit of King Cyrus" (2:2)—over Judah and Persia alike. Nevertheless, 1 Esdras is not simply a duplication of the book of Ezra; instead, it reworks the Ezra materials, reordering them and adding to them, in order to make a distinct narrative.

First Esdras distinguishes itself from its canonical parallels by juxtaposing Judah's rapid fall from glory in 2 Chr 35–36 with the book of Ezra's painful ascent back into a reconstituted community, omitting the extended historical background the rest of Chronicles provides. By beginning with Josiah's observance of the Passover, 1 Esdras showcases Judah at its best: a pious king follows the Law, the vessels and officials of the Temple are in place and in order, and animals for sacrifice abound. The account of Judah's decline in 1 Esd 1 is rapid and terse. Judah quickly falls from the apex of Josiah's celebration through a line of apostate kings and into exile. Yet 1 Esdras does not dwell on the exile itself. Instead, the book immediately recounts the decree of Cyrus and the beginning of the exiles' return to Judah. Unlike the road to exile, the path to rebuilt community is slow and winding, with multiple starts and stops along the way. The structure of 1 Esdras poignantly contrasts a quick, easy slip into sinfulness with a slow, difficult recovery from the disaster that sin has bred.

Although it contains a structure unique from its canonical counterparts, the heart of 1 Esdras' distinctiveness lies in the Story of the Three Youths (1 Esd 3–4). The story is a "court legend," a genre well-attested in the ancient Near Eastern and Hellenistic worlds. In these types of stories a courtier, usually a member of a subject people, rises to prominence in the foreign king's court because of the courtier's wisdom and righteousness. Analogous stories in the Old Testament include Gen 37–40, Dan 1–6, and Esther. The Story of the Three Youths was most likely a popular folktale that circulated independently of the Ezra–Nehemiah account, either in Greek or Aramaic. The Jewish editor of 1 Esdras then inserted the story into the Ezra materials, altering the details of both to fit the needs of the new narrative.

The Story of the Three Youths bolsters Zerubbabel's role in the rebuilding of the Temple and the city walls. As the courtier whose answer to the riddle proves wisest, he not only showcases his own sagacity but also becomes responsible for procuring deeper support and additional resources from King Darius, who encourages him to ask for rewards "beyond what is written" (4:42). References to Zerubbabel not attested in Ezra–Nehemiah are present elsewhere in 1 Esdras (6:17, 26, 28). At the same time, except for one brief mention at 1 Esd 5:40, the figure of Nehemiah remains conspicuously absent from 1 Esdras, even as it preserves textual parallels from the book of Nehemiah. First Esdras credits Zerubbabel, rather than Nehemiah, as a leading figure of the restoration.

The reason the author of 1 Esdras drew attention to Zerubbabel over Nehemiah remains unclear. The author may have wished to use Zerubbabel's Davidic ancestry to draw attention to the Davidic line, which otherwise is largely ignored in Ezra–Nehemiah, but 1 Esdras does not otherwise expound upon that theme. Yet the Story of the Three Youths develops the meaning of the return accounts beyond emphasizing one figure. The story underscores the agency of the Jewish people and their God—"the God of truth" (1 Esd 4:40)—in the restoration process. In Ezra the fate of Judah's building projects rests largely on the reliability of the Persian archives. Artaxerxes' search of the archives shows that Jerusalem was a rebellious city, and he orders its rebuilding to cease (Ezra 4:17–24). Darius' search of the archives shows that Cyrus decreed that the Temple in Jerusalem be rebuilt, and so the work of building begins again (Ezra 6:1–15). First Esdras preserves these "paper-shuffling" exchanges but adds a story of court wisdom that personalizes an otherwise impersonal, almost arbitrary process. In the Story of the Three Youths, it is Zerubbabel's testimony to truth that restarts the building process, and Zerubbabel attributes both that truth and his victory to God. The Story of the Three Youths indeed moves the 1 Esdras narrative "beyond what is written," supplementing the Ezra account to take the returnees' success out of the machinations of a foreign government and to put it more explicitly into the hands of their God.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Coggins and M. A. Knibb. The First and Second Books of Esdras (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); J. M. Myers. I and II Esdras. AB 42 (Garden City: Doubleday, 1974); Z. Talshir. I Esdras: From Origin to Translation. SCS 47 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); . I Esdras: A Text Critical Commentary. SCS 50 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2001). L. M. Wills. The Jew in the Court of the Foreign King: Ancient Jewish Court Legends. HDR 26 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990).

THE PRAYER OF MANASSEH

CASEY D. ELLEDGE

OVERVIEW

This apocryphal prayer attributed to the infamous Judahite king Manasseh explores a range of traditional themes in Jewish penitential prayer.

The Prayer of Manasseh builds upon the same traditions found in 2 Chr 33:11–19, where the reign of the wicked king concludes with his capture by the Assyrians, public repentance, and restored rule. Unlike the traditions found in 2 Chronicles, however, the Prayer gives a living voice to Manasseh's actual plea for divine mercy. Using autobiographical features, the Prayer employs the phraseology of the Chronicler's version of Manasseh's reign (cf. 2 Chr 33:6–7, Pr Man 10; 2 Chr 33:11–12, Pr Man 10–11). Such literary dependence demonstrates that the Prayer, like other apocryphal prayers, represents an expansion of earlier scriptural tradition. The Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Young Men, provide comparative examples.

The Prayer's dependence upon 2 Chronicles would date its composition to the eras subsequent to Chronicles (fourth century BCE), yet prior to its quotation in the third century CE Didascalia Apostolorum. Within this range, an absence of Christian references suggests a date of composition within the last two centuries before the Common Era. The original language of the Greek prayer remains uncertain. A different Hebrew prayer of Manasseh found at Qumran may increase the likelihood that the Greek version could be the translation of an originally Semitic prayer. In the opinion of some scholars, such earlier Hebrew prayers of Manasseh may even have antedated the composition of 2 Chr 33:11–19 itself, thus providing a source for the Chronicler's own distinctive account of Manasseh's repentance.

OUTLINE

I. Manasseh Praises God's Power, Wrath, and Mercy (1–7)

A. The Creator's Majesty (1–4)

B. God's Wrath upon Sinners (5)

C. "Unsearchable is your promised mercy" (6–7)

II. Manasseh Pleads for Mercy (8–15)

A. God invites repentance (8)

B. Confession of sins (9–10)

C. Plea for redemption (11–14)

D. Concluding promise to praise the deity (15)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

With economy and beauty, the prayer dramatically develops its wide-ranging themes, beginning with God's power in creation and ending with the penitent speaker's vow to praise the deity for the mercy bestowed upon him. The prayer opens by directly addressing God's creative power, wrath, and mercy (1–7). The God of the Jewish ancestors is the creator of all things (1), whose might made heaven and earth and the sea, "who confined the deep/and sealed it with your terrible and glorious name" (3). The penitent is certain that the creator's wrath and mercy are equally encompassing: "the wrath of your threat to sinners is unendurable;/yet immeasurable and unsearchable/is your promised mercy,/for you are the Lord Most High,/of great compassion, long-suffering, and very merciful,/and you relent at human suffering" (5b–7c). Through the skillful use of poetic parallelism, the prayer achieves a striking balance of divine justice and mercy.

As the prayer develops beyond this cosmic tableau, the penitent begins to plead his own case (8–15). The "God of the righteous" need not grant repentance for those who are already innocent—but rather "for me . . . a sinner" (8). A series of stylistic repetitions intensifies the speaker's desperation, as he confesses his own sins: "My transgressions are multiplied, O Lord, they are multiplied" (9b); "I have sinned, O Lord, I have sinned" (12a); "Forgive me, O Lord, forgive me" (13b). The autobiographical content of the prayer alludes specifically to Manasseh's religious crimes: "I have provoked your wrath . . . setting up abominations [i.e., idols]" (10d,f). Conflicted and on the verge of despair, he declares himself unworthy to lift up his eyes to the heavens (9c); he is convinced, "I am rejected because of my sins" (10c).

Yet even so, "now" he bows "the knee of [his] heart," beseeching the divine graciousness (11), hopeful that the "God of the righteous" ancestors is also "the God of those who repent" (13f). Rather than judging the sinner, God will do a greater work by revealing the divine glory even in the person of the wicked king himself: "in me you will manifest your goodness;/for, unworthy as I am, you will save me according to your great mercy" (14a–c). The prayer concludes as the speaker, graciously redeemed, makes good on this promise, joining "all the host of heaven" in singing hymns of praise to God (15).

This intensely personal, as opposed to national, psalm of repentance embodies in its own distinctive way a number of themes to be found in other biblical and early Jewish literature. It employs traditional features of penitential psalmody found in other writings, including reflections upon God's mercy and grace (Pr Man 1–7; cf. Pss 32:10; 51:1; 130:3–4, 7–8), a confession that often acknowledges the deity's wrath upon the speaker is just (Pr Man 8–10; cf. Pss 32:5; 38:1–4, 18; 51:3–5; 130; 3, 8; 143:2; Syr. Ps 155:8), the speaker's petition for divine mercy and cleansing from evil (Pr Man 11–13; cf. Pss 6:1–4; 38:1, 15–22; 51:1–2, 7–12; 130:1–2, 5–6; 143:1–2, 7–12; Syr. Ps 155:1–15), and the promise that the speaker will offer continual praise for the deity's compassion (Pr Man 14–15; cf. Pss 6:5, 51:14–15; Syr. Ps 155:19). Further comparisons may be made to contemporary psalms discovered within the Great Psalms Scroll from Qumran. Manasseh's prayer also displays the well-known motif of the wicked ruler who comes to acknowledge the might of Israel's God (cf. Dan 2:46, 3:28, 4:34–37; 6:25–27; 2 Macc 9:1–18), thus affirming the deity's moral governance of history. The autobiographical features of the prayer further advance the theme that if the notorious Manasseh can receive pardon for his transgressions, then no human wickedness can outreach the grace of God.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. H. Charlesworth. "Prayer of Manasseh." In The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1985) 2:625–37; W. Schniedewind. "A Qumran Fragment of the Ancient 'Prayer of Manasseh.'" ZAW 108 (1996) 105–107.

PSALM 151

MATTHEW GOFF

OVERVIEW

Psalm 151 is a brief hymn, seven verses in length, in which David recounts in the first person his selection by God to be king and his defeat of Goliath. The poem stresses that God exalted David, a lowly shepherd, rather than his brothers. Psalm 151 draws extensively from 1 Sam 16–17. The hymn appears at the end of Psalter not in the Hebrew Bible but rather in the Septuagint (LXX), or Greek Old Testament. The psalm is not in the Jewish, Protestant, or Catholic canons but is revered as scripture in the Eastern Orthodox tradition.

Because of the Dead Sea Scrolls, we now have an ancient version of Ps 151 in Hebrew. A large work, known as the Psalms Scroll (11QPsa), was found in Cave 11 of the Qumran site. This document contains thirty-nine hymns that correspond to biblical psalms and several others that do not. Column 28 of this scroll contains a version of Ps 151. It has significant differences from the form of the poem in the Septuagint. This Qumran composition indicates that the hymn was composed originally in Hebrew and then translated into Greek. In the Hebrew text there is a clear break in the manuscript between a poem that deals with David becoming king (Ps 151:1–5) and another that involves his battle with Goliath (Ps 151:6–7). Scholars classify the first Qumran hymn as Ps 151A and the second as Ps 151B. The Psalms Scroll suggests that LXX Ps 151 is a combination of two originally distinct compositions.

OUTLINE

I. Superscription

A. Attribution to David

B. Development of the Psalter into Its Final Form

II. God's Selection of David as King (vv. 1–5)

A. God Chooses David, Rather than His Brothers

B. David as a Musician

III. David's Defeat of Goliath (vv. 6–7)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

The superscription stresses that the poem is "outside the number," referring to the 150 poems of the psalter. The hymn is thus presented as a kind of appendix to the Book of Psalms. Concern that the poem is "outside the number" may explain the superscription's assertion that the psalm was written by David himself. The attribution to David functions as a justification for the hymn's inclusion in the psalter. The superscription of the Qumran version of Ps 151 is much briefer than that of LXX Ps 151. It reads: "A Hallelujah of David the Son of Jesse." The claims that the psalm was written by David himself or that the hymn is "outside the number" were added later. The Qumran version of the hymn reflects an earlier stage of the biblical psalter in which its canonical form with 150 psalms had not fully taken shape.

Psalm 151 contains two sections. The first (vv. 1–5) recounts God's selection of David as king. It relies on 1 Sam 16. In v. 1 David declares: "I was small among my brothers,/and the youngest in my father's house;/I tended my father's sheep." Verse 5 similarly stresses that David's brothers were "handsome and tall," but that God did not choose any of them to be king (v. 5; cf. 1 Sam 16:7–11). Theologically, a key message of this hymn is that God's blessings do not always work in ways that make sense in human terms. Psalm 151 enumerates several factors, such as David's youth and small stature, that would suggest he would be the least likely child of Jesse to become king. David ascended to the throne not because of his own charisma or talents but because God appointed him for the royal office.

God's selection of David is also stressed in Ps 151:4, which asserts that God "sent his messenger" to anoint David. This "messenger" (Gk.: angelon) can be understood as an angel, but in the Bible it is Samuel who anoints David as king (1 Sam 16:13). The Qumran version of Ps 151, in contrast to the Septuagint version of the poem, explicitly states that the prophet Samuel anoints David.

Another important trope of Ps 151 is that David is a musician. This motif is drawn from 1 Sam 16 (vv. 16–18). In Ps 151:2 David claims that he has fashioned a harp and a lyre. The next verse reads: "And who will tell my Lord?/The Lord himself; it is he who hears" (v. 3). This somewhat obscure statement can be reasonably understood as a reference to God hearing David's musical praise of God. The Qumran Psalms Scroll indicates that Ps 151:3 is a truncation of an originally longer text. In the Hebrew version of the poem David makes musical instruments, as in LXX Ps 151, but then goes on to assert: "And [so] have I rendered glory to the Lord, thought I, within my soul. The mountains do not witness to him, nor do the hills proclaim; the trees have cherished my words and the flock my works." Nothing whatsoever in these lines corresponds to LXX Ps 151. The next line in the Qumran poem is similar to, but longer than, Ps 151:3 in the Septuagint: "For who can proclaim and who can bespeak and who can recount the deeds of the Lord? Everything has God seen, everything has he heard and he has heeded." The Qumran poem stresses the difficulty of praising God because his accomplishments are innumerable and he has, literally, heard it all. This motif fell out of the psalm in the course of its scribal transmission and is not present in its Greek translation. It is easier to draw the conclusion that God hears David praise him from the Septuagint version of the hymn than the Qumran form of the composition.

The second section of Ps 151 (vv. 6–7) concerns David's defeat of Goliath. This story is recounted in 1 Sam 17, and the hymn draws on this biblical narrative. Goliath is never referred to by name in the psalm but is rather called "the foreigner" (the Philistine). Psalm 151:6 states that he cursed David (cf. Sam 17:43). David also asserts that he beheads Goliath with his own sword (Ps 151:7), an act described in 1 Sam 17:51.

Theologically, the overall message of Ps 151 is that God has the power to exalt the lowly (David) and bring down the mighty (Goliath). The hymn, by stressing that God selected the most unlikely son of Jesse to be king of Israel, teaches that the deity works in unexpected ways. The psalm, with its singular focus on David, concludes the biblical psalter as a whole in the Septuagint. In this arrangement the psalter ends on a strongly Davidic note, which is not the case in conventional translations of the OT. Psalm 151 asserts not only God's selection of David as king of Israel but also the traditional attribution of the psalms to this venerable figure of ancient Israel.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

P. W. Flint. The Dead Sea Psalms Scrolls and the Book of Psalms (Leiden: Brill, 1997); D. J. Harrington, S.J. Invitation to the Apocrypha (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); N. F. Marcos. "David the Adolescent: On Psalm 151." The Old Greek Psalter. Ed. P.J. Gentry et al. (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001) 205–17; J. A. Sanders. The Psalms Scroll of Qumran Cave 11 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1964).

3 MACCABEES

JEREMY F. HULTIN

OVERVIEW

The title 3 Maccabees is misleading, for the events in this book take place half a century before the Maccabean revolt. The title likely arose when this text was placed after 1 and 2 Maccabees in Greek manuscripts. The book describes how God delivered the Jews from two major crises under Ptolemy IV Philopator, king of Egypt from 221–204 BCE. In the first, the king threatened to enter their Temple (3 Macc 1–2); in the second, he subjected the Jews to slavery and, ultimately, to systematic destruction (3 Macc 2:28–6:29).

The work may well have been composed in Alexandria, the site of most of the story's action and home to a sizeable Jewish community. Because the book exhibits familiarity with the Greek translations of Esther and Daniel, it must have been composed after the mid-second century BCE. It is possible that the "registration" or "census" described in 2:28 was modeled on the registration for a poll tax introduced by Augustus in 24/23 BCE. Some scholars also detect echoes of the crises of Caligula's reign (37–41 CE). Thus the book could date from the Roman period. Ultimately, any date between 150 BCE to 50 CE is possible.

Although the historical value of 3 Maccabees has had its scholarly defenders, it seems best to consider it a work of historical fiction, a Jewish "novel" that includes real historical figures (e.g., Philopator) and perhaps memories of one or more historical incidents. Josephus gives a brief account of a similar crisis in Egypt, but he sets events in the 140s BCE (Against Apion 2.53–55). Thus there were apparently diverse legends explaining the origin of a contemporary celebration for divine deliverance.

Given the king's terrible persecution of the Jews, it would be tempting to infer that the author viewed the Gentile government with suspicion or hostility. But in fact, the author insists that true, law-abiding Jews were a bulwark for the king. Jews "continued to maintain goodwill and unswerving loyalty toward the dynasty" (3:3) even when the king began to mistreat them. At the end of the book, the king recognizes that the Jews are "those who faithfully kept our country's fortresses" (6:25) and that they were distinguished "in their goodwill towards us" (6:26 author's trans.; cf. 7:7 and 5:31). Such statements could hardly be made by an author who considered support of the government inherently incompatible with Judaism. In fact, it is the apostates, who violated divine commandments "for the belly's sake," who would never be favorably disposed toward the king's authority (7:11). In other words, faithfulness to the Jewish religion is the marker not of a traitor but of a good royalist.

Nor are the Gentiles in the book unremittingly hostile to the Jews. There are a few Gentiles who help (cf. 3 Macc 1:27; 3 Macc 3:8–10, where they are called the Jews' "neighbors . . . and business associates"). But these passages remain exceptions to the overall tenor of the book. On the whole, the outlook of 3 Maccabees is strikingly different from that of the Letter of Aristeas, which envisions Greeks and Jews enjoying pleasant, respectful conversations about God and wisdom.

The author may exhibit ambivalence and inconsistencies in his attitudes toward Gentiles or the king, but the book's central theme is unequivocal and frequently reiterated: God is mighty and will come to the aid of his people when they call upon him. Even Philopator realizes in the end that anyone who would cause the Jews harm has "the Ruler over every power, the Most High God, in everything and inescapably as an antagonist to avenge such acts" (7:9). This emphasis on God's surpassing greatness is echoed throughout the book: God is king, lord, all-powerful, most great. Hence prayer is more effective than any human resistance, and lengthy prayers bring about resolution to the book's two major crises.

To judge from the paucity of ancient references to 3 Maccabees, the book was not widely read either by Jews (there are in fact no Jewish references to the book) or by Christians. Theodoret summarizes the book in his commentary on Daniel. It is not rendered in the Vulgate, but there were Syriac translations.

OUTLINE

I. The Battle of Raphia (1:1–7)

II. Threat to Temple in Jerusalem (1:8–2:24)

A. Philopator Denied Entrance to the Sanctuary (1:8–15)

B. Jewish Uproar in Response to the King's Intention (1:16–29)

C. Prayer of the High Priest Simon (2:1–20)

D. God Heeds Prayer, Shakes Philopator (2:21–24)

III. Crisis in Egypt (2:25–6:21)

A. Philopator's Retaliatory Decrees Against Jews (2:25–33)

2:25–28. Jews Forced to Sacrifice and to Be Registered for Poll-tax

2:29. Jews to Be Branded with Ivy Leaf as Symbol of Dionysus

2:30–33. Some Jews Apostatize; Majority Remains Steadfast

B. Philopator Orders Egyptian Jews Gathered for Execution (3:1–30)

3:1–10. Variety of Views About the Jews

3:11–30. Philopator's Letter

C. Jews Gathered for Execution (4:1–21)

4:1–15. Jews Arrested and Imprisoned

4:16–21. Impossibility of Enrolling All the Jews

D. God Prevents Philopator's Plans to Execute the Jews (5:1–51)

5:1–9. Hermon Prepares the Elephants to Trample the Jews

5:10–17. God Causes Philopator to Oversleep

5:18–35. Renewed Preparation of Elephants; Divinely Induced Amnesia

5:36–51. Philopator Renews His Threats, and Promises Destruction of Jerusalem

E. Prayer of Eleazar (6:1–15)

F. Angelic Deliverance and Reversal of Fortune (6:16–29)

IV. Celebrations for God's Deliverance (6:30–7:23)

A. Jews Celebrate for Seven Days (6:30–35)

B. A festival of Commemoration Is Instituted (6:36–41)

C. Royal Decree on Behalf of the Jews (7:1–9)

D. Revenge Against Apostates (7:10–16)

E. Peaceful Return Home (7:16–23)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

1:1–5. The book opens with Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–204 BCE) preparing to battle Antiochus III (223–187 BCE), king of Syria, at Raphia, a city near Gaza (217 BCE). One Dositheus, son of Drimylus, who is said to be an apostate Jew (1:3), saves Philopator from a plot on his life. The detail about Dositheus's having apostatized is odd given the animus directed against apostates elsewhere in this book (2:33; 7:10–16), and the claim that they were less committed to the wellbeing of the kingdom (7:11). A lengthier account of these events, with some variation in the details, is contained in Polybius, The Histories 5.79–86.

1:6–15. Following his victory, Philopator made offerings to the sanctuaries of various local cities, including the Temple of Jerusalem. But although he was allowed, even as a Gentile, to make a sacrifice and to offer gifts (1:10), he was forbidden by biblical law from entering the sanctuary itself (Exod 30:10; Lev 16:2, 11–12, 15; Heb 9:7). Angered by this distinctive Temple law, the king decides to enter despite all Jewish remonstrance. (Pompey the Great actually entered the Temple in 63 BCE; it was widely believed that God punished him for this impiety; and in 40 CE, Caligula planned to have his statue set up in the Temple.)

1:16–29. The author vividly depicts the distress Philopator's plan causes the Jews of Jerusalem. Some Jews called for armed resistance (1:23), but the elders—no doubt representing the author's own sympathies—persuade them to join in supplication to God rather than taking up arms. Indeed, heartfelt entreaty to God characterizes this entire scene (1:16, 21, 24), and even some of the Gentiles around the king join in urging God to intervene (1:27)!

2:1–20. Simon II was high priest from 219 to 196 BCE. He was renowned for fortifying and beautifying the Temple (Sir 50:1–21), making him an especially appropriate person here to pray for the Temple's protection. Simon's prayer resembles the prayers of Ezra 9, Neh 9, and Dan 9.

Simon begins by listing God's attributes. As is often the case in 3 Maccabees, the emphasis falls upon God's power. This implicitly contrasts God with Philopator: God is truly "Lord," "king," "sovereign of all creation," "only ruler," and "almighty"; and whereas the Jews suffer at the hands of an "impious and profane man," God is "holy among the holy ones" (2:2).

Having listed several attributes of God, Simon recounts God's past punishment of the insolent and arrogant. First he says that God destroyed the "giants" with the flood. In Gen 6:1–4, when the "sons of God" took women as wives, their offspring were called "Nephilim," which the LXX rendered "giants." Ancient Jewish texts such as 1 Enoch say a good deal more about these fallen angels and their giant offspring than does Genesis, and make explicit that the flood was meant to obliterate the giants (e.g. Wis 14:6). Simon also states that God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah (2:5) and destroyed Pharaoh (2:6–7). In the NT, Jude also mentions the punishment of "the angels who did not keep their own position" (Jude 6) and the punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah (Jude 7).

Simon next appeals to God's choice of Jerusalem as the place for his "name" (cf. Deut 12:11) and his "magnificent manifestation" (2:9). The latter could refer to visions of God's glory (e.g. Isa 6), but even more appropriate for the present prayer would be a reference to the fiery manifestation of God's presence in Solomon's Temple (2 Chr 7:1; cf. 2 Macc 1:19–23).

Indeed, the fact that God had chosen Jerusalem forms a central motif of Simon's prayer (2:10, 14–18). God has promised to hear petition "when we come to this place and pray" (2:10, emphasis added). Such a focus on Jerusalem is all the more noteworthy in a book that was most likely composed in the Diaspora, and reminds us that Jews throughout the ancient world viewed Jerusalem as the holy city and its Temple as the only true dwelling of Israel's God. Simon acknowledges that God's true dwelling is in heaven (2 Macc 2:10; cf. 1 Kgs 8:27), but this observation was rarely felt to be incompatible with God's sanctifying and even inhabiting the Temple in Jerusalem. Christian readers often forget that Jesus also affirmed that God "dwelt" in the Temple (Matt 23:21).

Although Simon mentions of the sins of Israel (2:13, 19), he does not dwell on national culpability for the present distress. Ultimately, Simon prays like the Psalmist (Ps 79:9–10) and reminds God of the honor God would lose if he let the Temple be destroyed. The horrifying thought of Gentiles speaking arrogantly (2:17; cf. 4:16; 6:4–5) is invoked to prompt God to action. It is almost as though Simon reminds God of two possible linguistic outcomes: either the Gentiles will boast that they have "trampled down the house of the sanctuary" (2:18), or there will be "praises in the mouth of those who are downcast and broken in spirit" (2:20).

2:21–24. God heeds the "lawful supplication" of Simon and scourges Philopator, shaking him "as a reed is shaken by the wind" (cf. Matt 11:7). In an ironic scene, the king's "bodyguards" can do nothing to protect their master other than to drag him away from the Temple, paralyzed and speechless. Whereas Heliodorus (2 Macc 3:26–40) and Antiochus IV Epiphanes (2 Macc 9:5–29) both repented after being punished by God for their insolence, Philopator uses his recovered speech to utter "bitter threats" against the Jews.

2:25–33. Philopator returned from Jerusalem to Egypt with a vendetta against the Jews, at whose hands he had just been humiliated. The king now acts in tandem with his "previously mentioned drinking companions and comrades." (These men have in fact not been previously mentioned in 3 Maccabees, an indication that the book may be missing an earlier reference to them, perhaps because the author was using a source that had previously mentioned them.) To punish the Jews, the king composes a decree stating that: (1) all peoples must sacrifice as a prerequisite for entering their sanctuaries, (2) the Jews are to be "subjected to a registration involving poll tax" and reduced to the "status of slaves." Furthermore, those who were registered were to be branded with the ivy leaf, the symbol of Dionysus (2:29). The only way to avoid such registration and reduction of status was to join the initiates of Dionysus and thus to enjoy equal citizenship with the Alexandrians (2:30; this offer of Alexandrian citizenship is mentioned again at 3:21 but, strangely, is not mentioned at the end of the book when the Jews' fortunes are restored).

The precise details of this decree and any possible relationship it might have to an historical registration have been much debated. The reference to a registration for the poll tax may reflect historical circumstances of the Roman period. In 24/23 BCE Augustus introduced a census to determine how many would be liable to pay the poll tax. Jews, unlike Greek citizens of Alexandria, were deemed liable to the tax. Although there is little evidence that Ptolemaic leaders ever tried to compel the Jews to abandon their religion in the way depicted here, there is ample evidence from the Roman period that Alexandrian citizens objected to Jews enjoying citizenship when they would not worship the same gods as the Alexandrians did. Thus it is possible that the author has projected back into the reign of Philopator not only the census for taxation, but also the connection between worship of Greek gods and the privilege of citizenship.

"Being reduced to their former limited status" (2:29) refers to the fact that in the early third century BCE, Jews had been deported to Egypt by Ptolemy I Soter and held as slaves until they were manumitted by his successor, Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–47 BCE) (Letter of Aristeas 22).

2:31–33. Jewish response to the king's decree is divided: some capitulated (cf. 7:15), but "the majority" maintained their religion by paying money, that is, apparently, by paying bribes to avoid the registration. These latter Jews considered the former as "enemies" of the Jewish nation, a sentiment that will reach its strongest expression at the close of the book (7:10–16).

3:1–30. Because of the failure of his plan, Philopator is now enraged not only against those in Alexandria but also those in the countryside. Why the Alexandrian Jews are still free in 4:12 is not clear.

Fictive letters and decrees were a regular component of ancient literature, especially Greek novels. For instance, in the Greek version of the Book of Esther, a fictive letter (and one quite similar in content to Philopator's here) was included after 3:13 (Additions to Esther 13:1–7). Philopator views the Jewish refusal to let him worship in their Temple as stemming from their "traditional arrogance" (3:17–18). From the king's perspective, a generous offer had been made to the Jews, namely, Alexandrian citizenship and participation in religious rites (3:21). Hence he describes those Jews who cooperated not as "apostates" but rather as the "few among them who are sincerely disposed toward us" (3:23). The king invokes several of the more widespread elements of ancient Alexandrian anti-Jewish sentiment, such as the charge of impiety and a wariness about Jewish separateness (3:24).

4:1–21. The author paints a lachrymose portrait of the imprisonment of Jews (note the reversals of 4:6–8). While the pathos of the scene is unmistakable, the details of the narrative are not entirely coherent. For instance, it is not clear why the king is so insistent that the Jews be "enrolled individually" when he is planning to execute all of them in a single day (4:14). Be that as it may, this element of the plot lets God's "providence" shine forth, as the Jews turn out to be too numerous to be counted.

The king's idols cannot "come to one's help" (4:16)—that is, they are precisely the opposite of God, who "was aiding the Jews from heaven" (4:21). The reference to the king's "profane mouth" and "improper words" against God are reminiscent of Dan 7:8, 20.

5:11–31. God puts the king into a deep sleep, which gives the Jews a reprieve and issues in further praise and supplication (5:13). Furthermore, this particular intervention by God also occasions an unexpectedly lovely comment about the divine gift of sleep (5:11), a sentiment with many more parallels in Greek and Latin literature than in the Bible (though cf. Ps 127:2). Having first put the king to sleep, God then causes him to forget why he has assembled the elephants in the first place; the king declares that he has no complaint against the Jews (5:31)!

Ultimately, the king renews his oath to massacre the Jews held captive in Alexandria, and adds to this that he would level Judea and burn the Temple in Jerusalem (5:42–43). Not only is the drama heightened by the repetition of threat and rescue, but the scale of the crisis has now grown beyond the boundary of Egypt and affects all who worship the God of Israel.

5:50–6:15. Facing certain death, the Jews "considered the help that they had received before from heaven," and prayed all the more fervently for God's help (5:50–51). These two verses nicely encapsulate one of the central hortatory purposes of the entire book: because God has so dramatically saved Israel in the past, earnest prayer is the appropriate response to any present crisis.

Just as Simon's prayer in 3 Macc 2 prevented the destruction of the Temple, so the prayer of "a certain Eleazar" (6:1–15) leads to the ultimate deliverance of the Jews. The appearance of an aged, distinguished figure named "Eleazar" recalls the like-named martyr of 2 Macc 6:18–31 and 4 Macc 5–7, as well as the high priest in the Letter of Aristeas 1, 41.

Eleazar's prayer is similar to Simon's. He invokes God's might (6:2) and recalls God's former deliverance from threatening rulers such as Pharaoh (6:4) and Sennacherib (6:5; cf. 2 Kgs 18–19). Also like Simon, Eleazar urges God not to let the Gentiles boast (6:11), and even suggests that if punishment is truly necessary, God should first rescue the Jews and then destroy them himself.

But unlike Simon, who prayed from the chosen city Jerusalem, Eleazar states that he and his fellow Jews are "perishing as foreigners in a foreign land" (6:3, emphasis added). Hence it is appropriate that he invokes instances in which God rescued individuals who were far from the promised land, such as the "three companions" of Daniel, whom he notes were in Babylon (6:6). And by stating that Daniel was thrown to the lions because of "envious slander" (6:7), Eleazar helps to liken Daniel's situation to that facing the Jews (3 Macc 2:26; 3:7; 7:3–4). Finally, Jonah (6:8) is the classic example of a prophet rescued while far from home. Eleazar concludes his prayer with a reference to Lev 26:44 (emphasis added), reminding God that he had never neglected his people even "when they were in the land of their enemies."

6:16–29. God finally and conclusively delivers the Jews. When the Ptolemaic troops are thrown into confusion by two terrifying angels, the elephants begin to trample the soldiers. Now, finally, Philopator repents. Much as in 5:28–34, Philopator blames his advisors for having initiated the foolish and cruel plan to destroy the Jews. He insists that the Jews have served his country well (6:25–26) and that their God has sustained his government (6:28).

6:30–41. In a scene of reversals, the very place meant for the Jews' destruction becomes one of joy. Dirges are replaced by songs of praise. Instead of being branded with the ivy leaf of Dionysus, the Jews are now supplied wine for a festival of seven days (6:30). Even the king thanks God for his own rescue (6:33). The festival is instituted for future observance in much the way Esth 9 recounts the establishment of Purim. Josephus in fact mentions a festival celebrated in Alexandria commemorating the deliverance from the elephants (Against Apion 2.25).

7:1–16. Philopator reiterates in writing his newfound appreciation for the Jews and their God, summarizing a central theme of the entire book, namely, that the "God of heaven" defends the Jews as his own children (7:6), and hence that anyone who opposes them opposes the "Ruler over every power" (7:9). In Esth 8–9 the Jews are permitted to avenge themselves against their Gentile antagonists; in 3 Macc 7:10–16, they are granted permission to execute renegade Jews. Finally (7:17–23), in a storybook dénouement, the Jews are returned to their homes and recover any lost property; their neighbors now fear them (cf. Esth 8:17).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. J. Collins. Between Athens and Jerusalem. 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); N. C. Croy. 3 Maccabees. Septuagint Commentary Series (Leiden: Brill, 2006); C. W. Emmet. "The Third Book of Maccabees." The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. R. H. Charles, ed. 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1913); M. Hadas. The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (New York: Harper, 1953); V. A. Tcherikover. "The Third Book of Maccabees as a Historical Source of Augustus' Time." Scripta Hierosolymitana 7 (1961) 1–26.

4 MACCABEES

JEREMY F. HULTIN

OVERVIEW

The present work was included in some early Christian codices of the Bible (Alexandrinus, Sinaiticus, and Venetus) with the simple title "Fourth Maccabees." Eusebius and Jerome referred to the work more descriptively as "On the Supremacy of Reason," and attributed it to the first-century Jewish historian Flavius Josephus. The text does occur in some editions of Josephus's works under the related title, "On Temperate Reason," but both the details of the account and its language confirm that the attribution to Josephus was erroneous.

As the author himself notes (3:19), the work is divided into two main parts. In the first section (1:1–3:18), the author uses a variety of arguments and biblical illustrations to demonstrate that "devout reason is sovereign over the emotions" (1:1). In the second portion of the book, the author recounts the fates of nine Maccabean martyrs: the aged priest Eleazar (5–7), the seven brothers (8–14), and their widowed mother (14–17). The noble conduct of these martyrs is presented as further evidence that "devout reason" can triumph over any emotion or agony. But the accounts of the martyrs are certainly more than just further illustrations of the book's thesis. In an age when the temptation to abandon a distinctively Jewish way of life could be powerful, these heroes' steadfast adherence to the Mosaic law is put forward as a moving example worthy of imitation (18:1–2).

Little can be said with certainty about the author or when and where he wrote. He was clearly a devout Jew who had the benefit of an education in Greek rhetoric (cf. 1:12) and had some acquaintance with Stoic philosophy. But such an education could have been obtained in any major city of the Hellenistic Diaspora, or even in Palestine. Although the events he describes transpire in Jerusalem (4:22; 18:5), the early Church commemorated the martyrs in Antioch, making that one attractive possibility (but only a possibility) for the book's provenance. Regarding the date of composition, the references to the Temple (4:9; 4:20) cannot count as evidence that the cult in Jerusalem was still operational, for other Jewish texts written after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE also describe cultic activities in the present tense. One possible clue about the date can be found in the fact that Apollonius is called governor of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia (4 Macc 4:2; cf. 2 Macc 3:5). Elias Bickerman observed that Cilicia was only governed along with Syria between 20 and 54 CE; if the author wrote during this period, he could have projected the administrative circumstances of his own day into the past. As attractive as Bickerman's proposal is, subsequent scholarship has complicated the question. Ultimately, a date between the middle of the first century and the early second century CE is reasonable; recent scholarship has tended to favor the later end of this spectrum.

The division of the work into two parts creates a challenge for defining its genre. The opening portion (1:1–3:18) is well described as a literary diatribe, in which the author addresses imagined objections to his thesis (1:5; 2:24). The latter portion of the book is a form of epideictic rhetoric, the rhetoric of praise and blame. In particular, it resembles Greek funeral orations, which praised the piety and bravery of the dead so as to encourage the imitation of their virtues. Although there is a clearly marked division between the two halves of the work (3:19), there is no reason to doubt its overall unity. The first part of the book also makes use of historical examples (such as Joseph, Moses, and David) to demonstrate the supremacy of reason over the passions; and the praise of the Maccabean martyrs in the second part of the book is punctuated with reflections on their evidentiary value for the same thesis (6:31–35; 13:1–5). It has been argued that this speech was originally presented orally, perhaps at Antioch, the traditional burial site of the martyrs (17:8–10 refers to their tomb). The references at 1:10 and 3:19 to "this anniversary" and "the present occasion" could indicate that we have a commemorative funeral oration. But an author trained in rhetoric would have been able to simulate the language used in funeral orations, so there is little to say whether it was actually delivered or was composed simply to be read. Significance and Influence. 4 Maccabees was translated into Syriac, but no Latin translations survive and it was not made part of the Vulgate. Without question, the literary influence of 4 Maccabees on Christian authors can be seen in second-century literature about martyrdom, especially in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch and in the Martyrdom of Polycarp. It was also an important book for major patristic authors such as John Chrysostom, Augustine, and Jerome. The story of the mother and her seven sons is preserved in rabbinic sources (discussed by Hadas); but the rabbinic accounts seem not to be literarily dependent on 4 Maccabees, for they place these events in the reign of the Roman Emperor Hadrian rather than the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes.

Among the most striking teachings of 4 Maccabees is its claim that the deaths of the martyrs functioned as a "ransom" and an "atoning sacrifice" for Israel (see the comments on 6:29; 17:20–22). Because similar language is used of Jesus' death in the NT, some have proposed 4 Maccabees as an inspiration for this idea. Students of the apostle Paul may be particularly interested in the way 4 Maccabees portrays the role of the Mosaic law in the pursuit of self-control. Throughout 4 Maccabees it is taken for granted that it is possible to adhere to the law and that the law helps individuals to triumph over passions. For instance, 4 Macc 2:5–6 cites the commandment not to "covet" (Exod 20:17; Deut 5:21) as evidence that reason can control desires (i.e., God would not command what was impossible); Paul, on the other hand, claims that through this very commandment the power of sin "produced in me all kinds of covetousness" (Rom 7:7–8).

OUTLINE

I. The Supremacy of Devout Reason over the Emotions Proven Philosophically (1:1–3:18)

A. Introduction of Thesis and Main Topic: The Maccabean Martyrs (1:1–12)

B. Definitions of Key Terms (1:13–30a)

C. Biblical Evidence of Reason's Power over the Emotions (1:30b–3:18)

2:1–6a. Joseph's Triumph over Sexual Temptation

2:6b–14. Jewish Law Helps Restrain from Vice

2:15–23. Moses and Jacob Conquered Anger

2:24–3:5. Reason Does Not Rule over Its Own Emotions, such as Ignorance

3:6–18. David Resisted Irrational Thirst

II. Reason's Supremacy Demonstrated from Maccabean Martyrs (3:19–17:6)

A. Historical Background of the Persecution (3:19–4:26)

3:19–4:14. Apollonius's attempt on the Temple treasury

4:15–26. Jason's reforms and Antiochus's persecution

B. Martyrdom of Eleazar (5:1–7:23)

C. Martyrdom of the Seven Brothers (8:1–14:10)

8:1–14. Introduction of the brothers; Antiochus's offer

8:15–9:9. Cowardly response contrasted with their actual response

9:10–12:19. Torture and death of the seven brothers

13:1–14:10. Philosophical implications of the seven brothers' example

D. Martyrdom of the mother (14:11–17:6)

14:11–15:28. The power of maternal affection and the mother's triumph over it

16:1–4. Relevance of mother's conduct for the thesis

16:5–25. What the mother could have said; what she told her sons

17:1–6. Mother's voluntary death and summary praise of her virtue

III. Concluding Encomium (17:7–18:24)

17:7–18:5. Review of martyrs' triumph as divine athletes

18:6–19. Mother's testimony to her children

18:20–24. Conclusion

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Supremacy of Devout Reason over the Emotions Proven Philosophically (1:1–3:18)

1:1–12. The author presents the thesis to be defended and explains (1:7–12) that he will do so both by argument (1:1–3:18) and by considering the conduct of the Maccabean martyrs (3:19–18:24). The thesis is that "devout reason" is overreign over the emotions. With the adjective "devout" or "pious," the author sounds at once his distinctively Jewish approach to the broader philosophical question of the relation of reason to the passions. For him, true reason is "devout" because it is directed toward God and nurtured by the God-given law of Moses.

The Greek word pathos, commonly rendered "emotion," could also be translated by "passion" or "affection." All schools of Greek philosophy were in agreement that reason should be superior to the passions or emotions, but they disagreed about the degree of mastery possible and the means of achieving such mastery. The earliest Stoics had argued that the emotions must be extirpated entirely, resulting in a state of apatheia, passionless perfection. Thus the author's claim that reason does not destroy the emotions but only resists yielding to them has been cited as evidence that he diverges (intentionally or otherwise) from pure Stoic dogma. But Stoics such as Posidonius (ca. 135–51 BCE) had modified the older Stoic teaching about the passions, arguing that they were in fact innate to a person (cf. 2:21–22), and hence that they were to be controlled rather than eradicated. Thus it is possible that the author may be entirely consistent with a later Stoic position. On his claims about the passions, see also 1:28–29; 3:2–5.

The author also explains (1:10–12) how the praise of the martyrs is related to his principal theme: the martyrs' ability to despise suffering illustrates his claim that "reason controls the emotions." To be sure, the martyrs are more than simply evidence of a thesis: they are also national heroes, for their virtue and steadfastness resulted in the downfall of the "tyrant," the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes.

2:7–23. The author was clearly aware of the charge that the Mosaic law seemed too arbitrary and particular for it to count as philosophical. Before illustrating the way that Eleazar was a "true philosopher" (5–7), he first notes that the legislation itself has the power to improve people morally. For instance, if one follows the law, one is forced to lend without interest (2:8; cf. Exod 22:25; Lev 25:35–37; Deut 23:19–20) and to cancel debts in the seventh year (Deut 15:1–11), and hence, even a "lover of money" is forced to overcome his or her base inclination. A host of related examples are adduced. Importantly, the author notes that the law is superior to the power of familial and friendly attachments (2:10–13) in that it enjoins rebuke. This prepares the way for the author's reflections on the family affections of the brothers and their mother (4 Macc 13–14). With the examples of Moses and Jacob, the author argues that the law and reason can master even anger: Moses did nothing rash to Dathan and Abiram when they grumbled against him (Num 16:12–15, 23–25, although the biblical account does claim that Moses was "very angry!"); and Jacob censured Simeon and Levi for their savage treatment of the Shechemites (Gen 34). In a fascinating theological reflection on the source of the emotions, the author affirms that God "planted" the emotions and inclinations in humans, but that God also set the mind as governor over them (2:21–22). To this enthroned mind God gave the law. The claim that those obedient to the law have a "kingdom" echoes the famous claim of the Stoics that only the wise man was truly a king (cf. 14:2).

2:24–3:5. The author concedes that reason cannot deal with "its own emotions," such as forgetfulness and ignorance; rather, its proper control is over the emotions of the body. Nevertheless, even passions of the mind, such as anger or malice, can be resisted by reason so that they do not gain the upper hand.

3:6–18. The example of King David's ability to resist his irrational thirst is perhaps not best suited for the problem of reason's ability to rule over its own passions (e.g. forgetfulness and ignorance). The illustration is, however, a fascinating interpretation and expansion of the incident recorded in 2 Sam 23:13–17 and 1 Chr 11:15–19. Several details are added to the biblical account to accentuate the irrationality of David's thirst and the challenge of resisting it: David was extremely thirsty; there were springs where he was; the two young soldiers who fetched the water did so at tremendous risk (in the books of Samuel and Chronicles it is three warriors, and the dangers of their mission are not so great).

II. Reason's Supremacy Demonstrated from Maccabean Martyrs (3:19–17:6)

3:19–4:26. An abridged version of the events of 2 Macc 3–6 sets the scene for the martyrdoms, which will occupy the remainder of the book (4 Macc 5–18). In condensing 2 Maccabees the author has changed and garbled a few details. The attempted seizure of the Temple funds (3:20) took place not under Seleucus Nicanor (311–281 BCE) but Seleucus IV Philopator (187–175 BCE); furthermore, Seleucus was not the father of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (4:15) but his brother. Finally, in 2 Macc 3 it is Heliodorus, not Apollonius, who is prevented from stealing funds from the Temple treasury. None of these details is as important for the author as giving an explanation for why God allowed such terrible persecution. So long as there was a righteous high priest and good conduct in Jerusalem, God came to the Temple's defense (3:19–4:14); it was the unlawful reforms of the high priest Jason (175–72 BCE) that angered "divine justice" and brought Antiochus's persecution as punishment (4:15–26). Because it was unlawful behavior that brought about the dire persecution, it is fitting that the deaths of the martyrs "for the sake of the law" (6:27) reverse Israel's fortunes (cf. 17:22).

5:1–7:23. Whereas the events leading up to the persecution under Antiochus have been condensed, the relatively brief account of Eleazar's martyrdom (2 Macc 6:18–31) is here greatly expanded so that the philosophical validity of Eleazar's actions—and indeed the philosophical nature of the law itself—can be defended. At stake is nothing less than whether the practice of Judaism is consistent with the highest principles of philosophy. Most schools of ancient philosophy were in agreement that life should be lived "according to nature." Antiochus thus questions whether Eleazar can really be a "philosopher" when he "senselessly" refuses something nature has given, such as pork (5:5–12). Furthermore, Antiochus adds, God would surely forgive a minor transgression committed under such duress (5:13; cf. 8:22).

5:14–38. Eleazar replies to both arguments. To eat defiling food would not be a minor transgression, for it would be tantamount to despising the whole law, since all transgressions are of equal value (5:19–21). Furthermore, the Jews' reputation for piety was at stake (5:17–18; cf. 6:18), and, as Eleazar will note later, he should not set a bad example for others (6:19). As for the weightier charge that the particular food laws were irrational and unnatural, Eleazar responds along two lines. First, he claims that the law engenders such universally recognized virtues as "self-control," "courage," "justice," and "piety" (the first three of these belong to the four "cardinal" virtues), and therefore the law is philosophically worthy. Second, he notes that God the lawgiver is also God the Creator of all things; hence God's particular stipulations in the law must reflect what is best for his creatures (5:25–26).

6:1–35. The gruesome details of Eleazar's torture and death demonstrate the extent of his self-mastery and introduce the athletic motif (6:10) that will recur in the other martyrdoms (9:8; 11:20–21; 14:5; 15:29; 16:16; 17:11–16). Eleazar's concern for setting a good example means that he cannot even pretend to eat pork (6:15–23). Eleazar prays that his voluntary ("I might have saved myself") suffering and death could count vicariously for the Jewish people (6:27–29). His blood is to purify them and his life is given as ransom for theirs, an idea that is later echoed by the first brother (9:24) and developed by the author (17:20–22).

From this lurid account of torture the author draws a conclusion relevant to his initial thesis: Eleazar's conduct illustrates that "devout reason is sovereign over the emotions" (6:31) for it "has mastered agonies" (6:35).

7:1–23. Eleazar is praised in terms reminiscent of a Stoic sage: by his deeds he has proven that his "divine philosophy" is true (7:9). Because Eleazar's death constituted an "atoning sacrifice" that saved Israel (17:22; 6:27–29), he is compared to Aaron, who "made atonement for the people" to stop the plague (Num 16:46–50). Like Isaac (Gen 22:1–19), Eleazar was willing to be slain.

As earlier (1:5; 2:24), the author now addresses imagined objections (7:17–23). In this case the question does not go to the heart of his claim that reason can control the emotions; rather, the counter argument simply notes that not all people have "prudent reason." The author is actually in agreement with this "objection," for he claims that only those who "attend to religion with a whole heart" (7:18), only the "wise and courageous" (7:23), master their emotions. Once again, philosophy and "faith" in God are combined (7:21) in a uniquely Jewish synthesis.

8:1–9:9. In order to show just how great a temptation the brothers overcame, the author first imagines how they might have spoken had they been "cowardly and unmanly" (8:16–26) before he reports what they actually said (9:1–9). Likewise the mother's hypothetical speech (16:6–11) is presented before her actual response (16:16–23). In both cases, the hypothetical discourse proposes various plausible reasons to submit to the king's order. One suspects that some such arguments in favor of assimilation were current in the author's day and that he sought to counter their seductive logic. The brothers are introduced as "handsome," and their beauty makes an impression on the king (8:4, 5, 10), suggesting that it is he, rather than these young men, who is the victim of his passions.

9:10–12:19. In an almost formulaic fashion, each of the seven brothers endures brutal torture and speaks defiantly to the king before dying. Their bold responses to the tyrant cast them as true philosophers who take no notice of human status. The fact that the brothers appear from oldest to youngest heightens the pathos of the account and illustrates that reason can overcome the innate weakness of youth. In fact, the seventh brother (12:1–19) is so young that even the king feels compassion and allows him to speak with his mother. She, however, advises him in the "Hebrew language" (12:7), a detail that not only invokes the unique heritage of the Israelites but also heightens the suspense, as it leaves both Antiochus and the readers unsure what she has advised him to do. The king and his friends believe that the boy has come to his senses, and they set him free (12:9), but, just as his brothers had done, he audaciously informs Antiochus that eternal "tortures" await him (12:12, 18; cf. 9:32; 10:11, 21; 11:3, 23) and chastises him for ignoring the fact that his victims "are made of the same elements" as he is (12:13). As will his mother (17:1), the last brother takes his own life (12:19). Stoics and some Jews believed that suicide was permissible—and even noble—in certain dire circumstances (cf. 2 Macc 14:37–46).

13:1–14:10. After noting that the brothers' triumph over their passions demonstrates the initial thesis (13:1–7), the author then (13:8–14:10) reflects on the power of their brotherly affection. Although the author praises such familial affection as a gift of "all-wise Providence" (13:19), he also recognizes that brotherly love was an emotion to be "overcome" (14:1; cf. 2:9–12).

14:11–20. He makes a similar argument about the mother's overcoming her love for her children. Even in "unreasoning animals" the parental instinct to protect progeny is strong. Hence the mother's dramatic choice of religion over her own children is all the more remarkable, and she can be likened to Abraham (14:20), who was willing to sacrifice Isaac in obedience to God. When faced with a choice between "religion" and her children, the mother rightly chose religion; but it is a religion "that preserves them for eternal life" (15:3), so that in a sense, she, like Abraham, will get her children back. That the mother belongs to the "weaker sex" (15:5) represents a widespread prejudice (cf. 1 Pet 3:7). The ability of a woman—and a mother—to control her passions is the greatest proof of the author's central thesis. It is obvious just how gendered a virtue self-control was in the ancient world, for the author claims that the mother showed "a man's courage" (15:23) and indeed acted more courageously than "males" (15:30; cf. 16:14).

16:15–23. Whereas 5:4 and 8:3 suggest that the mother and her sons were brought into Antiochus after Eleazar had been killed, here the author reports how the mother exhorted her children to martyrdom as though they had witnessed his death. Her argument emphasizes shame and honor: if an elderly man can endure such torments, it would be shameful for these young men to cower.

17:1–18:5. After the gory and detailed treatment of the demise of Eleazar and the brothers, the mother's death is announced with striking brevity (17:1–6): she commits herself to the flames lest the guards touch her body, thus highlighting her modesty. (On voluntary death, cf. 12:19.) This final praise of the mother likens her and her sons to the stars, perhaps indicating a sort of astral mode of immortality (cf. Dan 12:3). The author believes in the immortality of the soul (9:22; 14:5; 15:3; 16:13; 17:12; 18:23) rather than in the resurrection of the body (cf. Philo and the Wisdom of Solomon).

III. Concluding Encomium (17:7–18:24)

In a concluding reflection on the accomplishment of the martyrs (17:7–18:5), they are presented as victorious athletes who triumphed over the tyrant before the entire world (17:11–16; cf. 6:10; 9:22). Such metaphors were common in philosophical language as well as in early Christian discourse (cf. Heb 12:1).

17:20–22. The martyrs' deaths are said to have caused the overthrow of Antiochus and the purification of the homeland (cf. 6:27–29; 9:22). The language used for the martyrs' deaths bears striking resemblance to that used by Christians for the death of Jesus, as their deaths are called a "ransom" (cf. Mark 10:45) and an "atoning sacrifice" (cf. Rom 3:24; cf. also 1 Tim 2:6; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet 1:19). The idea of one person's death applying vicariously to others is uncommon in the OT and in other ancient Jewish writings, but was well known from Greek literature.

18:10–19. The mother recounts that her deceased husband had faithfully taught their sons "the law and the prophets." Jews in the ancient world took great pride in their ancestral scriptures and in the fact that they saw to the education of their young.

18:20–24. The entire work concludes with a recapitulation of the torture the martyrs underwent. The author understands that it would be natural to lament such suffering. But because the martyrs will receive "immortal souls from God" (18:23), any lament must be paradoxical: their trial was "bitter . . . and yet not bitter" (18:20), for through their steadfast piety, they saved their country, brought down the tyrant, and won themselves a place in the heavenly chorus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. J. Bickerman. "The Date of Fourth Maccabees." Studies in Jewish and Christian History. 3 vols. (Leiden: Brill, 1976) 1:275–81; J. J. Collins. Between Athens and Jerusalem. 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); D. A. deSilva. 4 Maccabees: Introduction and Commentary on the Greek Text in Codex Sinaiticus. Septuagint Commentary Series (Leiden: Brill, 2006); M. Hadas. The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (New York: Harper, 1953); S. K. Stowers. "4 Maccabees." The HarperCollins Bible Commentary. J. L. Mays, ed. (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2000); R. B. Townshend. "The Fourth Book of Maccabees." The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. R. H. Charles, ed. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1913) 2:653–85).

2 ESDRAS

BRUCE W. LONGENECKER

OVERVIEW

Is God really just? Are God's ways knowable? If they are, are they understandable, and are they fair? Might God say one thing and do another? And what happens when the experiences of life don't seem to match up to traditionally-established doctrines? How reliable are scriptural accounts of God's ways and character? Might the Scriptures even be misleading in what they depict as fundamental realities of life?

In the course of their lives, many people in the Judaeo-Christian tradition have undergone crises of faith, in which questions of this sort are probed with existential urgency. This is no less the case for the author of 4 Ezra (i.e., the main text in a collection of three that were written separately by different authors, but which are now assembled together to form a document called 2 Esdras). In fact, the unnamed (and presumably male) author of 4 Ezra strides into the deepest and most troubling theological waters without hesitation. The main character of 4 Ezra holds his fists up high in defiance as he relentlessly pursues both a truthful and a theologically acceptable answer to his probing questions, with a deep aversion to trite theological reasoning. In the process, he tackles some of the toughest issues regarding God's own character and justice, and does so in a manner that is virtually uncontested in the ancient world in its indefatigable wrestling with the perceived contradictions between the mainstays of mainstream theology on the one hand and, on the other, key experiences and observations on life.

People of faith are often forced to probe pressing issues of theodicy, such as: If God is all-powerful, merciful, and loving, why is there evil in the world, to the extent that the innocent suffer tragically at the hands of perpetrators of horror? If the author of 4 Ezra probes these issues obstinately, he does so not in relation to his own individual experiences of life per se. Instead, he asks them on behalf of the suffering people of Israel, to whom he belonged. The event that triggered his reflections was the humiliating destruction of the Jerusalem Temple in 70 CE by Rome (although he writes as if he were the prophet Ezra of old). When the forces of Rome took on the all-sovereign power of the almighty creator God in the Jewish war of 66–70 CE, the vile evils that prop up the rule of Rome should have been overthrown in an almighty victory that established the people of Israel as the apple of God's eye at the expense of the Gentile nations. Instead, the people of Israel have been humiliated and the name of Israel's God has been shamed and disgraced, with the gods of pagan Rome having triumphed. How can this be?

OUTLINE

I. A Christian Prophecy and Apocalypse 1:1–2:48

A. The Rejection of Israel as God's People (1:1–2:9)

B. The Election of the Church as God's People (2:10–48)

II. A Jewish Apocalypse 3:1–14:48

A. The First Dialogue (3:1–5:20)

B. The Second Dialogue (5:21–6:34)

C. The Third Dialogue (6:35–9:25)

D. The Vision of the Woman in Mourning (9:26–10:59)

E. The Vision of the Eagle and the Lion (11:1–12:51)

F. The Vision of the Man from the Sea (13:1–58)

G. Ezra the Scribe (14:1–48)

III. A Christian Prophecy and Apocalypse 15:1–16:78

A. Oracles of Doom Against the Nations (15:1–16:34)

B. Exhortations to God's Suffering People (16:35–78)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

The theological project of 4 Ezra is contained within seven distinct sections within chs. 3–14 of 2 Esdras (with the later texts 5 Ezra comprising 2 Esd 1–2 and 6 Ezra comprising Esd 15–16; these texts are discussed below). The first three sections of 4 Ezra are lengthy dialogues between Ezra, who probes into the ways of God, and the angel Uriel, who responds (often in frustratingly curt and lackadaisical ways), giving Ezra what appears to be the divine perspective on things. Throughout these dialogues (2 Esd 3:1–5:20; 5:21–6:34; and 6:35–9:15), Ezra insists that God must be a merciful God, for his people and the whole of humanity have no hope unless God's grace meets their failings (see esp. his three appeals to God in 7:132–8:62). On the other hand, Uriel leaves little room for mercy in the character of God; only those who are completely without failings in this age will enjoy God's gracious salvation in the age to come (see esp. 7:45–61). Ezra intimates that Uriel's understanding falls short of the depiction of God known in Israel's Scriptures, for without the mercy of God, no one can enjoy God's salvation. Uriel responds that a few will benefit from God's salvation, but only a few, a tiny handful. Moreover, their salvation will be attributed not to God's grace but to the perfection that they have exhibited throughout the whole of their life. Ezra is baffled and dissatisfied.

Although the fourth section (2 Esd 9:26– 10:60) begins as if it were yet another dialogue, it quickly changes its format, as Ezra is overcome by a vision of a woman weeping over her lost son, much like Ezra was in despair over the loss of almost all of the people of Israel, who will no doubt fail to experience God's salvation. The experience allows Ezra to externalize his despair, allowing him to move on to a new phase of his quest, as in the final three episodes of 4 Ezra. In the fifth and sixth episodes (2 Esd 11:1–12:51 and 13:1–58 respectively), Ezra is shown further visions of the overwhelming power of God, who demolishes the all-encompassing control of evil within this world (including Rome itself) and who saves Israel—a twelve-tribe Israel comprised of (1) a few from the two tribes of Israel who have remained in Judea and (2) a ten-tribe conglomerate who have been living perfectly in a land far away (see esp. 13:21– 52). In the final seventh episode (2 Esd 14:1–48), Ezra is instructed to restore the Scriptures to the people of Israel, and to write a further seventy books wherein real knowledge and understanding of God's ways reside. Meanwhile, the people of Israel are kept in the dark about their desperate situation, but are to continue to praise God in the expectation that he will be merciful to them.

We cannot tell whether the author was ultimately satisfied with his own theological probings. But later authors were, it seems, as Christian authors elaborated the text of 4 Ezra with their own textual additions. The other two texts in 2 Esdras include 5 Ezra (= 2 Esd 1–2) and 6 Ezra (2 Esd 15–16). Both were written by Christian authors. Fifth Ezra was probably written in the middle of the second century CE, with the author seeking to demonstrate that God's favor had been transferred from Israel to the Gentiles. Sixth Ezra, written in the second half of the third century, piggy-backs onto the end of 4 Ezra, drawing out themes of the solemn judgment of God against sinners and the consequent requirement for God's people to live a godly life. But it is 4 Ezra that is the theological giant of the three texts of 2 Esdras, standing high above much of the theological literature of the ancient world in terms of its theological acumen and profundity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Coggins. The First and Second Books of Esdras. CBC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); D. Harrington. Invitation to the Apocrypha (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 185–206.

MATTHEW

STEPHEN WESTERHOLM

OVERVIEW

The Gospel of Matthew stands appropriately at the beginning of the NT, in closest proximity to the Old. Like all the writers of the NT, Matthew believes that the God who spoke to Israel in the past through prophets has now spoken—"in these last days," the days of fulfillment—through the Son of God himself (so Heb 1:1–2; cf. Matt 17:5). But more than any other evangelist, Matthew is concerned to link the old revelation with the new, to show the latter as the culmination rather than the abrogation of what went before.

Early church tradition explained this emphasis by saying that Matthew, a disciple of Jesus, wrote the Gospel for the Jewish people, and in Hebrew, though the work was later translated into Greek. That the original audience of the Gospel was primarily Jewish seems likely enough; but in the view of most scholars today, the Gospel was composed not in Hebrew, but in Greek, and in fact takes over the basic structure and often the very wording of another Greek composition, the Gospel of Mark. Some scholars allow some truth to the church tradition by suggesting that the Apostle Matthew may have put together a collection of sayings of Jesus that was then drawn upon by the writer of our (Greek) Gospel. But the Gospel writer himself is unknown, though it is customary and convenient to refer to him as "Matthew."

If Matthew used the Gospel of Mark as a source, then he must have been writing after 70 CE, the approximate date of Mark's composition. (We may note as well that Matt 22:7 appears to reflect an awareness of the fall of Jerusalem to Roman forces in 70 CE.) Since the Gospel was familiar to Ignatius of Antioch, writing in the early second century, its own date of composition was presumably in the decade of the 80s or early 90s. Antioch is perhaps the city most often suggested as the place of origin for the Gospel; but other areas where Jewish believers in Christ rubbed shoulders, and disputed questions of faith, with non-Christ-believing Jews are also possibilities.

Matthew's evident concern is to tell the story of Jesus, who is center stage in nearly every episode in the Gospel. Jesus is important for Matthew, not as a gifted human being whose religious intuitions, insights, and experiences can inspire others, but as the focus and instrument of God's activity on earth. That activity is seen as the continuation and climax of the OT drama of God's dealings with the covenant people of Israel. Matthew's main theme is an OT theme, the "kingdom of God" or "of heaven," where "heaven" serves as a circumlocution for "God." In one sense, God's kingdom (or rule) is a universal and eternal reality, whether or not humans choose to submit to it (cf. Ps 103:19; 145:13; Dan 4:3). But in the face of human hostility to that rule, God established a covenant with Israel in order that, among the covenant people, and as a model for all the peoples of the earth, God's rule might be realized (note the reference to the "throne of the LORD" in Israel in 1 Chr 29:23).

Yet even in Israel the rule of God remained an ideal, or a future hope, far removed from the everyday reality of human frailty and faithlessness, and from the brutal reality of suffering and oppression to which the people of God were subjected. The good news of the Gospel is that, in the person of God's Son, God has intervened to reassert the rightful rule of "the kingdom of heaven" and to impart its blessings to the covenant people of Israel and, ultimately, to all nations. In Jesus, the power of God's rule is at work, freeing the sick and oppressed from their afflictions, anticipating the day when all evil will be banished. Through Jesus, God's forgiveness and a place in the kingdom is offered to all, even to those whose lives of open sin have hitherto cut them off from the company of the devout (cf. Matt 9:9–13; 11:19). Indeed, not only does Jesus offer to all God's forgiveness; in the end, he offers his own life to make such forgiveness possible (26:28). But participation in the blessings of God's kingdom presupposes submission to its rule, and in much of Matthew's Gospel Jesus spells out the demands of that rule: those who would obey God are to listen to the voice of God's Son (17:5; cf. 10:40) and become his disciples (28:19–20). Such discipleship is costly, for a world in rebellion against God's rule will prove hostile to its subjects (10:16–39). But they may rest assured of God their Father's provision and care (6:8, 25–33; 10:29–31), and of the reward that awaits them when Jesus returns in power and glory and the kingdom of God is consummated (16:27; cf. 25:14–30).

One way of summarizing the content of Matthew's Gospel, then, is to say that the God who spoke to Israel of old through the prophets has now spoken decisively in the person of God's Son. But the conviction underlying the writing of Matthew's Gospel is that the God who has spoken through the Son still speaks to the hearts of those who listen attentively to the stories and words of Jesus. In the words of the Gospel, Matthew intends his readers to hear for themselves the invitation to God's kingdom, the summons to discipleship. Not that Matthew addresses his readers directly with these challenges; in this respect he is like the authors and editors of the prophetic books of the OT who collected, shaped, and transmitted the words God spoke through the prophets in the belief that, though originally directed to a particular context in the past, they remain vehicles through which God addresses later generations. In the truth of that conviction lies the justification for the never-ending process of interpreting and proclaiming the ancient texts of Holy Scripture.

OUTLINE

I. The Coming of Messiah (1:1–4:11)

A. Jesus' Genealogy and Birth (1:1–25)

B. Worship from Afar, Hostility at Home (2:1–23)

C. Messiah's Forerunner (3:1–12)

D. The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus (3:13–4:11)

II. The Mission of Messiah (4:12–28:20)

A. The Launch of Messiah's Ministry (4:12–25)

B. Messiah, Mighty in Word (5:1–7:29)

5:1–16. The People of God in the Midst of the World

5:17–48. The Greater Righteousness of God's Rule

6:1–34. Children of the Heavenly Father

7:1–29. Accountability and the Judgment

C. Messiah, Mighty in Deed (8:1–9:38)

8:1–17. Initial Healings

8:18–27. The Cost of Discipleship

8:28–9:38. Deeds that Offend

D. The Disciples' Mission (10:1–42)

10:1–4. Empowerment for the Mission

10:5–15. The Disciples' Task

10:16–42. The Response to the Disciples

E. Responses to Jesus (11:1–12:50)

11:1–19. Jesus and John

11:20–30. Woes for the Unrepentant, Rest for the Weary

12:1–21. Sabbath Controversies

12:22–37. Blasphemy Against the Spirit

12:38–50. Unbelief and Its Consequences, Obedience and Its Rewards

F. The Mysteries of the Kingdom in Parables (13:1–52)

13:1–9, 18–33, 36–50. The Parables

13:10–17, 34–35, 51–52. Why Parables?

G. The Mysteries of God's Son (13:53–17:27)

13:53–58. Offense in Nazareth

14:1–12. The Death of John the Baptist

14:13–36. Bread for the Hungry, Peace in the Storm

15:1–20. Religion of the Lips

15:21–39. The Cry of a Heart and the Feeding of a Crowd

16:1–12. Blind Foes and Dense Disciples

16:13–17:8. The Revelation of Jesus Christ

17:9–27. Earthly Realities

H. Church Matters (18:1–35)

18:1–14. The Community of Little Ones

18:15–35. Dealing with Offenders

I. On the Way to the Cross (19:1–23:39)

19:1–15. Family Matters

19:16–30. The Lure of Wealth

20:1–34. Serving Self or Others?

21:1–22:14. The Kingdom Offered— and Rejected—in Jerusalem

22:15–46. Putting Jesus to the Test

23:1–39. Woes and Warnings

J. The Last Days (24:1–25:46)

24:3–31. The Troubles of the Last Days

24:32–25:46. The Call to Readiness

K. Death and Resurrection (26:1–28:20)

26:1–27:66. The Passion of the Savior

28:1–20. The Risen Lord

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Coming of Messiah (1:1–4:11)

A. Jesus' Genealogy and Birth (1:1–25)

Matthew links the old revelation with the new by tracing the genealogy of Jesus back to Abraham, forefather of God's covenant people Israel. The genealogy is carefully structured around pivotal points in Israel's history, reaching its climax in the coming of Messiah.

The opening words ("account of the genealogy") are ambiguous ("genealogy" [Greek genesis] may also mean "birth" [as in 1:18], or even "history") but suggestive: borrowing words that appear in the Greek translation of Gen 2:4 and 5:1, Matthew implies that the story he tells represents both a new beginning ("genesis") and the culmination of the sacred history begun in (the old book of) Genesis. The juxtaposition (in 1:1) of "Jesus" with "the Messiah" (or "Christ") indicates that the significance of neither name is properly understood apart from the other. Though Matthew will insist that Jesus is more than (merely) the "son of David" (22:41–46), the latter title is nonetheless important as a designation of the Messiah (cf. 2 Sam 7:12; Jer 23:5). In addition to showing Jesus' Jewish ancestry, "son of Abraham" suggests that he represents the fulfillment of promises given to the patriarch.

Following the custom of Jewish genealogies, Jesus' forefathers are listed (1:2–16), even though this entails giving the ancestry of Joseph, his adopted father, rather than that of Mary, his real mother (note the careful wording of 1:16). The artificial division of Jesus' ancestors into three groups of fourteen generations (note, e.g., the omission—necessary if the number fourteen is to be achieved—of three generations in 1:8–9 from the list found in 1 Chr 3:11–12) marks the genealogy as a vehicle designed to convey a gospel truth rather than merely inform curiosity: the appearance of Jesus (Matthew wants readers to know) represents the next great event—after the call of Abraham, the reign of David, and the Babylonian exile—in God's dealings with Israel. Equally telling is the inclusion of selected women in the genealogy. These are not, as one might at least have expected, the matriarchs of Israel, but women whose foreign roots (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth) or immoral past (that "David was the father of Solomon by the wife of another man" [1:6] highlights the adultery involved) might be thought to exclude them from a place in God's program for Israel. Mention of precisely these women serves to highlight the universal embrace of the gospel.

The birth of any human being is a miracle (cf. Ps 139:13–16); that of the Son of God was, appropriately, more miraculous still, though unfolding according to divine plan (Matt 1:22–23; cf. Isa 7:14). Between the betrothal and the wedding of Mary to Joseph (1:18), and apart from any sexual relations between them (1:25), Mary conceived a child by the power of the Holy Spirit (1:18). (Chrysostom notes that, since neither the angel nor Matthew could say more than that the conception was the work of God's Spirit, human inquisitiveness should proceed no further.) The event (like others in the story that follows) carried with it its own possibility of misunderstanding and offence (1:19; cf. 11:6); but Joseph, believing the divine word he received, took Mary as his wife. That word (1:21) indicated that the child to be born would "save his people [in the first place, Israel, but ultimately, all who believe in him; cf. 26:27–28] from their sins." Salvation from sins begins with their forgiveness, but includes as well the enablement of those forgiven to live as God's children (cf. 5:13–48), and the hope, one day, of deliverance from the very effects of sin, including disease and death (cf. 8:1–17, 28–9:8, etc.).

The significance of Jesus' appearance is further indicated by the name Emmanuel, "God is with us" (1:23). At the least, the name indicates that the birth of the Messiah is a fresh token of God's favor toward Israel. But the term also suggests that Jesus' appearance brings the presence of God into the midst of the covenant people, a suggestion confirmed by later echoes of the promise in which Jesus substitutes his own presence for that of his heavenly Father (18:20; 28:20).

B. Worship from Afar, Hostility at Home (2:1–23)

In writing of "wise men from the East" who worship Christ, Matthew wants to move his readers to do the same. At the same time he shows how the coming of Christ encounters hostility from the start. The story also provides further opportunity to show how all Scripture points to Christ.

The OT scriptures had spoken of a day when, drawn by the appearance of God's glory, the kings and peoples of the earth would bring treasures ("gold and frankincense") to Jerusalem (Isa 60:1–7); Israel's king would receive the tribute of rulers and nations (Ps 72:10–11, 15). In a story that recalls these expectations, Matthew tells how mysterious "wise men from the East," bearing precious gifts ("gold, frankincense, and myrrh") for Israel's new-born king, are guided by a miraculous star (cf. Num 24:17) to the infant Jesus. The Greek verb rendered "pay homage" (2:2, 8, 11) is elsewhere translated "worship" (e.g., 4:10; 28:17). Jesus is repeatedly the object of such "homage" or "worship" in Matthew's Gospel; it is never suggested to be inappropriate (contrast Acts 10:25–26; Rev 19:10; 22:8–9) in spite of the reminder that worship belongs to God alone (Matt 4:9–10).

Foreign "wise men" gladly submit to the revelation they receive; not so, Herod and "all Jerusalem" (2:3). King Herod (2:1, 3) finds the reference to a new king's birth (2:2) threatening. Jerusalem, whose religious leadership is able to cite Scripture to identify Messiah's birthplace (2:6, which combines Mic 5:2 and 2 Sam 5:2), is equally troubled. Its inhabitants find disruptive and disturbing the notion that the God whom they worship might be about to act in their midst. The opposition of "chief priests" and "scribes" is a motif that runs throughout the Gospel; that of Herod comes to an immediate head as he seeks, first surreptitiously, then with open savagery, to kill the Christ-child (2:7–8, 16). His actions recall those of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites in Egypt (Exod 1:15–22). In both stories, innocent children die, but the designs of the tyrant are foiled by the preservation of one destined to be the instrument of his people's redemption (Exod 2:1–10; Matt 2:12–18). That Matthew wants readers to see Israel's story recapitulated in Jesus is evident when he tells of the infant's forced sojourn in Egypt (2:13–15; cf. Ps 105:16–23), when he applies to Christ the prophetic text "Out of Egypt I have called my son" (2:15; cf. Hos 11:1), and when he draws upon a prophetic lament over past devastations in Israel to characterize the grief that followed Herod's massacre of Bethlehem's children (2:17–18; cf. Jer 31:15).

In response to an angelic message (2:19–20, echoing Exod 4:19), Joseph returns with Mary and her child to the land of Israel, settling in the Galilean town of Nazareth. Again, Matthew sees a fulfillment of divine purposes set forth in Scripture, though 2:23 recalls the purport of several passages rather than any one particular text (note that Matthew refers in the plural to "prophets"): Isa 4:3; 11:1; 49:6; and even Judg 13:5 are among those that have been proposed. By a play on words, "Nazorean" suggests both the city of Jesus' upbringing and the holiness associated with Nazirite vows (Num 6:1–21; cf. Judg 13:3–7).

C. Messiah's Forerunner (3:1–12)

The work of Jesus is not to be understood apart from that of John the Baptist. Scripture itself—foreseeing, in advance of the appearance of the Lord, a "voice" preparing his way (Matt 3:3, where the "LORD" of Isa 40:3 is understood as Christ)—requires the linkage. Moreover, by its very nature, the rule of God that Jesus inaugurates requires the judgment of which John speaks: given that participation in God's kingdom is only possible for those prepared to submit to its rule, exclusion is inevitable for those who do not.

"In those days" (3:1; i.e., while Jesus was still in Nazareth, before beginning his messianic activity), John announced the imminent coming of God's kingdom and called for a repentance that signaled both penitence for the past and a determination to make oneself ready for the advent of God's rule (3:2). John's austere lifestyle (recalling that of Elijah; cf. 2 Kgs 1:8) comported well with the seriousness of his message, prioritizing obedience to God over earthly comfort (3:4). Religious leaders—including both Pharisees, known for their exacting interpretation and scrupulous observance of the ancestral law, and Sadducees, from whose ranks were drawn the upper levels of the priestly hierarchy—were warned that the impending judgment respects no persons, that leaders of others cannot afford not to examine themselves. The criterion of judgment for all is that of appropriate conduct; such externalities as physical descent from Abraham are irrelevant (3:7–9). John's announcement of impending doom was itself an indirect summons to produce "fruit" that would prove to be "good" on the day of judgment (3:10).

The repentance that John urged was outwardly expressed by baptism, accompanied by the confession of sins (3:5–6). Unlike the repeated washings prescribed for ritual uncleanness in Mosaic law, John's baptism represented a once-for-all commitment to a lifestyle befitting one who welcomes the arrival of God's kingdom. John distinguished this preparatory baptism "with water" from the baptism "with the Holy Spirit and fire" to be brought by the Messiah (3:11). "Holy Spirit and fire" may refer separately to the grace of the Holy Spirit granted to the repentant and the ("fiery") judgment that awaits the impenitent. Alternatively, the words may together refer to the divine holiness that must consume, whenever it comes in contact with, all wickedness.

D. The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus (3:13– 4:11)

Honoring John's divine mission (cf. 11:7–11; 21:23–27), modeling the humility he will require of his followers (cf. 20:20–28), and identifying himself with those whose sins he will bear (cf. 3:5–6; 8:17; 20:28), Jesus begins the work he has been given to do (cf. John 17:4) by coming to John to be baptized. John humbly protests his unworthiness, then shows the true humility of obedience. As soon as Jesus is baptized, "the heavens . . . opened" to signal a divine communication. God's Spirit "like a dove" descends on Jesus (thus fulfilling Isa 42:1; cf. Matt 12:18), a sign that his mission, empowered by God's Spirit (cf. 12:28), is about to begin. And God the Father himself speaks the Word that must be inwardly heard by all who follow Jesus (cf. 16:16–17): "This is my Son, the Beloved, with whom I am well pleased" (3:17; cf. Ps 2:7; Isa 42:1). Luther's paraphrase captures Matthew's message: "If you desire that I be a gracious Father, you may rest assured. Only hold fast to my Son, with whom I cannot be at enmity, and you will be beloved of me also because of him. So hear him and do what he says to you." Following his identification as God's Son, Jesus proves himself a loyal son before beginning his public activities. Like Israel (also called God's "son"; cf. Exod 4:22–23) in the wilderness, Jesus is tempted by hunger (cf. Exod 16:3), by the impulse to put God to the test (Exod 17:1–7; Ps 95:7–11), and by the worship of false gods (Exod 32:1–8). Unlike Israel of old, he withstands each temptation.

Even temptations find a place in God's purpose, though they are neither to be sought (Matt 6:13; 26:41) nor entered with any presumption of strength (contrast 26:31–35): Jesus is led "by the Spirit" to be tempted (4:1). His forty-day fast recalls those of Moses (Deut 9:9, 18), as well as Israel's forty years in the wilderness (Deut 8:2). In the first temptation, Jesus is urged to use his power as God's Son to satisfy his hunger, and thus to fend for himself apart from the Father's will. He responds to Satan, here and in the temptations that follow, not by invoking his unique prerogatives as God's Son, but with the tools available to any tempted human being, and with the spirit of all who are faithful: Scripture is cited, the will of God obeyed. More essential to life than bread itself is the spiritual nourishment provided by the Word of God (4:4, citing Deut 8:3).

Satan then seeks to exploit Jesus' very trust in his Father to tempt him to depart from his Father's will: should he not demonstrate his great faith by exposing himself to a danger from which only the miraculous intervention of God could deliver him? But those who truly trust God allow God to determine their steps; to attempt to dictate what God must do is an expression of human presumption, though disguised as extraordinary faith.

Satan then abandons all deception, blatantly offering power and glory in return for misdirected worship. Jesus repulses the temptation, reserving for his Father the worship and service that are due God alone. Only by taking the path of obedience will he come to possess "all authority in heaven and on earth" (28:18).

II. The Mission of Messiah (4:12–28:20)

A. The Launch of Messiah's Ministry (4:12–25)

The public work of Jesus' forerunner ends when John is "arrested" (literally, "handed over," a verb used of Jesus in 17:22; 20:18, etc.; in the service of God's kingdom, John and Jesus share the same fate), a signal that the time of preparation is over. Matthew speaks of Jesus' move to Capernaum (4:13) in terms that echo a text from Isaiah that he then quotes (4:15–16; cf. Isa 9:1–2): as Isaiah foresaw, Jesus brings light to those in darkness. The reference to "Galilee of the Gentiles" hints at the day when Gentiles will be numbered among Jesus' followers (28:19–20).

Jesus' message is summed up (4:17) as an announcement (also made by John; cf. 3:2) that "the kingdom of heaven has come near"; i.e., God, the rightful ruler of all, is about to reassert that rule and put things right that have gone terribly wrong where people have refused to acknowledge God's sovereignty. The news demands immediate action: those who hear it must either welcome it with a demonstration of their allegiance to God's rule or face exclusion from its blessings.

From the very beginning Jesus is accompanied by disciples who will later be responsible for the extension of his mission (10:1–42; 28:18–20; cf. Acts 10:36–42). Matthew's account of the calling of four disciples (4:18–22; cf. 9:9) is sparse in details, focusing on exemplary aspects. The mere words "Follow me" would never have elicited the response they received had the hearers not sensed in them a divine summons; the same is true of the proclamation of the Christian gospel (cf. 1 Thess 2:13). Believers in the gospel, like the first disciples of Jesus, are thus "called of God" (cf. 1 Thess 2:12). Accepting the call means, negatively, abandoning other pursuits. Positively, it means embarking on a life of following Christ.

The chapter concludes (4:23–25) with a summary of Jesus' activities: announcing the good news about the kingdom of God and demonstrating its power, not gratuitously or ostentatiously, but in healing the sick and bringing deliverance to the oppressed. As a result, crowds—though not disciples—multiply.

B. Messiah, Mighty in Word (5:1–7:29)

In the first of five discourses of Jesus in the Gospel (the "Sermon on the Mount," 5:1–7:27), Matthew shows him to be "mighty in . . . word" (Luke 24:19; cf. Matt 7:28–29). The focus of the sermon is on the character and behavior of those who participate in God's rule. Spoken originally on a mountain (5:1, recalling the mountain from which Israel received God's law [Exod 19:16–20:21]) by Jesus to his disciples, Jesus' words come to later disciples from their risen Lord, in possession of "all authority in heaven and on earth": it is at the behest of the risen Lord that they are taught to obey his commands (28:18–20). The identity of the speaker is crucial: the (counterintuitive) declaration that "the meek . . . will inherit the earth" (5:5), the command (counter to human instinct) not to "resist an evildoer" (5:39), the assurance (counter, at times, to all appearances) that the heavenly Father will provide for the needs of those who seek God's kingdom (6:33); these are not the quixotic ideals of a deluded prophet, but reality as disclosed by the Lord of all, a reality now hidden within the kingdoms of this world, but destined one day to supplant them.

5:1–16. The People of God in the Midst of the World. The sermon begins (5:3–12) with a series of beatitudes, a familiar form (cf. Ps 1:1–3; 128:1–4) that identifies first who it is who enjoys God's favor ("the poor in spirit," "those who mourn," etc.), then the manner in which that favor is revealed ("theirs is the kingdom of heaven," "they will be comforted," etc.). The pronouncements, which overturn worldly values and expectations, remain hopeless ideals at odds with reality unless they come from One whose word creates and shapes reality.

The "poor in spirit" are those who, in their desperate need, cry to God for help (cf. Ps 34:18). "Those who mourn" are those grieved by all that is evil in the world and by their own part in its waywardness. The "meek" are those who want no part in the world's pursuit of power, but become like children and serve others. "Those who hunger and thirst for righteousness" are those who long to see all that is good and right prevail in the world—and in their own lives. The "merciful" are those eager to aid all in need, ready to forgive all who wrong them, and charitable in assessing the deeds and motives of others. The "pure in heart" are those who singlemindedly pursue the will of God. The "peacemakers" are those who subordinate their own rights and interests to maintain peace, overcoming evil with good (cf. Rom 12:21). Misfits and persecuted on earth, the poor in spirit, mourners, and meek who follow Jesus will be rewarded with a part in the kingdom of heaven.

Yet followers of Jesus must be faithful to their calling, to the way of life prescribed for them by Jesus, if they are to be a good, not useless, presence in the world (v. 13). The good they do can no more be hidden than can a city built on a hill; but it elicits praise for the divine Source of all good rather than for the conduits of God's goodness (vv. 14–16).

5:17–48. The Greater Righteousness of God's Rule. The grace of the gospel and Jesus' compassion for sinners have at times been mistaken for an acceptance of all kinds of human behavior, erasing distinctions between good and evil (in effect, abolishing God's law [5:17]). In this section of the Sermon on the Mount, the same Jesus who befriends tax collectors and prostitutes declares insults and lustful looks to be sins that deserve damnation. In both cases, God's incarnate goodness is at work: a love that reaches out to the wounded and broken while inexorably opposing every trace of the evil responsible for their brokenness.

Jesus does away with none of God's demands— indeed, as guides to a life in harmony with the wisdom of God's creation, they cannot be done away as long as creation lasts (5:18); rather, he brings them to their intended "fulfillment" (v. 17). While extending forgiveness to every repentant sinner who falls short, he makes no compromise in spelling out the righteousness of God's kingdom, a righteousness far surpassing mere compliance with any legal code, including that comprised by the legal enactments of "scribes and Pharisees" (5:20). He "fulfills" the law, then, not by simply restating its provisions, but rather by vividly portraying the righteousness of God's rule that underlies the Mosaic code, but which that code, as the law of an earthly society of imperfect human beings, can only approximate.

Thus a legal code can prohibit murder and adultery but not outbursts of anger, expressions of contempt, or lustful looks. Jesus does (5:21–30), since these too express human willfulness, not God's rule. Regulated divorce, oaths that guarantee truth-telling when invoked (but presuppose more laxity on other occasions), and retributive justice may be necessary evils in a society of sinners (cf. 19:8), but they can have no place in lives governed by God's goodness (5:31–42). And inasmuch as God's goodness and compassion extend to "all that he has made" (Ps 145:9; cf. Matt 5:45), the love and benevolence of God's children cannot be exclusive, but must be shown even toward those who mistreat them (vv. 43–47). In short, the moral vision of Jesus' followers finds its inspiration, its goal, and its delight in the perfection of divine goodness (5:48).

The language Jesus uses is typically dramatic, even hyperbolic, rather than legal, conveying a vision without attempting to spell out how God's children are to behave in every situation. Reflecting on the pictures Jesus uses, they must understand that they cannot serve God acceptably when they are at odds with other human beings; every attempt must be made to be reconciled at once with any whom they have wronged (vv. 23–26). They must be vigilant in shunning all avoidable temptations to sin and rigorous in resisting the unavoidable (vv. 29–30). When ill-treated, they are to respond with a love that seeks the wrongdoer's good, "overcom[ing] evil with good" (v. 39; Rom 12:21). As children of the Lord of heaven and earth, they need hardly fend for themselves and their rights; they can afford to be magnanimous toward all as God their Father is magnanimous (vv. 40–42, 44–48).

The intensification of punishments listed in v. 22 appears rhetorical; the wrongs condemned are equally sinful. The point of v. 32 is that the God who ordained marriage does not recognize divorce (cf. 19:4–6); hence second marriages, in the eyes of One for whom the first marriage is still in force, entail an adulterous relationship. The husband who (in Jewish practice of Jesus' day) initiates the divorce bears responsibility for his (remarried) wife's adultery unless it was her unfaithfulness that precipitated the divorce ("except on the ground of unchastity"). The logic of vv. 34–36 is that true reverence for God means avoiding all oaths, not simply those that explicitly mention the divine name; after all, any circumlocution inevitably remains within the sphere of God's domain. 6:1–34. Children of the Heavenly Father. When children of God do good, they shun rather than seek a human audience (6:1, illustrated in vv. 2–6, 16–18). They serve God single-mindedly (vv. 19–24), assured that their heavenly Father knows, and will provide for, all their needs (vv. 25–34).

In doing good for God's eyes alone, followers of Jesus are unlike hypocrites whose ostentatious deeds of charity, prayer, and fasting Jesus memorably caricatures (vv. 2, 5, 16). The reward that follows good deeds, whether human applause or divine favor, is determined by the intended audience.

In the confidence with which Jesus' followers approach God in prayer, they are unlike Gentiles who vainly attempt to secure divine attention with drawn-out invocations (v. 7). Knowing that God already knows what they need, they nonetheless show to what source they look for all good by bringing their requests to God (v. 8). As children to a caring parent, so followers of Jesus speak to God their Father trustingly and simply (vv. 9–13).

The first concern of their hearts is that God's name will be acknowledged and revered by all, that all will submit to God's rule, and that all, on earth as now in heaven, will do God's will (vv. 9–10). In effect, each of these initial petitions expresses a yearning for the day when God's kingdom comes and all is put right on earth; at the same time each implies the desire of petitioners to realize God's rule in their own lives. Intent only on serving God, they ask no more for themselves than provision of their daily necessities, forgiveness for their every failing, and deliverance from temptations to which they know themselves prone to fall (vv. 11–13). Grateful for God's forgiveness, they spontaneously meet its condition that they in turn grant forgiveness to others (vv. 14–15).

No one enters God's service on a part-time basis (v. 24): God is truly God only of those whose devotion to God encompasses all they do. Such single-minded service is spoken of as the "healthy" eye that signals a body "full of light"; its absence betokens a life "full of darkness" (vv. 22–23). Its reward—unlike the pursuit of earthly goods—lasts eternally (vv. 19–21).

The trust of God's children in the goodness of their Father relieves them of the anxieties that plague those who, not knowing God, are left to fend for themselves (vv. 31–32). Such worry is unnecessary because God, who bestows the greater gifts of life and body, will surely grant the lesser gifts of food and clothing as well (v. 25b); because the heavenly Father who feeds the birds and "clothes" the flowers will surely provide for the needs of his children (vv. 26, 28–30); because worry achieves nothing—the lives of God's children are in God's hands in any case (v. 27); and because worry about the future is a pointless luxury when there are concerns in the present that demand attention (v. 34). In short, those who live to promote God's kingdom and to practice its righteousness may confidently leave their needs in the hands of an all-knowing, benevolent God (v. 33).

7:1–29. Accountability and the Judgment. No single theme unites all that Jesus says in 7:1–27, but human accountability before God is repeatedly emphasized.

The root of human sinfulness lies in humanity's unwillingness to acknowledge God and give God due worship and obedience (cf. Rom 1:21); conversely, human sinfulness finds constant expression in an eagerness to assume the prerogatives of God (cf. Gen 3:5). Thus the reality that human beings are moral creatures accountable to God their Judge finds perverted expression in a proclivity to judge the actions and character of one's fellow-creatures. Jesus' injunction not to judge (Matt 7:1; cf. 1 Cor 4:5; Jas 4:11–12) does not eliminate the need for moral discernment (cf. 7:6, 15–20), nor does it mean that sin should not be recognized as sin. It does mean that human beings should look for sin first in themselves (vv. 3–5) and interpret the actions of others in the most charitable way possible—as they themselves would be charitably judged by God (v. 2; cf. 1 Cor 13:4–7; 1 Pet 4:8).

God's love and forgiveness are freely offered, in the gospel, to all. But what God offers, and the message that conveys the offer, are both sacred, to be joyfully and reverently received. What is sacred must not be heedlessly exposed to the ridicule of those who despise it or to the practical contempt of those who claim to enjoy God's grace while exhibiting no concern to pursue God's righteousness (7:6).

God, the Father in heaven, is good and more willing than any loving parent on earth to give what is good to his children. As Father, he invites his children to trust him and come to him with their needs: "Ask!" "Search!" "Knock!" (vv. 7–11).

What God wants of human beings is spelled out in "the law and the prophets," but in its essence it is known in human hearts: the goodness that people want others to show to them is what they ought to show to others (v. 12).

The kingdom of God is only gained by those (the "few") who refuse to be guided by the spirit, values, and ambitions of this age, and who live disciplined lives devoted to God's service: the "gate" to the kingdom is "narrow," the road that leads to it "hard" (vv. 13–14).

As the path to life is easily missed, so there are many who, though innocent in appearance, would lead others astray (v. 15). In the end, however, their actions reveal the orientation of their hearts:

"you will know them by their fruits" (vv. 16–20). Those who would be guides to God's kingdom must themselves have submitted to its rule.

Such submission requires more than calling Christ "Lord"; nor are mighty deeds done in Jesus' name themselves evidence of compliance with God's will. Apart from a serious striving for the righteousness that Jesus has elucidated in the Sermon on the Mount, pious words and eye-catching deeds lead only to judgment (vv. 21–23). Only as Jesus' words are heeded as well as heard do they lead, not to judgment, but to life (vv. 24–27).

The forthrightness and authority with which Jesus proclaimed the requirements of God's rule amazed his hearers: they had not heard the like before (vv. 28–29). Amazement, to be sure, is not discipleship.

C. Messiah, Mighty in Deed (8:1–9:38)

8:1–17. Initial Healings. The Messiah who is mighty in word (Matt 5–7) now proves mighty in deed as well: Matthew highlights first his healing of a leper (8:1–4), a foreigner's servant (vv. 5–13), and a woman (vv. 14–15). The healings serve to announce the program and to demonstrate the power of God's kingdom to do away with all the effects of sin. At the same time, each act of healing represents the response of Jesus' compassion to the need of a particular person.

Matthew's healing stories frequently highlight the importance of faith. A leper, approaching Jesus with reverence (the verb translated "knelt before" here is rendered "paid homage" in 2:11, "worshiped" in 28:17) and complete confidence in his ability to heal, appeals to Jesus' compassion: "If you choose [literally, "If you will"—a condition appropriately attached to all prayer; cf. Rom 1:10; 1 John 5:14], you can make me clean." Jesus responds with a touch and word that bring instant healing. Avoiding ostentation ("say nothing to anyone"), Jesus instructs the man to comply with the requirements of Mosaic law (cf. Lev 14:1–32) as a "testimony" to the officiating priest and his fellows of Jesus' power to heal and of his conformity to God's law. Carrying out the required procedure would also pave the way for the former leper's acceptance back into the community.

A centurion, recognizing that, just as his own commands are backed by the authority of Rome, so Jesus speaks with divine authority, is confident that Jesus' mere word will heal his paralyzed servant. Jesus commends the extraordinary faith of this Gentile "outsider," and indicates that many such "outsiders" will join the patriarchs at the festivities of the kingdom of heaven, while unbelieving "insiders" will be excluded from the company. Jesus heals the servant with words that formulate an important principle: God helps those who in faith look to God (here in the person of Jesus) for help (8:13; cf. 9:29).

Matthew proceeds to tell of the healing of Peter's mother-in-law, then of all the sick who were brought to Jesus. He concludes the section by quoting Isa 53:4.

8:18–27. The Cost of Discipleship. The episodes that follow reveal something of the rigors and perils of discipleship. Matthew does not say what happened to the would-be followers of 8:18–22, nor is the hindrance alluded to in v. 21 clarified. The evangelist recounts the episodes merely to make the point that followers of Jesus must be prepared to share his deprivations and suffering (cf. 10:24–25) and to recognize his claims on their obedience as overriding all other demands (burial of the [physically] dead can be left to those not in the service of the kingdom of God [the spiritually "dead"]). Here, as elsewhere in the Gospel (see on 10:37–39), the absolute devotion and obedience humans owe God is formulated as duty to Jesus. Yet it is in this context that Jesus first uses the self-designation "Son of Man" (8:20). The phrase recalls Daniel's reference to "one like a human being" (literally, "one like a son of man") who comes "with the clouds of heaven" and receives "dominion and glory and kingship" (Dan 7:13–14; cf. Matt 24:30; 26:64); but its use in Matthew (cf. 17:22–23; 20:18–19) indicates that Jesus' path to glory is one of suffering and the cross.

Turning from Jesus' would-be followers, Matthew tells of what happened (and illustrates what happens) to actual disciples (who "followed him"). They are overtaken by a great storm to which their master seems oblivious. Jesus, awakened, makes the most of the teaching moment (he is with them; they should trust him and not be afraid) before calming the sea. The episode recalls Ps 107:23–30, with Jesus playing the role of "the LORD" in the psalm. The astonished reaction of the disciples (8:27) is appropriate, but their question is left (for the moment) unanswered (cf. 16:15–17).

8:28–9:38. Deeds that Offend. Even Jesus' healings provoke offense. He frees from their oppression two demoniacs who had terrorized all who came near them. But because he does so by allowing the exorcised demons to spend their destructiveness on a herd of pigs, the local townspeople are only too anxious to have him leave their neighborhood (8:28–34). Jesus then heals a paralytic, but first pronounces the forgiveness of the man's sins—to the consternation of scribes who inwardly protest that forgiveness is God's prerogative. The healing then becomes not simply an act of compassion, but a demonstration of Jesus' authority: though it is easy enough to say that another's sins are forgiven, Jesus' performance of the more difficult feat of healing shows that he acts, when healing and forgiving, with the authority of God (9:2–8).

Jesus' call of a tax collector (see on 4:18–22) and willingness to fraternize with the latter's cohorts proves a further occasion for offense (cf. 11:19; Luke 15:1–32): is he not condoning the behavior of "sinners" (Matt 9:9–11)? No, replies Jesus; as sick need the physician, so "sinners" need to hear the summons to God's kingdom that it is his mission ("I have come to call . . .") to proclaim. The point of v. 13b is not to distinguish between those who do and those who do not need to repent (in fact, the call to repentance is general [3:2; 4:17]), but to highlight why "sinners," of all people, are not to be excluded from Jesus' mission.

In a further complaint, the question is raised why Jesus' disciples, unlike others, do not fast. Jesus replies, in effect, that "to everything there is a season"; but in the presence of the bridegroom, the wedding party cannot fast. Similarly, those who fast now fail to recognize the appearance in their midst of the herald of God's kingdom (cf. 12:6, 28, 41–42; 13:16–17). To insist on the traditional practice of fasting when a new and joyous stage in salvation history has come is like trying to patch an old cloak with a new (still unshrunk) piece of cloth or to keep new wine contained in old wineskins.

Matthew (9:18–26) drastically reduces Mark's account (Mark 5:21–43) of the raising of Jairus' daughter and the healing of a woman with a hemorrhage, but preserves enough to stress: (1) the power of Jesus, who heals in a moment an affliction of twelve-years standing, and even raises the dead; (2) Jesus' willingness to aid all who look, for God's help, to him; and (3) the ridicule he attracts from those without faith.

The next episode (vv. 27–31) focuses again on Jesus' willingness to help in response to faith. Two blind men, addressing him as the Messiah ("Son of David"; cf. 1:1), appeal to his compassion and affirm their confidence in his ability to heal. The gift of sight they receive is explicitly linked to their faith (9:29; cf. 8:13). As in 12:15–21, Jesus commands those he has healed not to spread the news, choosing to advance God's kingdom with deeds of mercy but no display.

The final story in this narrative section of the Gospel (9:32–34) sums up the divided response with which Jesus meets, even when healing. Crowds, lacking the insight of faith, at least acknowledge with amazement the unprecedented nature of Jesus' miracles. Pharisees, vexed by the popular response, sinisterly suggest that Jesus is in league with the devil. Matthew introduces this ominous charge here, though reserving its discussion for 12:22–37.

Undeterred by criticism, Jesus continues his mission in both word and deed (9:35; cf. 4:23). Recognizing, however, the dearth of spiritual leadership in Israel, the need of the people—like scattered sheep—to be brought back to their divine Shepherd (9:36; cf. Ezek 34:1–31), and perhaps the reality that, physically, he himself can only reach so many, Jesus tells his disciples to pray that God would send new "laborers" out into the "harvest." In ch. 10, the disciples find themselves the answer to this prayer.

D. The Disciples' Mission (10:1–42)

Matthew 10 contains the second of Jesus' extended discourses in the Gospel: himself sent on a mission by God his Father (10:40), Jesus now expands his outreach by sending (10:5) his disciples on a mission focused on the same people (10:5–6; cf. 15:24), communicating the same message (10:7; cf. 4:17), demonstrating the same power (10:1, 8; cf. 4:23–24; 11:4–5), and anticipating the same hostility (10:24–25, 38). In responding to Jesus' disciples, people are responding to Jesus (10:40).

As elsewhere, Matthew here collects and passes on material that is both precious and pertinent to his readers because it comes from their Lord. Some of what Jesus says is not to be forgotten because it reminds us of the scope and purpose of his own salvific activities, even though the latter were subject to limitations transcended long before the Gospel was written (compare 10:5–6 with 28:18–20). Some of Jesus' directives, though permitting literal compliance only in the context in which they were originally given, outline areas of concern and a manner of living that must characterize all his adherents (compare 10:9–10 with 6:19–34). Some, indeed, of what Jesus says in this chapter would find fulfillment first in the period between Easter and the Parousia (e.g., 10:17–23). Matthew shows no concern to define (and thus restrict) the relevance of the material he preserves. Confident that the words of the Lord will bear fruit in the lives of his followers, the evangelist confines his task to that of collecting, shaping, and transmitting the material.

10:1–4. Empowerment for the Mission. Matthew assumes his readership's familiarity with the (hitherto unmentioned) circle of twelve disciples. Sent to do the work of Jesus, they receive the necessary empowerment from him (v. 1). Their names are given inasmuch as their part in the church's story—as those who attended and were commissioned by Jesus—is both foundational and unrepeatable. As "apostles" they are invested with the authority of the one who commissioned them. Still, the Gospel is not their story: few details accompany their names. "Cananaean" (of the second Simon), from an Aramaic term, speaks of this disciple's "zeal" (cf. Luke 6:15), though probably not here a technical term for a member of a Jewish revolutionary group. "Iscariot" is uncertain, though commonly taken to identify Judas's place of origin (Kerioth).

10:5–15. The Disciples' Task. The choosing of twelve disciples is likely itself intended to reflect a mission to (the "twelve tribes" of) Israel; and during Jesus' life on earth (contrast 28:19), their mission, like his, is confined to Israel (10:5–6). That priority, clear in other NT texts as well (e.g., Acts 3:26; Rom 1:16), serves to demonstrate God's faithfulness to promises to Israel without, ultimately, excluding Gentiles from participation in their blessings (Rom 15:8–12). The message of the disciples is that of Jesus (cf. Matt 3:2; 4:17). Their words are to be accompanied (as they are with Jesus) by deeds demonstrating the power of the kingdom in beneficial, not gratuitous, ways. In doing good, the disciples are mere instruments of divine benevolence; they are not to bring disrepute on their mission by exploiting it for personal gain (v. 8). The extreme restrictions on the provisions they take (vv. 9–10) compel them to trust their heavenly Father to care for their needs: the importance of such dependency pertains to all followers of Jesus even where the explicit demands do not. Having found accommodation in a receptive ("worthy") home, they are to be content, not seeking better conditions elsewhere (v. 11). Their initial greeting on entering the house is no mere formality, but a prayer that God will grant peace to its inhabitants; its efficacy depends on the response of the household to the disciples' mission (vv. 12–13). Where that mission is rejected, the disciples are to enact symbolically their own full-filled responsibility, and the liability to judgment of those who oppose them (v. 14). Since forgiveness and salvation are available to all who do not reject the message of forgiveness and salvation, such rejection proves unpardonable; indeed, it incurs even greater judgment than that of cities proverbial for their wickedness (v. 15).

10:16–42. The Response to the Disciples. The inbreaking of God's kingdom inevitably disrupts life on an earth where God's sovereignty is not acknowledged. Beginning at 10:16, Jesus prepares his disciples for the (largely negative) response they will receive.

They are not to invite persecution by their behavior, but to exercise prudence in avoiding it, wherever possible ("wise as serpents"; cf. Rom 12:18). Still, such prudence must be combined with an "innocence" that hides no agendas and harbors no ill will ("innocent as doves"). While those who oppose them are, in their hostility, like wolves bent on devouring sheep, from another perspective they are themselves "lost sheep" (cf. 10:6); the mission to rescue them must not be curtailed because of opposition (v. 16).

Disciples of an ill-used master, Jesus' followers can expect no better treatment (vv. 17–25). Like Jesus, they will be "handed over" to trial, flogged, tried by governors, even put to death. They will be betrayed by their closest kin, hated by all, driven from one city to another. No assurance of protection or deliverance is given: they are to be content to share the same slander and abuse to which their Lord was subjected (vv. 24–25; cf. Acts 5:41; Phil 1:29). They do know that they venture into danger at Jesus' command (v. 16); that even in these situations they serve a divine purpose ("as a testimony," v. 18); that the Spirit of their heavenly Father will enable them to bear effective testimony before those who try them (v. 20); that they will "be saved" (i.e., will participate in the glories of God's kingdom) if they remain faithful to the end (v. 22); and that as they proclaim the kingdom in Israel (a mission that is to continue until the end), they will not have exhausted their places of refuge before the coming of Jesus as "the Son of Man" (v. 23, alluding to Dan 7:13–14).

Persecution will test the genuineness of the disciples' loyalty and faith. Like Jeremiah, they will find themselves fearless only as they actively fulfill their commission, the charge to proclaim openly what Jesus has disclosed to them in private (vv. 26–27; cf. Jer 1:17–19). Like Isaiah, they must live so conscious of the presence of God that they fear, not humans, who can only kill the physical body, but God alone, by whose judgment all live or die eternally (v. 28; cf. Isa 8:11–13). Moreover, the God they fear is also their heavenly Father, whose providential care extends to the least significant of his creatures (the sparrows) and the least significant aspect of his children's lives (the hairs on their head). Confident of their Father's watchful care and loving design, they need not fear their persecutors (vv. 29–31).

Verses 32–33 envisage situations when disciples are put on trial for their faith, though the terms permit wider application: before God his Father, Christ will acknowledge as his own—implicitly, at the Last Judgment—those who are willing to confess before others their allegiance to him. Conversely, those who deny him before humans, he will deny before his Father. That Peter, who three times denied his Master, was a leader in the early church shows that even for this sin the contrite can find forgiveness.

Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God offers peace and salvation to all—even the most notorious of sinners—who submit to the proclamation of the kingdom; of its very nature, it cannot bring peace to those who oppose God's reign. Hence the division, even within families and households, between those who welcome and those who resist the offer (vv. 34–36). As Jesus' followers find themselves betrayed by their own kin (v. 21), so they must not allow loyalty to kin to deflect them from their life of discipleship (v. 37); rather they must embrace the life of self-denial and suffering ("take up [their] cross"; cf. 16:24) entailed in following Jesus, prepared to sacrifice everything—even life itself—for his sake. What they offer up ("lose") for him they will "find" eternally; what they cling to ("find") rather than sacrifice, they will eternally "lose" (vv. 38–39). Here the absolute duty of human beings, as creatures, to God—to love God above all else and with all their being (Deut 6:4–5); to follow God and none other (cf. 1 Kgs 18:21); to offer everything they have, even life itself, in God's service—is stated as an absolute duty to Jesus (see on 8:18–22).

Indeed, one's response to Jesus is, in effect, one's response to the God who sent him, and it is reflected in one's response to Jesus' messengers. Many oppose them, but not all; and what is decisive is not the apparent impact of one's activities, but whose side one is on (cf. 12:30). Jesus promises that those who receive his messengers will share in the messenger's reward; nor will the slightest gestures of kindness done for disciples of Jesus because they are his disciples go unrewarded (vv. 40–42).

E. Responses to Jesus (11:1–12:50)

With a transitional, summary statement (11:1) Matthew launches into a new section of narrative material (11:1–12:50). No single heading captures the essence of all its pericopes, but the emphasis shifts from Jesus' mission itself to the response it provokes. God's claim on people's lives permits no shrugging off; in the ongoing struggle between good and evil, the kingdom of God versus that of Satan, neutrality is not an option. In this section, what is at stake in people's response to Jesus' mission is clarified and—one way or another—people declare their allegiances.

11:1–19. Jesus and John. Nothing in this world is more precious, and nothing more vulnerable, than faith. Imprisoned, perhaps troubled by the evident discrepancy between the deeds of the Messiah (related in 4:12–11:1) and his own anticipation of imminent judgment (3:7–12), John wonders whether Jesus is, after all, the One he expected. Jesus summarizes his own activities in a way that echoes prophetic promises (11:5; cf. Isa 26:19; 29:18; 35:5–6; 61:1), indicating that, with those activities, the day of fulfillment has indeed come. To its appearance all must, and will, respond: with faith that, however weak, is blessed; or with offense that this man—the friend of sinners (11:19), son of a carpenter (13:55), who chooses, and proclaims the necessity of choosing, the path of the cross (16:21–26)—could be the instrument of God's salvation.

John's messengers gone, Jesus publicly honors his forerunner, underlining in the process the link between their respective missions (vv. 7–15). The crowds attending John were drawn neither by ordinary desert sights nor by paraded human opulence, but by the presence of a prophet (vv. 7–9). Yet John was more: as the herald of the Messiah (v. 10), the Elijah who precedes and marks Messiah's coming (v. 14; cf. Mal 4:5; Luke 1:17), John stood on the threshold of the new age (v. 13), honored above all who belong to the old order, though not as blessed as the least who participates in the new (v. 11).

But from its first announcement by John, the kingdom of heaven has met with the violent assaults of opponents (v. 12) and the petulance of the "generation" as a whole (vv. 16–19). The latter, like children who pout when others will not play their game, have found reason to object to the divine message both in the asceticism of John and in the conviviality of Jesus. But activities—such as those of John and Jesus—planned by divine wisdom will inevitably prove to be right (v. 19).

11:20–30. Woes for the Unrepentant, Rest for the Weary. The kingdom is offered to all, but open only to the repentant. Jesus' summons to repentance was accompanied by mighty works that themselves called for a response to the manifest presence of God. Such moments, when God's claims on people's lives are specially, even tangibly, real must not go unheeded. The liability to judgment of those too complacent or proud to respond will match the magnitude of their spurned opportunity (11:20–24; cf. 10:15; Luke 12:48).

In the words and deeds of Jesus, his Father—the "Lord of heaven and earth"—is addressing human beings. Jesus gratefully acknowledges that the openness to his mission shown by the lowly ("infants"; cf. Matt 18:1–5; 19:14) corresponds to his Father's will; so too its rejection by those too knowing to listen, too confident in their own wisdom to heed God's call (vv. 25–26; cf. 1 Cor 1:18–31). Those who refuse to recognize Jesus, the Son, withhold honor from the One to whom the Father has entrusted all things (v. 27; cf. 28:18). Thus knowing God the Father and acknowledging God's Son go together: the Son is known only by the Father and those whose eyes the Father has opened (vv. 25, 27; cf. 16:17); the Father is known only by the Son and those to whom the Son reveals him (cf. John 1:18).

Jesus invites all who live in quiet desperation, wearied with the troubles of a sin-marred existence, burdened by religious obligations that bring them no nearer God (cf. 23:4), to become his disciples. His are not the demands of one bent on asserting his authority, but of one meek, who promises "rest": a life of discipleship, learned at Jesus' feet ("learn from me" [v. 29]), reflecting undivided devotion to God, with childlike trust in, and obedience to, the Father's will (vv. 28–30).

12:1–21. Sabbath Controversies. The Sabbath activities of Jesus and his disciples provide the occasion for two controversies recounted at the beginning of ch. 12. In the first (vv. 1–8), hungry disciples pluck heads of grain as they pass through a grainfield, an activity permitted on other days of the week (cf. Deut 23:25), but construed by Pharisees as reaping, a category of work forbidden on the Sabbath (cf. Exod 34:21). Jesus counters the charge with a series of arguments and claims. First, God's will is not promoted by casuistically interpreting and rigidly applying legal texts while ignoring human need: after all, Scripture itself countenances David's violation of the law when he satisfied his and his companions' hunger with consecrated bread reserved for the priests (1 Sam 21:1–6; cf. Lev 24:9). Second, since the demands of the Temple take priority over Sabbath laws, so must the service of "something greater than the temple" (vv. 5–6): the implicit claim is that the presence of God is more immediate in the person and work of Jesus than in the Temple itself. Third, those who condemn the hungry for plucking grain on the Sabbath are out of step with a God who prioritizes compassion above fulfillment of ritual laws (v. 7, citing Hos 6:6; cf. 9:13). Fourth, since the God who instituted the Sabbath is free to define its true observance, so the One through whom God's reign is realized is "lord" of the Sabbath (12:8).

In the second incident (vv. 9–14), Jesus defends a Sabbath healing by demonstrating that, even when less is at stake, common sense dictates that help be given on the Sabbath. In general, Sabbath laws must not be used to prevent doing what is good. Those vexed that Jesus would heal on the Sabbath then devote the hallowed day to plotting his destruction.

Rather than aggravate the situation ("his hour had not yet come" [cf. John 7:30]), Jesus withdraws. He continues to heal all comers and to forbid them to publicize what he has done. In the unobtrusive, compassionate way in which he heals the effects of sin, advancing the cause of God's just rule (vv. 18–20), Matthew sees a fulfillment of Isa 42:1–4; appropriately too the Isaiah text refers to Gentile faith in God's humble servant.

12:22–37. Blasphemy Against the Spirit. When, as the result of an exorcism performed by Jesus, a blind and dumb man was able to speak and see, the awestruck crowd wonders whether Jesus might be the Messiah ("son of David"). Provoked by the suggestion, Pharisees contemptuously dismiss it, attributing Jesus' powers to Beelzebul (i.e., Satan; compare vv. 26 and 27, and note already 9:34). Jesus shows first the folly of this claim (it entails Satan fighting against himself [vv. 25–26]; it is inconsistently directed against Jesus, not against other exorcists [v. 27]); then its seriousness: if (as is indeed the case) Jesus casts out demons by the power of God's Spirit, then the kingdom of God is already making its presence felt in their midst, overpowering Satan and setting Satan's captives free (vv. 28–29). To oppose this work of Jesus—indeed, even to fail to align oneself with it—is to side with the powers of evil at a time when lines are being drawn, and those who will enter God's kingdom are being "gathered" (v. 30). God is ready to forgive all other sins, including blasphemy and opposition to Jesus rooted in a failure to discern the nature of his mission; but there can be no forgiveness for the determined opposition to God's rule that perversely, and blasphemously, labels evil the manifest good that it brings (vv. 31–32).

In attributing Jesus' powers to Satan, his opponents have revealed the malice of their hearts (vv. 33–34). Since "no one can tame the tongue" (Jas 3:8), the good or evil stored up in people's hearts is bound to find expression in their words; hence people's own words provide an adequate and irrefutable basis for their approval or condemnation on the day of judgment. Those who heedlessly disparage the work of Jesus are reminded that, on judgment day, people are accountable for even the careless words they have spoken (vv. 35–37).

12:38–50. Unbelief and Its Consequences, Obedience and Its Rewards. The appearance of God's kingdom in the words and work of Jesus demands a response of faith: to begrudge God one's faith, spelling out terms that God must meet before one will yield it (12:38; cf. 1 Cor 1:22), betrays a heart unwilling to submit to God's rule. Such resistance is typical of the "evil and adulterous [i.e., faithless] generation" Jesus encountered. The only "sign" it would be given would be one of God's own choosing, the resurrection of Jesus (to which veiled reference is made in v. 40). The indifference and hostility shown by Jesus' contemporaries in the presence of God's kingdom appears all the more inexcusable when compared with the positive response of the Ninevites to a prophet's word and that of the queen of Sheba to Solomon's wisdom (vv. 41–42; cf. Jonah 3:4–9; 1 Kgs 10:1–10). In a graphic picture, Jesus warns of the sorry end that awaits those who fail to follow up an initial interest in God's kingdom (cf. 3:5–6; 4:25) with true repentance and faith (vv. 43–45).

Jesus uses the appearance of his mother and brothers to highlight the very different state of those who follow him: they do the will of God his Father and are thus the true (or spiritual) kin of God's Son (vv. 46–50).

F. The Mysteries of the Kingdom in Parables (13:1–52)

The limited headway made by Jesus' mission and the opposition it provoked are among the "mysteries" (NRSV footnote in 13:11; cf. "what has been hidden" in v. 35) treated in his third discourse in Matthew's Gospel. The chapter includes both parables of Jesus and reasons for the adoption of this method of teaching.

13:1–9, 18–33, 36–50. The Parables. These verses contain a series of seven parables, together with the explanations given to the disciples for the first two parables. The opening parable of the sower (vv. 3–9, 18–23) stands on its own. The other six parables are made up of three groups of two parables each: that of the weeds among the wheat (vv. 24–30, 36–43) finds a parallel in the parable of the net that catches good fish and bad (vv. 47–50). The parable of the mustard seed (vv. 31–32) goes with that of the yeast (v. 33). The parable of the treasure hidden in the field (v. 44) goes with that of the pearl of great value (vv. 45–46).

The parable of the sower, spoken to "great crowds," clarifies— for those with "ears" to hear and understand (v. 9)—why the message of the kingdom meets with varying responses; at the same time it challenges listeners to respond appropriately. The message is like seed that is sown: depending on the type of soil on which it falls, it may or may not bring a harvest of grain. Those with no understanding of the message are like a beaten path that seed cannot penetrate: the "evil one" has no problem keeping those "tone deaf" to the summons to God's kingdom from responding when they hear it. Rocky ground has enough soil to allow seed to spring up, not enough to let it grow; similarly, some people are glad enough when invited to God's kingdom, but put off when they encounter the hostility it provokes among others. As seed sown among thorns yields no grain, so those unwilling to put aside the cares of the present age and the allurements of wealth are thus prevented from seeking God's kingdom and righteousness (cf. 6:19–33). Only those who "bear fruit" so grasp (and are grasped by) the call of God that they single-mindedly pursue it, regardless of the troubles it brings, and disregarding all other calls for their devotion. "Let anyone with ears listen!"

The parables of the weeds among the wheat (spoken to the crowd, explained to the disciples) and that of the net that catches good fish and bad (spoken to the disciples) explain that evil will co-exist with the good—the "children of the evil one" with "the children of the kingdom"—until the end of the age. Judgment is to be reserved for that day, when the good and the evil will be assigned their separate destinies.

The parables of the mustard seed and yeast (both spoken to the crowd) give assurance that God will bring to its glorious consummation the kingdom of God, even though its dawn, in the ministry of Jesus, commands little attention.

The parables of the treasure hidden in the field and the pearl of great value are spoken to the disciples: however unaccountable their way of life may appear to outsiders, those who have glimpsed the glories of God's kingdom will gladly seek it to the exclusion of all other pursuits.

13:10–17, 34–35, 51–52. Why Parables? In fulfillment of scripture (13:34–35, citing Ps 78:2), Jesus uses parables to communicate the mysteries of the kingdom. The stories challenge listeners to reflect on how the everyday events they relate have points of similarity with truths about God's kingdom. Teaching in parables itself reinforces a fundamental principle of the kingdom: as one act of obedience, or one sin, leads to another, so openness to the message of the kingdom leads to greater and greater insight (v. 12a), while resistance to its invitation renders one increasingly impervious to its message (vv. 12b, 13–15).

Specially blessed are Jesus' disciples: favored beyond "prophets and righteous people" of old who yearned for, but did not see, the dawn of God's kingdom; and favored beyond their contemporaries, who see but fail to grasp what is happening in their midst (vv. 16–17). Granted insight by God (v. 11a) and explanations by Jesus of what they do not understand (vv. 18–23, 36–43), they are equipped to convey to others both Jesus' ("new") message of the kingdom and how it was anticipated in God's ("old") dealings with the covenant people of Israel (vv. 51–52).

G. The Mysteries of God's Son (13:53–17:27)

Again, no single theme unites all the narrative material between Jesus' third and fourth discourses in Matthew's Gospel, but the mysteries surrounding Jesus' own person are the focus of a number of episodes. Outsiders express their bewilderment (13:54–56; 14:2; 16:13–14). The disciples are granted treasured but fleeting moments of luminosity in which they recognize the Son of God (14:33; 16:16–17; 17:1–8).

13:53–58. Offense in Nazareth. Like the Galilean cities denounced in 11:20–24 for their failure to repent, the people of Nazareth are put off rather than drawn to faith by the presence of Jesus. The contrast between his humble roots, which they know all too well, and the power of his words and deeds leaves them astonished; but astonishment here induces only offense. Where eyes are shut to the glory of God (cf. 13:15), familiarity breeds contempt (13:57). Nor does Jesus challenge their dismissive response with further miracles; "according to" their unbelief, they experience little of God's power (v. 58; cf. 8:13).

14:1–12. The Death of John the Baptist. For Herod Antipas (son of the Herod of 2:1) too Jesus' mighty works demand explanation but prompt no repentance. Prodded by conscience, he suspects that John the Baptist, whom he executed, has returned to life with supernatural power. Herod had arrested John to silence the latter's fearless rebukes of his immorality (14:3–4; cf. Lev 18:16; 20:21), then executed him rather than publicly renege on a fatuous commitment. The episode is one of the few in the Gospel in which Jesus is not the center of attention; nonetheless, the parallels between John the Baptist's death and that of Jesus are clear (see 17:11–13).

14:13–36. Bread for the Hungry, Peace in the Storm. Jesus withdraws, but the pursuit of the crowds and his own compassion make respite impossible. Practicality suggests that, after a day of meeting their needs, Jesus dismiss the crowd to find food; but Jesus insists that those who have come to him need go nowhere else for nourishment. As Jesus feeds the crowd, the God who "gives food to the hungry" is at work (Ps 146:7; cf. Matt 6:25–26, 33); at the same time, the story anticipates both Jesus' last supper, where the bread and wine he provides represent the gift of his own body and blood (26:26–28), and the feast of the kingdom of heaven, likewise furnished by Jesus the Messiah (cf. 8:11; 26:29).

In the verses that follow, Matthew invites his readers to join the disciples in seeing and worshipping God's Son (14:33). After communing alone with his Father (v. 23), Jesus comes to his disciples in a way that recalls divine appearances and activities in the OT: walking on water (cf. Job 9:8; Hab 3:15); speaking the divine "I am" (NRSV, "It is I," v. 27; cf. Exod 3:14); bidding his people not to fear (v. 27; cf. Isa 41:13, 14; 43:1, 5); calming the sea (v. 32; cf. Job 26:12; Ps 107:29). Matthew's desire, however, is not to drive readers to consult a concordance, but to encourage them to identify themselves and their troubles with the beleaguered disciples in the boat; to sense in the approaching presence of Jesus the goodness and greatness of God; to focus, not (as Peter did) on the hardships that surround them, but on the One who summons them to trust and come to him; and to acknowledge and worship Jesus as God's Son.

Coming to Gennesaret on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, Jesus heals all who seek his aid (vv. 34–35).

15:1–20. Religion of the Lips. Religious observances can be a means of serving God; but they can also be a means of concealing, from oneself as well as from others, a heart that is not submissive to God's will. A dispute over handwashing gives Jesus the opportunity to distinguish between true service of God and false.

Religious Jews of Jesus' day were united in believing that faithfulness to God required observance of the laws of God's covenant with Israel; they differed in their interpretation of particular laws and in whom they recognized as Torah's legitimate interpreters. Pharisees distinguished themselves by their recognition of non-priestly experts in the law ("scribes") as authorities, by their broad application of the laws governing ritual purity (e.g., Lev 11–15; Num 19), and by their adherence to, and advocacy of, a body of traditions that supplemented biblical law: the "tradition of the elders" of Matt 15:2, the forerunner of the "oral law" of rabbinic Judaism. Handwashing (to remove certain ritual impurities) before eating belonged to these extrabiblical traditions (though presumably an extension of such laws as Exod 30:19–21; 40:30–31; Lev 15:11); according to Matt 15:1–2, Pharisaic authorities who came from Jerusalem (perhaps to investigate the activities of Jesus) object to the failure of Jesus' disciples to observe this tradition.

Jesus responds by attacking the tradition itself as a substitute for, and even circumvention of, the radical demands of God. He cites an example whereby God's command to honor one's parents is effectively set aside by human tradition: by pronouncing one's property to be dedicated to God

(whether or not it was actually given to the Temple), one was able to prevent its use by others, in this case for parental support (vv. 3–6). The words of Isaiah (Jesus says) apply to these "hypocrites" whose service of God is a human construction, a lip service that is not matched with the devotion of the heart (vv. 7–9, citing Isa 29:13).

To the crowd as a whole, Jesus enunciates a fundamental principle (v. 11, explained in vv. 17–20; cf. Rom 14:14): the "defilement" that matters is that conveyed, not when something external enters the mouth (i.e., by the food one eats or the way in which one eats it), but by that which emerges from the mouth (i.e., coming from the heart). No show of religiosity that leaves untouched the malicious, or lustful, or slanderous thoughts of the heart can claim God as its source; nor will it survive divine judgment (vv. 10–13, 18–19).

15:21–39. The Cry of a Heart and the Feeding of a Crowd. In dramatic contrast with the contrived and superficial religiosity of complacent insiders is the extraordinary faith of a desperate outsider: a Canaanite woman begs Jesus to heal her demon-possessed daughter. Jesus never actually denies her request; his initial responses seem designed to discourage all but the most persevering of petitioners. First, he is silent, suggesting even to the disciples that he does not want to be bothered (v. 23). Then he remarks that her request exceeds his commission (v. 24; see on 10:5–6). When she persists with her pleas, he offers the common sense (and perhaps proverbial) observation that one does not give bread meant to nourish one's children to pet dogs—implying, again, that his mission is limited to Jews. Undaunted, she turns the latter observation to her advantage: pets are allowed a place beneath their masters' tables, where crumbs that fall become their food. As in 8:10–13, Jesus commends the faith of an outsider and grants her request.

The narrative continues with yet another summary of Jesus' healing of all who come to him with their needs; unlike the carping of religious leaders, the crowds are prepared to acknowledge in Jesus' miracles the goodness of God to the covenant people (vv. 29–31). The chapter concludes with a second story in which Jesus meets the physical needs of a crowd by multiplying the provisions that are put at his disposal (vv. 32–39; cf. 14:13–21).

16:1–12. Blind Foes and Dense Disciples. In the religious leadership of Israel, Jesus encounters willful blindness. Here Pharisees and Sadducees, united (for once) in their desire to embarrass Jesus before a crowd, demand that he "show them a sign from heaven"—a falling star would do, or perhaps a darkened sun at midday—to legitimate his claims. But Jesus, who performs many miracles in Matthew's Gospel for the good of others and in response to faith, here as elsewhere (see 4:5–7; 12:38–40; 13:58; 27:42) refuses to work gratuitous wonders in the absence of faith: not thus are true disciples gained (cf. Luke 16:31; John 2:23–25; 6:26–27). Instead he laments the lack of spiritual discernment among people capable of advanced scientific observations (Matt 16:2–3) and dismisses their imperious demand in the same terms as in 12:39 (16:4).

Jesus' disciples are more compliant but (apart from divine enlightenment) scarcely more perceptive. Not only do they misconstrue Jesus' warning for the teaching (in this case, God-talk that substitutes for faith and obedience) of the Pharisees and Sadducees, but they do so in a way that reveals their continuing anxiety for "what [they would] eat" (cf. 6:25) even after Jesus has proven himself able to meet all such needs (16:7–11). Again, Jesus rebukes their "little faith" (cf. 8:26; 14:31) and corrects their misunderstandings.

16:13–17:8. The Revelation of Jesus Christ. This section speaks of the revelation of Jesus' identity (16:13–20), of the nature of his mission (vv. 21–28), and of his glory as God's Son (17:1–8). In each case, the confusion of human perceptions apart from divine enlightenment is apparent.

Having journeyed northward into Gentile territory and arrived at Caesarea Philippi, at the foot of Mount Hermon, Jesus asks his disciples what people make of his identity (16:13). The disciples confine their response to a series of wellintentioned (contrast 9:34) but nonetheless confused perceptions, all of which grant that Jesus is some sort of prophet (16:14). Only through God the Father is God the Son known, even by Jesus' disciples (vv. 16–17; cf. 3:17; 11:27).

Jesus is "the Messiah, the Son of the living God" (v. 16). "Messiah" (or "Christ," the Greek equivalent) here refers to the expected descendant of David who would establish God's righteous rule over Israel, to the benefit of all nations: through the Messiah, God would put things right on earth (cf. Isa 9:6–7; 11:1–10; Jer 23:5–6). Since the Messiah was a "son of David" (cf. Matt 1:1), and since the sons of David who sat on "the throne of the LORD" over Israel (1 Chr 29:23) were spoken of metaphorically as God's "sons" (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7; 89:26–27), "Son of God" is at times a mere equivalent of the title "Messiah" (cf. Matt 26:63). But when affirmed of Jesus in Matthew's Gospel, it means much more: the relationship between the divine Father and Jesus, the Son, is unique (11:27); indeed, the Son is himself "God with us" (1:23), and to him divine prerogatives are ascribed throughout the Gospel (see, e.g., on 2:2, 8, 11; 9:2–3; 10:37–39; and below, on 16:24–27).

According to 2 Sam 7:12–14, David's son, called God's son, will build a house for God. In Matt 16:18, Jesus speaks of a fulfillment of that promise surpassing anything done by Solomon: Jesus himself will build his "church," the Christconfessing people who form God's spiritual temple (cf. Eph 2:19–22). Of that temple Christ himself is the irreplaceable foundation (1 Cor 3:11). Yet since Christ is known through the testimony of his apostles, they may be spoken of in similar terms (Eph 2:20; Rev 21:14). In Matt 16:18, the "rock" (Gk.: petra) on which the church is built is identified specifically as Peter, first of the apostles (10:2) and leader of the church in its earliest days: the very name "Peter" (Gk.: Petros; cf. Cephas, the Aramaic equivalent, in Gal 2:9, 11) was given by Jesus to mark him for this role. The gospel entrusted to Peter (and to the other apostles) is the "key" that opens the door to God's kingdom, the message that brings salvation or condemnation to its hearers, depending on their response (cf. Matt 10:7, 14–15, 40). And to Peter (and the other apostles; cf. 18:18) is assigned the task of adjudicating issues within the community as they arise. That the forces of evil (the "gates of Hades") will oppose Christ's church is taken for granted; but they cannot overcome it.

Yet any proclamation of Jesus as Christ that does not speak of Christ crucified invites misunderstanding; not yet, then, are the disciples to tell of his Messiahship (Matt 16:20). Indeed, the disciples themselves are ill-prepared to accept God's agenda for the Messiah—rejection, suffering, death, and resurrection—when Jesus reveals it. Peter attempts to dissuade him and is sharply rebuked by Jesus (vv. 21–23). Jesus goes further: the path of self-denial and self-sacrifice that he takes is the path prescribed for all who would be his followers (v. 24; see on 10:37–39). Through the centuries Christians have been no less creative than the Pharisees of 15:1–9 in contriving pious substitutes for obedience to Jesus' radical demands. Yet only when life centered on the self—its ambitions and gratification—is renounced for Jesus' sake is eternal life gained; and Jesus pointedly notes that gaining possessions at the cost of one's life—one's true life—is no way to do business (vv. 25–26).

The absolute devotion humans owe God—because God is God and because humans owe God everything—finds expression here in the call to follow Jesus, to sacrifice all for his sake (16:24–25; cf. on 8:18–22; 10:37–39); at the same time, the divine prerogative of judging humankind is here assumed by Jesus (16:27). But he comes again "in the glory of the Father" to repay all for the good or evil they have done (v. 27). Jesus encourages his disciples with the assurance that some of them will live to see him come in his kingdom (v. 28). Matthew proceeds immediately to tell how three disciples were granted an anticipation of that vision (17:1–8), and concludes his Gospel with the post-resurrection inauguration of Christ's reign (28:18)—though its consummation is reserved for an unknown hour (24:36).

What follows (17:1–5) is a narrative expression of the truth of 2 Cor 4:6 (cf. also Matt 11:27): the God who created light "in the beginning" must illumine the hearts of believers—here represented by Peter, James, and John—to enable them to see God's glory in the person of Jesus Christ. A glimpse of that glory makes the sacrifices of 16:24–25 worthwhile (cf. 13:44–46) and strengthens faith in the coming glory of God's kingdom (16:27; cf. 13:43). Moses and Elijah are seen with Jesus, stressing the continuity between old revelations ("the law and the prophets") and the new. But old revelations find their fulfillment in the new (5:17), and it is to Jesus, the divine Son, that God the Father directs attention and obedience (17:5, first repeating 3:17, then echoing Deut 18:15).

The transfiguration of Jesus represents a momentary glimpse in time of eternal reality. But not yet can Jesus and his disciples rest in heavenly glories (cf. 17:4). Much remains to be accomplished in time.

17:9–27. Earthly Realities. Jesus and his disciples (not unlike the Moses of Exod 32!) descend from the mountain to face earthly realities: a question from skeptics (17:9–13), a demon-possessed boy and a faithless generation (vv. 14–20), imminent suffering (vv. 22–23), and the demand that taxes be paid (vv. 24–27).

That the dawn of God's kingdom could be seen in the work of Jesus was dismissed by some on the grounds that Elijah, who must come first (cf. Mal 4:5–6), had not yet appeared. When Jesus' disciples voice this objection, Jesus confirms the timetable it implies but affirms that "Elijah" has already come and has gone unrecognized; he encountered the same fate as that which awaits Jesus. John the Baptist is meant, and the parallels between his life and that of Jesus are again underlined (see on 14:1–12).

In retelling (in a sharply abbreviated form; compare vv. 14–20 with Mark 9:14–29) the healing of a demon-possessed boy, Matthew focuses on the need for faith. Jesus' rebuke of the "faithless and perverse generation" among which he lives (v. 17; cf. 12:39; 16:4) here includes the disciples, whose faith was too "little"—even after all the time they had spent with Jesus—to enable them to perform an exorcism that they had been empowered to do (10:1). With a graphic picture (v. 20, echoed in 1 Cor 13:2), Jesus declares that the power of the God for whom nothing is impossible is accessible to those with faith.

The imminence of Jesus' suffering, death, and resurrection is the subject of another reminder in Matt 17:22–23 (cf. 16:21; 17:12). Nothing Jesus says or does in Matthew's Gospel is rightly understood if detached from the climax of the Gospel here anticipated (Matt 26–28).

Matthew 17 closes with the issue of paying taxes, here that which provided for the daily Temple sacrifices. If taxes paid to the Temple are taxes paid to God, then God's own Son and his followers should be exempt from paying them: no king demands taxes from his offspring. But Jesus is not inclined to disclose the secret of his divine sonship (cf. 16:15–20) merely to avoid paying taxes. Matthew tells how Jesus arranges—as only Jesus can!—for the tax to be paid (v. 27).

H. Church Matters (18:1–35)

In the fourth discourse of Jesus in the Gospel, Matthew turns to matters within the community of Jesus' followers. Jesus requires that his disciples practice self-effacement, acknowledge the seriousness of sin, show concern for the erring, and be willing to forgive.

18:1–14. The Community of Little Ones. The discourse is prompted by an inquiry from the disciples (v. 1), itself prompted by their (all too human) desire for a prominent place in God's kingdom. Jesus addresses not so much their question as the mindset that underlays it: any who would enter God's kingdom must abandon thoughts of selfpromotion and embrace the lowliness of a child. Embraced lowliness is demonstrated in part by embracing the lowly (cf. 19:13–15; Rom 12:16): to welcome a child is to welcome Christ (Matt 18:5).

In the verses that follow (6–14), "little ones" appears to refer to all who, by believing in Christ, have become "little" (i.e., have embraced lowliness; see v. 6). Their faith is precious in God's sight but vulnerable in a hostile world (see on 11:1–6): woe betide any who cause "little ones" to lose their faith or to wander into sin (vv. 6–7). That sin—unrepented and unforgiven—excludes from God's kingdom is presupposed throughout the discourse. As limbs are amputated to preserve physical life, so Jesus' followers must ruthlessly remove from their lives whatever entices them to sin (vv. 8–9; cf. 5:29–30).

God has charged angels with the care of these "little ones" (v. 10; cf. Ps 34:7; 91:11–12; Heb 1:14). If all are precious to God, none is to be disdained. Should any wander from the path of faith and obedience, every effort must be made to restore them, for God their Father wants none of them to perish (vv. 12–14).

18:15–35. Dealing with Offenders. The discourse continues with instructions given to Jesus' disciples on how they are to treat a brother or sister who sins against them. Love does not permit them to turn a blind eye to such sin, thus abandoning the wrongdoer to the consequences of their misdeed (note the connection between Lev 19:17 and 18; also Prov 3:12; 27:5–6), but nor will it want to embarrass them before others: only if a private word is disregarded are others to be brought in to add their voices. If the counsel of two or three is also rejected, then the whole church is to be enlisted in the effort to restore the offender. From any who nonetheless persist in sin the church is to disassociate itself—in the hope that this action of last resort will prompt repentance (vv. 15–17; cf. 2 Cor 2:5–11; 2 Thess 3:14–15). God in heaven, by forgiving or not forgiving the sin of the offender, will ratify the decision of a church that acts thus in love (v. 18).

Indeed, God will always hear and answer the united prayers of Christ's followers, however few they be, for God is bound to honor the presence of Christ who is with them when they meet in his name (vv. 19–20). The promise of Christ's presence (cf. 28:20) is reminiscent of Jewish texts that speak of the presence of God in the midst of those who meet to study Torah.

Human willingness to forgive has its natural limits (18:21); but God's does not, and those who would live in God's kingdom must choose God as their model. Jesus illustrates the point with a parable of a king who mercifully cancels an astronomical debt, but who reimposes it when he learns that the forgiven servant would not overlook the trifling sum he was owed by another. Followers of Jesus are to give as they have received (10:8), love as they have been loved (John 13:34), and forgive as they have been forgiven (Matt 18:35; Eph 4:32) if they would have a part in God's kingdom.

I. On the Way to the Cross (19:1–23:39)

In this section, Jesus and his disciples leave Galilee for Judea and Jerusalem, where he encounters the hostility that will lead to his crucifixion.

19:1–15. Family Matters. Having journeyed to Judea, Jesus is met with a trap-question ("Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife for any cause?") designed to draw attention to the discrepancy between his (presumably well-known) opposition to divorce and certain provisions of the law of Moses (cf. 19:7, citing Deut 24:1). For Jesus no less than the Pharisees, Scripture defines right behavior ("Have you not read . . . ?" [v. 4]), but the provisions cited by the Pharisees represent a concession to, and regulation of, human sinfulness rather than what God intends for marriage (Matt 19:8). God created human beings "male and female" so that the two might unite in one indissoluble family unit (vv. 4–6, citing Gen 1:27; 2:24). God instituted marriage for the good of humans, providing a lasting framework to encourage and support mutual love (cf. Gen 2:18). It is wrong, then, for humans to opt out in pursuit of their own agendas. Indeed, God does not recognize the dissolution of a marriage, but sees sexual union—even after a divorce—with anyone other than one's original spouse as an act of adultery (19:9, which excuses, however, a husband who divorces—as Jewish law appears to have required him to divorce—an unfaithful wife).

Jesus' disciples suggest that, if marriage is a school of love with demands so rigorous, one is perhaps well advised not to apply for admission (v. 10). Jesus grants that marriage is not for everyone: not for those rendered unfit—by birth or the violence of others—for the procreative act, nor for those divinely enabled to overcome sexual temptation while living a single life in the service of God's kingdom (19:12; cf. 1 Cor 7:7, 32–35).

The narrative moves from a discussion of marriage to a story about children. Jesus' disciples think children too insignificant to warrant their master's attention. Jesus rebukes them, repeating the lessons of 18:3 (it is those who embrace the lowliness of a child who find a place in God's kingdom) and 18:10 (none of God's "little ones" is to be despised), and blesses the children (19:13–15).

19:16–30. The Lure of Wealth. To a young man who inquires what "good" he must do to gain eternal life, Jesus replies that the good that God—the source of all goodness—requires is apparent already in the commandments of the Decalogue and that of neighbor-love; it need hardly be the subject of further inquiry (19:16–19, citing Exod 20:12–16; Lev 19:18). The young man claims to have observed these commandments, but Jesus reveals the divided loyalties of his heart when he invites him to make up what still lacks in his obedience by selling his possessions, giving the proceeds to the poor, and becoming Jesus' disciple. As elsewhere in the Gospel, the absolute duty humans owe God finds expression in the requirement to become a follower of Jesus. Unwilling to decisively choose God over wealth (cf. 6:24), the young man regretfully quits the scene.

Jesus seizes the occasion for a teaching moment with his disciples. Only of those whose lives are governed by devotion to God can it truly be said that God is their God; and only for such does God's kingdom have a place. Love of wealth makes this impossible. A love for God that reduces all other loves to their proper place is itself a gift of God (vv. 23–26); and in the day when God puts all things right, God will reward those who have demonstrated a love for Jesus greater than their attachment to possessions or kin. His immediate disciples will rule a restored Israel. Others, too, will be rewarded "a hundredfold" for sacrifices they have made (vv. 27–29). But the promise is meant to encourage Jesus' followers, not to invite their self-congratulation: on the day when all secrets are revealed, many who expect to be first will find themselves last, and vice versa (v. 30).

20:1–34. Serving Self or Others? The promise that sacrifices for Jesus' sake will be rewarded (19:29) might suggest that God's kingdom is a meritocracy, or invite a preoccupation with one's perceived entitlements. Jesus counters such notions with a parable (20:1–16) in which the number of hours people work makes no difference in their pay. A generous landowner gives a full day's wage not only to those who agreed to that sum at dawn, but also to those hired at intervals throughout the day. Given the tendency of human beings to focus on how any eventuality affects themselves, those who worked longest immediately take offense, construing the landowner's munificence as a depreciation of their labors. The landlord reminds them that they had not been wronged, and that he had the "right" to be generous! Jesus may well be using the parable (like that of the prodigal son, Luke 15:11–32) to defend his outreach to the disreputable: "respectable" people are outraged by the grace shown to "sinners" (Matt 9:11; Luke 15:2; this outrage is depicted in Matt 20:11–12; Luke 15:25–30), whereas Jesus wonders how they can begrudge God his generosity. Though this age is peopled by those absorbed in their own feelings and agendas, children of the heavenly Father find immunity from self-absorption in being "lost in wonder, love, and grace" (to quote the Wesley hymn).

An act of self-promotion sparks the exchange in Matt 20:20–28 as well; and it follows, most inopportunately, yet another announcement of Jesus' pending condemnation, suffering, death, and resurrection (vv. 17–19; cf. 16:21; 17:22–23). Demonstrating the insensitivity of the self-preoccupied, James and John (the "sons of Zebedee") choose this time to seek—through the appeal of a devoted mother—positions of honor and power in Christ's kingdom (vv. 20–21). Jesus reminds them that those who participate in his kingdom must first share his suffering (the "cup" prepared by God for him to drink), then declares that the mission he has come to fulfill is not that of assigning positions within the hierarchy of God's kingdom (vv. 22–23). Since James and John differed from the other disciples only in the brazenness of their request, Jesus explains to them all that though greatness in this age is measured by one's domination of others, the greatness that counts among his followers is that of mutual service (vv. 25–27). Indeed, his own mission is devoted to serving others, not to finding ways of being served, and it culminates in the sacrifice of his very life to procure their deliverance from the bane of sin (v. 28; cf. 1:21).

The chapter concludes with a miracle story distinguished from other such stories by the actions of the crowd: attributing their own sense of self-importance to Jesus, they attempt to silence two blind men whose cries for help they regard as a nuisance. Jesus, whose mindset is totally different, pauses to hear the blind men's request and compassionately grants them sight (20:29–34).

21:1–22:14. The Kingdom Offered—and Rejected—in Jerusalem. As prophets at times conveyed their message through symbolic acts (e.g., Ezek 12:1–16; 24:15–24), so Jesus now makes, of his entrance into Jerusalem, a symbolic offer of the kingdom that (since 4:17) has been the subject of all his teaching and activity: he deliberately enters the city as Zech 9:9 said Israel's king would do in the day of God's salvation. His entry on a donkey's back reflects the meekness of the king and the peaceable nature of the kingdom. As throughout the Gospel, the (now acted out) message of the kingdom meets both with popular, but little comprehending, enthusiasm (21:8–9, where "Hosanna" [lit. "Save now!" cf. Ps 118:25] has become an acclamation of the Messiah ["Son of David"]) and with the dismay (v. 10; cf. 2:3) of those whose way of life brooks no interference— even from God.

Nonetheless, with the authority of a king, Jesus does interfere with the trafficking (i.e., the selling of animals for sacrifice and the changing of currency into that approved for payment of Temple dues) that had turned the Temple courtyard from a "house of prayer" into a "den of robbers" (21:12–13, echoing Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11). Again, deliberate fulfillment of prophecy may be, in part, the point (cf. Zech 14:21 and, perhaps, Mal 3:1–4). The religious authorities who had tolerated the abuses in the Temple that Jesus attacked were far less tolerant of the healing of the blind and lame and the praise of children that, in Jesus' presence, replaced them. In reply, Jesus underlines that God's purposes are embraced and fulfilled by those little esteemed in society (vv. 14–16, citing Ps 8:2; cf. Matt 11:25–26).

In yet another symbolic act, Jesus curses a fig tree that had none of the fruit for which he was looking (21:18–19). The immediate withering of the tree provides an opportunity to underline the importance of trusting God when one prays (vv. 21–22; cf. 17:20). At the same time, the curse represents a warning to those who claim to be God's people that (the "fruit" of) their lives must match their pretensions (cf. 3:8–10; 7:21–23, and the parables that follow in ch. 21).

A pivotal exchange follows (21:23–27) in which those angered by Jesus' activities challenge him to declare by what authority he does them. Jesus counters by asking whether John the Baptist was divinely sent or acted of his own (human) initiative. His opponents' refusal to acknowledge the prophetic character of John's activities, and their apparent concern, not with the truth of this crucial issue, but only with avoiding personal embarrassment, reveal the insincerity of their question and the pointlessness of answering it. Jesus refuses to articulate the claims of God for those who lack ears to hear them (cf. 7:6).

Still, the message of the three parables that follow is unmistakable. In the first (vv. 28–32), the disreputable people who responded positively to John's message are compared to a son who initially refused but later obeyed his father's instructions. They (Jesus indicates) will enter God's kingdom long before religious leaders whose evident religiosity is like the spoken assent which the second son in the parable gives to his father's command, but whose rejection of John's message of the kingdom shows their unwillingness to act on their promise of obedience.

In the second parable (vv. 33–44), Jesus echoes a famous lament of Isaiah. The prophet had compared God's people to a vineyard whose owner did everything possible to ensure its fruitfulness, but which yielded only wild grapes (Isa 5:1–7). In Jesus' reshaped parable, the tenants placed in charge of the vineyard both refuse to turn over its produce to the owner and maltreat the messengers sent by the owner to collect it. Their mismanagement and malice reach their climax when they murder the owner's son, but they receive just retribution when the owner himself appears. The point of the parable—that Israel's leaders, in opposing Jesus, are acting like their forebears who mistreated the prophets; that God will vindicate Jesus, punish the corrupt leadership of Israel, and reconstruct as the people of God those who would bear appropriate "fruit" (see on vv. 18–22 above)—is not lost on "the chief priests and the Pharisees"; but their desire to arrest Jesus is hindered by their fear of the crowds (vv. 45–46; cf. v. 26).

The third parable (22:1–14) highlights both the insolence and the judgment of those who reject the offer of God's kingdom. The joys of the kingdom are pictured as a wedding banquet prepared by a king. The ostensible people of God are represented by those invited to the feast who, incredibly, respond (to their king, no less) with contempt and hostility (vv. 5–6). Their punishment (Matthew no doubt sees v. 7 as speaking of Jerusalem's destruction in 70 CE) is followed by the extension of the invitation to the banquet to anybody who would come. (We may think here both of the disreputable people whom Jesus "called" to the kingdom [cf. 9:10–13] and of the apostolic proclamation of the gospel to Gentiles [28:19].) The appearance at the banquet of a man improperly attired (representing those who see themselves, but do not live, as followers of Jesus [cf. 7:21–27]) leads to his banishment from the feast (vv. 11–14). The parable thus warns both those who reject and those who appear to accept Jesus' message of the perils that accompany their unprecedented opportunity.

22:15–46. Putting Jesus to the Test. In the verses that follow (15–46), three questions are put to Jesus with hostile intent before Jesus in turn poses a question of his interlocutors. In each case Jesus confronts his insincere questioners with the demands of life lived before God; in each case he leaves them speechless, but with their hostility intact.

A number of Jews felt religious qualms about supporting with their taxes a Roman regime that worshiped gods other than the Lord. The question whether it was lawful (i.e., in keeping with the law of God) to pay such taxes was thus a real one, but posed here not by religious seekers but by those intent on exposing Jesus to the charge of insurrection. Jesus responds that the emperor and God should both be given their due: those who use Roman coinage are bound to pay Roman taxes; those whose lives are a gift from God are bound to give God their wholehearted devotion (vv. 15–22).

Sadducean opponents posed a question (based on the law of Deut 25:5–6; cf. Gen 38:8) intended to mock Jesus' evident belief in the resurrection (vv. 23–33). Jesus corrects their misunderstanding of what belief in the resurrection entails (it does not mean a mere continuation of earthly life and relationships), then confronts their unbelief with a reminder of the power of God and the implications of Scripture: if God, in the time of Moses, was still the God of the patriarchs, then those patriarchs must be living in God's presence long after their death on earth.

The lawyer who asks Jesus to identify the greatest commandment in the law perhaps hopes he will speak dismissively of parts of the law. Jesus responds by identifying the fundamental duty of human beings, apart from which any fulfillment of the law is meaningless: the duty to love God with all one's being and to show the same devotion to one's neighbor's well-being as one naturally devotes to one's own (vv. 34–40; cf. Deut 6:5; Lev 19:18).

To those eager to discuss religion but not to yield God obedience, Jesus asks whose son the Messiah is (vv. 41–46). The obvious answer— "the son of David"—is correct (cf. 1:1), but insufficiently indicative of the authority with which the Messiah speaks. The Messiah whom David speaks of (in Psalm 110) as "Lord" must be more than his son. Readers of the Gospel know that Jesus, the Messiah, is the Son of God (3:17; 16:16; 17:5). To the words of David's Lord, the Son of God, it is crucial that all give heed (17:5).

23:1–39. Woes and Warnings. Human religiosity is by no means always opposed to human self-assertion. On the contrary, apparent devotion to God easily masks—even from the religious themselves—a pursuit of prestige and power that is antithetical to true devotion. In Jesus' denunciation of the vices that marred much religiosity in his day, Matthew highlights once again the opposition between Jesus and Jerusalem's religious leadership at the same time as he warns the pious of all ages of the perils that attend religiosity.

The objects of Jesus' denunciations are the scribes (the experts in the law) and the Pharisees (reputed to be its strictest observers). Jesus' endorsement of their teaching (23:2–3a) is, as later charges show (see vv. 16–22; also 15:1–20), merely rhetorical, intended to heighten the contrast between what they demand of others and what they do themselves (vv. 3b–4). Failure to practice what one "preaches" is a perennial danger for teachers (cf. Jas 3:1). Where religion requires visible tokens of obedience, those for whom it serves as a path to prestige show exaggerated conformity (v. 5; phylacteries were small leather boxes containing texts of Scripture worn on the left arm and forehead [cf. Exod 13:9, 16; Deut 6:8; 11:18]; for fringes, see Num 15:37–40; Deut 22:12). The same people relish occasions in which they encounter respect and the honorific titles with which they are addressed (vv. 6–7). Jesus' disciples are to eschew such titles, reserving all honor for God their Father and Jesus, God's Messiah, and seeking greatness only in service (vv. 8–12; cf. 20:25–28).

Seven "woes" follow, each directed against the "hypocrisy" (i.e., the discrepancy between appearance and reality) of "scribes and Pharisees," each—like prophetic pronouncements of judgment (cf. Jer 18:1–11)—indirectly inviting repentance from all in whom the fingered vice is found. The false teaching and priorities of the "scribes and Pharisees" prevent both teachers and their converts from entering God's kingdom (vv. 13–15). The attempt to distinguish between binding and non-binding oath formulas leads to conclusions both absurd (vv. 16–19; the basis on which the distinctions mentioned in these verses was drawn remains unclear) and—like many attempts to define casuistically the divine will in "gray" areas—incommensurate with the radical obedience and honor which are God's due (vv. 20–22): regardless of the formula, every oath is, effectively, an oath "by God" (cf. 5:33–37).

Punctilious observance (even to the point of seeing that every herb is tithed, in exaggerated obedience to Num 18:21–24; Deut 14:22–29) of commandments requiring visible and tangible compliance easily becomes a preoccupation substituting for, rather than accompanying, the justice, compassion, and faith that are at the heart of God's demands (vv. 23–24). Indeed, just as humans are typically more concerned to avoid being seen to do what they ought not than they are to avoid doing it, so the appearance of righteousness may be anxiously pursued as a cover for evil activities (vv. 25–28).

Finally, expressions of devotion to God's messengers who were mistreated in a bygone era are exposed as mere hypocrisy when those who express them oppose God's messengers among their contemporaries (vv. 29–33; the command of v. 32 is of course ironic). The "prophets, sages, and scribes" who, according to v. 34, will be sent by Jesus are messengers of the Christian gospel; the reception they encounter will match that of the prophets of old (cf. 5:11–12), thus provoking at last an outpouring of long accumulated divine wrath (vv. 35–36; on Zechariah, see, apparently, 2 Chr 24:20–22).

Jerusalem's destruction in 70 CE is in view both in vv. 35–36 and in v. 38 ("left desolate" means "abandoned by God"). Divine judgment only follows Jerusalem's persistent rejection of God's messengers and of the shelter from judgment that would have followed acceptance of Jesus' passionate appeals for repentance (v. 37). The judgment is not, however, final: like Paul (Rom 11:25–27), Matt 23:39 appears to envisage a day when Israel will welcome, in faith, its returning Messiah.

J. The Last Days (24:1–25:46)

Christian faith, inevitably and from its very beginnings, includes an eschatological hope: if God, Creator of all, is both good and all-powerful, then evil, though tolerated for a time, will not be allowed to spoil God's creation forever. God will see that goodness, righteousness, and peace prevail in the end.

The fifth and final discourse of Jesus (24:1– 25:46) picks up where chap 23 ended, with the "desolation" of Israel's "house" and the return of Christ (23:38–39). Jesus' disciples, pointing out the splendors of the Temple as rebuilt by Herod, are told of its pending destruction (24:1–2). Their question (or questions; but the destruction of the Temple, the return of Christ, and the end of the age all appear to be linked in the disciples' minds [v. 3]) prompts Jesus to characterize the troubles of the period leading up to his return and to summon his followers to faithfulness.

24:3–31. The Troubles of the Last Days. Jesus begins with a general characterization of the days to come (vv. 3–8): they will be marked by the claims of false messiahs, by warfare, and by "natural" disasters. Jesus' followers are to be neither deceived nor dismayed. They will find themselves the objects of persecution and hatred, which in turn will lead to apostasy, betrayal, and diminished fervor within their own communities (vv. 9–12). Before the end comes, however, the gospel proclaimed by Christ himself must be brought to all the world (v. 14; cf. 28:19–20). Those who remain faithful to the end will be saved (v. 13).

The verses that follow (15–28) speak of troubling times ahead in Judea. Though referring in the first place to events leading up to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE, the account is taken by many interpreters to have an eschatological referent as well. The desecration of the Temple site (v. 15; cf. Dan 9:27; 11:31) should be taken by Jesus' followers in Judea as a signal to flee without delay, for unprecedented suffering will follow (vv. 15–21, reminiscent of Gen 19:12–26). They are to pray that their flight may not be impeded by weather or by the difficulties of Sabbath travel (though Jewish law would not have forbidden such travel where life was endangered) (v. 20). Claims of false messiahs and prophets may be rejected outright, for Christ's return, when it happens, will require no investigation: it will be as evident to all as lightning, as certain as the gathering of vultures around a corpse (vv. 23–28).

Using the time-hallowed language of apocalyptic accounts, Jesus speaks of cosmic catastrophes preceding his return "on the clouds of heaven" (vv. 29–30; cf. Isa 13:10; Dan 7:13–14). That return will mean judgment for "all the tribes of the earth," deliverance for the faithful (vv. 30–31).

24:32–25:46. The Call to Readiness. Christ's followers, seeing these signs, should be prepared for Christ's return (vv. 32–33): the generation that sees the signs will also experience his coming (v. 34).

Verse 34 is understood most naturally to refer to the generation of Jesus' own contemporaries (cf. 16:28), though the early Christians, recalling the contingent nature of prophecy (cf. 1 Sam 2:30; Jer 18:1–11), interpreted the delay of Christ's return as a God-given opportunity for people to repent and be saved (cf. Luke 13:6–9; Acts 3:19–21; 2 Pet 3:9).

The timing of Christ's return remains a mystery, however, to all but God the Father: even the Son in his humanity is ignorant here (v. 36). Its uncertainty is both a temptation to indifference and moral laxity and a call for readiness. Those prepared will be "taken" and delivered from the judgment that comes to all who are "left" (vv. 40–41; cf. v. 31). The chapter concludes with a parable illustrating the readiness to which Christ's followers are called: they keep faithfully at the tasks they have been given (vv. 45–47) rather than becoming lax in their duties and indulgent in their lifestyles (vv. 48–51).

The call to readiness remains central in the two parables that begin ch. 25. In the first (vv. 1–13), ten bridesmaids await the appearance of the bridegroom, whom they are to accompany to the wedding festivities. Five bridesmaids show themselves wise by equipping their lamps with sufficient oil to last even if the bridegroom's appearance should be delayed. Conversely, five foolish bridesmaids are compelled to go and procure more oil just as the bridegroom approaches; they then arrive after the festivities have begun and find themselves excluded. The point of the parable is summed up in v. 13: given the certainty of Jesus' return but the uncertainty of its timing, one should maintain a constant state of readiness, living at all times with the same moral earnestness, the same fervor and focus in one's service, as one would show if one knew Christ's return was imminent.

In the second parable (vv. 14–30), enormous sums of money (an ordinary laborer would need to work fifteen to twenty years to earn the equivalent of a single "talent") are entrusted, in differing amounts, to servants with the intention that they would use them to increase their master's property. The talents represent the different responsibilities entrusted to Christ's followers: the resources, gifts and aptitudes, relationships, and circumstances that are a part of everyone's life and that are to be put to good use in the service of God's kingdom. Those who do so faithfully will, like the first two servants in the parable, be commended and rewarded abundantly at Christ's return. Those who fail to live for God's kingdom, whatever their declared allegiance ("Master" in v. 24 is the same word as "Lord" in 7:21–22, though in neither case is profession matched with obedience) or excuse (the misplaced fear expressed in vv. 24–25—that any venture might result in losses rather than gains—does not absolve the servant of his indolence) will share the fate of the kingdom's opponents.

The chapter closes with a dramatic portrayal of the final judgment (vv. 31–46). As elsewhere in the Gospel, Jesus' disciples are warned that professions of allegiance to the "Lord" (vv. 37, 44) must be matched by appropriate deeds (e.g., 5:20; 7:21–27): here deeds of charity are cited (cf. 5:7; also Jas 2:14–17; 1 John 3:16–18). Many interpreters understand the "brothers" (NRSV, "members of my family," v. 40) with whom Jesus identifies (cf. Prov 14:31; 17:5; 19:17), and who ought to have been the beneficiaries of such charitable acts, as impoverished members in the Christian community (cf. 18:5), or those who propagate the Christian gospel (cf. 10:40–42). But the Jesus of Matthew's Gospel demands that his followers show love to all they encounter (5:43–45; cf. Luke 10:25–37).

K. Death and Resurrection (26:1–28:20)

26:1–27:66. The Passion of the Savior. For Matthew, the crucifixion of Jesus represents the intended climax, not the tragic curtailment, of Jesus' mission. It has been anticipated (cf. 10:38; 12:14; 16:21–23; 17:12, 22–23; 20:17–19, 22, 28; 21:37–39) and foreshadowed (2:13–18; 14:1–12) throughout the Gospel. Now, when Jesus has finished "all" that he has to say (26:1; cf. John 17:4), the time has come (Matt 26:18, 45) for him to fulfill his Father's will (26:39, 42; cf. 6:10) and the divine plan announced in Scripture (26:54, 56) by giving his life to "save his people from their sins" (1:21; cf. 26:28).

As in John's Gospel (cf. John 10:17–18), so in Matthew, Jesus is shown to give up his own life freely. Repeatedly, Jesus announces what is about to happen (26:2, 21–25, 31 [citing Zech 13:7], 34). Knowing he is about to be betrayed and arrested, Jesus prepares himself, in prayer, for the event (vv. 36–44) rather than taking measures to evade it; nor does he call on his Father's resources to deliver him (vv. 53–54). Indeed, when the case against him disintegrates for lack of credible testimony (vv. 59–61; for v. 61, cf. John 2:18–22), Jesus provokes the charge of blasphemy that leads to a guilty verdict (vv. 65–66) by boldly announcing that he, as the Son of Man, will be exalted to God's right hand and will return to earth in judgment (v. 64, echoing Dan 7:13–14). At all times Jesus, not his foes, is in control of events—though this does not prevent them from mocking him when they appear to gain their purpose (vv. 67–68).

The significance of the events is summed up in Jesus' words at the Passover meal he shares with his disciples (vv. 26–28). When, in the course of the meal, Jesus gives his disciples bread to eat and wine to drink, he illustrates the giving of his body and blood for their benefit: as the Passover celebrated Israel's deliverance from slavery and entry into a covenant with God, so the shedding of Jesus' blood secures for his followers a covenantal relationship with God, one in which his self-sacrifice procures their sins' forgiveness (cf. Exod 24:8; Jer 31:31–34). They, the beneficiaries, are invited to "take," "eat," and "drink" of what he offers them.

Readers find it natural to identify with Jesus' disciples who, notwithstanding good intentions (vv. 41, 51) and self-assurance (v. 35), fail Jesus at each turn of the narrative. Their "righteous indignation" at the perceived wastefulness of a woman's act of devotion is singularly insensitive to the feelings of both the woman (note v. 10) and of Jesus, as he anticipates his death and burial (vv. 6–13). Judas, "one of the twelve" (v. 47) who ate at the same table with Jesus (v. 23), betrays him (as David was betrayed by his trusted counselor Ahithophel; cf. Ps 41:9, and note the parallels between the fate of Ahithophel and that of Judas, 2 Sam 17:23 and Matt 27:5). The disciples closest to Jesus, whose companionship he seeks as he approaches with dread his suffering and death, fall asleep rather than pray at the crucial hour (vv. 36–45). Nor are any of the disciples able to live up to their promise to be true to Jesus (v. 35): when trouble comes—and after an initial resort to violence, checked by Jesus, that completely misrepresents his mission (vv. 51–54; cf. 5:38–39)—their resolve vanishes, the instinct for self-preservation takes over, Peter denies Christ, all forsake him, and Jesus is left alone.

The story that portrays the failed intentions of the disciples also features the relentless hostility to God's Son of the leadership of God's covenant people; the judicial irresponsibility of the governor and the thuggery of soldiers of the greatest empire the world had known; the mob mentality that turned common people into a throng crying for Jesus' execution. Matthew 27 shows that the humanity for which the Son of God died was also the humanity that crucified God's Son.

The religious and political leadership of Israel ("the chief priests and the elders of the people") initiate the action against Jesus (26:3–5, 14–16, 47; 27:1), and it is their relentless hostility that drives the process to its predicted conclusion (cf. 16:21; 20:18). It is not to be thwarted by the lack of credible evidence (26:59–60), nor moved by the anguished repentance of the traitor they had suborned (27:3–4), nor shamed by the governor's ploy to force them to choose between a notorious criminal and "Jesus who is called the Messiah" (27:15–23). Nor are they content with gaining Jesus' crucifixion. They join the passersby (27:39–40; cf. the language of 4:3, 6) in mocking the crucified "King of Israel," even using his healing of the sick as the basis for taunting him with his apparent inability to save himself (vv. 41–43, echoing Ps 22:8). Indeed, their hostility extends beyond death to attempts to prevent belief in Jesus' resurrection (27:62–66; 28:11–15): so deeply ingrained, even in the leadership of God's covenant people, is the universal human tendency to protect pride, position, and prerogative from any infringement. Yet their murderous hostility toward God's Son is combined with—and its evil perhaps concealed even from themselves by—punctilious attention to details of religious law (27:5–7; cf. John 18:28).

For his part, Pilate attempts to conceal his irresponsibility (highlighted by the story of his wife's dream [27:19]) by washing his hands of the whole affair (27:24). His attempt to shift responsibility ("See to it yourselves") is as futile as that of the "chief priests and the elders" who spoke the same words to Judas (v. 4). Roman soldiers show the depravity of the human heart by mocking—with imitation robe, crown, and scepter—and brutalizing the "King of the Jews" (vv. 27–31).

The crowd of common people allows itself to be swayed by the suggestions of its leaders in crying, without cause, for Jesus' death (vv. 20–23). The words with which they accept responsibility for Jesus' execution (27:25) are certainly linked by Matthew to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, interpreted as divine judgment (cf. 23:34–36). Readers of every race and generation—and in particular those who acknowledge that "Christ died for [their] sins" (1 Cor 15:3)—should acknowledge their solidarity with the crowd whose sinful cries resulted in Christ's death.

In the face of the charges brought against him, and even when taunted, abused, and crucified, Jesus remains silent (27:12–14), thus both fulfilling Scripture (cf. Isa 53:7) and illustrating the meekness and non-resistance to evil that he enjoined on his disciples (5:5, 38–42; cf. 1 Pet 2:19–25). After responding to Pilate's "Are you the King of the Jews?" with an ambiguous "You say so" (perhaps "Well, yes, but not as you understand the phrase" [27:11]), Jesus does not speak again until he cries from the cross the opening words of Psalm 22, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (v. 46): like righteous sufferers in the psalms and throughout all ages, though to a degree known by no other, he experienced what it means to suffer in faithfulness to God while the face of God remains hidden, and divine deliverance is not forthcoming (cf. Ps 10:1; 13:1; 44:17–26). The apparent remoteness of God is yet another consequence of human sin, and must be borne by the Savior.

The universal significance of what is happening is underlined by the "darkness" that "came over the whole land" during the hours of Jesus' agony, and, at his death, by the tearing of the Temple curtain (cf. Heb 9:3, 8; 10:19–22), an earthquake, the resurrection of "many . . . saints" (cf. 1 Cor 15:20, 22), and the acknowledgement, by Gentiles, of Jesus as God's Son (vv. 45, 50–54).

Jesus is buried by a rich follower, Joseph from Arimathea, in Joseph's own new family tomb. Two of the women who accompanied Jesus from Galilee observe Joseph as he does so (vv. 55–60).

28:1–20. The Risen Lord. Undeniably, evil has found a place in God's world: its presence was never more in evidence than when God's Son was crucified. Yet evil cannot have the last word in God's world: its defeat was sealed by the resurrection of the crucified Son.

Matthew 27 closes with Jesus' opponents seemingly in control, their maneuvers successful in securing both his execution and a guard for his tomb, their taunts unanswered, that God had no interest in rescuing his self-proclaimed Son (27:43). Yet throughout the Gospel readers have been made aware that God's plan (announced in Scripture) includes Messiah's rejection and crucifixion. That claim, together with all of Jesus' words and activities, is vindicated by the resurrection. Indeed, the resurrection marks the inauguration of Christ's reign (cf. 28:18), the "kingdom of heaven" whose coming has been the focus of Jesus' message throughout the Gospel (e.g., 4:17; 12:28; 13:1–52; 26:64). Without the resurrection, Jesus' claims are the product of delusion or deceit; the resurrection proves them true.

Matthew's account is typically concise. At dawn on "the first day of the week" (hereafter "the Lord's day" celebrated by his followers [Rev 1:10; cf. Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 16:2]), two women express their undying devotion to what appears a lost cause by going "to see the tomb" (Matt 28:1). As, in Matt 1, an angel of the Lord announced Christ's birth, so, in ch. 28, an angel announces his resurrection and gives the women instructions to convey to Jesus' disciples: they will see him in Galilee. The women, moved to both "fear and great joy" by this sign of God's presence and activity, meet Jesus himself on their way to fulfill their commission. He speaks lovingly of the disciples who failed him as his "brothers" whom he intends to see. The women worship him.

Sandwiched between this encounter with the risen Jesus (vv. 8–10) and that of the disciples (vv. 16–20) is a reminder that the world that rejected Jesus remains unmoved: as, in 21:23–27, Jesus' opponents were more interested in saving face than in discovering the truth of Jesus' claims, so here the extraordinary turn of events moves them, not to faith, nor even to wonder that seeks an explanation, but rather to use the tools at their disposal (i.e., bribery) to undermine a message that implies their part in opposing God's purposes. The rule of Christ has been inaugurated, but until "the end of the age" it will encounter denial and opposition.

As Jesus appeared in glory to three disciples on the mountain of transfiguration (17:1–8), so now, on a mountain, the risen Lord appears to all his disciples. As, on a mountain, Jesus rejected the tempter's shortcut to the rule of this world (4:8–10), so now, having fulfilled the Father's will, he declares on a mountain, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (28:18). It was on a mountain that Jesus first instructed his followers on the ethics of the kingdom (5:1–7:27); so now, on a mountain, he commands them to "go" and "make disciples of all nations." They do this in the first place by baptizing people of all nations in the name of the one God who is at the same time a Father in whose providential care they may trust (6:7–13, 25–34; 7:11; 10:29–31), a Son who reveals the Father (11:27) and who accomplishes the divine plan for the salvation of lost humanity (1:21), and a Spirit through whom God's presence and power are made real in the world (3:16; 10:20; 12:18, 28); and they make disciples in the second place by passing on the teaching of Jesus (28:19–20). The disciples charged with this mission, like followers of Jesus in every age, are the same disciples who have shown their "little faith" throughout the Gospel and who harbor uncertainty even as they worship their resurrected Lord (6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 28:17). Yet they are assured of the accompanying presence of the one born Emmanuel ("God is with us" [1:23]) even "to the end of the age" (28:20).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. C. Allison. The Sermon on the Mount: Inspiring the Moral Imagination (New York: Crossroad, 1999); F. D. Bruner. Matthew: A Commentary. Volume 1: The Christbook, Matthew 1–12 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); . Matthew: A Commentary. Volume 2: The Churchbook, Matthew 13–28 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, Jr. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew. Vols. 1–3. ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988–97); R. T. France. The Gospel of Matthew. NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); D. A. Hagner. Matthew 1–13. WBC 33A (Dallas: Word, 1993); . Matthew 14–28. WBC 33B (Dallas: Word, 1995); C. Keener. A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); U. Luz. Matthew 1–7: A Commentary. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); . Matthew 8–20: A Commentary. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); . Matthew 21–28: A Commentary. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); S. Westerholm. Understanding Matthew: The Early Christian Worldview of the First Gospel (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006).

OVERVIEW

Origin and Sources. Mark's Gospel may have been the first sustained, literary interpretation of the traditions about Jesus in primitive Christianity. Although traditions from as early as the second century CE ascribe the Second Gospel to "Mark," Peter's companion in Rome (1 Pet 5:13), nowhere in the Gospel is its author identified or correlated with other NT figures. Mark's presumption that its readers are unfamiliar with Jewish customs, Aramaic terms, and Palestinian geography (7:2–4, 31, 34) suggests an origin beyond Palestine. The pervasiveness of Latin customs and vocabulary (5:9; 10:12; 12:42) points to a provenance in Syria, Italy, or elsewhere in the Roman Empire. If the tumult forecast in 13:5–23 mirrors that of Mark's readers, then the Gospel may have arisen during the era of Nero's persecution of Christians (64 CE) and the Jewish revolt against imperial Rome (66–73 CE). Such a setting is consistent with Mark's emphasis on the tribulations of Jesus and his followers (4:17; 10:30, 33–34). Such dating squares with the judgment, accepted by most scholars, that Mark was a source for Matthew and Luke, both of which may have been written toward the end of the first century CE. Mark's own sources appear to have included miracle stories (4:35–5:43), sayings (9:42–50), and an account of Jesus' final days in Jerusalem (14:1–15:47).

Genre and Style. Mark bears the stamp of many genres: OT prophetic and apocalyptic narratives (1 Kgs 17–2 Kgs 9; Dan 1–6), legends of the rabbis, and lives of Hellenistic philosophers. Like the other Gospels, Mark is essentially a religious proclamation based on historical event. Though vivid, its Greek is cruder than that of Matthew or Luke. Closely examined, however, Mark exhibits care in composition, creatively juxtaposing disparate traditions.

Preeminent among Mark's emphases is an interpretation of Jesus that recognizes his authority (1:21–27; 2:1–3:6) yet stresses his suffering and death (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34, 45). Authentic discipleship is depicted as self-sacrificial service to God for the sake of the gospel (8:34–9:1; 9:33–50; 10:35–45). Ironically, Jesus' disciples (10:35–41; 14:66–72) display such discipleship less often than do a cast of minor characters (5:21–43; 12:41–44) and Jesus himself (14:32–42). Jesus' followers are summoned to faithful vigilance during an arduous, ambiguous time between the inauguration and consummation of God's kingdom (1:14–15; 4:1–34; 10:1–31; 13:28–37).

Mark's relation to other Gospels. Compared with Matthew and Luke, Mark contains much less of Jesus' teaching (cf. Matt 5:1–7:27) and none of the infancy narratives (Luke 1:1–2:52). Only later endings to Mark describe appearances of the risen Christ. Unlike John, whose Jesus unveils himself at length (6:35–51; 10:1–18), Jesus in Mark is a cryptic figure who conceals as much as he reveals (4:1–34; 9:2–13). Despite its mysterious character, Mark's place in the NT has been secure, perhaps because no Gospel probes more intensely the implications of "proclaim[ing] Christ crucified" (1 Cor

OUTLINE

I. Prologue: Introducing Jesus (1:1–15)

II. The Early Days (1:16–10:52)

A. Jesus' Galilean Ministry and Its Opposition (1:16–3:12)

B. "Who Then Is This?" (3:13–6:6a)

C. Revelation over Bread (6:6b–8:21)

D. Christology and Discipleship (8:22–10:52)

III. The Final Days (11:1–15:47)

A. Jerusalem and the Temple (11:1–13:37)

B. The Passion Narrative (14:1–15:47)

IV. Epilogue: The Empty Tomb (16:1–8) [The Shorter Ending of Mark]
[The Longer Ending of Mark (16:9–20)]

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prologue: Introducing Jesus (1:1–15)

Mark's prologue consists of five seamless segments: the title and epigram (1:1–3), a description of John the Baptist (1:4–8), the stories of Jesus' baptism (1:9–11) and temptation (1:12–13), and a transitional passage that opens Jesus' Galilean ministry (1:14–15). This introduction orients the reader to several interrelated themes.

A christological concentration: Jesus Christ ("messiah" or "anointed one": 8:29; 9:41; 12:35; 13:21; 14:61; 15:32) stands at the beginning of this Evangelist's "good news" or "glad tidings of salvation" (vv. 1, 14; cf. Isa 52:7; 61:1; Matt 11:5; Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 15:1; 1 Thess 2:2, 8–9). Although missing from some ancient witnesses, "Son of God" is another significant title for Jesus in Mark (1:11; 3:11; 9:7; 15:39); in the OT it connotes an obedient servant within God's salvation history (2 Sam 7:13–14; Hos 11:1; Wis 2:18).

An Old Testament backdrop: The epigram in vv. 2–3 conflates material from Isa 40:3 with Exod 23:20 and Mal 3:1, suggesting that John's ministry fulfills Scripture and prepares the way of one mightier than he (v. 4). In the wilderness (vv. 3, 12, 13) Israel rebelled against God (Pss 78:17–18; 106:13–33) yet was delivered (Exod 19–24). The Baptizer shares the prophets' concern for repentance and forgiveness (Isa 1:10–20; Jer 31:34; Joel 2:12–13; Zech 1:4) in association with baptism (v. 4; Ezek 36:25–28); his attire recalls that of Elijah (v. 6; 2 Kgs 1:8). The heavenly acclamation of Jesus at his baptism (v. 11) combines elements of Ps 2:7 and Isa 42:1, with possible allusions to Gen 22:2–16 and Exod 4:22–23. A sojourn of forty days is reminiscent of Exod 34:28 and 1 Kgs 19:8. Though the significance of Jesus' being with the wild beasts (v. 13) is unclear, it may suggest the restoration of a paradise-like condition before the fall (see Gen 2:19–20; Isa 11:6–9; 65:25) or, in conjunction with angels, providential protection (Ps 91:11–13).

An apocalyptic aura: Elijah's return was sometimes regarded as a sign of the age's end (Mal 4:5). In John he has indeed returned (Mark 9:13); the whole countryside around Judea's capital, Jerusalem, is responding to his message (v. 5). Israel's reinfusion with the Holy Spirit was expected in the last days (vv. 8, 10; Isa 11:1–2; Joel 2:28–32; Acts 2:17–22); the Spirit hovers over Jesus at his baptism (vv. 9–10; Gen 1:2) before driving him into the desert (v. 12). The rending of the heavens is an apocalyptic image of divine disclosure (v. 10; 15:38; Isa 64:1; Ezek 1:1; John 1:51; Acts 7:56; Rev 4:1; 11:19; 19:11). By the NT era Satan, Jesus' tempter (v. 13), is considered God's eschatological adversary (Mark 4:15; John 13:27; Acts 5:3; 26:18; 2 Cor 11:14; 1 Tim 5:15; Rev 20:1–10). The pith of Jesus' proclamation, repentance and trust on the threshold of God's sovereign reign (v. 15b; 4:11; 9:1; 15:43), is apocalyptically tinged: "The time"—God's appointed moment—"is fulfilled" (v. 15a; 11:13; 12:2; Ezek 7:12; Dan 7:22; Gal 4:4). Such a time is painful (13:1–23): Jesus' own ministry in Galilee, a region of northern Palestine, begins only after John's arrest (v. 14), which presages Jesus' own (14:16).

II. The Early Days (1:16–10:52)

A. Jesus' Galilean Ministry and Its Opposition (1:16–3:12)

Mark's first major section comprises a series of five anecdotes that characterize Jesus' earliest ministry (1:16–45) and its stimulation of five controversies (2:1–3:6).

At the beginning of each of Mark's major sections (3:12–19a; 6:6b–13; 8:27–9:1; 11:1–11; 14:1–11) Jesus' disciples are prominent. In 1:16–20 the first disciples are summoned along the Sea of Galilee, an inland fresh-water lake. Fishermen enjoyed a lucrative business, as suggested by Zebedee's hired men (1:20). Brief though it is, this passage highlights features that will recur: the extraordinary authority of Jesus' actions (1:27; 4:41), his initiative in making disciples (2:14; 3:13– 19a), and the rupture such discipleship creates within families (3:19b–21; 10:28–30).

Jesus' casting out of an unclean spirit in Capernaum (1:21–28), on the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee, is the first of four such stories in Mark's four major sections (see 5:1–20; 7:24–30; 9:14–29). Jesus triumphs over the demon's attempt to wrest power through assertion of his antagonist's identity (v. 24b; cf. Gen 32:27–29). Subtle details cast long narrative shadows: Jesus wields authority over Satan's dominion (vv. 24a, 27c; 1:32; 3:11–12), which astounds (vv. 22a, 27a; 2:12; 5:20, 42b; 7:37; 11:18) and causes his fame to spread (v. 28; 3:7–10; 5:20; 6:14, 53–56). Jesus' teaching is fresh (v. 27b; 2:21–22), unlike that of the scribes (v. 22), the professional interpreters of the law who will return as Jesus' nemeses (2:6, 16; 3:22; 11:27). This healing takes place on the Sabbath in a synagogue (v. 21; also 3:1–2), a place of teaching and prayer, even as Jesus will resist later attacks in Jerusalem's Temple (11:27–12:27).

Describing Jesus' cure of all of Capernaum's sick, including Peter's mother-in-law (1:29–34), Mark generalizes the exorcism's effect. Three other nuances are introduced: the ministry of women to Jesus (v. 31b; 14:3–9; 16:1); his silencing of demons, who know his true identity (v. 34b; 3:11–12); the impossibility of keeping Jesus' power a secret (vv. 32–33; 1:43–45; 7:36).

Jesus' ministry begins with preaching (1:14–15); Mark broadens that aspect by narrating the build-up to a preaching tour throughout Galilee (1:35–39). More details are introduced for later development: Jesus as a person of prayer (v. 35b; 6:46; 14:32–42); his distance from the multitudes and their incursions upon him (vv. 35, 37; 1:45; 2:1–2; 3:7, 19b–20; 6:31–34; 9:2–15); and those searching for Jesus, often with hostile intent (vv. 36–37; 3:32; 11:18; 12:12; 14:1b).

Jesus' healing of a leper (1:40–45) declares many of Mark's remaining preoccupations. This tale demonstrates Jesus' compassion for those in distress (v. 41; 5:21–24a; 6:34–36, 48a; 8:2–3) and his divine power for its alleviation (v. 42; 4:39; 6:41–44, 48b–51b; 8:7–9; cf. 2 Kgs 5:7). Because leprosy (Hansen's disease) was regarded as contagious impurity (Lev 13:1–14:47), its sufferers were subject to banishment (2 Kgs 7:3–10; 2 Chr 26:19–21). Accordingly, Jesus insists that this leper's cleansing be ratified by a priest and honored with an offering (v. 44; cf. Lev 14:48–57). Social reintegration of outcasts and appreciation of genuine piety recur throughout Mark (3:4; 5:19, 23–34; 7:18b–23; 12:29–31).

Mark 1:16–45 highlights Jesus' power while resistance stirs in the shadows. In 2:1–3:6 opposition to Jesus moves onto center stage. Controversy stitches together five anecdotes arranged as a chiasm, or inverted ladder:

A Dispute over blasphemy: a paralytic (2:1–5, 10b–12) and some scribes (2:6–10a)

B The scribes' challenge to the disciples about Jesus' eating (2:13–17)

C The disciples' feasting and the bridegroom's removal (2:18–22)

B' The Pharisees' challenge to Jesus about his disciples' eating on the Sabbath (2:23–28)

A' Dispute over Sabbath: Pharisees (3:1–2, 6) and a man with a withered hand (3:3–5)

Two healings (2:1–12; 3:1–6) encompass three debates, all of which involve eating (2:13–17, 18–22, 23–28). The two bookends, tainted by spiritual heart disease (2:6, 8; 3:5), conflate common elements in a mirror image: the first healing (2:1–4, 10b–12) frames an accusation (2:5–10a); murderous suspicion (3:1–2, 6) frames the second healing (3:3–5).

The scribes' repudiation of Jesus' healing of a paralytic (2:1–12) is the first instance of Mark's characteristic technique of "sandwiching" two traditional pieces in such a way that each provides commentary on the other (see also 3:1–6; 3:19–35; 5:21–43; 6:6b–30; 11:12–25; 14:1–11; 14:53–72). The primary concern of 2:1–12 is Jesus' authority, manifested in his extraordinary ability to heal (vv. 10–11); the passage's theological springboard is the OT's correlation of healing with forgiveness (2 Chr 7:14; Pss 41:4; 103:3; Isa 57:17–19). Other issues rise to the fore. The scribes' rejection of Jesus' pronouncement of forgiveness is framed as blasphemy (v. 7a), a capital offense (Lev 24:15–16) with which Jesus will ultimately be charged by Jerusalem's high priest (14:64). Its relevance here presumes that forgiveness was God's exclusive prerogative (v. 7b; Exod 34:6–7; Isa 43:25). As elsewhere (3:4; 11:30) Jesus counters with an ambiguous question that puts his accusers on the spot (v. 9); the paralytic's healing suggests Jesus' authority to forgive sins without proving it. By contrast, faith (v. 5) manifests itself as aggressive confidence in Jesus' healing power (see also 5:34, 36; 10:52). Though he exhibits unusual discernment (v. 8), the only authority Jesus claims for himself is that of "the Son of Man" (v. 10), his customary yet obscure expression of self-reference throughout Mark (2:28; 8:31, 38; 9:9, 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 13:26; 14:21, 41, 62).

The summoning of Levi from a roadside tollhouse (2:13–14) dissolves into a larger tableau: disgruntlement among Pharisaic scribes over Jesus' eating with social outcasts (2:15–17). Jewish tax collectors were despised for their presumed dishonesty, interaction with Gentiles, and collaboration with Roman authorities. "Sinners" were the notoriously wicked who flouted Jewish law. In Mark, the Pharisees are ranged among Jesus' typical adversaries (v. 18; 2:24; 3:6; 7:1, 5; 8:11; 10:2; 12:13), even though they were a popular reform movement within Judaism that piously applied the law to all aspects of life (Josephus, B. J. 2.162–66). Here the dispute turns on the proper expression of righteousness: distancing one's self from sinners or fraternizing with them, as a physician consorts with the infirm (vv. 16–17).

A criticism of eating shifts into one of fasting (2:18–11), a Jewish rite observed annually (Lev 16:29; Zech 7:5) and occasionally (Ezra 8:21–23; Jonah 3:7–9) as a sign of contrition. Early Christians eventually adopted the practice (Acts 13:2–3; 14:23), as Mark 2:20b suggests. Jesus' rejoinder challenges not the act but its timing: The time to mourn is not at a wedding (cf. Isa 54:5–6; 62:4–5; Ezek 16:1–63; Hos 2:19; Eph 5:32; Rev 19:7) but rather when the bridegroom is taken away (vv. 19–20a; 14:21). Jesus' ministry represents something new (cf. 1:27) that the old cannot contain (vv. 21–22).

Another dispute erupts over plucking grain on the Sabbath (2:23–28). During and after the biblical era Jews debated the legality of particular activities on the Sabbath, the day set apart from all work (Exod 20:8–11; Deut 5:12–15; m. Sabb. 1.1–24.5). Plucking heads of grain (v. 23) may have been considered a violation of the proscription of reaping on the Sabbath (Exod 34:21). In rabbinic style Jesus defends his disciples' actions by countering with scriptural precedent (Lev 24:5–9; 1 Sam 21:1–6) whose effect is more liberal (Mark 7:1–23). The underlying question— Who decides?—is resolved in favor of Jesus, "the Son of Man [who] is lord even of the sabbath" (v. 28; cf. 2:10).

The healing of the man with a withered hand (3:1–6) is the last in this series of initial disputes. The narrative pattern inverts that of 2:1–12: a mighty work (vv. 3–5) is sandwiched inside a controversy (vv. 1–2, 6). The issue is the same as in 2:23–28: Jesus' contemporaries would have accepted a violation of the Sabbath to save life but would have questioned that exception's relevance in this case. Jesus attributes pitiless legality to "hardness of heart," stubborn obtuseness (see also 6:52; 8:17; 10:5; Exod 9:34–35; 1 Sam 6:6; 2 Chr 36:13; Ps 95:8). The climax of this passage, indeed of 2:1–3:6, lies in 3:6. The Herodians may have been partisans of the Herodian dynasty or officials appointed by Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (4 BCE–39 CE). Either way Mark foreshadows a conspiracy of Jewish and Roman authorities to destroy Jesus (see also 6:14–29; 12:13; 15:1).

Mark 3:7–12 is a transitional summary that underscores Jesus' growing popularity (1:28, 35–37, 45) while foreshadowing his ministry beyond Palestine (7:24–31). Judea and Jerusalem (v. 8) lay south of Galilee; Idumea ("Edom," Gen 32:3) was a region southeast of Judea. Beyond the Jordan was Perea, northeast of Judea and southeast of Galilee; Tyre and Sidon were cities northwest of Galilee. Mark gathers several threads in this digest: the enormous, life-threatening crowds (vv. 8–10; 3:20; 6:31) that want to touch Jesus (1:41; 5:27–28; 6:56); the unclean spirits' submission to him (v. 11; 1:23–26; 5:1–13; 9:25–26); their recognition of Jesus as the Son of God (see also 1:24; 5:7) and his silencing of that acclamation (v. 12; 1:34).

B. "Who Then Is This?" (3:13–6:6a)

Mark's previous section crystallized Jesus' ministry and its ensuing controversy; this one focuses on Jesus' mysterious identity and its challenge to faith. Opening and closing with disputes in which Jesus' family is implicated (3:21, 31–35; 6:1–6a), two episodes highlight Jesus' contest with unclean spirits (3:22–30; 5:1–20) and a trio explores the dynamics of faith amid hopeless circumstances (4:35–41; 5:21–43). At this section's heart is Jesus' teaching in parables (4:1–34), addressing God's kingdom while characterizing its principal herald.

Mark's first major section opened with Jesus' calling of his first disciples (1:16–20); this section begins with the filling out of the Twelve (3:13–19a). The setting is a mountain or "the hill country" (v. 13), a typical place for special disclosures in the OT (e.g., Exod 19:3–25) and elsewhere in Mark (9:2–13; 13:3–37). Jesus "makes" (3:14, 16) twelve whom he wants: a number that may symbolize Israel's twelve tribes (Num 1:4–16; 13:1–16; cf. Matt 19:28; Luke 22:30). The term "apostles" is rare in Mark (elsewhere only at 6:30). Its basic meaning, emissaries who discharge a specific commission, is its likely connotation (see 6:7–13). Besides affording him company, the Twelve are authorized to do precisely what Jesus has done in 1:21–3:12: to preach and wield authority over demons (3:14–15; 6:12–13). The names and ordering of the Twelve (3:16–19a) vary across the NT (see Matt 10:2–4; Luke 6:14–16; John 1:40–49; 21:2; Acts 1:13). Jesus gives Simon the name Petros (Greek for "stone" or "rock"; 1:16; cf. Matt 16:18–19 and its Aramaic equivalent "Cephas" in John 1:42; 1 Cor 1:12; Gal 1:18). Despite Mark's translation (3:17), the derivation and meaning of "Boanerges," nicknames for James and John (1:19), remain obscure. The "Cananaean," applied to another Simon (v. 18), may derive from an Aramaic term denoting religious zeal (qananan; see Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). The meaning of "Iscariot" (3:19a) is cloudy; it could be rooted in different Semitic terms for "one from Kerioth" (see Josh 15:25; Jer 48:24) or "a fraud" (sakar), perhaps even in a Latin word for an "assassin" (sicarius). Mark immediately identifies Judas as the one who will hand Jesus over: the same verb used to describe John the Baptist's arrest (1:14).

The embedding of a harsh controversy over Jesus' authority (3:22–30) inside a framing narrative that redefines his family (3:19b–21, 31–35) exemplifies a classic Markan technique first witnessed in 2:1–12. Indeed, that traditional sandwich and this one evince interesting parallels. In both cases the setting is "at home" (2:1; 3:19b), where an overflow crowd has gathered, impeding access (2:2; 3:20). Accusatory scribes are present in both cases (2:6; 3:22); here they have come "from Jerusalem," where Jesus' death awaits (10:32–34). Coloring both scenes are spirits, whether discerning (2:8) or unclean (3:30), and a charge of blasphemy (2:7; 3:28–29) associated with Jesus' healing power (2:9; 3:22) and his forgiveness of sins (2:7; 3:28–29). Both tableaux turn on the scope or source of Jesus' authority: either to forgive sins (2:7) or to cast out demons (3:22). The cords braiding 3:22–30 with its surrounding material in 3:19b–21 and 3:31–35 are (1) a serious misapprehension of Jesus as "out of his mind" (v. 21) or demon-possessed (v. 22; cf. John 8:48–52; 10:20) and (2) the division of households revealed by that charge. While Jesus counters his attackers with the claim that a house internally divided cannot stand (3:25–27), his own family show themselves as divided against Jesus (3:21, 31–32). Jesus suggests that his ministry spells the toppling of Satan (vv. 26–27) or "Beelzebul" ("lord of the flies" [2 Kgs 1:2] or "lord of the dwelling" [Matt 10:25]); strangely, the lord of an ancient household—the father—is absent from among Jesus' mother and brothers (Mark 3:31–32). Both components of this Markan sandwich of traditions end on a jarring note. In 3:28–30 Jesus solemnly affirms that confusing the Holy Spirit (see 1:8, 10, 12) or the Spirit's agent (3:30) with unclean spirits is tantamount to commission of an unforgiveable sin—perhaps because a patient so gravely ill will never solicit the physician's healing (2:17). In 3:33–35 Jesus radically redefines members of the family, antiquity's most basic social organization. No longer are they his relatives by blood; now they are all who do God's will. The broadening of that family to include "sister[s]" (v. 35) probably bespeaks female disciples in the earliest churches.

Mark characterizes Jesus' speech "in parables" (3:23), which in the OT are riddles or enigmatic stories that provoke without necessarily illuminating (Ps 78:2; Prov 1:6; Ezek 17:2; Hab 2:6). The stage is set for 4:1–34, Mark's largest cluster of parables, which, like 2:1–3:6, is chiasmatically arranged:

- B The sower (vv. 3–9)
- C The parables' purpose: Mystery given or withheld (vv. 10–12)
- D The sower explained (vv. 13–20)
- C' The parables' purpose: Disclosure and secrecy (vv. 21–25)
- B' The growing seed (vv. 26–29) and the mustard seed (vv. 30–32)
- A' Conclusion (vv. 33–34)

The setting (vv. 1–2, 10, 33–34) swings between poles of publicity and privacy, between distance and proximity, between parables and explanation. Three parabolic stories (vv. 3–9, 26–29, 30–32) liken God's kingdom (v. 11) to seeds whose inauspicious origins—random or inattentive sowing, minute size—eventuate in astonishing outcomes: a hundredfold yield (v. 8), automatic growth (v. 28), "the greatest of all shrubs" (v. 32). Fertility and fruitlessness are common metaphors in Jewish and early Christian apocalypticism (2 Esd 4:26–32; 1 Cor 3:6–8), even as sickle and harvest (v. 29) refer to final judgment (Joel 3:13a; Rev 14:14–20) and nesting in large branches (v. 32) suggests protection of God's elect (Ezek 17:23; 31:6; Dan 4:12, 21).

Punctuated by prophetic exhortations to listen and to look (vv. 3, 9, 23–24a; cf. Isa 28:23; Rev 2:7, 11), apocalypticism is even more pronounced in Jesus' baffling reasons for the parables (vv. 10–12, 21–25). In Daniel (2:18–19, 27–30), intertestamental Judaism (1 En. 63:3), the Pauline tradition (Rom 11:25; 1 Cor 4:1; Eph 3:3–9), and Revelation (10:7), the "secret" or "mystery" (Mark 4:11) refers to God's cosmic purposes, graciously disclosed to a select few. Things temporarily hidden are intended for disclosure (vv. 21–22). Attending that revelation, however, is a paradoxical concealment, a deafening and blinding, which the parables themselves are meant to inflict (v. 12). Like other NT authors (John 12:40; Acts 28:26–27), Mark adapts Isa 6:9–10 to interpret rejection of the gospel: preaching the word both gives to and deprives those mysteriously disposed to receive or to refuse (vv. 24–25; cf. 2 Esd 7:25). Even more puzzling is the reality that "those outside" (v. 11) can be those seemingly closest to Jesus (3:31–32). Mark sustains this enigma. Parables told as his listeners "were able to hear it" (v. 33) is highly ambiguous; disciples to whom everything is explained (v. 34) persistently do not understand (v. 13; 6:52; 7:18a; 8:17, 21; 14:68).

The heart of this section (vv. 13–20) is an allegorical interpretation of the sower (vv. 3–9), which may have originated among early Christians in reflection on their missionary hardships and the difficulty of discipleship (cf. 2 Cor 4:7–12; 2 Thess 1:4). The seed of Jesus' original parable is inconsistently interpreted as "the word" (i.e., the gospel: vv. 14, 15b) and various responses to it (vv. 15a, 16–20; cf. 2 Esd 8:41–44; 9:31). Mark 4:13–20 is a précis of his entire narrative, which recounts the vicissitudes of Jesus' ministry in the face of satanic temptation (v. 15; 1:13; 8:33), his disciples' temporary acceptance but apostasy under fire (vv. 16–17; 9:42–47; 14:27), and this world's lures of wealth and prestige (vv. 18–19; cf. 9:33–37; 10:17–27). At the end, in spite of everything, good soil bears astonishing fruit (v. 20)—perhaps an allusion to Jesus' own vindication by resurrection (14:28; 16:6–7; cf. John 12:23–24).

If Mark 3:19b–4:34 bespeaks tacit christology, then 4:35–6:6a pointedly raises the question "Who is Jesus?" This segment exhibits balanced architecture:

A "Who then is this?" Jesus stills a storm (4:35–41)

B Three healings: The Gerasene demoniac (5:1–20), Jairus' daughter (5:21–24, 35–43), the woman suffering from hemorrhages (5:25–34)

A' "Where did this man get all this?" Jesus provokes controversy (6:1–6a)

Mark's christological question generates human reactions of faith, fear, or disbelief: the other thread tying these passages together (4:40; 5:15, 33, 34, 36; 6:3, 6a).

Jesus' stilling of a storm (4:35–41) is a mighty work that reverberates with both the OT and Mark's exorcism narratives. The windstorm, waves, and boat's being swamped (v. 37) recall Ps 107:23–25 and Jonah 1:4. Jesus' sleep in the stern (v. 48) suggests the repose of trust in God (Job 11:18–19; Pss 3:5; 4:8). In its desperation (Pss 44:23–24; 59:4b) the disciples' plea for deliverance (v. 38) recalls the Psalms (69:1–2, 14–15; 107:26–28a). Like unclean spirits in Mark 1:25 and 9:25, the wind is "rebuked" and the roiling seas are "muzzled" (v. 39a; cf. Ps 104:6–7). The quelling of chaotic waters (vv. 39a, 41b) implies divine power (Gen 1:2, 6–9; Pss 65:5–8; 74:12–14; 93:3–4; Isa 51:10); great awe (v. 41a) characterizes human response to divine manifestations (Isa 6:1–5; Jonah 1:10, 16). The most obviously Markan stamp on this tale is the sharp contrast between Jesus' serenity and his disciples' terror: "Why are you afraid? Have you still no faith?" (v. 40).

After the storm's stilling, likened to an exorcism, Mark recounts an actual exorcism on Galilee's east bank, in Gerasa (modern Jerash: 5:1–20; cf. 1:21–28; 7:24–30; 9:14–29). The story comprises Jesus' contest with a demon (vv. 1–13) and its social consequences (vv. 14–20). As before (3:11), the unclean spirit bows before a superior force (v. 6) even while attempting to repel the exorcist with divine adjuration (v. 7b). The battle ensues with retaliatory commands (vv. 8, 12–13) and incantation of names (vv. 7a, 9; cf. 1:24). Defilement pervades the scene. The victim, possessed by an unclean spirit (v. 2), lives among tombs, the abode of the dead and of social outcasts (v. 3; cf. Isa 65:1–7). Gentiles applied the title "The Most High God" (v. 7a) to Israel's God (Gen 14:18–20; Num 24:16; Dan 3:26). A Roman "Legion" (v. 9), a regiment of about six thousand soldiers, is a massive Gentile occupation; equally defiling is a herd of two thousand swine (vv. 11–13; cf. Lev 11:7–8; Isa 65:4). The duel's outcome is simultaneously satisfying and terrifying: thousands of demons take possession of thousands of swine; all are drowned in chaotic waters (v. 13; cf. 4:41). The aftermath (5:14–20) abounds with conflicting emotions—fear (v. 15), gratitude (v. 18), amazement (v. 20b)—and social tensions. After the swineherds publicize the occurrence in city and countryside, the populace comes out, broadcasts its own witness, and entreats Jesus to depart (vv. 14, 16–17). Now clothed and calm, the erstwhile demoniac begs for Jesus' fellowship (vv. 15, 18). Jesus refuses his request (v. 19), instead commissioning him to tell his friends of the Lord's mercy: presumably that of God (see 12:11, 29–30, 36; 13:20), though this new missionary proclaims Jesus (v. 20; cf. 2:28; 11:3; 12:37). The news spreads throughout the Decapolis (v. 20a), ten cities lying within a predominantly Gentile region west and east of the Jordan River (see also 7:31).

While the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:21–24a, 35–43) is reminiscent of healings by Elijah (1 Kgs 17:17–24) and Elisha (2 Kgs 4:18–37), the deepest reverberations are those with the interrupting story of the healing of a woman with hemorrhages (Mark 5:24b–34). Each tale mirrors the other, down to the smallest details. Both center on women—"daughters" (vv. 23, 34)—whose lives are running out after twelve years (vv. 25, 42). The sufferers' medical conditions—chronic menstruation (v. 25) or death (v. 35)—restrict or exclude them from normal social relations (see Lev. 12:1–8; 15:19–30). Circumstances are hopeless and growing worse (vv. 23a, 26b, 35). In both tales someone pitifully falls at Jesus' feet (vv. 22, 33); in both he displays uncommon insight that appears laughably absurd (vv. 30–33, 39–40). Jesus' power trumps that of professionals: physicians (v. 26) and mourners (v. 38). By touch (vv. 23b, 27–28, 41a) both women are healed (sozo: vv. 23b, 28, 34a) and restored to wholeness (vv. 34b, 43b). Most important, both stories pivot on faith that penetrates fear (vv. 33–34, 36; cf. 4:40; 9:23–24). Mark stipulates that the little girl is "at the point of death" (v. 23b; cf. Matt 9:18) before recounting at excruciating length the tale of the older woman, capped by a false ending (v. 35). This is performative theology: the narration itself raises the stakes for the reader's trust in God.

With Jesus' return home (6:1–6a) Mark's second major segment ends as it began: With the disciples in tow (cf. 3:13–19a) Jesus is repudiated by association with his family (3:31–32). This passage recalls much that has occurred to this point: Jesus' teaching in the synagogue (1:21, 39; 3:1–4), astonishment over his powerful deeds (1:22, 27; 2:12), and rejection by those nearest him (3:19b–21). Here they "stumble" (v. 3b; the same Greek verb translated as "fall away" in 4:17) because they think they know him, his everyday occupation (carpentry, or any material craftsmanship), and his kinfolk (v. 3a; as in 3:19b–35 Jesus' father remains curiously missing). Insiders again stand on the outside (4:11–13); honorable prophets divide their households (v. 4; 3:25). The conclusion is sadly predictable and doubly ironic: Hometown folk receive from their native son the very nothing they expect (v. 5a; 4:24–25)—though he does cure a few (v. 5b). Now it is Jesus who is amazed (v. 6a; cf. 1:27; 2:12; 5:42)—by their lack of faith (cf. 4:40).

C. Revelation over Bread (6:6b–8:21)

Pulsing throughout Mark's third major section is the capacity of Jesus' ministry to reveal the kingdom's "insiders" and "outsiders" in surprising ways. Curiously, most of these episodes have something to do with food: a royal banquet (6:14–29), two wilderness feedings (6:30–44; 8:1–10), and a debate over kosher practice (7:1–23). A woman pleads for crumbs from Israel's loaf (7:24–30); the disciples bumble over bread (8:14–21).

Food is conspicuous by its absence in the commissioning of the Twelve (6:6b–13). In 3:13–15 Jesus assembles the Twelve to extend his ministry; after a transitional summary of his work (6:6b), that is precisely what happens. Their assignment consists of exorcism, healing, and preaching repentance (vv. 7, 12), all of which they accomplish (v. 13). Sending in pairs (v. 7) reflects biblical custom, in the interest of safety and corroboration (Deut 17:6; 19:15; 1 Tim 5:19). For room and board they are utterly dependent on others' hospitality (v. 10). Their traveling gear—a mere staff and sandals (vv. 8–9)—is extraordinarily sparse; other itinerant preachers in antiquity carried with them bread in a beggar's bag.

The tale of John the Baptist's death (6:14–29) is Mark's only anecdote in which, not Jesus, but a contemporaneous political figure predominates. True, Jesus' fame occasions its placement here (v. 14); debate over his true identity (vv. 14b–16) recalls earlier encounters (3:22; 4:41; 6:2–3) and anticipates later ones (8:28–30; 9:11–13; 12:35–38; 14:61; 15:2). The protagonist is Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great and tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (4 BCE–39 CE), popularly acknowledged as "king." His conclusion that Jesus is John raised from the dead (vv. 14b, 16) is the first intimation of the latter's death (cf. 1:14). As retold by Mark, the miserable tale in 6:14–29 recalls personages and events in Israel's history. John is a righteous man like Eleazar (2 Macc 6:18–31; 4 Macc 5:1–7:23), martyred for his fidelity to the law (vv. 18, 20, 27–28; cf. Lev 18:16; 20:21). Herodias is a schemer like Jezebel (1 Kings 19:1–3; 21:5–15), bent on destroying a prophet who challenges her (vv. 19, 24). Like Ahab (1 Kings 21:1–4, 27), Herod is a weak ruler, manipulated by his shrewd wife (vv. 16–17, 20, 26–27a). Herod presages Pilate: both seemingly in control, both easily outmaneuvered (vv. 21–25; 15:1–15). John's disciples give their teacher's body a decent burial (v. 29). How will Jesus' disciples dispose of his remains?

The apostles' (or emissaries') report of all they have done and taught (v. 30) harks back to vv. 13–14, suggesting that 6:14–29 has been another Markan intercalation, casting a shadow on the Twelve's success-stories. The feeding of five thousand (6:31–44) offers sharp contrast between two very different meals: a private state banquet, twisted into an innocent man's execution (6:21–28), and a public feast in the wilderness, refreshing the lives of all. This tale also chimes with remembrance of things past and hope for things to come: Israel's miraculous sustenance by God in the wilderness (Exod 16:13–35; Num 11:1–35) and Jewish expectations of an end-time feast for God's elect (Isa 25:6–8). Although retreat to the desert is intended for restful solitude (vv. 31–32; 1:35), Jesus' compassion for the multitude, "like sheep without a shepherd" (vv. 33–34), is a poignant reminder of a faithful king's proper response to needy Israel (Num 27:15–17; Ezek 34:1–31). The disciples' suggestion that the throng be disbanded elicits Jesus' command that they be fed (vv. 35–37a): a manifestly impossible assignment, whose cost would require two-thirds of a day-laborer's annual income (v. 37b). Equally ridiculous are Jesus' query of how much food is available and the puny reckoning (v. 38). No matter: The crowd is divided into "groups" (literally, symposia, suggesting a banquet's conviviality, v. 39), companies "of hundreds and of fifties" (v. 40) like Israel's jurisdictions in the wilderness (Exod 18:21, 25). Jesus' look to heaven (v. 41a) indicates the source of his power (also 7:34; Ps 121:1); his taking, blessing, breaking, and giving (v. 41b) are a host's customary actions at a Jewish meal, prefiguring Jesus' last supper (14:22). The symbolic significance, if any, of twelve baskets and five thousand men (sic) is obscure (v. 44; so also 8:8–9). Clearer is the miracle's confirmation by the multitude's satisfaction and the plentiful leftovers (vv. 42–43; cf. 2 Kings 4:42–44).

Reminiscent of appearances of the risen Christ in Luke (24:36–37) and John (21:1–14), Mark 6:45–52 presents this Gospel's second epiphany of Jesus on the sea (see 4:35–41). Again Jesus removes himself for prayer (v. 46; 1:35; 3:13) as evening falls (vv. 35, 47). Events unfold "early in the morning" (v. 48b: "around the fourth watch of the night," between three and six a.m.). The imagery reaches deep into the OT: Jesus' striding the waves (v. 48b) recalls the Lord God's own power (Ps 93:3–4); "It is I" (ego ēimi: v. 50), a classic expression of divine self-identification (Exod 3:13–15; Isa 43:10–11); the numinous evokes human terror (Exod 3:6b; Jonah 1:9–10). Jesus' intent to bypass them (v. 48c) may allude to God's veiled self-disclosure to Moses (Exod 33:18–23) and Elijah (1 Kgs 19:11–12), though Jesus in Mark is typically ahead of his disciples (10:32; 16:7). The climax in 6:51 is much like 4:39b–41, but here Mark emphasizes the Twelve's incomprehension (cf. 4:13), attributed to their hardness of heart (v. 52; 3:5; Ps 95:8) and focused on "the loaves," a veiled reference to their earlier incredulity (v. 37).

Their misperception of Jesus (vv. 49–52) is immediately juxtaposed with another throng's recognition of him as one with power to heal (6:53–56). This transitional summary (see 3:7–12) is located at Gennesaret (v. 53), on the lake's northwest shore, instead of Bethsaida on the northeast, where the boat was headed (v. 45). Mark emphasizes Jesus' openness to Galilee's widespread need of healing (1:28–45), communicated through a simple touch of his tassel (v. 56; 5:27–28; Num 15:37–41).

From destruction (6:14–29) to nourishment (6:30–44), from obtuseness (6:45–52) to recognition (6:53–54): Between such poles Mark's narrative swings. From beseeching (6:55–56) to criticism—Jesus and the Pharisees' mutual rejection (7:1–23)—the pendulum swings again, with a discernible arc.

1. The Pharisee's critique of eating with unwashed hands (vv. 1–2, 5) seems decades ahead of its time: The earliest mishnaic prescription for scrupulous washing among priests is about 100 CE (cf. m. Ber. 8.2–4). By Mark's day some laity may have adopted this pious practice. The parenthetical explanation (vv. 3–4) assumes Gentile readers unfamiliar with Jewish customs. Some Pharisees (2:16) from Jerusalem (the place of danger: 3:22; 10:32) challenge the disciples' ritually unclean "eating [of] the loaves" (7:2): a Semitic expression that recalls 6:38b, 41, 44, 52.

2. Disregarding the point at issue, Jesus sets the written Law—"the word of God"—over "the [oral] tradition of the elders" (vv. 6–8, 14). Quoting Isa 29:13, he likens eating with unwashed hands to vacuous worship, castigated by Israel's prophets (Isa 1:10–20; 58:1–14; Amos 5:21–24). Jesus extends his critique (vv. 9–13) to Corban, a ritual offering (Lev 1:2) withdrawn from secular uses like parental support, as violating the Fifth Commandment (Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16).

3. Jesus' answers the Pharisaic critique with a blatant repudiation of laws for keeping a kosher table (vv. 15, 18–19; cf. Lev 11:1–47). All hear this "parable"; privately the disciples, who "still fail to understand" (v. 18; 6:52), receive extended interpretation (vv. 14, 17; 4:34). Adopting a list of vices common in ancient exhortations (vv. 21–22; see Rom 1:29–31; Gal 5:19–21; 2 Tim 3.2–5), Jesus reasons that the organ in need of purification is not the stomach but rather the heart, the seat of moral sensibility and religious conduct (Ps 24:4; Jer 32:39–40). Defilement comes not from without but from within (vv. 18–20, 23). Mark draws the obvious if scandalous conclusion: "Thus he declared all foods clean" (v. 19b).

Immediately following this controversy are two healings in disreputable Gentile territory (Tyre, Sidon, the Decapolis: vv. 24, 31; cf. 3:8; Ezek 26:1–28:19). The healings themselves—the daughter of a Syro-Phoenician woman (7:24–30) and a deaf-mute (7:31–37)—do not receive as much attention as the tensions attending them. There is the pull between seclusion and disclosure (vv. 24b, 33a; cf. 1:44–45; 6:31–33). The infirmities (possession by an unclean spirit, v. 25; deafness and speech impediment, v. 32) place the sufferers at odds with their own bodies. Suspense is further created by Jesus' responses—at first, refusal (v. 27); later, a "gag-order" (v. 36a)—which others immediately overturn (vv. 28–29, 36b). The focus of 7:31–37 is on the healer's technique (vv. 33–35) and the astonishment his work evokes (v. 37; cf. Isa 35:5). In 7:24–30 the dynamics are reversed: the healing occurs at long distance (vv. 29b–30), while the foreign woman's acceptance of Jesus' harsh rebuff ("dog"; cf. 1 Sam 17:43), her insistence on receiving even the crumbs of Israel's "bread" (vv. 26–28), stand at the center.

The feeding of four thousand (8:1–10) parallels the tale in 6:30–44, reprising the same narrative components: desert ambience (6:31; 8:4), a famished horde (6:34–36; 8:2), Jesus' compassion (6:34; 8:2), the disciples' hesitation (6:37; 8:4), meager provisions of bread and fish (6:38; 8:5, 7), their offering to God (6:41; 8:6b–7) and orderly distribution (6:39–40; 8:6a), satisfaction of everyone's hunger (6:42; 8:8a) with abundant leftovers (6:43; 8:8b). Although Dalmanutha's location is unknown (8:10), the overarching setting is Gentile (7:31).

The earlier feeding miracle triggered misunderstanding (6:51b–52); so it is here, twofold. First, certain Pharisees return (8:11–13; cf. 7:1), demanding that Jesus verify his divine authority (as though heavenly feedings of thousands were an inadequate "sign"; cf. Num 14:11). Jesus refuses to comply with this generation's faithlessness (v. 12; 8:38; 9:19; cf. Deut 32:5, 20; Ps 95:10). Second, Jesus' own disciples have forgotten the bread (8:14–21). Their hardened hearts (v. 17; see 4:13) align them with the Pharisees (3:5) and Herod (6:14–29) when by now they should beware their antagonists' insidious corruption (the "yeast" that ferments within bread: 8:15; cf. 1 Cor 5:6) and recognize in Jesus the power of God (8:19–20). This section of Mark, which opened with the Twelve's ability to follow Jesus (6:7–13, 30), ends with an off-key demonstration of their resistance and incomprehension (8:17–18, 21; cf. Jer 5:21; Ezek 12:2), pointing the way into Mark's fourth major section.

D. Christology and Discipleship (8:22–10:52)

This section is the pivot around which this Gospel turns. To this point Jesus' identity and activity have been correlated with that of his disciples (1:9–20; 3:7–19a; 6:1–13). In this section, lying near the Gospel's center, the character of Jesus' messiahship and the responsibilities of his disciples forcefully converge in the dawning light of Mark's passion narrative, which immediately follows (11:1–15:47). This section adopts a tripartite structure that is framed by the Gospel's only two stories about the healing of blind men.

A Two-Stage Healing: Mark 8:22–26.

Prediction of the Son of Man's Destiny	The Disciples' Misunderstanding	Teaching about Discipleship
8:31	8:32–33	8:34–9:1
9:31	9:32–34, 38	9:35–37, 39–50
10:33–34	10:35–41	10:42–4

The Calling of Bartimaeus: Mark 10:46–52. The intercalated correspondences between blindness and incomprehension (4:12; 8:18), between healing and teaching (1:27), are unmistakable.

The first healing-story (8:22–26) returns the reader to Bethsaida (6:45), as well as to the motifs healing by touch (5:23), with saliva (7:33), in seclusion (5:37, 43; 7:24, 36). This story's anomalous feature is its sufferer's progressive relief, requiring more than one touch by the healer (vv. 23–25). Likewise, the Twelve's perception of Jesus is fuzzy, requiring of their teacher multiple corrections.

The first of Jesus' pointed exchanges with his disciples (8:27–9:1) occurs at Caesarea Philippi (v. 27). As in 6:14–15, those with whom Jesus is identified (v. 28) were popularly regarded as harbingers of "the Day of the Lord." While correct (1:1), Peter's identification of Jesus as "the Messiah" (v. 29) is susceptible of misunderstanding and, therefore, is sternly silenced (literally, "rebuked": v. 30; see 3:12).

Cryptically referring to himself as "the Son of Man" (2:10, 28), Jesus foretells his suffering, death, and vindication in twenty-five words (v. 31) that synopsise Mark's last seventy-five verses. The elders were senior Jewish lay leaders (Luke 7:3) who with the chief priests and the scribes constitute the Sanhedrin, or supreme Jewish council, in Mark (14:43, 53–55). That the Son of Man "must undergo" all these things is a way of expressing its conformity to God's will. This is no parable; it is said as plainly as Peter rebukes it (v. 32). Regarding all his disciples (vv. 33, 34), Jesus rebukes his rebuker as offering a satanic deviation from God's intentions (v. 33; cf. 1:13). Jesus then draws Mark's clearest connection between his own destiny (the cross) and his followers' responsibility to deny themselves, even to the point of death, for the sake of the good news (vv. 34–37; 1:1, 14). Honor and shame preoccupied ancient society (Xenophon, Hiero 7.3); here Jesus associates shame with alignment to the values of "this adulterous and sinful generation," honor with fidelity to God (v. 38). Jesus' first reference in Mark to an apocalyptic Son of Man (8:38; also 13:26–27; 14:62; cf. Dan 7:13–14) is ambiguous. In this figure is he pointing to another or to himself? Perhaps the latter (v. 31), as early Christians deduced (Matt 19:28; Acts 7:55–56). Equally mysterious is Jesus' promise in 9:1, so easily disconfirmed in Mark's own day— unless the kingdom's coming with power points to the very next episode.

Jesus' transfiguration (9:2–8) and its ensuing deliberation (9:9–13) are saturated with apocalyptic imagery. A high mountain (v. 2) is a place of divine disclosure in the OT (Exod 19:3–25; 1 Kgs 19:8). Here the revelation is privately witnessed by an inner circle (cf. 5:37; 13:3), ordered to withhold report of their experience until after the resurrection (v. 9). Transfiguration is rooted in Jewish apocalypticism (Rom 12:2; 2 Cor 3:18; Phil 3:21); dazzling whiteness often connotes glorification (Dan 12:3; 2 Esd 7:97; Rev 4:4). In Mal 4:4–5 Moses and Elijah (v. 4) are linked as heralds of the Lord's day. A cloud (v. 7) often accompanies OT theophanies (Exod 24:12–18; Isa 4:5; Ezek 1:4), which characteristically evoke terror (v. 6; Exod 3:1–6; Isa 6:1–5). What sets this theophany apart is the heavenly voice's identification of Jesus as God's beloved or unique Son, comporting with Jesus' singular transfiguration. This divine announcement recalls that of Jesus' baptism (1:9–11); this time, however, an audience beyond Jesus is addressed and instructed to pay attention to him (v. 7). Rather than housing God's self-revelation on a mountain-top (v. 5; cf. Exod 25:1–9), the disciples are redirected to the world below (v. 9). Their questioning (vv. 10–11) elicits from Jesus another pronouncement of the divine necessity of his many sufferings (v. 12) with the assurance that his precursory Elijah, John the Baptist, has come and was similarly received (v. 13; see 1:6; 6:15).

The last of four exorcisms in Mark (1:21–28; 5:1–20; 7:24–30), the healing of an epileptic child (9:14–29) counterpoises desperate anguish (vv. 18, 20–22, 26) against the requisite of faith (vv. 19, 23). Whereas the scribes, like the disciples, are divided (vv. 10, 14) and the boy's father sways from trust to unbelief (v. 24), Jesus exerts mastery over the demonic (v. 25) so that its victim may arise (v. 27; cf. 5:41–42). Nothing is possible apart from faith and prayer (vv. 19, 23, 29), a lesson reiterated in Mark 11:22–26.

With another change of scene (Galilee, v. 30), Mark unfolds the second of Jesus' predictions and corrections of his disciples (9:31–50). The major differences between the wording of 9:31 and 8:31 are the former's simplicity and emphasis on the Son of Man's betrayal (cf. 1:14; 3:19). The disciples are typically uncomprehending and fearful (4:13, 40), evidenced by their private argument in Capernaum over who among them is greatest (vv. 33–34), a common point of debate within antiquity's social groups (Luke 22:24–25). Jesus upends the conventional premise by demanding of his disciples servanthood (v. 35), exemplified by accepting a little child—an exemplar of powerlessness—as one would accept Jesus himself (vv. 36–37). Nor are there rigid boundaries between disciples and other sympathizers, like the exorcist casting out demons in Jesus' name (vv. 38–39). If the bar for those receiving Jesus' disciples is low and easily reached (vv. 40–41), that for faithful discipleship is high indeed. On that note this segment concludes, with a chain of what may originally have been detached sayings about radical self-sacrifice, now linked by catchwords ("causes to stumble," vv. 42, 43, 45, 47; "fire," vv. 48, 49; "salted," vv. 49, 50a, 50b). The primary exhortations are for protection of Jesus' "little ones" (disciples: v. 42), elimination of any impediment that might prevent entry into eternal life, or God's kingdom (vv. 43–48), and the importance of vital peace among disciples (vv. 49–50).

Focused on life within the family, Mark 10:1–31 explores the ethics of discipleship. Appropriately, the subject opens with marriage (vv. 2–12). Proper grounds for divorce were debated among later rabbis (m. Git. 9.10); their Pharisaic antecedents raise the question here (vv. 2–4). Jesus argues (vv. 5–12) that their cited precedent (Deut 24:1) arose from human stubbornness (cf. 3:5) and is trumped by Genesis (1:27; 2:24; 5:2). God wills union, not division (see 9:50b). As elsewhere in the NT (Matt 5:32; 19:9; 1 Cor 7:10–16), Mark 10:11–12 seems to relax absolute prohibition of divorce. By OT definition (see Exod 20:14; Deut 5:18; 22:22) adultery violates only the husband's prerogative. By contrast, Jesus asserts also the wife's protection against adultery (v. 11) and assumes her right to initiate divorce (without remarriage, v. 12). Effectively placed on a level plane, wives and husbands owe each other mutual rights and responsibilities.

The subject turns to children brought to Jesus for blessing but rebuked by his disciples (vv. 13, 16). Jesus defends these little ones as candidates for God's kingdom (v. 14) and urges upon his disciples a child's vulnerable receptivity (v. 15; 9:36–37). Before the kingdom's demands Jesus himself renounces any claim of goodness (v. 18; cf. 2 Cor 5:21). Such a disposition differs sharply from the *-man wanting to do something to inherit eternal life (v. 17), God's new creation in the age to come (9:43–47; Dan 12:2; 2 Macc 7:9). Though religiously observant (vv. 19–20; Exod 20:12–17; Deut 5:16–20; 24:14), he cannot satisfy the outstanding requirement: to relinquish his riches for heavenly treasure—to receive God's kingdom like a child (v. 15)—and to follow Jesus (vv. 21–22). Read in context, the problem with wealth (vv. 23–25) lies in its inhibition of self-denial (8:35–37) and unreserved dependence on God, for whom nothing is impossible (vv. 26–27). Jesus accepts Peter's affirmation that he and others have indeed abandoned all for the gospel (v. 28), promising them that they shall inherit a new family in this life and eternal life in the coming age (vv. 29–30). That promise is, however, laced with surprises: no paterfamilias (the supreme head of antiquity's households) replaces an earthly father (v. 29); the rewards to come are comparatively modest (cf. 1 Esd 7:88–89); persecutions remain on the horizon (v. 30); God retains sovereignty for reversing expectations (v. 31).

Mark 10:32–45 presents this section's third contrast between suffering christology and recalcitrant discipleship, set amidst the disciples' fearful amazement as they approach the Judean capital from which hostility to Jesus has radiated (v. 32; 3:22). Verses 33–34 offer the most detailed forecast of the Son of Man's destiny; verses 35–41, the most blatant display of his followers' failure to get the point. The wording of James and John's request (vv. 35–37) echoes Herod's impetuous offer to Herodias' daughter (6:22); moreover, they mistake the cup they must drink as that of bliss (Pss 23:5; 116:13) not woe (Isa 51:17, 22). The rest of the Twelve are predictably indignant (v. 41); Jesus implies that all of them still construe authority in the Gentiles' self-aggrandizing terms (v. 42), not as the radical inversion of social norms that obtains in God's kingdom (vv. 43–44; 9:35). Discipleship derives from christology: the Son of Man who gives life as ransom or compensatory redemption for many (v. 45; 14:24; cf. Isa 43:1–7; 1 Tim 2:5–6).

The healing of blind Bartimaeus (10:46–52) in Jericho (v. 46) bookends the healing of Bethsaida's blind man (8:22–26). Many themes are reprised in this brief encounter: partial apprehension of Jesus ("Son of David," vv. 47–48; cf. 12:35–37); refusal to be diverted (v. 48a, 51b; 8:33; 9:43–47); faith that heals (v. 52a; 9:23; 10:27). Timaeus' son not only receives his sight; he acts toward Jesus, who calls him (v. 49: 1:17, 20), as a disciple should (vv. 50, 52b; 9:23b; 10:14).

III. The Final Days (11:1–15:47)

A. Jerusalem and the Temple (11:1–13:37)

Mark's fifth major section narrates Jesus' last days, spent in Jerusalem. The focal point is the Herodian Temple, Israel's religious and political center. There Jesus performs and interprets a prophetic act (11:12–26). Later, facing the Temple, he speaks of its annihilation within the context of God's final judgment (13:1–37). The heart of this section (11:27–12:44) is a series of controversies arising from Jesus' teaching in the Temple court about God's will.

In Jerusalem Mark slows down the narrative by clocking days (11:11, 12; 14:1, 12) then hours (14:17, 72; 15:1, 25, 33, 34, 42; 16:1–2). The first day is marked by Jesus' arrival (11:1–11), whose description in Mark is less lofty (cf. Matt 21:1–11; Luke 19:28–40; John 12:12–19). Bethpage's location is uncertain; Bethany was about two miles southeast of the Judean capital (John 11:18). The Mount of Olives, a high hill east of Jerusalem (Ezek 11:23), was associated with both the city's defeat (2 Sam 15:15–30) and hope for God's endtime triumph (Zech 14:4). Speculation about prearrangements for the colt (vv. 2–4) is pointless; the point is acknowledgment of Jesus' authority (vv. 5–6; cf. 1 Sam 10:1–8). Apart from the textually suspect 16:19, "the Lord" appears only in v. 3 with clear reference to Jesus. The animal (v. 7) may allude to a humble king's conveyance (Zech 9:9); its having never been ridden (v. 2) is reminiscent of unyoked, consecrated animals (Num 19:2; Deut 21:3; 1 Sam 6:7). Spreading of cloaks and branches on the road (v. 8) is a motif in Israel's royal and festal processions (2 Kgs 9:13; 1 Macc 13:51; 2 Macc 10:7), accented here (vv. 9–10) by acclamations approximating Ps 118:25–26 (a thanksgiving for military deliverance). "Hosanna" (literally, "Save now!") was a liturgical formula for God's praise. "The kingdom of our ancestor David" recalls Bartimaeus' recognition in 10:47–48, which Jesus himself will challenge in 12:35–37. Jesus' visit to the Temple, refurbished by Herod the Great (37–4 BCE), is anticlimactic and suspenseful (v. 11). Jesus' arrival does not neatly match customary expectations of Israel's king.

Mark 11:12–25 comprises one of the evangelist's characteristic narrative insertions (see 2:1–12). In the center is the cleansing of the Temple (vv. 15–19): a debatable characterization, as its defilement is not evident. Purchasing cultic paraphernalia in the Court of the Gentiles, the outermost plaza of the Temple complex, was legitimate, even necessary. Jesus' bewildering conduct—affronting both buyers and sellers (vv. 15–16)—suggests the Temple's destruction (see also 13:1–2). Those seeking refuge there, as bandits regard a secure lair (Jer 7:1–11), must look elsewhere for "a house of prayer for all the nations" (v. 17; Isa 56:7). The understandable animosity of chief priests and scribes (v. 18) harks back to 3:22 and 8:31, and will be amplified in 11:27–33.

Surrounding Jesus' prophetic action is the withering of a fig tree and its interpretation (vv. 12–14, 20–25). OT prophets likened Israel to a fruitless fig tree (Jer 8:13; Joel 1:7; Mic 7:1; cf. Luke 13:6–9). That it was not the season for figs (v. 13) holds an important clue: a season—kairos, climactic time appointed by God (see 1:15)—of fruitlessness (on a tree, in the Temple) invites judgment, which Jesus twice invokes (vv. 14–17; also 13:28–29). From a chain of exhortations with catchwords ("faith," "believe," vv. 22, 23, 24; "prayer," "praying," vv. 24, 25; cf. 9:42–50) Mark constructs Jesus' consolatory instruction about prayer, emphasizing forgiveness among disciples (vv. 14b, 20–21, 25). Because the Temple was situated on a rise, faith's moving of a mountain is apropos (v. 23). Trusting in God is itself promised to rescue from calamity (v. 24; see also 2:6; 5:34, 36; 9:23–29; 10:26–27).

Recalling the controversies of 2:1–3:6, Mark 11:27–12:44 comprises another five controversies in Jerusalem (11:27–12:34), to which are appended three provocative barbs about christology (12:35–37), destructive piety (vv. 38–40), and authentic discipleship (vv. 41–44).

The controversy is a frontal assault on Jesus' authority to challenge the Temple's cultic practice (11:15–19) by those most heavily invested in it: chief priests, scribes, and elders (vv. 27–28). From Mark's beginning, Jesus' authority has occasioned amazement (1:22, 27) and contention (2:7–8). As elsewhere (2:25–26; 10:3), in rabbinic fashion Jesus counters one question with another: the origin of John the Baptist's authority (vv. 29–30). This was a delicate matter. Ancient Jews (Josephus, A. J. 18.117–18) and Christians (Matt 21:32; Luke 7:28–30; Acts 19:1–7) esteemed John and his baptism of repentance for their alignment with God's righteousness. Verses 31–32 capture the Hobson's choice Jesus offers his antagonists. As earlier (2:6; 3:4; 9:10), his interlocutors are divided (v. 31), finally copping a plea of ignorance (v. 33a) that justifies Jesus' reply: If his accusers are in no position to adjudicate John's credibility, then neither can they judge Jesus' (v. 33b).

Jesus elaborates his parabolic answer with a controversial parable (12:1–12), Mark's longest and most allegorical (cf. 3:23–27; 4:1–34). The planter's procedure (vv. 1–2), customary for its era, recalls Isaiah's identification of God's vineyard with wayward Israel (5:1–7; cf. Jer 2:21; Ezek 19:10–14). The coming of the season (v. 2, kairos) strikes an eschatological note (see 1:15; 11:13). OT prophets, styled as God's slaves (Jer 7:25; 25:4; Amos 3:7; Zech 1:6), suffered comparable brutality at the hands of their countrymen (vv. 2–5; 1 Kgs 18:12–13; 2 Chr 24:20–22; Neh 9:26). "A beloved son" (v. 6), murdered for being the true heir (vv. 7–8), is a veiled yet direct pointer to Jesus (1:11; 9:7); likewise, the religious leadership (11:27) recognize themselves as the parable's killers (v. 12; 3:6). Psalm 118:22–23 is cited to interpret Jesus' rejection by his coreligionists and to assert the church's vindication (cf. Acts 4:11; Eph 2:20; 1 Pet 2:7).

The third controversy (vv. 13–17) features Pharisees (first appearing in 2:16) and Herodians (3:6), whose identification is pertinent to the trap they lay (vv. 13–15a): Poll (per capita) taxes were a detested aspect of subjugation to imperial Rome. If Jesus can be maneuvered into sanctioning their payment, his piety is compromised; if he advocates nonpayment, sedition is whispered. Jesus recognizes their hypocrisy (v. 15b); Mark's reader perceives the truth in their obsequiousness (v. 14). The head (literally, "image") on the requested denarius (a laborer's daily wage; v. 15) is the emperor's (v. 16); its title (literally, "inscription"), "Tiberius, Emperor, Son of the Divine Augustus." Jesus evades the trap with a neat double entendre: Caesar is entitled to his own (see also Matt 17:24–27; Rom 13:1–7; 1 Pet 2:13–17), as is God (to whom belongs everything).

Next come the Sadducees (vv. 18–27), the priestly aristocracy (Acts 23:6–8), whose denial of resurrection was likely based on its absence from the Pentateuch (cf. Isa 26:19; Dan 12:2–3; 2 Macc 7:14, 23; Josephus, A. J. 13.197; 18.17). Presupposing the law of levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–6), their question issues from an absurd exaggeration: Whose wife will a seven-time widow be after she herself dies (vv. 19–23)? Jesus' initial answer rejects the question's premise: In post-mortem life there is no marriage (v. 25). More to the point (vv. 26–27a), the wording of God's self-identification to Moses (Exod 3:6, 15–16) implies that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob still live under divine dominion.

Formally, Jesus' argument resembles rabbinic exegesis and reasoning. Its point is emphatic: His social superiors are altogether wrong about "the scriptures [and] the power of God" (vv. 24, 27b). The end of Mark's Gospel will verify that soon enough.

The final controversy in the Temple proves unexpectedly noncontroversial (vv. 28–34). Since scribes have opposed Jesus since Mark's beginning (1:22), the reader anticipates the same here (v. 28), yet this scribe simply inquires about first principles, a question of scriptural precedent debated among the rabbis (m. Ber. 2.2, 5; b. Mak. 23b–24a; Sifra Lev 19:18). Jesus' reply to a sincere question is an impeccably orthodox answer (vv. 29–31): love of God and neighbor, the Shema (Deut 6:4–5) wedded to the Holiness Code (Lev 19:18). Jesus' questioner not only commends but amplifies his assessment (vv. 32–33: Deut 4:35; 1 Sam 15:22; Isa 45:5, 21; Hos 6:6). Jesus has the last, enigmatic word (v. 34a): If the scribe were any closer to God's kingdom than this, would he then be Jesus' disciple?

Having silenced all further debate (v. 34b), Jesus takes the initiative with three brief rejoinders, linked by catchwords ("scribes," vv. 28, 32, 38; "widow[s]," vv. 40, 42; cf. 9:42–50; 11:22–25). His first challenge (vv. 35–37a) mysteriously questions the Messiah's Davidic sonship (2 Sam 7:4–17; Ps 89:3–4; cf. Matt 1:1; Rom 1:3; 2 Tim 2:8) by assuming the traditional attribution of Psalm 110 to "David himself." Since his audience hears this with delight (v. 37b), the force of Jesus' remark is worth teasing out. First, the utterance "by the Holy Spirit" is with presumed prophetic authority (Acts 1:16; 28:25; Heb 3:7; 10:15). Second, Mark may concur with other NT authors in regarding Ps 110:1 as descriptive of Jesus' ultimate exaltation (Acts 2:34–35; 1 Cor 15:25; Heb 1:13). Most important, David's concession of a Lord greater than himself (v. 37a) may be Mark's way of qualifying the suffering Son of Man's superior messiahship (8:29–31).

Denunciation of pretentious scribes follows in vv. 38–40. The OT castigates oppression of economically vulnerable widows (Ps 94:1–7; Isa 10:1–2; Zech 7:10; Mal 3:5). Speaking of widows, Jesus concludes his teaching in the Temple with a surprising comment made opposite the treasury (v. 41), a Temple chamber that abutted the Women's Court as well as a receptacle for offerings (John 8:20). By contrast with the wealthy, making large donations, a poor widow offers two small copper coins (the smallest in circulation at that time), equal in value to a penny (a Roman quadrans, about one-sixty-fourth of a laborer's daily wage; v. 42). The surpassing value of her gift is a lesson for disciples, underlined by Jesus' solemn assurance (v. 43; see 3:28; 9:1, 41). Like another nameless woman memorable for her extravagance (14:3–9), this widow gives "all she had to live on": literally, "her whole life" (v. 44), as Jesus himself will do (10:45). The irony that she gives everything for a seemingly lost cause (13:1–2) is no greater than Jesus' own sacrifice soon to come.

Mark 13:1–37 is Jesus' last extended discourse to members of the Twelve, some of whom comment on the Temple's massive stones and wondrous structures (v. 1). The Jewish historian Josephus corroborates just how magnificent the Temple was: Soaring fifty meters into heaven and covered on all sides with massive golden plates, "The outside of the building lacked nothing to astonish the mind or eye" (J.W. 5.222). Examining the Temple's remains, today's visitors to Jerusalem observe building blocks whose weight ranges from two to nearly four hundred tons. Whether or not Mark knew of the Romans' destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, as Luke seems to (19:41–44), Jesus' forecast of its future is prescient (v. 2), much as OT prophets accurately predicted devastation of its predecessor, Solomon's Temple (Jer 26:18; Mic 3:12).

More than an architectural marvel, the Temple represented Israel's sacrifice of itself to the God who had called it into covenant existence. Its decorative tapestry "typified the universe" (Josephus, J.W. 5.212–14), suggesting to worshipers that the world itself was held together by the divinehuman interaction occurring within these sacred precincts. No little anxiety percolates in the questions of the disciples (v. 3).

The discourse that follows (vv. 5–37) is a familiar genre in antiquity: a farewell address of leaders to their followers (see Gen 49:1–33; Deut 33:1–29; Josh 23:1–24:30; Tob 14:3–11; John 14:1–17:26; Acts 20:18–35). Jesus' address at Olivet is braided with common forms of expression: exhortations to vigilance, predictions of things to come, commissions or prohibitions, and authoritative pronouncements. Moreover, Jesus' address is clearly structured. About three-quarters is devoted to the second of his disciples' queries, "the sign when these things will be accomplished." Jesus' offers not one sign but many, each more obvious than the last.

1. Earthly calamities that will befall everyone (vv. 6–8): While images of socio-political turbulence are common in prophetic portents (Isa 19:2; Jer 22:23; Rev 6:8; 11:13), first-century Jews and Christians were aware of specific tumults (Acts 5:36–37). Jesus warns that such lie within divine providence and are not in themselves proof of the end (cf. 2 Thess 2:1–12).

2. Particular forms of stress that believers will undergo (vv. 9–13): As Jesus himself must suffer (14:17–21), his disciples will be targeted for arrest before sanhedrins (local Jewish courts) and suffer abuse. All is for the sake of the good news (Mark 1:1, 14) proclaimed to all nations (11:17): an OT theme (Isa 49:6; 52:10) adapted in the NT (Mark 16:20; Rom 11:11–32; Eph 3:1–10). Anxiety is answered by reassurance that in the hour of trial God's Holy Spirit will support those suffering for the gospel (also Matt 10:19–20; Luke 12:11–12; John 14:26). Interfamilial betrayal is a stock apocalyptic motif (Mic 7:6), yet such divisions occurred among first-century Christians (John 9:18–23; 16:2), even as the Roman historian Tacitus attests to widespread hatred of early Christians (Annals 15.44).

3. Particular human reactions to the great tribulation (vv. 14–23)—especially flight—are triggered by "the desolating sacrilege," pagan desecration of the Temple (see Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). This is an era of unparalleled tribulation, sometimes expected to precede the end (Dan 12:1; Rev 7:14. 13:20); if occurring in winter, heavy rains would impede travel. Again believers are assured of their election by God (cf. Ps 105:6; Rom 8:33; Eph 1:4–5) and are warned against losing their heads over signs performed by false prophets (v. 6; Matt 7:15–23; 2 Thess 2:9–10).

4. Particular supernatural responses (vv. 24–27): Celestial convulsions are commonplace in OT prophecy (Isa 13:10; 34:4; Ezek 32:7–8; Joel 2:10, 31). Expecting the advent of an end-time Son of Man may have its origins in Daniel (7:13–14); Christian apocalypticism associates that figure with Jesus (Rev 1:7, 13). The ingathering of God's dispersed elect is a pervasive biblical hope (Isa 11:11; Ezek 39:25–29; Bar 5:5–9; 1 Thess 4:15–17).

The disciples began by asking when these things will happen. Jesus defers this until last, reworking the question into a matter of discipleship.

5. Predictable imminence and assurance of the time (vv. 28–31) are parabolically represented by a maturing fig tree (cf. 11:12–14, 20–21). The language here is vague yet urgent: exactly who "is near, at the very gates" is unclear; "this generation" is regarded pejoratively in Mark (8:11). Still, all these things are soon to happen (see 9:1); all else may fade, but Jesus' promise is dependable.

6. There remains, nevertheless, unpredictable suddenness and ignorance of the precise time (vv. 32–37). "That day" likely refers to "the day of the Lord" (Isa 2:12; Jer 46:10; Ezek 30:2–3; Amos 5:18–20; Zeph 1:14–18); "that hour," God's appointed time for the consummation of the age (cf. 1:15; 14:35; Dan 8:17–19). Instead of futile attempts to clock that hour, faithful disciples remain vigilant and accountable (see also Matt 25:1–30; Luke 12:35–40; Rom 13:11–14). The stages of night on v. 35—evening, midnight, cockcrow, and dawn—may refer to the Romans' four nocturnal watches (6:48).

In presentation and substance the Olivet discourse is apocalyptic pastoral care: dialing down anxiety, reminding disciples that God remains mysteriously and faithfully in control.

B. The Passion Narrative (14:1–15:47)

Mark's last major section recounts events culminating in Jesus' betrayal and arrest (14:1–52), his arraignment (14:52–15:15), his execution (15:16–41), and burial (15:42–47). Appreciation of Mark's irony-saturated treatment is critical.

The anointing of Jesus (14:3–9) is illuminated against a conspiracy for his arrest (14:1–2, 10–11). Entwining two sharply contrasting anecdotes that complement each other, Mark frames a theologically significant gift for Jesus from an unnamed woman (vv. 3–9) with the consummation of longstanding machinations against him by religious authorities (3:6; 8:31; 11:18; 12:12) assisted by a named member of the Twelve (vv. 1–2, 10–11; 3:19a). The effect is one of ironic simultaneity: The woman is publicly, albeit unwittingly, preparing Jesus' body for burial (v. 8) while others aggressively seek (vv. 1, 11; 1:37) his secret betrayal (9:31). Her gift is incredibly lavish: fragrant perfume (Song 1:12; 4:13, 14), worth over three hundred denarii (almost a full year's wages for a day-laborer; cf. 6:37), seems wasted from the viewpoint of conventional religiosity (v. 5; see also 12:38–44; Deut 15:11). Colluding with the religious establishment, Judas is promised an unspecified reward (vv. 10–11). Pouring the ointment on his head (v. 3) suggests Jesus' royal anointment (1 Sam 10:1; 2 Kgs 9:6); this is a messianic coronation (1:1). Later Jesus will be crucified as "King of the Jews" (15:26). Here (14:9) as elsewhere in Mark (1:14; 8:35; 13:9–10), "gospel" is embedded in suffering that God's will be done. Mark's timing for these events (v. 1) is apparently Wednesday, 13 Nisan (March–April), two days before Passover: the annual celebration of God's liberation of Israel from captivity (Exod 12:1–13:16), later conjoined with the seven-day harvest festival of Unleavened Bread (2 Chr 35:17; Ezek 45:21–24). In spite of concern that it not happen during the festival (v. 2), Jesus' arrest occurs on Passover evening (14:12–50).

Jesus' last observance of Passover (14:12–31) comprises four vignettes: preparation for the feast (vv. 12–16), his betrayal's prediction at table (vv. 17–21), the institution of the Lord's Supper (vv. 22–26), and a foretelling of all the Twelve's desertion (vv. 27–31).

The preparation (vv. 12–16) is introduced by one of Mark's anomalies regarding the calendar: The first day of Unleavened Bread (v. 12; usually 15 Nisan) seems inconsistent with 14 Nisan, when the Passover lamb is sacrificed (Exod 12:1–20; cf. John 18:28; 19:14, 31, which locates Jesus' last day twenty-four hours later than in the Synoptics).

The prediction of betrayal (vv. 17–21) occurs after all have taken their places ("were reclining," the customary posture at banquets: Luke 5:29). Jesus' poignant language (v. 18) echoes earlier phrases in Mark: "Truly I tell you" (also vv. 25, 30; 3:28), "will betray" (9:31). The betrayer at table—the last place a friend should knife his host in the back—chimes with Ps 41:9. Elsewhere in Mark (2:10; 10:33) "the Son of Man" speaks of himself with authority about the suffering he must endure. He goes "as it is written," meaning in accordance with the divine purpose (also 8:31; 1 Cor 15:3–4).

Passover slides into institution of the Lord's Supper (vv. 22–26), variously expressed elsewhere in the NT (cf. Luke 22:14–23; John 6:48–58; 1 Cor 11:24–25). At previous banquets in Mark (6:41; 8:6) Jesus "took, bless[ed], broke, and gave" (v. 22); likewise he earlier spoke of his sacrifice for many (v. 24; 10:45). In Greek as in English, one's "body" is a flexible metaphor: "My selfhood" or "personality" may capture some nuances here (cf. 1 Cor 10:16–17). "Blood of the covenant" (v. 23) is a classic OT image for ratification (Exod 24:6–8; Jer 31:31; Zech 9:11), christologically developed in Hebrews (9:11–10:18). "That day . . . in the kingdom of God" suggests the new eschatological age, sometimes envisioned as a magnificent banquet (1 Chr 12:38–40; Isa 25:6–8; Matt 22:1–4).

Jesus' prediction of the Twelve's desertion (vv. 27–31) occurs en route to the Mount of Olives (see 11:1; 13:3). The sheep's scattering after their shepherd's smiting accords with Scripture (Zech 13:7; cf. Mark 6:34; 14:21). To "become deserters" (vv. 27, 29) is tantamount to "falling away," much as rocky, rootless hearers of the word fold under pressure (4:16–17). One such "rock"—Peter (petros, 3:16)—twice repudiates his threefold defection (vv. 29–31a); his peers join in for a third denial (v. 31b). Jesus promises his own post-mortem fidelity in Galilee (v. 28; 16:7). The mind reels at ironies past and to come: Jesus' injunction that his followers must deny themselves (8:34), their precipitate denial of their denials, Jesus' denial of himself out of loyalty to the traitorous.

At Gethsemane (14:32–52) Jesus is arrested as all of the Twelve forsake him. Verses 32–42 present Jesus' most extended crisis of faith in Mark. In many ways it is a flashback to Jairus, his daughter, and the woman with chronic bleeding in 5:21–43. All these stories are drenched in apocalyptic imagery: Jesus' declaration that the woman depart in peace (5:34), his raising of the little girl (5:41–42), his references to "the cup" (14:36; see also 10:38–39; Isa 51:17, 22) and "the time of trial" (14:38; cf. Jas 1:2; 1 Pet 1:6; Rev 2:10), and his repeated rousings (14:34, 37–38, 41ab) of disciples who cannot stay awake (vv. 37, 40, 41; cf. 13:34–37). All culminates in his announcement that "the hour" has come (vv. 35, 37, 41c; cf. 13:11, 32). Present in all three stories are Peter, James, and John (5:37; 14:32–33), who characteristically flout their teacher (5:31; 14:34, 37–38, 40). Suffusing these tableaux is utter hopelessness: Jairus's little girl is at death's door (5:23a); the woman's bleeding has only worsened (5:25–26); here Jesus is tormented, even to death (14:34a). All the protagonists' initial responses to crisis is fear (5:33, 36; 14:33): distress that throws its victims to the ground (5:22, 33; 14:35), a grief whose source is human frailty, "weakness of the flesh" (14:38; cf. Isa 31:3; 40:6; Rom 8:1–17). "Daughters" (5:23a, 34) and a "beloved son" (1:11; 9:7) addressing "Abba" (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) beg for relief (5:23b, 27–28; 14:36, 39, 41). Like the woman (5:28), Jesus temporarily resists discovery yet ultimately steps forward to face the truth (5:32–33; 14:36): the Son of Man's ordained betrayal into sinful hands (14:41–42, 49b).

Immediately Jesus' arrest (14:43–52) compounds the irony. The betrayer is Judas (v. 43; 3:19; 14:10), using as his signal the kiss to which a rabbi was entitled from his disciples (Prov. 27:6; Luke 7:38). Just as he predicted (Mark 8:31), those to whom Jesus is delivered are the religious elite who first challenged him in the Temple (11:27): chief priests, scribes, and elders, whose associates Jesus implicated for the very banditry for which he is now apprehended (11:17–18; 14:48–49a). Various interpretations have been proposed for the mysterious incident in 14:51–52. Is it an anticipation of the linen shroud in 15:46, soon to be discarded? Is this the same young man in 16:5? Should we recall naked flight in Gen 39:12 or Amos 2:16? None is compelling. Perhaps Mark intends a contrast between Jesus' calm courage and his followers' panicked flight (14:50).

"On the night he was betrayed" (1 Cor 11:22) not one but two interrogations took place at the high priest's house. Mark heightens the irony by folding one (that of Jesus: 14:55–65) inside the other (that of Peter: 14:53–54, 66–72). Inside Mark portrays a kangaroo court, with Jesus the silent center (v. 61; cf. Ps 38:12–14) amidst a rash of judicial irregularities. A formal trial by the entire council, or Sanhedrin (v. 55; cf. 13:9), should not be convened at night, especially on a festal evening; nor should a verdict to convict be reached in a single day (m. Sanh. 4.1). The charge that Jesus threatened to destroy the Temple is bogus (vv. 57–58) and contradicted (vv. 56, 59; cf. Deut 19:15; Ps 109:2–3). The Temple's replacement with one not made with hands braids a strand of the OT (2 Sam 7:4–17) with later Christian reflection (Acts 7:48; 1 Cor 3:16; 1 Pet 2:4–6). Finally (v. 61b) the high priest, presumably Caiaphas (18–37 CE; Matt 26:3; John 18:13, 24), oddly charges Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One: all terms central to Christian preaching (Mark 1:1; John 20:31), none culpable of capital punishment. Jesus accepts that claim (v. 62), again predicting the advent of an apocalyptic Son of Man (8:38; 12:36; 13:26) along the lines of Ps 110:1 and Dan 7:13–14. Rending his garment (v. 63; Gen 37:29), the high priest charges blasphemy (v. 64), which here seems unfounded (see Lev 24:16; cf. Mark 2:7). The court's conduct in v. 65 is reminiscent of Isa 50:6; 53:3–5; at the precise moment they taunt him to "prophesy," Jesus' prophecies are fulfilled in the courtyard outside (vv. 66–72). There a motley group, chiefly the high priest's maid, accurately spots Peter as having been "with Jesus" (v. 67; 3:14). Not only does Peter lie about his discipleship (v.

71); he does so in a manner revealing unintended truth about all of the Twelve: "I do not know or understand" (v. 68; see 4:13; 6:52; 8:17, 21; 9:32). The cock crows (whether a bird or a Roman signal: 13:35), Peter remembers (14:30–31) and collapses (v. 72): one who lost himself by trying to save himself (8:35).

Jesus' arraignment continues by his transfer to Roman jurisdiction (15:1–15). Mark's specification of morning (15:1) is the first of five carefully measured, temporal indicators in this chapter (vv. 25, 33a, 33b, 42). The Pharisees, Jesus' antagonists earlier in Mark, have faded from the picture; henceforth the chief priests, representing the entire Sanhedrin, are his principal accusers (vv. 3, 10, 11, 31). Recalling the second passion prediction in 9:31, Mark emphasizes Jesus' being handed over (15:1, 10, 15) to Pontius Pilate, fifth Roman prefect of Judea (26–36 CE). Philo (Legat. 301–2) and Josephus (Ant. 18.55–57; B. J. 2.169–77) characterize Pilate as stubbornly vicious; the Evangelists, as a reluctant pawn (Matt 27:18–25; Luke 23:1–24; John 18:28–19:16). Appearing for the first time in Mark 15:2, the title "the King of the Jews" is the first of five ironic acclamations of Jesus by Roman agents (vv. 9, 12, 18, 26; cf. v. 32). Their unbelieving affirmation chimes with the high priest's in 14:61, as does Jesus' silence in 15:5. The trial before Pilate concludes with the so-called Passover amnesty (vv. 6, 8), evidence for which is uncorroborated outside the Gospels. Benefiting from this custom is one Barabbas (literally, "Son of the Father"). In which insurrection he may have committed murder (v. 7) is uncertain; Luke (13:1; Acts 5:36–37) and Josephus (Ant. 18.55–62, 65–87; J.W. 2.167–77) report numerous Jewish revolts against their Roman overlords. Pilate's offer to release Jesus and the crowd's decision for Barabbas underscore two further ironies: yet another authority in Mark proves feckless (see 6:14–29); a known malefactor goes free while a righteous innocent (cf. 6:20; 15:15) pays the ultimate penalty.

The execution of Pilate's sentence (15:16–47) begins with Jesus' humiliation by the Roman guard (15:16–20). A whole cohort numbered between 200 to 600 soldiers; if this be exaggeration, its effect is to dramatize the enormous odds against Jesus. Like the crown, purple suggests royal raiment (15:17; see 1 Macc 10:20). Bowing in worship (v. 19) while uttering, "Hail, King of the Jews!" (v. 18) is altogether ironic, possibly a cruel parody of the legionary salute, "Hail, Caesar, conqueror, emperor" (Suetonius, Claudius 21.6). Mockery by physical abuse (vv. 19–20) recalls Jesus' prediction in 10:34, which in turn recalls Isa 50:6 and Mic 5:1.

A condemned prisoner like Jesus carried only the crossbar (v. 21); the gibbet awaited at the place of execution. By reporting that a passerby named Simon (cf. 14:37) was pressed to carry his cross (cf. 8:34), Mark may cut the irony deeply indeed. Evidently Mark's audience would have recognized Rufus and Alexander; identification of the former with Paul's associate (Rom 16:13) is impossible to confirm. Though it can no longer be certainly located, Golgotha (v. 22) was apparently outside Jerusalem's city walls (John 19:20; Heb 13:12). Myrrh-spiked wine (v. 23) was likely offered as an analgesic (cf. Prov 31:6); because he has chosen to drink from another cup (10:38; 14:36), Jesus refuses this one.

Cicero describes crucifixion—impaling a victim onto a stake and crossbar—as the supreme penalty (In Verrem 2.5). It was commonly used in cases of imperial sedition, which matches several of Mark's details: the placard of the charge, "the King of the Jews" (v. 26); the identification of fellow victims as revolutionary bandits (v. 27; cf. 14:48). The intent of crucifixion was sadistic: cruel, shameful, protracted torture of society's most heinous offenders of lower class. In that context Mark's portrait of Jesus' crucifixion is in four respects noteworthy. First, the evangelist does not milk the event for pity: he simply states the matter (v. 24). Second, the details of Jesus' final hours, effectively tolled (vv. 25, 33), remind a biblically knowledgeable reader of Pss 22 and 109, two classic laments: casting lots for a victim's clothes (v. 24/Ps 22:18), taunting by head-shaking (v. 29/Ps 22:7; 109:25), the cry of dereliction (v. 34/Ps 22:1). For those able to perceive, "the scriptures [are being] fulfilled" (14:49b; made explicit in 15:28, which is absent from the oldest manuscripts). Third, reminiscent of Jesus' prediction at Olivet (13:24), midday darkness over the whole land (v. 33) is an apocalyptic portrayal of divine judgment (Amos 8:9).

The fourth characteristic of Mark's narration is by now predictable: its hellish irony. Malefactors are crucified on Jesus' right and left (v. 27): the places of honor that James and John had requested (10:37). Even Jesus' fellow victims join with bystanders in ridiculing him (v. 32b; cf. Luke 23:39–43). The mockery, rendered in the NRSV as "derision" (v. 29), is described in Greek as "blaspheming" (see 14:64); singled out among the blasphemers are the chief priests and scribes (v. 31). The substance of their jeer in v. 29, like the testimony of impeached witnesses in 14:58, demonstrates that to the very end most of Jesus' auditors have misunderstood him altogether. The taunt that he save himself (v. 30) directly contradicts the Son of Man's mission in 8:35; that he is the Messiah, Israel's king (v. 32a) who cannot save himself as he saved others (v. 31), is exactly right (1:1; 10:45; 14:24; 15:2). In effect Golgotha's audience is enacting the attitude of the unrighteous in the Wisdom of Solomon (2:12–24); their insistence on signs as a basis of faith (v. 32a) Jesus has already repudiated (8:11–12). In Mark the relationship between faith and mighty works is precisely opposite: nothing can happen unless first one trusts God (2:5; 5:34; 9:23; 11:22–24).

Irony persists in Mark's depiction of Jesus' death and its immediate aftermath. His lament in Aramaic (v. 34; see also 5:41; 7:34) occasions still more misunderstanding by his audience (see also 4:12; 8:14–21): they mistake "Eloi" (God) as a cry to Elijah (v. 35). Perhaps evolving from 2 Kgs 2:9–12, later Jewish tradition envisioned Elijah as protector of the righteous in distress. In John the Baptist, however, Elijah has already returned and been disposed of (1:6; 6:27–28; 9:11–13). While an allusion to Ps 69:21 may be intended, sour wine, a common drink of the time, is offered in a final, unavailing attempt to pump a miracle from heaven (v. 36). After a final shriek lacking either confidence (Luke 23:46) or triumph (John 19:30), Jesus dies (v. 37). Immediately (v. 38) Mark redirects the reader's attention to the curtain of the Temple, perhaps that which veiled the Holy of Holies (Exod 26:31–37), ripped from top to bottom. As a bookend to the heavens' rending at Jesus' baptism (1:10), this is surely a revelatory sign. Just what it reveals is debatable. It may symbolize the Temple's eventual eradication (see also 11:15–19; 13:1–2); another possibility, effectively developed in Hebrews (9:1–28; 10:19–20) is unmediated access to God created by Jesus' death. Equally ironic and no less ambiguous is the centurion's reaction (v. 39). For the first and only time in Mark, a human being besides Jesus identifies him as God's Son (cf. 1:1; 3:11; 9:7; 13:32). This person is a Gentile, and Gentiles have been receptive to Jesus (3:8; 5:20; 7:24–31; 11:17; 13:10). Ironically this Gentile is one of Jesus' executioners, facing Jesus who has thus expired (cf. Matt 27:54). Whether his assertion betokens sincerity or sarcasm (15:9, 32) is impossible to determine.

Only the reader who faithfully accepts the Son of Man's self-assessment (8:31; 10:45) is in position to judge the accuracy of the centurion's verdict and the basis on which it is reached (cf. 1 Cor 1:18–2:5).

Women observing from a distance (v. 40; cf. Ps 38:11) perform three important functions. First, they remind the reader of those absent from the scene: the Twelve, who have long since abandoned Jesus (14:50). Second, their presence clarifies that Jesus' ministering entourage has included from the beginning many women, disciples beyond the Twelve (v. 41; see also 1:31; 14:6). Third, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of Joses, and Salome know where Jesus was buried (v. 47), anticipating any objection that they later visited the wrong tomb (16:1). Whether Mary the mother of James and of Joses is the same woman as Jesus' mother (6:3) is impossible to determine. The negotiations for disposition (vv. 42–45) of Jesus' body ring true, and archaeological remains confirm the burial customs implied (v. 46; see also Deut 21:22–23; Isa 22:16). It is unclear on which council Joseph of Arimathea (in northwest Judea) served, but respected membership could have allowed him access to Pilate as Mark describes (v. 43, 45). If not a disciple as such, Joseph was "himself awaiting expectantly" the kingdom that Jesus preached (1:15); with courage Joseph performs for the body those services John's disciples rendered for their dead teacher (6:29). Since death after crucifixion often occurred after "long drawn-out agony" (Seneca, Dialogue 3), Pilate's surprise that Jesus was gone after only six hours is as understandable as his determination to verify it (vv. 44–45)—confirmation that may have served as additional defense against later charges of Christian fraud (cf. Matt 27:62–66). Evening on the Day of Preparation (v. 42) suggests the three hours before sundown on Friday; even a hurried burial before the Sabbath suggests Jewish piety and provides reason for the women's return to anoint the body after the Sabbath was past (16:1).

IV. Epilogue: The Empty Tomb (16:1–8) [The Shorter Ending of Mark]

[The Longer Ending of Mark (16:9–20)]

The earliest and finest manuscripts of Mark end at 16:8. This Gospel's textual tradition includes three other endings, two of which the NRSV places in brackets. The latter two are obvious attempts by scribes to close this Gospel in conformity with the other Gospels' conclusions. (The fourth ending, an expansion of "the Longer Ending," is not rendered in the NRSV and will not be discussed further.)

The Shorter Ending of Mark, thirty-four Greek words in length, was added not earlier than the fourth century CE. This conclusion offers the women's report to the eleven and others (see Matt 28:8; Luke 24:9) and a variant of Matthew's "Great Commission" (28:19–20). Through "Peter and those with him," the risen Jesus disseminates "the sacred and imperishable proclamation of eternal salvation" (cf. 1 Tim 1:11; 2 Tim 1:10; 1 Pet 1:23–25). This announcement's sweep "from east to west" presumes, or at least aspires for, subsequent expansion of the Christian proclamation (cf. Mark 13:10; Acts 1:8; Rom 15:22–29).

Dating to the late second century and present in a majority of witnesses is the Longer Ending of Mark (16:9–20), well known to readers of the KJV. Mixing a variety of NT motifs, many foreign to Mark, this ending reads as a pastiche of the other Gospels. The risen Jesus' first appearance to Mary Magdalene (v. 9) recalls different traditions in Matt 28:9–10 and John 20:11–18. From Luke 8:2 is probably derived the detail that he had cast out seven demons from Magdalene. The disbelief confronting Mary's testimony (vv. 10–11) is reminiscent of Luke 24:9–11. Mark 16:12–13 seems an abbreviated version of the Emmaus Road episode in Luke 24:13–35. The clearest intersection of this ending's theology with that expressed elsewhere in Mark lies at 16:14: Jesus appears and upbraids the eleven for their "lack of faith" (see 4:40b; 6:6a; 9:24) and their "stubbornness" (literally, "hardness of heart": see 3:5; 6:52; 8:17; 10:5). Recalling Mark's opening reference to the good news (1:1), 16:15 and 20 paraphrase Matt 28:19, with additional cautions and encouragements. "The one who does not believe will be condemned" (16:16b) is without precedent in Mark but akin to John (3:18; 16:17). "The one who believes and is baptized will be saved" (16:16a) approximates assertions made elsewhere in the NT (Matt 28:19; Acts 2:38; Titus 3:5; 1 Pet 3:21). Though Mark is suspicious of signs as warrants for belief (8:11; 13:22; 14:32), the Longer Ending accords credibility to many signs done in Jesus' name (vv. 17, 20; cf. 9:39; John 2:23; 4:48; 6:30). Casting out demons is not beyond the purview of Jesus' disciples in Mark (3:15; 6:7; cf. 9:38). Other convincing signs (16:17–18) are characteristically Lukan: speaking in tongues (Acts 2:4–11; 10:46; 19:6), safely picking up snakes (Luke 10:19; Acts 28:3–6), healing the sick by the laying of hands (Acts 3:1–10; 5:12–16; 9:12, 17–18; also Jas 5:14–15). Divine cooperation with and confirmation of Christian believers (Mark 16:20) is assured throughout the NT (Matt 28:20; Acts 4:30; 6:8; 14:3; 15:12; Rom 15:19; Heb 2:3–4). Even more prevalent is the image, developed from Ps 110:1, of the Lord Jesus as gloriously seated at God's right hand (Acts 2:33–34; 5:31; 7:55–56; Rom 8:34; Eph 1:20; Col 3:1; Heb 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Pet 3:22). His being "taken up into heaven" (Mark 16:19) recalls Jesus' ascension in Luke (24:51; see also Acts 1:2, 11; 1 Tim 3:16) as well as Elijah's departure in a chariot of fire (2 Kgs 2:11).

What, then, of Mark's original epilogue (16:1–8), on which all other endings are based? As elsewhere in the passion narrative (14:1, 12, 17; 15:1, 25, 33, 42), Mark sets the stage with temporal precision: "when the Sabbath was over [after six o'clock on Saturday evening] . . . very early on the first day of the week [Sunday]" (vv. 1, 2). Those visiting the tomb are the same women named as witnesses of Jesus' death (15:40). They have come to anoint the hastily buried body (15:42, 46). Their mission is doubly futile: Another woman has already performed that task (14:8); repeatedly Jesus has promised that his body would be raised three days after his death (8:31; 9:31; 10:34). While superficially an expression of poor planning, their concern for moving from the tomb's mouth a stone so large (vv. 3–4) tacitly rebuts any accusation that the body was stolen (thus, Matt 28:11–15). Again their concern proves needless: The stone has already been rolled back (v. 4). Entering the tomb they are astonished to see a young man dressed in white (v. 5), suggesting apocalyptic glorification (9:3; Dan 7:9; 12:3; Matt 13:43; Rev 7:9, 13). In v. 6 he assures them (a) there's no reason for alarm: (b) Jesus, the crucified Nazarene they are seeking, (c) is not there because (d) he has been raised from death (implicitly, by God). This is one of the NT's fundamental claims (John 5:21; Acts 4:10; 13:30; Rom 4:24; 1 Cor 15:3–4; 2 Tim 2:8). Verse 7 is an assignment: (a) Go and tell his disciples, especially Peter (see 14:30–31, 66–72), (b) that Jesus is going ahead of them back to Galilee (the starting point: 1:9, 14), (c) where they will see him (cf. Acts 2:32; 3:15; 10:40–41; 1 Cor 9:1; 15:5–8), (d) just as he said (Mark 14:28). Verse 8 describes the women's response: (a) they flee the tomb, (b) tremulous and bewildered, (c) and say nothing to anyone (d) because they were afraid. The final irony: Even these women, who followed Jesus longer than anyone else, fall short from fear—as his disciples have done as far back as Mark 4:40–41. When all else and all others fail, God remains faithful to the promise relayed by Jesus himself (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34). Mark's Gospel is but the beginning of the good news (1:1), now sandwiched into its readers' lives, where it may continue to unfold as a parable most surprising (4:1–34).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. C. Black. Mark: Images of an Apostolic Interpreter. SPNT (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); M. E. Boring. Mark: A Commentary. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2006); A. Y. Collins. Mark. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); R. A. Culpepper. Mark. SHBC (Macon, Ga.: Smyth & Helwys, 2007); M. D. Hooker. The Gospel according to Saint Mark. BNTC (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1991); D. H. Juel. A Master of Surprise: Mark Interpreted (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); J. Marcus. Mark 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 27 (Garden City: Doubleday, 2000); . Mark 9–16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 27A (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009); F. J. Moloney. The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 2002); P. Perkins. "The Gospel of Mark: Introduction, Commentary, and Reflections." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1995) 8:503–733; H. N. Roskam, ed. The Purpose of the Gospel of Mark in Its Historical and Social Context. NovTSup 114 (Leiden: Brill, 2004).

LUKE

JOHN T. CARROLL

OVERVIEW

Genre and character of the work. The Gospel of Luke, with its sequel, the Acts of the Apostles, is a narrative of Christian origins; it grounds the spread of the gospel ("good news") to all nations in the public career of Jesus, the prophet-Messiah commissioned by God and empowered by God's Spirit for a ministry of word and deed in Galilee and Judea. Luke embeds the story of Jesus in the history of Israel, whose hopes and scriptural promises find fulfillment in the story Luke tells.

A central concern of Luke's two-volume narrative is legitimation. How can Israel's hopes for salvation be realized in a community composed increasingly of Gentiles, with Jews dividing in response to its message? How can Israel's Messiah face the scandalous death of crucifixion? Luke shows how these surprising developments represent the working out of the divine purpose for Israel and the nations.

Luke gives distinctive shape to a story others told before him, reworking Mark's narrative of Jesus' ministry and weaving it with other sources (written and oral): birth stories, teachings of Jesus (many shared with Matthew, others found only in Luke), and resurrection appearances.

Author and audience. Tradition assigns the Gospel of Luke (and Acts) to a physician, occasional companion of Paul (see Col 4:14). While authorship by Luke is possible, no positive indicators point to Luke or to a physician as author, and interpretation is not aided by such an identification. As with the other Gospels, anything that is to be learned about author, audience, and circumstances of composition must be inferred from the story Luke tells.

Themes. Luke highlights God's work of salvation in Israel, fulfilling scriptural promise, through the agency of Jesus, the Spirit-empowered Messiah and prophet. In Acts salvation extends to the whole world, a move anticipated in the Gospel, even if Jesus mostly confines his activity to Jewish circles. He launches his ministry in his hometown, an episode that prefigures both the character and the outcome of his career: Jesus brings hope and liberation to the poor, sick, and lost; salvation thus effects radical role reversals, both vertical (rich and poor, powerful and powerless exchanging positions) and horizontal (sinners displacing the righteous in God's realm).

While Jesus is the chief actor, the purpose that drives the story is God's. Divine empowerment ("Holy Spirit") authorizes Jesus and his apostles; their message, acts of healing, and inclusive hospitality embody God's rule. Restoration comes to God's people but in the process subverts prevailing cultural scripts. People lacking status and power model the life of God's realm. This countercultural vision provokes opposition, eventually leading to Jesus' execution—prelude to divine vindication in resurrection and mission to the whole world as the story continues in Acts.

OUTLINE

Preface (1:1–4)

I. Beginnings (1:5–4:13)

A. Narrative of the Birth and Childhood of John and Jesus (1:5–2:52)

B. Preparation for the Ministry of the Messiah (3:1–4:13)

II. Ministry (4:14–19:27)

A. Galilean Ministry (4:14–9:50)

B. Journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27)

III. The Final Days (19:28–25:53)

A. Climactic Teaching Ministry in Jerusalem (19:28–21:38)

B. Ministry During the Passion (22:1–23:56)

C. Easter: Ministry of the Risen Jesus (24:1–53)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

Preface (1:1–4)

Luke begins the Gospel with a formal preface, signaling that the work, addressed to "most excellent Theophilus," seeks a hearing from cultured audiences in the Greco-Roman world. Luke sketches the scope and aims of his literary project, presents his credentials to deliver a trustworthy narrative, and characterizes the story as one about fulfillment. Having conducted careful research, and building on the narrative tradition crafted by predecessors, Luke, a second-or third-generation Christian teacher, retells the story in a way that accents narrative design ("an orderly account") in which events are not random but fulfill divine promise. The goal is a reliable account, so that Theophilus—whose name means "lover of God," probably a person of status—and others who hear the story "may know the truth concerning the things about which you have been instructed." Luke opens his second book with a briefer preface (Acts 1:1–2) that links the two writings, recalling the content of the Gospel.

I. Beginnings (1:5–4:13)

A. Narrative of the Birth and Childhood of John and Jesus (1:5–2:52)

Like Matthew, Luke begins the story by relating Jesus' birth. However, Luke develops the significance of Jesus' arrival by setting it in three distinct contexts. (1) Luke first narrates the birth of the precursor prophet John. (2) Luke's account of the births of John and Jesus evokes scriptural promises to Israel, celebrating hopes fulfilled. (3) At the same time, John and Jesus step into human history at a particular geopolitical moment, when Rome and its emperor hold sway. It remains to be seen how Israel's hope and Rome's power will collide.

1:5–38. Twin Announcements: the Coming of Prophet and Son of God. Having garnered the attention of a cultured, Greek-speaking audience, Luke begins the story with a move of cultural reorientation, borrowing language, character types, and plot twists from Jewish Scripture. In a narrative that will close in the Jerusalem Temple (24:52–53), where better to begin than in this same sacred space, observing rituals faithfully performed by an aging priest? Heaven claims his attention with surprising news, soon to be followed by an even more stunning revelation to a young peasant girl—the first of many accounts pairing male and female characters (e.g., 2:25–38; 10:25–42; 13:10–17 with 14:1–6; 15:3–10).

1:5–25. Pious, yet childless, the first characters in Luke's story reprise a role played by many in Israel's history, notably Abraham and Sarah (Gen 16–18) and Hannah (1 Sam 1–2). A heavenly messenger (Gabriel) interrupts the priest Zechariah in the course of his Temple service and announces that his wife Elizabeth will give birth to a son, whom they are to name John. As with their biblical predecessors, the promise of a child is not a private matter; God's promise concerns the formation and now restoration of a people. John will play a special role; in the mold of Elijah, he will call the people back to their God, readying them for their "Lord" (cf. Mal 4:5–6).

This is extraordinary news, warranting suspension of the sacred routine, but Zechariah is slow to believe because he and his wife are so old. The priest is unable to speak until the promise he could not trust has been realized. Events will have to speak for themselves—until, that is, Elizabeth becomes pregnant and, in a voice reminiscent of Rachel's (Gen 30:22–23), celebrates God's gracious reversal of her position as a childless woman in a society that privileges households with children. So Luke narrates the first of many inversions of status in his story.

1:26–38. The young woman Mary also receives an unexpected heavenly visitor, though in her home far from the Temple. She too receives the promise of a son, whose stature will surpass even John's. With the name Jesus (its significance ["God saves"] is not developed as in Matt 1:21), he will be known as holy, Son of God, and he will reign over Israel forever (Luke 1:32–33), fulfilling Nathan's promise to David (2 Sam 7:12–14). Like the priest Zechariah, the socially marginal young woman answers Gabriel with a question: "How can this be, since I am a virgin?" (Luke 1:34). Unlike Zechariah, however, she accepts God's promise, after the angel offers news of the pregnancy of Mary's relative Elizabeth as proof that "nothing will be impossible with God" (vv. 36–38). If Mary's trust in divine promise is not misplaced, this will be an occasion for joyful celebration.

1:39–56. Elizabeth and Mary Meet, Celebrate Their Pregnancy. Praise for a God who delivers on promises to the people finds voice as Mary visits Elizabeth and bursts into Spirit-inspired song. Prophetic speech articulates the meaning of the events now set into motion.

1:39–45. Mary visits her relative Elizabeth, staying for three months (until Elizabeth is ready to deliver). Only Luke forges kinship ties between Jesus and John, who are also yoked as agents of God's work of salvation. Especially remarkable is the part played by two women and their conversation at the start of the narrative. Anticipating the end of the story, when women will be the first to proclaim Jesus' resurrection (24:1–11), Luke highlights the words of two women, who interpret what God is doing in Israel. On Easter, the apostles (men) will receive the message of women disciples with skepticism; in a story that aims at reliable narration (1:4), how will Luke's readers respond to women's prophetic witness as the story begins?

Elizabeth finds voice first. The son she carries in her womb, Gabriel had prophesied, would be "filled with the Holy Spirit" even before birth (1:15). When Elizabeth hears the greeting of Mary, "the child leap[s] in her womb," yet Elizabeth is the one who is "filled with the Holy Spirit" and speaks (v. 41): the mother of a future prophet invests his leap with meaning: "the child in my womb leaped for joy" (v. 44). Elizabeth discerns Mary's trusting reception of God's word; she also knows who is Lord—the unborn child Mary now carries, whom John will acknowledge as greater than himself (3:15–17). Elizabeth's greeting discloses that while God is sovereign, the "Lord" to whom all people owe loyalty and service, God's Son (Jesus) will also bear that authority. Elizabeth's "blessing" of Mary prompts the younger woman to pick up this theme. She will not focus her prophetic speech on her own good fortune, however, but on the character of God's activity in the world.

1:46–56. Mary's song (the "Magnificat": the passage's first word in Latin translation) praises a God who has launched a social revolution. These are neither gentle nor tame words; the coming of John and Jesus enacts a divine reign that effects wholesale reversal of status and power in the world. Elevation of the one low in status (like Mary herself), unending mercy tempering the exercise of might: God exerts power by deposing the powerful and lifting up the powerless, nourishes the poor and turns away the wealthy. So, in a socially and politically subversive way, the God of Israel fulfills ancient promises to Abraham and his descendants.

Echoing Hannah's prayer in 1 Sam 2:1–10, Mary's song characterizes the divinely initiated events that now unfold as the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham and as the expression of God's commitment to power and status inversion. The social order that will mark the realm of God, in Luke's narrative description, will disenfranchise those with power and resources, and honor the powerless and impoverished. How will the agents of salvation whose births Luke chronicles enact such a bold social program? Will Roman power stand aside without a fight?

1:57–80. John's Birth and Prophetic Interpretation by His Father. The next scene, chronicling John's birth, pictures his parents' fidelity to divine purpose and presents the father's Spirit-impelled declaration of praise to God, reinforcing Mary's celebration of divine activity.

1:57–66. Luke briefly mentions John's birth, which the village marks as an expression of divine mercy to Elizabeth. When the community gathers eight days later for the child's circumcision and naming, attention focuses on his name; defying expectation, Elizabeth and then Zechariah (with the aid of a tablet) insist that the infant receive the name "John." Zechariah moves from his initial skepticism to fidelity, and at once "his mouth was opened and his tongue freed" (v. 64). Behind these passive-voice verbs lies the activity of God, yet God does not restore capacity for speech as a reward for obedience, or to cancel punishment for earlier lack of trust. Instead, John's father regains his voice so as to speak, "filled with the Holy Spirit," the prophetic declaration that follows—another in a series of inspired speeches that articulate the meaning of what is happening.

1:67–80. Like Mary, Zechariah praises God and in so doing interprets God's activity. Verse 67 describes the source of his words—the Spirit—and characterizes them as prophetic speech (Mary's song is prophetic in function but not in label). "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," he begins (v. 68)—deserving of blessing, of praise (benedictus in Latin), because God has decisively intervened in Israel's history to fulfill ancient promise, keep covenant relation with the people, effect their salvation, and conduct them in the ways of peace. As in Mary's song, the prayer of Zechariah highlights the fulfillment of scriptural promise, mentioning Abraham, David, and more generally ancestors and prophets. The images multiply: mercy, salvation, divine visitation to liberate the people, and peace. From beginning to end, chapter one kindles hopes for Israel's future, raising expectation of imminent liberation. By the end of the story, many of these images will have been turned on their head: divine visitation will be neither recognized nor welcomed (19:41–44); redemption will fail to materialize, at least as expected (24:21); "things that make for peace" will be hidden from a recalcitrant people (19:42). What manner of salvation is this?

Zechariah's hymn-prayer hints that the salvation God effects in Israel will not meet expectation; there will be surprises, even provocations, on the road to liberation. Though not as radical as Mary's song, Zechariah's, too, rewrites conventional scripts. Salvation, pictured as a mighty "horn," as rescue from enemies, has as its aim righteous service of God and assumes the form of forgiveness of sins, the outcome of divine mercy. Luke does not "spiritualize" salvation, however, for Jesus, the embodiment of salvation for both Israel and the nations, will engage in a mission that not only delivers forgiveness but also challenges the structures of economic and political power and social privilege.

For now, reinforcing Mary's song, and picking up threads from Gabriel's earlier announcement to him, Zechariah illuminates the future roles of John and Jesus as agents of divine liberation. John will prepare the people for Jesus' ministry of liberation, pointing them toward the one who will enact salvation and mediate God's forgiveness.

2:1–20. Jesus' Birth and Prophetic Interpretation by an Angelic Choir. The Roman emperor's directive ushers Mary and her future husband to Bethlehem, where Jesus is born. Yet as the occupying power counts heads in a census, God delivers more than Caesar had counted on. The story of Jesus' birth points beyond Rome to the sovereignty of God, and to the significance of this newborn through whom divine rule comes to be exercised in the world. A third message from heaven confirms and extends the good news about Jesus earlier proclaimed by Gabriel and seconded by Mary and Zechariah.

2:1–7. The narrator supplies a dose of geopolitical reality: the emperor Augustus issues decrees that affect the whole world (exaggeration, to be sure, but not by far, at least from the vantage of occupied Palestine). No historical records confirm that an empire-wide census, or even a regional one during the governorship of Quirinius, occurred, though a limited census, inciting vigorous protest (cf. Acts 5:37), did follow the deposing of Herod Archelaus in Judea in 6 CE. Whatever the historical details, the census aligns the tradition of Jesus' birth in Bethlehem with the fact of his family's residence in Nazareth and introduces into the narrative a tension between two world rulers, Caesar and God's Messiah. Power appears to belong to Rome, yet fidelity to God on the part of law-abiding people generates outcomes the emperor could scarcely have imagined.

So Jesus is born at Bethlehem, David's city, an apt birthplace for a descendant—through Joseph, introduced here for the first time—of David. The last line of the passage, "there was no place for them in the inn" (2:7), highlights the deep irony. A child born in conditions of marginality and poverty (a feeding trough for animals) will challenge Caesar's claim to universal dominion, but only by way of radical reversal of conventional notions of power and status. The stage is set for acclamation of an infant born to be king, not by wealthy and powerful magi (Matt 2) but by shepherds.

2:8–20. Heaven again disrupts routine human activity, as socially marginal shepherds in the countryside near Bethlehem encounter divine glory in the form of angels who announce the birth of a Savior. Disclosure of Jesus' identity and vocation—"a Savior, who is the Messiah [i.e., Christ], the Lord" (v. 11)—and affirmation of God's gift of peace prompt the shepherds to investigate and, ultimately, to praise God. When the shepherds report their experience, it astonishes everyone who hears. News about Jesus' words and actions will repeatedly amaze people (e.g., 2:47; 4:32; 5:26; 8:25, 56; 9:43). Astonishment at God's powerful work is not yet faith, but Mary has stepped onto the path toward authentic faith: while she has already heard firsthand something resembling the shepherd's report (1:32–35), she must mull over (2:19) the extraordinary meaning of the birth of a child who begins life away from home, outside any home. (He will later describe his life as one well acquainted with homelessness, 9:58.)

So arrives the one who will enact God's salvation, as Israel's anointed ruler (Messiah), and exercise sovereignty in the world on behalf of God as "Lord." The era of fulfilled promises has begun, yet will Caesar willingly relinquish his own claims to universal sovereignty, as the source of peace on earth? What manner of Messiah, Savior, and Lord will the manger-boy wrapped in cloths grow to be? Will peace find a home on earth (cf. 19:38, 42)?

2:21–40. Preview of Jesus' Destiny: The Child and Israel's Salvation. The outer frame of this passage displays the fidelity of Jesus' family, but the accent falls on the fulfillment of divine promise, articulated by a pious old man in the Temple in a way that foreshadows the conflict that will accompany God's offer of salvation to Israel. Like John, Jesus is nurtured in a pious Jewish family. At his circumcision, Mary and Joseph honor the angel's directive to name the boy Jesus and observe the purification rituals prescribed by Mosaic law (cf. Lev 12:6–8) when they present their firstborn son at the Temple—an occasion for another prophetic oracle about Jesus' vocation and destiny, one that will add chords of conflict to the symphony of promise and fulfillment.

Luke introduces an aging prophetic duo (2:25–38, again pairing male and female). Though not labeled a prophet, the devout Simeon, directed by the Spirit, encounters Jesus and his parents in the Temple and delivers an oracle that celebrates the presence of salvation in this child but also prophesies the conflict that will greet him. Israel will receive honor ("glory") through him, to be sure, but divine revelation will extend to the nations (or "Gentiles") as well—the first of many anticipations of the inclusion of Gentiles in the people of God (e.g., 3:6, 38; 4:25–27; 7:1–10), a story Luke will tell in Acts. Moreover, the Messiah will not only restore God's people but also divide them. Some will rise, while others will oppose him and fall, a division-through-conflict that will touch even Mary.

The extraordinarily devout widow Anna adds her prophetic testimony. The narrator labels her a prophet but does not report any oracles spoken by her, instead providing a general summary. (Acts 21:9 presents similar treatment of Philip's four prophetic daughters.) Following the oracle of Simeon, the subtle phrasing of the narrator's profile of Anna raises questions. She praises God and talks about "the child" to all who were "looking for the redemption of Jerusalem" (Luke 2:38), but what form will that redemption take? Who will recognize and accept it, and who will resist it?

Luke's selective account of the infancy of Jesus closes by repeating the theme of his parents' fidelity to "the law of the Lord" (v. 39), and a narrative summary takes notice of the child's growth as one marked by the grace, or favor, of God.

2:41–52. Jesus, Son of God, Among the Teachers in the Temple (Part One). The narrative jumps ahead to Jesus' twelfth year. Continuing an annual custom of traveling to Jerusalem for the Passover, the family does so again, but when Jesus fails to appear among the company returning to Nazareth, Mary and Joseph finally locate him in the Temple, listening to the teachers and impressing them with his understanding. The point of the story becomes clear in the spirited exchange that ensues between Jesus and his mother. Already at age 12, Jesus knows who he is, and whose son he is. In response to the distress Mary voices for "your father and [me]," the son responds that his place is "in my Father's house" (lit., "among the things of my Father," vv. 48–49). Mary's incomprehension may seem puzzling; after all, Gabriel had told her that her son would be the Son of God and sit on David's throne (1:32–33, 35). Perhaps that message was more for Luke's audience than for the young girl Mary. In a real way, though, Mary models for readers a genuine faith that does not arrive fully formed but, taking note of the complexity of life in this world and grappling with the sometimes inscrutable, expectation-shattering activity of God, relentlessly seeks until it finds. In any case, the son begins to surpass his parents, yet returns home and remains an obedient son. Verse 52 repeats the refrain of 2:40, marking Jesus' growth in wisdom (already on display among the teachers in the Temple), and in favor both divine and human. When Luke's audience next observes him, he will be on the verge of assuming his vocation as Messiah, Son of God.

This is the first of two teaching sessions in the Jerusalem Temple. Luke will not narrate another visit by Jesus to Jerusalem and the Temple until the last week of his life. Then he will take possession of the Temple, making it the setting for his final teaching before his arrest (19:47–21:38). The teachers who greet him then will not judge his answers so kindly.

B. Preparation for the Ministry of the Messiah (3:1–4:13)

Fast-forward nearly two decades: John the baptizing prophet steps back into the story to begin his ministry. So the narrative preparation for Jesus' own career gains momentum.

3:1–20. John's Prophetic Ministry. The passage begins with a list of political leaders, notably the emperor Tiberius; the tetrarch of Galilee, Herod Antipas; the Roman governor of Judea, Pontius Pilate; and the high priestly duo of Annas and (his son-in-law) Caiaphas. By linking the prophet's call to the reign of particular rulers, and by employing the phrasing "the word of God came to John" (3:2), Luke recalls the prophetic books of the OT (e.g., Jer 1:2–3; Hos 1:1; Mic 1:1). The question again arises: How and with what outcome will political power and prophetic message authorized by God collide?

John receives his prophetic call while in the wilderness near the Jordan (where Jesus' messianic call will soon be validated) and conducts his ministry there. Through a purifying ritual bath in the river, John baptizes all who are willing to reorder their lives ("repent"), orienting commitments and actions toward the coming reign of God—a "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (3:3), thus fulfilling his father Zechariah's prophecy (1:77). John's message, drawing from Isa 40:3–5, pictures him as the wilderness herald who prepares the way of the Lord (cf. Luke 1:76), a way that extends salvation to all people. John joins Simeon as a prophetic witness to the universal scope of salvation.

Verses 7–14 expand John's proclamation, first with an urgent summons to repentance in view of imminent judgment, then through moral instruction that accents generous, just, and honest handling of material goods, anticipating a theme Jesus will develop in radical terms in his teaching (e.g., 12:13–21; 14:33; 16:13, 19–31; 18:18–30). Finally, John distinguishes his role from that of Messiah, the more powerful one still to come. Despite the austerity and urgent tenor of John's message, the narrator characterizes it as "good news" (or "gospel," v. 18). For John, and later for Jesus in Luke's Gospel, good news of salvation and moral seriousness are two sides of one coin.

Luke brings John's ministry to a sudden end, reporting his arrest by Herod Antipas. Such is the destiny of a prophet who not only admonishes soldiers but also dares to rebuke a powerful ruler (for Herod's decision to marry his brother's wife). This is the outcome of the first direct collision between prophet and "king" in Luke's story. Opposition to the agents of God's deliverance is real—and potent. Luke keeps the stage uncluttered; one character (John) exits the story before another (Jesus) takes his place (cf. 1:56 for a similar departure by Mary before Elizabeth gives birth to John). This narrative sequence reinforces the image of John as the precursor who goes before the Lord (Jesus) to prepare his way; their ministries do not overlap. Nevertheless, in a temporal flashback, one significant baptism remains to be narrated.

3:21–4:13. Jesus' Identity and Vocation: Baptism, Genealogy, and Testing. This section of the Gospel brings into focus the identity and vocation of Jesus as Messiah, Son of God. At his baptism he receives direct divine confirmation of his status as Son of God, and the Spirit anoints him for the work that lies ahead. Then a genealogy ascribes honor to Jesus as "son of Adam, son of God." Finally, Jesus demonstrates, against demonic opposition, his resolve to accept his vocation as Messiah, Son of God.

3:21–22. In the course of John's baptizing ministry, Jesus, too, received baptism—presumably by John, though this is only implicit. What matters is not John's role in the event (after all, Jesus is the "greater one" of the two) but heaven's. The Spirit of God (Holy Spirit) descends upon Jesus (tangibly, as a dove). Luke will not often mention the Spirit during the ministry of Jesus; however, a cluster of references at the outset (also 4:1, 14, 18) supplies the divine signature on Jesus' activity. He speaks and acts under the direction and empowerment of God's Spirit (cf. Acts 10:38). The Spirit is not alone in bearing witness to Jesus; a voice from heaven addresses Jesus: "You are my beloved Son; I take delight in you" (Luke 3:22; author's trans.). In God's authoritative voice, the baptism seals Jesus' identity as Son of God.

3:23–38. Genealogies serve various interests, including ascription of honor through recall of one's ancestors. Luke does this and more, as he presents a genealogy (substantially different from the one in Matt 1:1–17) that locates Jesus on a family tree that, proceeding backward in time, includes King David; patriarchs Judah, Jacob, and Abraham; and Adam, "son of God." By tracing Jesus' roots to Adam, Luke again affirms that Jesus brings God's salvation not only to Israel but also to all people (cf. 2:32; 3:6). Mention of Adam as "son of God" (3:38) prepares for resumption of the theme of Jesus' divine sonship, the implications of which will be probed in the next scene.

4:1–13. At Jesus' baptism, the divine voice marked Jesus as beloved Son of God, confirming Jesus' self-understanding and the Lukan audience's previous information, and God's Spirit came to rest upon Jesus. Yet neither knowledge of divine sonship nor anointing by the Holy Spirit sets Jesus on an easy path. In fact, the devil—chief enemy of God's purpose and architect of evil opposition to its accomplishment—seizes the opportunity to challenge Jesus' fidelity to his vocation as God's Son. (To dramatic effect, the narrative presents as a dialogue with an external entity what one might today describe as an internal struggle to discern and embrace God's will.)

Like Matt 4:1–11, Luke narrates a threefold test in which both the devil and Jesus appeal to Scripture (OT). The devil, with support from Ps 91:11–12, prods Jesus to tap divine power to make a splash in the world: (1) breaking his 40-day fast in the wilderness—replication in miniature of Israel's 40-year wilderness ordeal?—by turning stone into bread (Jesus will later speak of stones acclaiming God's royal Messiah, Luke 19:40); (2) seizing power over the nations (though at the cost of abandoning loyalty to God); and (3) claiming angelic protection from destruction at the Temple mount. Jesus counters this "scriptural paradigm" for his messianic vocation by appealing to texts from Deuteronomy (8:3; 6:13 and 10:20; 6:16): (1) not bread but God's word sustains (though Jesus will interpret reliance upon divine nourishment as a practice that calls for robust response to human hunger, Luke 9:10–17); (2) worship and loyalty are due God alone (from whom the Son of God does receive "the ends of the earth [as] your possession," according to Ps 2:8); and (3) not even God's Son should presume to place a demand upon God, inverting the testing scenario by putting God to the test. Jesus' ensuing ministry will reject the flashy, power-centered ministry urged by the devil, but neither he nor his followers will neglect the physical needs of people. Indeed, he will feed a large crowd and restore health to the sick. The focus is instead on the temptation to use power to serve self-interest. By the story's conclusion, Jesus' radical rejection of that approach will be evident. The one who saves others will not save himself from the cross, even if he does ask to be spared the ordeal (see 22:42; 23:35, 37, 39).

The unit closes on a foreboding note; the devil, though bested by Jesus, will at "an opportune time" again challenge Jesus' fidelity to his messianic vocation (4:13; cf. 22:3). For the time being, however, Jesus—Spirit-empowered, his mission in sharp focus—is ready to launch his ministry. Where better to begin than at home?

II. Ministry (4:14–19:27)

A. Galilean Ministry (4:14–9:50)

Luke blends the roles of prophet and Messiah as Jesus begins his ministry in Galilee. He makes a formal beginning in his hometown synagogue, an inaugural scene that defines the program of his ministry and previews its outcome. Jesus then moves from town to town, teaching, proclaiming the good news of God's reign, and embodying it in grace-filled acts of healing, forgiveness, and hospitality.

4:14–44. Jesus' Spirit-empowered Ministry Begins at Home, with Mixed Results. The same Spirit that came to Jesus at his baptism and sustained him through his wilderness ordeal now energizes an itinerant ministry in Galilee, and those who hear Jesus' teaching respond with praise. But he also provokes a hostile response in Nazareth, his childhood home. In a dramatic scene in the synagogue, Jesus reads from Scripture, selecting a passage from Isaiah (61:1–2a, but adding a line from Isa 58:6), and then claims that the Scripture "has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Luke 4:21).

With help from Isaiah, Jesus interprets the Spirit's (i.e., God's) action in his life (itself the result of the Spirit's work [1:35]). Jesus believes himself to be commissioned—indeed, anointed (echrisen, word-relative of "Christ") by the Spirit—to engage in a ministry that brings good news to the poor, liberates those who are bound, and restores sight to the blind, enacting the scriptural paradigm for the Spirit-anointed, God-commissioned Messiah. So the Spirit of God places its signature on Jesus' activity. The larger context of the verse Jesus draws from Isaiah 58 suggests the future directions of Jesus' ministry, including a bold critique of inauthentic Temple worship near the end of his life (Luke 19:45–46): No worship of God is genuine if it coincides with unjust actions, with neglect of the needs of the poor. Jesus will make their plight a central concern of his ministry.

The synagogue audience, though puzzled because they know Jesus to be only "Joseph's son" (partial truth, as readers recognize; cf. 2:48–49; 3:23), nevertheless receive gladly such hope-inspiring words. Surely this is good news for them, Jesus' own people (doctors take care of their own, right?). However, Jesus immediately challenges any such presumption; the good news he brings is for outsiders, not for his own people. After all, no prophet is accepted at home. Jesus illustrates the point by recalling episodes from the careers of Elijah and Elisha when they brought help not to people in need within Israel but to outsiders. The implication is twofold: Jesus, too, has a prophet's task, and it will shatter traditional barriers and transgress conventional boundaries, benefiting outsiders. Luke shows the direction the narrative will eventually take, including Gentiles in God's people (culminating in Acts 28:28). The scene previews the story's plot in another sense. Enraged by Jesus' words, the Nazareth audience seeks to put him to death, but without success, as his appointment with a prophet's destiny lies ahead at Jerusalem (cf. Luke 13:33–34). For the present, Jesus has more work to do among his people. How will nearby Capernaum respond to him?

As Jesus begins his career, his way of enacting Israel's salvation—hopes such as were celebrated in the speeches of Luke 1–2—indicates that the "smooth" way of salvation proceeds through conflict, role reversals (both vertical and horizontal), and radical revision of expectations. Mary's song and Simeon's oracle had it right. Status inversion (1:51–53) and the division of the people in response to the work of the Messiah (2:34–35) have begun.

Superficially, Capernaum (on the north shore of the Sea of Galilee), the next stop on Jesus' tour of Galilee, forms a stark contrast to Nazareth. Where Nazareth rejects, Capernaum enthusiastically accepts Jesus' ministry. After Jesus has taught with impressive authority, freed a man from debilitating demonic control and a woman (the mother-in-law of Simon, to be more fully introduced in ch. 5) from a high fever, and healed others of illness or demonic possession, the people of Capernaum attempt to keep him from leaving. Yet this response, too, is misguided. By claiming for itself the healing power of the Messiah, Capernaum would set itself against the purposes of God. Jesus answers with a mission statement: "I must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God to the other cities also" (v. 43). So Jesus departs, to continue his teaching mission elsewhere. Jesus actually returns to Capernaum in the very next chapter, but the last word on the town is one of judgment (10:15).

This passage highlights the activity of demons, especially their knowledge of Jesus' identity as "Holy One of God" (4:34) or "Son of God" (v. 41). Jesus silences their witness which, though accurate, is not helpful advocacy; 11:14–26 shows the potential for misinterpretation of his exorcisms. Nor is this the way in which Jesus seeks to invite authentic faith, which joins attentive listening and faithful obedience (e.g., 6:46–49; 8:19–21). Faith is more about how one lives, in grateful response to God's gracious work, than having the right label for Jesus. Clinical diagnosis today may employ categories other than demons and unclean spirits for the conditions from which Jesus restores such people, but the distortions of human well-being he attacks are familiar enough.

After the success of his activity in Capernaum, Jesus withdraws to pray and gains clarity about his mission, just as he had sought clarity of vocation in the desert following his baptism. This is the second time readers have observed Jesus at prayer (the first notice immediately preceded the divine voice at his baptism, 3:21). Jesus finds guidance for his work through prayer (6:12; 9:18, 28–29; 10:21–22; 11:1; 22:41–42; 23:34, 46), a distinctive feature of Luke's portrayal of Jesus, and a model for readers to emulate (11:1–4).

5:1–11. Jesus Begins to Gather Disciples. The focus of Jesus' ministry is clear: teaching; announcing the good news of God's saving reign, especially for the poor and marginalized; and restoring health. Now he begins to recruit followers to aid him. He will ask them to leave everything behind—home, family, occupation—to accompany him, forming a community of "disciples" (learners) to convey the same good news and receive empowerment to bring the same healing, first alongside him and then (in Acts) after him.

He begins with a fisherman, Simon (Peter), whose mother-in-law he has just healed, and who will emerge as chief among the apostles ("ones sent") in Acts. Simon does not strike an impressive pose at the moment of his call; aware of his failings, he responds to Jesus' teaching and an extraordinary catch of fish engineered by Jesus: "Go away from me, Lord, for I am a sinful man!" (5:8). Undeterred, Jesus summons Simon and his fishing partners, the brothers James and John, to a new fishing vocation, "catching people" (v. 10; i.e., for God's realm). Jesus will later define his mission as seeking and saving "sinners" like Simon (5:32; 19:10), so this first call to discipleship scripts an apt headline for the ministry to come. Leaving everything behind, as disciples in Luke are expected to do (5:28; 14:26, 33; 18:28), these recruits join Jesus' band.

5:12–6:11. Healing and Feasting—and Escalating Conflict. A series of episodes probes the connections between Jesus' religious practice (fasting, Sabbath observance, hospitality) and social conventions, as well as Mosaic law. Healing events frame the section, each developing the implications of Jesus' activity for religious practice and conviction. Throughout the narrative, Luke weaves together mutually interpreting words and actions of Jesus. The result is escalating conflict between Jesus and other teachers over both his authority and the interpretation of Scripture.

In the first episode (5:12–16), Jesus encounters a man afflicted with leprosy, a skin ailment (not identical to the disease called by that name today) that rendered him ritually unclean and gave him a socially marginal existence (see Lev 13–14). Jesus "touched" the man, and at his word "the leprosy left him" (Luke 5:13). Jesus sends the man to the priest to make an offering "as Moses commanded"; his ministry of healing does not conflict with the Torah (v. 14).

A second healing disrupts Jesus' teaching in the company of "Pharisees and teachers of the law" from every part of Palestine (5:17-26). When a paralyzed man is lowered into the room, Jesus, struck by this display of faith, says to him, "Friend, your sins are forgiven you" (v. 20)—an assertion that strikes observers as blasphemous, for only God can forgive sins. Jesus, discerning prophet that he is, reads their minds and responds by adding to the (weightier) declaration of forgiveness the (easier) command to walk, thus showcasing his authority as Son of Man to forgive. The man gives proof of his healing by carrying his bed home, filling the village streets with praise of God.

The passage links physical restoration and forgiveness but does not explain the man's physical condition as the result of sin. Nor does Jesus offer healing as a reward for faith, even if it is the bold faith of the man and his friends that opens up access to the gift of restored movement. On the theological point at issue: Jesus' declaration "your sins are forgiven you" employs a "divine passive"; God is the source of forgiveness, even if Jesus is its mediator. So the charge of blasphemy is wide of the mark. Jesus' authority to forgive derives from God. As Son of Man, a self-identifying image Jesus likely has drawn from Dan 7:13–14 (where "one like a human being" [lit., like a son of man] receives from God eternal dominion; cf. Luke 22:69), Jesus rightly exercises judgment—and mercy—on behalf of God.

Luke 5:27–39 develops the theme of forgiveness of sins as a central concern of Jesus' ministry. The call of the tax collector Levi—like other disciples in Luke, he abandons "everything," including his occupation, to follow Jesus—culminates in a festive banquet at Levi's home (he obviously did not relinquish all his possessions!). Pharisees and experts in Torah interpretation criticize the disciples' meal fellowship with "tax collectors and sinners." (Tax agents were widely regarded as dishonest and as disloyal collaborators with Rome; cf. 18:13; 19:7.) Jesus defends his social intimacy with religious outsiders, employing a medical metaphor: doctors treat sick people; Jesus calls sinners—to repentance (a reordered life, 5:32). This will be the focus of Jesus' mission, over the objections of the "righteous." With the image of repentance, the passage moves seamlessly into a discussion of fasting (often associated with repentance; note the fasting imagery in Isa 58:1–9, a passage echoed in Luke 4:18). Followers of both the Pharisees and John the Baptizer regularly engage in fasting and prayer, while Jesus' followers "eat and drink" (5:33). To a query prompted by these contrasting expressions of piety, Jesus replies with two parabolic images (fabric and wineskins) that picture the incompatibility of old and new, even if people still typically prefer the old. Jesus' teaching and embodiment of God's reign, while faithful to Scripture and to authentic Jewish religious practice, proves to be innovative, radical, and controversial (as previewed in 4:16–30). The present, in Jesus' view, is a time not for fasting and mourning but for festive joy that expresses communally an inclusive vision of God's realm. Fasting will be apt later, when the bridegroom is forcibly taken from the disciples—first foreshadowing by Jesus of his destiny (cf. 9:22, 44; 13:31–35; 18:31–33). Luke 7:31–35 will return to this contrast between John's austere discipline and the celebration that marks Jesus' practice of hospitality.

The religious practice of Sabbath keeping and the related matter of Torah interpretation come into view in the next two vignettes (6:1-11). Pharisees chastise Jesus' disciples for failing to keep the Sabbath when they pluck grain and eat (Exod 34:21 prohibits harvesting on the Sabbath). Although Jesus might have defended his disciples' behavior by appealing to Deut 23:25 (which distinguishes plucking from harvesting), he finds warrant instead in King David's emergency appropriation of sacred bread (1 Sam 21:1–6), thus setting up Jesus' own claim to sovereignty: "The Son of Man is lord of the Sabbath" (Luke 6:5). The next scene shows how Jesus chooses to exercise that sovereignty; not only hunger but also the need for healing justifies action on the Sabbath.

Luke 6:1-5 pictures Jesus' sovereign authority (as "lord") over the Sabbath, and he claims, with scriptural warrant, that genuine human need (such as hunger) should guide conduct on the Sabbath. In vv. 6-11, encountering a man with a physical disability (a "withered" hand), Jesus presses further. In such a case, fidelity to Torah requires one to act: "I ask you, is it lawful to do good or to do harm on the sabbath, to save life or to destroy it?" (v. 9). By refraining from action, one actually harms and therefore fails to keep the law. Not convinced by Jesus' interpretation, enraged observers debate what to do. Conflict intensifies, yet despite vigorous criticisms of Jesus' religious practice, his ministry is pictured as shaped by faithful interpretation of Scripture.

6:12–49. Jesus Names Twelve Apostles and Reveals the Character of Life in God's Realm. After an all-night prayer session on a mountain, Jesus commissions twelve disciples to be "apostles" ("ones sent"). The number twelve expresses symbolically that Jesus' ministry aims at Israel's restoration—all twelve tribes (cf. 22:30; Acts 1:15–26). Simon, to whom Jesus gives the name Peter, heads the list, and Judas Iscariot, "who became a traitor," comes last, both names prefiguring momentous events to come. The mountain setting is a prime location for reception of divine revelation, from Moses on Mount Sinai onward (see Exod 19–24, echoed in the Sermon on the Mount in Matt 5–7, a passage that parallels Luke's "Sermon on the Plain," 6:20–49). Having chosen twelve authorized agents to expand the scope of his ministry (9:1–6; cf. 10:1–12), Jesus shows a vast crowd what it means to be his disciple, and so reveals the content and character of the reign of God the apostles will represent in their mission on his behalf.

6:17–49. When a crowd assembles, Jesus gives his longest discourse so far, profiling the commitment to which he summons disciples (vv. 20–49). Beginning with grace notes, he pronounces the disciples "blessed" (implicitly, by God). What is the nature of their happy fortune? With four beatitudes (a more elaborate set of nine appears in Matt 5), Jesus pictures the radical role reversals in God's domain. The recipients of God's favor are those who are poor, hungry, weeping, and hated now, not those who enjoy good fortune—the wealthy, sated, laughing, and honored. With these contrasting beatitudes and woes, Jesus begins to enact in word the status inversion for which Mary's song praised God (Luke 1:51–53).

If God's salvation effects reversal of circumstance, what are the implications for human relationships? Jesus provides a concise sketch: (1) when met with hatred and harm, one should respond with love and compassionate mercy, modeled after God's own merciful character (6:27–36); (2) when facing another's failings, one should refrain from judging and instead forgive, aware of one's own failings (vv. 37–42). The discourse concludes with imagery that appeals for action embodying the message one has heard. As fruit indicates the quality of a tree, one's way of life indicates the character of the heart (vv. 43–45); hearing Jesus' word without performing it will only bring ruin (vv. 46–49). Having impeccable christology ("Lord, Lord") is no cover for disobedience—including disobedience expressed in a refusal to extend grace and mercy to others.

7:1–35. Jesus Restores Health and Life, Thereby Revealing His Identity. Another round of healing elicits a query from John the Baptizer regarding Jesus' identity and vocation, and both the narrator and Jesus then draw contrasting profiles of these two figures, and of the people's response to them.

7:1–10. For the first time, Jesus extends his ministry of healing to a Gentile household. Insideout reversal, already evident in Jesus' acceptance of "sinners," over the objection of Pharisees and specialists in Torah interpretation (5:27–32; cf. 5:8, 20), reaches a new level. After the pattern of Elisha (as previewed in 4:27), Jesus restores health in response to the request of a Gentile military officer, aided by others' mediation (cf. 2 Kgs 5:1–19). The Roman soldier, a centurion (head of a company of 100), is a curious blend of deferential humility and bold assertiveness. A person with authority himself, he acknowledges Jesus' power to heal, even at a distance; yet, realizing that he is not worthy to host Jesus under his roof, he sends two delegations to present his request to the "Lord." Like another centurion in Acts 10 (Cornelius), this soldier has close ties to the Jewish community (he even built the Capernaum synagogue). The point of the story is not the healing of the centurion's slave, though the narrator does report it; rather, Luke emphasizes the extraordinary faith of this Gentile: "[N]ot even in Israel," Jesus exclaims, "have I found such faith" (Luke 7:9). God's gracious favor comes to outsiders, even Gentiles, just as Jesus had said it would (4:25–27)—the first enactment of the prophecies voiced by Simeon (2:32) and John the Baptizer (3:6). Although Jesus will direct his ensuing ministry to Jewish communities (with the exception of 8:26–39), the encounter with this remarkable Gentile soldier gives a preview of the direction the story will take in Acts.

7:11–17. After the pattern of Elijah (as previewed in Luke 4:25–26), Jesus restores life to a widow's son (cf. 1 Kgs 17:17–24; also Elisha in 2 Kgs 4:32–37). The narrator reports Jesus' motive: compassion, a notice heightened by the mother's vulnerable position after losing both her husband and her only son. His method? A simple command to "rise." Impressed by the Messiah's prophetic ministry of teaching and healing, reminiscent of Elijah and Elisha, the people recognize God's gracious visitation (cf. 1:68) and acknowledge Jesus as the "prophet" through whom that grace has come to them. Word continues to spread, reaching even that other prophet, John, who languishes in Herod Antipas's prison.

7:18–23. John, the imprisoned prophet who was to "prepare the way" for Jesus, sends his own disciples with a question for the acclaimed prophet-healer: "Are you the one who is to come?" (7:20). Do Jesus' activities follow the script for the mighty one who would bring the decisive judgment John had announced as imminent (3:9, 17)? For confirmation of his identity and calling, Jesus points to his acts of healing, echoing Isa 35:4–6 with its images of the future restoration of the land ("when God comes to save you," Isa 35:4). A whirlwind tour with Jesus, the mighty healer, shows the arrival of the era of salvation—an indirect answer to John's query. But will John and other observers discern the moment as one of fulfillment, the year of God's favor? Jesus is indeed the Spirit-empowered herald of good news as he aids people in desperate need: "[B]lessed is anyone who takes no offense at me" (Luke 7:23).

7:24–35. After the departure of John's messengers, Jesus evaluates the people's response to John and himself. They were right to esteem the Baptizer as a prophet, yet he was even more—indeed, the end-time prophet who prepared for the Lord's coming (citing Mal 3:1 and recalling Luke 1:76). Still, John belongs to the time of preparation; the era of fulfillment in God's realm surpasses even his greatness (cf. 16:16–17). A narrator's aside interrupts Jesus' address to the crowd, observing the wedge John's ministry has driven between receptive crowds (including tax collectors) and resistant Pharisees and Torah experts. Jesus' ministry likewise divides the people between responsive sinners and righteous critics, as exemplified in the next episode (7:36–50). First, though, Jesus borrows an image from village life to clinch his point about a people dividing in response to God's emissaries, John the austere ascetic and Jesus the "friend of tax collectors and sinners" who enjoys a good feast. Like children who refuse to play a street game because they cannot agree on the rules (is it about dancing or mourning?), the people have no excuse for remaining uncommitted because John and Jesus are a study in contrasts; after all, God's wisdom merits acceptance when it appears in any of "her children," no matter how diverse.

7:36–8:3. Grateful Response of Several Women to Jesus' Benefaction: Role Reversal at a Pharisee's Home and Funding Jesus' Itinerant Ministry. Two prominent themes—divergent responses to Jesus' ministry and the inside-out status inversion it provokes—are spliced together in this scene, a dinner set at a Pharisee's home. This is the first of three such occasions, each surfacing conflict between host and guest (cf. 11:37–54; 14:1–24). A woman enters the house uninvited and in a gesture of shocking intimacy bathes, kisses, and anoints Jesus' feet. The impropriety of the woman's behavior prompts the Pharisee (Simon) to doubt Jesus' status as prophet: everyone knows she is a sinner, yet he lets her touch him. Jesus reads Simon's mind and answers with a parable and a rebuke, defending the woman and honoring her at the host's expense. Just as a person forgiven a larger debt shows greater love (i.e., gratitude) than one forgiven a smaller debt, so this woman's extravagant affection expresses the grace she has received (presumably in an earlier, untold encounter). The Pharisee host, by contrast, withholds even basic tokens of hospitality. Host and guest, righteous man and sinful woman, exchange places. Other dinner guests are left with the question, "Who is this who even forgives sins?" (v. 49). Who, indeed! The woman—a model of faith that receives the gift of mercy and responds with gratitude and love—enters the inside-out domain of God's grace, of salvation and peace, mediated by Jesus.

8:1–3. Jesus resumes his travels as herald of God's reign, the twelve apostles accompanying him, along with several women Jesus has restored to health. These women, including Mary Magdalene (liberated from seven demons), Joanna (married to Herod's property manager), and Susanna, cover the expenses of Jesus' itinerant band, thus exemplifying the hospitality and generous sharing of possessions to which Jesus summons all disciples (12:13–21, 33; 16:19–31; 18:18–25). Divine grace again elicits the human response of gratitude and generous service (cf. 4:39).

8:4–25. With Parable, Provocation, and Power, Jesus Forms a New Family Defined by Faith.

Jesus has already employed the teaching device of the parable, a brief fictional narrative that illuminates some aspect of life or God's realm (5:36–38; 7:41–42; cf. 6:39, 48–49). Beginning with 8:4–15, which presents and then interprets a parable commenting on Jesus' ministry of proclamation, parables become increasingly prominent, including several unique to Luke: a compassionate Samaritan (10:30–35), a rich fool (12:16–20), a widow's lost coin (15:8–10), a father and his two sons (15:11–32), a dishonest but savvy manager (16:1–8), a rich man and Lazarus (16:19–31), a widow and a judge (18:2–5), and a Pharisee and a tax collector (18:10–13).

An opening parable pictures a sower planting seeds in various soil conditions. Even if many seeds do not produce, a bountiful harvest is sure. Jesus appends an explanation of the purpose of parabolic teaching; presenting indirectly revelation ("mysteries") the disciples receive more directly, parables frustrate listeners' ability to perceive. Jesus then explains the parable of the sower as a symbolic narrative about diverse responses to the proclamation of God's word. Not hearing the word but enduring fidelity is the goal of Jesus' teaching (and later the disciples'), a point Jesus reinforces when he redefines his family as "those who hear the word of God and do it" (8:21). (Jesus' mother and brothers later appear in the company of the faithful, Acts 1:14.) Attentive listening to the word matters; Jesus does not intend to keep people from perceiving the word and work of God, despite the explanation of parables in vv. 9–10. Shifting to visual imagery, he affirms that what is temporarily hidden will eventually come to light. God's work of salvation seeks attentive listening and enduring commitment of life in response.

8:22–25. Life presents challenges to faith, as exemplified in a scene set on the lake. The disciples struggle to survive a menacing storm in their wave-tossed boat, while Jesus sleeps. Awakened by their cries of distress, he calms wind and wave and then asks, "Where is your faith?" (8:25). The amazed disciples wonder who can command even the forces of nature. The disciples are growing toward more perceptive faith—and understanding of Jesus' identity—but have a long way to go, much of that ground to be covered in the next chapter. This passage invites deep trust in God's care, even though endangered boats often do capsize (metaphor for all manner of perils) and people perish.

8:26–39. Life for a Tormented Tomb-dweller in Gentile Territory. A mood of awe and fear continues as Jesus' band is greeted across the lake by a demon-tormented man whose appearance (naked) and residence (among the tombs) show that he no longer lives within human community. Like others before him who were afflicted by malevolent spiritual beings, this man knows who Jesus is ("Son of the Most High God," 8:28; cf. 4:34, 41). Jesus has already commanded the spirit to depart, though further dialogue reveals that the man ("Legion") is actually in the grip of a demon army. The demons beg to be dispatched into a herd of pigs (this is Gentile territory), resulting in the animals' self-destruction; ironically, while seeking to avoid "the abyss," the demons drive the pigs off a cliff into the lake.

Contact with this kind of spiritual power is frightening. Loss of an entire herd is even more distressing, and the herders spread the news. Yet when all gather to see the spectacle, what terrifies is not the awesome power unleashed in the event but the sight of the man sitting—clothed, sanity restored—with Jesus. Among Gentiles, too, Jesus' ministry provokes divided response. The Gerasenes ask Jesus to depart, but the healed man desires to stay with him; Jesus asks him instead to tell in his own region what "God has done for you" (i.e., what God's agent of salvation, Jesus, "had done for him," v. 39)—another preview of the Gentile mission to be narrated in Acts.

8:40–56. Jesus Restores Health and Life to Two Women. Jesus returns to Galilee and enthusiastic crowds, only to be met by desperate pleas for the healing of two women, in a hybrid narrative Luke has adapted from Mark 5:21–43. First, a synagogue leader named Jairus requests the healer's intervention to save his dying daughter. Suspense builds when Jesus stops to deal with a woman in the crowd who has stealthily touched his clothing and found healing of her chronic bleeding condition; the disorder placed her in the socially marginal position of continual ritual impurity. The two women are twins of a sort, having in common their gender, need of healing, and the number 12 (the young woman is 12; the bleeding woman has suffered from her disorder for 12 years and spent all her resources seeking a remedy). Jesus commends the woman's faith and dismisses her in peace, but at that very moment word comes from Jairus's house that his daughter has died. Undeterred, Jesus urges stubborn, against-the-evidence trust, enters the girl's room, restores her to life, and instructs her parents to give her food and keep the event private. Jesus' ministry brings help to both a woman on the social margins and the child of a prominent leader—an inclusive, statustranscending community shaped by divine grace. The surprising appeal for silence at the story's end (reversing Jesus' command to "Legion" to tell his story, 8:39) is no blanket appeal for secrecy in mission, for in the next passage Jesus dispatches his twelve apostles to broadcast the ministry of healing and word far and wide.

9:1–9. The Twelve Extend Jesus' Ministry, and Herod Antipas Is Perplexed. The twelve disciples selected by Jesus as apostles (6:13) now receive their first missionary assignment. Jesus dispatches them to expand the sphere of his ministry, proclaiming God's reign and healing just as they have seen him do. He charges them to "[t]ake nothing for your journey," relying on the hospitality of a household within each village, and taking nothing with them (not even the dust of the street!) when they leave a place that does not welcome them (9:3–5).

When the Twelve take their good news in word and healing deed "everywhere" (v. 6), news reaches the tetrarch of Galilee, Herod (Antipas, a son of Herod the Great). Herod dismisses the speculation that this is the work of the baptizer John, raised from death (Luke's first notice of the previously imprisoned John's execution): "John I beheaded" (v. 9). While others maintain it is Elijah, whose return was anticipated before the last days (see 1:17; Mal 4:5), Herod muses: "Who is this?" (a query the disciples, too, posed in Luke 8:25). Given John's demise, the desire of Herod to see Jesus creates suspense, which will be sustained as the narrative unfolds (13:31; 23:6–12).

9:10–17. Jesus and the Twelve Feed a Large Crowd. The apostles report their activities to Jesus, and he attempts unsuccessfully to retreat with them. When large crowds follow, Jesus resumes speaking about God's realm and healing. At day's end, the Twelve are eager to dismiss the crowd to seek food and shelter, but Jesus directs them to provide nourishment instead, their meager resources notwithstanding. Jesus then "blessed and broke" the loaves and fish, acts that will gain ritual significance later in the story (22:19; 24:30; cf. Acts 27:35). Twelve baskets of left-over food, one for each apostle, show that by God's gracious provision, the generous sharing of resources is more than ample to meet the need of all God's people (whether five thousand or, with appreciation of the symbolic cast of the narrative, all twelve tribes).

9:18–27. Jesus Teaches Disciples About His Identity and Vocation of Suffering. Finally alone with the disciples, Jesus is praying again and seizes the opportunity to probe the disciples' grasp of the events they have been experiencing, and their developing interpretation of his identity and role. Pressing beyond the crowd's (partially correct) perception of him as a prophet (though he is not, as some think, John the Baptizer or Elijah; cf. 9:8), Peter brands Jesus "the Messiah of God" (v. 20). Despite the truth of the label, Jesus commands silence. Why? The next line supplies a hint, in a first unambiguous prediction of his coming suffering and death at the hands of the religious leaders—and subsequent resurrection vindication—as Son of Man. Jesus' messianic vocation embraces shame, suffering, and death. All who follow Jesus, moreover, should expect to share in his vocation, taking up their own cross each day; the temporal qualifier ("daily") indicates that the cross image works metaphorically. Seeking honor from God may mean accepting dishonor, even if not actual crucifixion, in one's social world. Nevertheless, the reality of death, whether real or metaphorical, cannot prevent the imminent appearance, even in a world hostile to God's purposes and messengers, of God's reign, at least for those with eyes to see it (cf. 17:20–21).

9:28–36. Heaven Confirms Jesus' Identity and Provides a Glimpse of His Future Exaltation. Confirmation of Jesus' teaching about his identity and vocation now comes from the most reliable source—God—in a setting that primes readers to expect divine revelation: Jesus at prayer on a mountain, with Peter, John, and James. Jesus' transformed appearance ("transfigured," revealing his heavenly glory), illustrious company (Moses and Elijah), and the topic of conversation (Jesus' coming departure—exodus—at Jerusalem) give the three disciples a behind-the-curtain glimpse of Jesus' glory in the realm of God, anticipatory fulfillment of Jesus' prophecy in 9:26–27. What the disciples cannot yet comprehend, Luke's audience is primed to discern. A voice from a cloud, traditional choreography of divine revelation, provides public endorsement of the private disclosure Jesus heard at his baptism: "This is my Son, my Chosen" (v. 35; cf. 3:22). The appended command, "[L]isten to him," echoing Deut 18:15–20, implies that Jesus is the "prophet like Moses" whom God promised to send (cf. Acts 3:22–23; 7:37). Jesus takes up in his own figure, for the decisive era of Israel's salvation, the roles of both Elijah and Moses, a point scored symbolically when the cloud's lifting reveals only Jesus. The "exodus" image suggests that Jesus' journey to Jerusalem—the focus of a long section in the center of Luke's Gospel (9:51–19:27)—is both an exit from life and a journey from wilderness testing to liberation.

9:37–50. Greatness Divine and Human: Vanquishing Demons and Rewriting the Scripts for the Messiah and His Loyal Followers. A mountain-top glimpse of glory gives only temporary reprieve from insistent crowds, including desperate pleas for help from the father of an only child tormented by a malevolent spirit, which even the disciples were unable to banish. Impatient with the faithlessness of his contemporaries, Jesus nevertheless frees the boy from the spirit—an outcome the narrator labels healing, signaling that for Luke diseases and demons are related expressions of disordered human life. Divine grace restores well-being: the enacted good news of God's reign in a world marked by evil. Such is the "greatness of God" (v. 43).

In 9:43b–50, Jesus again pictures his vocation as one of suffering, yet the disciples do not understand, a point the narrator makes emphatically, in three waves. (1) God is implicated, as Jesus' meaning is "concealed" from the disciples (the passive voice implies divine agency) and they are afraid to ask. Not until the disciples have experienced the shattering of their hopes in Jesus' crucifixion will their eyes be opened (24:13–35). (2) Disciples then debate among themselves: Which of them is the greatest? Such status-seeking is discordant with Jesus' vision of God's realm, which brings radical status inversion for both Messiah and people. So Jesus embraces a young child as a paradigm of greatness in God's realm, turning social convention upside down (cf. 18:15–17; 22:26). (3) The disciples win Jesus' rebuke for opposing competitors who are exorcising demons in Jesus' name but do not belong to his disciple team: "[W]hoever is not against you is for you" (9:50). What matters is not one's position inside or outside, but doing the work of God (cf. 6:46; 8:21).

B. Journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27)

Jesus begins a circuitous journey to Jerusalem, where his destiny lies. In alternating scenes, he nurtures the disciples' formation in faith, teaches crowds, and spars with other teachers who oppose his religious vision and its embodiment in practice.

9:51–62. Resistance to Jesus' Summons into God's Realm. Jesus makes a decisive turn, "set[ting] his face to go to Jerusalem" (v. 51). Jesus has been engaged in an itinerant ministry all along, but now the journey (however vague its markers of place and chronology) is defined by its destination. Like all other prophets, Jesus must face rejection in the holy city (13:33–35)—an exaggerated, yet symbolically and theologically profound affirmation. The disciples again show the dissonance between Jesus' vision and theirs. When advance messengers are rebuffed in a Samaritan village, James and John propose prayer for the town's destruction, and win Jesus' rebuke. The advocate of love of enemies (6:27–28) has no interest in violent reprisal, though he will return to the theme of divine judgment upon towns within Israel that have turned away from God's reign (10:13–15).

9:57–62. What does it mean to follow a Messiah who is determined (pun intended) to go to Jerusalem? Will Simeon's oracle ("a sign that will be opposed," 2:34) dominate the headlines? Repudiation by a Samaritan village supplied the first hint. The second follows swiftly, as Jesus encounters three potential followers. Discipleship en route to Jerusalem means (1) homelessness, (2) willingness to abandon sacred familial duties (burying a parent) to proclaim God's reign, and (3) uncompromising commitment to the hard work of God's realm, at the cost of loyalty to family. The response of these characters to Jesus' radical, countercultural demand goes unreported; it is up to Luke's audience to answer.

10:1–24. Mission in Expanding Circles, and Divided Response. To judge from Jesus' exchanges with three potential disciples at the end of ch. 9, the turn toward Jerusalem has heightened the mission's urgency. Jesus again enlarges the scope of his mission, increasing its stakes by terming it a "harvest" (stock image of end-time judgment, as John also knew, 3:17). Jesus sends out seventy-two disciples, in pairs—two witnesses are needed to offer credible testimony—to supplement the work of the apostles (in some manuscripts this team numbers 70). As in the earlier mission of the Twelve (9:1–6), the seventy-two are to announce the approach of God's reign and heal the sick. They are also to rely upon the hospitality of the villages they visit, eating whatever food is offered (laying aside kosher purity concerns). Yet they will also meet rejection (God's offer of salvation divides God's people, as Simeon prophesied), and that amounts to rejection of Jesus, God's agent of deliverance, and therefore of God—a recipe for judgment, even for Capernaum, so enthusiastic in its initial response to Jesus' activity.

When the seventy-two return celebrating their success in freeing people from demons (a far cry from the failure in 9:40), Jesus graphically depicts that success as the result—or indicator—of Satan's fall from heaven (cf. 11:14–26). No less important is the divine approval that embraces disciples ("names written in heaven," 10:20). That divine grace is to be found, and celebrated, in the most unexpected of places: not among the wise and powerful, but among babies; not among kings and prophets, but among disciples and those whose eyes they open. This is the mysterious working of God, who (not the devil, 4:6) has given Jesus authority.

10:25–42. Parable and Hospitality: Doing and Hearing the Word. Jesus' message has emphasized the dual necessity of attentive hearing and faithful doing of the word (e.g., 6:46–49; 8:21). The next two scenes reinforce this theme, highlighting first doing (10:25–37), then hearing (vv. 38–42).

10:25–37. A "lawyer" (specialist in interpretation of Torah) puts Jesus' practical wisdom to the test: "[W]hat must I do to inherit eternal life?" (v. 25). Jesus counters with a question of his own: What does the expert in the law find there? As Jesus does elsewhere in the Gospels (e.g., Mark 12:28–31), the man responds with a hybrid commandment. One who seeks enduring life must love God with one's whole being (citing Deut 6:5, a primary identity-shaping command for Jews) and also "love your neighbor as yourself" (citing Lev 19:18). Jesus commends the answer, which points to the source of real life—provided that people actually "do this" loving of God and neighbor.

Since the lawyer's motive was to test Jesus, he persists in interrogating, to "justify himself": Who is the neighbor one is directed to love? Selfjustification is not a practice Jesus commends (Luke 16:15), but he responds as if his conversation partner is earnest. The answer takes the form of a provocative parable featuring a man severely beaten while on the road that descended sharply from Jerusalem to Jericho, together with a trio of potential rescuers. For undisclosed reasons, two men whom readers would expect to offer aid—a priest and another with a priestly role in the Temple (a Levite)—continue on their way without stopping. Jesus springs a surprise when he introduces as the story's hero a Samaritan, whom Jewish listeners would be inclined to despise (cf. 9:52–54). The narrator details the compassion-prompted aid the Samaritan renders. Then Jesus subverts the lawyer's previous question, which had probed the limits in the obligation to love neighbors, with a counter-question: "Which of these three . . . was a neighbor to the man who fell into the hands of the robbers?" (v. 36). In Jesus' reframing of the matter under debate, "neighbor" is no longer the recipient of love but the way in which one lovingly engages others. Since a detested Samaritan is the one whose compassionate action must be emulated (even the lawyer admits as much), love not only of enemies (6:27) but from enemies expresses God's gracious will for human life. So the parable challenges conventional social maps and boundaries.

10:38–42. If the preceding passage accented compassionate action that embodied the divine purpose, Luke now balances the mandate to "do" with a summons to attentive listening. The model to be emulated is a woman, Mary, whose desire to attend to Jesus' teaching contrasts with her sister Martha's preoccupation with the tasks of hospitality for their guest. This vignette scores two points simultaneously: women are equal partners with men in the company of disciples (cf. 8:1–3), and to be a disciple means to hear Jesus' word, a necessary step on the way to performing it. Hospitality is important, too (e.g., 14:10–24), but attending to "the word" is crucial.

11:1–13. Jesus Models and Commends Persistent Prayer. The disciples, who have observed Jesus' practice of prayer and know that John taught his disciples to pray, ask Jesus to give them similar instruction. He provides a model prayer, which has formed faith and voiced the heart's deep need for two millennia. Luke presents the prayer in a more compact form than Matt 6:9–13. The prayer's first line accents the honor of God, the "Father" whose gracious provision calls for answering love and allegiance and forms the basis for the ensuing petitions for (1) realization of God's reign; (2) provision of needed nourishment; (3) forgiveness, as petitioners themselves forgive all debts owed them; and (4) protection from overwhelming testing. Though not a comprehensive enumeration of human need, this is a suggestive template for prayer that voices need, relying in trust on God's gracious care.

11:5–13. With multiple images, Jesus develops the basis for sustained practice of prayer: trust in a gracious God. In a culture that placed great stock in the values of hospitality, friendship, and public reputation (honor), even a reluctant neighbor, despite personal inconvenience, will get up at midnight and share bread at a friend's over-the-top, shameless request (not persistent, as rendered in the NRSV). God may be trusted much more to provide for the needs of God's people. Jesus reinforces the point with a series of sayings that commend active, persistent prayer. Good results from continual asking, seeking, and knocking (the nuance of the present-tense imperatives in vv. 9–10). What is the ground for such seeking? The grace of a loving God whose gifts to human beings transcend the good gifts even fallible human parents offer their children—above all, the Holy Spirit. This last line guards against the potentially damaging interpretation that God is a cosmic goods-dispenser at one's beck and call and that faith means expecting God to meet one's every request. Whatever the request, God provides the empowering divine presence that humans need. While Jesus assumes, in support of his appeal for trusting prayer in God, that even "evil" fathers routinely give their children good gifts, the reality is often harshly and harmfully different. The lesser-to-greater argument Jesus is making is that God's gracious kindness toward people surpasses human parents' care for their children.

11:14–36. Jesus Answers Critics of His Ministry of Liberation. Conflict with Jesus' critics had faded to the background but now resumes, with a new focus of debate: the source and meaning of Jesus' exorcisms. Observers accuse Jesus of casting out demons "by Beelzebul, the ruler of the demons" (v. 15), while others "test" him by pressing for a "sign from heaven" (v. 16; cf. 4:3, 9). Jesus answers his critics with a series of counter-assertions. (1) The charge that Jesus' exorcisms betray alliance with the prince of evil is absurd, for Satan would be undermining his own regime. (2) None level similar charges at other Jewish exorcists. (3) In decisive, positive terms, Jesus' exorcisms point to the presence of God's powerful reign (the "finger of God," 11:20 echoes Exod 8:19). Jesus adds interpretive commentary: he is overpowering Satan and releasing people bound by evil forces. Reversing an earlier generous statement (9:50), he then declares, in the context of heated debate about his ministry's character and source, that anyone who is not allied with him (hence with God's reign) is "against me" (11:23). So Jesus turns his opponents' criticisms on their head. The activity they ascribe to evil Jesus reframes as the operation of God's realm, defeating evil powers and bringing "release to the captives" (cf. 4:18).

Jesus concludes his defense of his ministry with an arresting image: removal of an oppressive, distorting reality needs to be accompanied by positive construction of a new reality. Otherwise, a banished demon will bring back to an empty home seven spirits "more evil than itself" (11:26). Attentive listeners who hear Jesus' words and do them (a theme repeated in the next paragraph), who participate with him in acts of compassion and hospitality, will have houses filled to overflowing with good.

11:27–36. Swelling crowds are not necessarily a positive sign. For a second time, Jesus castigates his contemporaries (cf. 9:41), this time for seeking signs (cf. 11:15) while refusing to embrace the reordered life ("repentance") to which prophetic signs point. Unlike the queen of Sheba (1 Kgs 10:1–13), they fail to discern the moment (cf. Luke 12:54–56), and unlike the people of ancient Nineveh (Jonah 3), they fail to repent at the word of God's prophet. Even a woman who pronounces Jesus' mother blessed (cf. Luke 1:42, 48) receives correction: "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and obey it" (11:28). Verses 33–36 add sight to sound, stressing the importance of clear vision. Luke 11:27–36 thus emphasizes the integrity of self that results from sound perception—hearing God's word and seeing clearly—and faithful action. Jesus, perceiving with prophetic clarity, realizes that the fidelity of enthusiastic crowds has yet to be tested.

11:37–54. Conflict at Table (Again): Jesus Turns Up the Heat on His Critics. For a second time, Jesus accepts a Pharisee's dinner invitation (cf. 7:36–50), and the meal again becomes the occasion for conflict. The host's astonishment that Jesus neglects to wash his hands—where is his concern with ritual purity?—elicits from Jesus a sharp critique of Pharisees' practice. Preoccupation with outer purity cannot cover over interior "greed and wickedness" (cf. 16:14). The external practice that does align with interior purity is generous giving to the poor ("almsgiving," 11:41). Jesus intensifies his critique of Pharisees' practice: they are careful to tithe when it comes to spices, yet "neglect justice and the love of God" (v. 42). Without cancelling the obligation to tithe, Jesus makes clear which claim on human obedience is primary. He also faults Pharisees for concern with public affirmation, and closes with a stinging, ironic rebuke for a group that prizes ritual purity: "[Y]ou are like unmarked graves, and people walk over them [becoming ritually impure] without realizing it" (v. 44).

Another meal guest, a teacher of the law, objects to Jesus' rebuke of Pharisees, feeling himself implicated, too, and Jesus turns up the heat. Teachers of the Torah weigh others down with burdensome obligations and withhold the beneficial knowledge they possess, even aligning themselves with ancestors who murdered the prophets. The long-standing clash attested in Israel's Scripture between divine servants and a resistant people will culminate in the response of "this generation" to "prophets and apostles" whom God sends. Eventually, violent repudiation of God's messengers will bring judgment.

The meal's aftermath is unsurprising; teachers whom Jesus has criticized reciprocate the hostility and seek opportunities to spring a verbal trap on him. In an era when polarizing conflict immobilizes church and political system alike and when it is easy to lob verbal missiles at others with whom one disagrees, it is imperative to temper the harsh polemic of this passage with Jesus' call elsewhere in Luke to "love enemies" and emulate God's mercy (e.g., 6:27–36). Nevertheless, people who hold power but "neglect justice" and mercy do deserve to be "called out."

12:1–12. Directions for Witness in the Face of Conflict. Despite enormous crowds, the road to Jerusalem will bring intensifying conflict, as Simeon predicted (2:34–35), and the apostles' later mission will immerse them in conflict as well (e.g., Acts 5, 7, 22). Jesus therefore begins the disciples' formation for witness in the face of conflict. First, he warns against hypocrisy—maintaining appearances, but allowing action to be out of sync with heart. What is hidden will come to light, and what is whispered in secret will become public.

Jesus urges courageous witness before hostile rulers, trusting in God's care ("even the hairs of your head are all counted," v. 7) and relying upon the empowerment of the Holy Spirit. Loyal witness will receive divine affirmation, even if that witness results in suffering and death (cf. 21:12–19), while those who deny the Son of Man "will be denied before the angels of God" (12:9). Yet forgiveness extends even to those who speak against the Son of Man—a good thing for Peter, for whom denial of his Lord will not be the last word (22:54–62).

If one slanders (NRSV, "blasphemes") the Holy Spirit, however, one is beyond hope, for one can no longer perceive the holy, powerful working of God as good. The cutting edge of these words is sharpened by the earlier repudiation of Jesus' acts of healing as demonic (11:14–23).

12:13–34. Teaching on Wealth and Well-being. Jesus often addresses the subject of wealth and poverty in Luke's Gospel, and does so in radical ways (already anticipated by Mary's song, 1:46–55). How will one whose mission delivers good news to the poor (4:18; cf. 6:20) and bad news to the rich (6:24) respond when asked to divide a family inheritance (a household scenario to which Jesus will return in 15:11–32)? In an ironic reversal of Moses' spurned mediation attempt in Exodus ("Who made you a ruler and judge over us?" Exod 2:14), Jesus refuses to mediate: "Who set me to be a judge or arbitrator over you?" (Luke 12:14). He warns against the greed he discerns in the request, which misses the truth that "life does not consist in the abundance of possessions" (v. 15). To illustrate, Jesus tells a parable about a rich man whose abundant harvest outpaced his storage capacity. Rather than share his good fortune—his food—with others, he tears down his barns and builds larger ones to "store all my grain and my goods" (v. 18) and ensure a life of comfort and security. All an illusion! What happens to his abundance if he dies that night? Jesus clinches the point:

preoccupation with treasure for self and wealth that honors God (and thus is shared with others; cf. vv. 33–34) are mutually exclusive.

12:22–34. Jesus now reinforces the lesson for his disciples. They should take their cue not from the anxiety-driven acquisitiveness people exhibit but from nature. One may trust in the gracious provision of God, who clothes flowers and nourishes birds and will certainly care for human children. Strive not for goods but for God's reign, Jesus urges, and God will provide what is needed; indeed, the loving "Father" to whom one prays (11:2, 13) will even make a gift of God's realm. This life freed from oppressive concern with possessions and security will grasp less and release more (for the benefit of the poor) and open up access to enduring treasure. In an age dominated by concerns with economic systems, financial security, and the quest to acquire goods or to maintain what one already possesses, Jesus' teaching in 12:22–34 is countercultural. He employs exaggeration, for one still needs to work to obtain food and clothing (birds work for food, too). Yet these words have a strange appeal, as they invite—while also challenging—readers to make God's concerns their primary commitment. Thus they may live by trust in God's generosity, and emulate it in their dealings with others, rather than by acquisitiveness that seeks to maintain self-advantage.

12:35–13:9. Instruction on Discerning the Moment. Jesus continues his project of (trans) forming disciples for God's realm, addressing first disciples (12:35–53) and then crowds (12:54–13:9) on the topic of discernment. How should one order life in the present moment, when God's reign is at hand?

12:35–53. Still speaking to disciples, Jesus shifts to a new topic: knowing what time it is and ordering life accordingly. Contrasting images picture the importance of vigilant preparation: (1) slaves are rewarded for remaining alert to open the door for their master at his late-night return from a wedding banquet; and (2) knowledge of the timing of a potential burglar's intrusion enables a homeowner to take preventive action. Just so, disciples must remain vigilant as they await the Son of Man's unpredictable arrival, first appearance of a motif that will become increasingly prominent: Jesus' future (post-Easter) return, or parousia (see 17:22–37; 21:27; cf. 19:11–27).

Peter presses for clarification: does Jesus intend this message for disciples or for a wider audience? Jesus explains the parable with another, this time featuring a household manager (steward) who supervises other slaves. A faithful manager stays on the job and treats his supervisees fairly, even if the master delays in returning. Those entrusted with greater responsibility are expected to produce accordingly. While everyone is called to be faithful in the time before the Lord's return, leaders of the community of disciples (e.g., apostles) bear special responsibility. Throughout the remainder of his ministry, Jesus will equip them to perform wisely their particular leadership role (carried out in Acts).

The apostles' leadership role involves more than relationships within the household (community of disciples), for the arrival of God's reign provokes intense opposition in the world. Elsewhere, Jesus speaks of his mission in terms of seeking and saving the lost (19:10; cf. 5:32; 15:1–32). In 12:49–53, he inscribes the other side of the coin: in a world that repudiates concern with people located on the social margins, Jesus came to kindle a blazing fire, to undergo a baptism (of death), and to bring division—even disrupting intimate household relationships, and so rewriting the script for the mission of John, the latter-day Elijah (cf. 1:7; Mal 4:6). From beginning to end, he restores God's people but also is a "sign that [is] opposed" (Luke 2:34). God's reign is countercultural, not least in its demand for commitment that transcends allegiance to family (cf. 9:59–62).

12:54–13:9. Jesus shifts attention to the crowds, summoning them, too, to wise discernment of the historical moment, and what it asks of them. They may be able to read the weather but they fail to read the times—the appearance of God's reign among them, liberating the oppressed, saving the lost, deposing evil powers, and fashioning a community marked by God's expansive grace (the "year of the Lord's favor," 4:19). What does such an extraordinary moment ask of God's people? They must recognize the present as the time for decisive action, whether setting things right with a legal adversary or reordering life to align with God's purposes ("repenting"). The misfortunes of others (e.g., worshipers killed by order of the brutal Roman governor Pontius Pilate and victims of a tower's collapse) do not result from their wickedness. But such disasters should prompt honest self-examination and reordering of one's commitments and actions; it would be foolish to presume that life will go on forever and that one can delay getting it right.

Jesus reinforces this appeal with another brief parable (unique to Luke) about a fig tree that fails to bear fruit. The owner is ready to chop it down, but when the farmer who tends the tree pleads to give it another year, he agrees. God, too, is patient and merciful, but now is the time to reorient life toward God's purposes. Next year the ax may be called into action. Jesus' message here recalls that of his predecessor John (3:9). There is no time like the present to discern well, and to act courageously, allowing one's life to be shaped by, and for, God's transformation of the world.

13:10–21. Sabbath Liberation for a Woman. For the second time, Jesus interrupts a synagogue teaching session on the Sabbath to heal a person (cf. 6:6–11), again inciting hostile response; the synagogue leader urges him to heal on the other six days (14:1–6 narrates a third healing controversy on the Sabbath). In his messianic ministry, though, Jesus liberates the oppressed—this woman's physical ailment is depicted as an eighteen-year binding by Satan—in a Jubilee year of release (4:18–19, 21) that knows no "sacred" day interruptions. Even farm animals are released from their stalls to get water on the Sabbath, so why not set this woman free? The contrasting reactions to the event speak volumes: the healed woman praises God and the crowd rejoices, while Jesus' critics are "put to shame" (v. 17). God's people are being restored, and at the same time divided, by Jesus' ministry.

With two compact parables (actually, similes), Jesus interprets the healing that has just occurred. It is God's reign in action, transforming human life. Often this happens in improbable ways, where the outcome belies insignificant or obscure beginnings. Imagine a tiny mustard seed growing into a tree that offers birds a home, or a woman adding a small amount of yeast to flour and so producing fully leavened bread. So it is with God's realm; the world is undergoing transformation, but only faith discerns it and praises God.

13:22–35. More Images of God's Reign: Reversal—and a Prophet's Destiny. Luke reminds readers of the goal of Jesus' journeying; mention of Jerusalem frames the unit, which highlights the inside-out reversal effected in God's realm and graphically pictures the destiny awaiting Jesus. Perhaps reacting to the growing hostility to Jesus' activity, someone from the crowd queries whether only a few would "be saved" (v. 23). With the image of difficult entrance through a "narrow door," Jesus confirms that many will fail to enter (i.e., the domain of God, or life), though he does not say that only a few will experience salvation. Undermining presumption of inclusion in God's realm, Jesus offers no guarantee for those who have known the Lord's presence or heard his teaching or even enjoyed meal fellowship with him, nor for those who belong to God's chosen people. God's realm belongs instead to outsiders, people from every corner of the earth, and those who are at the bottom ("last," v. 30). So the dramatic inside-out, upside-down reversal that marks God's realm is a matter of divine grace. Yet, as the warning to "all you evildoers" shows (v. 27), those who answer God's gracious welcome respond by both hearing and doing God's will. Intimate association with Jesus and affirmation of his status as Lord cannot replace living by the vision for human life that he advocates (cf. 6:46–49; 8:19–21).

Prophets whose words point to God's ways typically meet rejection, and Jesus entertains no illusion that he will fare differently. When Pharisees warn him of Herod's designs on his life, Jesus dismisses the notion, confident that his mission of healing has not run its course and that his prophet's date with death will come later, at Jerusalem. The holy city's penchant for violent rejection of God's messengers elicits from Jesus a lament for "your house" (i.e., Temple), left empty until he will be greeted with acclamations—but even then only as prelude to his crucifixion (see 19:38). The sword prophesied to pierce Mary's soul (2:35) now takes direct aim at her son's.

14:1–24. Table Talk Once More: Redrawing Social Maps in the Light of God's Reign. A third meal in a Pharisee's home provides the occasion for another Sabbath healing, this time of a man with dropsy (a condition marked by fluid retention and swelling, interpreted in that social world as evidence of greed). Posing questions before and after the healing, Jesus implies that healing on the Sabbath does not conflict with the Torah; this merciful rescue is no more problematic than the accepted action of lifting an ox or a child from a pit. His critics fall silent.

The behavior of status-conscious meal guests prompts Jesus to offer advice on meal practices, and then a parable, challenging conventional notions of honor. At a wedding banquet, one should "take the lowest place"; honor (public reputation)—a prized value in Jesus' culture—will be enhanced when the host invites one to take a position conveying greater honor. Indeed, in God's topsy-turvy world, the humble will receive greatest honor (a line repeated in 18:14; cf. 1:48, 51–53). Jesus then addresses the host. While it was customary to invite to a meal persons capable of reciprocating and thus enhancing one's honor, Jesus gives countercultural counsel: "[I]nvite the poor, the crippled, the lame, and the blind" (14:13). God, source of the only honor that matters, will be the one to reciprocate, granting a share in the "resurrection of the righteous" (v. 14). There is hope for persons with wealth, it seems, if they share generously with those in need, joining Jesus in "bring[ing] good news to the poor" (4:18; cf. 6:20; 7:22).

At mention of the "resurrection of the righteous," a dinner guest toasts the good fortune of those who "will eat bread in the kingdom of God" (14:15). Jesus responds with a parable challenging complacent assurance that one will have a place at that table. What happens when everyone who had accepted a dinner invitation requests, at the last minute, to be excused? The host fills the hall, drawing guests from the "poor, the crippled, the blind, and the lame" and even outsiders to the village, effectively excluding those originally invited. One would only miss the greatest party in town, opting instead to tend to routine business, because one has failed to discern the moment (cf. 12:54–59). This parable depicts God's realm as a domain of grace, where all sorts of people find welcome and nourishment. But one does need to accept the invitation.

14:25–35. The Cost of Following Jesus. All is not festive banquets in Jesus' company. With the crowds swelling, Jesus issues a sharp warning; one must become a disciple with eyes wide open, counting the cost. As a wise builder does not start a major project without sufficient funds and a king does not start a war if he lacks the forces needed to win, potential disciples should consider the demands of that vocation: placing commitment to God's realm above all else, even allegiance to family (the practical meaning of the insistence that one "hate" family [v. 26]); bearing a cross (cf. 9:23); and surrendering possessions (generously sharing with those in need). God's realm is marked by radical grace, but no less by radical, costly discipleship.

Luke appends obscure sayings about salt. Disciples are worth their salt only when they actually perform the job to which they have been recruited—announcing and embodying in actions and relationships the good news of God's reign.

15:1–32. Invitation to Party: Three Parables Interpreting Jesus' Ministry to the Lost. Jesus' ministry, including the intimacy of shared meals, again provokes criticism. Defending his embrace of sinners, Jesus offers three parables that picture God's gracious acceptance of those who are "lost." First, heaven's delight at the restoration of a sinner is like that of a shepherd who (improbably) abandons ninety-nine sheep to locate one that is lost and throws a party to celebrate its rescue. The implication is that Jesus risks alienating the righteous in order to restore hope to those who have lost their way. Pairing the shepherd with a woman who has lost one of her ten coins, Jesus repeats his affirmation of God's gracious care for the lost. The third parable, the longest extant parable of Jesus, initially follows the structure of the first two. A lost son is welcomed (though not sought) by his father, who invites the whole village to celebrate his return. The parable of the prodigal (extravagantly forgiving) father departs from the preceding pattern—and gives voice to the complaint of the righteous against Jesus' acceptance of sinners even before they have tangibly demonstrated their repentance, in the role played by the dutiful older son. The last part of the story narrates his understandable protest against his father's excessive mercy toward "this son of yours" (v. 30) and the father's plea to him to join the party to welcome "this brother of yours" (v. 32). Jesus' audience is left wondering what the older son will do, and Luke's audience ponders the response of Pharisees to Jesus' invitation. He welcomes sinners, yet has no desire to exclude the righteous. However, they have a decision to make.

16:1–31. Wisdom and Integrity in Use of Wealth. Jesus shifts attention from Pharisees back to disciples, though Pharisees remain interested, if skeptical, listeners. Chapter 16 probes wise use of material resources, expressing fidelity to God's ways as revealed in Scripture.

16:1–13. An enigmatic parable features a manager who engages in questionable business practices, and Luke appends brief sayings on faithful use of wealth that tame the difficult parable. Fired for "squandering [a rich man's] property" (v. 1), his business manager concocts a shrewd survival plan. By reducing the amounts owed by the rich man's debtors, the manager ("steward") ensures that he will receive a friendly welcome, if not employment, in their homes. The rich man, his hands tied by the manager's generosity, on his behalf, toward the debtors—he would not dare to reinstate the forgiven debts, thus forfeiting honor in the community—can only commend his cunning former manager. Ironically, the manager wins his master's praise by doing what got him fired, squandering the rich man's property.

The parable plays with a prominent Lukan concern, responsible use of material resources, but its message is elusive. Evidently Luke found the parable difficult; the following sayings counter the notion that Jesus is commending dishonesty as a business practice. Far from it, to judge from vv. 8b–13. Only persons who handle money honestly will have anything of value entrusted to them. Indeed, allegiance to money and allegiance to God are fundamentally conflicting values (v. 13). Verses 8b–9 spin the parable's plot in a more positive direction: God's people ("children of light") must be wise just like the manager, making "friends" by using "unrighteous wealth" (author's trans.)—sharing generously with the poor.

16:14–31. Pharisees who overhear the assertion that service to God is incompatible with service to wealth mock Jesus, prompting him to affirm the law's enduring validity, then tell a parable that connects the claim of the law to wise use of possessions. First, Jesus redirects the quest for honor from a human public to God and declares that the claim of God's law remains even in the new reality of God's realm inaugurated by John the Baptizer, illustrating that claim with a difficult saying about divorce and remarriage (v. 18; though the statement goes beyond what Mosaic law says about divorce; see Deut 24:1–4).

Then, countering the Pharisees' dismissal of his teaching about wealth, Jesus tells a parable that enacts the role reversal announced by Mary's song (Luke 1:53) and his earlier pronouncement of blessing for the poor and woe for the rich (6:20, 24). A destitute man named Lazarus unsuccessfully begs for food, day after day, at a rich man's gate, but when they die, their roles are reversed. Lazarus enjoys the company of the patriarch Abraham (cf. 13:28–30), while the rich man suffers torment. The last movement of the parable returns to the theme of the law's enduring validity. If the rich man's brothers do not practice what both law and prophets teach about right use of wealth, even the message of one raised from death will have no impact. The realm of God, including resurrection, does not nullify God's claim on human obedience, as expressed in law and prophets alike. Jesus did not invent the call to generous sharing of resources with the poor; it is a profound biblical theme. He does, however, give the theme radical expression as he embodies God's upsidedown realm: "Blessed are you who are poor But woe to you who are rich, for you have received your consolation" (6:20, 24).

17:1–19. Images of Grace, Faithful Service, and Boundary-transgressing Gratitude. Jesus turns his attention to the disciples, accenting forgiveness, faith, and service. First, a dose of realism: mistakes that cause others difficulty are inevitable, but that does not lessen accountability, especially when it is "one of these little ones" (presumably a child) who is affected (vv. 1–2; cf. 9:47–48; 18:15–17). Those who do wrong are accountable and must reorder life, but disciples are also to forgive, and forgive again. Forgiveness is difficult, however, so the disciples ask to have their capacity for faith expanded. With hyperbole—the image of mustard-seed faith planting a tree in the sea—Jesus replies that the disciples have enough faith but need to exercise it. And faith and service go hand in hand; disciples may rely, but not presume, on divine grace. Jesus later reverses the image, picturing himself serving the disciples at table—but to inspire, not cancel, their own humble service toward others (22:27).

17:11–19. Life-transforming faith is not the disciples' exclusive property. On the route to Jerusalem (aptly in a liminal space "between Samaria and Galilee," v. 11), Jesus encounters ten lepers who seek healing. When he sends them to the priests (to attest their restoration to purity) and they find themselves made clean, only one—a Samaritan—returns, praising God, to thank Jesus. Astonished that "this foreigner" alone modeled grateful praise of God, Jesus comments that his "faith has made [him] well," v. 19). God's saving work continues to turn the social world—and the domain of faith—inside out. Outsiders receive welcome into God's realm.

17:20–18:8. Authentic Faith(fulness) When God's Reign Delays. God's reign is already evident in Jesus' ministry, which proclaims good news and embodies salvation for all who are open, in faith, to receiving it. Nevertheless, full realization of God's purposes for the world remains a matter of hope. This section of the Gospel highlights the tension between present and future expressions of God's realm, and its implications for human faith.

17:20–37. Pharisees, who share with Jesus an expectation of God's coming rule (including resurrection; see 20:27–40; Acts 23:6–9), query him about its timing. In reply, Jesus affirms God's reign as present, though unrecognized. Those who cannot discern God at work now will not be helped by the enumeration of signs for which to watch. However, Jesus provides disciples a more specific scenario for the coming of the Son of Man, an event associated with the future expression of God's reign. Life and history will test faith, for the completion of God's purposes, symbolized by the glorious arrival of the Son of Man, will not occur promptly and will be preceded by his suffering and death. During a time of waiting, routine activities of life will take over, so that on "the day that the Son of Man is revealed" (v. 30), vigilance will be a challenge, as it was for the contemporaries of Noah and Lot. The ensuing images continue a tone of urgency and crisis for both life and faith. When "the day" comes, one should not retrieve possessions, return home, or hold securely onto life. The unstated positive appeal is to entrust one's future entirely to God. So humanity will be divided, with one of a pair taken and the other left, and those left behind will inhabit a world marked by the reality of death (v. 37). The path to divine glory passes through suffering and death (cf. 24:26). In a world, and a future, such as this, will faith persist?

18:1–8. Jesus adds a parable that affirms the importance—and challenge—of trusting faith in a world where realization of God's rule delays. A widow's quest for justice must overcome not only her legal adversary but also the inaction of a contemptuous judge who should have respected her vulnerable situation. Her persistent demands for justice wear down the judge, and out of his own self-interest he finally vindicates her. If such a judge will deliver justice, how much more may people of faith trust in God for vindication! Nevertheless, lived experience and ongoing historical struggles will test faith and lead to discouragement, so that one must persist in trusting prayer. Only so will faith endure until the coming of the Son of Man.

18:9–30. Status Inversion in God's Realm. A parable, an object lesson on the character of God's realm, and a dialogue with a man on a religious quest highlight the reversals of role and status in Jesus' ministry.

18:9–14. Despite heated debates between Jesus and Pharisees (5:17–6:11; 7:36–50; 11:37–54; 14:1–24; 15:1–2; 16:14–15), his audience would perceive Pharisees as models of piety, religiously and morally serious people who seek to be faithful to God's will as revealed in Torah. Tax collectors, by contrast, would be viewed as models of sinfulness, disloyal and dishonest. Yet Jesus tells a parable in which a tax collector's humble plea for mercy, not a Pharisee's confident prayer of gratitude for his impeccable faithfulness, is heard; it is the sinner who leaves Temple worship "justified" (vindicated by God). The narrator's description of the parable's audience and Jesus' clinching statement of its point leave little to speculation. Role reversal in God's dominion is both horizontal and vertical. (1) Only God's assessment of righteousness (or sinfulness) matters, and sinners who accept God's gracious forgiveness, not righteous Pharisees who protest, have inside position. So with this parable, Jesus again explains and defends his embrace of sinners. (2) God's realm honors the lowly and humble, and demotes the self-important. The next two vignettes further develop this latter, upsidedown reversal.

18:15–30. For a second time, Jesus presents children as exemplars of God's work in the world (cf. 9:46–48). Disciples obstruct babies' access to Jesus (evidently having forgotten Jesus' warning in 17:2!), but he welcomes the children and affirms them, low in status, as model participants in God's realm.

A wealthy "ruler," who enjoys status children lack, brings his quest for "eternal life" to Jesus. If children are paradigm-setters for God's reign, what place will a member of the social elite have? Jesus points him to a sampling of the Ten Commandments, which the man has faithfully kept. The enduring life of God's realm is defined by grace, to be sure, but it also means doing God's will (cf. 8:21; 10:25–28; 16:16–17). However, an obstacle still blocks the man's quest. Jesus challenges him to divest himself of wealth to benefit the poor, and to become a disciple. Unable to abandon his wealth, he departs with resigned sorrow, prompting Jesus to comment on the impossible possibility of wealthy people entering God's realm. What human beings cannot accomplish, however (camels navigating needles?), God is able to do, as readers soon discover (19:1–10). Unlike the rich ruler, Peter remarks, disciples have left everything, including home and family, to follow Jesus; indeed, they will have their reward both now and in the life that is still to come.

18:31–19:27. Images and Acts of Salvation near Jerusalem: Divergent Responses to God's Realm. As Jesus approaches Jerusalem, a preview of coming danger collides with images of salvation. With a last parable before entering the holy city, Jesus interprets the divergent responses attending his ministry as bearer of God's rule.

18:31–34. Disciples are not the only ones called to sacrifice for God's realm. For a fourth time, and in vivid detail (including mention of Gentile participants), Jesus explicitly announces his coming suffering and death—fulfilling prophetic Scriptures (cf. 9:22, 44; 17:25). Still, the disciples fail to understand (cf. 9:45). Such a horrific outcome to the Messiah's career defies comprehension.

18:35–43. Ironically, a blind beggar perceives more clearly. Despite the crowd's efforts to silence him, he petitions the "Son of David" for mercy, and Jesus delivers: "Receive your sight; your faith has saved you" (v. 42; or "made you well," as in 7:50; 17:19). Salvation is evident in the gift of sight, but even more in the man's response. He "sees" what God's grace has provided and follows Jesus, his praise of God inspiring praise from "all the people." Sight and salvation, discipleship and praise: positive images of God's reign accumulate on the eve of Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem.

19:1–10. Inside-out reversal that typifies salvation recurs when Jesus encounters a wealthy "chief tax collector," Zacchaeus, in Jericho. The diminutive tax collector finds himself up a tree attempting to see Jesus, who calls him down and insists on staying with him. The crowd, picking up the Pharisees' refrain, grumbles at Jesus' intimacy with a notorious sinner. Yet the social transaction at Zacchaeus's home reveals that "[t]oday salvation has come to this house" (19:9), to a child of Abraham whose membership in God's people is not forfeited by conspicuous wealth (contrast the misfortune of another child of Abraham in 16:24–30), social marginality, or dishonest business practices. Disqualifying wealth is no hindrance for Zacchaeus's entry into life, as the head of local taxation pledges to compensate people he has cheated and to give half his wealth to the poor—another image of salvation, a life transformed in response to Jesus' acceptance.

19:11–27. Arrival at Jerusalem, just after mention of the presence of salvation "today" at Zacchaeus's home, triggers hope that God's realm is imminent. Jesus counters this expectation with a parable explaining that the Messiah, Israel's rightful ruler, will receive royal honors only after his people have rejected him. In Jerusalem, not the realm of God but crucifixion awaits.

Luke stitches this royal claimant sub-plot to a parable that describes the varying success of investments made by the ruler-in-waiting's slaves during his absence. Only those who risk letting the money go (as they do business) prove obedient to their master and win his praise—and a share in his political power (authority over cities). The slave who banked on security, keeping the money safe and returning it without profit, loses everything. Discipleship, like Messiahship, exposes one to risk; those who play it safe will find themselves left out of the Messiah's grace-filled, power-sharing dominion. This parable advocates courageous, faithful service; the followers Jesus leaves behind to continue his mission are accountable for what they do with what he has entrusted to them.

III. The Final Days (19:28–25:53)

A. Climactic Teaching Ministry in Jerusalem (19:28–21:38)

Jesus finally reaches the holy city, goal of his journeys since 9:51, and teaches in the Temple. As before, his activity evokes sharply divergent responses, but now the stakes are higher; the power-wielding elite in Jerusalem look for a way to eliminate him.

19:28–44. Divine Visitation Welcomed and Resisted. Jesus prepares to enter Jerusalem, descending from the Mount of Olives. He sees to the choreography himself, arranging suitable transportation, a colt fit for a king (as in Zech 9:9). As he rides in triumph into the city, the "multitude of the disciples" shout God's praises: "Blessed is the king who comes in the name of the Lord! Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest heaven!" (Luke 19:38). Although this acclamation recalls the angelic chorus after Jesus' birth (2:14), the relocation of peace from earth to heaven is striking. Divine visitation, with its offer of peace, will go unrecognized by Jerusalem. The Pharisees, in their final appearance in the Gospel, seek to silence the disciples' acclamation of Jesus as king (cf. 13:35). Then, delivering another prophetic oracle, Jesus laments the holy city's repudiation of God's visitation to grant peace, and foresees enemy forces surrounding the city (an image to which Jesus will return in 21:20–24). Israel's Messiah approaches his destiny, one that defies expectation—except his own, informed by his reading of Israel's Scriptures (9:22, 44; 17:25; 18:31–33; cf. 24:26–27, 44–46).

19:45–21:4. Jesus, Son of God, Among the Teachers in the Temple (Part Two). Jesus' culminating activity as teacher reprises his session with the teachers in the Temple as a youth (2:46–49). First, he reclaims the Temple for its intended purpose, expelling merchants from a sacred space that had been converted from a "house of prayer" to a "den of robbers" (drawing phrasing from Isa 56:7; Jer 7:11). Jesus then teaches each day in the Temple, his message driving a wedge between a receptive people and their leaders (including the priests who manage the Temple system), who want him dead. This power bloc sends a delegation to challenge Jesus' authority. He counters with a question: Was the prophet John's legitimation human or divine in origin? Realizing the trap Jesus has set (the same divide between receptive people and resistant elite resulted from John's ministry), the leaders confess their ignorance and Jesus refuses to answer their query.

He then tells the people a parable about a group of tenants who treat agents of their absentee landlord contemptuously and murder the owner's son, having taken designs on the land themselves. The allegorical cast of the parable is obvious: the owner of this vineyard (symbol of the nation, in its unjust practices, Isa 5:1–7) has a "beloved son" who is killed outside the vineyard. With this parable, Jesus interprets his rejection by leaders of his people and anticipates the divine judgment to follow. Acts 3–5 will begin to tell the story of this transfer of leadership over the vineyard (Israel) from one set of tenants (the Jerusalem elite) to another (the apostles). Even now, however, the powerful elite grasp the point. The parable challenges their authority, yet fear of the people prevents their moving against him, momentarily. Jesus places his rejection by the elite in scriptural context, picturing a stone rejected by builders as a cornerstone (tapping Isa 8:14–15). The Temple, whose stones will become a heap of ruins (Luke 21:5–6), must yield to a rejected stone that brings to ruin all who fall against it. So the crucified Messiah, bearer of salvation to God's people, remains a "sign opposed," resulting in the "falling and the rising of many in Israel" (2:34).

The elite priests and scribes next send "spies" to secure grounds for accusation of Jesus before the Roman governor. What better tack than to force Jesus to take a public stand on the unpopular obligation to pay taxes to Rome? Not to be outwitted, Jesus points to a coin sporting the image of the emperor. The conclusion seems unavoidable: "Pay to the emperor what belongs to the emperor [no basis for a charge of treason here], and to God what belongs to God [the claims of God trump any human authority]" (20:25, author's trans.; cf. Acts 5:29). Jesus' adversaries, still thwarted by the people, depart in silence.

Sadducees then ask Jesus about resurrection, a notion this elite priestly group does not affirm because the books of Moses lack explicit attestation (cf. Acts 23:6–10). The Sadducees ridicule resurrection belief through a reductio ad absurdum: In the resurrection life, who will be the husband of a woman married successively to seven brothers? Jesus' reply pictures marriage as a matter for this life, not the afterlife, and presents the message Moses heard at the burning bush—"God of Abraham . . . Isaac, and . . . Jacob"—in support of resurrection faith. God is God of the (perpetually) living (Luke 20:37–38). Scribes overhearing the exchange commend Jesus' answer, and the flurry of questions ends. However, Jesus has some barbs of his own to offer.

For Luke, David is Jesus' ancestor (1:32; cf. 2:4; 3:31), though his divine sonship is of greater import (1:32, 35; cf. 3:22; 9:35). Jesus now questions the tradition that the Messiah is "David's son" (20:41). If, according to Ps 110:1, King David called the Messiah "Lord," how can David's Lord—of superior status—be his son, lower in status? The argument is not about Davidic ancestry (which the narrative affirms) but Jesus' status as God's anointed ruler. It is through God's raising of Jesus from death that David's descendant comes to receive honor as Lord (asserted in Acts 2:29–36).

Jesus next cautions disciples (with "all the people" overhearing [Luke 20:45]) against conventional practices for seeking honor. Socially elite scribes who covet public reputation and construct a façade of piety while "devour[ing] widows' houses" win no approval from God (vv. 46–48). Jesus again presses his point about role reversal when he observes rich people placing their gifts into the Temple treasury, while a widow deposits two small coins. Her gift exceeds in value their much larger donations, the generosity of the poor outstripping that of the wealthy. Following the critique of 20:47 ("condemnation" for those who "devour widows' houses"), a widow's praise turns into Jesus' prophetic indictment of the Temple system's exploitation of the poor.

21:5–38. Words of Judgment and Hope for Disciples. The Temple, site of Jesus' final public teaching, was impressive—and headed for ruin. Jesus presents a discourse about "last things," forecasting the destruction to befall Jerusalem and Temple, and summoning hearers to persevering trust in divine vindication.

Despite natural catastrophe and international strife, the end of history will delay, even if prophets announce its imminent arrival. An era of intense crisis will test faith but also afford opportunity for witness before religious and political powers, with assurance of divine guidance and protection (prophecy fulfilled in Acts). When Roman armies surround Jerusalem, the demise of city and Temple is imminent, and listeners should keep their distance. Gentile subjugation of the holy city will be temporary, but devastating. Finally, after Jerusalem's fall (which lies in the past [70 CE] for Luke's audience), cosmic portents will anticipate the glorious return of the Son of Man, which brings liberation for the faithful.

As the appearance of leaves on fig trees signals summer's approach, these dramatic events prefigure God's realm. Already present and, by anticipation, enacted in Jesus' ministry, God's reign will decisively transform the world—a basis for confident hope for Luke's audience. Even if the universe disappears, Jesus' word is reliable. He calls for enduring trust, vigilance, and faithfulness through time of crisis, until time itself runs out. The narrator follows this discourse about last things with the image of Jesus teaching the people each day in the Temple and resting each night on the Mount of Olives. Suspense continues to build; with enraptured people and enraged leaders, when will the prophet-Messiah who has predicted the Temple's destruction meet his destiny in the city where God's prophets perish (13:33–34)?

B. Ministry During the Passion (22:1–23:56)

Jesus has concluded his public teaching, but not before deepening the divide between people drawn to his message and the elite who reject his legitimacy as a divine agent. As Passover approaches, conflict intensifies and events move quickly toward the end Jesus has forecast.

22:1–38. A Final Passover Meal. The Passover festival brought thousands of pilgrims to Jerusalem each spring. This year's Passover, memorializing God's exodus liberation of the people (Exod 12), will bring liberation—through the death of a first-born son (of God) who is himself the agent of deliverance. Elite priests and scribes, bested by Jesus in debate, gain an unlikely ally, an intimate associate of Jesus. Judas Iscariot strikes a deal with the Temple authorities to hand Jesus to them at a time when the sympathetic crowds are not present. Luke's explanation—"Satan entered into Judas" (22:3)—signals that the arch-enemy of God's purposes has renewed his fierce testing of Jesus' fidelity (cf. 4:13).

Jesus seizes the initiative, arranging a last meal with his disciples and delivering a farewell discourse that encourages and warns the disciples whom Jesus leaves behind. Jesus refrains from eating and drinking at this, his last meal, vowing to abstain until the banquet in God's realm. He offers bread and cup to the disciples, symbol of his body and life-blood, given for their benefit. Luke's words about bread and cup are distinctive, with repeating parallelism: eating (vv. 15–16)—cup (vv. 17–18)—bread (v. 19)—cup (v. 20). (This unusual pattern confused copyists, whose reworking of the text left its exact shape uncertain; some manuscripts omit all or part of vv. 19b–20, thus lacking the interpretation of the cup as "the new covenant in my blood," v. 20.) Meals in Jesus' ministry extended hospitality, especially to sinners and those of low status, and were characterized by joy. However, this is not another festive meal, nor one that enacts God's realm (cf. 14:15–24), but a somber leave-taking that enacts betrayal by a friend, whose identity remains hidden from the disciples, though not the reader (6:16; 22:3–6).

Having just heard that one of their number would betray Jesus, the disciples argue about who is greatest, as if Jesus had not repeatedly pictured God's household subverting conventional statusseeking. So he repeats the point: not the powerful are great but the youngest, those who serve—with Jesus himself the model to emulate.

Despite their failure to comprehend basic values of God's realm, the disciples win Jesus' commendation for their loyalty. He invites them to share in his rule over Israel; they will join him at festive meals in God's realm but also in his rule over the twelve tribes (a pledge that begins to be realized in Acts 3–5).

Jesus then singles out Simon Peter. Satan's malevolent designs on disciples notwithstanding, Jesus has prayed for Peter's perseverance in faith, yet he urges Peter to encourage the rest when he has "turned back," implying his failure, too. Peter protests that his commitment to Jesus will extend to prison and even death, bravado that earns a swift rebuke. Before dawn, Peter will three times have denied knowing his Lord. However, danger to life and loyalty awaits other disciples, too. For the peril that lies ahead, Jesus reverses his mission directive to travel light and rely on strangers' hospitality (cf. 9:3–4; 10:4–7). Now disciples should take purse and bag, and even purchase a sword, for Jesus must be "counted among the lawless" (22:37, echoing Isa 53:12). The two swords the disciples produce for inspection are "enough" (Luke 22:38); Jesus employs the sword as metaphor of the danger that is coming, not to advocate violent resistance.

22:39–53. Prayer, Testing, and Arrest. With crisis looming, Jesus retreats to the Mount of Olives and finds strength through prayer; the disciples, overwhelmed by grief, surrender to sleep rather than pray to escape "the time of trial" (vv. 40, 45–46; cf. 11:4). Despite earlier assertions of the inevitability of his suffering and death (9:22, 44; 17:25; 18:31–33; 22:22), Jesus petitions his "Father" to spare him the "cup" he must drink, but embraces God's will (v. 42). The narrator depicts Jesus receiving an angel's support even as he continues to pray so intensely that his profuse sweat resembles drops of blood, a graphic display of anguish omitted in some manuscripts. Jesus faces death with courage but would have preferred life. Still, having drawn upon his customary resource (prayer), he is ready, unlike his sleepy followers, for what will happen next.

A crowd appears, led by Judas; ironically, the arrest will not, after all, occur in the absence of a "crowd" (v. 47; cf. 22:6). Before Judas can plant a kiss on his master's cheek, Jesus reframes this gesture of friendship as an act of betrayal. Unidentified members of the party accompanying Jesus brandish swords and one cuts off an ear of the high priest's slave. Jesus, though, halts the violence and (in a distinctively Lukan touch) heals the wounded man. The teacher who advocated love of enemies practices what he preached (6:27–36). Now addressing those enemies directly, he asks why they did not seize him while he taught in the Temple; readers know the answer: the power bloc feared the people (22:2). This is their moment, however; "darkness" (i.e., evil) rules—for now (v. 53b). Whatever else Luke may say about the Messiah's death as divinely purposed and prophetically scripted, it results from the decisions, and actions, of human agents who oppose the ways of God. They will not have the final word, however, as only this "hour" belongs to them.

22:54–71. Contrasting Witnesses: Peter Denies His Lord and Jesus Points to Divine Vindication. After Jesus is arrested and led to the high priest's residence, Luke's audience must wait to discover what will happen to him. First, the narrator follows Peter into the courtyard ("I am ready," he had vowed, "to go with you to prison and to death," v. 33). Three times, reacting to observers who link him to the arrested man, Peter denies connection to Jesus. Cascading events activate Peter's memory and bring him to remorse: on cue, the cock crows, and "[t]he Lord turned and looked at Peter" (v. 61). Realizing the enormity of his failure, Peter "went out and wept bitterly"—necessary prelude to his restoration. When Peter calls audiences to repentance in his sermons in Acts, he will speak from experience (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31). Even sin of such shocking depth (cf. Luke 12:9) finds forgiveness from a God whose character is grace and mercy (6:36).

In contrast to Peter's failed testimony, Jesus, mocked and beaten, courageously testifies before an early morning council of elders. Their interrogation, garnering evidence for execution of Roman justice, probes whether Jesus claimed to be Messiah. He deflects the question but does speak of his imminent vindication, adapting imagery from Dan 7:13–14: "[F]rom now on the Son of Man will be seated at the right hand of the power of God" (Luke 22:69). This audacious claim prompts a follow-up query whether Jesus claimed to be Son of God. Jesus neither affirms nor denies the claim, putting its truth on his interrogators' lips, though, curiously, they condemn him for what they have heard "from his own lips" (v. 71). The outcome of the hearing is no surprise; the ruling elite were determined to have Jesus killed. The Roman agents of that death now step onto the stage.

23:1–25. Pilate and Herod Deal with an Inconvenient Truth. The Jewish leadership group brings Jesus before Pilate, whose cruelty has won notice (13:1). The Roman governor will draw the tetrarch Herod (Antipas) into the proceedings (23:6–7), and Herod's violent streak, too, is notorious (3:19–20; 9:9; 13:31). The proceedings hold a surprise, however, for Pilate repeatedly asserts that accusations against Jesus as a threat to Roman peace—corrupting the people, opposing payment of tax to Rome, and claiming to be king—lack any basis and attempts to release Jesus. Pilate sends the prisoner to Herod, hoping to sidestep a politically explosive situation (a vignette only Luke narrates among the canonical Gospels). Herod's soldiers mock the prisoner, but he returns a silent Jesus to Pilate, a gesture that the Roman governor interprets as recognition of the accused man's innocence and, improbably, helps patch serious differences between the two leaders. The irony is arresting; after encountering Jesus, even bitter foes are reconciled!

Present for the final session before Pilate are elite priests and other leaders, as well as "the people" (23:13). When Pilate announces his intention to have Jesus flogged and released, "they all" demand that Barabbas, a rebel jailed for murder, be released instead, and that Jesus be crucified. The scenario is repeated and Pilate relents, delivering Jesus to the death sentence "as they wished" (v.

25). The passion drama thus enacts the plot of the parable of the throne claimant (19:12, 14); Jesus' own nation rejects its God-authorized ruler—not the last word about the people, but the basis for later appeals for repentance (Acts 2:23, 36, 38; 3:13–15, 17, 19; 5:30–31). The portrayal of Pilate is historically implausible; however, Luke is not bending history to defend Pilate but demonstrating that Jesus died a righteous man who did not merit death. God's suffering righteous one will die with courage and dignity that others fail to exhibit.

23:26–49. Crucifixion of God's Messiah. An undefined "they" lead Jesus to the execution site, forcing Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross "behind Jesus" (v. 26)—casting him in the role of disciple (9:23; 14:27), Jesus' own followers not being available for the part. In a scene unique to Luke, women mourners line the route to the cross and Jesus delivers an oracle that converts their lament for him into a warning of coming disaster for Jerusalem. Because conditions will soon be more combustible (when the city's judgment looms; the wood is now "green"), "[W]eep for yourselves and for your children" (23:28). Better to be childless, the destruction will be so devastating (cf. 19:27, 41–44; 21:20–24). Within a generation, Roman armies would impose this fate on Jerusalem (70 CE).

With two companions-in-crucifixion, Jesus is led to a site named "Skull." (Does the label come from the hill's shape or the executions carried out there?) The account is restrained, its horror left to the audience's imagination: "they crucified Jesus there with the criminals, one on his right and one on his left" (23:33). Not the details of crucifixion but Jesus' fidelity to his messianic vocation dominates, although the narrator shows soldiers gambling for his clothing and mocking him with sour wine, joining their voices to the chorus of ridicule led by the religious elite. Jesus dies as he lived: with integrity, saving sinners, forgiving enemies. He prays to his "Father," asking forgiveness for those who are taking his life (v. 34). (Many manuscripts lack this verse, likely because later copyists and their communities, embroiled in conflict with synagogues, were troubled by Jesus' petition for forgiveness.) So he remains true to his identity as Messiah and Son of God, not seeking to "save himself" (v. 35; cf. vv. 37, 39) but trusting in God and saving others instead. He even offers a repentant criminal an immediate place in Paradise, a benefaction exceeding the man's request to be remembered when Jesus became the king the placard above his head proclaimed him to be. Jesus goes to death doing what he has done throughout his ministry, saving the lost, modeling divine grace—king of the Jews, but only by way of a radically rewritten script for royal power. The crucifixion scene has dramatic visual accompaniment; darkness descends from noon until 3:00 p.m. (imagery Amos 5:18–20 and Joel 2:31 associate with the "day of the Lord"), and a Temple curtain is torn (which curtain is unclear, but after Jesus' earlier indictment of the Temple system, this surely signifies judgment, 19:45–46). Jesus dies, a prayer on his lips, committing his spirit to his "Father." Reaction to his death is swift; a centurion brands him righteous (23:47; NRSV, "innocent"), another Roman voice attesting Jesus' death as unjust. And the crowds leave shaken and remorseful, while Jesus' friends, including the women who accompanied him from Galilee, observe the scene from a distance, ready to play the role of "witness" in Acts (e.g., 1:22; 2:32).

23:50–56. Burial of Jesus in Anticipation of God's Reign. Jesus' burial, together with the narrative of his birth and childhood, frames his life with symbols of Jewish piety: expectation of God's reign (cf. 2:25, 38) and fidelity to Torah (Sabbath observance). For the first time, readers learn that the Jerusalem council's action against Jesus was not unanimous; unable to effect justice then, Joseph of Arimathea honors Jesus with burial. The pattern of faithful Jewish life continues among Jesus' followers and sympathetic observers. But in the aftermath of the cross, what will come of their hopes for Israel's redemption? Unnamed women have taken note of the tomb where Jesus' body lies and prepared spices to perform burial rites; will the story's next turn prove Jesus right in his prophecy of divine vindication through resurrection (9:22; 18:33)?

C. Easter: Ministry of the Risen Jesus (24:1– 53)

Moving from cruel death for Israel's Messiah and dashed hopes for the people's salvation to resurrection vindication and a Scripture-driven mandate to carry the message of forgiveness to the entire world, Luke's Easter story brings joyful closure to the account of Jesus' life and prepares for the narrative of Acts.

24:1–12. News Too Good to Trust?: Women Witness to Jesus' Resurrection. Early Sunday morning, a group of women (including Mary Magdalene, Joanna, and James's mother Mary) approach the tomb to complete burial rites for Jesus but discover the tomb empty. Two men wearing bright clothing (one, an "angel," appears in Matt 28:2, 5; a "young man" in Mark 16:5) announce that Jesus is alive and remind the women of Jesus' prophecy of his death and resurrection. The memory of the prediction has post-event precision lacking in the original phrasing (no mention of crucifixion or the agency of sinners in Luke 9:22, 44; 17:25; 18:31–33). The women disciples become heralds of the resurrection to "the eleven" and "all the rest" (Judas is no longer with them; cf. Acts 1:16–20, 25). The women's witness does not convince, although Peter inspects the tomb, with its discarded burial clothes. Only direct encounter with the risen Jesus will restore the disciples' shattered hopes.

24:13–49. Journey to Hope: Scripture Interpretation and Meal. The road to hope passes through the village of Emmaus, and then the few miles back to Jerusalem, where the Gospel ends and Acts will begin. Jesus leads the disciples from discouragement to faith, joining them at table, as he had so many times before, and interpreting his suffering and death as the fulfillment of scriptural promise. First Cleopas and an unnamed disciple (standing in for Luke's reader?) chronicle for Jesus—without recognizing him—the disastrous turn of events that had crushed their hope for Israel's redemption, though they also mention the women's news, too good to believe. He then provides a new lens for viewing Scripture, explaining that both Moses (law) and the prophets teach that the Messiah's route to glory passes through suffering and death. However, it is when they share a meal with Jesus, his words and gestures recalling the farewell Passover meal, that "their eyes [are] opened" and they realize who he is (Luke 24:30–31). They return to Jerusalem, only to discover that Peter, too, has met the risen Lord.

Jesus appears once more; the account emphasizes that he is no ephemeral spirit but the "real Jesus," flesh and bones, bearing the marks of suffering, and still one to enjoy a good meal. The risen Lord is this same person—the divinely vindicated Messiah who lived, healed, taught, challenged the powers, and suffered death in disgrace. For Luke's readers, no less than for Jesus' first disciples, the story of Jesus generates massive cognitive dissonance between expectation and reality. A crucified Messiah, the experience of death-conquering resurrection life, the scandal of sin-erasing forgiveness:

these are not the stuff of normal life, nor the things (at least the first two) one easily finds in the Jewish Scriptures. That is why a new reading lens—coming to perceive Scripture and experience anew in the light of the event of the cross and the message of Easter—must be supplied. That is why Jesus must teach this lesson, and teach it again and again. So he explains that Scripture pointed to the necessity of the Messiah's suffering, death, and resurrection, adding that Scripture's mandate (hence, God's will) calls for the message of "repentance and forgiveness of sins" to be declared "to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem" (vv. 44–47). Jesus charges his disciples with the task of "witness," but not until they receive divine empowerment. The stage is set, and the table of contents scripted, for Acts.

24:50–53. Closing the Book and Preparing for a Sequel Narrative. As Easter day draws to a close, Jesus blesses the disciples and is taken up to heaven—exalted to share in God's cosmic dominion. Luke's second book, re-telling the ascension in a way that commences, rather than closes, the story, locates the event forty days later (Acts 1:1–11). The Gospel narrative ends, as it began, with worship of God in the Jerusalem Temple. The notes of joy and praise, post-crucifixion, surpass the hope-filled praise of the book's opening chapters, though hopes have found fulfillment in unexpected ways. Luke closes, fittingly, with doxology to a God who counters cultural convention and defies human (even religious) expectation, but does so to bring life and liberation to God's people, and to the whole earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. A. Culpepper. "The Gospel of Luke." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1995) 9:1–490; J. A. Darr. On Character Building: The Reader and the Rhetoric of Characterization in Luke–Acts. LCBI (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); J. A. Fitzmyer. The Gospel according to Luke: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 28–28A. 2 vols. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1981–85); J. B. Green. The Gospel of Luke. NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); . The Theology of the Gospel of Luke. NTT (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); L. T. Johnson. The Gospel of Luke. SP 3 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, 1991); A.-J. Levine, ed. A Feminist Companion to Luke. Feminist Companion to the New Testament and Early Christian Writings 3 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); H. Moxnes. Economy of the Kingdom: Social Conflict and Economic Relations in Luke's Gospel. OBT (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); B. E. Reid. Choosing the Better Part? Women in the Gospel of Luke (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, 1996); F. S. Spencer. The Gospel of Luke and Acts of the Apostles. IBT (Nashville: Abingdon, 2008); C. H. Talbert. Reading Luke: A Literary and Theological Commentary. Rev. ed. Reading the New Testament (Macon, Ga.: Smyth and Helwys, 2002); R. C. Tannehill. Luke. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996).

OVERVIEW

The Gospel of John is, in some respects, the most difficult and mysterious of all the Gospels. Its meaning and message, as well as the circumstances of its composition, are not easily discerned and give rise to considerable disagreement. Yet, from the early Church onward, John's Gospel is widely regarded as one of the most profound spiritual texts within the Bible. In its religious and theological perspective, it stands alone in the New Testament (NT), offering a unique vision of Jesus Christ for the life of the believing community. John's Gospel does not offer a neutral account of Jesus' life and death but rather a theological reflection on the meaning of those events from the perspective of believing. It is written, in other words, "from faith to faith." Although there are important similarities to the other three Gospels (Synoptics), John's Gospel is distinctive. The stories he tells, his characters and characterization, his outline of the plot, his style of writing, and the theology that emerges, all have a characteristic Johannine stamp that has few parallels elsewhere.

John begins his story, not with the birth narratives as in Matthew and Luke, or the wilderness experience of the people of Israel, as in Mark but in the eternity before creation. There we witness the intimacy between the Logos (Word) and God, and the creative activity of the divine Logos in giving life and form to the world. The incarnation of the Logos, which is the high point of the opening verses, sets the narrative in motion. The evangelist reinforces his message through the witness of John the Baptist, two of whose disciples are first to gather around Jesus. The public ministry, which begins with the wedding at Cana and ends with the raising of Lazarus—both unique to John—demonstrates the "signs" and "works" of Jesus' ministry and manifests symbolically the glory of God revealed in him. Particularly important are the seven "signs," around which the first half of the Gospel turns.

The second half of the Gospel consists of the long farewell discourse, bounded on one side by the footwashing and on the other by the "high priestly" prayer of Jesus. These events take place in the intimate circle of Jesus' disciples at the Last Supper. The stress here is on Jesus' departure as beneficial for the disciples, associated with the gift of the Spirit and the love-command. With the passion narrative we move back to the public arena, in the arrest, the trial before Pilate, and the crucifixion, where the unnamed disciple and the mother of Jesus play key roles. The climax is the flow of blood and water from the side of the crucified Christ. The resurrection narratives, first in Jerusalem then Galilee, represent a move back to the intimate circle of discipleship, and Jesus renews his broken relations with the disciples, drawing them into Easter faith. With the giving of the Spirit, he commissions them for mission, pastoral leadership in the church, and witness in his name.

The Gospel of John is constructed around a series of "signs" and images, which the narrative unfolds, drawing out their symbolic significance and enticing the reader to share the evangelist's worldview. These great symbols center around two distinct yet interconnected themes: creation and incarnation. The first designates the beginning of the created order where God, through the divine Logos/Word, brings into being a world of beauty, light and truth. The second presupposes the tragic separation between God and creation, a separation that has disfigured the original goodness of the world. In both, God acts in self-giving, life-affirming love. In the second, God's gift is no less than God's own self, clad in the garb of creation. This is John's central theological affirmation, and it shapes the Gospel's religious vision from beginning to end. The self-revelation of God, in this Gospel, is through matter: through image, symbol, and metaphor, replaying the foundational theme of a deity disclosed in mortal flesh.

Perspective on Jesus. John's Gospel confirms from the beginning the identity of Jesus as the Word-made-flesh. To the Samaritan woman, Jesus discloses that his mission is to draw people to authentic worship of the Father (4:23). Toward the end of the Gospel, the author declares openly that his purpose in writing is to lead people to (deeper) faith and thus eternal life (20:31). The Gospel is concerned with truth (8:32; 14:6), but truth is understood personally, as well as objectively. To know the truth is not just about intellectual propositions—though it is at least that—but, more fundamentally, it constitutes a relationship of friendship, love, and obedience, a relationship grounded in the self-revelation of God.

As with the Synoptic Gospels, John is not to be read as a series of journalistic snap-shots of Jesus' life seen through the eyes of a neutral observer. John's Gospel emerges from a period of theological reflection, in which the author meditates on the significance of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. Jesus is viewed through the lens of the resurrection, which permeates his speaking and acting throughout the Gospel. This is a Jesus interpreted through Christian eyes. Not just the earthly Jesus, therefore, but the fullness of the "real Jesus" of Christian faith pervades the Gospel: yes, the one who walked the earth, who lived and died but also the one who rose from the dead and who continues to indwell his people through the Spirit.

Relationship to Other Gospels. John differs significantly from the other Gospels. Mark's Gospel presents a short ministry in Galilee, followed by a single journey to Jerusalem, culminating in the cleansing of the Temple. In John, Jesus visits Judea and Jerusalem three times, cleansing the Temple near the beginning of his ministry on his first visit. Other events, familiar from the Synoptics, are absent, such as the institution of the Eucharist at the Last Supper. Jesus also speaks in a somewhat different manner in John, in long, self-revealing discourses based around central symbols rather than the short, succinct sayings and parables of the Synoptic tradition. And, inevitably, there are theological differences: a focus in John, for example, on the preexistent origins of Jesus, and emphasis on the fullness of life in the here and now. Yet it is important not to overstate these differences. Once the distinctiveness of the two traditions—Synoptic and Johannine—is acknowledged, there remains considerable overlap between them. This is apparent in the central characters, in key events, and in overall theological perspective.

Traditionally, the church has seen John as complementing the other evangelists. In the twentieth century, however, scholarship was more concerned to assert the independence of John and the gulf separating him from the Synoptics. In more recent years, there has developed increasing awareness of the complexity of the relationship between the Synoptic and Johannine traditions. While there is dispute over whether this is a direct or indirect relationship, there are unmistakable signs of crossfertilization between the two traditions. Indeed, given the close relationship between widely spread Christian communities in the first century, it is hard to imagine that John was unaware of the Gospel of Mark and unfamiliar with its contents. The Gospels quickly assumed an important place in the early church, and it is therefore possible that John knew also the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. Whatever view we take, John's place in the NT canon ensures that his voice speaks as an authentic expression of Christian faith, as important and legitimate as the Synoptic tradition. The point is strengthened if, as is possible, John assumes the Synoptic tradition and consciously builds on it, sometimes adapting, sometimes complementing, and at other times departing from it.

Author, Location, Dating. We have no direct evidence from the Gospel of its authorship, place or dating. The title, "according to John," tells us little, and the identity of the unnamed disciple is never disclosed within the Johannine text. Later in the Gospel, this character is referred to as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (13:23–25; 19:26–27; 20:3–10; 21:7, 20–23), though elsewhere he is simply "the other disciple" (1:37–40; 18:15; 19:35). Many modern scholars conclude from this that the Gospel is more or less anonymous, the "John" referring to a later figure who edited the Gospel in its final form, and not necessarily the same as the unnamed disciple.

From the second century onward, the early church believed that the author was the Apostle John, son of Zebedee—though curiously the two "sons of Zebedee" only appear in one scene in the Gospel (21:2). Irenaeus (c. 130–c. 200) takes this view and traces his information back to Polycarp (c. 65–c. 155) who personally knew the apostles and other disciples of the earthly Jesus. But the early church also has a tradition of another John, ministering in the late first century, named "the Elder," a disciple of Jesus, and it is possible that the two Johns have been conflated. The Gospel concludes with an explicit identification of the unnamed ("beloved") disciple with the author and thus with the name John. There is no reason, moreover, to doubt that the "witness" language of the Fourth Gospel reflects the stance of actual eyewitnesses, especially given the importance of eyewitness testimony in the ancient writing of history. If John the Elder wrote not only the Gospel but also the Johannine Epistles (2 John 1; 3 John 1), he can also be identified with the unnamed disciple, since it is possible that the Elder had known Jesus in his youth, though being outside the circle of the Twelve. The evidence for either person is plausible, though the possibility of later editorial work on the Gospel by a disciple of "John" cannot be ruled out and is, indeed, suggested by the closing verses of the Gospel.

A persistent tradition from the early church sees Ephesus as the place of composition. While this cannot be demonstrated from the text itself, it is likely that the Gospel originated in a Hellenistic city with a large Jewish population. On these grounds alone, Ephesus is a good guess; and the traditional association of both the apostle and the elder with Ephesus is strong. In many respects, Ephesus makes sense as the location for this Gospel, and there is no reason to doubt it: it had a vibrant Christian community, a large synagogue, and was a Greek-speaking Hellenistic city of considerable importance in the ancient world, culturally, religiously, and economically.

Internal evidence suggests a rather late date for its composition at the end the first century. The Gospel seems to reflect a context in which "Pharisees" could be interchanged with "Jews," a situation unlikely in the diversity and complexity of Judaism before the Jewish War (66–70 CE). Moreover, the conflict between Jesus and "the Jews" in the Gospel sets the Johannine community apart from the synagogue. While conflict was certainly part of Jesus' life and times, and that of the earliest church, it reached a new intensity in the period after the Jewish War, when the struggling Christian community found itself in competition with an equally struggling Judaism. A dating of around 95–100CE seems reasonable.

Structure. A common way of dividing the Gospel separates the Book of Signs (chs. 1:19– 12:50) from the Book of Glory (chs. 13–20), with a Prologue (1:1–18) and an Epilogue (ch. 21). But this can be confusing, especially since glory is a major theme throughout the Gospel. Also the opening verses of the Gospel (1:1–18) and its concluding chapter (21:1–25), despite doubts raised by some scholars, both function as integral to the overall narrative. A more helpful organization is as follows:

OUTLINE

I. Prologue: Coming of John the Baptist and Jesus (1:1–18)

II. Jesus' Public Ministry (1:19–12:50)

A. Gathering of the First Disciples 1:19–51

1:19–34. Witness of John the Baptist

1:35–51. Gathering of First Disciples

B. Cana to Cana (2:1–4:54)

2:1–12. First "Sign" at Cana: Wedding

2:13–25. Cleansing of the Temple

3:1–36. Jesus, Nicodemus, and John the Baptist

4:1–42. Jesus and the Samaritan Woman

4:43–54. Second "Sign" at Cana: Healing of the Official's Son

C. Jesus and the Festivals of Judaism (5:1–10:42)

5:1–47. Jesus and the Sabbath: The Son

6:1–71. Jesus and the Passover: The Bread of Life

7:1–52, 8:12–59. Jesus and Tabernacles: Water and Light

9:1–41. Tabernacles: Healing of the Man Born Blind

10:1–42. Jesus and Dedication: The Good Shepherd

D. Climax of the Public Ministry: Resurrection and the "Hour" (11:1–12:50)

11:1–12:11. The Raising of Lazarus

12:12–19. Jesus' Entry into Jerusalem

12:20–50. The Manifestation of the "Hour"

III. Jesus' Private Ministry: The Last Supper (13:1–17:26)

A. Jesus Washes the Disciples' Feet (13:1–30)

13:1–20. The Footwashing

13:21–30. Revelation of the Betrayer

B. Farewell Discourse (13:31–16:33)

13:31–14:31. Jesus' Departure: The Way, the Paraclete, Love, and Peace

15:1–16:4a. Abiding-in-Love and the World's Hatred

16:4b–33. Jesus' Departure: The Paraclete, Joy, Love, and Peace

C. Jesus' Great Prayer (17:1–26)

17:1–5. Prayer for Glory

17:6–19. Prayer for the Disciples

17:20–26. Prayer for Future Believers

IV. Jesus' Death and Resurrection (18:1–21:25)

A. Jesus' Arrest and Trial (18:1–19:16a)

18:1–11. Arrest in a Garden

18:12–27. Jesus and Peter at the High Priest's Court

18:28–19:16a. The Trial before Pilate and Condemnation

B. Jesus' Crucifixion and Burial (19:16b–42)

19:1b–25a. The Inscription on the Cross and Seamless Robe

19:25b–27. The Mother of Jesus and the Beloved Disciple

19:28–31. Jesus' Death

19:31–37. The Piercing of Jesus' Side

19:38–42. Jesus' Burial in a Garden

C. Jesus' Resurrection Appearances (20:1–21:25)

- 20:1–18. Appearance to Mary Magdalene
- 20:19–23. Appearance to the Disciples and Gift of the Spirit
- 20:24–31. Appearance to Thomas and Summary of the Gospel
- 21:1–14. Appearance to Seven Disciples in Galilee
- 21:15–19. Pastoral Role of Simon Peter
- 21:20–25. Witness of the Author and Summary of the Gospel

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prologue: Coming of John the Baptist and Jesus (1:1–18)

The Prologue to John is arguably the most important passage in the whole Gospel. It functions as a musical overture, opening up the core symbols and central themes that provide the key to the Gospel's meaning at the outset. Unlike the characters in the ensuing narrative, we as readers know the truth about Jesus in a way they do not. Practically every section of the Gospel narrative can be headed with a phrase or verse or symbol from the Prologue, so well does it sum up the Gospel message.

Originally the Prologue may have been a hymn to the Logos, arising from the early Christian community. It has a poetic structure, and the language, though simple, has a grand, majestic tone. Yet, if so, the evangelist has adapted it to include not only the proclamation of Jesus' divine origins and identity but also the beginnings of the Gospel's plot: we encounter first the story of John the Baptist, then the narrative of Jesus the incarnate Word in his revelation of the Father.

The background to the idea of Logos derives from the Old Testament (OT) and intertestamental writings. In the first creation account, God's word speaks the world into being (Gen 1:1–2:4a). In the prophetic writings, God's life-giving word brings salvation and judgment to the people of Israel, in fulfillment of the covenant. In the wisdom writings of the OT and beyond, God's word is associated with Lady Wisdom who takes on a personalized status as the self-manifestation of God in creation and salvation: the hostess and nourisher who invites guests to share her food and drink. These ideas are Jewish, influenced also by Hellenistic ideas and imagery, including Greek (Stoic) notions of logos as the harmonious web of reason that holds all things in being. John's use of "Logos," thus provides an integrated picture of the source and ground of creation—that which gives rise to all created things and unites them, offering guidance and illumination to the created world.

John begins with the Logos in relationship to God and creation (1:1–5). The Logos (logos) has a complex relationship with God (theos): on the one hand, the Logos is "with God" in the sense of being "turned towards" or even face-to-face with God; on the other hand, the Logos also is God, sharing in the divine being, God's way of being present to the world, the sublime Utterance through which the world was made. In this sense, the Logos is portrayed as the agent of creation, the source of all life, a life that begins with the making of light (Gen 1:3). The evangelist moves at once from the literal to the symbolic: this light, dawning at creation and shining through the world's history as a material, moral, and spiritual reality, can never be grasped (comprehended or overcome) by any force of darkness (1:5). This theme and this opposition are essential to the plot of the Gospel, where light does indeed appear to be quenched by darkness. Yet light is God's first and last word, as the Gospel will display in the history of the Logos.

The second section of the Prologue (1:6–13) outlines the response of faith to the dawning of the light, beginning with John the Baptist and concluding with the community of faith who believe his testimony. It may seem as if John the Baptist breaks into the poetic structure (1:6–8), but his role is a crucial one: he is the primary witness to the Logos, his testimony grounding the Prologue's exalted language in concrete reality—although the evangelist has not yet made the identification between the Logos and Jesus. In the following verses (1:9–13), John outlines the response of the world to the saving presence of the light. Note that John's theology here, though it refers to salvation, is nonetheless firmly grounded in creation. Those who reject the light ironically and tragically reject their own Creator and, by definition, their own identity (1:10–11). "His own" could refer specifically to the Jerusalem authorities in this Gospel who largely reject Jesus. But the evangelist refers to the world as a whole, which belongs to the Logos by right of creation. Yet the last word is not tragic: just as the light is not overwhelmed by the darkness, so creation is not lost to its Creator. Those who welcome the light rediscover their true identity, through faith, as "children of God" (1:12–13). Note that this is the first reference to "flesh" in John's Gospel, not negative and fallen but depicted here as ineffective. Flesh cannot bridge the gulf between Creator and creation; only God can.

We now reach the last and climactic section of the Prologue to which the previous two sections have been leading (1:14–18). The Logos is connected to creation not just as its Creator but through incarnation. So far the Prologue has maintained a distinction between "being," which signifies the divine realm, and "becoming," which is characteristic of creation. But now the gulf is crossed: that which is now becomes; Creator becomes creation. "Flesh" too now takes on a new quality: this flesh achieves what ordinary human flesh could not. And now for the first time John speaks of "we": the believing community, those born of God, those who behold in the human flesh of the Logos the radiance of divine glory, "full of grace and truth" (1:14). This act of profound recognition is the meaning of salvation for the evangelist.

Glory is a vitally important concept in John's Gospel, though its meaning is not easy to pin down. It has strong tabernacle/temple overtones derived from the OT, the Temple in Jerusalem being the place where God's radiant, life-giving presence dwells for Israel; here the verb we translate as "live" (ske- noo-) has the sense of "pitch one's tent," with its suggestion of the tabernacle in the exodus. There are implications also of Mt. Sinai and the giving of the Law, which is accompanied by the radiance of God's glory (Exod 34:29–35). In John's Gospel, glory evokes the life-giving, saving radiance of God, the divine presence with God's people in holiness, beauty, and love. That glory, for John, is now located in the "flesh" of the incarnate Logos.

And now, for the first time, the rather abstract language of "Logos" and "God" in the opening verses of the Prologue gives way before the vivid metaphorical language of "Father" and "Son," which is part of the core symbolism of the Gospel. The Logos is now revealed as the divinely human Son who stands face-to-face with the Father in intimate communion while sharing the same being; who enters the world and stands face-to-face with human beings, sharing their becoming. On this central theological tenet the Gospel hinges.

Once more we meet John the Baptist, bursting into the grandeur of the Prologue, and for the first time hear the words of his testimony: he witnesses to the one who is "First," a witness that will be repeated in the next section, binding the Prologue closely with the ensuing narrative (1:30). The Word-made-flesh is superlatively above and beyond the person of John the Baptist, as he is above everyone, because from the incarnate Logos comes the fullness of divine grace (1:16). He is even above Moses, though not over against him (1:17). The last verse of the Prologue (1:18) sums up its central message: the invisible, unseen God is made visible in the incarnation, disclosing the deepest intimacy between Father and Son, an intimacy into which believers are drawn. There is no more fit Revealer than this—the one who manifests divine glory through radical participation in mortal flesh.

II. Jesus' Public Ministry (1:19–12:50)

A. Gathering of the First Disciples (1:19–51)

1:19–34. Witness of John the Baptist. It is no surprise that Jesus' public ministry should begin with John the Baptist. The Prologue has already begun his witness, which now takes the form of a "trial" before members of the Jewish leadership. As in the Prologue John the Baptist witnesses to the preeminence of the Coming One, his baptism in water points symbolically to something greater. When Jesus himself appears—for the first time in the Gospel—it is the voice of John the Baptist we hear, testifying to him as "the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29). John the Baptist then narrates the story of his own recognition of Jesus' identity, which he perceives as the result not of his own cognition but of divine revelation. Unlike the Synoptic Gospels, which narrate directly the story of Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist, the descent of the dove, and the divine voice, in John's Gospel the same story is narrated as a personal vision of John the Baptist. Jesus' own baptism in water is not told, though is perhaps assumed by the evangelist. What John the Baptist does bear witness to in this Gospel is the descent and abiding of the Spirit, confirming Jesus' identity as the Son of God.

The title, "Lamb of God" connects Jesus with the rich lamb symbolism of the OT. It suggests the Passover lamb, associated not so much with sin as with liberation and exodus. There are overtones also of the OT cult and the animals sacrificed as sin-offerings. The Suffering Servant who sacrifices himself vicariously for others, the very image of innocence and vulnerability, is also part of the symbolism. The story of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen 22:1–14) may also form part of this association, where Abraham is called to sacrifice his beloved son—though the animal sacrificed in Isaac's stead is a ram. The symbolism can work at more than one level and suggest more than one meaning. At this point in the narrative, we do not know exactly what the title means, but its fuller significance will be disclosed on the cross, where Jesus dies as the true Passover lamb, the beloved Son sacrificed for sin. Note that John the Baptist speaks of "sin," not "sins," implying that beneath individual acts of wrongdoing lies a fundamental condition of alienation and darkness, which Jesus has come to eliminate. Indeed, as the incarnate Logos, he alone is capable of dealing definitively with "the world's sin."

1:35–51. Gathering of First Disciples. The testimony of John the Baptist bears immediate fruit. What follows is a witness chain beginning with John the Baptist, extending to his disciples, and moving on from them to others. The first to become disciples of Jesus are initially disciples of John the Baptist, and they approach Jesus on the basis of their master's testimony. The language of this preliminary encounter is evocative. Although they begin by following Jesus, it is his question that challenges them at the deepest level: "What are you looking for?" (1:38a). The evangelist uses the language of "abiding," a key concept in his understanding of discipleship, although it is somewhat masked by the English words "stay" and "remain" (1:38b–39). But abiding with Jesus is precisely what it means to be a disciple and involves a mutual recognition.

In the following verses the growing group of disciples, as they come in contact with Jesus, use a variety of titles to describe his identity—Rabbi, Messiah, the one about whom Moses in the law and the prophets wrote, Son of God, King of Israel—while Jesus, in turn, knows their identity before even they speak. Thus Simon is recognized and named Cephas (Peter, 1:42), and Nathanael is declared to be "an Israelite in whom there is no deceit" (1:47). The theme of Jesus' divine ability to see into the human heart is one that will continue throughout the Gospel.

Philip is the exception in the chain of witnesses; his summons comes from Jesus himself who calls him to follow (1:43). This small scene is closer to the Markan picture of the calling of the first four disciples (Mark 1:16–20) whom Jesus calls with startling authority and immediacy. Perhaps John shows here an awareness of the Synoptic tradition, even though he tells the story very differently. At the same time John emphasizes that, although the disciples bring each other to Jesus, the initiative lies with Jesus himself who draws them to his own self-revelation.

The climax of the chapter is reached with Nathanael who is amazed at Jesus' knowledge of his character and whereabouts, despite some initial scepticism. Jesus promises him the sight of far greater things, a statement that leads naturally into Jesus' public ministry. Yet Jesus concludes with what seems an odd claim, linked to yet another title that comes from the mouth of Jesus and appears to trump all the other titles used by the disciples. The promise of seeing angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man is not literally fulfilled in the narrative of the Gospel (1:51). Yet symbolically it is fulfilled throughout Jesus' ministry and in his exaltation on the cross. The reference to the ascent and descent of angels recalls Jacob's ladder (Gen 28:10–22), signifying the unexpected presence of God: "the house of God" . . . "the gate of heaven" (Gen 28:17). As the Son of Man, who combines the divine glory of apocalyptic symbolism (Dan 7:13) with the mortal flesh of a human being (Ezekiel), the Johannine Jesus is himself the House of God and the Gate of Heaven. He brings to completion what is partially disclosed to Jacob, just as he does also with Moses, Abraham, and Isaiah. By the end of the chapter, the disciples are thus gathered around Jesus and have begun to discern, in an intensifying series of titles, who and what he is. All is ready for Jesus' public ministry to commence.

B. Cana to Cana (2:1–4:54)

2:1–12. First "Sign" at Cana: Wedding. The story of the wedding at Cana begins the first narrative cycle of the Gospel, a circular path from Galilee to Jerusalem to Galilee again, via Samaria. In each case, we encounter different responses to Jesus: Jew, Gentile, Samaritan. The overarching theme is the giving of new life in Jesus and the invitation to faith. At the same time—because Johannine narrative is spiral rather than strictly linear—the wedding at Cana also, in a sense, completes the faith-story of the disciples from ch. 1.

As the first miracle of the Gospel, the wedding at Cana (which does not appear in the Synoptic Gospels) plays a significant role. As the first of the Johannine "signs," this is a symbolic and theological narrative about the advent of the new through the incarnation and the relationship of the new to the old. The six stone jars of water represent Judaism and its ritual purifications, which are transformed by Jesus into the best wine: the new arises out of, yet surpasses, the old. In the OT and the Synoptic Gospels, marriage ceremonies are symbolic of the last days and the celebration of God's future reign. The imagery of the banquet suggests the sumptuousness of God's bounty, and the marriage signifies the perfection of union (covenant) between God and Israel. All this rich symbolism is operative here, mediated through the Johannine Jesus who brings the divine gift of eternal life radically into the present, in his own person.

Particularly difficult is the role of the mother of Jesus who is introduced without name or explanation (2:1). Like all narratives in this Gospel, the story of her encounter with Jesus is highly stylized and typically Johannine. While Jesus seems to distance himself from her initiative, he follows it nonetheless, as elsewhere in the Gospel when people approach him, since everything he does is primarily at the Father's initiative. More important, John introduces the theme of the "hour" (2:4), which points forward to the cross, Jesus' final act of glorification. The climax of the story makes this plain: the changing of water into wine is itself the revelation of divine glory (2:11), a glory derived from Judaism and now manifest in the flesh of Jesus. The mother of Jesus nurtures the faith of the disciples as she will nurture the Beloved Disciple at the crucifixion. What Jesus does at Cana, in other words, anticipates what he will do on the cross. Equally important, however, is her response (2:5), addressed as much to the disciples and the reader of the Gospel as to the attendants at the wedding. The mother of Jesus calls us to obey the word of the one who is himself the Word.

2:13–25. Cleansing of the Temple. The cleansing of the Temple also concerns the revelation of the new but with a more polemical note than the previous story. This narrative, familiar from the Synoptic Gospels as the prelude to the passion narrative, occurs in John at the beginning of Jesus' ministry and has a double focus. On the one hand, Jesus displays passionate "zeal" for the Temple (2:16; Ps 69:9), fulfilling OT expectations and showing a prophetic critique of all that might pollute the true worship of God. Note the typically Johannine use of "my Father's house," implying a unique relationship with God and a unique authority. At this level, the story is truly a "cleansing" of the Temple and its worship.

At the same time, the narrative also operates at a deeper level. In the ensuing conversation with the Jerusalem authorities, the Temple becomes a symbol of Jesus himself, and the prophecy of its destruction and rebuilding signifies his death and resurrection (2:18–21). Jesus is the true sanctuary, and the resurrection denotes the rebuilding of this incarnate "temple," destroyed by the authorities. Jesus, in other words, is the house in which/ whom the Father dwells. Thus by the end of the story, the Johannine Jesus has not only recovered the Temple for his Father, but has also claimed it as his own. The place of the Temple and Jesus' body are mysteriously fused, to be vindicated in the resurrection. In the first part, therefore, Jesus points to the Father, while in the second he points symbolically to himself. At both levels, it is only the later "remembering" of the disciples that confirms for them the true meaning of this event. Everything in this Gospel is thus seen through the lens of Easter, with the words of the Scriptures and the word of Jesus himself of equal stature (2:22).

The Johannine Jesus is reserved about the many who come to faith at Passover (2:23–25). For John, faith based on "signs"—on outward manifestations of power—can be, at best, superficial and, at worst, misleading. Real faith in this Gospel is perceiving the glory of God in the words and works, and person, of Jesus. Thus true faith involves seeing the inner meaning of the "signs," what they reveal about Jesus. At this point, Jesus will not entrust himself naively to those who profess trust in him (2:24–25), 3:1–21. Jesus and Nicodemus. The previous verses (2:23–25) have set the scene for Nicodemus' meeting with Jesus in Jerusalem: there is an ambiguity about his appearance, despite the sincerity of his opening greeting (3:2). Jesus at once moves to the heart of the matter in a solemn saying, summoning Nicodemus to be "born from above" (3:3), a saying then reiterated as "born of water and Spirit" (3:5). Nicodemus misunderstands, interpreting Jesus' imagery on a material level, as if Jesus were indeed speaking of literal birth (3:4). The word translated as "from above" (anothen) can also mean "again," which is the way Nicodemus interprets it. Misunderstanding is common in this Gospel, and even necessary for growth in faith; the challenge is to move beyond the material to the symbolic and spiritual. Here birth is employed as a metaphor for new life in Christ, a birth that can only be effected by the Spirit of God whose origins and operations are as mysterious as the wind (3:8). There are suggestions of baptism in this language, which itself represents rebirth into the kingdom of God (see 1:12–13). Note that this is one of the few occasions in the Gospel where John uses the term "kingdom," generally preferring the phrase "eternal life" to convey a similar meaning—although John places great stress on that life as a quality in the here-and-now.

The strange thing is that Nicodemus, while failing to grasp Jesus' words, now fades from the picture, and Jesus appears to address a wider audience—perhaps others like Nicodemus. The overall theme is entry into new life by faith, though the imagery shifts. First John makes it plain that the revelation comes from the Son of Man, who has descended from heaven in the incarnation and who will ascend in glory on the cross in order to give eternal life (3:13–15). For John, the bronze serpent in the wilderness, which healed those Israelites struck by plague, is a type of Christ whose death on the cross, in a similar paradox, gives healing and life (Num 21:4–9). All of this expresses God's radical love for the world that shows itself in the giving of the Son, even to death (3:16), a love that desires not condemnation and death but salvation and life (3:16–17). If there is condemnation, it is the free choosing of those who, like Nicodemus, are given the choice between light and darkness. In this sense, for John, final judgment has already come, anticipated in the human response to Jesus' offer of new birth. Here John develops the theme of light, introduced in the Prologue (1:4–5), imagery that is consonant with the symbolism of birth. By the end of the narrative, Nicodemus is left suspended between the light and the darkness, unable to choose the life Jesus offers. Yet his story, as we shall see later in the Gospel, is by no means finished.

3:22–36. Jesus and John the Baptist. The scene moves now from Jerusalem to the Judean countryside, where the focus shifts from one leader in Judaism to another, from Nicodemus to John the Baptist. The narrative presents two parallel but very different responses to the shining of the light. John the Baptist's ministry is continuing, we discover, as evident in his baptizing (note how the theme of baptism is closely allied to that of water throughout ch. 3). But John the Baptist's ministry is still directed at Jesus, as his testimony makes plain: with the advent of the new in Christ, John the Baptist is happy to retire, to give way as the lesser to the greater, just as the bridegroom's closest friend gives way before the bridegroom (3:28–30).

It is not easy to discern the speaker of the verses that follow (3:31–36). This is not uncommon in John where, in any case, Jesus and the evangelist speak the same language. It is possible that John has inserted the episode about John the Baptist into a discourse by Jesus, continuing on from 3:21. The Son bears witness to the Father, and the Father loves the Son: their relationship is one of intimacy and mutuality. Only by recognizing Jesus as the Son, and having faith in him, can true life be found. The bleak alternative is wrath, rejection, and death (3:36).

4:1–42. Jesus and the Samaritan Woman. The circle turns now from Judea to Galilee via Samaria. John sets up the narrative carefully, continuing the theme of water and baptism (4:1–2). Journeying with the disciples, Jesus is naturally weary by mid-day, the hottest part of the day, and sits beside Jacob's well while the disciples go to the village to buy food. When the Samaritan woman comes to draw water, Jesus at once engages her in conversation. While it is unusual for a woman to come alone to a well in the middle of the day, the narrative is again stylized: John is drawing a contrast between Nicodemus, the Jerusalem leader with name, rank, and education who comes by night, and the woman of Samaria, who without rank or status comes to Jesus in the full light of day.

Two factors are operative here: on the one hand, the woman belongs to a race despised by Jews, treated as Gentiles and seen as unclean; on the other hand, Jesus potentially loses honor and risks scandal by talking to such a woman in public. The woman expresses her surprise at Jesus' request for a drink, and John explains that Jews refuse to share eating and drinking vessels with "unclean" Samaritans. Yet the Johannine Jesus is indifferent to these conventions, using his own physical thirst as a way of pointing to the woman's deeper thirst (4:10). The dialogue turns on the phrase "living water" which has a double meaning: at a literal level, it signifies flowing or spring water as opposed to the still water of the cistern, while at a Johannine level it is shorthand for "water of life," that is, eternal life. The woman, thinking on a material level, assumes the former meaning and points out the absurdity of Jesus' offer. How can he possibly be a water-giver? She introduces the figure of Jacob who, according to later Jewish tradition, originally dug the well so that the water flowed miraculously over the rim for seven days. But the Johannine Jesus is greater than Jacob, as he is greater than Moses, though standing in the same tradition: indeed Jacob, as water-giver, is a type of Christ himself. By the end of the scene, the woman is convinced that Jesus is offering a superior form of water so that she does indeed ask for the gift that Jesus offers, though her understanding is still limited (4:15).

The ensuing dialogue deepens the woman's understanding of the giver, the gift, and her own thirst. Jesus confronts her with the reality of her life—five husbands and one who is not her own husband—not so much to expose her guilt (after all, she may be the victim, given that women in the OT cannot initiate divorce) but to disclose her need for living water in the uncertainty and restlessness of her relationships (4:16–18). The woman begins to realize that Jesus is speaking about spiritual and religious realities and that he has prophetic power (4:19–20). Once again, she raises the distinction between Jew and Samaritan. Jesus' reply points to the centrality of worship in John's understanding, the role of the Spirit, and the desire of the Father to draw authentic worship to himself, thus outlining the purpose of Jesus' mission (4:21–28). The woman now recognizes that Jesus is speaking in messianic terms and refers to Samaritan expectations of a teaching Messiah (a Ta'eb) in the tradition of Moses; to this Jesus replies with the self-revealing "I am he, the one who is speaking to you" (4:26).

In face of the disciples' disapproval, it is not surprising that the woman departs, leaving behind her water jar, perhaps in token of her intention to return (4:27–28). Her words to the villagers express hyperbolically the conviction that Jesus has uncovered the truth of her life; they also raise the question of his identity; at once they set out to discover the truth for themselves (4:29–30). In this Gospel, Jesus as the Revealer reveals both his own identity and that of human beings: knowledge of the self and knowledge of God go hand-in-hand. The disciples have no real conception of what is happening and, as Jesus speaks metaphorically of the ripeness of the harvest, the Samaritans make their way toward him. The title, which serves as the climax of the story, "Savior of the world" (4:42), embodies the universalism of the Johannine message. Through the symbol of "living water," Jesus thus reveals himself as the one who offers universal salvation to all, regardless of race or gender. Though himself a Jew, the new life he offers is for all.

4:43–54. Second "Sign" at Cana: Healing of the Official's Son. The last episode in the "Cana to Cana" cycle concludes in Galilee where it began. The miraculous story of Jesus healing at a distance has distinct parallels with the wedding at Cana. In both there is a request for a miracle, and in both Jesus appears to spurn the one who requests it (4:48), underlining the evangelist's nervousness about faith based solely on "signs." In each case, however, the asker's faith shines forth in an exemplary way—though this time the Jewish mother of Jesus is replaced by the royal official, most likely a Gentile. Like her, the man believes "the word that Jesus spoke to him" and goes home in faith to be met on the way with the good news of his son's recovery (4:50–53). Both "signs" are numbered, emphasizing the connection between them. As with the wedding, the healing story is significant in its revelation of divine glory in the word of Jesus who is himself the Word. The cycle thus begins and ends with two extraordinary examples of faith in Jesus, the Savior not just of Jews but of the whole world.

C. Jesus and the Festivals of Judaism (5:1–10:42)

5:1–47. Jesus and the Sabbath: The Son. This story section of the Gospel centers on the festivals and rites of Judaism. Reference to these has already been present in the previous section, but now the feasts are given greater prominence, introduced by the unspecific "festival of the Jews" (5:1). In each case—Sabbath, Passover, Tabernacles, and Dedication—John presents Jesus as the one who gathers the feasts into himself, bringing them to fulfillment. At the same time, the controversy between Jesus and the Jerusalem authorities intensifies, focussed on the significance of the festivals but with strong presentations of John's distinctive christology.

The story of John 5, the third "sign" in the Gospel, concerns the Sabbath. The fact that the healing of the disabled man takes place on a Sabbath is not revealed until later in the story (5:9b). Water is again part of the imagery, but John gives it no overt meaning. What the physical water of the pool cannot do in this case (5:7), Jesus is able to accomplish by word alone (5:8–9a). The indication of the Sabbath leads to conflict. The healed man seems to have no loyalty toward Jesus (unlike the man born blind in ch. 9) but betrays him to the authorities who are outraged at his breach of the Sabbath and who begin "persecuting" him (5:16). Jesus' warning to the man seems to imply a connection between his disability and his spiritual condition (5:14), but later in the Gospel John makes it clear that there is no necessary link between the two (9:2–3). The reference to sin is confined to one particular case, while the man's subsequent actions confirm Jesus' diagnosis.

The discourse that follows is profoundly revelatory of Jesus' identity and mission, and occurs in the context of sharp polemic. It expands on his preliminary self-defense: "My Father is still working, and I also am working" (5:17). This is a highly charged statement. The Judaism of the first century CE was aware of the theological problem of how God could rest on the Sabbath without creation grinding to a halt. They observed that God must, in some sense, continue to work, as evidenced in the fact that babies are born and people die on the Sabbath. Therefore, while still keeping the Sabbath, God is exempt in continuing to give life and to make judgment. This is precisely John's point here: Jesus is claiming to share the same divine exemption because he too is carrying out the uniquely divine task of giving life and judging. The story of the man's healing evidences both aspects of Jesus' ministry.

But why does Jesus, and Jesus alone, possess this godly exemption? For the simple reason that he is the divine Son (Logos) who dwells in intimate and loving union with the Father. Jesus as Son carries out the Father's work: he gives life, as the Father does, and exercises judgment as Son of Man. That life and that judgment are not only for the future but also realizable now—so much so that believers in the present can already be said to have "passed from death to life" (5:24). In Jesus' ministry, therefore, the Last Judgment is anticipated, a judgment and a life-giving based not on his own authority but that of the Father (5:25–29). John's conclusion is simple, therefore: the honor that is due the Father, as divine Life-giver and Judge, is due likewise to the Son (5:23).

Yet the Johannine Jesus does not testify to himself in making these extraordinary claims. John the Baptist has testified to him (5:32–35) but, even more so, the Father testifies to Jesus, and those who claim to know the Father must also recognize the Son (5:36–38). The Scriptures likewise testify to Jesus, including the preeminent figure of Moses, who stands as defense counsel for Jesus in his trial against the religious authorities—those who think they know the law but seek their own glory rather than the glory of God (5:39–47). Thus the Sabbath, for John, becomes a profound symbol of Jesus' identity and mission, revealing him as the Son who carries out the Father's work of giving life and judging. Both dimensions are present in the healing narrative and controversy of John 5.

6:1–71. Jesus and the Passover: The Bread of Life. Despite the geographical awkwardness, we now find Jesus suddenly in Galilee around the time of Passover. The imagery of this long and rather untidy narrative centers on the exodus: Moses, the manna, the paschal lamb, and the people of Israel journeying through the wilderness. John 6 contains two "signs," beginning with the multiplication of the loaves, familiar from the Synoptic tradition, yet with distinctly Johannine touches: the main disciples are Philip and Andrew, the loaves are barley loaves eaten by the very poor, and Jesus himself is both host and giver, distributing the food himself. The full Johannine meaning does not become apparent until the ensuing dialogue between Jesus and crowd, which is an extended commentary on the meaning of the feeding story.

That meaning begins to unfold in the crowd's response to the feeding: first they speculate as to Jesus' identity—the Moses-like prophet who is to come (6:14; see Deut 18:15, 18) and the king who feeds his people (6:14–15). Their attempt to crown him betrays both understanding and misunderstanding: Jesus is both prophet and king in this Gospel—though also far more, as the next, rather puzzling, scene indicates (6:16–21). Jesus' appearance on the lake is an epiphany, the second "sign" of this chapter and the fifth "sign" of the Gospel. It reveals Jesus' divine identity, manifest not just in the miracle of his walking on the water and the landing of the boat but in the self-disclosing, "It is I" (literally, "I am," 6:20).

The crowd seeking Jesus now find him and begin to explore the significance of the feeding. The dialogue works in typically Johannine style: misunderstanding leading to growing understanding, at least initially. Jesus makes a distinction between perishable food and the enduring "food" of eternal life (6:27), to which the miracle points, the only access to which is faith. The crowd begin to perceive the parallel with Moses who gave manna from heaven in the wilderness (6:31), but Jesus is quick to clarify their remaining misunderstanding: God is the giver of the manna, not Moses; the gift is not just a past event since God gives now in the present; the bread from heaven in the manna points to the true bread from heaven in Jesus; and the gift is not only life-giving for the Israelites but also for the world (6:32–33). Like the Samaritan woman (4:15), the crowd now asks for the gift and Jesus responds by revealing the full meaning of the feeding: he is himself the true bread come down from heaven on whom people must feed to gain eternal life (6:35). Jesus is both the giver and the gift.

This is the first of a series of metaphorical "I am" sayings in the Gospel, which reveal the identity of Jesus, just as the parables in the Synoptic Gospels reveal the kingdom of God. Tragically, however, Jesus' self-revelation in this case leads not to faith but rejection. The crowd cannot believe he is the bread from heaven and source of eternal life. They begin to "complain" (6:41)—a word that recalls the murmuring of the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod 16)—and cite Jesus' human identity as if it cancelled out his divine origins. Twice more Jesus repeats the "I am" saying (6:48, 51), drawing out the contrast with the manna in the wilderness, which had no power over death. The true manna, indeed, is Jesus' own flesh given "for the life of the world" (6:51).

This radical statement leads to open conflict (6:52), but Jesus, far from allaying his opponents' anxiety or soothing their repugnance, intensifies the metaphor of eating his flesh and drinking his blood. The evangelist draws on two traditions: first that of Lady Wisdom (Sophia), who as the nourisher is both the giver and the gift, the giver of food and the food itself, and second that of the paschal lamb, who is slaughtered and eaten at Passover in commemoration of the exodus. Yet this wealth of imagery also recalls vividly the Christian eucharist, where Jesus gives his flesh and blood to those who believe. This eucharistic self-giving comes through the cross, so that "giving" has a double sense: sacrificial death and table-fellowship. There are also overtones of breast-feeding, where the infant feeds from the maternal "flesh." The eucharist is here depicted as a relationship of "abiding," a mutual intimacy (6:57) where believers are drawn into the love of Father and Son.

Nonetheless, in the next section, the tragedy intensifies and many more abandon their discipleship (6:60–66). Jesus challenges them by drawing a distinction between the flesh he gives—which is life-giving—and human, material reality which, without the Spirit, is unable to bestow eternal life (6:63). Only the twelve are now left, and Peter speaks on their behalf in confirming his faith in the one who has "the words of eternal life" (6:68). Yet the tragic note does not end with the faith of these few disciples, for in their midst stands also the betrayer, Judas Iscariot (6:70). By the end of the narrative, then, through sign, festival, imagery, and dialogue, Jesus is revealed as the fulfiller of Passover, the true manna from heaven and lamb of God who gives himself in death and sacrament, and on whom believers must feed in order to find life.

7:1–52, 8:12–59. Jesus and Tabernacles: Water and Light. The long Tabernacles discourse of the next two chapters, much of which consists of hostile dialogue between Jesus and the Jerusalem authorities, is not easy to follow. At first it seems disjointed, partly because readers do not always understand the rites of Tabernacles on which the dialogue and the imagery turn. It is also complicated by the story of the woman caught in adultery (7:53–8:11), which is not found in the oldest and best manuscripts. The Tabernacles discourse takes place in the Temple, in the context of Jesus' teaching, and surrounded by hostility both from his family (7:5) and from the crowds gathered to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles. The debate focuses initially on Moses and the law, and the identity of Jesus as Messiah. Jesus does not answer in the terms of his opponents but speaks instead of his destiny, to return to the Father, which the crowd misunderstands. The authorities seek to arrest him, but Nicodemus defends Jesus and is abused for his pains (7:50–52).

In the midst of this conflict and uncertainty, Jesus reveals himself as the giver of living water, calling people to come and drink. Here John makes it explicit that water is symbolic of the Spirit. Yet water is also linked to the celebration of Tabernacles. One of the two main rites in the festival was the morning ritual of pouring water on the altar, first drawn from the Pool of Siloam. Thus by offering living water Jesus draws the festival to himself, revealing his giving of the Spirit as the promised gift of water flowing sumptuously from the Temple in the last days (Zech 14:8). Though English translations speak of water flowing from the believer's heart (7:38), the Greek is not as clear: the reference is probably, in the first place, to the flow of (blood and) water from the side of the crucified Christ (19:34) and only in a secondary sense the "spring of water gushing up to eternal life up" in the heart of the believer (4:14).

Later in the discourse Jesus alludes to the second great ritual of Tabernacles, the lighting of the great candelabra in the evenings so that the whole of the Temple was lit up. Using another "I am" saying, Jesus reveals himself as the light of the world (8:12), the one in whose light believers are illuminated. The claim gives rise to heightened hostility from the authorities; Jesus' claim parallels that of the Mosaic Law, which likewise enlightens the people of God (e.g. Ps 119:105). Jesus defends himself in relation to the Father, but the Jerusalem authorities fail to understand; ironically, only on the cross will his full identity be disclosed (8:28).

Not all those present at the festival, however, remain hostile to Jesus. Some come to believe, and Jesus encourages them to "continue in my word" (8:31), a word that will liberate them through knowledge of the truth. Yet the promise of freedom leads anew to hostility and wrath. How can the free children of Abraham need freedom? Jesus does not answer directly but points to himself as the Son, the only truly free member of the household. It is sin, not genealogy, that indicates one's true status, slave or free (8:34–36), and sin reveals itself, for John, in the rejection of Jesus and the rejection of the life he offers. The rest of the dialogue, as the polemic intensifies, focuses on Abraham as the father of faith and of true Judaism. The Johannine Jesus claims a status greater than Abraham, able to give life beyond that of Israel's leading ancestors. As with Moses and Jacob, Abraham too is on Jesus' side and "rejoiced that he would see my day" (8:56). The more Jesus reveals of himself, however, the more violently he is rejected: ironically, unbelief can be as revealing as faith. Finally, Jesus' claim climaxes in an ultimate statement of self-revelation: "before Abraham was, I am" (8:58). Here Jesus claims a divine status that derives from his identity as the Logos and Son before creation. His opponents, in face of this seeming blasphemy, attempt to execute him, but once again he escapes their violence (8:59; see 7:30, 32). Thus throughout the Tabernacles discourse, in dialogue and questioning, in hostility, aborted faith, and sudden violence, Jesus reveals himself as the giver of living water and light of the world, taking to himself the rites, metaphors, and inner meaning of the Feast of Tabernacles.

9:1–41. Tabernacles: Healing of the Man Born Blind. The story of the man born blind, the sixth "sign" of Jesus' public ministry, belongs to John's development of Tabernacles imagery. John sets out the major terms of the narrative in the opening verses. The question of sin—for the man himself and for Jesus—will revolve around the Sabbath (9:14), while the imagery of light will dominate the plot (9:4–5). The light imagery is supplemented by that of water, since the man is told to wash in Siloam, with its Tabernacles overtones, which John interprets christologically (9:7). The man's sight is not restored; rather he is given new sight for the first time by the creative Word of God. Creation imagery is present in the way Jesus uses dust/clay to heal him (Gen 2:7).

A series of interrogations follow in which Jesus is paradoxically absent. First the man is questioned by his neighbors (9:8–12) and then by the Pharisees who are concerned about the breach of the Sabbath (9:13–17) and who cannot agree among themselves whether Jesus is a sinner. Even the man's parents are interrogated (9:18–23), confirming his natal blindness and demonstrating their terror of the authorities with the threat of excommunication (apōsynagōgos, 9:22). The result is to throw the onus back on the man himself. This time, however, he engages the authorities with greater confidence and defiance (9:24–34). More and more he comes to side with Jesus, concluding that Jesus could not possibly be a sinner and must therefore have come "from God" (9:33).

The final, climactic scene sets out the basic reversal of the story. On the one hand, the man is sought out by Jesus and comes to full faith in him (9:35–38); this is the first time he actually sees Jesus in the narrative, though that "seeing" is both physical and spiritual. For the man himself, this is a tale of illumination where, even in Jesus' absence, he moves toward the light and recognizes Jesus as the Light of the world. The story would have been powerful in the early church, given Jesus' physical absence yet his continuing power to draw people to himself (see 12:32).

The story is equally about sin and judgment. The authorities move through the narrative from doubt to outright rejection, both of Jesus and of the man born blind, concluding that they are inextricably bound in sin (9:24, 34). Yet blindness of itself, says John, does not constitute sin. The problem with the Pharisees is their claim to sight and their self-delusion, condemning them to abide in sin (9:41).

10:1–42. Jesus and Dedication: The Good Shepherd. While the imagery changes significantly in this chapter, the opening section also provides something of a commentary on the previous story. The figures of those who harm the sheep, as against the true shepherd recall the abuse the man born blind has suffered at the hands of the authorities. The opening verses set out the scenario (10:1–5). In the face of misunderstanding Jesus unfolds the imagery with the use of two "I am" sayings: the Gate of the sheepfold (10:7–10) and the Good Shepherd (10:11–18). In the first case, Jesus is the one—the only one—through whom access to life is possible. The gate gives the sheep access to security and protection at night, and pasture and nourishment in the day. So the Johannine Jesus gives abundant life to those who follow him, who belong to his flock (10:10). In the second case, the Good Shepherd imagery finds its background in the OT where the shepherd is used as an image for the king and leaders of Israel, just as the community of Israel is depicted as a flock of sheep (see Ps 23; Ezek 34). The background makes it clear that, for John, the symbolism points to Jesus' kingship and his authority over his flock, the people of God. Unlike the hired hand, the real shepherd has a real investment in the sheep.

At this point the imagery begins to stretch almost to breaking point (10:17–18). Unlike an ordinary shepherd, this shepherd is prepared to die for his sheep. Once more it becomes clear that Jesus gives life through death; he also possesses uniquely divine authority over life and death, including his own. He lays down his own life, and he also takes it up again. Unlike other NT statements of the resurrection, Jesus in this Gospel has the power and right to take back his own life, an authority that derives from the Father.

The discourse leads, predictably, to conflict with the authorities, so outrageous are Jesus' claims. The context is Dedication, the last festival in the cycle, a winter feast commemorating the liberation of God's people from their Syrian overlords and persecutors in the second century BCE (10:22). When challenged, the Johannine Jesus exposes the opponents who demonstrate by their behavior that they do not belong to the flock, and reiterates the basis of his authority and identity: "The Father and I are one" (10:30). So incendiary a statement serves only to irritate the authorities who accuse him of blasphemy. Yet what he has demonstrated in word and deed is the total dedication of his life to his God and Father. By the end of the cycle, Jesus has revealed himself as the fulfiller of the rites and rituals of Judaism, not discarding or overriding them but bringing them to fruition. For John, Jesus is the reality to which the OT symbols point, unfolding their true meaning.

D. Climax of the Public Ministry: Resurrection and the "Hour" (11:1–12:50)

11:1–12:11. The Raising of Lazarus. These chapters form the conclusion and climax of Jesus' public ministry; they also set in motion the passion and resurrection story. The hostility now reaches such a point that, instead of spontaneous attacks on Jesus, the authorities lay a careful plot against him, and Jesus enters Jerusalem with the knowledge that "the hour" of his glorification is at hand.

Although it is a little unclear where exactly this account ends, it seems to include the plot against Jesus and the anointing at Bethany, as well as the final attempt to kill Lazarus. This gives a circular, chiasmic pattern to the narrative, the threat to Lazarus' life forming the outer parameters (A and A', 11:1–16 and 12:9–11), Jesus' meeting with Martha paralleled by his anointing by Mary (B and B', 11:17–27 and 12:1–8), his meeting with Mary and the mourners the counterpart of the reaction to Jesus following the "sign" (C and C', 11:28–37 and 11:45–57) and the raising of Lazarus to life the center of the narrative (D, 11:38–44).

In the opening scene, the narrator sets out the main characters and their connection to Jesus, as well as Jesus' own response to the crisis. John's language for the relationship of Jesus to the Bethany family is that of discipleship: these are "friends" in the full, Johannine sense (see 15:15). Despite his closeness to the family, Jesus remains where he is for two days, having described Lazarus' illness as leading not "to death" but to the manifestation of glory (11:4, 6). The disciples misunderstand Jesus' reference to Lazarus being asleep (11:11), but the image illustrates the authority Jesus possesses: to raise his friend from the dead is no more difficult than rousing him from sleep (11:11–15). As Jesus departs, Thomas recalls the danger in his returning to Judea; the underlay of this story is the passion narrative.

The next two scenes take place before rather than after the miracle and draw out the meaning of the "sign." In the first of these, Martha's conversation with Jesus is of critical importance for the story as a whole (11:17–27). Though a "friend" of Jesus and therefore a disciple, Martha still does not understand the full implications of his identity. Despite some optimism, she assumes Lazarus is beyond hope and that resurrection is a future, postponed reality. But Jesus invites her to a new understanding in which resurrection is bound both to his own identity and to the present moment. This is centered on the "I am" saying, "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25), which reveals that the life Jesus offers—the life he both gives and is—is a life that transcends death. For John, Christ's victory over death is already spelled out so that death is now, at most, a penultimate reality. The resurrection life of the last day can already be experienced in relationship to him. Martha accepts Jesus' self-revelation and, like Peter in the Synoptic Gospels, confidently declares her faith in Jesus as the Messiah (11:27)—though her later reservations at the tomb suggest that her faith is not yet complete (11:39). Jesus' subsequent meeting with Mary and the mourners shows again their lack of understanding (11:28–37); yet Mary's falling at Jesus' feet points forward to the anointing. His emotional response to their grief suggests not just his own very human grief and anger at death but also awareness of his approaching death.

The central scene is replete with symbolism. Lazarus now inhabits a domain that is beyond recall; no human voice can penetrate the walls of death. Yet Jesus' voice does precisely that, because he shares the Father's authority over life and death (see 5:25–26). Unafraid of the terrible stench of death, Jesus summons Lazarus into the light of life, bidding the bystanders unwrap the bonds of death and decay that entrap him (11:44). Revealed now as "the resurrection and the life," who prefigures the final resurrection of the dead and gives life in the now of human mortality, Jesus draws many of the mourners to faith in him (11:45–57). So enthusiastic is their response that the authorities, led by the high priest Caiaphas, plot to kill him, unwittingly serving not their own ends but God's, since Jesus will indeed "die for the nation" and for "the dispersed children of God" (11:49–52).

The banquet at Bethany expresses at one level the sisters' gratitude for the restoration of their brother. Mary's act of anointing parallels Martha's earlier confession of faith (11:27). Here Mary and Judas Iscariot stand in stark contrast as the true and the false disciple. The extravagance of Mary's action is an appropriate response to the costliness of what Jesus has done in bringing her brother back from the dead. In a deep sense, he has given his life for Lazarus, and Mary's act shows awareness of the death that will follow. For now, the beauty of the perfume, pervading the house, contrasts vividly with the stench at the open tomb, for this is a story—whether about Lazarus or about Jesus—whose last word is life. And yet, in the final scene, Lazarus' life is again threatened by the hostile authorities, who are out to destroy not only Jesus but also his friends (12:9–11).

12:12–19. Jesus' Entry into Jerusalem. The dual response to Jesus seen in the narrative of Lazarus is also present in the triumphal entry. Although this story is given less prominence than in Mark or Matthew, it is important for John that Jesus enters the city as its King, riding an animal of peace. Only later, remembering in the light of Easter, do the disciples perceive the significance of this event (12:16). In the meantime, many of the believing mourners testify to their faith, and the hostile authorities, in another unintentionally prophetic statement, exclaim in despair that "the world has gone after him!" (12:19).

12:20–50. The Manifestation of the "Hour." In the coming of the Greeks—probably Gentiles who are attracted to Judaism—Jesus at once recognizes the coming of his "hour," to which he has alluded several times throughout the Gospel (2:4; 7:30; 8:20). In each case it refers to the divinely appointed time of his death, which human beings try unsuccessfully to hasten. But now the presence of Gentiles who wish to "see" Jesus, to draw close to him in faith, is the trigger by which he recognizes the imminence of the passion. The coming of the Greeks signifies that "the world has gone after him," and that his gift of life has extended beyond Jewish borders to Gentiles, thus completing his public mission on earth. Jesus' response identifies the pattern of discipleship in the seed dying and rising (12:24), —the foundational pattern of his own life and death.

Jesus' distress is now apparent yet, unlike the Synoptics, it does not lead to his asking God to permit him to bypass the hour. He is so perfectly united to the Father that, in this Gospel, he does not struggle to obey the divine will; instead he prays for the Father's glorification and the Father responds in kind (27–28). In the Johannine cross, suffering, death, and evil are definitively overcome, provoking the final judgment and the giving of eternal life. Jesus' crucifixion is both literally and symbolically an exaltation, the revelation of who God is and what the incarnation means. The central symbol is that of Jesus raised high, his arms extended in love to embrace "all people" (or, possibly, "all things," 12:32) and to draw them to his light and life.

John concludes the public ministry with the hiding of the Light through unbelief, a tragic eventuality that Isaiah has already discerned having, like Abraham, seen Jesus' glory (12:38–41). Yet, as in the Prologue, the looming tragedy is not the last word; many do believe though fear of eviction by the authorities holds them back. Jesus' last words are a summons to faith: only in him and his revelation are salvation and life to be found, as well as freedom from judgment. All of Jesus' ministry thus far has been at the bidding, and with the authority, of the Father who has sent the Son to give life to the world.

III. Jesus' Private Ministry: The Last Supper (13:1–17:26)

In this major subdivision of the Gospel, Jesus turns from the public to the private world of his own disciples. Most of the material in these five chapters is uniquely Johannine and without extensive parallel in the Synoptic Gospels. The Farewell Discourse (13:31–16:33) contains material that is repetitious, and some have speculated that it originally circulated in two versions, both of which the evangelist has incorporated. Whatever its origins, these chapters in their present form are now largely integrated, thanks to the evangelist's careful editorial work, and despite some awkwardness in detail. Along with the events on either side—the footwashing and the prayer—which act as the frame, the whole forms a chiasmic structure, with the vine symbolism at the center in the opposition of love and hate (15:1–16:4a). Jesus' departure acts as both the context and theme of the whole.

A. Jesus Washes the Disciples' Feet (13:1–30)

13:1–20. The Footwashing. The opening three sentences serve as a mini-prologue, outlining Jesus' destiny (just as the Prologue outlined his origins) and the implications for his disciples. The setting is just before Passover, the third Passover in John's Gospel, and John brings to it the festal associations of Jesus as the new temple, the Host at the table, the Lamb of God, and the true Bread from heaven. In John's Gospel, this is not a Passover meal as in the Synoptics. The arrival of the "hour," however, does signal the passion, which John interprets as Jesus' return to the Father. The main thrust of the first sentence is Jesus' love for his disciples, which is the motivation behind everything that is to follow in the second half of the Gospel (13:1c). Jesus' love for "his own" (see 1:11–13) extends "to the end" not just in terms of time—till the end of his life—but also in scope: his love for them is total, radical, complete. Though the betrayer is in the midst, ironically part of the intimate circle to which Jesus has turned (13:2), Jesus walks forward towards the passion in full knowledge of what the Father has given him, and in obedience to his appointed destiny.

In this context Jesus performs the footwashing, an act that John outlines in careful, almost ritualized detail. Simon Peter's forceful reaction against it (13:4–8a) is both typical of his impetuous character and also gives the opportunity for Jesus to explain its necessity. His brief answer outlines its primary meaning: "unless I wash you, you have no share with me" (13:8). In the ancient world, footwashing was done for reasons of hygiene and hospitality, generally by a slave or other socially inferior person. It also had cultic significance, suggesting the ritual purity needed, for example, in entering the Temple. It is the latter meaning that has primacy here. The footwashing is fundamentally an act of ritual cleansing that enables the disciples to enter into full union with their Lord. Once Peter has grasped the point, he demands to be cleansed from head to toe. But Jesus explains that the disciples have already been cleansed and need only their feet washed, just as guests will bathe at home before a banquet and then have their feet washed on arrival—with the exception of Judas Iscariot, the betrayer (13:10–11). The footwashing, therefore, belongs in the context of the passion, signifying union with Jesus in his sacrificial death.

Yet John draws out a further meaning. Not only is the footwashing a symbol of cleansing and union with Christ, it is also symbolic of the love within the believing community (13:12–17). This kind of servant love is the love that Jesus has demonstrated for "his own" and is to be the basis of Christian love. Disciples are drawn into a community, not just with Jesus but also with one another. This will be an important theme in the Farewell Discourse: Jesus will be present to his people in their self-giving love for, and service of, one another. The circle of love that this creates has its origins in the Father (13:20).

13:21–30. Revelation of the Betrayer. For the second time in the Gospel, Jesus expresses his dismay and distress at the arrival of "the hour" (12:27; 13:21); this time, it is the intentions of the betrayer that prompt distress. Only now do the disciples become aware of what Jesus has been prophesying all along. This is also the first description of the unnamed disciple as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (see 1:35–39). Note that he is "reclining next to" Jesus, holding the place of honor and intimacy at the banquet (13:23, 25), and he is therefore in a position to whisper to Jesus. John uses an expressive metaphor to describe the posture of this disciple: he is reclining next to Jesus' "heart" (literally, "bosom," kolpos, and "breast," stēthos), occupying the place of the true disciple, just as Jesus is "close to the Father's heart" (kolpos, 1:18).

B. Farewell Discourse (13:31–16:33)

13:31–14:31. Jesus' Departure: The Way, the Paraclete, Love, and Peace. The current chapter division is unfortunately placed. The Farewell Discourse begins before ch. 14, and there is no gulf between 13:38 and 14:1. Jesus commences the discourse with the central motif of the passion, the mutual glorification of Father and Son. Just as Jesus will glorify God by revealing on the cross the full extent of the Father's life-giving love for the world (see 3:16), so God will glorify Jesus by lifting him up, through the cross (death, resurrection, and ascension), to return to the heavenly glory of the Father. In view of his imminent departure, Jesus gives his disciples the love command (13:33–35) as a sign of his presence and a sign to the world. What is "new" about this command is not the notion of love within the community, which belongs firmly within the Mosaic Law but rather the expression "just as I have loved you." The love of Jesus has been demonstrated ritually and symbolically in the footwashing and will be enacted on the cross.

Peter's desire to follow his Lord's path will prove illusory (13:36–38). Yet, for all the solemn warning, Jesus immediately goes on to comfort the disciples, faced with the pain of his departure and their own inability to follow as true servants of their Master (see 12:26; 13:16). This consolation is based in the temporary nature of their separation; Jesus' return to the Father means his preparation for a reunion with them, through the Father (14:1–3). Thomas and Philip take Jesus' language literally, failing to realize that Jesus is speaking symbolically and christologically. He is himself the true and life-giving Way to the Father who is the ultimate destination not just of Jesus but also the community of disciples (14:5–6); to see Jesus is to see the Father (14:8–9). That means that the access disciples have to Jesus—an access that will continue, despite the separation—is access also to the Father.

It is difficult to know precisely how to interpret the language of Jesus' return throughout the Farewell Discourse. On the one hand, it suggests the idea of the parousia, Christ's future coming. At the same time, a very strong theology of the Spirit emerges in five distinctive passages throughout these chapters. In the first of these passages, the Spirit is named "the Advocate" (literally "Paraclete," paraklḗtos), who will be the presence of Jesus for the bereft and orphaned community (14:15–18). John's concept of the Spirit-Paraclete, confined to these chapters of the Gospel, is rich and complex, its range of meaning emerging throughout the discourse. While advocacy is part of that role, here in this context the idea of comfort dominates. As the Spirit of Jesus, sent from the Father, the Paraclete will bring consolation to the community. Note that John describes the Spirit as "another Advocate," implying that Jesus is the first and that his ministry will be paralleled by that of the abiding Spirit.

So is Jesus' coming a future event, at the end of history, or is it manifest in the imminent arrival of the Spirit-Paraclete? The answer is probably both. Though John gives considerable emphasis to the present moment, it is nonetheless an anticipation —of what God has promised for the future. The Spirit's presence guarantees the continuing love of Father and Son: to abide in that love means to hold to the love command, thus remaining within the divine circle of love (14:21). This love is not intended as a revelation to the "world"—and here John uses "world" in its most negative sense, as the realm of darkness that lies over against God— but is intended for the believing community, who are themselves the sign of Jesus' love for those outside. This leads into the second promise of the Advocate who, this time, has the role of Teacher and Reminder, making real and dynamic the teaching of the Johannine Jesus (14:26).

At this point, Jesus comes to the end of the first part of the discourse, underlining his departure with the gift of peace (shalom), the reiteration of his reassurance against anxiety and the promise of his return. Joy, not sorrow, is to be the appropriate response of the disciples in the face of Jesus' return to his beloved Father, who is the ground of his divinely human identity. That departure, via the cross, will bring about the radical overpowering of "the ruler of this world" (14:30). Though the light appears to be quenched, it cannot be overcome by the darkness (see 1:5); on the contrary, the darkness will be overcome by the light.

15:1–16:4a. Abiding-in-Love and the World's Hatred. The Farewell Discourse now moves into more explicit symbolism, developing Jesus' words about love and union from the previous chapter (14:20–21). This section forms the chiasmic center of chapters 13–17, with its key opposition between love and hate. The primary image is that of the vine, which becomes a kind of symbolic allegory of the relationship between Jesus, the Father and the believing community (15:1–11). As with the sheep and the sheepfold, the vine is an important symbol for Israel in the OT (see, e.g., Ps 80:8–13; Jer 2:21; Ezek. 17:6–8; Hos 10:1). In John the vine functions as a major symbol for the church, with the emphasis on the vital interdependence between vine, branches, and vine grower.

An important part of the viticulturalist's art is the pruning of branches to encourage new growth. This process involves both removing dead branches and cutting back those that remain. It is significant that John speaks literally of this pruning as a "cleansing," a purifying that takes place through the life-giving word of Jesus (15:2–3, 6). Pruning makes fruit-bearing possible, the maturation of the grapes for the vintage and the making of wine. Fruit most likely refers metaphorically to the exterior signs of love within the community, which enable believers to find abundant life and thrive in relation to one another.

Throughout the Gospel, John has used the concept of abiding to express his understanding of discipleship (see 1:38–39). Unfortunately, this theme is often obscured in English translation, which tends not to translate "abide" consistently but sometimes uses "stay" or "remain" (meno[–]; see 1:38–39; 4:40; 9:41). Although John employs imagery of following to indicate discipleship, abiding is the more fundamental Johannine notion, articulating the intimacy, connection, and rest that lie at the core of faith. In the image of the vine, John brings the notion of abiding to prominence as the most apt metaphor to describe the mutuality and interdependence of divine love, and of the love between disciples and their Lord.

In the verses that follow, John develops the imagery of the vine in categories of love and friendship. Now friendship becomes the primary category of the relationship between Jesus and disciples rather than the master-slave paradigm (15:15). Yet this intimate friendship does not rule out the call to obedience (15:14, 17). Mutuality, rather than equality, is the nature of the union. Disciples are still called to obey their Lord but as free, adult children of the household, not infants or slaves. It is the mature obedience of those who have been invited into the circle of love and knowing (15:16). This friendship is profoundly christological: it is grounded in Christ's friendship for his own that shows itself most radically in his dying for them (15:13). Abiding with him on the vine draws disciples also into relationship with one another as intimate "friends," making complete the circle of love that originates with the Father. Although no explicit mention is made of the Spirit in these verses, the implications are present, carried over from the previous chapter. All that Jesus offers in his capacity as the Vine and true Lover of the disciples is sustained by the Paraclete who bridges perfectly the gap between the absent Lord and his future return.

The opposite of the love and friendship within the community of faith is the hatred and persecution of the world (15:18–16:4a). Here again John uses "world" in its most negative sense: not in reference to the material domain but the realm of death and darkness. The hatred of this realm is an inevitable concomitant of belonging to Christ; indeed, the world's hatred is really a hatred of Jesus himself—and ultimately hostility to the Father (15:20–23). Jesus' coming, in other words, has given rise to both illumination and judgment, a two-sided response that will continue in the disciples' experience in the world. In this context, the role of the Holy Spirit is forensic (15:26–27). In the third Paraclete passage, the Spirit is indeed the Advocate, who bears witness on the disciples' behalf, precisely in the context of the world's hatred. This promise gives strength and comfort to the community as it faces the inevitability of persecution (16:1–4a). Note that John's description of these tribulations comes, not from the pagan world but rather from within Judaism, with particular reference to exclusion from the synagogue (apōsynagōgōs, 16:2; see 9:22; 12:42). This reflects the struggle of the early post-70CE Christian community to establish itself over against the (also struggling) Jewish community, from whence it sprang. Once again, "remembering" plays an important role in the life of the believing community, a task that belongs rightly to the Paraclete (see 2:17, 22; 14:26).

16:4b–33. Jesus' Departure: The Paraclete, Joy, Love, and Peace. The third section of the Farewell Discourse provides a parallel with the first section, in its common themes of Jesus' departure, the coming of the Paraclete, the scattering of the disciples, and Jesus' gift of peace. Once again, while acknowledging the pain of Jesus' departure, John presents that departure as paradoxically of benefit to the community. Just as the Johannine Jesus speaks earlier of the Father being greater than himself (14:28), so now he describes the coming of the Paraclete as bringing greater advantage to the disciples (16:7). The role of the Spirit is again forensic in this fourth passage, but this time in prosecution against the world, convicting it of sin. The important point here is that the Advocate reveals that "the ruler of this world" stands already under judgment (16:11), a judgment effected through the cross.

In the fifth and last reference to the Paraclete in the Farewell Discourse, the Holy Spirit reveals the truth to the believing community: not a static view of truth but a dynamic, vibrant sense that implies the Spirit's continuing voice in the life of the church (16:13). This testimony to truth, which parallels Jesus' own ministry (see 8:32; 14:6), is authenticated by the Spirit's origins and purpose. Just as everything Jesus has said and done has been given him by the Father for the purpose of the Father's glorification, so everything to be said and done by the indwelling "Spirit of truth" will be given by the Son for the Son's glorification (16:13–15). In terminology developed in later centuries, John's understanding of God is trinitarian.

Turning now to the disciples, Jesus offers them consolation in view of his imminent demise. No less than modern readers of the Gospel are Jesus' disciples puzzled by his promise to return in "a little while" (16:16–19). Their bewilderment is resolved, however, not by direct answer (as is typical of the Johannine Jesus) but by the symbolic allegory of the woman who gives birth. In a mother's experience, as with disciples faced by the absence of Jesus, there is a paradoxical juxtaposition of pain and joy. The joy helps her to endure and leave behind the pain. Thus, within the framework of Jesus' imminent coming—both in the gift of the Spirit and in his own future return—the suffering of disciples is set within a wider perspective.

By the end of the Farewell Discourse, light has dawned on the disciples. They know now Jesus' true origins and destiny, they understand the temporal nature of the separation, and they comprehend the Father's love that embraces them (16:25–30). Jesus' last words to them are words of warning but mostly of consolation. Despite the persecution and the dispersion, despite their abandonment of Jesus, the disciples are held in his peace and victory, just as he is held in the Father's abiding presence (16:31–33). His conquest of death and darkness, paradoxically through the cross, will have the last word.

C. Jesus' Great Prayer (17:1–26)

Jesus' prayer forms the climax of this section of the Gospel, paralleling the footwashing in its focus on themes of love and unity. Technically, it indicates the conclusion of the fellowship meal (not a Passover meal in John) but also suggests farewell speeches of dying patriarchs in the OT who conclude their last utterances with prayer (see Gen 49; Deut 33; Josh 24). Traditionally, John 17 has been called the "high priestly prayer." Though John does not depict Jesus in high-priestly categories (as Hebrews does), Jesus, in this chapter, is engaging in intercession on behalf of his people. A more strictly Johannine title, however, is the "Prayer of the Departing Redeemer." A peculiar feature of John 17 is that elsewhere the Johannine Jesus seems to discount the need for intercessory prayer, so perfect is the unity of will between him and the Father (11:41–42; 12:27–28). Jesus' prayers, therefore, serve a wider function than strictly intercession: they point to the communion between Father and Son, and they draw the believing community—the objects of prayer—into Jesus' relationship with God.

17:1–5. Prayer for Glory. Jesus' great prayer is popularly read as a prayer for unity among Christians, but this is only a part of the story. Fundamentally it is a prayer for glorification, as the opening section indicates. Jesus reiterates his announcement of the "hour" (12:23; 13:1), and prays within the context of his passion for that mutual glorification that is its inner, Johannine meaning (17:1, 4–5). The opening verses are a summary of the mission of Jesus: at the heart of the revelation of glory is the gift of eternal life, found in intimate union with the Son and, through him, with the Father (17:2–3). The divine power that Jesus possesses and that authorizes him to bestow eternal life, is grounded in the Son's authority in creation, extending to all "flesh" and not just "all people" (sarx, 17:2) as the NRSV suggests .

From this it becomes clear that the whole prayer points in two directions at the same time. On the one hand, it points backwards to the beginning of the Gospel. The one who prays here is the Son who is "close to the Father's heart" (1:18), standing face-to-face with God as the eternal Word-made-flesh (1:1–2, 14). On the other hand, the prayer looks forward to the passion narrative to follow. The prayer is itself an act of glorification, and, in that sense, it both anticipates and enacts the passion. It illustrates that the deepest meaning of the cross in John's Gospel is the exaltation of the Son to the Father, an act of prayer and praise that draws creation into its boundless, life-giving embrace. What is played out here, on the historical plain, is the eternal self-offering of the Son to the Father and the Father's mutual love for the Son.

17:6–19. Prayer for the Disciples. Jesus turns now to his disciples and prays for them in the light of the impending separation. This part of the prayer acts as a kind of protective seal over the disciples, guarding them against the dangers of the world and emphasizing that the love they have already received from Jesus will not be taken from them. More fundamental than the intercessory level, however, is the notion of prayer as communion. In this sense, the disciples through the words and act of the prayer are drawn into the love and self-offering of the Son to the Father. Their place within the trinitarian circle of love is assured. Once again, though the Spirit is not named explicitly, it is precisely the role of the Paraclete to ensure and actualize that ongoing presence, despite the disjunction of Jesus' departure.

In these verses, the disciples are given the gift of the "name" to protect and inspire them (17:6, 11–13). In the OT, this refers to the divine name, the unspeakable and unpronounceable name of God. For John, by extension, the name is that of the Father, and the gift is given by Jesus himself who has such authority as, and only as, the Son. The disciples are protected also by the word that Jesus has given them, a radical self-giving that draws them like a magnet to holiness and truth (17:17–19). Yet this protection occurs within the world and not outside it. The disciples are not removed from danger and the power of the Evil One but rather protected in the Father's love and unity within the context of violence and persecution (17:15). These intercessions echo the petitions of the Lord's Prayer (Matt 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4).

17:20–26. Prayer for Future Believers. The circle of intimacy between the Father and Son, which has widened (through the Spirit-Paraclete) to include Jesus' disciples, now widens even further: future believers are drawn into the orbit of the divine love and union. The focus of this last section is on the oneness of believers, which echoes and reflects the oneness within the divine being (17:20–21). This unity is part of the glory that Jesus renders to the Father and passes on to the believing community (17:22–23). John does not specify the nature of the unity among Christians. Rather, his focus is on its quality as a gift, an intrinsic part of the divine nature into which the Church is drawn. Therefore, "to know" signifies an intimate and life-giving relationship that draws creation into the trinitarian love at the heart of all things. As Son, Jesus draws believers into his own filiation, so that they too share in the intimacy of his union with the Father and become "children of God" (1:12–13). This relationship is the source and origin of eternal life, encapsulated in Jesus' prayer and enacted through the glory of his selfgiving, life-giving death on the cross.

IV. Jesus' Death and Resurrection (18:1–21:25)

The Johannine passion and resurrection narratives are not a journalistic account of the crucifixion. They are also a highly stylized and symbolic portrayal of the meaning of that death for the believing community. This is not to say that the narratives lack historical basis but rather that they are so shaped as to draw readers to faith. The cross, in John, is a verbal or narrative icon, a profound meditation on the saving significance of the crucified and risen Christ. To gaze on this "icon" in faith is the Johannine understanding of salvation (19:27).

The narrative as a whole is bounded on either side by garden imagery: John refers explicitly to the arrest, burial, and first Easter appearance as taking place in a garden. In the OT the garden is a symbol of paradise, of Spring and new life, fecundity and harmony (Gen 2; Song of Songs). Symbolically, the garden is where creation begins and harmony founders, where, despite loss, hope remains of love flowering again in the promise of paradise restored. For John, this OT promise is fulfilled, paradoxically, in the brutality of the arrest and the mournful yet unexpectedly sumptuous burial. The imagery reaches its climax in the Easter garden where Mary Magdalene is reunited with her beloved Lord and commissioned to proclaim his resurrection to the disciples.

A. Jesus' Arrest and Trial (18:1–19:16a)

John 18 begins a new section of the Gospel. Jesus now moves from the private, intimate world of his disciples to the public arena and the hostility of his opponents. The irony is that one of the inner circle has treacherously bridged the divide between the two irreconcilable realms, between enemy and friend. To acknowledge this chapter as a new beginning, however, from a narrative point of view, should not obscure the way John writes, overlapping one story and one section with another. There is also a sense in which the passion commences much earlier in the narrative. Just as in Mark and Matthew the passion narrative begins with the anointing of Jesus' head, so the Johannine passion is foreshadowed by the washing/ anointing of feet—Jesus' feet anointed by Mary of Bethany (11:1, 12:1–8) and the disciples' feet washed by Jesus (13:1–20), both of which pre-figure the passion and resurrection, embodying Jesus' assent to his destiny.

18:1–11. Arrest in a Garden. The arrest itself is rather astonishing in John's account, carrying a touch of farce. The arresting party is ludicrously overblown for the seizure of one man and yet insignificant in view of his sublime identity. Judas leads a large contingent of Roman soldiers and Jewish police who bristle with weapons, lanterns, and torches to overpower the Light of the World. Yet when the soldiers approach Jesus, it is he who takes the initiative—"For whom are you looking?" (18:4, 7, author's trans.)—and his selfidentifying, "I am he," which literally means "I am" (ego eimi), makes them fall to the ground, overcome by his majesty. John thus emphasizes that Jesus consents to what is occurring and never for a moment loses his identity; on the contrary, against adversity and enmity it shines the more brightly (see 1:5).

Jesus' concern is not for himself but "his own," those for whom he has just prayed (17:9–19). Loving them to the end (13:1), he ensures their safety above everything else. His request to those arresting him is authoritative (18:9). Although Peter's rash act of violence against the high priest's servant (named "Malchus" only in John, 18:10) is comprehensible in the circumstances, Jesus' rebuke indicates Peter's unwillingness to accept God's will—a will with which Jesus is in full accord (18:11)—as well as his folly in courting unnecessary danger.

18:12–27. Jesus and Peter at the High Priest's Court. The story of Peter's denial occurs, with variations, in all four Gospels (Mark 14:66–72; Matt 26:69–75; Luke 22:54–62). In each case, it is placed alongside, and contrasted with, Jesus' appearance before members of the Jerusalem hierarchy. In John, the contrast is also between the unnamed disciple (probably "the disciple whom Jesus loved"), who has access to the high priest's court, and Simon Peter, who does not. As at the Last Supper, the unnamed disciple takes precedence over Peter (13:23–25). Peter denies his Lord three times (18:17, 25–27a), thus fulfilling Jesus' prophecy and confirming his foreknowledge (13:37–38; 16:32; 18:27b). His desire to "follow" is not lacking, but his courage fails. At the end of the Gospel, Jesus prophesies that Peter will indeed follow him faithfully to death (21:18–19).

Jesus' trial before Annas is set within the story of Peter's denial. On either side, Peter is "standing and warming himself" in the wintry courtyard: outside in the cold, in company with Jesus' enemies (18:18, 25), denying all knowledge of Jesus. Peter's emphatic "I am not" contrasts with Jesus' earlier "I am" (18:5, 6, 8, 17, 25). By contrast, Jesus under questioning defends himself, protesting against the injustice that confronts him (18:20–23); there has been nothing covert or surreptitious about his teaching, as any witness could validate. By the end of the scene, the religious authorities seem at a loss and nothing is resolved. Jesus is handed over for questioning to Caiaphas, Annas' son-in-law (11:49–50), but nothing is said of its progress or outcome (18:24).

The centerpiece of the Johannine trial narrative is the trial before Pilate, which occurs in seven scenes, with Pilate shuttling back and forth between his headquarters (the pretorium), where Jesus is, and outside, where the Jewish authorities are. Their fear of ritual defilement at Passover prevents their entering an unclean, Gentile edifice (18:28). In the first scene, outside the pretorium (18:29–32), Pilate tries to pin down the charge against Jesus, but the Jerusalem authorities want only to have him executed. John underlines that everything happens in fulfillment of either the Scriptures or, as now, the word of Jesus (18:32). The second scene, inside, is between Pilate and Jesus (18:33–38a). Again Pilate seeks to locate the charge against Jesus but again fails. Jesus does not answer his questions directly but describes his "kingdom" or "kingship" as not belonging to this world (basileia, 18:36). It is not unrelated to the world, but it does not use the methods of the world to establish itself. Its origins are "from above" and of a different quality from the world's understanding of power and authority. As King, Jesus embodies truth—and truth is what the trial is supposedly about. Yet Pilate answers with a shrug, as if the whole question were too difficult for him (18:38a) despite the fact that, as governor, he supposedly represents truth and justice.

The third scene (18:38b–40) makes it clear that Pilate is now convinced of Jesus' innocence. To appease the Jerusalem hierarchy, Pilate suggests releasing Barabbas, a "bandit" (a freedom-fighter or terrorist), while taunting them with the title "King of the Jews," underlining their subject status and increasing the enmity between them and Jesus. (John is, of course, writing after the Jewish War [66–70 CE], aware of the tragic consequences of the rebellion against Rome.) The fourth scene is the center of the chiasm (19:1–3). Jesus is taken before the Roman soldiers who flog him, dress him as a king, and ridicule him—the only mockery in John's account of the crucifixion. It represents Pilate's second attempt to release Jesus and to appease the Jewish authorities, yet it operates ironically to reveal Jesus' true identity. In the fifth scene (19:4–8), outside, Pilate presents the authorities with Jesus, mocked and bloody, taunting them with this derisive picture of their "kingship." Yet he remains convinced of Jesus' innocence (19:4, 6). His words of acclamation, "Here is the man!" (19:5) express both his contempt for the chief priests and his unwitting revelation of who Jesus really is, even in degrading circumstances. Demanding Jesus' crucifixion, the chief priests manifest their real objection to Jesus: his identity as Son of God (19:7). The title, with its overtones of Roman imperial status, fills

The sixth scene (19:5–11), inside the pretorium, has Jesus fall silent before Pilate, who threatens him with the power of Rome. But Jesus represents a far greater power, and only by permission of that power does Pilate have authority over him. The real culprit is not Pilate but "the one who handed me over" (19:11), most likely Judas Iscariot. In the final scene (19:12–15), Pilate makes a more determined effort to release Jesus. But just as he has played on the political sensitivities of the chief priests, so they in turn play on his. In effect, they question his loyalty to Rome: Pilate's release of Jesus would make him appear to support sedition against the Emperor. Pilate therefore reaches his decision and seats himself on the judge's bench (the Greek could also mean that he seats Jesus on the judge's bench!), where he condemns Jesus to death (19:16a). Even now, he cannot resist taunting the Temple authorities; they respond by swearing allegiance not to God but to Rome. Knowing the truth, Pilate denies it; despite their mutual enmity, the two groups collude in judicial murder.

B. Jesus' Crucifixion and Burial (19:16b–42)

19:16b–25a. The Inscription on the Cross and Seamless Robe. The crucifixion narrative consists of a series of symbols that draw out the meaning of the cross in John's understanding. Jesus, not Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21), carries his own cross-bar, emphasizing his divine control of events. Also, the inscription outlining the charge is more significant in John than in the Synoptics (Mark 15:26). While it signifies Pilate's determination, after having been outwitted, to score the last point off the religious authorities, it also speaks the ironic truth: Jesus is indeed the "King of the Jews," a kingship that is universal, as the three languages indicate (19:20). The Roman soldiers, entitled to the remaining possessions of the condemned, divide his clothes but gamble for the seamless robe. In doing so, they fulfill the OT and also ironically and unintentionally confirm the divine unity, which Jesus represents and into which the believing community is drawn (19:23–24).

19:25b–27. The Mother of Jesus and the Beloved Disciple. One of the key symbols of the Johannine crucifixion is the relationship between the mother of Jesus and the unnamed disciple, which Jesus inaugurates. The difficulty here is knowing the limits of the symbolism. As Jesus has brothers in this Gospel (2:12; 7:3–5), provision for his aged mother is not the focus. More likely, Jesus' words to these two disciples are the sign of his love for "his own," as the language of "home" indicates (19:27b; see 17:11–12; 18:8), a love that will endure beyond the crucifixion. Yet the words do not include the others present (four women, paralleling the four soldiers), suggesting something unique about this relationship. The mother of Jesus and the Beloved Disciple are to be to each other as mother-son, symbolizing the intimate and familial bonds of the new community, born here from the death of Jesus. There are also overtones of Zion and Israel: John sees the ideal disciple placed under the care of mother-Zion, embodied by the mother of Jesus, a mothering that originates with Jesus himself and continues in the power of the Spirit-Paraclete (14:18; Isa 66:12–13). There is also an important link with the wedding at Cana, where the mother of Jesus is addressed likewise as "woman" in relation to the "hour" and where she nurtures the disciples' faith in Jesus (2:4–5). Some also see her as a type of Eve, the "mother of all living" (Gen 3:20), present at the undoing of the Fall. Whatever our view, the role of the mother of Jesus is brought to fulfillment in the advent of the "hour" and Jesus' glorification.

19:28–31. Jesus' Death. Jesus' thirst is also part of the Johannine symbolism, where once again the OT is fulfilled (19:28). At a literal level, Jesus' utterance, "I thirst," (author's trans.) signals the raging thirst associated with death. At a deeper level, by accepting the drink, Jesus indicates his passionate "thirst" for the will of God and readiness to drink the cup of suffering (4:34; 18:11). The sprig of hyssop—unlikely at a literal level, since it is a soft and yielding plant—belongs to the same symbolism: the link with Passover confirms Jesus as the paschal Lamb (whose sprinkled blood gave protection from the angel of death, Exod 12:22), and points to the purifying effects of his sacrificial death (Ps 51:7). Jesus' last utterance, "It is finished!" (19:30a), is a cry of triumph and achievement, neither the sense of abandonment of Mark's Jesus (Mark 15:34/par.) nor yet the quiet self-giving trust of Luke's (Luke 23:46). The Johannine Jesus has completed the Father's work in the world (17:4), revealing the divine glory in his mortal flesh, in both living and dying. His life's mission is accomplished. Note that Jesus gives up his own life at this point, emphasizing his authority over life and death (see 10:17–18). The ambiguous wording—"he gave up his spirit"—suggests also the Holy Spirit, donated by the crucified Jesus, a further symbol of the life that comes through Jesus' death (19:30b, emphasis added; see 7:39; 12:24).

19:31–37. The Piercing of Jesus' Side. The climax of the Johannine crucifixion occurs at this point, following the death of Jesus. John emphasizes once more the Passover connection: now is the hour at which the lambs are slaughtered in preparation for the Passover meal. Again we confront the religious scruples of the religious authorities, who fail to see before them the Lamb of God who takes away the world's sin (19:31; 1:29, 34). Unlike his fellow criminals, however, Jesus' legs are not broken: as OT prophecy makes clear, the paschal Lamb must be whole and its legs unbroken (19:33, 36; Exod 12:46). The piercing of Jesus' side by the soldier's lance—paralleling the centurion's declaration in the Synoptics (Mark 15:39/pars.)—acts at a literal level to ensure Jesus' death. Symbolically, however, it points to the life that issues from the death of Jesus, blood and water being sacramental symbols of life in this Gospel, associated with the Spirit (2:6–10; 3:5; 4:10–14; 6:53–56; 7:37–39; 13:3–5; 15:4–5). Paradoxically, the crucified Christ gives birth to the believing community, as attested by the faithful witness, the one "who saw this"—most probably the Beloved Disciple (19:35). Gazing on this extraordinary icon of life-through-death produces, in the viewer, either faith or judgment (19:37; Zech 12:10).

19:38–42. Jesus' Burial in a Garden. The Synoptic Gospels give Joseph of Arimathea the leading role in Jesus' burial (Mark 15:43–46), but, to this prominent disciple, John adds the figure of Nicodemus who now at last experiences his own "rebirth" through the death of Jesus (19:38–39a; 3:1–9). The secret sympathies of these two Jewish leaders are now unveiled. At considerable risk to themselves, they request of Pilate the body of a deceased criminal and bury him with sumptuous quantities of myrrh and aloes, as well as careful attention to the proper rites (19:39b–40). This is, indeed, a burial fit for a king. John notes the new tomb and the garden setting, preparing the reader for the new life that will unexpectedly appear in the Easter garden.

C. Jesus' Resurrection Appearances (20:1–21:25)

One of the main difficulties in John's resurrection narratives is the relationship between John 20 and John 21. After Jesus' appearance to Thomas, John seems to close off the whole Gospel with a summary statement that sets out his purpose (20:30–31), while John 21 gives the impression of a first appearance of the risen Christ. For some, this suggests that John 21 is a later addition or a kind of epilogue to the Gospel—perhaps even part of a second edition. However, despite the points of awkwardness (and John's narrative style often does not smooth things out), John 21 plays a significant role in the Johannine resurrection story, tying up a number of loose ends from the previous chapter. John 21 also has a number of connections with, and parallels to, the rest of the Gospel. Whatever its origins, in its present form it belongs as an integrated part of the Gospel and is a vital part of the Johannine narrative.

20:1–18. Appearance to Mary Magdalene. Mary Magdalene is first introduced into the Johannine narrative at the foot of the cross, where she stands alongside the other women and the Beloved Disciple (19:25). She now approaches the tomb in the predawn darkness (with no intention of anointing the body, unlike the "myrrh-bearing women" of Mark and Luke) and is dismayed to find the stone rolled away. She at once draws the wrong conclusion, that the body has been stolen, and runs to inform Peter and the other disciple—oddly enough, using the plural "we" to describe her findings (20:2). What follows is the strange and inconclusive story of the two disciples' visit to the tomb (20:3–9). There is a kind of competition for precedence that takes place: the other disciple reaches the tomb first, yet allows Peter to enter first (20:4–6); Peter does not understand whereas the other seems to reach a level of faith, though what that level is the narrative does not disclose (20:8–9). The important point is that, as with the stone, so the grave clothes and the head cloth indicate that Jesus' body has not been stolen but, on the contrary, that Jesus has risen from the dead.

Mary has meanwhile returned to the tomb and the two disciples leave her there; not surprisingly, she begins to weep. Turning to the tomb, she sees not the grave clothes rolled up but two angels, seated at either end of the stone slab on which the body lay (20:12). This is a further sign of the resurrection, the position of the angels suggesting the cherubim on the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant (Exod 25:17–22; Heb 9:5). Their role is symbolic, for their only words to Mary are the question, "Why are you weeping?" (20:13). Despite her faith and love, Mary does not recognize the signs and, like other characters in the Fourth Gospel, misunderstands. Even when confronted by Jesus himself, her tears prevent her recognizing him, and she assumes he is the gardener. His naming of her, "Mary!," is enough: like one of the sheep she recognizes the voice of the Shepherd when he calls her name (20:16). Yet still there remains misunderstanding. Her embrace of him—possibly holding his feet (see Matt 28:9)—indicates that she assumes he will remain with her in flesh rather than through the Spirit; the problem here is not that she touches him but that she holds onto him. Jesus clarifies her misunderstanding and speaks of his impending ascension "to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God" (20:17). The language is carefully nuanced to show the commonality yet distinction between Jesus' relationship with the Father and that of disciples. Finally, Mary is commissioned with the message of the resurrection and proclaims the message to the other disciples: the first apostolic witness to the resurrection in this Gospel (20:18).

20:19–23. Appearance to the Disciples and Gift of the Spirit. John's account of the giving of the Spirit occurs on Easter evening and not fifty days later, as in Luke's reckoning (Acts 2:1–4), the fourth evangelist making clear the inextricable link between cross, resurrection, ascension, and sending of the Spirit. In John's Gospel, Jesus enters the locked room of the disciples' fears, offering them twice the gift of peace (20:19, 21). The fact that his body still bears the scars, although it is a risen body, maintains the vital continuity between the crucified Jesus and the risen Christ. But it is also profoundly iconic: for John, Jesus' wounds—and especially his wounded side—remain open to give life to the community of faith; believers always have access to that life-giving death. The disciples receive the Spirit—the breath of Jesus—and are commissioned with the authority to bring his forgiveness and reconciliation to the world (20:21, 23).

20:24–31. Appearance to Thomas and Summary of the Gospel. The story of Thomas' encounter with the risen Christ occurs, significantly, one week later: on the Sunday following Easter. Thomas at first refuses to believe, having been absent for the appearance of the risen Lord (for reasons the evangelist does not give). His refusal to believe does not necessarily suggest a more doubting disposition; rather, he demands access to the same evidence as the other disciples. His wish is granted when the risen Jesus again appears, with the greeting of peace, and offers Thomas sight and touch of his wounds (20:26–27). Thomas does not seem to avail himself of this invitation but rather responds with the highest confession of faith of any human being in this Gospel: "My Lord and my God!" (20:28). There are distinct echoes of the Prologue here: Thomas recognizes in the risen Jesus the incarnate Logos, the divine Son who stands face-to-face with God (1:1–18).

Jesus' response to Thomas is not so much a rebuke as an address to the readers of the Gospel. Though they lack the signs that Thomas demanded and are dependent on the testimony of Mary Magdalene and the others, they are no less blessed. Through the presence of the Spirit-Paraclete, their access to the risen Christ is as immediate and real. John concludes the first part of his resurrection story with a summary of Jesus' ministry, emphasizing that the purpose of the Gospel is to lead to faith in Jesus, and therefore to life itself. This is not a neutral account of Jesus but a story that arises from faith to faith, so that others too may have the same meeting with Christ and be drawn into the same union with the Father.

21:1–14. Appearance to Seven Disciples in Galilee. There is an abrupt change of scene in this narrative: from Jerusalem to Galilee, from those who have received their commission to those who still seem somewhat dispirited and lost. The list of seven disciples includes those mentioned in John 1, as well as the two sons of Zebedee, named here for the first time in the Gospel (21:2; 1:35–51). A similar story of a miraculous catch of fish, probably based on the same tradition, is found in Luke's Gospel, where it occurs at the beginning of Jesus' ministry (Luke 5:1–11). John's narrative contrasts the ineffective labor of the disciples in Jesus' absence with its astonishing power and effectiveness in his presence. The imagery is essentially about mission and ties in with the commission and gift of the Spirit in the previous chapter (20:21–23). Like the story of Mary Magdalene and the Emmaus story (20:16; Luke 24:13–33), the risen Christ is not at first recognized until he says or does something familiar, in this case conjuring up a large quantity of fish (21:6–7a). Once again, the characteristically Johannine parallelism between Peter and the unnamed disciple operates: the latter is the first to recognize Jesus, but Peter is first to jump into the sea and reach him (21:7b). Much speculation has gone into the symbolic number 153: it is possible that, for John, it suggests the universality and breadth of the church in its mission (21:11). On the shore Jesus provides the disciples with a meal of fish and bread, imagery that recalls both the miraculous feeding and the eucharist. Once again we meet the Jesus of John 6: the bread from heaven on whom the community feeds in order to find life.

21:15–19. Pastoral Role of Simon Peter. The conversation between Jesus and Peter is part of the same scene, reflecting in its imagery the context of the early church's mission. Much of this chapter is concerned with the ongoing life and leadership of the faith community. Using language that differs each time—to give stylistic variety and not for any difference in meaning—Jesus confronts Peter three times, in formal terms, with the question of his love for Jesus (21:15–17) and commissions him for his role in the community. However distressing, this dialogue reestablishes Peter after his three-fold denial of Jesus (18:17, 25–27), and confirms his leadership in the church: he is to shepherd the flock of the Good Shepherd (10:1–18). The prophecy of Peter's martyrdom further rehabilitates him and confirms his authority. He will surrender power over his own life, not just before his enemies but more fundamentally before the God whose will he obeys. This time Peter will follow Jesus faithfully to death, a death that like Jesus' own will glorify God (21:18–19).

21:20–25. Witness of the Author and Summary of the Gospel. The parallel between these two key disciples continues in the closing verses of the Gospel, taking us back to their presence at the beginning (1:35–42). Peter is concerned about the future of the other disciple, and the writer (probably a later editor) uses the opportunity to clear up misinformation about the latter's death (21:23). Peter's role is not to be inquisitive about the shape and form that the discipleship of others will take but to follow (21:19, 22). The last verses of the Gospel identify the Beloved Disciple as the witness and author of the Gospel, so that by the end, any hint of rivalry between the two disciples dissolves: each has his own role and place in the leadership of the church. The language of witness here includes but is not confined to material eyewitness testimony: the unnamed disciple both sees and "sees," literally and metaphorically. In the end John claims emphatic truth for his Gospel, even though it contains only a small portion of the Jesus story (21:25). This truth-claim confirms the divinely human identity of the Johannine Jesus and the divine origins of the church born from his death. For John, it is the risen Lord's abiding presence, through the Spirit-Paraclete, that guarantees its life, joy, love, unity, and peace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. K. Barrett. The Gospel According to St John. 2nd ed. (London: SPCK, 1978); R. Bauckham and C. Mosser, eds. The Gospel of John and Christian Theology (Grand Rapids/Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans, 2008); R. E. Brown. The Gospel According to John. 2 vols. AB 29–29A (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1966); R. A. Culpepper. Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); C. H. Dodd. The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); J. Elowsky, ed. John 1–10, John 11–21. 2 vols. Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture. New Testament 4a, b (Downer's Grove: InterVarsity Press, 2006–2007); C. Koester. Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel: Meaning, Mystery, Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); D. Lee. Flesh and Glory: Symbol, Gender and Theology in the Gospel of John (New York: Crossroad, 2002); F. J. Moloney. The Gospel of John. SP 4 (Collegeville, Minn.: The Liturgical Press, 1998); R. Schnackenburg. The Gospel According to St John. 3 vols. (Vols. 1–2, New York: Seabury, 1980; Vol 3, New York: Crossroad, 1982); S. M. Schneiders. Written That You May Believe. Encountering Jesus in the Fourth Gospel (New York: Crossroad, 1999); M. M. Thompson. The God of the Gospel of John. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001).

ACTS

JOEL B. GREEN

OVERVIEW

The Acts of the Apostles is the only narrative of its kind in the NT. Whereas the Gospels recount the significance of the advent, life, mission, death, and resurrection of Jesus, Acts picks up the story from the resurrection and ascension of Jesus and traces the development and mission of the early church. Like any historical narrative, Acts is selective in what it includes, so we would be mistaken to imagine that this book gives us "the history of the early church." Its focus is somewhat more narrow, oriented as it is around the missional agenda set forth by Jesus in 1:8: "you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth." These words provide not so much the outline of Acts as the mandate that drives the narrative forward. Accordingly, Acts traces the story of the church through those who carry the good news from Jerusalem to Judea, Samaria, and the ends of the earth. Since the phrase "the ends of the earth" refers not only to places on the first-century Roman map (Ethiopia, for example) but also to the reach of God's salvation to include the Gentiles (see 13:46, citing Isa 49:6), much of Acts is devoted to the commission, mission, and witness of Paul and his companions, whom the Lord chose "to bring my name before Gentiles and kings and before the people of Israel" (Acts 9:15).

It is generally assumed that the Acts of the Apostles and the Gospel of Luke were written by the same person (compare Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:1–2) and early tradition identifies that person as Luke. Neither of these NT books is "signed," however; they were originally anonymous documents. When the author refers to himself within the narrative (beginning in ch. 16, with references to "we"), he does so as a member of a group sometimes associated with Paul and not to himself as an individual by name. In fact, what we know about the author of Acts comes almost entirely from his own writing. For example, he is educated, probably urban, is at home in the Scriptures of Israel, and counts himself as a member of the "people of the Way"—that is, as a Christian. We have too little evidence to speak dogmatically of the author otherwise; hence, in the commentary that follows, I will refer to the author of Acts as "Luke" as a matter of convenience.

If the Gospel of Luke and Acts were written by the same person and if Acts picks up the story at the ascension (the very place where the Gospel of Luke ends), this raises questions about their literary relationship. Do these two books comprise a single narrative? Is Acts a planned "sequel" to the Gospel? In the commentary that follows, it will be clear that I see Acts as the self-conscious continuation of Luke's Gospel, and that Luke has so constructed Acts as to reverberate with some of the emphases and patterns of the Gospel. This means that the mission of Jesus sets the contours and aims of the mission of those who follow him as his witnesses.

OUTLINE

I. The Preface (1:1–14)

II. Witnesses of the Resurrection in Jerusalem (1:15–6:7)

A. The Lord Reconstitutes the Twelve (1:15–26)

B. Jesus Receives and Pours Out God's Promise, the Holy Spirit (2:1–47)

2:1–13. The Outpouring of the Holy Spirit

2:14–41. Peter Testifies to Jesus' Enthronement

2:42–47. The Daily Life of the Community of Believers

C. Spirited Witness in Jerusalem (3:1–4:31)

3:1–10. A Lame Beggar Enters the Temple, Restored

3:11–4:4. Peter Addresses the Whole People

4:5–22. Peter and John Under Inquiry

4:23–31. God Powerfully Reconfirms His Mission

D. Embodying the Resurrection Message in the Community of Believers (4:32–5:11)

E. Signs and Wonders in Jerusalem (5:12–16)

F. The Apostles on Trial (5:17–42)

G. A Shift in Leadership (6:1–7)

III. Expansion from Jerusalem to Antioch (6:8–12:25)

A. The Witness of Stephen (6:8–8:3)

6:8–15. Stephen Provokes Opposition

7:1–53. Stephen Addresses the Council

7:54–8:3. The Stoning of Stephen

B. The Proclamation of Philip (8:4–40)

8:4–25. Philip in Samaria

8:26–40. Philip and an Ethiopian Eunuch

C. The Choice of Saul as the Lord's Emissary to Gentiles and Jews (9:1–31)

9:1–25. Saul Commissioned

9:26–31. Saul Speaks Boldly in Jerusalem

D. The Conversions of Peter, Cornelius, and the Jerusalem Church (9:32–11:18)

9:32–43. Peter's Signs and Wonders Outside of Jerusalem

10:1–48. Complementary Visions, Complementary Conversions

11:1–18. Jerusalem's Acknowledgment of God's Work

E. Christians in Antioch (11:19–30)

F. Herodian Violence Against the Church (12:1–25)

IV. Expansion from Antioch to Asia and Europe (13:1–19:20)

A. The Expedition of Paul and Barnabas in the Province of Galatia (13:1–14:28)

13:1–3. Barnabas and Paul Commissioned

13:4–12. Contending in Cyprus

13:13–52. Preaching in Pisidian Antioch

14:1–7. The Reception of the Word of Grace in Iconium

14:8–20. Good News in Lystra

14:21–28. Encouraging the Churches

B. The Jerusalem Consultation and Its Aftermath (15:1–16:5)

15:1–5. Dissension and Debate

15:6–18. Testimony and Deliberation

15:19–29. Decision and the Letter

15:30–35. Reception at Antioch

15:36–16:5. Paul and Timothy Strengthen the Churches

C. Proclaiming the Good News in Macedonia (16:6–17:15)

16:6–10. The Call to Macedonia

16:11–15. The Baptism and Hospitality of Lydia

16:16–40. Imprisonment and Release in Philippi

17:1–9. Turning the World Upside Down in Thessalonica

17:10–15. The Word Welcomed in Beroea

D. Advancing the Good News in Athens (17:16–34)

17:16–21. Paul Gains an Audience

17:22–31. Paul's Proclamation on the Areopagus

17:32–34. The Response at Athens

E. Proclamation and Persuasion in Corinth (18:1–17)

F. The Triumph of the Name of Jesus in Ephesus (18:18–19:20)

18:18–23. Interlude: Travel and Continuity

18:24–28. Priscilla, Aquila, and Apollos

19:1–7. The Holy Spirit Comes upon Some Disciples of John

19:8–10. Arguing at Ephesus

19:11–20. Miracle and Magic

V. The Journeys of Paul, Missionary Prisoner (19:21–28:31)

A. Paul Resolves to Travel to Jerusalem...and Rome (19:21–22)

B. Premonitions Concerning Paul's Arrival in Jerusalem (19:23–21:14)

19:23–41. Rioting in Ephesus

20:1–12. Resuscitation in Troas

20:13–38. Farewell to the Ephesian Elders

21:1–14. Jerusalem Bound

C. On Trial in Jerusalem (21:15–23:11)

21:15–36. Reception in Jerusalem

21:37–22:29. Paul's Defense Before the Jewish People

22:30–23:11. Paul's Defense Before the Jewish Council

D. Custodial Journey to Caesarea (23:12–35)

E. Paul's Defense Before Felix (24:1–27)

24:1–9. Paul Accused

24:10–21. Paul's Defense

24:22–27. Felix Delays Judgment

F. Paul's Defense Before Festus (25:1–27)

25:1–12. Festus Favors the Jerusalem Leadership

25:13–22. Festus Confers with Agrippa

G. Paul's Defense Before Agrippa (25:23–26:32)

25:23–26:1a. Preliminary Matters

26:1b–29. Paul Addresses Agrippa

26:30–32. Paul's Innocence Reaffirmed

H. Custodial Journey to Rome (27:1–28:15)

27:1–44. Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck

28:1–15. Hospitality in Malta and Italy

I. Paul on Remand in Rome (28:16–31)

28:16–22. Paul Sets the Hope of Israel Before the Jewish Leaders

28:23–31. The Jews in Rome Divided; Paul's Unhindered Proclamation

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. The Preface (1:1–14)

The author of any narrative is faced with the problem of a beginning: How far back in time must I go to make sense of the story? Luke simply ties Acts back into the Gospel of Luke with a preface that both recalls "volume one" and provides a transition into "volume two." He summarizes the Gospel of Luke in vv. 1–3 with reference to "what Jesus did and taught from the beginning," holding together in typical Lukan fashion both word and deed. What Jesus did he did "through the Spirit"—an apt description of the ministry of Jesus (see Luke 4:16–21) and anticipation of the central role the Spirit will play in Acts. Verse 3 looks forward to the role of Jesus' followers who bear witness to his resurrection (e.g., 1:8, 22) and sums up Jesus' message with the overarching description of "the kingdom of God." In the Gospel of Luke, the kingdom refers to the presence of God in the mission of Jesus to overturn competing authorities and to bring salvation in all of its fullness especially to those dwelling on the margins of society.

Verses 4–8 provide two representative scenes during the 40 days of post-resurrection fellowship between Jesus and his followers. Verses 4–5 center on what happened when Jesus had resumed table fellowship with the disciples. (The NRSV translates synalizomenos as "staying together," but "eating with" is far more likely.) Reaching back into the Gospel of Luke, Jesus anticipates the coming of the Holy Spirit (see Luke 3:16; 11:16; 24:49). John's baptism, so important for Luke and Acts, was a baptism of repentance—important but incomplete apart from the outpouring of the Spirit by Jesus. Jesus had spoken of the kingdom and promised the coming of the Spirit, so it is no surprise that his disciples wonder about the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (v. 6). After all, the coming of the Spirit was tied to the restoration of God's people from exile (see, e.g., Ezek 37; Joel 2:28–32). The second representative scene (vv. 6–8), then, provides Jesus the opportunity to direct the disciples' concern with restoration toward a mission-oriented program, setting Israel's hope within God's plan to include even Gentiles in God's saving work. Accordingly, 1:8 marks the rejection of a Jerusalem-centered map of God's purpose in favor of an orientation to the end of the earth—understood in Isaiah in terms of the coming of the good news of salvation to the Gentiles (see especially Isa 49:6, on which see Acts 13:47; also Isa 8:9; 45:22; 48:20; 62:10–11—all of which contain the Greek phrase used here, heōs eschatou teōs geōs).

The third scene is the climax of this preface to Acts, with the ascension of Jesus linking together Jesus' departure, the impending coming of the Spirit, and the anticipated return of Christ. Here is the literary and theological pivot point for the two-volume work: Jesus' ascension, recounted at the end of the Gospel (Luke 24:50–53) and again at the beginning of Acts (1:9–11). In terms of the literary form of Luke's account, Jesus' ascension is reminiscent of visions of enthronement. This, together with the repeated references to his going into heaven and his movement "up," underscore the significance of this event in terms of Jesus' exalted status. This is his exaltation into God's presence, at God's right hand (see Ps 110). Five times, Luke uses verbs of "seeing," again asserting the important role of the disciples as witnesses. As the narrative will clarify shortly, Jesus' ascension is not only the literary hinge between the Gospel and Acts but also the theological basis for the outpouring of the Spirit and the gift of salvation.

The preface closes with a summary statement (vv. 12–14). The community of believers includes both male disciples (only 11 names are given, preparing for Judas' replacement in 1:15–26) and women, with Mary explicitly named alongside the mention of Jesus' brothers.

II. Witnesses of the Resurrection in Jerusalem (1:15–6:7)

The first major section of Acts is bounded by two accounts in which the community of believers faces a problem within its own boundaries—in 1:15–26, the apostasy of Judas; and in 6:1–7, the integrity of the word embodied in an intercultural community. Between these two is a lengthy account of the church's early witness in Jerusalem—first sketching scenes of preparation (1:15–26) and empowerment (2:1–47), then alternating between reports of the interaction of Jesus' followers with those outside the community (in witness and/or persecution—3:1–4:31; 5:12–42) and accounts concerned with affairs within the community (with a focus on unity and distress—4:32–5:11; 6:1–7). Geographically, this section is localized in Jerusalem. Jesus had mandated that the disciples stay in Jerusalem until the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (1:4; cf. Luke 24:49), and this is exactly what they do (1:12–13). The landscape of these chapters is dotted with references to Jerusalem, the Jerusalem Temple, sites related to the Temple, and to Jewish leadership whose authority and identity is tied to the Temple. In this sense, the opening of Acts is reminiscent of Luke 1:5–2:52, the horizons of which are dominated by Jerusalem and the Temple. The centrality of Jerusalem and the Temple in Acts 1–6 includes some positive elements, including the use of the Temple precincts for prayer and instruction. At the same time, missionary sermons in this context consistently charge Jerusalem and its leadership with working at cross-purposes with God in rejecting and executing Jesus. Moreover, hostility toward Jesus' followers, earlier predicted by Jesus (e.g., Luke 12:4–12; 21:12–19), is also central to the story. Given Jesus' directive in 1:8 ("in Jerusalem . . . to the ends of the earth"), the early concentration of the narrative in Jerusalem is somewhat surprising. "From Jerusalem" (Luke 24:47) may necessitate bearing witness also in Jerusalem (Acts 1:8), but the Jerusalem believers nevertheless seem slow to depart the environs of the city. In fact, it requires the authorization of new leadership (6:1–7) and the witness of Stephen (6:8–8:3) to move the believers beyond the walls of the city, to Judea and Samaria (compare 1:8; 8:2).

Here, as elsewhere in Luke–Acts, the key figure is God, and we find evidence of God's aim and activity in references to the Scriptures (1:16, 20; 2:16–21, 25–28, 31, 35; 3:18, 22–25; et al.), in claims that God's aim was actualized in the life and mission of Jesus (2:22–24, 32; 3:13–15; et al.), and in the activity of the Holy Spirit (the promise of the Father—1:4; 2:33; cf. Luke 24:49). The opening section of Acts is thus a self-conscious continuation of the one story of God's dealings with God's people.

A. The Lord Reconstitutes the Twelve (1:15–26)

The replacement of Judas as one of the Twelve was necessary not simply because of his death, which is almost incidental to Luke's report. The problem, rather, was his defection (1:16, 25). Consistent with images of the kingdom, resurrection, and the coming of the Spirit—all intertwined with God's promise to restore Israel from its exile—is the need to reconstitute the Twelve. This would provide continuity not only with Jesus' mission in Luke's Gospel (e.g., 6:13) but also with Israel's twelve tribes (e.g., Gen 49; Exod 24:4). Throughout this scene, Luke highlights how God's plan was actualized—through references to divine necessity (dei, vv. 16, 21), to the Scriptures and their fulfillment (explicitly in v. 20, with reference to Pss 69:26; 109:8), to the work of the Spirit (v. 16), to prayer (vv. 24–25), and to the casting of lots (v. 26). (God had forbidden practices of magic among his people [e.g., Deut 10:11–13; 18:10–11; 1 Sam 28; 2 Kgs 21:6; 2 Chr 33:6], so the casting of lots was used to ascertain God's choice [e.g., Lev 16:18; Neh 11:1]. In this way, the intrusion of human desires could be bypassed in favor of ascertaining the divine will.) Thus, a replacement for Judas is chosen through a process involving the articulation of required qualifications, the nomination of two candidates, prayer, and the casting of lots. Later, when new leadership is needed, the process moves from articulating the required qualifications to the choice of leaders to prayer and laying on of hands (6:1–7); that is, the practice of casting lots disappears and is never again mentioned in the NT. Why this is so is never explained, though it might be imagined that the coming of the Holy Spirit to empower and guide God's people (Acts 2) rendered recourse to lot-casting unnecessary.

B. Jesus Receives and Pours out God's Promise, the Holy Spirit (2:1–47)

The outpouring of the Spirit is anticipated by John the Baptist (Luke 3:16) and Jesus (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4, 8). The nature of this expectation is such that, apart from the Spirit's coming, the narrative must come to a standstill, since the witness of the apostles is contingent upon it. Looking forward, Acts 2 provides a pattern for progress in the mission. (See, e.g., 10:47; compare 11:17.) In this way, Acts 2 functions like Jesus' inaugural sermon in Luke 4:16–30—a scene that shares a number of parallels with the present account. For example, both are the first public event and first public sermon of Jesus and the apostles; the Spirit-anointing of Jesus and the Spirit-filling of his followers initiate their respective missionary activity; and these experiences of the Spirit are interpreted with reference to prophetic Scriptures (Isa 61:1–2/58:6; Joel 2:28–32).

"Pentecost" is shorthand for the festival celebrated on the fiftieth day after Passover, one of the three pilgrim festivals (see Exod 23:16; 34:22; Deut 16:10). Pentecost was the occasion for celebrating the harvest, and particularly for giving thanks to God for graciously bringing forth fruit from the land. This emphasis on the divine hand comports well with the Lukan narrative, the focus of which is Luke's portrait of God as the primary actor whose purpose directs these events.

2:1–13. The Outpouring of the Holy Spirit. For Luke's readers, this scene marks the baptism with the Spirit and fire predicted by John, the work of Jesus Christ, and the faithfulness of the Father who keeps his promise and responds graciously to the prayers of his people; serves as a manifestation of the kingdom, the genesis of Israel's eschatological restoration; and announces the Spirit-empowered mission to all peoples (see Luke 3:15–17; 11:1–13; 24:44–49; Acts 1:4–8). For characters within the story, though, this scene is full of wonderment, leading to the all-important question, "What does this mean?" (v. 12), which sets the stage for Peter's speech, beginning in v. 14.

The phenomena Luke describes, both visual and auditory, are reminiscent of the theophany at Mount Sinai, when God gave the Ten Commandments (see Exod 19:16–19; Deut 4:11–12; Num 11:25). Old Testament allusions are also found in the combination of a list of nations (vv. 9–11) together with the emphasis on "other languages" in this scene, reminiscent of the interweaving of the Table of Nations with the story of the Tower of Babel in Gen 10–11. Since everyone gathered in Jerusalem on this extraordinary day would have spoken Greek, rendering unnecessary the disciples' speaking in other languages, this OT background becomes even more significant. Speaking in other languages was not needed in order for the disciples to be understood. Why, then, this speaking in tongues? Their doxology ("speaking about God's deeds of power," v. 11; compare Pss 106:2; 145:4, 12; Exod 15; Judg 5; 1 Sam 2), spoken in many languages, becomes a way by which God affirms the diversity of those gathered in a way that undermines Roman interests in creating a single people through subjugation. Any vision of the gathering of all people that denies the will of God for a diverse people scattered across the earth (Gen 1:28; 9:1; 19:32) is similarly denied. The unity of Jesus' followers, underscored at the beginning and end of the Pentecost story (2:1, 42–47), is not the consequence of the dissolution of multiple languages, nor of all social and national distinctives in the service of cultural uniformity. Instead, unity is the consequence of the activity of the Spirit who is poured out by Jesus and the shared identity of those baptized "in the name of Jesus Christ" (2:38).

2:14–41. Peter Testifies to Jesus' Enthronement. This is Peter's first public sermon in Acts, and as such can be compared with Jesus' first sermon in Luke's Gospel (4:16–30) and with Paul's (Acts 13:16–41). In each case, the contours of the speaker's mission and message are sketched, particularly in conversation with the Scriptures and, in the case of Peter and Paul, in how the OT interprets Christ and the church's mission, and vice versa. The outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost (2:1–13) had resulted in sneers and questions of meaning. These establish the need for Peter's speech, which has three pivot-points: (1) the phenomena witnessed in Jerusalem comprise nothing less than the outpouring of the Holy Spirit promised in Joel 2:28–32; (2) these phenomena, the Scriptures, and Jesus' followers together testify that Jesus is coregent with God (2:33); and (3) the outpouring of the Spirit marks the present as "the last days"—that is, the days of restoration promised by the prophet Joel, days that mark the offer of salvation to everyone and that call on everyone to respond with repentance and baptism. The result is Luke's emphasis on the saving significance of Jesus' exaltation to God's right hand, on the prophetic and missional character of the community of Jesus' followers, and the certainty that God has accomplished God's purpose not only in spite of but through those who opposed Jesus.

Careful readers of Luke's narrative will be familiar with the question raised by Peter's audience, "Brothers, what should we do?" (2:37), as similar questions have already been asked (Luke 3:10–14; 10:25; 18:18; compare Acts 16:30; 22:10). Peter's response combines repentance (a call to align oneself with God's purpose as this is understood through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus) and baptism (understood as both the response of those who repent and a gift to those who are received into the community of believers). "Salvation" is represented by two of its central ingredients within Acts—namely, the forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Spirit. Both are oriented essentially to the life of the church, since forgiveness is the means by which people gain (or regain) entrance into the community of God's people and the Spirit generates the genuine experience of community among those who thus declare their allegiance to Jesus, Lord and Messiah.

2:42–47. The Daily Life of the Community of Believers. This summary statement provides a sense of what is typical of the community of believers generated and nurtured by the work of the Spirit poured out at Pentecost. Verse 42 is a kind of summary of the summary, developed in vv. 43–47, so that teaching is correlated with signs and wonders; fellowship is put on display in terms of economic sharing; the breaking bread exhibits the unity of believers by focusing on hospitality; and prayer points to the habit of praising God. The language Luke uses, "all who believed . . . had all things in common" (v. 44), is reminiscent of Greco-Roman thought about ideal friendship, and has parallels among the Jewish sect known as the Essenes as well. In this way, the early church is represented as putting into practice the highest ideals. Selling all that one has was not a requirement, however, but was simply a natural outgrowth of the sense of fellowship shared by these followers of Christ. (See also 4:32–5:11.) The result is the ongoing numeric growth of the church—itsself understood as the Lord's doing. Here, as often in Acts, the identity of "the Lord" is unclear. Is it the exalted Jesus; or is it the God who raised Jesus from the dead? Here, as often in Acts, this ambiguity may simply demonstrate how unnecessary it is to draw such a careful distinction.

C. Spirited Witness in Jerusalem (3:1–4:31)

This section has as its bookends two summaries of what is typical among these followers of Christ (2:42–47; 4:32–35); the section itself begins and ends with prayer (3:1; 4:23–31). Here begins the narrative of witness in earnest, as Luke relates how Peter, John, and others, empowered by the Holy Spirit, live out some of the specific practices Luke has just summarized (2:42–47). This includes, for example, the importance of signs and wonders, the name of Jesus, the teaching of the apostles, and prayer and praise. This series of four scenes is set in motion by the healing of a lame beggar; altogether, they provide a case study in the breadth of Luke's understanding of "salvation." Thus, salvation is human restoration (3:1–10, 16; 4:9–10), forgiveness (3:19), the end-time restoration of all things (3:20–21), the gift that enables people to align themselves with God's purpose (3:26), and the restoration of Israel (4:2).

3:1–10. A Lame Beggar Enters the Temple, Restored. Note the parallel in Luke 5:17–26. This represents one of many ways Luke provides parallels between Jesus and Jesus' spokespersons in Acts, including Peter, Paul, Stephen and others, and is one way Luke ties together his Gospel and Acts, as well as authorizes (or legitimizes) witnesses like Peter.

The setting is significant. Everything happens in the context of the Temple (3:1, 2, 3, 8, 10), that locus of God's presence whose architecture set up boundaries for those determined to be more or less pure or clean, from a religious perspective. The gate is at first a barrier (see Lev 21:16–18), then a point of entry. Three o'clock in the afternoon was a set time for prayer and evening sacrifices. Luke thus underscores the piety of these apostles. They encounter an apparently hopeless situation, a man born lame, completely dependent on almsgiving (e.g., Deut 15:7–11; Tob 4:5–11; Sir 17:22; Acts 10:2, 4, 31). However, within Luke's narrative, good news is for the lame (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21; Acts 8:7).

Importantly, the lame man recognizes the ultimate source of his healing and restoration: he praises God (3:8–9). Peter and John thus bear witness to the efficacy of "calling on the name" (2:21; 3:6).

Leaping (see Mic 2:13; Isa 35:6) epitomizes the age of salvation, symbolized in this instance by the healed man's entry into sacred space, the Temple, from which he had formerly been excluded.

3:11–4:4. Peter Addresses the Whole People. The stage is thus set for Peter to invite those who witnessed the healing to reassess God's purpose and to respond accordingly. His speech is divided into two sections—the first indicating that this healing points to the status of Jesus in God's plan (3:11–16), the second drawing out the implications of this portrait of Christ and issuing in an urgent call to repent (3:17–26). In effect, Peter uses the people's amazement as an opportunity to interpret the past, present, and future work of God. Building on their shared witness of this man's restoration (3:12, 16), their shared ancestry and faith (3:12–13), Peter presses for a shared reconfiguration of life around God's agenda (3:19–26). The sermon pivots around 3:16, then, where Peter interprets this man's "perfect health" as a demonstration of the power of the name of Jesus, "the Holy and Righteous One," the "Author of life," God's glorified servant (3:13–15; Isa 52:13). Although Peter's audience had rejected Jesus (3:13–14), they now have the opportunity to repent because of their failure to comprehend the depth of God's plan. Peter's speech is centered on Christ, but it is profoundly theocentric: God foretold that the Messiah must suffer, the times of restoration, and even "these days" (3:18, 21, 24); God fulfilled God's plan (3:18); and God made a covenant (3:25; see Gen 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4). This portrait of God has come full circle: The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (3:13) made a promise to Abraham (3:25)—a promise now kept through the raising up of God's servant, Jesus; this is evidenced in the full health of this formerly lame man. Accordingly, the antidote to their ignorance is not simply new information about what God has done, but their reordering their lives in light of what God has done—that is, repentance.

The result of Peter's address is twofold: (1) an attempt to silence Peter and John through imprisonment and (2) growth of the faithful, from some 3,000 prior to this event (2:41) to "about 5,000" (4:4). Peter and John are arrested for two reasons: exercising influence among the people through their teaching and "proclaiming that in Jesus there is the resurrection of the dead" (Act 4:2). This last phrase is not simply a reference to Jesus' own resurrection, but also to its effects for the restoration of Israel, triumph over those hostile toward God's people, and the establishment of divine justice—for all of this is entailed in Israel's hope of "resurrection of the dead." That those most associated with the Temple are identified as those who place Peter and John in custody signals their very different interpretation of present events. Indeed, those whose powerful identity and status are most identified with present realities are least likely to welcome the promise of transformation and renewal.

4:5–22. Peter and John Under Inquiry. Peter had already spoken to the question of what "power or piety" (3:12) was responsible for the healing of the crippled man; the rephrasing of the question in terms of the "power" or "name" maintains the focus on the basis of the healing, demonstrates the rulers' lack of awareness or support of Peter's earlier claim regarding the efficacy of the name of Jesus (3:16), and provides Peter with the opportunity to bear witness again to Jesus' resurrection and its saving effects.

Luke's account is a study in contrasts. The apostles are uneducated and ordinary, yet they speak with boldness as persons filled with the Spirit (see Luke 12:11–12). The Jerusalem council was the locus of moral and religious authority, yet their actions in rejecting Jesus were overturned by God's vindication of Jesus in raising him from the dead (see Ps 118:22). Jesus had been executed in humiliation, but the resurrection had signaled his exalted status as coregent with God. God is the source of salvation, but it is through the name of Jesus that salvation is available—as the presence of this man in good health testifies (4:10). How, then, can the Jerusalem council speak for God when it has worked so deliberately to counter God's plan? The rulers are caught in a vice, unable to counter Peter's witness to the "notable sign" represented by this healing, yet needing to save face with the people of Jerusalem. Their solution is to reassert their authority while also removing the threat of the apostles' influence.

4:23–31. God Powerfully Reconfirms His Mission. Twice warned not to bear witness to Jesus (4:18, 21), how will Jesus' followers respond? Jesus had earlier urged his followers, twice, to pray in the face of testing (Luke 22:40, 46), and this is precisely what they do now. The result is a prayer notable for its balance—the first half naming God as "Sovereign Lord" and centered on God's work in creation and in the anticipation of hostility toward God's Messiah, Jesus (4:24b–28; see Ps 2:2); the second half naming God as "Lord" and centered on the hostility encountered by Jesus' followers (vv. 29–30). In this way, a line is drawn from creation to David to Jesus to the early church, demonstrating the essential unity of God's purpose, even in the face of hostility. Importantly, the focus of the prayer is not on protecting the disciples from persecution, but on ensuring the ongoing witness to the good news. God's response to their prayer is as immediate as it is unmistakable. They pray for the gift of bold speech and for God to perform signs and wonders (4:29–30). Then, "when they had prayed, the place in which they were gathered together was shaken; and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke the word of God with boldness" (4:31). A stronger validation of the community of disciples is hard to imagine.

D. Embodying the Resurrection Message in the Community of Believers (4:32–5:11)

Luke's summary follows immediately on the heels of the prayer and outpouring of the Spirit narrated in 4:23–31. This shows that economic sharing is both the result of the Spirit's work and a characteristic of the community of believers filled with the Spirit. Acts 4:32 serves as a heading for this section, with 4:33–35 indicating what is common among the believers, 4:36–37 providing a positive example of economic sharing, and 5:1–11 providing a negative example. The whole is held together by the repeated pattern: they had land, they sold land, they placed the proceeds at the apostles' feet (4:34b–35, 37; 5:1–2).

Verses 32–35 are remarkable for the way they correlate proclamation of the resurrection with care of the needy. The association of being raised up with hospitality and food is found elsewhere in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 4:38–39; 8:49–56; 15:11–32; 24:13–35; Acts 10:41). Economic sharing in this case is grounded in the formation of God's people in exodus (Deut 15:1–18); note how Luke's description in v. 34 borrows from Deut 15:4: "There will, however, be no one in need among you."

The examples of Barnabas on the one hand, Ananias and Sapphira on the other, are more easily understood when we grasp the relationship between economic sharing and social relations. Simply put, persons of the same kin group share everything, including possessions and, importantly in this context, the truth. Outsiders are under no such expectations, however, either with respect to possessions or the truth. Moreover, "to place 'x' at the feet of" is a gesture of submission (e.g., 1 Sam 25:24, 41; 2 Sam 22:39). Hence, Barnabas precisely recapitulates in his behavior what is characteristic of the community of the faithful. Ananias and Sapphira do not. It is not that they were required to do so (see 5:4), but rather that they conspired (5:2, 8, 9) to present themselves as exemplary insiders while behaving as outsiders (through withholding both possessions and the truth). In doing so, they aligned themselves with Satan, against God and God's people (5:3, 4, 9).

E. Signs and Wonders in Jerusalem (5:12–16)

Luke's summary continues to develop motifs mentioned earlier in 2:42–47. Here the focus is on the signs and wonders done by the apostles (see 2:43; 4:30). The effect of this report is twofold. First, the picture Luke presents is remarkably incongruous with the mandate Jesus had given his witnesses in 1:8. There, Jesus says that their work of bearing witness would move outward from Jerusalem to the end of the earth. Here, however, those from outside Jerusalem must bring those needing restoration into Jerusalem where they might be healed (that is, the motion is centripetal, moving inward, rather than centrifugal, moving outward). Why have the steps toward the wider mission not yet been taken? Second, these signs and wonders only exacerbate the problem the popularity of Peter and John had presented to the Jerusalem Council in 4:5–22. In a contest for social standing and the influence that comes through being held in high esteem, the apostles are gaining ground.

F. The Apostles on Trial (5:17–42)

The hostility between the apostles and the Jewish leadership reaches another highpoint. Having been instructed "not to speak or teach at all in the name of Jesus" (4:18), the apostles had nonetheless been engaged in public ministry (5:12–16), leading again to their arrest. The opposing sides are clearly drawn. "Through the hands of the apostles" (5:12, NRSV, "through the apostles") God performed signs and wonders, whereas the rulers "laid hands on the apostles" (5:18, NRSV, "arrested the apostles"). The Jerusalem rulers imprisoned the apostles so as to silence them, but an angel of the Lord released them from prison and directed them to "tell the people the whole message about this life" (5:20). That their escape from prison was God's doing is underscored by the subsequent discovery that the jail had remained securely locked. This leads to the bold assertion, "We must obey God rather than any human authority" (5:29), which emphasizes the central importance of the divine purpose not only to this scene but to Luke's narrative as a whole. Note that, according to Peter, God's Spirit is given to those who obey God, and the Spirit agrees with Peter's witness regarding Jesus' death, resurrection, and exaltation (5:32). This is a direct challenge to the legitimacy of the authority of the Jerusalem rulers; they claim to speak for God, but have been cast by Peter in the role of those who disobey God and therefore lack God's Spirit.

Peter's address before the Council borrows elements already well-established in Acts 2–4, including especially the identification of God as "God of our ancestors" (3:13; 5:30) and God's raising (2:24, 32; 3:15; 5:30) and exalting (2:33; 5:31; see 3:13) Jesus. In this case, however, Peter interprets Jesus' exaltation in redemptive terms: exalted as Leader and Savior, he is able to give repentance and forgiveness of sins (5:31). Here, the gift of repentance is designated for Israel; later the community of Jesus' followers in Jerusalem will recognize that this gift is given also to the Gentiles (11:18). Salvation is thus grounded in the exalted status of Christ.

Gamaliel plays a crucial if ironic role in the proceedings Luke recounts. Theudas and Judas the Galilean are also mentioned by the Jewish historian Josephus (Ant. 18 §23; 20 §§97–98; J.W. 2 §433), along with other leaders of Jewish prophetic movements. Gamaliel refers to them as examples of renewal movements that failed, drawing out the implication that, if the renewal movement represented by the apostles is of human origin, then it too will fail. The climax of Gamaliel's speech comes in 5:39: "but if it is of God, you will not be able to overthrow them—in that case you may even be found fighting against God!" As with Peter's speech, here is an affirmation of divine sovereignty (see 5:29). On this point, a leading Pharisee sides with the apostles; soon, another Pharisee will learn that fighting against the followers of Jesus is tantamount to fighting against the Lord (see 9:4).

Although Luke reports that the Council was persuaded by Gamaliel, they nevertheless take action against the apostles: flogging them and commanding again that they not speak in the name of Jesus (5:40). This is reminiscent both of Jesus' suffering (see Luke 23:16) and of Jesus' words anticipating the suffering of his followers (e.g., Luke 21). Their rejoicing in the face of suffering strikes a cord first sounded in the Sermon on the Plain (Luke 6:22–23).

G. A Shift in Leadership (6:1–7)

Given the twofold focus on hostility from outside the church and persistent unity within the church, this episode is surprising for its concern with disharmony among the believers. From within the biblical tradition that Luke embraces, to neglect widows at all is offensive (e.g., Exod 22:22; Deut 10:18; Luke 2:36–38; 4:25–26; 7:11–17; 20:45–21:4), for God is the "protector of widows" (Ps 68:5; cf. Ps 146:9). With his reference to "Hellenists" and "Hebrews," Luke apparently envisages two groups characterized by their dominant language, Greek and Aramaic, respectively.

The progression of the scene raises hard questions. Can one serve the word and not care for widows? Can one serve the word and not serve at table? These may appear to be practical issues, but for Luke they are profoundly theological. This is because Luke has already developed the language of "service" (diakonia) in terms that disallow different sorts of responsibilities. Is not Jesus himself one who serves at table (Luke 22:24–27; cf. 12:37)—in the sense of providing leadership in carrying out a mission that puts into practice the good news of God? Is not the apostolic task simply "service" (diakonia; Acts 1:17, 25; see also 20:45; 21:19)? Indeed, bearing witness to the resurrection cannot be divorced from caring for the needy (4:32–34). This line of interpretation is furthered by the choice of the Seven to engage in "service," for their "service" within Luke's narrative is manifestly not waiting on tables, but the "service" of preaching and evangelism (see 6:8–8:40). Accordingly, Luke narrates the succession of missional leadership from the apostles to Spirit-empowered witnesses like Stephen and Philip, who carry forward the missional directive of Jesus in

III. Expansion from Jerusalem to Antioch (6:8–12:25)

Anticipated already in 1:8, Luke now relates the expansion of the mission beyond the walls of Jerusalem. The immediate cause of this expansion is the ministry and death of Stephen—his signs and wonders, his Spirit-enabled and wisdom-filled words, and his speech before the Jerusalem Council, leading to his death by stoning (6:8–8:3). The remaining material in this section of Luke's account traces two separate but related plot lines—the first, from Stephen's death to the activity of Philip, Paul, and Peter (8:4–11:18); and the second, from Stephen's death to the mission in Antioch and the persecution of the church in Jerusalem (11:19–12:25). As the first major section, 1:15–6:7, ended with the phrase, "the word of God continued to spread" (6:7), so Luke summarizes at the close of this section, "the word of God continued to advance and gain adherents" (12:24).

A. The Witness of Stephen (6:8–8:3)

Although Luke's account of Stephen's ministry, defense, and death is profound in its own right, it achieves much of its pathos and significance by the many points of contact between Stephen and Jesus. Stephen was rejected by the Jerusalem leadership, so it was all the more necessary to show Stephen's Christ-like character.

6:8–15. Stephen Provokes Opposition. Luke begins and ends with a character reference. In 6:8, Stephen is like the apostles, who are themselves like Jesus, in performing signs and wonders (2::22, 43; 5:12). In 6:15, "his face was like the face of an angel"—a phrase that gains its significance from the idea of the "face" as the external signpost of one's internal character (cf. Exod 34:35 Matt 17:2; 2 Cor 3:13; Rev 1:16; 10:1). Between these bookends is a record of the opposition Stephen attracted, first from his own people, the Hellenists (note, then, that the Hellenists were not a unified "party"), then from practically everyone (6:9, 12). The charges appear three times (6:11, 13, 14) and can be reduced to two: speech against the Temple and speech against the Mosaic law. These parallels show the close correlation between the Temple of God and the God of the Temple, and they demonstrate that what is at stake here is nothing less than the question of how best to practice faithfulness toward the God of Israel. Although the indictment brought against him assumes that he has spoken, Luke builds up the drama of his story by having Stephen accused and brought to trial before we hear anything he has to say.

7:1–53. Stephen Addresses the Council. Dramatically, Stephen's speech is significant because these are the first words we actually hear him utter. Theologically, their importance is heightened by the fact that Stephen is "a man full of faith and the Holy Spirit" (6:5), "full of grace and power" (6:8), whom Luke has characterized in language reminiscent not only of the apostles but of Jesus himself. His words are not his alone. This is crucial not only for understanding how Stephen responds to the high priest's question (7:1) by turning the charges against him back onto the Jerusalem leadership, but also for how his words demonstrate that the missional move away from Jerusalem is a legitimate extension of God's purpose. Stephen addresses both issues through the longstanding rhetorical move of recalling the story of Israel so as to recast it for his listeners. Like all storytelling, Stephen's is not an unbiased narration, but a legitimating one; it is a kind of "revealed" history, with the sacred story itself demanding the perspectives and practices associated with Jesus and his followers.

The perspective Stephen adopts at the outset is that of an "insider." He addresses his audience as though they were kin: "brothers and fathers" (7:2); then repeatedly uses first- person plural pronouns: "our" and "us" (7:2, 11, 12, 15, 17, 19, 38, 39, 44, 45). At the same time, and especially as the speech progresses, he distances himself from the Jerusalem council, referring to them as "you" and identifying them as opponents of God's agenda (7:4, 51, 52, 53).

Stephen's recounting of Israel's history is highly selective. He refers to Abraham, demonstrating that God is the primary actor in the story of Israel and reminding Luke's reader of the earlier references to the actualization of God's promise to Abraham in the coming of Jesus (see Luke 1:5–2:52). Joseph appears as a precursor to Jesus, rejected by his own yet the agent of their deliverance. Moses is a precursor to Jesus, too. His birth fulfilled God's promise (7:17, 20), he grew in wisdom and power (7:22; see Luke 2:52), and he was sent by God as ruler and liberator (7:35; see 5:31).

Jesus–Stephen Parallels
	Luke	Acts
Leadership understood as "service"	22:24–27	6:3–6
Full of Spirit	4:18–10	6:3, 5, 8, 10; 7:55
Signs and Wonders	(Acts 2:22)	6:8
Impossible to refute	21:15	6:10
Passion (confrontation, agitation, arrest, council)	22–23	6:10–12
Rejection by "his own"	4:16–30	6:9
Events at Death
– Heavens opened	(compare 3:21)	7:55–56
– Son of Man ... at the right hand of God	22:69	7:55–56
– Out of city	(compare 4:29)	7:58
– Death cry	23:46	7:59
– Prayer at death	22:41	7:59–60
– Plea for forgiveness of executioners	23:34	7:60
– Report of death	23:46	7:60
– Burial by the righteous / devout	23:50–53	8:2
– Mourning	23:27, 48	8:2

The pattern that develops focuses on the rejection of God's instruments—first Joseph (7:9–10), Moses (7:27–28, 39), and the prophets (7:52–53), then "the Righteous One" (that is, Jesus; see 7:52; 3:14). The speech actually does take into account the charges against Stephen regarding the law and the Temple. His detractors are the ones who have rejected the law, not him (7:53); and the building of the Temple is placed in a negative light—both by Stephen's reference to it as a "house made with human hands," by which he identifies the Temple with idolatry (compare, e.g., Ps 115:4; Acts 17:24–25), and by his reference to Isa 66:1–22. He thus undermines Jerusalem's claim to divine authorization as the center of Israel's worship and faith.

7:54–8:3. The Stoning of Stephen. Although Jesus was executed by means of crucifixion and Stephen through stoning, the parallels between their death-and-burial scenes are strong (see above, on 6:8–8:3). This positions Stephen with Jesus, "the Righteous One," as well as the prophets, Moses, and Joseph; their status before God was not canceled by their rejection by humans. Stephen's vision of the Son of Man standing at God's right hand is a strong vindication of Stephen and his message, since it identifies Stephen with Jesus' vindication, as well as displays God's residence in heaven rather than in the Temple (see 7:48–49).

Into this scene of Stephen's death, Luke introduces Saul. He is the only person named among those who reject Stephen and his status as a leader among those who resist Jesus' followers may be signaled by the fact that others laid their coats at his feet (7:58). Note the contrast in Luke's characterization: the devout bury Stephen, but Saul ravages the church. In a double irony, persecution leads to the actualization of the missionary portfolio Jesus had given the apostles in 1:8, yet the scattering involves everyone but the apostles who first received Jesus' commission.

B. The Proclamation of Philip (8:4–40)

Philip was introduced as a person "of good standing, full of the Spirit and of wisdom" in Acts 6:3 (see 6:5; 21:8–9). His "service" takes the form of missionary activity in Samaria and with an Ethiopian.

8:4–25. Philip in Samaria. "Proclaiming the Messiah" (v. 5) parallels "proclaiming the word" (v. 4), indicating that Philip's ministry is an illustration of the summary in 8:4. These two phrases also parallel the later expression, "proclaiming the good news about the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" (v. 12). This shows the close continuity between Philip and the words of Jesus and the apostles. In addition, Philip, like Jesus and the apostles, engages in a ministry accompanied by signs, exorcism, and healing (vv. 6–7). Similarly, the people of Samaria believe and are baptized (vv. 12–13), they "accepted the word" (v. 14), and, like the community of Christ-followers in Jerusalem, were "with one accord" (v. 6).

These points of similarity bring into sharp relief the anomalies of this episode: the location in Samaria, the interchange with Simon, and the delay in the outpouring of the Spirit among these new believers. The first may be the more remarkable, though it is also the easiest to miss. The Samaritans traced their ancestry back to Abraham, but rejected a Jerusalem-centered salvation history. The antipathy between Jews and Samaritans is represented already in Luke 9:53–53; 10:33–35; 17:11–19—texts that underscore both the inhospitality between the two groups and the Samaritans' status as "foreigners," but also portend their inclusion within God's redemptive plan (see Acts 1:8). Simon tracks with the Samaritans in terms of belief and baptism (vv. 12–13), but otherwise appears under a dark cloud; he seems to be engaged in a power encounter with these new missionaries. Indeed, Luke's account stresses both the power of the good news over the wiles of evil and the transition from "mighty power" to powerless in the case of Simon (note: in the end he must request others to pray for him, v. 24). Although we might be tempted to imagine that Peter and John dispense the Holy Spirit among the Samaritans in order to identify the Jerusalem church as a kind of headquarters, Acts gives no indication whatsoever that the Spirit can be withheld or given by human beings (compare 10:1–11:18!). Instead, Peter and John witness the outpouring of the Spirit among the Samaritans in order that the apostles might see and participate in the work of God beyond Jerusalem, as the risen Jesus had directed (1:8).

8:26–40. Philip and an Ethiopian Eunuch. Like so many scenes in Acts, this one follows the simple movement from problem (vv. 26–31) to resolution (vv. 32–35) to outcome (vv. 36–40). The problem is twofold—the mixed status of the Ethiopian and the need for an interpreter. On the one hand, the Ethiopian has enviable status in his country, is able to travel, has a "chariot" (probably more of a wagon), has in his possession a scroll of Isaiah in Greek, and is literate. On the other hand, he is an outsider. From a Roman perspective, as an Ethiopian he inhabits the margins of the world; from a Jewish perspective, as a eunuch he is marginal to God's people (see Lev 21:20; Deut 23:1); and his dark skin only contributes to his "otherness." He is likely a Gentile. One's status is always determined in relation to a comparator group, and, in his characterization of the Ethiopian, Luke highlights both the Ethiopian's importance in his own world and his otherness in the world in which he now finds himself. The other need underscored in this account revolves around understanding the Scriptures and, particularly, resolving the question, To whom does Isaiah refer (see especially vv. 30, 31, 34)? The Scriptures are not self-interpreting, but require a hermeneut. Isaiah 52:13–53:12 is especially open to a variety of interpretations, since the text itself does not clarify the identity of the Lord's "servant." Identifying Jesus as the servant, Philip's interpretation ties the life of the Ethiopian into that of Jesus, so that the reversal Jesus experienced—from humiliation to being raised up by God—is good news for the Ethiopian too (see Isa 56:1–4).

Threading its way through this account is what may be its most important motif—namely, evidence of divine choreography: "an angel of the Lord said . . ." (v. 26), the pilgrimage of an Ethiopian to worship in Jerusalem (v. 27), the opportunistic meeting on a deserted road at midday (vv. 26–28), "The Spirit said . . ." (v. 29), the presence of water in the desert (v. 36), and Philip's disappearance (v. 39). Luke bathes this scene in testimony to divine intervention in order to show that the movement of the gospel to the "ends of the earth" (1:8) was (and is) divinely sanctioned.

C. The Choice of Saul as the Lord's Emissary to Gentiles and Jews (9:1–31)

This section of Luke's narrative is marked by repetition—repeated references to Saul's status as an enemy of Jesus' disciples (9:1–3, 13–14, 21, 26; see 7:58; 8:2–3), repeated references to the nature of Saul's encounter with the Lord (9:3–5, 13–14, 17, 27), and, thus, a heightened emphasis on the thoroughgoing transformation Saul has experienced (9:15–19, 20, 22, 23, 28–30). This transformation is dramatically realized in this: the one who breathed murder and threats against the Lord's disciples will now suffer for the sake of the Lord's name. The correlation of suffering and persecution with the extension of the mission was anticipated by Jesus (see, e.g., Luke 6:22; 10:16; 21) and experienced by the apostles (Acts 5:41); it will now be the lot of Saul (9:21, 23, 29b).

9:1–25. Saul Commissioned. Saul does not undergo "conversion" in the sense of leaving one religion to join another, but his "Damascus Road experience" remains a transformative experience. Note, for example, how the word "Lord" is used in vv. 1, 5; the one whom he identifies as Lord is none other than Jesus, the Lord of the disciples whom he has been persecuting.

Getting Ananias and Saul together is the outcome of divine orchestration. The commissioning of Ananias includes indications of his reluctance, providing opportunity for the Lord to emphasize the role he has chosen for Saul. In short, the directive Saul receives to go to both Jew and Gentile is grounded in divine initiative alone. Throughout the Lukan narrative "light" is related to the "enlightenment" of the good news (e.g., Luke 1:78–79; 2:1–20; 4:18–19; Acts 9:3, 7, 8, 9, 12, 16, 17, 18).

Two aspects of the Lord's commission to Saul (vv. 15–16) are immediately (eutheos, v. 20) realized as Saul, (1) "empowered" by the Spirit (NRSV, "increasingly more powerful"; endunamoo, see Judg 6:34; 1 Chron 12:18), proclaims Jesus as Son of God and Messiah; and (2) is the object of a death plot.

9:26–31. Saul Speaks Boldly in Jerusalem. Saul escapes the plot against him in Damascus (vv. 23–25) only to find the door of hospitality closed to him among the disciples in Jerusalem. Their fear is consistent with his former hostility toward them (see 9:1–2, 13–14, 21, 26). Barnabas, introduced as an encourager in 4:36–37, now mediates on Saul's behalf. Speaking "boldly" is a cipher in Acts for Spirit-empowered speech (e.g., 2:29; 4:13, 29, 31), and so it functions here to authenticate Saul (vv. 27, 28). The phrase "the Jews" was used in vv. 22–23 to define a group in Damascus set against Saul and now, in Jerusalem, the phrase "the Hellenists" is used in the same way (v. 29). The hostility arrayed against Saul is an added authentication of his ministry (vv. 15–16).

The summary statement in v. 31 documents the ripple effect of Stephen's ministry and death (6:8–8:4)—the scattering and mission of witnesses like Philip (8:5–40) and the commission and proclamation of Saul (9:1–30). Persecution has led to peace and strengthening, living in the fear of the Lord and growth.

D. The Conversions of Peter, Cornelius, and the Jerusalem Church (9:32–11:18)

Peter has been largely absent from the narrative since ch. 5, though he and John are mentioned in connection with Philip's mission to Samaria (8:14, 20) and he would have been included in references to the apostles and disciples in 6:1–7; 9:26–27. Breaking into the story of Saul's commission and work, Peter is represented in this section of Acts as healer and preacher, but also as learner. His brush with issues of purity in 9:32–43 prepare him for his "conversion" in ch. 10, as he learns how far into conventional Jewish sensibilities the good news reaches.

9:32–43. Peter's Signs and Wonders Outside of Jerusalem. Luke's last word about Peter was that he had returned to Jerusalem, so Luke's report of his going "here and there among the believers" (v. 32) raises questions about Peter's travels. It is remarkable, though, that Peter's journeying has apparently not been oriented toward evangelizing. His geographical movement to Lydda and then to Joppa sets the stage for the lengthy account involving Peter, Cornelius, and Cornelius' household in ch. 10. His movement can be plotted in another way, too—namely, in terms of purity: from a paralytic to a corpse, and from a corpse to the home of a tanner, this last location noted for its foul stench and the ritual uncleanness that would accompany the craft of working with the skins of dead animals (e.g., m. Ketub 7.10; m. B. Bat. 2.9). This makes ironic Peter's later protests regarding his observance of Jewish practices regarding ritual purity (see 10:14).

The two healing stories stand in parallel, balancing the healing of a man and a woman, the presence of "saints" (vv. 32, 41), and commands "to get up" (vv. 34, 40). The term "holy" has been used of Jesus (3:14; 4:27, 30) and the Spirit (e.g., 9:31), so here and elsewhere in Acts identifies persons as Jesus' disciples (see 9:13; 26:10). Peter's "signs and wonders" (see 2:43; 4:30) occur within an already-established community of believers. Extensive detail accompanies the second of these two accounts, with its focus on Dorcas, whose benefaction on behalf of widows marks her as exemplary (compare 6:1–6!).

10:1–48. Complementary Visions, Complementary Conversions. The importance of the episode Luke recounts in ch. 10 is underscored by its relative length and by its abbreviated repetition in 11:1–18; 15:7–9. Punctuating the whole scene is the variety of evidences of divine guidance—complementary visions and the timing of visions and travel in 10:1–16 and the autonomous work of the Spirit in 10:17–48, leading to the conclusion in 11:17–18: This must have been God's doing! Evidence of divine initiative throughout this scene is reminiscent of the work of God that threaded its way through the story of Philip's encounter with the Ethiopian. In both instances, it is clear that Luke wants to leave no doubt as to the divine source of these missional innovations.

The scene Luke paints is remarkable. Although neither a Jew nor a follower of Christ, but a Godfearer, Cornelius exhibits exemplary piety, his prayers are heard by God, and he is the recipient of an angelic visitation (10:1–6). (God-fearers are Gentiles who worship the God of Israel and who associate themselves with the life of the synagogue and certain aspects of Torah-observance, but have not fully converted to Judaism; see 10:2; 13:16, 26; see also, e.g., 16:14: "worshiper of God"; 17:17: "devout persons.") Although both a Jew and a follower of Christ—indeed, an apostle—Peter debates with the Lord (10:11–16) and struggles to understand what God is doing (10:17, 19, 21, 29) before finally recognizing, and proclaiming, that "God shows no partiality," that Jesus is "Lord of all"

(10:34, 36). Thus, Luke portrays Peter as undergoing a "conversion" in the sense that he understands more fully and embraces more deeply the faith to which he is committed. Cornelius undergoes a "conversion" in the sense that he moves from his status as a God-fearer to that of a Christ-follower. God works in the lives of Cornelius and his household before Peter arrives and, quite apart from Peter's initiative, plan, or expectation, the Spirit intrudes into their exchange. Baptism is the church's recognition of and response to the prior gracious act of God.

11:1–18. Jerusalem's Acknowledgment of God's Work. Although the conversion of Cornelius is often regarded as the conversion of the first Gentile in Acts, this honor actually belongs to the Ethiopian (8:26–40). However, that episode ended with the Ethiopian returning to his home and Philip's going on to Caesarea. This means that the account of the conversion of Cornelius and his household is the first report of a Gentile conversion to reach the ears of the disciples in Jerusalem. The concern registered by Jewish followers of Christ in Jerusalem is unrelated to the conversion or baptism of Gentiles per se, but instead to Peter's participating in Cornelius' hospitality. That is, the problem Luke confronts is not whether there is to be a Gentile mission but its effects. Peter's response to those who question his behavior is "to tell the story"—not "step by step," as the NRSV has it. Instead, Peter's telling is like Luke's literary achievement. Both are characterized by the adverb kathexes (Luke 1:3; Acts 11:4), which suggests that theirs are "orderly" accounts, to be sure, but "ordered" according to a certain perspective or with a certain end in mind. A careful comparison of the first recounting in Acts 10 with Peter's report in 11:1–16 shows that Peter retells the story from his new vantage point, realizing that what has happened is nothing less than a divine gift. His account is "ordered" so as to force the decision either to embrace what has happened as God's work or to find oneself in opposition to God (11:17; compare 5:38–39).

What is the relevance of Peter's vision regarding food for the question of the Gentile mission? Since, from a Jewish perspective, a characteristic feature of Gentiles is their uncleanness, and since questions surrounding judgments regarding clean and unclean center on shared meals and hospitality, the leap in logic is not great. If God (rather than Peter—see 10:15, 28; 11:9, 12) is the arbiter of what is clean or profane, if the Spirit unilaterally directs Peter "not to make a distinction between them and us" (11:12), if God cleanses the hearts of Gentiles (this will be made plain in 15:7–9), then it is appropriate not only for the good news to be extended to Gentiles but for Jewish Christians to be welcomed into the homes and at the table of Gentiles. After all, repentance for both Jew and Gentile is nothing other than a gift from God (see 3:26; 5:31; 11:18).

E. Christians in Antioch (11:19–30)

In 8:1, 4, Luke observed that the death of Stephen eventuated in the scattering of the church. With 8:5, he began to relate the story of Philip's mission, followed by the commission of Saul to both Jew and Gentile, and finally to the encounter with Cornelius and its aftermath. Now, with 11:19–20, he recalls the scattering of the church, but this time picks up the storyline from Stephen to Antioch, and particularly the formation of a predominately Gentile church at Antioch. Little fanfare accompanies the report at this juncture, as Luke has already prepared his readers for this turn of events leading to a Gentile mission and Gentile Christian community through the narrative running from 8:5–11:18. That storyline had been punctuated by evidences of divine initiative, divine direction, and divine authorization of just such a missional innovation. The one explicit note of this kind is Luke's testimony to divine support for and authorization of this Gentile-oriented mission: "the hand of the Lord was with them" (11:21). Here and in the immediate context, Luke ties the mission into the Lordship of Jesus (see the repetition of "Lord" in 10:20, 21, 23, 24). Like Peter's remark that Jesus Christ is "Lord of all" (10:36), so these references press political and religious boundaries, identifying Jesus as coregent with God and as the agent of God's saving benefaction, to be sure, but also identifying him as the one to whom all-embracing allegiance is due.

Barnabas, like some of the new believers, was a Cypriate (4:36; 11:19), so he might have seemed a natural choice as an agent of the Jerusalem church. More important, having been identified as an encourager when first introduced (4:36: paraklēsis), he now encourages (11:23: parakaleo; NRSV, "exhorts") these new believers. Apparently, they would have needed encouragement to faithfulness from someone like Barnabas. After all, to be called "Christians" would not have been at first a term of endearment, and it was not a name followers of Christ first adopted for themselves. It was a name given them by outsiders, probably in derision (see Acts 26:28; 1 Pet 4:16), however appropriate it might eventually seem (see Acts 5:16).

Verses 27–30 are interesting in three respects. First, they document the presence of a prophet within a people identified as a Spirit-endowed, prophetic community (see 2:17). Second, they show how the economic sharing characteristic of the early Jerusalem community of disciples (see 2:42–47; 4:32–35) might be mapped onto relationships among churches and not only within them. This is all the more important in this context, since the sharing of the Antioch church with the Jerusalem church was a sharing between Gentiles and Jews. Finally, reference to Claudius's rule (41–54 CE) is one of the few data given by which to date the progression of events in the early church.

F. Herodian Violence Against the Church (12:1–25)

Within a stretch of the book of Acts concerned with Antioch, Luke has placed this material related to Jerusalem. Acts 11:29–30 lead us out of Antioch, back to Jerusalem (12:1), while 12:25 and 13:1 return the narrative focus to Antioch. The collection of scenes in ch. 12 demonstrate that Herod's death is the consequence of his actions against the leaders of the church, while the placement of this material within Luke's presentation of the formation (11:19–30) and mission (13:1–3) of the church at Antioch shows that hostility against the church, even against its leaders, cannot stop the spread of the good news. In order to underscore his view that hostility from Rome's designated ruler against church leaders is not a denial of the status of those leaders or the church before God, Luke peppers his narrative with parallels between Jesus, James, and Peter. Data like these—together with the more explicit statements concerning Herod's actions and motivation in 12:1, 3a, 11—make it difficult to argue that Luke has a positive or even neutral view of Rome, even if he never sanctions open resistance against Rome (or its leaders). (The James in question is the brother of John—that is, the apostle James. James the brother of Jesus seems already to have become a leader of the Jerusalem church in 12:17; see further, 15:13; 21:18.)

Luke's account of Peter's imprisonment and escape highlights elements of divine intervention on his behalf. Consider, for example, the measures taken to ensure that the prisoner is secure (12:6, 10), the appearance and guidance of an angel (12:7–10), Peter's lack of awareness of what was happening (12:9, 11), and the notation that the chains fell and the gates opened (that is, the exit was not forced by human efforts; 12:7, 10).

Another storyline is at work: prayers for the imprisoned Peter (12:5). Blending comic elements with reminiscences of the story of the discovery of the empty tomb of Jesus (see the chart, following), Luke sketches how Peter was finally able to gain entry to Mary's home to address the church. They are praying for him but seem not to anticipate that their prayers will be effective. Rhoda recognizes Peter, rejoices, and reports on his release, but others imagine that she has seen his ghost or, perhaps, his guardian angel (see Tob 5:22; Matt 18:10). Peter narrates his liberation in ways that may recall for us the exodus from Egypt (see already 12:3–4, 8; Exod 12:11) as well as Jesus' deliverance from death.

That Herod would return from Jerusalem to Caesarea is no surprise, since Caesarea was the provincial capital. The final installation to this sequence of scenes concerned with Herod (12:19–23) highlights his hubris. His title as "king" is repeated (12:1, 21) and this is matched with reference to his clothing (for the correlation of wealth, status, and clothing, see, e.g., Luke 16:19–21); he has the role of a patron who can give peace and on whom others depend (12:20); he is addressed as a god and does not deflect glory from himself to Israel's God (12:22–23). In this respect, he stands in sharp contrast to Peter, who has already twice declared himself to be no more than a human being when others assumed otherwise (3:12–13; 10:25–26). Herod's presumptuousness was already on display in his violent actions against the apostles James and Peter, and now it leads to his revolting demise (12:23).

Chapter 12, and with it the lengthy section of Acts beginning with 6:8, comes to a close with a summary statement (12:24–25). Read in relation to its immediate context, 12:24 marks the most startling of contrasts, between Herod and the word of God. Read in relation to the narrative unit it draws to a close, it demonstrates the fulfillment of Jesus' missional mandate in 1:8, even in the context of internal debates and hostility from Roman rule. Regarding 12:25, although the NRSV's rendering is possible, it makes no sense for Saul and Barnabas, having set out for Jerusalem in 11:29–30, now to return to Jerusalem. More likely the Greek text should be translated, "having completed their mission in Jerusalem, Barnabas and Saul returned [to Antioch]."

Parallels: James, Peter, and Jesus
Acts		Luke
12:1	Herod	23:6–17; Acts 4:27
12:3	Pleased the Jews	23:20, 23–25
12:3–4	Unleavened Bread / Passover	22:1–2
12:4	Before the People	23:4, 13
12:7	Angel	22:43–44; 24:4
12:4, 6	Security / Proof of Security	24:2
12:13–15	Women Believe and Rejoice / Others Doubt	24:1–12
(12:18–19)	Empty Tomb	24:2–3, 12
12:16–17	Departure	24:50–51

IV. Expansion from Antioch to Asia and Europe (13:1–19:20)

The commission Paul had received in Acts 9:15, "to bring my name before Gentiles . . . and before the people of Israel," moves to center stage through these seven chapters, which center above all on Paul. Even if the initial order of names suggests the primacy of Barnabas in the partnership (11:30; 12:25; 13:1, 7), this order changes quickly (13:42, 43, 46, 50; 14:1) and, at the end of ch. 15, Paul and Barnabas go their separate ways, with Luke continuing his focus on Paul. Although mission among the Jews is never far from sight, the drama surrounding Paul's mission revolves around what it means to include Gentiles among the people of God. The end of this section in 19:20 marks the third appearance of Luke's assurance, in this case a de facto commentary on Paul's mission, "So the word of the Lord grew mightily and prevailed" (see 6:7; 12:24).

A. The Expedition of Paul and Barnabas in the Province of Galatia (13:1–14:28)

Antioch emerges as a mission base from which Barnabas and Paul are sent. This, together with Luke's record of their economic partnership with the Jerusalem church (11:27–30) serves to legitimate this predominately Gentile congregation. Luke's fast-paced narration highlights a range of missionary activity (preaching, encouraging, evangelizing, strengthening, announcing, appointing, etc.). Response to the mission is divided, though not along easily determined lines. The surface impression one might get that Jews are hostile and Gentiles receptive to the good news (e.g., 13:45–48) is easily set aside, by both the positive response of some Jews (e.g., 13:43; 14:1) and hostility from Gentiles (e.g., 14:5–6). Nevertheless, the report Paul and Barnabas deliver to the church at Antioch reaches its climax as they share "how [God] had opened a door of faith for the Gentiles" (14:27). In terms of the larger narrative, a primary purpose of chs. 13–14 is to set the stage for the Jerusalem Council in ch. 15.

13:1–3. Barnabas and Paul Commissioned. Luke's account of the commissioning of Barnabas and Paul is tantalizingly brief. Apparently, Barnabas and Paul are so well-integrated into the church at Antioch that their names need not appear together in this list. We know that Barnabas and Paul are transplants into the church (11:22, 25–26). Both Simeon and Lucius are Africans, but when or how they found their way to Antioch is unknown. Perhaps with a note of irony, we find that a member of the court of Herod, the very ruler who met his demise due to presumptuous pride in ch. 12, is numbered among the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch. Importantly, the commissioning of two of their number is not the result of human initiative, whether that of the church or that of Barnabas and Paul themselves, but of God.

13:4–12. Contending in Cyprus. Barnabas and Paul are sent by the Spirit (13:4), they proclaim the word of God (13:5, 7, 12), Paul is filled with the Holy Spirit (13:9), and he speaks as a prophet (13:10–11). Bar-Jesus is a magician and false prophet (13:6) who opposes Barnabas and Saul and tries to deceive Sergius Paulus (13:7); surprisingly, then, he is a Jew, who would have known the rejection of magic and the penalties related to false prophecy in the OT (e.g., Deut 10:11–13; 13:18:9–14). Luke has thus sketched at the outset of this new stage of the mission a striking conflict between these agents of God's Spirit and this agent of evil (see the list of names Paul gives Bar-Jesus in 13:10!). The triumph of the divine word is realized in two steps—first, the prophetic judgment against Bar-Jesus; and second, the proconsul's faith (compare 8:4–25).

13:13–52. Preaching in Pisidian Antioch. John Mark, whose role seems to have been a kind of assistant to Barnabas and Paul (13:5), departs—an event that Luke regarded as important enough to note but for which he provides no obvious motivation. That he leaves at this juncture in the narrative and returns to Jerusalem may signal his discomfort with the ascendancy of Paul and his Gentile orientation. In any case, the real focus of these verses is Paul's address at the synagogue in Pisidian Antioch, his first and most lengthy address, which has its analogy in Peter's address at Pentecost (Acts 2:14–41) and Jesus' sermon at Nazareth (Luke 4:16–31). This speech is exemplary in that we can imagine this as the kind of thing Paul preached in synagogues more generally.

The argument Paul sets forth is a straightforward celebration of God's activity on behalf of God's people, which culminates in God's sending a savior, Jesus. God is identified as the subject of a series of verbs concerned with the election and guidance of Israel, so that the introduction of Jesus is continuous with God's efforts on their behalf. This, for Paul, is how to trace Israel's plot line, so that it leads unerringly, naturally, to Jesus. Jesus' role as Savior (see Luke 2:11; Acts 5:31) is connected to two claims regarding Jesus, both of which signify in him the restoration of Israel: Jesus' resurrection from the dead and the offer of forgiveness of sins. Salvation thus refers to the restoration of God's people, and this comports well with Paul's later insistence that his message concerns nothing but his belief in the hope of Israel (e.g., 26:6–7; 28:20).

In his speech, Paul devotes special attention to how in their hostility toward Jesus the Jerusalem leadership opposed God's plan. For the Paul known to us in his NT letters, this might have served as the backdrop for developing the saving significance of Jesus' crucifixion. Here in Acts, though, it is a precursor for the warning Paul issues at the end of his speech, with its implicit question, Will you embrace or reject the Savior whom God has brought to Israel? The outcome is mixed, with some Jewish and devout converts to Judaism following Paul and Barnabas, but others slandering them and rejecting their message. Paul's response echoes the words of Simeon over Jesus in Luke 2:29–32, with both citing Isa 49:6 as the basis for a mission to the Gentiles. Paul's words and behavior strike a note of apparent finality with respect to the offer of good news to the Jewish people; however, the pattern continues in Acts (see 17:1–2!): first to Jews, then to Gentiles. As in Luke's initial presentation of John the Baptist's proclamation (Luke 3:7–14), so now the first question is not whether one can claim Abraham as one's ancestor but how one responds to God's saving initiative.

14:1–7. The Reception of the Word of Grace in Iconium. The opening words, "the same thing," mark the episode at Pisidian Antioch as prototypical for this phase of the mission: this kind of preaching in synagogues leads to divided responses. The language Luke uses is slippery, so careful reading is required. According to 13:4, "the Jews" are aligned against "the apostles," but this would refer to Jews who have rejected faith in Jesus (i.e., "unbelieving Jews," 13:2), since it is clear that a great number of "Jews" did become believers (13:1). Note that the "Greeks" who became believers did so in the synagogue, indicating that, despite the apparently obvious words of Paul in 13:46, he has not turned away from the Jews and toward the Gentiles, but is evangelizing God-fearers alongside Jews. Luke lays out the importance of signs and wonders in 14:3: they validate the divine origins of their message.

14:8–20. Good News in Lystra. In an account reminiscent of chs. 3–4, Luke shows how a healing (14:8–11; compare 3:1–10) sets the stage for proclamation (14:12–18; compare 3:11–26), which leads to a response of resistance (14:19–20; compare 4:1–22). The parallels with the episode of healing are especially strong (located near a temple, a man lame from birth, intent looking, jumped up and walked), with both healing stories recalling Jesus' healing of a paralytic in Luke 5:17–26. This again helps to establish Paul's credentials. Greek mythology spoke of the importance of hospitality to the gods (Ovid, Metamorphoses 8 §§611–724), and the notion of gods taking the form of humans—and, thus of confusing humans for gods—was well-known in ancient literature. Separated from the people of Lystra by a language barrier (14:11), Paul and Barnabas are slow to respond (14:14), but when they do they contrast themselves with Herod (12:22–23), signaling their objections by tearing their clothes (compare Gen 37:29; Esth 4:1; Mark 14:63) and with words of denial.

Neither a synagogue nor Jews are mentioned in this encounter. Accordingly, rather than a rehearsal of Israel's history as preparation for the announcement of a savior (13:13–41), God's roles as creator and provider serve as witness (perhaps using the language of Exod 20:11; Ps 146:6). Christ is not mentioned at all, as these Gentiles are urged to turn from idolatry (that is, from inanimate, worthless things—see, e.g., Ps 115:1–8) to the living God (compare 1 Thess 1:9–10). We must wait to learn that some responded with faith to Paul's proclamation (see 14:21–23; 16:1–2); here, the focus is on his lack of success in convincing the crowds that they were only human beings and then on persecution instigated by their Jewish opponents from other towns. (The persistence of this opposition is suggested by the fact that Antioch is about 100 miles from Lystra!)

14:21–28. Encouraging the Churches. With this textual unit we come full circle—having been sent from (13:1–3) and now returning to Antioch. Luke makes this connection explicit in 14:26, indicating that the material in chs. 13–14 must be read together. Luke summarizes the reports of Paul and Barnabas in two key ways. First, among new believers, they interpret the opposition they themselves faced during the mission and, presumably, that the new believers have encountered subsequently. This is not a denial of God's agenda, but the means by which God's purpose is actualized; what is more, by participating in the same sort of opposition that Jesus himself faced, believers show themselves to have entered into God's saving rule. Second, whoever might imagine that the success of the mission is a consequence of the work of Paul and Barnabas would find themselves corrected, both by Luke's reminder that they had worked by means of God's grace (14:26) and their own report concerning "all that God had done with them" (14:27).

B. The Jerusalem Consultation and Its Aftermath (15:1–16:5)

The lengthy account of the mission of Paul and Barnabas can be summarized thus: "[God] opened a door of faith for the Gentiles" (14:27). What is cause of celebration for some (15:3) is the source of alarm for others (15:1, 5). In other words, the increasingly Gentile orientation of the mission of Paul and Barnabas provides the impetus for this more formal consideration of the place of the Gentiles among the people of God (compare 11:1–18).

15:1–5. Dissension and Debate. Luke's introduction to the Jerusalem Consultation centers on the conversion of the Gentiles, with the lines between opposing perspectives sharply drawn. Twice, Paul and Barnabas report on the mission Luke has surveyed in chs. 13–14. Among the believers in regions outside of Jerusalem, these reports lead to joy (15:3), but some believers among the Pharisees resisted their testimony. It is not that the Pharisees knowingly resist God in this matter; after all, their claim is that circumcision and Torah observance are necessary according to God's plan (note the Greek term, dei, in 15:5). Earlier, with regard to the conversion of Cornelius and his household (11:1–18), the issue has been table fellowship and hospitality between Jewish and Gentile followers of Christ. Now, however, the issue runs deeper, to what is required for salvation itself (15:1). Here, as elsewhere, Luke's definition of salvation is bound up with the character of the people of God and, in particular, what it might mean to be included among that people.

15:6–18. Testimony and Deliberation. What follows is reminiscent of Peter and John's daring response to the Jewish Council in 4:20: "we cannot keep from speaking about what we have seen and heard"; the parallel is significant since in both instances the question is how best to discern and practice the will of God, and in both instances evidence of God's saving initiative invites renewed reflection on time-honored understandings of God's will.

Peter's testimony rehearses briefly the Cornelius-episode with which those gathered were already familiar (11:1–18), with primary emphasis placed on Peter's interpretation of the episode as God's work. (Notice how many verbs in Peter's speech have God as their subject.) Though he does not use the term "salvation," he does refer to the gift of the Holy Spirit, synecdoche for salvation in the Lukan narrative, and refers implicitly to the analogy provided by the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2) as the analogy for making sense of God's activity among Gentiles in Caesarea. Because there is "no distinction" (15:9; see 10:28–29; 11:12) between Jews and Gentiles in how people are included within the family of believers, then requiring circumcision and Torahobservance of Gentiles is a means of testing God's ability to save (peiraz, 15:10) rather than a divine necessity (15:5).

Since his audience has just learned of Barnabas and Paul's missionary activity among the Gentiles (chs. 13–14), Luke can summarize this part of the proceedings with a single sentence. By mentioning "signs and wonders," though, he draws attention to their work as God's work through them (see 14:3, 27).

It is unclear whether the "Simeon" to whom James refers in 15:14 is the "Simeon" of Luke 2:25–35 or the apostle "Simon Peter." If it is the former, then we are reminded of the blessing pronounced over the infant Jesus that he would be "a light for revelation to the Gentiles" (Luke 2:32; see Isa 42:6; 49:6). If it is the latter, then we are reminded of Peter's own testimony in 15:7–11, referring back to 10:1–11:18. Either way, a similar effect is achieved, leading to James' reading of Scripture and conclusion regarding the question at hand. Working with the LXX version of Amos 4:11–12, James concludes that God's agenda all along has been to include Gentiles among God's people. In this sense, the decision toward which the Jerusalem Consultation is moving does not abrogate scriptural instruction but recognizes a strong element of that instruction that had been downplayed or overlooked. Indeed, God has already made this clear, as in fact Luke has recounted in Acts 10–14.

15:19–29. Decision and the Letter. The decision James reaches, and which makes its way into the letter from the Jerusalem Consultation to Gentile believers, does not question the inclusion of Gentiles among God's people. Nor does it set up prerequisites for how Gentiles might thus be included. Instead, by naming four practices as outside the boundaries, it seeks to regulate the behavior of Gentile believers. As each of these practices is related to the practice of idolatry, the decree seems especially concerned with militating against the idolatry that would have been ubiquitous in the Gentile world (compare 14:15; 17:22–25; 1 Thess 1:9–10). The letter itself undermines the concerns about Gentiles expressed in 15:1, 5 (see especially 15:24) and provides solid affirmation of Barnabas and Paul, whose reputations as representatives of the faith might have been sullied by those who resisted their mission among the Gentiles (15:25–26).

15:30–35. Reception at Antioch. Luke's record of the harmony and rejoicing that accompanied the reception of the decisions made in Jerusalem suggest an interpretation of the Jerusalem Consultation as a necessary detour from the main path of missionary endeavor. It is surely important that the Jerusalemites, Judas and Silas, participated in the building up of believers in Antioch, and were sent away in peace by the Antioch believers. But with a notation about the ministry of Paul and Barnabas at Antioch in 15:35, we have returned to their work among the disciples in Antioch prior to the interruption from certain Judeans (14:28; 15:1).

15:36–16:5. Paul and Timothy Strengthen the Churches. The purpose to which Paul sets himself is to backtrack through the territory covered in chs. 13–14 to review "how they are doing" (15:36). In the end, this is what Paul does, though with Timothy rather than with Barnabas. Although the immediate reason for the parting of the ways between Paul and Barnabas is clear enough—namely, their disagreement regarding John Mark (see 13:13)—the basis of that disagreement is unclear. The language of "desertion" (15:38) might suggest that Paul thought of John Mark as having forsaken the whole gospel, with its openness to Gentiles (the very issue on which the Jerusalem Consultation had just spoken!). Barnabas, on the other hand, appears in his customary role as mediator and encourager (a role he had played with Paul himself; see 9:26–27; 11:25–26). In any case, at this juncture Luke writes Barnabas and John Mark out of the story, following instead the work of Paul and his companions.

Although his legal status is uncertain, for Luke Timothy would be regarded among Jewish communities as a Jew. Note that the Jerusalem Consultation did nothing to mitigate for Jewish followers of Christ the requirements of Torah, with the result that Paul circumcised Timothy so as not to place in jeopardy the reception of the gospel.

Luke summarizes the results of their journey in two ways—first, by indicating the content of their message (16:4); and second, by indicating the thriving of the church. The two are cause and effect: embodying the gospel worked out in these multiethnic terms leads to health and growth.

C. Proclaiming the Good News in Macedonia (16:6–17:15)

Divine guidance moves Paul and his companions into Macedonia (16:6–10), where they remain until the travel summary in 17:14–15, which locates Paul now in Athens. This unit contains the first of the "we-passages" in Acts—that is, passages where the narration moves from third person ("they did such-and-such") to first person ("we did such-and-such") (see 16:10–17; 20:5–21:18; 27:1–28:16). The presence of the pronoun "we" has the immediate literary effect of inviting Luke's audience into active participation in the narrative, and contributes to the reliability of the narration. That it happens in only selected portions of the narrative shows that the narrator makes no claim to having been a constant companion of Paul, but an observer of Paul's mission nonetheless at some of its pivotal junctures.

16:6–10. The Call to Macedonia. A strong sense of divine guidance permeates this introduction to Paul's missional activity in Macedonia, as does the affirmation of unwavering obedience to the divine voice (see "immediately" in 16:10). "Holy Spirit" and "Spirit of Jesus" (16:6, 7) are virtual equivalents, the latter reflecting Luke's view that Spirit is given by the exalted Jesus (2:33). Indeed, it was in the context of the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit that the eschatological promise of dreams and visions was rehearsed (2:17), and subsequently visions and dreams are used to advance the narrative (e.g., 9:10; 10:3, 10; 11:15).

16:11–15. The Baptism and Hospitality of Lydia. Luke devotes inordinate attention to identifying Philippi (16:12) and Lydia (16:14–15). This is strategic since it makes the first convert on European soil and in this Roman colony a woman—either divorced or widowed, a Gentile, the head of her own household. Later, Paul and his companions will be charged with "turning the world upside down" (17:6), but here we have already evidence of Roman conventions inverted. Apparently, Philippi has no significant Jewish presence, hence a gathering for prayer on the Sabbath (16:13). Luke highlights that Lydia's conversion was the Lord's doing (16:14), notes that the conversion of the head of the household signaled the conversion of the whole household (see 10:2, 48; 16:33), and ties the reception of the good news to the hospitable reception of its messengers. Indeed, her house seems to serve as a center for the mission (16:15, 40).

16:16–40. Imprisonment and Release in Philippi. Returning to a "place of prayer" (16:13, 16), Paul and his companions encounter another woman whose contrast with Lydia is sharply drawn. Rather than head of a household, this woman is enslaved to her masters as a prophet for business purposes. Her claims regarding Paul and his companions are met with rebuke in a way reminiscent of demonic claims regarding Jesus (e.g., Luke 4:34–35, 41). In the present case, this may be because her words can be heard by non-believers as affirmations of yet one more god among the gods, or because these missionaries do not need allies like this demonized woman. In any case, emphasis falls on the power of Jesus Christ.

Although the real concern of the owners is the loss of income they will experience on account of Paul's exorcizing the spirit of divination, their opposition is recast in terms of xenophobia and public disturbance. Like Peter before them (Acts 12), so Paul and Silas, cast into jail, are miraculously rescued from their secure imprisonment. Luke's story highlights the response of the jailer who is about to commit suicide when he himself is "saved." Here, Luke's readers can hear a double meaning: saved from the shame of having allowed his prisoners to escape and thus from his own execution (compare 12:19) versus saved in the sense of welcoming both the good news and its messengers into his home (on the jailer's question, see Luke 3:10–14; Acts 2:37).

17:1–9. Turning the World Upside Down in Thessalonica. Lest we imagine that the focus on Gentiles in the preceding material has marked a departure from a mission among the Jewish people, Luke reminds his audience that Paul's custom was to focus his work in the synagogue. The message centers on how to read the Scriptures so as to emphasize the Messiah's death and resurrection, which leads eventually to charges that Paul is leading the people astray. In all three respects, Paul is like Jesus, who habitually preached in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Luke 4:16–17), interpreted Israel's Scriptures in conformity with the divine plan regarding the suffering and resurrection of the Messiah (24:25–27, 44–46), and was indicted for leading the people astray (Luke 23:1–5). To what degree are these witnesses guilty of the charges brought against them? On the one hand, nothing in Luke's precis of their message militates against Rome or its conventions; on the other hand, by proclaiming Jesus as God's Messiah, they call into question all beliefs and practices that do not flow from embracing the reign of God. If Jesus is Lord of all, then all other allegiances are secondary.

17:10–15. The Word Welcomed in Beroea. With Paul and Silas' escape from Thessalonica, the pattern of proclamation in the synagogue is repeated. The difference is that the rabble-rousing of 17:5 is replaced with serious engagement with the Scriptures among the Beroeans—apparently among Jews and devout Gentiles (17:12). This underscores yet again the struggle within Judaism in the Second Temple period regarding how best to read the Scriptures, with Luke siding with these followers of Jesus in claiming that, read thoughtfully in light of God's purpose concerning God's Messiah, the Scriptures confirm the good news concerning Jesus.

D. Advancing the Good News in Athens (17:16–34)

As with the move into Lystra (14:8–20), so Paul's entry into Athens sets him and his message on the stage of Greco-Roman religion. Athens may have a synagogue (17:17), but the context of his proclamation of Jesus and his resurrection is Athenian idolatry (17:16, 23).

17:16–21. Paul Gains an Audience. Paul's exasperation (paroxyno[−], NRSV, "deeply distressed") at the city's idolatry leads to his engagement with the city's inhabitants in two arenas, the synagogue and the marketplace. We might think it strange that Paul argues about idol worship in the synagogue until we recall that idolatry is a pervasive issue in Israel's Scriptures, and life outside of Palestine was replete with enticement to participate in idol worship; it may also have been that Paul's arguments in the synagogue centered on the importance of Jewish testimony against the idolatry of the city. If Luke seems to present Paul as a "street preacher," it is worth recalling how common itinerant philosophers, as Paul must have seemed, would have been. Indeed, Luke has it that the marketplace provided the stage for interaction with representatives of two philosophical schools, Epicureans and Stoics. For Epicureans, the ideal life comprises never-ending, undisturbed happiness, free from anxiety, pain, and despair. Stoicism prioritized living in accord with human reason, with happiness not an affective response but a product of virtue. As to beliefs in the afterlife, for Epicureans, the soul was a substance of fine particles that dissipated at death; death, then, was annihilation. Stoics had no settled position on the afterlife, but would not have supported the idea of a "bodily resurrection." It is not at all clear that either of these groups understood Paul's proclamation, as they regard him as a mere babblers and apparently hear in his message a reference to two foreign deities: "Jesus" and "Resurrection."

17:22–31. Paul's Proclamation on the Areopagus. An altar to an "unknown god" was likely a safety precaution as the Athenians relied on gods known and unknown to secure their living and fortune. Paul's speech provides an essentially Jewish perspective on idols: it is wrong to locate God in a shrine (16:24; see 7:48); it is wrong to attempt to placate the living God who provides life (16:25); God is not a local god, unlike idols that are stationary and bound to a specific locale (17:26); and God has his own life, unlike idols, who are inanimate objects (see Ps 115:1–8). From a Greek perspective, Paul's critique raises a serious question, since wrong worship ought to lead to punishment from the gods. Thus, in 16:30–31, Paul explains why God has withheld judgment and explains why repentance is now the order of the day. (Recall that, in a city full of idols [17:16], turning away from idols to the Living God would have far-reaching social-religious consequences.) He puts forward the resurrection of the appointed judge both to certify that judgment will come and to mark the turning point in God-human relations.

17:32–34. The Response at Athens. In effect, Luke describes a range of three responses to Paul's resurrection message: (1) scoffing, presumably the response of Epicureans and those who shared their rejection of an afterlife, or who simply thought "resurrection" was a barbaric belief in "resuscitation of dead corpses"; (2) openness, presumably the response of Stoics and others like them who had a variety of views on the afterlife; and (3) coming to faith.

E. Proclamation and Persuasion in Corinth (18:1–17)

Luke provides in these textual units two points of contact with datable history—the expulsion under Claudius (49 CE) and the proconsulship of Gallio (51–52 CE).

Two central elements in the formation of a community in the ancient world were ethnic background and trade, so it is no surprise to see that, upon coming to Corinth, Paul identifies immediately with Priscilla and Aquilla, who were like him in so many ways: Jews, living away from their homes, and tentmakers. At the outset of his work at Corinth, Paul seems to have worked as a tentmaker Sunday through Friday (compare 20:34; 1 Cor 4:12; 9:1–23; 1 Thess 2:9) until Silas and Timothy arrived from Macedonia. Did his companions bring with them from Macedonia financial support (see Phil 4:15), allowing Paul then to occupy himself more fully with proclaiming God's word? In any case, as was Paul's habit (e.g., 17:2), we find Paul speaking to Jews and devout Gentiles in the synagogue, and then to Jews especially, testifying that Jesus was the Messiah. Jesus had preached in synagogues, too, but in Luke 13:10–17 he meets such opposition that, for the rest of Luke's Gospel, he never again enters a synagogue. Overall, Luke–Acts demonstrates the importance of the synagogue to the mission of Jesus and his followers, but also a move toward the household where there is greater receptivity to the good news. This is precisely what we find in this scene. Like 13:46–14:1, Paul's resolve to turn to the Gentiles in 18:6 has about it the note of finality but the very next scene has him in a synagogue (18:19).

Paul's vision (18:9–10) anticipates the heightened opposition he will face. When it does materialize, the charges against him (18:13) could be heard in terms of sedition, but, in his disinterest, Gallio hears only an intramural dispute among the Jews (18:14–15).

F. The Triumph of the Name of Jesus in Ephesus (18:18–19:20)

This is the final narrative unit devoted to Paul's mission in Acts. From 19:21 on, Paul will continue his journeys and proclaim the good news, but the focus will shift away from missionary proclamation more and more to a defense of the gospel in a series of judicial settings. This part of Luke's narrative closes with much that is familiar to us—e.g., Paul among believers in regions he has already visited, Paul preaching in synagogues, mixed responses to the good news. The storyline centers in Ephesus, capital of Asia, and it is in this city that Demetrius, a silversmith, observes that Paul had countered idolatry "not only in Ephesus but in almost the whole of Asia" (19:26). This speaks not only to Paul's faithfulness to Israel's God but also to the breadth of his influence as a proclaimer of the good news.

18:18–23. Interlude: Travel and Continuity. The crisscrossing of travels is hard to follow as Luke telescopes many miles and days into only a handful of verses. Paul's words in 18:21, "if God wills" (see Jas 4:15), place the whole journey under the canopy of the divine plan. This summary also contributes to Luke's portrait of Paul as a traveling witness, underscores his Jewish credentials (see 18:18, 19), introduces Ephesus—a center for church and mission in the paragraphs that follow—and locates Priscilla and Aquila in Ephesus during Paul's absence. Luke provides no details about the vow Paul makes, but what he does say parallels somewhat the Nazarite vow (Num 6:1–21).

18:24–28. Priscilla, Aquila, and Apollos. In the temporary absence of Paul, Priscilla and Aquila provide continuity with the larger narrative as well as instruction for Apollos. Apollos is an example of how John's baptism ought to lead someone to Jesus Christ and, thus, to the gift of the Spirit (see Luke 3:7–20). Accordingly, he has been instructed "in the Way of the Lord," his speech is alive with the Spirit (18:25; NRSV, "with burning enthusiasm"), he teaches accurately concerning Jesus, and he speaks with boldness (that is, as emboldened by the Spirit; compare, e.g., 4:31) in the synagogues. The role of Priscilla and Aquila (note that she is named first, suggesting her prominent teaching role) is to explain the Way of God "more accurately." Luke's summary of Apollos' message parallels that of Paul (18:28; see 17:3).

19:1–7. The Holy Spirit Comes upon Some Disciples of John. Although they are called "disciples," those whom Paul encounters upon his arrival in Ephesus are like Apollos only insofar as they know only the baptism of John. Otherwise, the Spirit is manifest in Apollos' speech, but they are ignorant concerning the Holy Spirit. Moreover, whereas Apollos is able to teach accurately concerning Jesus, Paul must instruct these "disciples" that John's baptism was to have moved them toward faith in Jesus. This suggests that, by "disciples," Luke has in mind "disciples of John" (see Luke 5:33; 7:18).

Remarkably, John's ministry took place in a region far removed from places like Ephesus, and decades earlier. That John is mentioned so often in Acts (1:5; 11:16; 13:25; 18:25; 19:3–4) reminds us of the widespread influence of his movement, and allows us to see how Luke puts John in his place as an important precursor (but only a precursor) to Jesus.

19:8–10. Arguing at Ephesus. The conflict between Paul and those among the Jews who resist him and his message reaches a new stage, with Paul not only departing the synagogue but "taking the disciples with him" (19:9). Such opposition notwithstanding, Paul and his message are clearly sanctioned by God: his speech is "bold" (that is, emboldened by the Spirit; see, e.g., 4:31), he argues "persuasively," his message concerns the kingdom of God, and his departure from the synagogue has the effect that "all the residents of Asia, both Jews and Greeks, heard the word of the Lord" (Act 19:10). Opposition fuels the spread of the mission.

19:11–20. Miracle and Magic. Luke provides three short vignettes, ostensibly to legitimate Paul as a worker of miracles, but actually to show that the name of the Lord Jesus is to be praised (see the repetition of the name in 16:13 [2×], 15, 17). First, Paul is described in ways analogous to the summary regarding Peter in 5:15; note, however, Luke's clear affirmation that these miracles were done through Paul by God (19:11–12). Second, some Jewish exorcists (compare Luke 11:19) attempt to use the name of the Lord Jesus but in the process we learn that they are not qualified to do so (as is Paul) since they do not name Jesus as Lord (19:13–16). The play on words in the Greek text adds to the humor of the episode: they call on Jesus the Lord (kyrios) but the evil spirit "lords it over" them (kata-kyrieuo⁻, 19:16; NRSV, "mastered")! Finally, this leads to many becoming believers, exposing their magical practices and burning their books of magic (in spite of the fortune related to those practices), and the word of God not only grew but prevailed. This last point is a commentary not only on the power encounter Luke narrates, but also on his testimony that the spread of the mission has not been curtailed by the opposition it has encountered.

V. The Journeys of Paul, Missionary Prisoner (19:21–28:31)

Luke signals a major shift in the narrative of Acts, first, by the summary statement in 19:20 and, second, by the resolve that characterizes Paul's movement. The language of divine necessity will now move Paul forward toward Rome (compare 19:21; 20:16; 21:1–14). Along the way, Paul will fulfill his commission to "bring [the Lord's] name before Gentiles and kings and before the people of Israel (9:15); indeed, this last major section of Acts demonstrates Paul's allegiance to Jesus as he bears witness before rulers.

A. Paul Resolves to Travel to Jerusalem . . . and Rome (19:21–22)

Paul's travel plans are not of his own invention. They are guided by the Spirit and reflect God's purpose. His resolve parallels that of Jesus as he begins his lengthy journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and, like Jesus, he sends companions on ahead of him (compare Luke 9:51–52a).

B. Premonitions Concerning Paul's Arrival in Jerusalem (19:23–21:14)

What happens to persons in the Lukan narrative who embrace the divine will with radical resolve? Jesus and Stephen are case studies in the resistance God's spokespersons encounter. This section of Acts anticipates in both implicit and transparent ways the heightened hostility Paul will encounter too. Consider the furor arising in relation to temples made with human hands in Ephesus (19:24–27)—a flashback to Stephen's characterization of the Jerusalem Temple (7:48), likewise made with human hands; and a flashforward to the indictment that will be brought against Paul in relation to the Temple (21:26–29). Paul's own words before the Ephesians are the best commentary on what to expect: "And now, as a captive to the Spirit, I am on my way to Jerusalem, not knowing what will happen to me there, except that the Holy Spirit testifies to me in every city that imprisonment and persecutions are waiting for me" (20:22–23).

19:23–41. Rioting in Ephesus. How best to read this narrative unit is suggested by its immediate aftermath in 20:1: Paul's departure from Ephesus; indeed, 20:17 has Paul address the elders of the Ephesian church from a location other than Ephesus. Although Paul and his companions escape this riot without being physically harmed, the opposition has grown to such an extent that the public mission in Ephesus seems to have been silenced.

On the one hand, there is much to commend the success of Paul's mission. Others participate in the mission (18:24–28), everyone hears the good news (19:10; compare 19:17), even his opponents admit the far-reaching influence of Paul and his message (19:26), and when Paul and his companions are faced with mob action, the town clerk intervenes and warns the crowds that they, not Paul, are acting outside of the law.

On the other hand, the opposition is rigorous, a consequence of the tentacles of Artemis worship that reach far into the social, religious, political, economic lives of this center of Artemis worship, Ephesus. The concern with prosperity and business sounded in 19:27 should not be reduced to simple greed. Rather, Demetrius speaks truthfully of how fully the temple and its worship are integrated into the whole of the city's life, so that Paul's message against idolatry (that is, against gods made with human hands) is a genuine threat to a way of life. What is more, the town clerk counters Paul's message by repeating the legend of Artemis—not (as Paul would have it) a statue made by human hands, but "the statue that fell from heaven" (19:35).

Luke thus demonstrates the inherently and inextricably social-political-economic-religious character of the good news, and thus the degree to which its opponents will go to keep the gospel from upsetting conventional life.

20:1–12. Resuscitation in Troas. The first half of this section is taken up with details of travel and companions, each of which is important in its own way. Travel, for example, is toward Jerusalem (see 19:21), and the route taken reflective both of the hostility Paul faced and the need to encourage the believers in the places of his ongoing mission. Luke names some of Paul's expanding entourage, themselves representative of the congregations he has founded. Those designated by the pronoun "we" had remained in Philippi in 16:40, and now they reappear to sail from Philippi to join Paul in Troas.

The story of Eutychus is often taken as humorous but its associations within the Lukan narrative actually commend it as a tragedy made good. Sleeping is precisely what disciples ought not to do (see especially Luke 22:39–46; compare Acts 20:28, 31), so Eutychus' having been overcome by sleep marks his inattentiveness to Paul's words, his lack of spiritual alertness. His resuscitation by Paul (compare 9:36–43) is a restoration of Eutychus to the faithful. Luke's portrait of the scene invites reflection, too, on the nature of believers gathered for worship and teaching: the first day of the week (that is, Sunday; compare 1 Cor 16:2), breaking bread (compare Acts 2:42), multiple lamps (light and sight are often related to the illumination of the gospel in the Lukan narrative), and an upper room (compare 1:13).

20:13–38. Farewell to the Ephesian Elders. This is the last Pauline speech before his captivity and it fits the well-known pattern of the "farewell discourse" found in biblical and other literature (compare, e.g., Luke 22:21–38). Thus, it provides a review of history (20:18–21), warnings about the future (20:22–24, 25, 29–30), appointment of successors (20:28), encouragement to follow teaching (20:31), blessings (20:32), and prayer for those left behind (20:36). Perhaps most interesting is Paul's characterization of himself in this address, which serves both to prepare Luke's readers to hear counter-charges against him in the chapters to follow and to provide an exemplar for faithful leadership. Others will distort the truth, but Paul proclaims the message of the kingdom and the whole purpose of God (which undoubtedly refers to the mission to Jew and Gentile); Paul is faithful with regard to money (compare Luke 16:14; 1 Tim 3:3; 6:10); and Paul's mission, including the opposition it attracts, reflects and serves the divine purpose (see especially 20:22, 24, 27). So, too, the ministry of these elders is given by God, to whose care Paul finally commends them.

21:1–14. Jerusalem Bound. Just as Luke had marked Jesus' growing proximity to Jerusalem with added detail concerning his travelogue (Luke 18–19), so now Luke provides startling detail about the progress Paul and his companions make en route to Jerusalem. Although many days and miles are covered in the span of only a few verses, the effect nonetheless is to slow down our reading of the narrative so as to gain a heightened sense of the solemnity with which Paul carries out the journey. Additionally, Luke's record of Paul's itinerary has the effect of drawing together what would otherwise be disparate communities of believers; of course, the bond that holds them together is the Lord, yet the evidence we have of this is the peripatetic mission of the Lord's witness, Paul.

Luke's attribution of direction to the Holy Spirit may give us pause. After all, it was "in the Spirit" that Paul resolved to go to Jerusalem (19:21), and it is the Spirit who says that Paul will be bound in Jerusalem and handed over to the Gentiles (20:11). How, then, can it be that disciples tell him "through the Spirit" not to go to Jerusalem (21:4)? This may be nothing more than an example of the apparent tension we find in 20:22–23—namely, Paul is a "captive to the Spirit" in his going to Jerusalem, but the same Spirit testifies that this journey will be one of imprisonment and persecution.

At the end of ch. 8, after his encounter with the Ethiopian, Philip had proclaimed the good news as he moved up the coast from Azotus to Caesarea. Tying off that loose thread, when Paul and his companions arrive in Caesarea they enjoy the hospitality of Philip ("one of the seven" [6:1– 7], to differentiate him from Philip the apostle). Note that he is labeled as an "evangelist," a term that describes the actual work of sharing the good news in which he has been engaged in Acts; he is not a "deacon." His four daughters are "unmarried," probably a reference to their relative youth, and they are all prophets. Here in Caesarea, then, is the embodiment of the witnessing and prophetic community anticipated with the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost (see 2:17–21).

C. On Trial in Jerusalem (21:15–23:11)

This narrative section is focused on Jerusalem and includes Luke's account of Paul's journey from his arrival in Jerusalem in 21:15–17 to the Lord's promise in 23:11 that Paul would testify in Rome as well. Although he enjoys hospitality initially upon his entry in Jerusalem, Paul's Jerusalem experience is dominated by misunderstanding, accusation, and hostility—and, therefore, the opportunity to maintain allegiance to the whole purpose of God and to bear faithful witness.

21:15–36. Reception in Jerusalem. Although Paul's welcome in Jerusalem among the believers is warm, the situation soon turns critical (21:18–26). James and the elders relate to Paul the presence in Jerusalem of "many thousands" of Jewish followers of Jesus who are zealous for the law, who have heard (and apparently believe) that Paul has taught Jews in the diaspora to forsake Moses. This is surprising for two reasons. First, Paul's report to James and the elders has focused on God's work among the Gentiles (21:19; compare 14:27; 15:3–4, 12). Second, never in Acts do we read of Paul's even hinting that Jewish followers of Jesus, much less that Jews in general, should forsake Moses. A comparison with the charges raised against Stephen (compare 6:11–14; 21:21) is suggestive on account of similar concerns with Torah, but also because of a key difference: Stephen was opposed by Jews in Jerusalem, but Paul is being challenged by Jewish followers of Jesus. The proposed solution comes as a directive: Paul is to pay for the shaving of the heads of four Jews who are under a vow. The identification of the vow (somehow related to a Nazirite vow [compare Num 6:1–21]?) is passed over in favor of the symbolism of Paul's prescribed act; he will be seen to be participating in a Jewish act of piety.

The irony, then, is that it is precisely Paul the observant Jew who stands accused (21:27–36). To be sure, the accusers are Jews from Asia (repeating a pattern of Paul's opponents following him from place to place to upset his ministry—e.g., 17:13). But this only presses the question, Where are James and the elders? Why do they not come to Paul's defense? Sounding another chord of irony, then, it is not the community of followers of Jesus in Jerusalem who come to Paul's rescue as a mob is formed, but Rome's representatives. Like Jesus before his passion, Paul is isolated from the disciples. And as with Jesus, so with Paul, the crowds shout, "Away with him!" (Luke 23:18; Acts 21:36).

21:37–22:29. Paul's Defense Before the Jewish People. The parallels with Jesus continue as Paul, like Jesus, is assumed to be a rabble-rouser (Luke 23:1–5; Acts 21:38). The tribune gives voice to Rome's real concern—namely, maintaining order and addressing any threat of insurrection. Paul's defense speech is directed not to Rome, though, but to the Jews in Jerusalem, and, indeed, to those Jewish followers of Jesus who had questioned his faithfulness as a Jew (see 21:21). Thus, in 22:1–5, he lines up, one after the other, an impressive list of Jewish credentials. He claims kinship with his audience (22:1); he speaks Aramaic (21:40; 22:2; NRSV, "Hebrew"); he names himself a Jew, claims to have been reared in the center of the Jewish world, Jerusalem, recounts his strict education in Torah and its interpretation under Gamaliel (see 5:34), and bears witness to the zeal for God that he shares with those gathered (22:3); and he recalls his role in the service of the high priest and Jerusalem Council as a persecutor of followers of Jesus (22:4–5).

Even his report of his commission on the road to Damascus is saturated with demonstrations of Jewish faithfulness (22:6–16). He refers repeatedly to "the Lord," mentioning the name "Jesus" only because this was the name given to him in his vision. Ananias is presented not as a Christian but with transparent credentials as a devout Jew. Although Luke's readers know that the "him" and "his" to whom Paul refers is Jesus, Paul himself never makes this clear.

The climax of his speech comes in 22:17–21 as he recounts his vision in the Temple. Again, he refers to "him" and "the Lord," never mentioning Jesus. (The NRSV has added the name at 22:18.) He is in God's own house, holy space, when he receives a vision. He protests the message he receives from the Lord. In these ways it become irrefutable that his commission to go to the Gentiles was not self-imposed but came from the Lord himself.

Up to this point, the crowd had listened, apparently finding nothing of concern in Paul's speech. At this juncture, however, they break into his address with gestures and words of rejection. The parallel with Jesus' passion continues as they cry out for his execution (compare Luke 23:18; Acts 22:22).

The initial charges against Paul had been that he led people away from Torah and defiled the Temple (21:28). Rather than address these charges directly, Paul's defense had undermined the notion that he was anything but a faithful Jew. By the end of this part of the narrative, though, the real sticking point has been identified. Paul has made the case both that he can be a Jew and a follower of the Lord Jesus and that the Lord himself had shown Paul that followers of Jesus comprise a redirection of Israel's own history, a history that was now to include the Gentiles.

22:30–23:11. Paul's Defense Before the Jewish Council. Initiating the meeting as though he were in charge, Paul states credentials that call into question the whole string of events related to the opposition he has garnered in Jerusalem (23:1–5). He addresses the Council as "brothers," thus claiming "insider status" with these Jewish leaders (23:1, 5, 6); this could harken to his former role as persecutor on behalf of these leaders (see 7:58; 8:1). Second, he declares his "clear conscience before God." This may seem a strange assertion for one who has persecuted followers of Jesus, but it actually meshes well with Luke's biography of Paul. He has been zealous for God from first to last. To be sure, his experience on the road to Damascus has enhanced and transformed his understanding of what it might mean to align himself with God's purpose, but this only underscores the nature of his consistent commitment to serve (rather than work against) God's agenda. Drawing on imagery from Ezek 13:10–15, Paul associates the high priest with those who feign to speak on God's behalf but actually participate in unjust practices. In this, Paul calls into the question the legitimacy of this hearing.

Paul's subsequent claim to be a Pharisee "on trial concerning the hope of the resurrection of the dead" (23:6) functions at two levels (23:6–10). First, it comes across as a pragmatic move designed to throw the Jewish Council into turmoil—an effective strategy according to Luke's report. If Paul's rhetorical move seems to be a strategic manipulation of the Jewish Council, though, it remains true that his statement regarding the hope of the resurrection strikes at what he regards as the heart of faithful Judaism (see 24:15; 26:6–7; 28:20). This refers to the restoration of Israel by God—a restoration that, for Paul, signals the inclusion of the Gentiles—which has been set in motion by God's raising Jesus from the dead. Christology, the nature of salvation and God's people, and the end time thus come into focus in the one reference to the hope of the resurrection.

Paul's rescue from the Jewish Council by the Roman tribune leads that night to a vision, reminding us of how often Luke has recounted visions of assurance and divine direction (see 2:17–21; 16:9; 18:9–10; 22:17–18). The reach of Paul's witness is grounded in his commission (9:15), and now reiterated in this anticipation of the rest of the narrative of Acts (see also 19:21).

D. Custodial Journey to Caesarea (23:12–35)

Luke recounts the first stage of Paul's journey to Rome in remarkable detail. We have read before of Jewish plots against Paul (9:23–24; 20:3, 19), but only here do we have inside knowledge both of the plan and of its widespread support. Regarding the latter point, it is significant that the two groups before whom Paul has just spoken—the Jews in Jerusalem (21:37–22:29) and the Jewish Council (22:30–23:11)—are both involved (23:12, 14–15); Luke's report concerning the large number of actual conspirators and the death-vow they have taken only adds to the seriousness of the unfolding drama.

Even with this heightened devotion to detail, some points still are puzzling. Paul had a sister? A nephew? Luke passes over such matters, including why the tribune unquestioningly accepts the young man's report. Instead, we find that the tribune's name is Claudius, and that Claudius wrote a letter effectively transferring authority for Paul over to Felix, writing in such a way as to place himself in the most favorable light. (Compare 22:23–29 with 23:27!) Moreover, Claudius' letter serves to bear witness to Paul's innocence. From here to the end of Acts, Paul's innocence will be a constant refrain, reminiscent of the threefold statement of Jesus' innocence by Rome's representative in Luke 23:4, 14, 22.

E. Paul's Defense Before Felix (24:1–27)

Chapters 24–26 report Paul's making his defense before Rome's representatives, Governors Felix and Festus and King Agrippa. These allow Luke to sharpen the point of controversy between Paul and his detractors, and to show how, from a Roman perspective, Paul is innocent of all charges—and, accordingly, to raise the question why he continues to be imprisoned (see, e.g., 24:26–27; 25:9). Most important, this series of trials allow Paul the opportunity to maintain his allegiance to the Lord and to testify before Roman rulers (9:15).

Speeches in legal contexts like these typically unfolded in three parts: (1) an introduction designed to gain a favorable hearing, usually by flattering the audience and presenting oneself in a positive light; (2) a statement of the facts designed to establish the question on which judgment is needed; and (3) reference to witnesses and testimony that prove the charge against the defendant is either true or false. In the material that follows, we see that Paul and his opponents disagree about the question on which judgment is needed. This is because, for Luke, to put Paul on trial is actually to place the gospel itself on trial.

Jesus and Paul—On Trial
Luke 23:1–25		Acts 25:1–26:32
23:1	Introduction	25:1
23:2–5	Hearing Before Roman Procurator	25:2–12
23:6–7	Introduction to Herodian Ruler	25:13–27
23:8–12	Hearing Before Herodian Ruler	26:1–23
23:13–23	Dialogue	26:24–29
23:24–25	Conclusion: Innocent ... but	26:30–32

24:1–9. Paul Accused. Although the high priest and some Jewish elders are present, they do not speak, apparently having procured the services of a professional orator to make the case against Paul on their behalf. Note the escalation of Paul's opposition, from mobs in 21:27 to a hired lawyer. Although Felix was generally regarded as a scoundrel, Tertullus proceeds to flatter the governor in the expected way. The charges against Paul boil down to his status as a public enemy (loimos; 24:5, NRSV, "pestilent fellow"), evidenced by his disturbing the peace (compare the charges against Jesus in 23:1–5), and, especially, profaning the Temple (see 21:27–29). His case is supported by the testimony of the Jews—presumably, that is, by Jews of such status as the high priest and elders mentioned in 24:1.

24:10–21. Paul's Defense. By way of contrast, Paul proceeds without the services of a professional lawyer and provides only what might be regarded as brief and ambiguous praise for the governor. His statement of the facts differs significantly, too. He repeats each stage of his defense:

(1) I went to worship in Jerusalem, not to cause trouble (24:11–12).

(2) Where is the proof (24:13)?

(3) In fact, I am a faithful Jew, holding to resurrection hope (24:14–16).

(1) I went to Jerusalem to bring alms and offer sacrifices in Jerusalem, and there was no disturbance when I did so (24:17–18).

(2) Where are my accusers (24:19–20)?

(3) The charge against me should be this, that I proclaim the resurrection (24:21).

Paul has thus countered Tertullus, first by disagreeing about the reason he is on trial, second by admitting to a charge (his belief in and proclamation of resurrection hope) that is outside of Roman legal concern. In effect, he has shifted the focus of controversy away from himself and onto the nature of Israel's faith—that is, onto the good news of God.

24:22–27. Felix Delays Judgment. Luke casts Felix initially in a neutral light, but this portrait quickly deteriorates. His decision to await the arrival of the tribune is understandable for someone concerned with civil order and removed from the events in question; moreover, the relative freedom Felix gives Paul in his imprisonment comports well with first-century practices, where the everyday maintenance of prisoners fell to friends and family rather than to the state. However, he rejects Paul's message when it turns to judgment, attempts to profit from Paul's situation, lets Paul's case sit idle for two years, and, rather than dispense with the case, holds Paul's case over for decision by the new governor (24:25–27). This last (in)action suggests that Felix had no reason not to release Paul apart from his desire to curry favor from the Jews. Luke's portrait of Roman justice is thus a sullied one.

F. Paul's Defense Before Festus (25:1–27)

The narrative of Paul's trials before Festus and Agrippa in Acts 25–26 repeat familiar patterns from Luke's account of Jesus' trials before Pilate and Herod in Luke 23. The result is further legitimacy of Paul, not simply in spite of but because of the legal action taken against him.

25:1–12. Festus Favors the Jerusalem Leadership. Traveling to Jerusalem so quickly upon assuming the governorship of Judea may not be surprising given the reality that Festus' capital was Caesarea but the Jewish leadership was in Jerusalem. Ostensibly, then, he was seeking to establish a good relationship with Jerusalem. The issue of Paul is raised by the Jewish leadership and their request of a favor should be read within the elaborate web of social relationships in the ancient Mediterranean. It was one thing to be appointed governor, but quite another to rule; placing the Jewish leaders in his debt as they have suggested would be a firm step toward Festus' ability to rule over his people. Nevertheless, this encounter between the Roman and Jewish authorities (24:1–5) leaves us with the impression that Festus is nonprejudicial regarding Paul's case.

All of this changes once the governor returns to Caesarea. Having been prompted by the Jerusalem leaders, he has Paul brought before the seat of justice. Luke provides his audience with brief asides to let them know what is really going on in the ensuing encounter. The charges may be serious, but they cannot be proven (24:7). Festus may appear to be judicious, but in fact has joined his predecessor in seeing the disposition of Paul's case as a means of winning Jewish favor (23:27; 24:9). This leads to his suggestion that they take the case to Jerusalem. Paul's response is to deny all charges (compare 24:8 with 21:21; 24:5–6); to assert that the governor has stepped outside legal boundaries by suggesting a change of venue; and, indeed, having no hope of a fair hearing under Festus, to appeal to be heard by the emperor himself.

25:13–22. Festus Confers with Agrippa. A comparison of the narrator's account of Festus' handling of Paul's case in 25:1–12 with Festus' version of what transpired is stunning. The narrator portrays Festus as anything but a paragon of fairness, but Festus presents himself as the quintessential Roman governor, having acted responsibly at every turn. Even so, Festus does sharpen the question of Paul's alleged wrongdoing, repeating to Agrippa only that the issue at stake had to do with the resurrection. Paul's consistent rhetoric has thus proven successful: it is not he himself that is on trial, but rather his belief in the resurrection (e.g., 23:6–10; 24:14–16, 19–21).

G. Paul's Defense Before Agrippa (25:23–26:32)

This is Paul's final defense speech, and the third and final account of his encounter with the risen Lord on the road to Damascus (9:1–25; 22:4–21; 26:9–23). What does Paul defend in this address? Note that no charges are named; Agrippa merely permits Paul "to speak for himself" (26:1). This gives Paul the opportunity to set the record straight simply by narrating what has happened. We are thus reminded that "narrative" is not just "story" but also "action"—shaping identity, legitimating beliefs and behavior, and demonstrating continuity with the past. Such aims as these characterize an address like Paul's, the character of which must thus be understood in apologetic terms. In the end, then, Paul's address is proclamation much in the same way that the author of Acts employs narrative to proclaim the good news.

25:23–26:1a. Preliminary Matters. The problem Festus faces is one of his own making: How can he prove that he is a good governor? Thus, he exaggerates the pressure he is under, declares Paul's innocence (a pronouncement of which there is no hint in Festus' earlier comments in 25:1–12), and, neglecting his own prejudicial behavior that resulted in Paul's appeal to Rome, claims that had Paul not done so he would be set free. With the stage set for Paul to speak, no charges have been stated; Paul has nothing to which he must respond.

26:1b–29. Paul Addresses Agrippa. Paul's introduction fulfills its expected role by preparing his audience, Agrippa, to hear him favorably. He lauds the king for his familiarity with "all the customs and controversies of the Jews" (26:3) as well as presents himself as a faithful Jew. In this way, he lays out the contours of his speech. What is on trial is not Paul's alleged rabble-rousing behavior, but rather the nature of Jewish belief regarding the hope of the resurrection. This does not render Paul and the gospel harmless from a Roman or political perspective, since the hope of the resurrection is shorthand for the restoration of God's people, Jew and Gentile; and the resurrection has as its corollaries a reordering of social and economic life and political allegiance to the Resurrected One, Jesus, who is "Lord of all."

Paul comes to the primary question in 26:6–8—namely, his definition of authentic Israel in terms of the promise around which they orient their lives. This promise is the resurrection of the dead. "Why is it thought incredible by any of you that God raises the dead?" (26:8)—this is the question around which the king's judgment turns. Paul has thus removed himself from the focus of this hearing, substituting in his place what is for him the center of the gospel, the resurrection of Jesus Christ. To anticipate the judgments that come in 26:24–32, Festus' response to Paul's question is that Paul has lost his mind. Agrippa sidesteps the pronouncement of judgment on the question Paul has posed, recognizing instead that the issue at hand is not the concern of Roman jurisprudence. According to its canons, Paul is innocent.

Paul's sketch of his encounter with the Lord on road to Damascus leads to the center of Paul's defense in 26:19–23, presented in an A–B–A' structure:

A (26:19–20). What Paul has done he has done in obedience to God. In terms that roughly parallel Jesus' missionary mandate in 1:8, Paul has proclaimed to Jews and Gentiles their need to repent.

B (26:21). The action of the Jews against Paul was baseless. (After all, what he has done was in obedience to God [A] and was accomplished with God's help [A'].)

A' (26:22–23). What Paul has done, he has done with God's help. What is more, the message he has proclaimed is grounded in Israel's own Scriptures.

Festus' outburst, "You are out of your mind!" is countered by Paul's claim to inspired, sober speech (26:24–25). The basis of Festus' interruption is not Paul's hysterical speech or babbling, but rather Paul's exposition of Scripture as witness to the death and resurrection of the Messiah. Lacking the conceptual categories to make sense of Paul's argument, Festus presumes that Paul is the one lacking in cognitive equipment. Agrippa, on the other hand, seems to have understood the evangelistic ramifications of Paul's address but sidesteps the issue. Belief in the prophets, belief in the resurrection of the dead as the restoration of Israel, belief that his being raised up marks Jesus as Lord, and belief that Jesus' resurrection invites people to align themselves with God's purpose through repentance—these are all interwoven in Paul's speech as Israel's hope. Hence, the final exchange between Paul and Agrippa underscores Paul's persuasive agenda; he is not so much defending himself as he is proclaiming the good news.

26:30–32. Paul's Innocence Reaffirmed. When measured against the interests of Roman law, Paul is innocent. On this, both Festus and Agrippa agree, with Agrippa making explicit what Festus had earlier implied (25:25–27), that Paul could have been set free except for his appeal to the emperor.

H. Custodial Journey to Rome (27:1–28:15)

These final two chapters of the narrative of Acts are analogous to the final defense of the gospel Paul has just made before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa in chs. 24–25. There could hardly be a more profound testimony to God's help than God's rescue of Paul and his shipmates from the storm at sea that left them swimming for their lives. And there could hardly be a stronger affirmation of God's directive and assurance to Paul that he would bear testimony to the gospel in Rome (see 19:21; 23:11) than his arrival in Rome as a witness.

27:1–44. Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck. Accounts of sea voyages and shipwrecks had a firm place in the literature of antiquity, where they often highlighted providential care. Lest we are tempted to imagine that this account is included for the sake of novel-like entertainment or merely to provide an informative travelogue, we should note the variety of ways in which ch. 27 witnesses to the overall Lukan message of salvation. First, the terminology of salvation dots the seascape of this story. Verbs for salvation appear in 27:20, 31, 43, 44 (NRSV, "brought safely") and the noun appears in 27:34 (NRSV, "to survive"). In addition, retrospectively Luke writes, "After we were saved . . ." (28:1; NRSV, "reached safety"), and one of the natives of Malta observes of Paul that he was "saved from the sea" (28:4; NRSV, "escaped"). Although in Greek the language of "salvation" extends to notions of "rescue from danger," against the backdrop of the narrator's pervasive interest in salvation it is difficult not to read this chapter as an extension of that interest. This helps to underscore Luke's central concern that the agenda being served here is God's—and so this story highlights the lengths to which God will go to ensure that God's purpose is brought to fulfillment even against hurricane-level forces.

Second, the drama of Luke's narrative moves from a heightened emphasis on the danger of the journey to the declaration of divine promise, and from divine promise to divine deliverance. Note, e.g., how 27:1–12 underscores the difficulty of the journey: the winds were against them, they moved ahead with difficulty, they lost time, they were threatened by disastrous loss, etc. Acts 27:13–26 juxtaposes the desperate situation with hope: the winds achieved hurricane force, the ship was driven away from land, they had to strap the ship together, the ship was battered, they tossed their gear and cargo overboard, they were fearful, and darkness settled over them, so that "all hope of our being saved was at last abandoned (27:20); versus words of hope from Paul and his declaration that their safe arrival was woven into the divine plan (27:23–24a). And, indeed, it happened just as Paul had been told: the ship ran aground and was lost, but every person arrived on land safely (27:25, 41, 44).

Third, recalling that, for Luke, salvation is plotted as reversal of status and circumstances, it is instructive to read Luke's story in this light— e.g., movement from destruction at sea to safety at land, from darkness to daylight, from starvation to well-fed, and from discouragement to good courage (compare 27:20–26, 36; 28:15). All of this bears witness to the emphasis in ch. 27 on divine protection and deliverance.

28:1–15. Hospitality in Malta and Italy. If Acts 27 provided at times extraordinary detail of the voyage and shipwreck, Luke's narration of the three months (28:11) subsequent to the rescue of Paul and his fellow voyagers is far more sketchy. Undoubtedly, this is due to our proximity to the end of Acts, with Paul's long-anticipated arrival in Rome. Marking this interim period are two primary motifs, the first of which is hospitality (28:2, 7, 10, 14). The second is the identification of Paul as one through whom the power to heal is available. The snake incident on Malta may recall Jesus' words in Luke 10:19, that he had given his disciples "authority to tread on snakes and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy," and promised that "nothing will hurt you." This kind of commentary comports well with the evidence of the divine hand in rescuing Paul and his fellow travelers in Acts 27 as well. For their part, the natives of Malta see the snake bite as a sign of divine judgment, the hand of Lady Justice (28:4; NRSV, "justice") identifying and punishing him as a murder. The motifs of healing and hospitality intertwine in 28:8–10, as Paul and the islanders engage in reciprocal relations: Publius provides hospitality and Paul healed Publius' father; Paul's work of healing extends to the rest of the island and the islanders repay him with gestures of honor and supplies.

I. Paul on Remand in Rome (28:16–31)

Although Paul is greeted by followers of Jesus (28:15), they appear incidental to the story. Since the form of his imprisonment was a kind of house arrest, we might assume that Paul received support from these believers throughout his time in Rome. However, Luke bypasses any discussion of how there came to be a church in Rome prior to Paul's arrival (see, however, 2:10) and the final paragraphs of his narrative are taken up with Paul's interactions with Jews in Rome rather than with Christians. Throughout this final section of Acts, the focus is twofold: the gospel, which concerns the kingdom of God and the Lord Jesus Christ (28:23, 31), and how Paul's audience responds to the gospel (28:24–28).

28:16–22. Paul Sets the Hope of Israel Before the Jewish Leaders. Paul's summary of how he came to Rome emphasizes first his fidelity as a Jew and second the heart of his message, "the hope of Israel" (28:20). The content of this hope is not developed in this context, but we know from chs. 24–25 that this hope concerns the resurrection of the dead. This is a claim about Israel, of course, but also about Jesus, since it is through his being raised up that he has been declared both Lord and Christ (2:36) and that God's promise for the restoration of Israel, including Jew and Gentile, is being actualized.

28:23–31. The Jews in Rome Divided; Paul's Unhindered Proclamation. Only with the passing of time does the shorthand, "hope of Israel," get developed, and then in terms of the kingdom of God and Jesus. As we have come to expect in Acts, the response to Paul's proclamation is divided: "Some were convinced . . . while others refused to believe" (28:24). Paul interprets Jewish resistance with reference to the words of Isa 6:9–10, a text that has a long history of interpretation within Israel's life as a means of explaining Israel's recalcitrance. The message Paul draws from Isaiah is clear: even though the Jews in Rome say they want to hear Paul (28:22), he understands that many will not listen. The conclusion he reaches, that he will take his message to the Gentiles, might appear as the final rejection of the Jewish people. Three considerations militate against this impression, however. First, twice before Paul has made pronouncements of this kind, with strong notes of finality, only then to be found again proclaiming the good news in synagogues (see 13:46–47; 18:6–7). Second, 28:24 shows that some Jews hear and really receive the message. Third, the closing of Acts has Paul living in Rome welcoming all to his place of lodging. Here at the end, then, Paul's continued proclamation demonstrates that this proclamation is not silenced by opposition from any quarter and bears witness to the universal reach of the message he proclaims.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

K. L. Anderson. "But God Raised Him from the Dead": The Theology of Jesus' Resurrection in Luke–Acts. Paternoster Biblical Monographs (Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2006); W. S. Campbell. The "We" Passages in the Acts of the Apostles: The Narrator as Narrative Character. Studies in Biblical Literature 14 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2007); R. J. Cassidy. Society and Politics in the Acts of the Apostles (Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis, 1987); B. R. Gaventa. Acts. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2003); L. T. Johnson. The Acts of the Apostles. SP (Collegeville, Minn.: Glazier, 1992); I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson, eds. Witness to the Gospel: The Theology of Acts (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); F. S. Spencer. Journeying through Acts: A Literary-Cultural Reading (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 2004); M. Turner. Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel's Restoration and Witness in Luke–Acts. JPTSup 9 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996).

ROMANS

CHARLES COUSAR

OVERVIEW

Romans stands first in the canonical presentation of the letters because it is the longest of Paul's letters, but it might well be placed first because of its theological profundity and historical significance. However much the letter reflects a specific situation in Paul's ministry, it also addresses deep and perennial issues of Christian experience and faith. Whether the topic is God's own righteousness, justification by faith, the atonement, the sanctifying work of the Spirit, eschatological hope, God's dealings with Jews and Gentiles, or Christian ethics, Paul's letter to the Romans is a resource and reference point.

The importance of Romans for Christian tradition is simply incalculable. Augustine famously took up Romans when he heard a divine voice commanding him to "Take and read," and the theological controversies that marked his career sent him repeatedly back to Romans. Martin Luther identified Rom 1:17 as the occasion for his insight about the gift of God's righteousness, and Calvin identified Romans as nothing less than the entry point for understanding all of Scripture. John Wesley's Aldersgate experience, where his heart was "strangely warmed," happened as a minister was reading aloud from the preface to Luther's commentary on Romans. Arguably, Karl Barth's commentary on Romans was the most generative and controversial theological text of the twentieth century. From across the theological and ecclesiastical spectrum, readers of Paul throughout the centuries would agree with Barth's observation that Romans always has something new to teach its audiences.

This history of influence itself may have contributed to the sense that Romans offers a summary statement of Paul's theology, that Romans is less situational than Paul's other letters. Yet the letter is scarcely an abstract summary of Christian doctrine; it is silent about the Lord's supper and refers to baptism only once (6:3–4) and it uses the word "church" only in the closing lines (16:1, 4–5, 16, 23). In addition, the nature of Paul's work, characterized by his urgent need to proclaim the gospel in new places (1 Cor 9:19–23; Rom 15:20–21) and his concern about the flourishing of individual congregations, also makes it unlikely that he composed this letter as a dispassionate systematic reflection on the gospel. For these reasons, over the last several decades scholars have largely agreed that this letter, like Paul's other letters, addresses some particular situation, and considerable scholarly energy has been expended toward identifying Paul's reasons for writing to Rome and his reasons for writing this particular letter.

If it is relatively easy to agree that Romans is, like Paul's other letters, addressed to some particular situation, it is difficult to identify the exact contours of the situation. The difficulty has much to do with the fact that Paul had not yet been to Rome (1:10–13; 15:22–24). Here he writes to a community where he has not preached the gospel, so there is no appeal to their shared history (as in 1 Thess 1:2–2:16), no reference to previous instruction (as in 1 Thess 4:1–2), no direct reference to Paul's knowledge of their situation (as in Phil 4:3). From the greetings in ch. 16, however, it is apparent that Paul does know some people at Rome, and he greets them in quite affectionate terms: three are called "beloved," one couple is referred to as "kin" (or perhaps "compatriots"), one woman is described as "a mother to me," several are addressed as "brothers and sisters." Presumably, these are people he had met elsewhere, as is the case with Prisca and Aquila (see 1 Cor:16:19; Acts 18:1–3, 18, 26).

Some details about Paul's own situation are clear. First, Paul felt that his work in the Aegean region of Greece was completed (15:23). He then wanted to go to Rome and on from there to Spain, where he planned to carry out a new mission. Paul felt it critical to solicit support from the Roman church, perhaps even financial support (1:8–15; 15:22–32). Furthermore, Phoebe, who was about to leave from Cenchreae for Rome, and who was a good friend of Paul's, could be a trusted bearer of the letter, perhaps filling in gaps and responding to questions raised by the Roman church. She may have been a woman of means since she had served as "a benefactor of many and of myself as well" (16:2).

Before traveling to Rome or Spain, however, Paul faced an important and worrisome journey to Jerusalem. The predominantly Gentile churches Paul had founded throughout Macedonia and Achaia had collected an offering for the famine-stricken churches at Jerusalem (15:25–26), and it was Paul's job to deliver this gift to Jerusalem. But as he freely acknowledges (Rom 15:22–32), he was fearful of doing so for two reasons. First, given the tense political situation (the decade preceding the first revolt against Rome), he was perhaps afraid for his life. He admits to considerable anxiety (15:30–32). Many Jews would understandably be suspicious of Paul, a Jew who once persecuted the church and who now is known as the "apostle to the Gentiles."

Complicating matters further, Paul was uncertain whether the Jerusalem church would in fact accept the offering collected from the Gentiles. Some Jewish Christians may have encountered pressure from their kinfolk to avoid association with Gentile Christians. If they rejected the offering from the Gentile Christians, then Paul would have been devastated. To have the church splintered into Jewish and non-Jewish groups would have been crushing to Paul, who had fought so valiantly for a church where there was "neither Jew nor Greek." The gospel of which Paul is not ashamed and which he is eager to proclaim to those in Rome depends on a single message; the Lordship of Jesus Christ, in whom the righteousness of God is made known to all people, to the Jew first and also to the Greek.

Locating the situation in Paul's own ministry is far easier than learning anything about the situation of the Christians at Rome. Although the origins of Christianity at Rome are unknown, it seems likely that believers arriving in Rome would naturally have sought out the Jewish communities in the synagogues, where they would have encountered not only Jews but a number of Gentiles who were attracted to Jewish life and teaching. Writing in the second century, Suetonius reports in his Life of Claudius that in what would have been 49 CE the emperor Claudius expelled Jews from Rome due to the disturbances over Chrestus (probably a mistaken form of the Latin term for "Christ"). Given the size of the Jewish population, it seems likely that this reference has to do, not with the whole Jewish population, but with Jewish Christians whose preaching caused resistance and perhaps conflict in Jewish communities in the city. The same Jewish believers would have been allowed to return to Rome when Nero succeeded Claudius (in 53 BCE). If that is the case, then Christianity at Rome for several years may have been largely a Gentile phenomenon, and the return of Jewish Christians could have precipitated conflict between Jews who understood themselves as the rightful leaders of the communities and Gentile believers who had exercised leadership in the interval. This scenario helps to account for Paul's insistence on the priority of Jews (1:16; 2:9–10) and his fear of Gentile condescension (11:11–24), but it remains speculative and should be used with care.

OUTLINE

Most interpreters of Romans divide the letter into six major parts: 1:1–17; 1:18–4:25; 5–8, 9–11, 12:1–15:13, and 15:14–16:27. Though some have sought to place a major break between chs. 5 and 6, it is clear that the opening of ch. 5 contains themes that are developed throughout ch. 8. (In Romans, Paul has the habit of mentioning a problem, but then returning to deal with the problem in more detail at a later place in the letter.) Chapters 9–11 constitute a distinct unit dealing with the election by God of the Jews and of non-Jews. Chapters 12 and 13 then take up instructions for the lives of believers. These instructions are continued in 14:1–15:13, where Paul deals with conflicts having to do with diet and other religious observances and concludes with a plea for unity. The remainder of the letter (15:13–16:27) provides the conclusion, which includes comments about Paul's own plans and his greetings to people in Rome.

I. Introduction (1:1–17)

II. God's Righteousness Expounded (1:18–4:25)

A. The Revelation of God's Wrath (1:18–3:20)

B. The Revelation of God's Righteousness in Jesus Christ (3:21–31)

C. God's Dealings with Abraham (4:1–25)

III. "Boasting in our hope of sharing the glory of God" (5:1–8:39)

A. God's Justification of the Unrighteous in the Death of Jesus (5:1–21)

B. Death and Resurrection with Christ (6:1–7:6)

C. The Law and Sin (7:7–25)

D. The Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus (8:1–17)

E. The Assurance of God's Love (8:18–39)

IV. God's Election of Israel (9:1–11:36)

A. God's Word Has Not Failed (9:1–29)

B. God's Impartiality and Faithfulness (9:30–10:21)

C. God's Electing Mercy (11:1–36)

V. Life in Christ (12:1–15:13)

A. "Be transformed by the renewal of your mind" (12:1–21)

B. On Christian Obligations (13:1–14)

C. An Appeal for Harmony (14:1–15:6)

D. Welcome to Jews and Gentiles (15:7–13)

VI. Letter Closing (15:14–16:27)

A. The Romans and Paul's Mission (15:14–33)

B. Closing Greetings and Instructions (16:1–27)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1:1–17)

The opening of Romans formally resembles Paul's other letters, beginning as it does with a salutation (1:1–7), followed by a prayer of thanksgiving (1:8–15), and a section commonly referred to as the theme of the letter (1:16–17, although the theme is only fully explained in 1:18–3:20 and then expanded upon throughout the letter).

Several features stand out in these opening lines. First is the length of the salutation. Presumably because this letter is Paul's first occasion for addressing the Romans, he offers a more extended identification of himself. He is a "servant" (literally, a "slave") of Jesus Christ, he is "an apostle," he is "set apart for the gospel of God" (v. 1). This reference to the gospel is unpacked in vv. 2–4, as Paul sets forth clearly the content of the gospel he preaches. Verse 2 connects the gospel with God's promises in Scripture, a comment that seems to anticipate the body of the letter, with its extensive engagement with Scripture. Several features of vv. 3–4 prompt scholars to conjecture that Paul is employing an early confession of some sort, possibly one already known to his Roman readers. Two parallel statements specify what is to be said about "his Son":

"who was descended from David according to the flesh." (1:3)

"who was declared Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness by resurrection from the dead." (1:4)

The first statement firmly connects Jesus to Israel by Davidic descent (cf. 9:5), and the second asserts that this particular son of David was established into the office of the Son of God on the basis of his being raised from the dead (see Acts 13:26–40).

With v. 5 Paul moves from a summary of the gospel's content to the mission generated by the gospel. It is from Jesus that "we" received "grace and apostleship" to bring about "obedience of faith among all the Gentiles" (1:5, NRSV). The REB unfortunately separates the phrase into two distinct results: "obedience and faith," whereas the NIV more correctly reads "the obedience that comes from faith," or "the obedience that consists in faith."

Verses 6–7 at last identify the recipients of the letter as those "called to belong to Jesus," "God's beloved in Rome," and "called to be saints." As elsewhere in Paul's letters (e.g., 1 Cor 1:2), it is not only the apostles who are called into service. Paul understands all believers to be such by virtue of God's calling to them.

The thanksgiving (vv. 8–15) acknowledges that the existence of the Roman churches is known throughout the world, and includes a typical statement about his constant prayers for them (v. 9; cf. e.g., 1 Thess 1:2–3). Also here Paul announces his long-standing desire to be in Rome and his hope that he is soon to be able to do so. Few details help readers to understand either why Paul wishes to be in Rome in particular or what circumstances have prevented his journey. He announces that he wants to "reap some harvest" there, which could mean either his hope for extending the gospel's message further into the populace of Rome, or it could refer to the support of Roman Christians for his planned mission to Spain (see 15:24, 28–29).

What is clear is Paul's sense of obligation to preach the gospel to all people. "To Greek and to barbarians" seems peculiar, given that he is writing to Rome rather than to a Greek city, but this phrase reflects the dominance of Greek culture. One way of dividing the human world was between those who would speak Greek and the "barbarians" who could not. All people, whether Greek-speaking or not, whether "wise" or "foolish" are intended to hear the gospel.

Verses 16–17, surely among the best known of all Paul's statements, constitute an announcement of the thesis of the letter. It begins with the claim that "I am not ashamed of the gospel" which is probably an example of litotes, a rhetorical use of understatement intended to affirm the positive side of a statement (as in Acts 20:12; 26:26). It could be rendered "I have complete confidence in the gospel." The gospel is "the power of God for salvation" (1:16). The gospel is not simply verbal, it actually consists of God's own power (cf. 1 Thess 1:4–5). Here Paul's apocalyptic perspective comes to the fore in that he writes about the gospel using the language of power (see below). Paul understands the tyranny under which human beings live and from which they needed to be freed (as he will make clear in chs. 5–7).

Having said in vv. 14–15 that his own preaching is for all people (Greeks and barbarian, wise and foolish), Paul reiterates that point here in a slightly different way. This saving power of God is available to "everyone who has faith," but it is to "the Jew first and also to the Greek." While Paul argues for the inclusion of the Gentiles among the people of God, he does not want the Gentiles to forget that there is a certain divine precedence in the order of things. Later in the letter, he speaks of the advantages of being a Jew (3:2), the promises to Abraham (4:13), and the gifts of God to Israel (9:4–5). He also reminds the Gentile readers, who might be tempted to gloat over their status, that they are to "remember that it is not you that support the root, but the root that supports you" (Rom 11:18).

Verse 17 continues the announcement about the gospel with the claim that it reveals "the righteousness of God." This phrase appears often in Romans (1:17; 3:5, 21, 22, 25, 26; 10:3) and has been interpreted in at least three distinct ways. First, it has been thought of as denoting a moral attribute, a characteristic of God (as in the declaration that "Mother Teresa was a person of righteousness"), so that the gospel's role is to reveal knowledge about God's inherent goodness. A second interpretation imagines that the "righteousness of God" is language that finds its proper home in the courtroom, that the phrase denotes the favorable decision a defendant receives from a judge. Thus when Paul speaks of the "revelation of righteousness," he refers to the favorable verdict pronounced over the individual, declaring that the defendant's sins are forgiven. A third interpretation locates the "righteousness of God" in apocalyptic thinking and understands it as God's salvation-creating power that is at work in the world in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This third interpretation involves both the subjective righteousness that belongs to God and its objective action in saving humankind, and it best accounts for the argument that unfolds in the chapters that follow. It is God's own righteousness, not in and of itself (as in moral righteousness) but in its action for human beings, indeed for the whole of the cosmos. The revelation of this righteousness is a cosmic event that stands at the beginning of a new era.

Paul concludes the introduction with the affirmation that God rectifies "through faith for faith; as it is written, 'The one who is righteous will live by faith'" (quoting Hab. 2:4; cf. Gal 3:11). But of whose faith does Paul speak here? Is this human faith that somehow of its own reveals God's righteousness? Or is it the faithfulness of God or of Jesus Christ? The Greek word pistis can bear either interpretation, either as human faith (in the sense of humanity's belief or trust in God) or as faithfulness (in the sense of God's own trustworthiness, God's reliability). The context emphasizes God's own action, and the chapters that follow underscore this point, making it likely that the revelation of God's righteousness "from faith to faith" means that "the saving promises of God are declared from the faithfulness of God in Christ to the responding faith of believers." God's revelation of righteousness comes through the divine faithfulness and not through human achievement.

II. God's Righteousness Expounded (1:18–4:25)

A. The Revelation of God's Wrath (1:18–3:20)

This first major section of the letter unpacks what Paul understands by the saving power of the gospel. He initially takes up the negative side of the argument by considering in stark and bold tones his diagnosis of the human situation (1:18– 3:20). Having begun with a clear affirmation of the revealing of God's righteousness, Paul turns in 1:18 to the revealing of God's wrath. Because the notion of God's "wrath" conjures up images of an irrational and angry deity, some readers of Paul identify this divine wrath as impersonal, the natural consequences of human evil. But it is important to understand that God's "wrath" is indeed personal in the sense that it reflects God's refusal to accept humanity's distortion of the relationship between humanity and God, humanity's defiance of God.

Following the initial announcement about the revelation of God's wrath, Paul takes up "ungodliness and wickedness" in 1:18–32. Here he makes use of conventional Jewish stereotypes about Gentiles, who are regarded as ungodly because their religious practices involve many gods and who are sexually promiscuous (see, e.g., Wisdom of Solomon 13–14). Even if Gentiles have not received the same revelation of God as have Jews, Paul contends that God has nevertheless been made known to them so that their behavior is inexcusable. Importantly, the behavior Paul focuses on here is their refusal to honor God rightly and their distorted practices of crafting images of God (vv. 19–23). It is because of this initial rebellion against God that God "hands them over" (vv. 24, 26, 28) to their own desires. The description of same sex relations in vv. 26–28, along with the list of vices in vv. 29–31, is the result of the primal human sin of rejecting God.

Much controversy has focused on Paul's brief comments here about same sex relations. It is unlikely that Paul thought of homosexuality as a sexual orientation in the modern sense of an identity or a disposition; instead, he may well have in mind the sexual abuse of younger men by older ones (see 1 Cor 6:9) and the widespread conviction that relations between people of the same sex represented lust that was out of control (as in Dio Chrysostom, Discourse 7.151–52; Philo, On Abraham 133–36). Given the Old Testament's frequent association of idolatry and sexual immorality (e.g., Hos 1–4; Ezek 16; 23; Wis 14:12–31), it is not at all surprising that Paul places the two together here. Whatever readers conclude about these comments, it is important to study with equal seriousness the list included in vv. 29–31.

This indictment comes to a dramatic turning point at 2:1, where Paul shifts from the third person plural to the second person singular, now directly addressing his audience with "you." It is often claimed that Paul here is thinking of those Jews who condemn Gentile immorality without acknowledging their own, but it is not clear that the "you" addressed here is Jewish. What is clear is that the move from 1:32 to 2:1 is a rhetorical tool, by which those readers who imagine themselves exempt from the indictment (whether Jews or Gentiles) are caught in a trap. With this use of direct address, as often in Romans, Paul makes use of elements of the diatribe, a teaching strategy common among philosophical teachers.

On most any interpretation of the letter, Rom 2 is challenging. Here Paul speaks of God's kindness leading people to "repentance" (v. 4), a concept that is virtually absent from his other letters (see 2 Cor 7:9–10; 12:21). He also speaks of Gentiles who do "instinctively what the law requires" (2:14) although he will later say that the law's function is to reveal sin (3:20; 7:7). And he places stress on a final judgment of human beings based on their actions (2:6), although later he will contend that it is God's grace that saves (3:24; 5:21). There is no consensus about how this discussion functions in the larger argument, and some scholars conclude that Paul is simply inconsistent. Several things do emerge clearly: God's dealings with Jew and Gentile are impartial (v. 11); contrary to expectations, some Gentiles do what is good and some Jews do not.

Toward the end of ch. 2 Paul comes perilously close to denying any special status to Jews. A Jew is not a person characterized by any external trait, such as circumcision; rather circumcision is something spiritual and not literal. One can speak only of an inward circumcision, a circumcision of the heart (see Deut 10:16). Given God's long and historic relationship with the Jews, Paul then has to face the question of whether the Jews have any advantage at all (3:1–5). Have their failures caused God to turn away from the Jews? Can God's promises to the Jews be trusted? And if God is so gracious as to overlook the sins of the Jews, then how can God judge the world? What about God's faithfulness (3:3), and God's righteousness or justice (3:5) and God's truthfulness (3:7)? Are these convictions about God called into question by God's failure to condemn the Jews? Paul's vehement response to these potential responses ("By no means!" vv. 4, 6) hints at his own convictions about God's faithfulness to Israel, convictions that will be articulated more fully in Rom 9–11. The problem is not that God is faithless but that human beings are.

With 3:9, Paul arrives at a pithy summary of his argument to this point: "all, both Jews and Greeks, are under the power of sin." Gentile sinfulness he takes as virtually self-evident, Jewish sinfulness he argues more cautiously, but the result is the same. Numerous attempts have been made to soften Paul's rhetoric, such as suggestions that he means that all people are prone to do what is wrong, or that Jews and Gentiles are equally capable of wrong-doing. But the compound citation of Scripture that follows, together with the argument offered in 5:12–19, suggests that Paul means what he says: all are under sin's power (cf. 11:32).

Paul reinforces 3:9 with an extended collection of quotations from Scripture in 3:10–18. It has been argued that Paul is drawing here on a preexisting text, but the collection seems to serve his argument well. Especially notable is the repetition of the phrase, "there is not (or 'no') one." No one is righteous (v. 10), no one seeks God (v. 11), no one shows kindness (v. 12), no one fears God (v. 18). The collection culminates with the solemn declaration of vv. 19–20, which reintroduces the role of the law (see earlier in 2:12–29): the law shows that all are silent before God.

B. The Revelation of God's Righteousness in Jesus Christ (3:21–31)

In 3:21–31, Paul turns away from his complex argument about the revelation of God's wrath (1:18) and returns to his initial statement about the revelation of God's righteousness (1:16–17). While repeating his conclusion that God's righteousness does not come through the law (that is, the law does not itself rectify people), Paul carefully reiterates the role of Scripture ("the law and the prophets") in witnessing to God's righteousness (3:21, and see 1:2). Both Jews and Gentiles have fallen short of the divine glory, but God has taken the initiative in the death of Jesus to remedy the human plight and to declare divine righteousness for all people.

God's initiative is repeatedly declared in these verses. It is God's grace that justifies (v. 24), God who puts forward Christ Jesus in the cross (v. 25), God who acts to make clear his own righteousness (vv. 25–26), and God who justifies humanity (v. 26). The reader who pays careful attention to Paul's emphasis on God's role will find this complex and important passage somewhat easier to grasp.

God's righteousness is "through faith in Jesus Christ," as the NRSV puts it, but a footnote indicates that the Greek can also be rendered as "through the faith of Jesus Christ." Literally, the phrase is pistis Iēsou Christou, "faith of Jesus Christ," and the Greek pistis can mean both "faith" in the sense of belief and "faithfulness" in the sense of reliability or trustworthiness. Generations of English translations reflect the presumption that what Paul means here and elsewhere is faith "in" Jesus Christ (Rom 3:22, 26; Gal 2:16 [twice], 20; 3:22; Phil 3:9), but in recent decades scholars have intensely debated whether Paul means that God's righteousness comes about through faith in Jesus Christ or whether it means that Jesus' own faithfulness brings about God's righteousness. Although some arguments from Greek grammar and usage are introduced, the question finally focuses on context, especially whether Paul seems to be pitting a human activity (fulfilling stipulations of the law) over against a divine activity (Christ's faithful obedience), or whether he is pitting one human activity (fulfilling the stipulations of the law) over against another human activity (believing). Particularly in 3:21–26 the phrase carries a "subjective" sense, designating the faithfulness of Christ to God, not a human's faith in God.

Paul further describes the righteousness of God in vv. 24–25, where he writes that God put Christ Jesus forward as a hilastērion. Discussions of this term often revolve around whether Paul refers to "propitiation," a means of warding off God's wrath, or to "expiation," a means of ridding the human being of guilt. Those two connotations, however, cannot be disentangled from one another. What is clear is that in the LXX the word hilastērion designates the cover over the top of the mercy-seat, where the high priest on the Day of Atonement sprinkled the blood of the bull, making intercession for his own sins and the sins of the people as a whole (e.g., Lev. 16:13–15). It is used similarly in Heb 9:5, the only other time the word appears in the NT. Following this usage, Jesus becomes the "mercy-seat," or, figuratively, he is the sacrifice that takes place there. This figurative usage of the term is found in 4 Maccabees, where hilastērion refers to the loyal Jewish mother and her seven sons who became martyrs at the time of the Hasmonean revolt (4 Macc 17:22; cf. 4 Macc 6:28–29).

It is tempting to make the exact connotations of this word pivotal to understanding the passage, but the difficulty with that strategy is that Paul nowhere else uses the word. In addition, while these verses are important for understanding Paul's interpretation of the death of Jesus, they are not his only statements on that subject. In 5:12–21, Paul will interpret the death of Jesus as the occasion in which human beings are incorporated in Jesus, as earlier they were incorporated in Adam. In 1 Cor 1:18 and 2 Cor 5:15–16, the death of Jesus becomes the point at which the corruption of human values and virtues is revealed.

The transition at v. 27 may seem abrupt, but it will be less so if readers have observed how emphatic in vv. 21–31 is Paul's insistence on God as the agent of righteousness. The question about boasting, then, is a question about whether it is God who justifies or whether human beings do so based on their keeping of the law. Paul's reintroduction of the law in vv. 27–28 prompts him in vv. 29–30 to return to his earlier discussion of Jews and Gentiles (see 2:9–16; 3:9), which then leads him to introduce Abraham.

C. God's Dealings with Abraham (4:1–25)

Since Abraham is the progenitor of the people and is the recipient of the sign of circumcision, Paul must deal with the figure of Abraham. This discussion, then, extends the comments made in 3:1–2 about the benefits that belong to Jews, and it also anticipates the longer discussion in Rom 9–11. Crucial to this discussion is Paul's interpretation of Gen 15:6, which he draws on in three slightly different ways (vv. 3, 9, 22) to underscore the fact that Abraham did not earn God's favor, but rather trusted in God. First, in vv. 3–5, he quotes Gen 15:6 as evidence that it was by faith that God puts the ungodly in a right relationship to himself and not by works. Here he elaborates with the analogy of work; workers are paid a wage that is due them for their labor. And in vv. 6–8, he introduces Ps 32:1–2 as evidence of God's gracious forgiveness. Second, in vv. 9–15 he takes note of the fact that Gen 15:6 mentions Abraham's faith prior to the time when, in Gen 17:9–14, circumcision is made essential for inclusion into the covenant people of God. Paul draws a conclusion from the order of the two stories: Abraham's experience of faith occurred before he was circumcised, and this makes Abraham the ancestor and model for non-Jews as well as for Jews (4:11b–12). And third, Gen 15:6 enters the discussion again as Paul emphasizes that Abraham grew strong in faith with regard to having a son, despite the barrenness of his aged wife Sarah and his own body that was "already as good as dead" (v. 19). He remained strong in faith, fully convinced that God was able to do what God had promised.

That this bit of exegetical interpretation is not simply of antiquarian interest becomes clear in v. 24, when Paul writes that the "reckoning" of righteousness was not just for the sake of Abraham but is "for ours also." Abraham is father of both the uncircumcised and the circumcised (vv. 11–12), those who believe in "Jesus our Lord" (v. 24).

III. "Boasting in our hope of sharing the glory of God" (5:1–8:39)

A. God's Justification of the Unrighteous in the Death of Jesus (5:1–21)

Romans 5:1–11 serves as a transitional unit into the second major section of the letter. "Therefore, since we are justified by faith" (5:1a) recapitulates the language of righteousness and justification in the previous section. Similarly, Paul also reiterates the language of boasting in vv. 2, 3, 11 (see 2:17, 23; 3:27; 4:2) and the nature of God's actions for the ungodly in v. 6 (see 4:5). But 5:1–11 also paves the way for movement into a new direction. After the beginning of ch. 5, there is no longer such emphasis on the language of "faith" or "believing" (see 1:12, 17; 3:3, 22, 25–31; 4:5, 9–16, 19–20), "the righteousness of God" (1:17; 3:5, 21, 22, 25, 26; 10:3), and "Jew" and "Greek" (see 1:16; 2:9–10; 3:9, 29) as the primary topics for consideration in chs. 5–8. Instead, these chapters emphasize the language of "hope" (5:2, 4–5; 8:20, 24; see 4:18), "life" (5:10, 17, 18, 21; 6:4, 22, 23; 7:10; 8:2, 6, 10, 38), "death" (5:10, 12, 14, 17, 21; 6:3–5, 9, 16, 21, 23; 7:5, 10, 13, 24; 8:2, 6, 38), the work of Adam and Christ (5:12–21), and attention to the role of the Spirit (see 5:5; 7:6; 8:1–17, 23, 26–27). Whereas OT texts were prominent in the first four chapters, only two citations (at 7:7 and 8:36) occur between 5:1 and 8:39. Furthermore, unlike the boasting referred to earlier (2:17, 23; 3:27; 4:2), here boasting is in God, which gives the section a doxological flavor (5:2, 11).

Two dimensions of 5:1–11 warrant special attention. First, at the beginning of the section, attention is directed to the future, as Paul writes that boasting is "in our hope of sharing the glory of God" (5:2b). "The glory of God," the very reality that humanity has lacked because of sin (3:23), becomes the object of hope, which for Paul is not mere wish but confident expectation (and see 8:18). This hope makes possible a positive attitude toward the sufferings of the present time. Rather than being the occasion for puzzlement or lament, afflictions are understood as the necessary part of the experience of grace. Then at the end of the section, in vv. 9–11, Paul returns to the theme of the future. In parallel rhetorical expressions ("much more surely") in vv. 9 and 10, readers are provided with a warrant not to fear the eschatological judgment but to "receive the abundance of grace and the free gift of righteousness" (5:17).

Second, Paul takes up again here the death of Jesus (as in 3:21–26), but he does so in a way that is striking. Jesus' death for the ungodly is an unparalleled event that occurs as a surprise (v. 6–8). There is no preparation for it, no contingency that makes it provisional, no call to repentance to activate its results. It is a happening of unilateral and unconditional grace. The death of Christ for weak, ungodly sinners is both unanticipated and incomparable.

The "therefore" that introduces 5:12 connects the second half of the chapter closely to 5:1–11, as here Paul addresses the question as to how weak, ungodly sinners can have such confidence in their standing on the day of judgment. As Paul begins that explanation, however, he returns to the question of sin, this time introducing Adam with no reference at all to the involvement of Eve (cf. 2 Cor 11:3). The statement in 5:12 plays a significant role in the understanding of original sin that developed in Western Christianity, where the Vulgate's translation (the English equivalent of "in whom all sinned" instead of "because all sinned") suggested the possibility that sin is biologically transmitted. What Paul argues, based on Gen 3:3, 19, is that Adam's sin brought death into the world, and together they established controlling power over all humanity, power that is broken only in Jesus Christ.

In 5:15–21, Paul treats Adam and Christ less as individuals than as corporate figures; each of them includes in himself all of humanity. Each is the progenitor and prototype of all human beings. What distinguishes them is the result of their action; through the one person death spreads to all people; through the other person life comes to all (v. 18). But the one figure dominates the other. Obedience triumphs over disobedience; grace triumphs over sin; life triumphs over death.

The two-age scheme that has already been introduced in 5:1–11 is even more evident here. Adam and Christ personify the old and the new in strikingly antithetical ways. The act that each performs (disobedience and obedience) determines the destiny, not of a few, but of all people. Nothing is said to suggest that Christ's death made life potentially available to all people; nothing suggests that faith transforms the potentiality into reality. The language is quite comprehensive. In chapter six, Paul turns to the obligations that grasp those who do believe.

B. Death and Resurrection with Christ (6:1–7:6)

Paul's sweeping claims about how the obedient act of Jesus Christ brought about "justification and life for all" naturally prompts the accusation that he is advocating antinomianism. Already in 3:8 he has indicated that he is familiar with the accusation, and so he introduces it here directly: "Should we continue in sin in order that grace may abound?"(6:1).

Paul offers two responses to this fear that his understanding of the gospel is actually a provocation to moral chaos. First, he reminds his readers that they have been baptized into Christ's death. He makes similar statements about baptism in 1 Cor 12:13 and in Gal 3:27, although in both those cases the union with Christ is interpreted in the direction of unity of believers with one another. Here union with Christ in baptism marks, even more sharply than in those passages, union with Christ's own death. For Paul, baptism is no mere symbol or act of initiation; it is instead a realistic association between the human being and Jesus Christ in his death and burial. In addition, Christ's own resurrection is more than simply a resuscitation of life. "We know that Christ, being raised from the dead, will never die again; death no longer has dominion over him" (6:9). He leaves in his wake the broken power of death, the ultimate enemy, whose defeat signals the final triumph of God (see 1 Cor 15:24–28).

When Paul expounds on the association of believers with Christ in his baptism, he allows for what has come to be called an "eschatological reservation." Believers are united with Christ in his death and burial in the sacrament, but Paul carefully does not say that they have already been united with Christ's own resurrection; instead, they have "newness of life" as they await their resurrection with him (6:5, 8). For the present the newness of life to which believers are called is a cruciform life. In Christ the new age has come, but this old age has not yet gone, with the result that the age of sin continues to exist alongside the age of righteousness and life. While the ultimacy of sin's threat is removed, the struggle precipitated by the co-existence of the two ages remains. Thus readers are encouraged to live out of the new age and not out of the old, to present themselves as instruments of righteousness and not to let sin have dominion over their mortal bodies (6:12–13).

Using the images of slavery and freedom, the remainder of chapter six employs indicative verbs alongside imperative ones to declare liberation from sin's clutches and at the same time to announce believers' accountability to God. Freedom from sin does not mean that human beings are free to do as they please. They are always slaves in one sense and free in another; the only question is whether the slavery is to God or to unrighteousness, whether the freedom is from righteousness or from sin. These two forms of freedom and enslavement are not equally balanced, of course, as vv. 21–23 make clear; slavery to sin brings death, and slavery to righteousness brings "sanctification," which in turn is God's gift of holiness to believers.

The brief section of Rom 7:1–6 provides Paul's second response to the charge that his understanding of the gospel results in libertinism. Here he uses an analogy that would be understandable to those familiar with Jewish law. A woman is bound by law to her husband and cannot simply take up an intimate relationship with another man while her husband is alive. The death of the husband creates a new situation for the widow. She is released from the binding marital code and is free to marry another husband. Likewise, the death of Christ brings freedom from the law and enables union with another—in this case with the risen Christ. The key is found in 7:6, where believers are declared to be "slaves not under the old written code, but in the new life of the Spirit." With these last words, Paul recalls 6:4 and also anticipates his important discussion of the Spirit in ch. 8.

C. The Law and Sin (7:7–25)

With the claim in 7:5 that the law itself arouses the sinful passions, Paul comes terribly close to saying that the law is sin. He has made other provocative remarks along the way that move in the same direction. The law brings "knowledge of sin" (3:20), "the law brings wrath," there is no "violation" without the law (4:15), the arrival of the law meant that "the trespass multiplied" (5:20). In 6:14 he came very close to equating law and sin with the statement that "sin will not have dominion over you since you are not under law but under grace."

At 7:7 Paul articulates the question of an imaginary interlocutor, "What then should we say? That the law is sin?" He replies to the question in 7:7 with his usual vehement response, "By no means!" But then Paul goes on in the remainder of the chapter to explain how it is that the law is "holy and just and good" (v. 12); but nevertheless, the law has become the tool of sin. In vv. 7–13, Paul draws on the specific prohibition of covetousness from the Decalogue (Exod 20:17; Deut 5:21) as he attempts to disentangle the role of the law from that of sin. The prohibition (i.e., the law) introduces knowledge of sin (v. 7), but then sin itself becomes active and multiplies covetousness. The arrival of the law provides the opportunity for sin, and sin itself is the agent producing death. Paul does not specify when it is that there was life without knowledge of the law. It may be that he has Adam in mind once again (as in 5:12–21), but the precise timing of this "event" is less important than the attempt Paul is making to arrive at his conclusion, "the law is holy." Verse 13 unpacks this conclusion: it is not the law in and of itself that bring death but sin's use of the law to increase its own power over human beings.

With vv. 14–25, Paul shifts from past to present tense and introduces the conflict between what one desires to do and what one actually does. Read in the wake of contemporary psychology, it is difficult to focus on anything except the tortured "I" who speaks here, but Paul's emphasis lies elsewhere. Verse 14 returns to the powerful assertion that "I" am "sold into slavery under sin" (cf. 6:16–23). In v. 17 and again in v. 20, Paul concludes from his analysis that "sin dwells within me." The situation is so dire that there are actually two "laws," God's own law which is a source of delight (v. 22), and "another law," the law controlled by sin itself (v. 23). Deliverance can come only through God's victory in Jesus Christ over the hideous power of sin, and it is the vision of this victory to which Paul will turn in ch. 8.

Paul's use of the first- person singular pronoun in this chapter has provoked controversy throughout the history of interpretation, with some readers convinced that Paul here refers to his pre-Christian experience and others equally convinced that he has in view his on-going Christian struggle. The difficulty with both of these views is that there is little evidence that Paul, either before or after his conversion, was afflicted by a guilty conscience (see esp. Phil 3:4b–16). In addition, 1 Cor 13 offers strong evidence that he can write in the first person without writing simply about himself. (For these reasons, most scholars agree that the "I" in Rom 7 is a stylistic device rather than a reflection of Paul's own experience.)

D. The Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus (8:1–17)

With 8:1, Paul moves to take up the positive character of living in the Spirit, returning to elucidate the work of the Spirit he only touched on in 5:5 and 7:6. He opens with the declaration that there is "no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus," and then restates God's role in delivering humanity from sin. In this instance, however, Paul introduces the language of spirit and flesh with a series of contrasts between the mind as "set on things of the flesh" and life lived "according to the Spirit." This contrast between flesh and spirit (or Spirit; ancient manuscripts would not have distinguished between the two) has prompted many people to conclude that Paul has a negative attitude to the human body. Texts such as 1 Cor 6:15 ("Your bodies are members of Christ") and Rom 12:1 ("Present your bodies as a living sacrifice") strongly suggest otherwise. And Paul sometimes uses the term sarx ("flesh") in an entirely neutral way to refer to biological descent (as in Rom 1:3; 9:5). In Rom 8 (as in, e.g., 2 Cor 1:17; 5:16; 10:2–4; 11:18; Gal 5:17; 6:8), "flesh" has little to do with the human body in itself; it stands instead as a shorthand reference for a way of thinking, even a realm of existence. To think "the things of the flesh" is to be governed by a set of values that is no larger than oneself, while the "things of the Spirit" is a mindset that comes from the Spirit's own gift (vv. 9–11).

The contrast between the two groups, those who are "in the flesh" and those in whom the Spirit dwells, becomes especially stark in vv. 9–13. Nothing less than life and death are at stake here. Yet Paul does not linger over warnings but moves to the reassuring identification of "you" as God's children. God's children have been adopted, they cry out to God as their own father (v. 15), and they are even heirs with Christ himself (v. 17).

E. The Assurance of God's Love (8:18–39)

Being heirs along with Christ does not exempt believers from suffering, and in the second half of Rom 8 Paul returns to this point, already introduced in 5:3. Apparently the sufferings to which Paul alludes are the eschatological woes, which turn out to be the birthpangs of the new age. Here the dualism of the previous section of the argument yields to a concern for the whole of creation, since creation itself has been "subjected to futility" and longs for its own liberation and the future glory of God's children (vv. 19–21). Believers, because they have the "first fruits," join in this groaning, led by the Spirit to take their place in this earthly choir that gives forth unintelligible sounds of anguish. Even prayer is redefined in terms of "inarticulate groans" (8:26, NEB). Nevertheless, the Spirit works in the weaknesses of the believers and intercedes for them.

This leads Paul to claim that "all things work together for good for those who love God, who are called according to his purpose" (8:28). This tremendous affirmation includes God's intention to conform those who have been called "to the image of his Son" (v. 29). Again here Paul draws on familial language, identifying the Son of God as the "firstborn" of many brothers and sisters (v. 29). It is God who has predestined, called, justified and glorified. This powerful series of assertions returns Paul to the earlier topic of the "sufferings of the present time," and to his soaring insistence that no one and no thing can intercede between God and those whom God has chosen.

Paul's logic is clear: Recalling 4:25 and perhaps also the obedience of Abraham in Genesis 22, he asserts in 8:32 that the God who gave over his own Son will defend all children against any condemnation. In 8:36, Paul cites Ps 44:22, originally a cry of lament to God in the face of the assaults of Israel's enemies. In this context, the citation acknowledges the reality that God's faithful are always exposed to violent death, that tribulation is a mark of belonging to God. And yet none of these powers can separate believers from the love of God made known in Jesus Christ.

Finally Paul returns to the love of God, which he has already identified in 5:5–8 as the ultimate basis for hope. The gift of the Spirit stands in the gap between the present and the future and yet provides the ultimate basis for a confident hope. In 8:35 Paul asks whether anything can "separate us from the love of Christ," and decisively answers his own question in 8:38–39, "For I am convinced that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor rulers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord."

IV. God's Election of Israel (9:1–11:36)

A. God's Word Has Not Failed (9:1–29)

The tone of the letter shifts dramatically at the beginning of ch. 9, as the triumphant rejoicing that nothing in all creation "will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord" (8:39) gives way to lament and sorrow. What do those words of assurance mean for Jews who do not recognize Jesus as the Messiah of God? Put another way, who is included among the "us" who cannot be split off from God's love in Christ? Reminiscent of Moses' willingness to be cut off for the sake of worshipers of the golden calf (Exod 32:31–32), Paul offers himself in behalf of God's people.

Despite the shift in tone, Rom 9–11 does not introduce a new topic into the letter. From the very beginning, Paul has expounded his understanding of the gospel for the "Jew first and also the Greek" (1:16). Already in 3:1, he asks the pointed question whether there is any advantage to being a Jew. Does the Jew have any privilege that others do not also have? In answering in the affirmative, he declares that the Jew has the "oracles of God" (3:2). Returning to the question here at the beginning of chapter 9, he offers a longer list: they are recipients of God's adoption (cf. 8:15, 23), glory, covenants, the law, worship, the promises, and the patriarchs (vv. 4–5). Finally, as of most importance, it is from Israel that the Messiah comes "according to the flesh" (v. 5) that is, biologically. As the translation notes in the NRSV indicate, the final words of v. 5 are quite ambiguous, and it is debated whether Paul is affirming that the Messiah himself is God or whether he is following his reference to the Messiah with a blessing of God. What is clear is that this important section of the letter both begins (9:5) and ends (11:36) with an ascription of praise to God.

One possible interpretation of the anguish Paul reveals in vv. 1–5 is that he has concluded that there is no hope, that God's word has failed. But this conclusion he adamantly rejects in v. 6, which stands as the theme of the following three chapters. As he begins to explain how it is that the present rejection of Israel's Messiah does not mean that God's promises are at an end, Paul turns to the history of Israel in Scripture, and citations from and engagement with Scripture are dense in these chapters. First, he looks at the constituting of Israel, which has always come about by God's choosing or election. The promise made to Abraham was to Isaac and his descendants (vv. 7–9). Subsequently, God chose Jacob rather than Esau, doing so even before their births, before either of them had done anything good or bad (vv. 10–13). Even the role of Pharaoh was the result of God's choosing (v. 17). One of the striking things in this account is that Paul offers no critical remarks either about his own contemporaries or about the actions of Israel in the past (by contrast with Stephen in Acts 7:2–53). His point is not to criticize individual Israelites or even to identify the limits of Abraham's family but to insist that it is God who elects and God does so for God's own purposes.

This discussion leads into Paul's use of the familiar analogy of the potter and the clay (see, e.g., Isa 41:25; Jer 18:1–10; Wis 15:7; Sir 33:13; 1QS 11:22; IQHa 1:21; 3:23–24; 4:29; 11:3; 12:26, 32; 18:12) which has led many readers of the text to take offense at the picture of an unfeeling, despotic God. Yet the point of the analogy is not the power of the potter to fashion a vessel, but the right (9:21) of the potter to determine the use of the vessel. The Greek of vv. 22–23 is exceedingly difficult, but these lines appear to be an elaboration on v. 21; God has indeed acted with mercy and with wrath, but

God's actions have as their goal a glorious mercy, both for Jews and for Gentiles (v. 24). This section of the argument concludes with citations from Hosea and Isaiah. Stunningly, in vv. 25–26, Paul applies language drawn from Hos 1:10 and 2:23, texts that have to do with the restoring of Israel, to both Jews and Gentiles. He then, in vv. 27–29, draws on Isa 10:22–23 and Isa 1:9 to introduce the notion of Israel's remnant, to which he will return in 11:7–10. It is God who has elected Israel and God who will save. (It is important to understand that the qualifier "only" is added in v. 27 by the translators of the NRSV and does not appear in the Greek. Chapter 11 will suggest that there is a remnant, but this remnant is not the only object of God's salvation.)

B. God's Impartiality and Faithfulness (9:30–10:21)

As is clear already in 9:24, Paul is not concerned in these chapters exclusively with God's dealings with Israel, since God has now called Gentiles as well. The second stage in this discussion begins by observing an anomaly: Gentiles did not strive for righteousness and yet attained it, whereas the Jews who strived after righteousness did not achieve it. Most of the remainder of this section grapples to explain this situation of Jews, although 10:12–13 briefly refer to Gentiles as well. Paul begins by observing, in a compressed and elliptical fashion, that Gentiles attained righteousness through faith, whereas the Jews sought righteousness through law, which they did not succeed in fulfilling. They treated righteousness as if it were based on works. As a further explanation, Paul writes that Jews tripped over a "stumbling stone," which Paul illumines with a quotation that combines portions of Isa 28:16 and 8:14. Given the context, with its recent reference to the law, the "stumbling stone" has sometimes been identified with the law, but other early Christian texts draw on stone imagery to refer to Christ (e.g., Matt 21:42; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:6–8), and the citation of Isa 28:16 again in 10:11 suggests that this is Paul's understanding in 9:33 as well. On either reading, it is noteworthy that the "I" who places the stumbling stone that causes Israel to trip is none other than Israel's own God.

Recalling 9:1–5, ch. 10 begins with a prayer for the salvation of Israel, reiterating that Israel has a zeal for God, but it is not enlightened. Paul is ascribing to Israel the same attitude that he himself had before coming to faith in Christ Jesus (cf. Gal 1:13–14; Phil 3:6; cf. Acts 22:3–5); like him, they were ignorant of the righteousness that God gives and were seeking to establish their own righteousness. Famously, it is at this point that Paul adds the statement that Christ is the telos of the law (v. 4). The NRSV translates telos as the "end" or "termination" of the law, which would entail a sharp difference between the law and the gospel. However, Paul has insisted that the law is holy, just, and good (7:12) and that it witnesses to the righteousness of God received through faith (3:21). And he has said that God acted in the death of Jesus Christ to fulfill "the just requirement of the law" (8:4), suggesting that the better translation is "goal" or "purpose." What Paul is affirming on this reading is that the law itself is about nothing else than Christ as the basis of righteousness for all believers. (Similarly, 1 Tim 1:5 says that "the aim [again: telos] of such instruction is love.")

In 10:6–8 Paul contrasts righteousness that comes from the law with righteousness that comes from faith and employs a midrashic commentary on Deut 30:12–14 to make his point. "The word of faith," which Paul has preached, is that Jesus is Lord (v. 9), and Jesus' lordship is impartial. Paul makes this point repeatedly in vv. 11–13, where he again quotes Isa 28:16 (as in 9:33), insists that there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile (as in 3:22–23), and further insists that there is one Lord for all (as in 3:30). Joel 2:32, which is crucial to the sermon of Peter in Acts 2:17–21, appears here as well: "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (v. 13).

The chain of questions in vv. 14–15 draw the connection between calling on the name and the preaching carried out by Christian missionaries. Yet Paul is quick in v. 17 to avoid the conclusion that faith comes about by his own work; it is the work of the "word of Christ." This section of the argument concludes by drawing on Ps 19:4; Deut 32:21; Isa 65:1–2; God's word has gone out, God has continually sought after Israel, and Israel remains disobedient (vv. 18–21). This dire diagnosis is not the final word, however, as becomes clear immediately at the beginning of ch. 11.

C. God's Electing Mercy (11:1–36)

Chapter 11 opens with the question that follows logically on ch. 10: "Has God rejected his people?" His adamantly negative response introduces an argument about the division within Israel, the divine use of that division for the salvation of Gentiles, and the extent of God's eschatological mercy to all people. Paul does this by first noting that he himself is an Israelite (as also in Phil 3:3:4b–6; 2 Cor 11:22), so God cannot have rejected all of Israel. Then he turns back to Israel's history once again in vv. 2–4, this time to the story of Elijah and the seven thousand who had not bowed their knees to Baal (1 Kgs 19; see esp. 19:10, 14, 18). Just as God preserved a remnant then, so God does now (and here the reference to a remnant in 9:27 comes again into focus). Once again, in v. 6, Paul pauses to insist that this remnant is "by grace," not by anyone's achievement (as in 4:2–8; 9:11–16).

Verses 7–11 draw Paul's conclusions from his own experience and Israel's history: There is at present a division in Israel between the "elect" or the "remnant" and the "rest." In the context of what he has just said about himself and the time of Elijah, the "elect" refers to those Jews who believe Jesus to be the Messiah, those who have been called ("elected") by God into this role (as with the election earlier in 9:6–18). The "rest" refers to those Jews who do not believe Jesus to be the Messiah, those who have been "hardened" by God just as was Pharaoh (9:17). Paul reinforces this point by drawing on Deut 29:4, Isa 29:10, and Ps 69:22–23, texts that emphasize God's role in closing eyes and ears and in tricking the people (as in 9:33).

This emphatic statement about God's hardening of the "rest" provokes the question of v. 11: Is God's hardening of them permanent? And again the answer is "No," and beginning in v. 11b the remainder of the chapter endeavors to show that it is not only a remnant but "all" of Israel (v. 26) that God will save. First, vv. 11b–12 announce the logic: Through a strange and unanticipated inversion, Israel's salvation has come to the Gentiles, who in turn will make Israel jealous. In v. 13 Paul speaks directly to Gentile members of the house churches at Rome about his own work among the Gentiles. His hope is that the end result of that ministry is that it will contribute to God's salvation of Israel (vv. 13–14).

Paul amplifies his point with two images, the dough and the olive tree. The lump of dough offered as the first fruit (cf. 8:23) cannot be different in character from the loaf of which it is a part (v. 16; Num 15:17–21). As the "lump," the believing remnant of Israel signifies the whole loaf that lies in the future. Then Paul employs the image of the olive tree, first simply as a reiteration of the relationship between a lump of dough and the whole loaf: the same plant cannot have a root that is holy and produce branches that are not (v. 16). This image transforms in vv. 17–24 into a sharp warning against Gentile arrogance. Some of the branches of Israel have been broken off, and in their place wild olive shoots from among the Gentiles were grafted on. But this gives no right to the grafted branches to boast. The natural branches were broken off because of their unbelief, but the grafted branches remain a part of the tree only by virtue of the kindness of God. They cannot presume upon God's grace.

With v. 25 Paul moves toward his conclusion, which he terms a "mystery," a term with apocalyptic connotations (as in Dan 2:18–19, 27–30; 2 Esd 12:36–38) having to do with God's own plan (Rom 16:25; 1 Cor 2:1, 7; 15:51). Here he summarizes the argument he has been making in this chapter: God has accomplished the hardening of "part" of Israel (the "rest" of v. 7) while the Gentiles come in, and then "all Israel will be saved" (v. 26). He finds this mystery anticipated in the words of Isa 59:20–21 and 27:9 (although in altered form). Paul is rejecting at every point a rigid determinism that divides humankind into two groups, namely the "insider" and the "outsider," the "saved" and the "damned." While "part" of Israel is currently at enmity with God (see 5:10), Israel remains God's beloved.

Two verses provide the theological character of Paul's argument. First, God's faithfulness to Israel rests on the fact that "the gifts and calling of God are irrevocable" (11:29). It is not because Israel has demonstrated or will demonstrate such fidelity to God that God will decide to save Israel. Rather it is because God is steadfast and gracious concerning the gifts and calling. Second, the strange inversion rehearsed in 11:30–32 is possible because "God has imprisoned all (people) in disobedience so that he may be merciful to all" (11:32). The double use of the word "all" is intentional. For both Jews and Gentiles, all doors are closed tight, all windows are barred, so that only God can provide the salvation of all.

Romans 9–11 then ends as it began, with a doxology (see 9:5; 11:33–36), which is composed in part from OT citations (Isa 40:13 [LXX]; Job 41:11). God remains beyond human manipulation, and yet true faith and obedience and the hope of salvation depend on God who can be trusted. This is the God whom Paul praises at the conclusion of his argument.

V. Life in Christ (12:1–15:13)

The previous chapters have served to shape the identity of the house churches in Rome and to mold their understanding of themselves as Christian people. Readers are encouraged to think of themselves as people who belong to the new age inaugurated by God, people who have been redeemed by Christ, freed from the controlling power of sin, people who exist in the confidence that the promise-making God is also a promisekeeping God. Chapters 1–11 are often separated out from what follows and labeled as "theology," with the label "ethics" attached to 12:1–15:13. A more accurate term for this new section may be "embodying the gospel." For Paul, faithful thinking and faithful living are not to be distinguished, as they belong together. Here Paul speaks of "doing the will of God," but he does not prescribe a code or program of ethical action; neither does he explicitly invoke the teaching and example of Jesus.

A. "Be transformed by the renewal of your mind" (12:1–21)

At this critical point in the letter, when Paul has argued that Jews and Gentiles are both included in God's redemptive work, he begins his important admonitions with words about presentation of "your bodies" and "renewing of your minds" for discernment of God's will (vv. 1–2). The introductory "therefore" joins the practical appeal to what has just preceded it, namely, the electing mercy of God.

Several emphases stand out in these two verses, which may be thought of as the theme for all of 12:1–15:13. To begin with, they are addressed to a particular communal context, to the various members of the house churches in Rome. It is not an abstract ethic addressed to individuals. Paul never posits the ability of individuals to discern the divine will in the midst of the various complex decisions in which they are daily involved. The gospel that creates the community provides the context in which the demands are made for moral discussion and judgment. As he writes later in Rom 15:14, "You yourselves are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, and able to instruct one another." Second, it is clear that Paul's understanding of the human embodiment of the gospel is eschatological. Readers are urged not to be conformed to this world (or better: "this age"), but to be transformed by the renewal of their mind. The Greek word translated in the NRSV as "world" is aiōn rather than kosmos, and it refers to the inbreaking of God's new age into the present. Believers are called to set aside their conformity to the old age and to be renewed in their minds, which heretofore have been darkened and have produced only futility and senseless thoughts (Rom 1:21–22). A conventional way to put Paul's point is in terms of the integral relationship between the indicative and the imperative moods, between God's gift and God's demands, between the gospel itself and the faithful response it elicits. A third emphasis in Rom 12:1–2 is that Paul's comments embrace all of human life with metaphorical language. The mercies of God call for reordered lives that are offered as "a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable to God." Further, such transformed selves are "your spiritual worship" (NRSV) or, as the KJV puts it, "your reasonable worship." Paul declares that such dedication of the entire self serves as the authentic worship appropriate to a reordered human life. A fourth emphasis in 12:1–2 is the critical role of discernment. The goal of transformation is "that you may discern what is the will of God" (v. 2). Paul does not attach "the will of God" to a specific pattern of behavior; instead, the phrase is a more general way of referring to the total claim God makes on believers. It must be repeatedly sought and tested in every new situation. Three qualities are specified in determining the will of God: the "good and acceptable and perfect." The gift of discernment enables the community to separate the important from the trivial, the genuine from the bogus, good from evil.

From announcing this important theme in 12:1–2, Paul turns at 12:3 to take up the marks of Christian community and the relationships of Christians with those beyond the community. The initial topic in vv. 3–8 concerns the crucial matter of self-evaluation, which can build up or undermine community life. Paul begins by urging his readers not to think more highly of themselves than they ought to think, but to think "with sober judgment," (v. 3) each person doing so according to faith's standards and not according to the world's standards. Paul draws attention to this admonition by employing the literary device of paranomasia (repetition of a root word); although obscured in English translation, four times in v. 3 he uses a form of the verb phronein ("to think or to regard")

This sobriety of self-judgment is essential for the proper activity of the church as the body of Christ. Drawing on the image of the community familiar from 1 Cor 12:4–31, he observes that members of the body do not all have the same function; instead, each one has a gift given by God that contributes to the well-being of the body. Each individual is to exercise his or her gift (prophecy, ministry, teaching, exhortation, giving, leadership, benevolence) in a way that is consistent with its source and in a fashion appropriate to its function for the body. Diversities are acknowledged, but they are radically subordinated to the norm of faith so that they lose their divisive power.

From 12:9–21 in staccato-like fashion Paul mentions the characteristics essential to the Christian experience. Love heads the list (v. 9), which is not surprising given that love often marks the embodiment of the gospel in Paul's letters (e.g., Rom 13:9–10; 1 Cor 13:1–13; Gal 5:22). Love is not for Paul an abstract ethical principle but is made specific in terms of the self-sacrifice of Christ, "who loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal 2:20). Paul declares that the only true love is that which is genuine (Rom 12:9) and free from dissimulation. With vv. 9b–13, he provides some indicators of what love looks like within the community of faith, as it energetically serves the Lord by serving the needs of those within the community.

In vv. 14–21, Paul takes up the challenge of dealing with hostility, especially with the temptation to take revenge. This section may well have in view hostility that comes from outside the Christian community, although vv. 15–16 probably reflect concerns for the community itself, and the conflicts Paul will address in 14:1–15:6 could also generate hostility inside the community. Not surprisingly, several of these statements have parallels elsewhere in early Jewish and Christian tradition (e.g., cf. v. 14 with Matt 5:44, Luke 6:28; v. 17 with Matt 5:38–39; 1 Pet 3:9; v. 19 with Prov 20:22; 24:20). And Paul explicitly references Deut 32:35 (v. 19) and Prov 25:21–22 (v. 20) to recall that God alone is judge (a claim to which he will return in 14:1–12) and to advocate generosity in response to hostility.

B. On Christian Obligations (13:1–14)

The passage that follows (13:1–7) has caused the church such grief through the years that it needs to be examined with great care. It has often been used as a biblical warrant to advocate for ecclesial support of oppressive governments such as Germany under the Third Reich and South Africa under apartheid, and there is every reason to expect that it may be called upon again elsewhere.

Because the passage begins somewhat abruptly and has no parallel in the other Pauline letters (although see 1 Tim 2:1–2; cf. 1 Pet 2:13–14), occasionally scholars suggest that it was added to Paul's original letter to Rome. There is, however, no early copy of the letter without these verses, which makes it likely that they were in fact part of the letter Paul sent. Because taxation plays an important role in this discussion (see vv. 6–7), it may be that the specific situation that prompts this discussion lies in that arena. Roman taxation could be abusive (hence the association in Gospel tradition between sinners and tax collectors; e.g., Matt 9:10–13; 11:19; Mark 2:15–17; Luke 5:30; 7:34), and the emperor Nero sought in 58 CE (shortly after the writing of this letter) to address widespread abuses in the system (see Tacitus, Annals 13.50). This situation could well mean that Paul hopes to discourage Roman Christians from withholding taxes and thereby putting themselves at risk for punishment; thus, he writes to provide specific directions rather than to offer a generalized statement on the nature of government.

To be sure, the notion that citizens owe the authorities an acknowledgment of their rightful place is not a novel proposal for a Jewish community. Both the OT and the literature of Hellenistic Judaism acknowledge the legitimate authority of various human rulers and call for obedience to such kings. At the same time, these texts recognize that the authority of God stands above and beyond human rulers, and the obligation owed to ruling powers is thereby limited (e.g., Jer 29:7; Prov 8:15–16; 24:21–22; Dan 2:21; Sir 17:17; Wis 6:1–11; Letter of Aristeas 196, 219, 224). In addition, the eschatological statements in 12:1–2 and especially in 13:11–14 serve to relativize current governmental structures and place the state in a penultimate position: Jesus, not Caesar, is Lord.

The initial imperative, "Let every person be subject to the governing authorities," (v. 1) demands that the readers take seriously the role of the magistrates in the sense of submitting to the order God has established. This is not the same thing as demanding unqualified obedience to those authorities. One might disobey the governing officials, if one thought their demands contrary to God's will (as, e.g., Acts 4:18–20; 5:29), and at the same time be exposed to their discipline and punishment. Civil rights leaders, who violated the segregationist laws and practices of the southern states and who went to jail for their actions, were disobedient to many local magistrates but they nevertheless continued to be subject to the authority of those same magistrates.

To the authorities, one gives what is due (v. 7), but that obligation stands in stunning contrast to the real obligation articulated again in v. 8, the obligation to love. Here Paul returns to his discussion of love begun in 12:9 and exhorts: "owe no one anything, except to love one another; for the one who loves another has fulfilled the law" (v. 8; NRSV). The Greek here is slightly ambiguous, so that v. 8b could possibly be translated, "the one who loves has fulfilled the other law." In this case, "the other law" would be the law Jesus gave to replace the Torah or perhaps the Mosaic law over against Roman civil law. There has been, however, no clear reference to "law" in the preceding sentences, and Paul does not elsewhere contrast Torah with Jesus' law or Roman law. Furthermore, Paul nowhere else uses the verb "love" absolutely (as in "the one who loves"), so that the NRSV is far preferable. Paul amplifies this comment in v. 9 by citing from the Decalogue (Exod 20:13–17; Deut 5:17–21), culminating in the admonition to love the neighbor (Lev 19:18; cf. Matt 5:43; 19:19). Fulfillment of the law involves not just loving someone other than oneself, or loving those who are comfortable and attractive, but loving each person whom God presents as neighbor.

Paul's language about fulfilling the law may seem surprising, given that much of what he has said about the law in earlier chapters is negative. The law gives sin its power by defining certain patterns of behavior as sinful and by a total inability to help people to accomplish what the law demands (e.g., 7:7–10). And yet Paul persists in declaring that "the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, just, and good" (7:12). And 8:4 anticipates that the "just requirement of the law" is fulfilled by those who walk in the Spirit of God. Here that "just requirement" takes on specificity and it can then be said, "love is the fulfilling of the law" (13:10b).

Paul concludes this initial discussion of the Christian life by returning in vv. 11–14 to the note of eschatological urgency with which he began (12:1–2). The metaphors of wakefulness (v. 11), daylight or light (vv. 12–13), and the putting on of new clothing ("armor"; v. 12) are common ways of depicting the radical change of life expected from those who are members of the Christian community. This change reflects their shared knowledge that "salvation" is at hand. In this context, "salvation" appears to be a shorthand reference to the return of Jesus, which Paul discusses more fully in 1 Thess 4:13–18 and in 1 Cor 15:12–58.

C. An Appeal for Harmony (14:1–15:6)

This lengthy section continues to address the transformation (12:1–2) brought about in Jesus Christ, but here Paul takes up a specific issue that causes tension. Some believers strictly observe certain regulations in the Mosaic law regarding dietary matters and "holy" days (including the Sabbath; see Exod 20:8–11; Deut 5:12–15); Paul refers to them as "the weak," presumably an epithet applied to them by others rather than a name they have given themselves. Other believers, those who presumably have given themselves the name "the strong," understand that the arrival of Jesus as God's Messiah has given them freedom to ignore such regulations. It may be that Paul takes up this question because of its currency in Corinth (see 1 Cor 8–10), and he is in Corinth as he writes to Rome (see Rom 16:1; Cenchreae is the seaport for Corinth). And there are some similarities, since in both texts Paul warns against individual freedoms that become hazardous for others (Rom 14:20–21; 1 Cor 8:9; 9:12), and in both texts he advocates actions that build up (1 Cor 8:1; Rom 14:19). However, in important respects the texts and probably the situations behind them differ. At Corinth, the food that proves controversial is food that has been offered to idols, such as was sold in the meat markets (see e.g., 1 Cor 8), and the debate revolves around the existence of other gods and around individual freedom, conscience, and knowledge. At Rome, the debate revolves around the observance or non-observance of specific Jewish practices, and here questions of purity are at stake (14:14).

Whatever has given rise to the conflict at Rome, Paul's response is thoroughly theological. In vv. 1–12, he begins by insisting that neither side may judge or despise the other side because "God has welcomed them" (v. 3). Here he analogizes believers to household servants; all are servants in God's household and may not judge the servants of another (v. 4). All give thanks to the same Lord, whatever their dietary practices may be (vv. 5–6). All live and die in the presence of the same Lord (vv. 7–9). All will be judged by the same Lord (vv. 10–12). In support of this claim, Paul points to Isa 45:23 (and cf. Phil 2:10–11).

Although vv. 1–8 speak of believers as belonging to God who is Lord, in v. 9 he refers to Christ, whose death and resurrection mark him as "Lord of both the dead and the living." This seamless shift between references to God and to Jesus Christ may or may not be self-conscious, but it is among the features of NT writings that give rise to the church's later creedal formulations.

Apart from the use of the terminology of "strong" and "weak," vv. 1–12 are rather evenly balanced, in that Paul does not appear to favor either party in the dispute. With vv. 13–23, however, it becomes clear that he himself agrees with the so-called "strong"; nevertheless, it also becomes clear that his admonitions are largely intended for them rather than for the "weak." Nothing is unclear "in the Lord Jesus," that is, to those who have already been called into life in the new age inaugurated in Jesus Christ (v. 14), but it is nevertheless wrong to eat in a way that causes the weaker brothers or sisters to act against their own consciences.

In 15:1–6 Paul explicitly identifies himself with the strong and urges that they must "put up with" the weak. The translation "put up with" (v. 1) conjures up mere tolerance, but the Greek bastazein is closer to "carry" in the sense of "bearing with." As Paul explains what he means by this "putting up with," he returns to the language of building up, acting for the good of the neighbor. Christ himself is invoked as one who did not please himself, citing Ps 69:9, a prayer for deliverance on the part of the innocent person who is afflicted unjustly. Along with other early Christian writers, Paul saw this psalm as referring to Christ (cf. Ps 69:21b in Mark 14:36, John 19:28–29; Ps 69:4 in John 15:25). Scripture exists both "for our instruction" and as a source of hope (v. 4). Paul concludes with a prayer for the harmony of the community "in accordance with Christ Jesus" (v. 5).

D. Welcome to Jews and Gentiles (15:7–13)

With vv. 7–13, Paul returns to the language of "welcome" that introduced 14:1–15:6, but this section is more than a conclusion to that specific discussion. It also brings together several of the major concerns of the letter, constituting what a number of scholars regard as the climax of the entire argument. The opening admonition of 15:7 repeats that of 14:1: "Welcome." Here, however, the language of "strong" and "weak" has disappeared, as the dispute over dietary matters and the marking of holy days gives way to different terminology. The command to "welcome one another" in 15:7 does not now concern the "strong" and the "weak," but "the circumcised" and "the Gentiles." Each group is to "welcome" the other, accepting and respecting one another's differences, "just as Christ has welcomed you" (v. 7). In both cases, that welcome is for God's own glory; this is not hospitality for its own sake or simply to enhance the social life of a divided community.

With vv. 8–9a Paul succinctly describes Christ's "welcome." The Greek is complex and ambiguous, but Paul appears to be making parallel claims about Christ's welcome of both circumcised and Gentile. First, Christ became a "servant" (v. 8; diakonos; cf. 13:4; 16:1) of "the circumcised" (i.e., Jews), and he did so to confirm the promises (as in 4:13). Second, Christ also acted so that Gentiles might glorify God for God's mercy (see also 9:15–18, 23; 11:32). Paul underscores this claim about the way in which Christ has welcomed both Jew and Gentile with four quotations from Scripture (Ps 18:49; Deut 32:43; Ps 117:1; Isa 11:10), all of which specifically refer to the inclusion of the Gentiles among those who offer praise to God alongside Israel. The repetition of "and again" at the beginning of vv. 10, 11, and 12 dramatically reinforces the importance of Paul's expectation that Jew and Gentile together will offer praise to God. Paul draws this section to an end with a prayer-wish of hope (v. 13); it is God's power and that of the Holy Spirit that brings about the shared praise of Jew and Gentile.

VI. Letter Closing (15:14–16:27)

A. The Romans and Paul's Mission (15:14–33)

Keenly aware that he has not yet been to Rome (1:10–15) and may have given offense, Paul reiterates in v. 14 his confidence about the health of the congregations, yet immediately in vv. 15–16 he appeals to his own vocation as a reason for his letter. Strikingly, v. 16 draws on liturgical language ("priestly service," "offering") to explain his vocation (cf. the use of liturgical language in 12:1–2). His service of the gospel concerns "the offering of the Gentiles" (v. 16), an ambiguous phrase that may refer to the Gentiles themselves as an offering or to the collection itself, which forms such an important part of Paul's own mission and is very much at the front of his thinking as he writes this letter (see vv. 25–33). Paul adds two remarks about his own work. In vv. 17–19, he is proud of what he has accomplished, although he also immediately asserts that his "boast" is in what God has done (as in 5:1–2 and also 1 Cor. 1:31). And, turning to Isa 52:15, he specifies that the geographical extent of his work reflects his goal of preaching to those who have not yet heard the gospel (v. 21). The import of this comment emerges in what follows.

In vv. 22–33 Paul reflects on his plans for future travel. As he indicated at the beginning of the letter (1:10–13), he intends to travel to Rome. Now he adds that, after being in Rome, he wants to take the gospel to Spain (vv. 24, 28–29), and it appears that Paul seeks the support of the Roman congregations for his labor in Spain. But most immediately, Paul's work takes him to Jerusalem with a collection for the "poor among the saints" there (v. 26). This collection clearly occupies an important place in Paul's mission, as he refers to it also in Gal 2:10, 1 Cor 16:1–4, and at length in 2 Cor 8–9. Although he speaks about the collection in terms of human need (vv. 26–27), it is clear that Paul also understands this need in theological terms. The Gentile believers in Macedonia and Achaia have received "spiritual blessings" from Jewish believers and so are right to share in material goods (v. 27). More to the point, vv. 30–33 reveal Paul's deep concern that Jerusalem will reject the collection, as he calls for the Romans to pray that the collection will be acceptable and that he will be "rescued" in Jerusalem. Apparently, Paul fears that the unity of Jew and Gentile, a unity for which he has argued throughout the letter, will be rejected in Jerusalem.

Whether he was able to follow through with these plans remains unknown. Luke's account of Paul's arrest in Jerusalem seems to confirm that Paul was right to be apprehensive about his visit (Acts 21:27–36). Luke himself is curiously silent about the collection, although he may touch on it briefly in Acts 24:17.

B. Closing Greetings and Instructions (16:1–27)

The final chapter of Romans opens with a brief letter of recommendation for "our sister Phoebe" (vv. 1–2). Presumably she is the bearer of the letter and it is important for Paul that she be received with respectful hospitality by the congregations in Rome. Paul identifies her as a "deacon" (diakonos) of the church in Cenchreae, a harbor-town about seven miles east of Corinth. While the word "deacon" does not yet refer to a defined office in the church's life (as it apparently does in 1 Tim 3:8–13), there is at the very least the suggestion of some leadership role. That point is underscored when Paul refers to her as a "benefactor" (prostatis), a person of means who provides concrete support for Paul's mission (cf. Luke 8:1–3; Acts 16:14–15).

Verses 3–16 contain a lengthy list of greetings to twenty-four named individuals and a number of unnamed people associated with the named individuals (see vv. 5, 10–11, 13–15). Paul had not yet been to Rome, but he no doubt met many of these people while they were exiled from Rome and had taken up residence in Corinth and Ephesus (as is the case with Prisca and Aquila). It may be that he includes this lengthy list in order to secure a relationship with Rome and to gain a better hearing for his letter. The list itself includes many people who are otherwise unknown, but their names and Paul's brief comments about them still offer considerable insight into the makeup of early Christianity at Rome.

In Rome as elsewhere, early Christians did not worship in special buildings dedicated for that purpose but instead gathered in the homes of individuals (as in 1 Cor 16:19; Phlm 2; Acts 20:20). That practice is evident when Paul greets Prisca and Aquila and "the church in their house" (v. 5), as well as in vv. 14–15 when he greets those "who are with them" in other households. In addition, the list may include at least one prominent household, that of Aristobulus (v. 10), perhaps a grandson of Herod the Great. And several of the names are among those often used for slaves or former slaves (e.g., Ampliatus, Hermes, Nereus).

Paul includes the names of several women, and his comments about them suggest their significant leadership in the house churches at Rome. To begin with, he greets Prisca (Priscilla) and Aquila, whom he identifies also as co-workers and who "risked their necks" on his account (vv. 3–4). Prisca and Aquila were expelled from Rome due to Claudius' decree and worked with Paul in Corinth (Acts 18:1–3). The husband and wife team then accompanied Paul to Ephesus (Acts 18:18, 24–26; see also 1 Cor 16:19) and now are back in Rome with their own house church (Rom 16:3–5). (This information from Romans, coupled with the information from Acts and Suetonius, is important in the reconstruction of the historical setting of Romans; see Introduction.) Paul lists Prisca before her husband (as also in Acts 18:18, 26; 2 Tim 4:19); given ancient practice, this suggests that she is a more prominent figure than he is, either socially (i.e., perhaps he is a freed slave) or ecclesially (i.e., she may have been the more important figure in Christian circles).

Prisca is not the only woman identified as working on behalf of the gospel. Paul employs similar language of Mary in v. 6, as well as Tryphaena, Tryphosa, and Persis in v. 12. Elsewhere he uses the same language to refer to his own apostolic labor (as in 1 Cor 15:10; Gal 4:11; Phil 2:16). Perhaps most revealing, in v. 7 he greets Andronicus and Junia, who were in prison alongside him and who are "prominent among the apostles." The NRSV footnote indicates that the female name "Junia" may in fact be accented as "Junias," the male version of the name. There is ample evidence, however, that the name "Junia" was often used among women whereas there is no evidence that the name "Junias" was ever used among men. Until at least the Middle Ages, Christian readers understood this person to be female, presumably another missionary couple like Prisca and Aquila. Whatever Paul's contested remarks elsewhere about women in worship may mean (see 1 Cor 11:2–16; 14:34–36), here he takes for granted the leadership of women in Roman congregations.

In vv. 17–20 Paul issues a warning to these friends that they keep an eye out for those who cause splits in the community and who smoothtalk their way into a position that is contrary to that which they have previously learned (cf. 2 Cor 11:12–15; Phil 3:18–19; Gal 5:11; 6:17; Rom 3:8). He then adds greetings from those who are with him and who may travel with him to Jerusalem (including Timothy, his often mentioned associate [e.g., Acts 16:1–2; 1 Cor 4:17; 1 Thess 3:2]; Lucius, perhaps the Lucius of Cyrene of Acts 13:1; Jason, possibly the Thessalonian host of Acts 17:5–9; and Sosipater, perhaps the Sopater of Beroea of Acts 20:4); the scribe Tertius to whom Paul has dictated the letter (v. 22); and finally, leading figures in the Corinthian community, namely Gaius, Erastus, and Quartus (v. 23).

It is not clear whether the doxological statement of vv. 25–27 is part of the original letter. In some ancient manuscripts of Romans it does not appear at all, and in some it is included after 14:12 or 15:33. Nevertheless, it provides a fitting conclusion to a letter in which praise of God plays a prominent role (e.g., 9:5; 11:33–36).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

K. Barth. A Shorter Commentary on Romans with an Introductory Essay by Maico Michielin. Maico M. Michielin, ed. (Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2007); B. Byrne. Romans. SP 6 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1996); E. J. Epp. Junia: The First Woman Apostle (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2005); J. A. Fitzmyer. Romans: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 33 (New York: Doubleday, 1993); K. Grieb. The Story of Romans: A Narrative Defense of God's Righteousness (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); R. Jewett. Romans: A Commentary. Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2007); L. T. Johnson. Reading Romans: A Literary and Theological Commentary (New York: Crossroad Publishing Co., 1997); E. Käsemann. Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); L. E. Keck. Romans. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 2005); P. Meyer. The Word in This World. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2004).

1 CORINTHIANS

SUZANNE WATTS HENDERSON

OVERVIEW

Written around 54 CE, Paul's first letter to Corinthian Christians plunges readers into a conversation well underway. The apostle has apparently spent considerable time with the community (1 Cor 2:1–5; 2 Cor 1:16–19; Acts 18:1–18), and the letter refers to various word-of-mouth reports about their conduct (1 Cor 1:11; 5:1; 11:18), as well as previous correspondence from both Paul (1 Cor 5:9) and the congregation itself (1 Cor 7:1). First Corinthians, then, presents Paul's side of a lively, on-going exchange about a range of topical concerns—from sexuality to meal practices to worship life—all of which he addresses in light of the "message about the cross" (1 Cor 1:18).

Social and historical factors at work in first-century Corinth shed important light on the matters that concern Paul in this letter. Reestablished as a Roman colony in 44 BCE, the city had emerged as a thriving melting pot where social mobility and economic opportunity fostered vigorous competition in the marketplace of goods, ideas, and even physical prowess. Within such a culture, the Corinthian Christians quite naturally found themselves divided along lines of apostolic loyalty (1:12), human erudition (1:26; 8:1), economic status (11:19–21), and religious expression (12–14). In response to such factionalism (1:10–11; 3:3), Paul challenges the Corinthian cultural value of self-promotion at every turn, advocating instead the kind of unity that results from imitating Christ's pattern of self-sacrifice (11:1).

Another cultural value that affected the Corinthian Christian community was the premium placed on freedom in that city, where a large number of freed slaves from throughout the Roman Empire had settled. Apparently, the Christian community embraced that notion of freedom and interpreted it, at least to some degree, as spiritual license for a wide range of moral and ethical behaviors that Paul challenges in the letter. Certainly, the sexual promiscuity they have tolerated—even boasted about (5:6)—reflects this notion of "freedom in Christ," but Paul argues just as vigorously against the kind of freedom that leads to eating idol meat to the detriment of the "weak" (8:11). Such misconstrued liberty may indicate that the Corinthians affirmed the "already" of Christ's triumph over sin to the neglect of the "not yet" of Christ's decisive reign that Paul actively awaits.

Partly in response to this view, Paul attempts to situate the Corinthian Christians—including many former Gentiles—within the story of Israel, which for Paul culminates in the Christ event. Though scriptural citations are relatively sparse in this letter, Paul does invoke biblical testimony about God's wisdom (1:19; 2:9, 16; 3:19–20), the Shema (8:4) as reminder of God's oneness, Torah wilderness narratives of God's activity among the Israelites (whom he calls "our ancestors," 10:1–11), and prophetic expectations of eschatological hopes (15:54–55). In so doing, Paul casts the Corinthians' present experience of grace within the larger context of God's unfolding plan of salvation.

Even as he plants the Corinthians' faith story in the soil of Jewish scripture, Paul also freely deploys Corinthian idiom to convey the gospel message in familiar terms. He repeatedly quotes, and reinterprets, slogans that apparently reflect the wisdom and punditry of their culture (e.g., 6:12; 7:1; 8:1, 4, 8; 10:23). And he appropriates imagery drawn from cosmopolitan Corinth—from the workplace (3:10–15), sports (9:24–27), and political philosophy (12:12–31)—as he refracts the culture's self-serving, competitive values through the lens of the cross. Thus, Paul varies his means but not his gospel message in a manner consistent with his own apostolic strategy: "I have become all things to all people, that I might by all means save some" (9:22).

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1:1–9)

A. Salutation (1:1–3)

B. Thanksgiving (1:4–9)

II. Mending the Body (1:10–4:21)

A. Quarrels and Factions (1:10–17)

B. Christ Crucified, the Wisdom of God (1:18–2:16)

C. Jealousy, Quarrels, and Factions (3:1–23)

D. Cruciform Apostleship (4:1–21)

III. Glorifying God in the Body (5:1–11:1)

A. Judging Immoral Behavior (5:1–6:20)

B. Promoting Morality in Marriage (7:1–40)

C. The Problem of Idol Food and Worship (8:1–11:1)

IV. Gathering as the Body of Christ (11:2–14:40)

A. Head Coverings (11:2–16)

B. Remembering the Lord's Death (11:17–34)

C. Spiritual Gifts Among the Members (12:1–31)

D. The "More Excellent Way" (13:1–13)

E. Spiritual Gifts in Worship (14:1–40)

V. Affirming the Resurrection Body (15:1–58)

A. Christ Raised (15:1–11)

B. Christ as the First Fruits (15:12–34)

C. Resurrection of the Spiritual Body (15:35–58)

VI. Closing (16:1–24)

A. Collection for the Saints (16:1–4)

B. Future Plans (16:5–12)

C. Exhortation and Greetings (16:13–24)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1:1–9)

A. Salutation (1:1–3)

In the letter's salutation, Paul attributes his apostleship not to his own credentials but to the divine will of the One who has called him. His co-writer Sosthenes (1:1) may be the Corinthian synagogue official mentioned in Acts 18:17; in any case, he appears only here in the Pauline corpus. From the outset, Paul affirms God's sanctifying work among the Corinthians: they are both made "holy" (1:2; NRSV, "sanctified") in Christ and called "holy ones" (1:2; NRSV, "saints"; cf. Lev 19; Exod 19:5–6).

Moreover, Paul binds them to "all those who in every place call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:2).

B. Thanksgiving (1:4–9)

Paul continues his emphasis on God's activity among his audience by giving thanks "because of the grace of God that has been given you in Christ Jesus" (1:4). Already, Paul reminds the Corinthians that their status before God depends not on their own accomplishments, but rather on the free gift of God in Christ. In the claims that the Corinthians have been "enriched . . . in speech and knowledge" (1:5) and are "not lacking in any spiritual gift" (1:7), Paul engages his audience on their own terms, telegraphing sources of the divisions he will address in the letter (e.g., 1:10–11; 3:3; 8:1). Here he identifies their riches with the grace of God and finds evidence of their spiritual abundance in the "testimony of Christ . . . strengthened among you" (1:6). Their true wealth manifests itself not in their own aggrandizement but in the extent to which their lives bear witness to Christ.

Paul also introduces, at this early juncture, reminders of the eschatological nature of the gospel, reminding the Corinthians that they await the "revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:7) and the "day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:8). The thanksgiving concludes by affirming that, "God is faithful; by him you were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1:9). The term fellowship translates the Greek koinōnia, which implies not just social interaction but shared spiritual participation in the pattern of Christ's life, death, and resurrection (cf. 10:16). Though Paul casts these verses as thanksgiving, they also (though subtly) begin the task of critique that will characterize the letter.

II. Mending the Body (1:10–4:21)

This section features the first in a series of responses to reports—both written and oral—about the nature of the Corinthian Christians' life together. Here, "Chloe's people" have informed the apostle about divisions (1:11) that plague the community. Besides repeated and direct appeals for unity (1:10–17; 3:1–9), Paul recalls for the Corinthians the source of that unity, which is the apocalyptic "wisdom" of Christ's self-emptying death (1:18–2:16). And he models that pattern in his own apostleship (4:1–13), in turn enjoining the Corinthians to be "imitators of me" (4:16) so that they too might embody the foolish wisdom of the cross.

A. Quarrels and Factions (1:10–17)

Paul first addresses the problem of factionalism with a positive appeal for the Corinthians to "be in agreement" (1:10). Here as throughout the passage, Paul employs standard political idiom to promote cohesiveness among the community. Though the term body does not yet appear here, both the noun schismata (1:10; NRSV, "divisions"; see also 11:18; 12:25) and the participle katerτισμενοι (1:10; NRSV, "be united") denote the restoration of a human body to its intended condition of wholeness.

The section also exposes the nature of the divisions that plague the community, as Paul quotes slogans that align individual believers with leaders in their midst. In light of the underlying image of the community as an integrated whole, Paul's reference to "each of you" (1:12) is striking. While it is probably not the case that the Corinthians belong to organized parties, Paul mentions allegiances to himself, to Apollos (see Acts 18:24–19:1; 1 Cor 3:4–6, 22; 4:6; 16:12), to Cephas (mentioned also in 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; cf. Gal 2:11–14), and even to Christ, in exclusive terms that subvert the gospel message. When Paul asks, "Has Christ been divided?" (1:13), he may imply two answers: a negative—since Christ has not been divided, neither should the Corinthians be—and a positive—as Christ's "body" on earth (see 12:1–9), their division has torn Christ himself asunder. In either case, their problem of social division matters precisely because they constitute the "body of Christ" in the world.

The rest of the passage militates against the notion that the one who baptizes new believers thereby wins their exclusive loyalty. Since Paul emphasizes God's redemptive work, he maintains that baptism, as the outcome of apostolic work, is of secondary concern to his primary calling: the proclamation of the gospel (1:17). With this claim, Paul subtly redirects attention from the matter of human authority to the heart of his message, which is the cross of Christ.

B. Christ Crucified: the Wisdom of God (1:18–2:16)

Having identified the problem of the Corinthians' factionalism, Paul begins to elaborate his "message about the cross" as the interpretive solution to that problem. The argument moves beyond theological musings toward the practical implications of this message for the Corinthian community. First, he stresses the motif of apocalyptic reversal entailed in God's wisdom, now personified in a crucified messiah (1:18–25). Second, he recalls for his audience the evidence of that reversal at work in their own call (1:26–31). Third, Paul sketches the contours of his own apostleship in a cruciform pattern (2:1–5). And finally, he draws attention to revelatory work of the spirit within the human sphere (2:6–16).

1:18–25. Paul begins this section by acknowledging sharply opposing responses to "the message about the cross" (1:18; ho logos ho tou staurou), and in turn highlighting the sacrificial nature of God's logos. The use of present participles (1:18: those who are perishing; those who are being saved) subtly recalibrates the Corinthians' eschatological timeframe, as he reminds the Corinthians that they still await the outcome of salvation (cf. 1:7–8). Further, both the citation from Isa 29:14 (1:19; the first on this letter's relatively short list of scriptural references) and the phrase "this age" frame the Corinthians' present existence within an apocalyptic scheme (cf. 10:24).

Paul devotes much of this section to the topic of wisdom. Summoning the "one who is wise," the "scribe," and the "debater of this age," Paul targets figures whose acclaim lies in the "wisdom of the world" (1:20). Their status as the educated elite, though, proves inadequate to the only goal that matters for Paul: the knowledge of God (1:20–21). Not only does human wisdom fail to grasp God's wisdom, but it also produces a pretense that construes the notion of a crucified messiah as "foolishness" and a "stumbling block." Only "those who are called" can perceive in Christ—that is, in his death—"the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1:24). Once again, Paul maintains that God has turned on end human notions of power and wisdom, replacing them with the divine foolishness and weakness that comprise the "message about the cross."

1:26–31. Paul now invites the Corinthians to reflect on the implications of God's wisdom for their own call (cf. 1:2). When he writes, "not many of you were wise by human standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth" (1:26), Paul both tacitly acknowledges the elevated worldly status of some Corinthian Christians and underscores the subversive ways of a God who has chosen "what is foolish in the world to shame the wise . . . what is weak in the world to shame the strong . . . [and] what is low and despised in the world . . . to reduce to nothing things that are" (1:27–28). To support the notion that this reversal of human power structures precludes boasting, Paul invokes the prophecy of Jeremiah: "Let the one who boasts, boast in the Lord" (Jer 9:24). "The Lord" probably refers to God (1:29), since Paul ascribes to God the Corinthians' "life in Christ Jesus" (1:30).

2:1–5. Paul correlates the logic of the cross with the method and content of his own proclamation. In Greek, the word order of 1 Cor 2:1 is reversed, stressing that it is "not according to lofty words or wisdom" that he came "proclaiming the mystery of God." Again, Paul challenges cherished cultural values such as polished rhetoric and conventional wisdom, which he believes are at odds with the wisdom of God (cf. 1:5, 17, 18; 21; 26).

For Paul, that wisdom consists in the one thing he claims to have known among the Corinthians, "Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (2:2), a claim as jarring, as one interpreter puts it, as "fried ice." For Paul, the notion of a crucified messiah is reflected in the cruciform shape of his apostolic mission. The language here is telling: by noting his own "weakness," "fear," and "trembling" (2:3), together with the failure of his "speech and proclamation" to be "persuasive" (2:4; NRSV, "plausible"), Paul carefully distinguishes between human resourcefulness and divine power. In Paul's witness, as in Christ's, God's power works most palpably in human weakness as it promotes faith that rests "not on human wisdom but on the power of God" (2:5).

Throughout the passage, Paul deliberately recalls his proclamation to the Corinthians in personal terms, addressing them directly in 2:1 ("when I came to you"), 2:2 ("decided to know nothing among you"), 2:3 ("I came to you"), and 2:5 ("your faith"). Through such direct relational appeal, Paul submits his own apostolic witness—both in content and in delivery—as a pattern for them to emulate.

2:6–16. Having disclaimed any pretense to wise speech, Paul redefines wisdom in decidedly apocalyptic terms, denying that it belongs to "this age" or to the "rulers of this age" (2:6), while calling it "secret and hidden" yet "decreed before the ages" (2:7). The contrast implies that, in the gospel of a crucified Christ, the present evil age begins to yield to the new age of God (cf. 10:24), since "these things God has revealed (apokalypsen) to us through the Spirit" (2:10).

Paul presupposes an apocalyptic divide between the "spirit of the world" and the "Spirit . . . from God" (2:12). Both divine and human realms are animated by s/Spirit, yet while the human spirit understands only human matters, God's Spirit discerns all things divine. Rather than through human acumen, it is through the Spirit of God that believers "understand the gifts bestowed on us by God" (2:12). Moreover, Paul differentiates his own Spirit-taught speech from speech taught by human wisdom (2:13). And he juxtaposes the human ruled by the psyche (psychikos anthro⁻pos; 2:14), who does not receive the "things of God's Spirit" (2:14; NRSV, "gifts of God's Spirit"), with the spiritual one (pneumatikos; 2:15), whose amenability to the "Spirit of God" makes it possible to understand or discern "all things" (ta panta; 2:15).

For Paul, Christ bridges the chasm between the human and divine realms, and in his closing reminder that "we have the mind of Christ" (2:16), he probably refers not just to himself and his apostolic co-workers, but also to his audience. Rhetorically, he appeals to their identity "in Christ," as those "taught by the Spirit" (2:13); thus, God has empowered them to discern divine wisdom as it turns on end the human wisdom so widely vaunted within their own social context.

C. Jealousy, Quarrels and Factions (3:1–23)

Having established the source of spiritual discernment, Paul returns to the pressing issue of division among the Corinthians by way of frontal attack: their factionalism, evident in "jealousy and quarreling" (3:3), reflects behavior shaped by "human inclinations" (3:3). Throughout the chapter, he employs workplace metaphors to recast apostolic leadership within the larger framework of God's redemptive purposes and thus to undermine one source of the community's divisiveness.

3:1–4. Paul diagnoses the Corinthians' spiritual condition by first recalling that he "could not speak to you as spiritual people, but rather as people of the flesh, as infants in Christ" (3:1). Notably, their orientation as fleshly does not preclude their being in Christ. To be sure, they remain dependent on others for nourishment, and Paul himself has assumed the role of nursing mother, who has given them milk because they were not—and still are not—ready for solid food (3:2; cf. 1 Thess 2:7).

As evidence of such fleshly orientation, Paul revisits the problem of division that began the letter (1:10), a division rooted, in this case, in alignment with particular apostolic leaders. Though the NRSV translates the term ze⁻los as "jealousy" (3:3), Paul's diagnosis here suggests a misplaced zeal, since the word often conveys fervent belief, and sometimes in a positive light (cf. 2 Cor 7:7, 11; 9:2; 11:2; Rom 10:2; Phil 3:6). Apparently, zeal becomes problematic precisely when it becomes divisive, particularly when Corinthian Christians direct their zeal toward their presumed leaders by claiming, "I belong to Apollos" or "I belong to Paul" (3:4; cf. 1:12). Such allegiances suggest that the Corinthians are "merely human" (3:4), a condition that contrasts sharply for Paul with the new life in Christ.

3:5–17. Through a series of three metaphors, Paul affirms the shared nature of the apostolic task, which is to promote God's redemptive agenda. First, he depicts both Apollos and himself as "servants" (diakonoi; 3:5) who labor for a mutual Lord, thus placing their respective authority squarely within the overarching authority of God. Invoking agricultural imagery to emphasize their role as workers in God's field, Paul goes so far as to claim (perhaps hyperbolically?) that neither the one who plants nor the one who waters "is anything, but only God who gives the growth" (3:7). Moreover, he underscores the "common purpose" (3:8) that he shares with Apollos, calling them "co-workers" (synergoi; 3:9) who toil in the same soil of God's field. The deliberate distinction between apostolic labor and its yield may offer a rare Pauline allusion to gospel traditions (see esp. Mark 4:1–30; cf. 7:10; 11:23–26).

Paul next uses the image of God's building (3:9b–15) to express the nature of the apostolic task. After reminding the Corinthians about God's calling grace (3:10; cf. 1:4; 15:10; Rom 1:5; 12:3; 15:15; Gal 1:15; 2:9), Paul portrays himself as a builder who has laid a foundation upon which others now build. His language holds in delicate tension both the shared nature of this building enterprise, based on a common foundation of Jesus Christ (3:11), and the respective choices of "each one" (3:10; NRSV, "each builder") involved in the building task. In the progression of materials selected—"gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, straw" (3:12)—Paul implies that some apostolic efforts may be more durable than others. Still, neither he nor the Corinthians will ultimately assess "what sort of work each has done" (3:13); judgment will come only with the eschatological "day" (3:13), when faulty construction will be destroyed and "the builder will suffer loss," yet "the builder will be saved . . . through fire" (3:15). The final judgment itself functions not so much to condemn people as to disclose the true nature of their work, and thus to lead to their ultimate salvation (cf. 5:5).

Finally, Paul identifies the nature of God's building by depicting the Corinthians, collectively, as God's "temple" in whom "God's Spirit dwells" (3:16). The use of the plural pronoun you in these verses reflects Paul's communal concern. Further, despite his earlier discussion of the Corinthians' behavior as human rather than spiritual, he here reaffirms that the Spirit does reside in their midst (cf. 2:12). In the claim that God will destroy the "person" who destroys God's temple (3:17), the NRSV supplies a definite noun that is lacking in the Greek. Especially in light of the impulse for salvation discussed above (cf. 3:15), Paul may suggest the impending eradication of any corrupting influence (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3) rather than the destruction of a person (false apostle?) per se.

3:18–23. Paul once again challenges the wisdom of "this age" and "of this world" by claiming it is "foolishness with God" (cf. 1:18–25). After an appeal to Israel's wisdom tradition (3:19–20; cf. Job 5:13 and Psalm 94:11), he offers this pointed exhortation: "Let no one boast with respect to human beings" (3:21; NRSV, "about human leaders"). The startling claim that "all things are yours" (3:21) once again reverses the power dynamics of the leader-servant relationship by maintaining that human leaders, along with "the world or life or death or the present or the future—all belong to you (pl.);" (3:22). Lest the Corinthians begin to invoke "lordship" for themselves, though, the apostle closes with a pointed reminder: "you (pl.) belong to Christ and Christ belongs to God" (3:23). Paul has taken the Corinthians' individual loyalty to apostolic human leaders (3:4) and refashioned it as a collective allegiance to God.

D. Cruciform Apostleship (4:1–21)

This chapter proceeds organically from earlier discussions about true apostleship, as Paul continues to root out division by addressing its flawed basis in the measuring of one apostle's work against another. Instead, he promotes a cruciform standard for apostleship that he will also apply to the Corinthians themselves.

4:1–7. Having insisted that everything "belongs to God" (3:23), Paul addresses the specific issue of judging. Though the Corinthians have apparently measured him against Apollos, he once again emphasizes what is common to them as "servants" and "stewards" of God's mysteries (cf. 3:9; 4:6). Noting the importance of apostolic faithfulness (4:2), Paul insists that it falls neither to the Corinthians nor to himself to discern the extent of that faithfulness, for it is "the Lord who judges" (4:5). Moreover, he corrects not just the Corinthians' judging tendencies but their timeframe as well, reminding them of decisive judgment that will yet occur when the Lord "comes" (4:5). Paul repeats here the positive outcome of that judging mentioned above: "each one will receive commendation from God" (4:5; cf. 3:15).

Paul reworks the Corinthians' schematic plans for apostolic assessment, since he has "applied (metesche-matisa) these things to myself and to Apollos for your benefit" (4:6; NRSV, "to Apollos and myself"), thus confronting their adversarial pitting of "one against another" (4:6). His point is that they might "learn through us the meaning of the saying, 'nothing beyond what is written'" (4:6), a decidedly obscure reference that may refer back to Paul's earlier scriptural citations concerning boasting, or more broadly to his exhortation on the topic to this point in the letter. Whatever specific content he has in mind, one thing is clear: for Paul, "what is written" challenges the kind of puffing up that sets Corinthians, or their leaders, against each other.

A series of three rhetorical questions drives home Paul's message, though the first presents a translational challenge. According to the NRSV, Paul asks, "For who sees anything different in you?" (4:7a). Yet the Greek is far leaner: "For who distinguishes (diakrinei) you (sing.)?" Perhaps Paul implies that, since distinction among the Corinthians lies exclusively within God's purview, they overstep bounds of authority by forging distinctions among themselves. This reading makes clearer sense of the two questions that conclude the verse: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as if it were not a gift?" (4:7b–c) Together, these pointed queries indicate that boasting has no place among those whose status before God comes not through their own wisdom or resourcefulness but through the grace of God (see above, 1:4).

4:8–13. From such a scathing indictment of their boasting, Paul moves toward a distinction of his own, as he sharply contrasts the Corinthians' present status (4:8) with the status of "us apostles" (4:9). Three rhetorical questions drip with irony as they indict the Corinthians' pretense: "Do you already have all you want? Have you already become rich? Have you become kings apart from us?" (4:8; the NRSV presents the clauses as ironic statements). The underlying claims, with their accompanying hint of realized eschatology, drive a rhetorical wedge between the Corinthians' selfpromotion and Paul's authentic, self-sacrificial pattern of apostleship.

The turning point of this passage comes as Paul reaffirms that "God has exhibited us apostles as last of all, as though sentenced to death" (4:9a), clearly aligning authentic apostleship with the plight of a crucified messiah. Moreover, it is this pattern of self-sacrifice, rather than the scheme of wealth and power embraced by some Corinthians, that constitutes the "theater" (theatron; 4:9b; NRSV, "spectacle") in which God's redemptive purposes have been performed for the world. As he sharply contrasts the apostles' condition (4:10; "fools for the sake of Christ," "weak," "in disrepute") with the Corinthians' ("wise in Christ," "strong," "held in honor"), Paul caricatures the difference between God's wisdom and worldly acclaim. He drives home the point by emphasizing both the apostles' enduring deprivation (4:11–12) and their self-denying response to mistreatment (4:12b–13a; cf. Luke 6:28; Rom 12:14).

A concluding statement about the apostolic role merits reflection: "We have become like the rubbish (perikatharmata) of the world, the dregs (peripse̅ma) of all things, to this very day" (4:13). Though these two Greek words are elsewhere unattested in the NT, and only scantily in the LXX, they share a loose association with purification that comes through unseemly sacrifice. Such graphic lexical choices, then, associate the perils of authentic apostleship with the scandalous, but sanctifying, ways of God's wisdom.

4:14–21. Paul concludes the first section of the letter with a strong relational appeal by casting his rebuke in thoroughly parental terms: "to admonish you as my beloved children" (4:14). As their "father" (4:15; cf. 3:2), he exhorts them to "be imitators of me" (4:16) and introduces his child Timothy, whom he will send "to remind you of my ways in Christ Jesus" (4:17). Lest the Corinthians infer Timothy's visit suggests that Paul parents from a distance, though, he adds quickly, "I will come to you soon, if the Lord wills" (4:19). He strikes a balance, too, between his preference to engage the Corinthians in a "spirit of gentleness" on the one hand and his willingness to wield an authoritarian "stick" (4:21) on the other. In any case, Paul's fundamental response to the Corinthians' divisiveness is to embody the "message about the cross" (1:18) as their ultimate source of unity.

III. Glorifying God in the Body (5:1–11:1)

Building on the foundation of his sustained appeal for unity, Paul shifts gears to address a wideranging list of practical concerns that arise out of reports, both oral and written, that he has received about the Corinthian Christians' conduct. Within these chapters, Paul continues to deploy the selfsacrificial logic of the cross as plumb line against which he assays the community's behavior, even as he urges his hearers to exercise the same kind of judgment among themselves. In each case, such discernment ultimately serves the larger purpose of promoting wholeness within the community, which in turn embodies God's saving impulse for the world.

A. Judging Immoral Behavior (5:1–6:20)

The first major section in this unit weaves together disparate concerns about the community's conduct, as Paul stakes out clear moral ground on sexual as well as legal matters. Taken together, the separate contingencies that provide the outline of this section indicate that, for Paul, the body matters; that is, as a community whose life is patterned after the apocalyptic reality of Christ crucified, the Corinthian Christians' practices ought to manifest God's glory in the world.

5:1–13. To detect in 1 Cor 5:1 the beginning of a second major section in the letter is not to deny that this opening verse flows naturally from the end of chapter four, where a parental Paul has threatened to bring a disciplining rod. Indeed, his rhetoric in the subsequent discussion does feature sharp verbal rebuke. Moreover, Paul continues to express concern over the arrogant posture at least some Corinthians strike toward objectionable conduct in their midst (5:2; cf. 4:18). In Paul's view, their problem lies not just in the sexual immorality itself (porneia; 5:1)—immorality that puts the Gentiles to shame—but, perhaps even more alarmingly, in their celebration of the offensive habit. While readers may be inclined to focus on the individual offenders and the egregiousness of their sin, Paul views the situation primarily through the lens of its impact on the community as body of Christ.

Several aspects of Paul's argumentation shift the weight of his judgment from the offender(s) to those who have accommodated the offense. In the first place, already in 1 Cor 5:2, Paul turns from the man sleeping with his father's wife to those who tolerate, or even celebrate, such licentious behavior. As he has before, Paul employs direct address to contrast the Corinthians' presumption with the response he deems more fitting: their mourning and removal of such sin from their midst (5:2).

Since they have failed to exercise that authority, Paul weighs in with a commanding judgment of his own. Despite his physical absence, he asserts that he is indeed "present in spirit" (5:3), probably referring both to his own spirit and to the Spirit of God who serves as mediator (cf. 3:16). In any case, he offers a definitive rendering: "I have already pronounced judgment" (5:3). The ambiguous placement of the phrase, "in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" (5:4), presents an exegetical challenge. Some interpreters, including the NRSV translators, read the phrase as an effort to enhance Paul's authority ("I have already pronounced judgment in the name of the Lord Jesus"). Others infer that the offender himself has predicated his sexual liberty on that same lordship ("the man who has done such a thing in the name of the Lord Jesus"). A third possibility has the phrase expressing the nature of the gathered community ("when you are assembled in the name of the Lord Jesus"). Though a clear resolution of the matter proves elusive, Paul's judgment stands squarely at the interface of the man's misdeeds and the community's response.

The ensuing instructions clearly illuminate Paul's communal concerns, since he anchors his command to "hand this man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh" (5:5a), in the motivating clause that follows: "so that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord" (5:5b). While the NRSV supplies the possessive pronoun his to suggest that Paul focuses on the offender's salvation, a more accurate translation of the Greek ("the spirit") leaves the spirit's identity more obscure. In light of the passage's prevailing communal concerns—concerns which will be elaborated in the next three verses—it may be more prudent to place greater emphasis on the benefits (even "salvation") that accrue to the Corinthian body through the eradication of evil.

Paul next appeals to the story of Israel to depict the kind of salvation he has in view. Using the metaphor of bread to convey the deleterious effects of the "yeast" of sexual immorality on the batch of dough that is the Corinthian congregation, Paul maintains, "you really are unleavened" (5:7); by adding evocative Passover language ("paschal lamb," "sacrifice," "celebrate the festival"), he depicts both Christ and the Corinthians as active participants in Israel's sacramental story. In essence, Paul prods his hearers to recalibrate their moral compass so that it takes its bearings not from surrounding Gentile culture but from the landscape of Jewish scripture, which promotes "sincerity and truth" rather than "malice and evil" (5:8).

Paul reiterates communal concerns as he clarifies previous instructions to the Corinthians about sexual immorality. Continuing with bread-baking imagery, he recalls what he wrote previously—"not to be mixed with sexually immoral persons" (5:9; NRSV, "be associated with")—before moving quickly to correct possible misunderstandings. Here, Paul broadens the question of morality to include not just sexual offense but also greed, idolatry, robbery, reviling, and drunkenness (5:10–11). In so doing, he seems to divert attention from a particularly salacious incident (i.e., sleeping with one's stepmother) toward the more pervasive patterns of self-satisfying human compulsions. Even as he emphasizes the need for judgment against the offender in question, he situates sexual immorality within a moral framework that likely indicts others within the community.

Even more significantly, Paul works to differentiate the respective jurisdictions of human and divine judging. Though earlier in the letter (4:1–5), Paul has denied the Corinthians the right to judge (him), citing instead the authority of God's eschatological judgment, here he reworks his position. With respect to behaviors in the community, Paul asks, "Is it not those inside that you are to judge?" (5:12), even as he insists, "God will judge those outside" (5:13). Such a shift in thinking reflects Paul's adaptive pastoral strategies. Without denying the decisive weight of God's end-time, universal judgment, he also keeps an eye on the meantime witness of the Corinthian community, a witness that is compromised to the extent that it tolerates, or even celebrates, self-indulgent conduct.

6:1–11. Though the topic at hand shifts from sexual licentiousness to legal disputes among believers, Paul offers further input on the Corinthians' own judgment. Whereas he has reiterated the call to judge immoral behavior within the community (5:12–13), now Paul charges them not to submit to the judgment of the unrighteous (adikõn; 6:1) but rather to resolve their disputes internally by deploying their own God-given judgment.

Paul's language telegraphs keen frustration with the Corinthians' glib accommodation to judgment by outsiders. Six times within this chapter (6:2, 3, 9, 15, 16, 19) he asks, almost in disbelief, "Do you not know . . .?" (The question appears only eleven times in the Pauline corpus and nine times in this letter.) Likely, the phrasing is a play on words, intended as a subtle critique of the "knowledge" on which the Corinthians apparently pride themselves (cf. 1:5; 8:1; 13:2).

Paul's apocalyptic worldview construes creation in dualities. One group, those outside, are both "unrighteous" (6:1) and "unbelievers" (6:6) and thus lack the capacity to mete out God's judgment. On the other hand, the Corinthians are "holy ones" (6:2; NRSV, "saints"; cf. 1:2), who have been endowed with judgment. For Paul, the Corinthians' submission to judgment by outsiders is just as misguided as their rendering judgments against them would be (cf. 5:13). The two groups operate, in his view, under different jurisdictions, and he deems their legal decisions to be irreconcilable.

That is not to say, though, that Paul means to keep the spheres separate. Already, he has overtly denied any such impulse (5:10). And his consternation in this passage stems partly from the (negative) witness the Corinthian Christians' disputes reflect in the Gentile court of law. When he says it is "to your shame" (6:5) that he even broaches the topic, Paul implicitly includes the non-believing outsiders among those who notice the division within a congregation that should, according to the logic of the cross, be united. More than that, he calls the very existence of legal disputes "a defeat for you" (6:7). Where the Corinthians have the opportunity to be "wronged" or "defrauded" without seeking retribution, they apparently exercise injustices themselves, even among themselves (6:7; cf. 4:12–13). Though Paul does not make the point outright, the language here also hints at economic oppression by those in positions of power; such a dynamic of social stratification would only further fan the flames of Paul's ire (cf. 11:21–22).

The discussion about lawsuits concludes with a pointed reminder that the unrighteous "will not inherit the kingdom of God" (6:9). Though the section has begun with a clear distinction between outsiders (the "unrighteous") and insiders (the "saints"), here the lines of division are less clear. Paul has accused the Corinthians of injustice in the previous verse (6:8); now he employs a traditional vice list to enumerate many of the behaviors that constitute such injustice. By casting the net of reproachful behavior far and wide, it surely ensnares some in his audience—and purposefully so.

Paul pulls back from the brink, though, attributing such conduct to the Corinthians only in hindsight: "this is what some of you used to be" (6:11). Using a series of aorist passive verbs, Paul indicates that now the Corinthians have been "washed," "sanctified," and "justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God" (6:11). That is, their standing before God comes wholly as the by-product of God's activity, not their own. Since God has claimed them, and decisively so, Paul implies that the Corinthians' behavior ought to comport with their standing as the "righteous."

6:12–20. As if aware of the dangers implicit in affirming such a status, Paul circles back to address the freedom that comes through both Christ and the Spirit. Probably he quotes a slogan the Corinthians themselves have uttered: "All things are lawful for me" (6:12a). Without denying the claim outright, he qualifies it: "not all things build up" (6:12b; NRSV, "are beneficial"; cf. 10:23; 12:7). His retort shifts the focus from the individual's prerogative to the impact one's personal conduct makes on others.

Paul's concern with bodily existence pervades the remaining verses in this chapter. Rooted in the Judaic notion of humanity's embodiment of the divine image (Gen 1:27), the notion that "body matters" finds fullest expression, for Paul, in Christ's bodily sacrifice. What is more, he reminds the Corinthians that their new life in Christ means that their "bodies are members of Christ" (6:15), implying their present bodily life continues to manifest Christ in the world. To participate in fornication (6:13, 18) or prostitution (6:15), according to Paul, is to engage in bodily sin that corrupts not just human flesh but the body, which is the "temple of the Holy Spirit" (6:19). Here the mystical and corporeal converge, and as a result, any claims to personal licentiousness fade from view.

B. Promoting Morality in Marriage (7:1–40)

Continuing his discussion of embodied existence, Paul responds in this chapter to specific queries the Corinthians have posed about sexual morality within the context of marriage.

7:1–16. The section opens with a slogan that the Corinthians have apparently quoted to Paul in their correspondence: "It is well for a man not to touch a woman" (7:1b). Though scholars disagree about whether the claim originated (1) with Paul, (2) with an ascetic contingent in the community, or (3) in the Corinthians' misinterpretation of Paul's teachings, he moves swiftly to clarify his positive position about sex within the marriage relationship. Probably still mulling the offenses addressed earlier, he maintains that "because of cases of sexual immorality" (7:2a), husbands and wives should exercise mutual sexual fulfillment.

Paul's view of sexuality in marriage is strikingly balanced in terms of gender roles, since the apostle crafts his recommendations so that they address not just the husband but the wife as well ("each man . . . each woman," 7:2; "husband should give . . . likewise the wife," 7:3; "wife does not have authority . . . likewise the husband," 7:4). Especially in contrast with the cultural accommodation evident in later NT household codes (Eph 5:24; Col 3:18; 1 Pet 3:1, 6), this series of syntactical parallels expresses a degree of mutual authority and sexual prerogative that is unusual for its setting.

Though some interpreters believe that Paul calls marriage itself a "concession" (7:6)—as a lifestyle that is inferior to celibacy—the word "this" (touto) that opens the verse probably refers instead to the practice of mutual sexual denial "by agreement for a set time" (7:5). That is, he concedes sexless marriage, but only temporarily and under the right circumstances. Besides making better sense grammatically, this reading fits well with what follows, where Paul affirms not just celibacy but also the "particular gift from God" (7:7) that takes different, and implicitly equal, forms. Certainly he understands his celibacy as a gift, but so too does he affirm the gift of marriage, where sexuality as part of the God-given bodily existence finds pure expression.

As Paul turns to the matter of divorce, we find another rare allusion to the teachings of Jesus (cf. Mark 10:2–12; Matt 5:31–32, 19:3–9). Once again Paul promotes the marriage ideal while leaving room for the practical contingencies of real life. He first maintains that "the wife should not separate from her husband" (7:10), adding quickly that a divorced wife should remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband (7:11). Some take this primary focus on women to reflect Paul's concern about Corinthian women who had taken their "freedom in Christ" to an extreme. Such a reconstruction, though, seems to overreach the evidence. More likely, Paul simply repeats his tendency (cf. 7:2–5) to vacillate between genders in this discussion of marriage between believing spouses.

Paul devotes even more attention to the durability of "mixed" marriages—between believers and non-believers—where he stakes out ethical ground that manifests the "message about the cross." Of greater importance than the institution of marriage per se, for Paul, are the human destinies affected through marriage. For believing husbands and wives married to willing unbelievers, Paul recommends remaining in marriage (7:12–13). The motivation he supplies has stumped interpreters: "for the unbelieving husband is made holy through his wife . . ." and "wife, for all you know, you might save your husband" (7:14, 16). As some have noted, this contagion of holiness seems in tension with the letter's earlier suggestion that immorality is contagious (5:6). But there is here no indication of immorality on the part of the unbelieving spouse; once again, Paul underscores the witness that believers bear as members of the body of a self-sacrificing, reconciling messiah: "it is to peace that God has called you" (7:15).

7:17–40. The remainder of the chapter is sprinkled with allusive eschatological claims, which together establish the backdrop against which Paul forges all moral and ethical advice. While he has more to say in these verses about sex, marriage, and abstinence, the apostle grounds his instruction in his conviction about the impending salvation of Corinthian believers. Thus the recurring injunction to "remain as you are" (7:20; cf. 7:8, 11, 24, 40), that is, "in whatever condition you were called" (7:24), takes its cues from the impending eschatological "crisis" (7:26).

Paul's chief concern for the unmarried, widowed, divorced, and even the married, is that they live lives of "unhindered devotion to the Lord" (7:35) within the short span of eschatological time, since "the present form of this world is passing away" (7:31). Through his teaching, Paul promotes freedom from unnecessary anxieties on the one hand (7:32–34) and ardent extra-marital passion (7:36) on the other. As he has earlier in the chapter, Paul here advocates an ideal of unchanging social status, while demurring from any impulse "to put any restraint on you" (7:35).

In the midst of this discussion about marital status, Paul tackles two other matters that relate to the Corinthians' social status: circumcision and slavery. In the first instance, he denies both that circumcised believers should seek to undo their circumcision and that uncircumcised believers should seek circumcision (7:18). In either case, Paul views such concern with the foreskin, and the social status or embarrassment associated with it, as a distraction from the true calling of faith, which he identifies here as "obeying the commandments of God" (7:19).

Paul's directive to slaves proves more befuddling—to ancient as well as modern readers. The interpretive crux lies in the Greek phrase mallon chre⁻sai (7:21), an elliptical suggestion for slaves either (1) to remain enslaved even if freedom is possible ("it is better to use [your present circumstance]"; NRSV, "make use of your present condition [i.e., your slavery] now more than ever"), or (2) to seize the opportunity for freedom ("all the more, use [your freedom]"; NRSV note "avail yourself of the opportunity [to be freed]"). Despite the offense to contemporary readers' sensibilities, Paul probably intended that slaves, too, should "remain in the condition in which you were called" (7:20). Such a reading both coheres with the chapter's overarching bias against changing social status and makes better sense of the verse that follows, where Paul suggests that slaves experience a spiritual freedom in Christ, even when their social function remains in tact (7:22). Conversely, believers who are "free" in social terms are spiritual slaves to Christ. When Paul commands his hearers not to "become slaves of human masters" (7:23), he affirms the "slavery" of all believers to God and thus locates true power in that slavery, rather than in the human institution that was central to Roman society.

Paul devotes the rest of this section to casting decisions about marriage within his short-term eschatological landscape, in which "the appointed time has grown short" (7:29). The passage reflects his sustained attempt to balance the ideal, which is "unhindered devotion to the Lord" (7:35), with the realistic pull of human passion (7:36). Put simply, Paul writes that the unmarried man "who marries his fiancée does well [but] he who refrains from marriage will do better" (7:38). Applying the same standards to the widow, Paul writes, "in my judgment she is more blessed if she remains as she is" (7:40).

Paul's refusal to draw a line in the sand on the matter of marriage is telling. More important to the apostle than immutable injunctions to marry or not to marry is the concern that believers "be holy in body and spirit" (7:34) in light of the coming judgment. To the degree that marriage promotes anxieties "about the affairs of the world" (7:34), Paul finds it to detract from the proper concerns with "the affairs of the Lord" (7:32). But to the degree that, apart from marriage, the flames of passion rage, the freedom to marry safeguards bodily purity, which Paul views as critical to the end-time salvation that remains his overarching concern.

C. The Problem of Idol Food and Worship (8:1–11:1)

With the transitional phrase, "now concerning" (8:1; cf. 7:1), Paul shifts to the topic of idolatry, especially food sacrificed to idols. Yet once again, Paul will not prescribe strict regulation. Rather than fixed behavioral guidelines, he promotes his own pattern of self-sacrifice as the governing principle for the community's conduct. To the degree that they invoke "freedom" not to justify their own choices but to serve the interests of the weak in their midst, the Corinthians build one another up in the unity that Christ intends.

8:1–13. Paul uses two separate terms to introduce the topic at hand: to̅n̅ eido̅ lothyto̅n̅ ("idol sacrifices"; 8:1) and te̅s̅ bro̅seo̅s̅ . . . to̅n̅ eido̅ lothyto̅n̅, ("food of idol sacrifices"; 8:4). Though the NRSV translates the first expression as "food sacrificed to idols," the difference in the Greek indicates that, in 1 Cor 8:1–3, Paul broaches the topic of idolatry more broadly understood before turning to particular concerns about idol meat. In any case, the opening verse provides the ethical framework for the ensuing discussion: "knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (8:1).

Apparently since they "know that, 'no idol in the world really exists'" (8:4), some Corinthians have justified either consuming food previously sacrificed to idols or participating in temple meals. Paul begins to address the issue by making a case for unity that is anchored in the oneness of God. As Paul contrasts the "many gods and many lords" (8:5) of Greek religious life with the central Jewish affirmation that "there is no God but one" (8:4; cf. Deut 6:4), he exposes the nature of idolatry even as he sets forth exclusive loyalty to "the one God, the Father . . . and one Lord, Jesus Christ" (8:6) as the foundation of the social appeal that follows.

In Paul's view, ingestion of idol meat, or any food for that matter, is morally neutral: "Food will not bring us close to God" (8:8). Yet he evaluates the question at hand in light of the fundamental problem it exposes: the stratified nature of the Corinthian Christian community. Central to Paul's discussion of the eating of idol meat is his qualification of "this liberty of yours" (8:9), which may not be invoked so that it becomes a "stumbling block to the weak" (8:9). On the one hand, those with "knowledge" (8:1, 7, 11) rightly deny the existence of idols and thus divest the idol meat of any spiritual power; on the other hand, when such knowledge leads to their "eating in the temple of an idol" (8:10), it is to the detriment—even destruction (8:11)—of those whose weak "conscience" (8:7, 12) makes them susceptible to returning to idol worship (8:10). Thus he finds that, even if for them eating idol meat is a morally neutral activity, when viewed in light of its deleterious effect upon "your family" (8:12), the act becomes a "sin against Christ" (8:12; cf. Rom 14:15). The chapter concludes as Paul states his own willingness to forego eating meat "so that I may not cause one of them to fall" (8:13).

9:1–27. In the midst of his discussion of idolatry and idol foods, Paul presents an "apology" (apologia, 9:3; NRSV, "defense") for his own model of sacrificial servanthood as a template for the conduct of the Corinthians. Here the "message about the cross" (1:18) takes on embodied form in Paul's willingness to forsake personal prerogatives whenever they pose an "obstacle in the way of the gospel of Christ" (9:12).

Paul first aligns himself with those Corinthians whose "liberty" (exousia; 8:9) authorizes their eating of idol food: "Am I not free?" (9:1). Through a series of rhetorical questions, Paul emphasizes his "right" (exousian; 9:4) to be accompanied by a believing wife (9:5) as well as to receive payment for his apostolic labors (9:4, 6–7). Moreover, he invokes the law of Moses, which he deems to be "written for our sake" (9:10), as clear sanction of the "rightful claim" (exousias; 9:12a) he has to "reap material benefits" (9:11) from the Corinthians themselves.

Despite mounting evidence for these rights of apostleship, "Nevertheless, we have not made use of this right (exousia), but we endure anything rather than put an obstacle in the way of the gospel" (9:12b). In essence, Paul sacrifices his established rights to the embodiment of the gospel. Indeed, Paul differentiates himself from those "employed in temple service [who] get their food from the temple" (9:13), even as he implicitly violates a command of the Lord "that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel" (9:14). Once again, Paul refracts both Jewish religious practice and Jesus' authoritative teaching through his gospel lens: when established convention impairs his witness, he freely sets it aside.

Paul explains his own apostleship in subtly cruciform terms. Maintaining that he has "made no use of any of these [rights]" (9:15a), Paul adds emphatically, "I would rather die than that" (9:15b). That Paul here signals Jesus' own exemplary death seems evident when he claims that no one will "empty" (kenō sei, 9:15b; cf. Phil 2:5; NRSV, "deprive me of") his boast, which lies in his determination to "make full use of my rights (exousia) in the gospel" (9:18) by foregoing remunerative reward. Echoing the letter's earlier injunction to "let the one who boasts boast in the Lord" (1:31), Paul adopts the Lord's pattern of self-sacrifice as the means through which the gospel might take root in the world.

Paul's apocalyptic vision of eradicating socioreligious distinction is evident in the apostolic strategy he explains in 9:19–23. Framing his interaction with different groups in the context of his own self-denial, Paul begins, "though I am free with respect to all, I have made myself a slave to all" (9:19). His strategy toward Jews, those under the law, those outside the law, and the weak shares an underlying commitment to adopt each group's standing, in an effort to "win" its members (9:19, 20, 21, 22). The NRSV translates Paul's summary explanation this way: "I do it all for the sake of the gospel, so that I may share in its blessings" (9:23, emphasis added). Yet in the Greek, the motivational clause might better be translated "so that I might become a partner [in the gospel]." In other words, what motivates Paul's apostolic approach is his commitment to active participation (synkoinō nos) in the gospel by embodying it through his own self-sacrifice.

In the chapter's concluding verses, Paul engages his audience through metaphors drawn from Corinthian culture. Probably alluding to the Isthmian games held nearby every two years, Paul urges his hearers to "run in such a way that you may win" (9:24), even as he contrasts the prize of a "perishable wreath" worn by successful athletes with the "imperishable one" (9:25; cf. 15:42, 50, 53; Phil 4:1; 1 Thess 2:19) they might win. Notably Paul invokes the example of athletic, and perhaps philosophical, self-discipline ("I punish my body and enslave it," 9:27) as he acknowledges to the Corinthians the grueling demands of the life lived in service to the benefit of others.

10:1–22. Perhaps to counter some Corinthians' pretense to knowledge (cf. esp. 8:1, 4), Paul introduces the scriptural example of Israel's wilderness idolatry by insisting, "I do not want you not to know" (10:1; NRSV, "to be unaware"). Here he elaborates his earlier, more allusive appeal to the law of Moses (9:8), which he views as "written for our sake" (9:10), highlighting parallels between Israel's story and the Corinthians' circumstance: like Israel in the wilderness, the Corinthians have been set free by God's saving grace; like these spiritual forebears, they have been baptized (10:2), and like them, Paul's hearers enjoy a sacramental meal that signifies God's provision (10:3–4).

Paul turns rather abruptly from these positive points of contact to the doomed destiny of the Israelites: "God was not pleased with most of them, and they were struck down in the wilderness" (10:5). For Paul, these unfaithful Israelites serve as negative examples for the Corinthians, "so that we might not desire evil as they did" (10:6). Although idolatrous eating and drinking remain in view here (10:7), Paul addresses idolatrous behavior more broadly as well, noting the disastrous outcome for those who participated in sexual immorality (cf. Num 25:1–9). Paul both establishes a spiritual continuity, through Christ, between the Corinthians and the wilderness story (10:3) and insists that Israel's story need not—indeed, ought not—repeat itself in the activities of Corinthian Christians.

Even as Paul sketches an unfolding salvation history as backdrop, he believes that the Corinthians stand at a decisive apocalyptic moment, as those "on whom the ends of the ages have come" (10:11).

While the present evil age, exemplified in Israel's idolatrous lapses, draws to a close, God's coming age, manifest in true worship of God, has begun to break through. Moreover, because of God's faithfulness, any present experience of testing also carries with it a "way out so that [they] may be able to endure" (10:13).

To support his instruction to "flee from the worship of idols" (10:14), Paul points to the mystical power associated with the Christian memorial meal. It is important to note that the cup of blessing and the bread shared by the Corinthian community entail their participation (koinōnia; 10:16) in Christ and, at the same time, their unity with one another, as the "many are one" (10:17). Likewise, Paul maintains that idol food is actually sacrificed not to idols but to demons, making the respective meals mutually exclusive: "You cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of demons" (10:21).

10:23–11:1. Paul's response to the question about eating meat from the marketplace—meat that may or may not have been ritually sacrificed to idols— is less clear. Avoiding categorical restriction on eating marketplace meat, Paul sets forth the same criteria he has affirmed throughout the letter: does the action benefit, or build up, the community (cf. 8:7–13)? The governing principle that emerges in this discussion is the "conscience" (syneidēsin; 10:25, 27, 28, 29; cf. 8:7, 10, 12), a word that seems to denote the awareness of whether or not the meat has been sacrificed to idols. As long as the believer remains ignorant about the meat's status as sacrificial, it is permissible, since "The earth and its fullness are the Lord's" (10:26). Once the believer knows that the food has indeed become idol meat, though, Paul advises, "do not eat it" (10: 28).

The questions that follow seem to contradict such straightforward advice: "For why should my liberty be subject to the judgment of someone else's conscience? If I partake with thankfulness, why should I be denounced because of that for which I give thanks?" (10:29b–30). The two dominant interpretive possibilities are as follows: (1) the questions somehow qualify the preceding verse; or (2) they come not from Paul but from an interlocutor whose views Paul counters. The coherence of the passage depends, to some degree, on the latter interpretation, which the final— and resounding— command to "give no offense to Jews or to Greeks or to the church of God" (10:32) clearly rebuts. In seeking not his "own advantage, but that of many" (10:33), Paul sets before the Corinthians the example of Christ crucified. The freedom they have received in Christ, then, entails the freedom to offer oneself in ways that build up the community (cf. 8:1). In this respect, Paul enjoins the Corinthians to "be imitators of me, as I am of Christ" (11:1).

IV. Gathering as the Body of Christ (11:2–14:40)

This section finds thematic coherence in its concern with matters related to the gathering of the Corinthian Christians. While Paul has previously addressed the conduct of believers as they operate within broader society, here he turns to behavior when they "come together" (11:17). Though the section presents a range of issues from head coverings to meal practices to spiritual gifts, Paul continues to promote the unity of the body of Christ.

A. Head Coverings (11:2–16)

Scholars are divided on their view of the literary integrity of 1 Cor 11:3–16. Not only do the verses articulate a gender hierarchy that many find inconsistent with other Pauline claims (cf. Gal 3:28), but their excision also leaves intact an unfolding discussion of eating and drinking that precedes and follows. As it stands in the text now, though, the passage introduces a new focus on issues that arise among the gathered community.

Paul broaches the topic of head coverings by first commending the Corinthians for their faithfulness to him and to the traditions he has "handed on" to them (11:2). The precise nature of those "traditions" remains unspecified in the verses that follow, which begin with the claim that "Christ is the head of every man, and the man is the head of the woman" (11:3; NRSV, "the husband is the head of his wife"). As the passage's catch word, head (*kephale*⁷) appears nine times in 1 Cor 11:2–26 and correlates appropriate headcoverings (including hairstyles) with appropriate authority: while a woman "should let her [head] be covered" (11:6; NRSV, "wear a veil"), "a man ought not to have his head covered" (11:7; NRSV, "veiled"). The theological warrant for such differentiation can be found in the creation story: "since [man] is the image and glory (NRSV, "reflection") of God; but woman is the glory (NRSV, "reflection") of man" (11:7). By employing the philosophers' strategy of appealing to "nature" (11:14) to support the distinction, Paul confirms that both Jewish and Greco-Roman convention undergird the practice.

Some interpreters believe that the verb katalyptein (11:5–7) refers to the binding of long hair, rather than the wearing of a veil, and suggest that Paul promotes a distinction, through hairstyle, between the Corinthian Christian women and (temple?) prostitutes. This reading finds support in the emphasis on male "headship" (11:3, 8–9), since the impulse here would be to domesticate (unattached) women, as well as in Paul's stance on gender interdependence: "in the Lord woman is not independent of man or man independent of woman" (11:11). Similarly, the odd recommendation that the woman who will not "cover herself ... should cut off her hair" (11:6; NRSV, "veil herself") makes more sense in light of this translation.

At any rate, it is worth noting that the passage assumes rather than argues the point that women are praying in public settings (11:5). And the closing verse indicates that the Corinthians' head-related issues are particular to their own cultural context and do not warrant contentious debate (11:16), either within the original setting or outside of it. Together, these observations undermine the universal applicability of this passage, even if it is authentically Pauline and original to the letter.

B. Remembering the Lord's Death (11:17–34)

The remainder of 1 Cor 11 returns to the Corinthians' eating practices, which fail to reflect the logic of the cross. If 11:3–16 constitutes an interpolation, 11:17 follows the preceding commendation (11:2) with a sharp rebuke: "Now in the following instructions I do not commend you, because when you come together it is not for the better but for the worse." Paul addresses the situation by first diagnosing the problem of social stratification at shared meals (11:18–22), next recalling the cruciform solution to that problem (11:23–26), and finally warning the Corinthians of the dire consequences for not "discerning the body" (11:29) as they partake in the shared meal (11:27–34).

Though Paul has enjoined the Corinthians to "do everything for the glory of God" (10:31), he finds that their manner of eating and drinking as a gathered community reflects not that glory but the same divisions (11:18) he has argued against from the letter's outset (1:10–13). Paul denounces the Corinthians for gathering to share a meal that is not "a supper of the Lord" (kyriakon deipnon, 11:20). By translating the phrase as "the Lord's supper," the NRSV diminishes the rhetorical contrast that Paul depicts between a Lord-like supper, which patterned after Christ's self-sacrifice, and the Corinthians' habits of eating one's "own supper" (idion deipnon) in which "one goes hungry and another becomes drunk" (11:21). Though social custom may have afforded the wealthy a certain temporal priority, the division that concerns Paul has less to do with the timing of the meal than with the gaping chasm between those who lack enough food and those who gorge themselves.

Paul invokes traditional accounts of the Last Supper (11:23–26; cf. Matt 26:26–29; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:15–20) as narrative correction to the Corinthian meal practices he condemns. Though some have viewed these verses as digression from social to sacramental concerns, their content demonstrates the dynamic solution Paul once again promotes within this divided community. In the command to "do this in remembrance of me" (11:24), the demonstrative pronoun touto probably refers not just to the pro forma commemorative meal but also, and more critically, to the self-sacrificing dynamic of Jesus' death: "This is my body that is for you" (11:24). To the extent that the Corinthians eat their meals for themselves, rather than for others, they fail to "proclaim the death of the Lord" (11:26).

Lest the Corinthians fail to reflect the Lord's pattern of self-sacrifice, Paul offers a stern warning: when the gathered community shares its meals "in an unworthy manner"—that is, not according to the "message about the cross"—judgment, even condemnation, will follow (11:27). Indeed, in Paul's estimation, judgment has already begun: "For this reason many of you are weak and ill, and some have died" (11:30). Whether he refers to external divine judgment upon some offenders or, more likely, to the more intrinsic consequences for the community of not providing sustenance and resources for those who are in need, Paul urges the community to "welcome one another" (11:33; NRSV, "wait for one another") when they gather, thus transforming a self-serving, stratifying meal to a self-sacrificial meal that embodies Christ's death.

C. Spiritual Gifts Among the Members (12:1–31)

Another source of stratification within the Corinthian community apparently concerns the wielding of spiritual gifts, particularly prophecy and ecstatic speech. Paul both affirms these powers while reminding the Corinthians of the vital function of all gifts, which provide the "manifestation of the Spirit for the common good" (12:7; cf. 6:12; 10:23)

12:1–11. Paul counters possible suspicion about Spirit-prompted speech by contrasting the "idols that could not speak" (12:2), which belong to the former Gentile life, with the Spirit of a living God, who does speak, albeit through believers. For Paul, evidence of God's Spirit comes straight from the message itself; wherever true confession is found ("Jesus is Lord"), there he discerns the activity the Holy Spirit (12:3).

Next, he expands the discussion by affirming varieties of gifts (12:4), services (12:5), and activities (12:6), all of which he attributes to the same Spirit (12:4), Lord (12:5), and God (12:6). Despite his dominant concern with the community as a whole, Paul enumerates a wide variety of ways in which the Spirit operates through individuals. For Paul, participation in the Christian community need neither elide distinction among its members, nor entail formulaic criteria for religious expression. The fact that prophecy and tongues appear last among listed items (cf. 12:28, 29–30; cf. Rom 12:6–8) may indicate that some Corinthians held them in higher esteem. In any case, the paradoxical nature of Paul's message about unity through diversity finds expression in the claim that "all these are activated by one and the same Spirit, who allots to each one individually just as the Spirit chooses" (12:11).

12:12–31. Earlier in the letter (6:15; 11:29), Paul has reminded the Corinthians of their intrinsic connection to the body of Christ. Here he adopts this metaphor, often used in Greco-Roman political discourse, to promote not just the countercultural notion of interdependence but also the power reversal evident in the "greater honor" that is given to the "inferior member" (12:24).

As starting point, Paul may allude to an early baptismal tradition: "in the one Spirit we were all baptized into one body—Jews or Greeks, slaves or free—and we were all made to drink of one Spirit" (12:13; cf. 10:3–4; Gal 3:27–28). Through their conversion from a Gentile past, the Corinthians' embodied existence has taken on a spiritual dimension that entails oneness, not division (cf. 3:1–5). Paul extends the metaphor to stress not just the interrelated nature of a body's members, but their utter lack of choice in the matter: the members can dissociate neither themselves (12:15–16) nor others (12:21) from the body, since "God arranged the members in the body, each one of them, as he chose" (12:18). This fits well with Paul's view of "gifts" discussed above (12:4–6); they are given by God at the discretion of the Spirit, not according to the whims, accomplishments, or even agency of the believers.

Also significant in Paul's use of the body metaphor is the claim that the "members of the body that seem to be weaker are indispensable, and those . . . that we think less honorable we clothe with greater honor" (12:22–23). Rather than discrediting weakness, as the Corinthian culture would have, Paul invokes the needs of the weaker members as the basis for unity, since the members share the "same care for one another" (12:25).

Only after fleshing out the body metaphor in detailed fashion does Paul return to the list of roles that God has appointed among the members. Having affirmed mutuality among gifts, he presents the list of gifts progressively, beginning with apostleship—perhaps not surprisingly, Paul's own office (1:1)—and moving toward prophecy and teaching, then deeds of power and gifts of healing, as well as assistance, leadership, and finally tongues (12:28). The sequence itself may reflect chronological development—with apostleship coming first and tongues being given only later—or a hierarchy of decreasing importance. In either case, such a list would diminish the significance of tongues, which the Corinthians may have prized as superior. For Paul, though, no spiritual gift can function in isolation; each gift becomes "greater" through its use for the building up of the community, which constitutes for Paul "a more excellent way" (12:31).

D. The "More Excellent Way" (13:1–13)

As the central chapter in Paul's sustained discussion about the spiritual gifts, 1 Cor 13 provides an interpretive key for the instructions that precede and follow. Both the hymnic nature of the passage and its lack of overtly theological claims lead some interpreters to infer that Paul quotes an earlier source to serve his rhetorical purposes. As presented, though, the chapter reiterates through lofty verse Paul's earlier imperative to "seek the advantage of the other" (10:24; cf. Phil 2:1–11), this time in the deployment of spiritual gifts.

Rather than a separate manifestation of the Spirit, the chapter's overarching concept of love (agape; mentioned nine times in thirteen verses) indicates the disposition through which believers express the work of God's Spirit among them. In Paul's view, not only does Christian community entail interdependence among spiritual gifts (12:27), but those gifts lack authentication unless expressed through love. Apart from love, even those who possess the most powerful and impressive gifts are "nothing" (13:2).

At first, love appears as something the believer "has" (13:1, 2, 3), yet it assumes a life of its own in the chapter's central section, where love becomes the subject of a series of verbs (13:4–8). Though the connection between love and God is not explicit, claims found here parallel Paul's views about God and Christ elsewhere (cf. Rom 5:8; Phil 2:6–11). This love, which is neither boastful nor arrogant nor self-serving, fits well Paul's understanding of the self-emptying "message about the cross" (1:10).

Paul returns in 13:8b to specific gifts of prophecy, tongues, and knowledge, which are probably best understood as synecdoche for the wider range of gifts under discussion. Perhaps these three gifts have figured more prominently in the stratification of the community, and Paul wishes here to emphasize their fleeting nature in light of the coming "end." Invoking thoroughly eschatological language, especially in the claims that prophecy and knowledge will "come to an end" (13:8), Paul understands such gifts within the drama of impending apocalyptic reversal (cf. 1:28; 2:6; 15:24). Despite their present value for the building up of the community, such gifts belong to the realm in which "we know only in part (ek merous) and prophesy only in part" (13:9), echoing the earlier claim that, for now, individual Corinthians are "parts" (NRSV, "members") of the body of Christ (12:27). Once again, Paul reframes the crises of the community within the broader landscape of the coming end (teleion, 13:10). The present age is characterized by "enigmatic" vision (ainigmati, 13:12; NRSV, "we see in a mirror, dimly"), while the coming age will bring the kind of clarity in which "we will see face to face" and are "fully known" (13:12).

In the meantime, Paul reminds the Corinthians that "faith, hope, and love abide, these three" (13:13; cf. Gal 5:5–6; Col 1:4–5; 1 Thess 1:3, 5:8). Taken together, this familiar triad characterizes the new life in Christ for which the Corinthians have been gifted through the Spirit. Among them, Paul maintains, it is love that is the "greatest of these" (13:13).

E. Spiritual Gifts in Worship (14:1–40)

Paul's discussion of gifts mostly focuses in this chapter on the distinction between prophecy and tongues, as he combats spiritual elitism associated with the gift of tongues. The "building up" of the community (14:3, 4 [2×], 5, 12, 17, 26; cf. 3:9; 8:1, 10; 10:23)—together with its implicit witness to outsiders—serve as touchstone against which Paul evaluates the Corinthians' giftedness.

14:1–25. Without denying "tongues" as a spiritual gift (14:5), Paul qualifies its value to the community on several grounds. In the first place, such direct address to God is shrouded in mystery which "nobody understands" (14:2), so that "those who speak in a tongue build up themselves" (14:4). In Paul's view, the merits of such private devotion are limited "unless someone interprets, so that the church may be built up" (14:5). To develop this notion, Paul draws on musical imagery, likening tongues to "lifeless instruments that produce sound, such as the flute or the harp" (14:7). The instruments themselves are vessels through which music is produced, but only through "distinct notes" (14:7)—that is, a discernable tone, rather than an "indistinct sound" (14:8). At issue is the relationship forged between the one producing the sound and the listener. Without an understanding of the sound, Paul maintains, "I will be a foreigner to the speaker and the speaker a foreigner to me" (14:11). Once again, Paul redirects attention from the form of the Corinthians' faith toward its reconciling, unifying social function.

A second drawback Paul associates with the gift of tongues stems from his conviction that worship involves the whole person—spirit, mind, and body together. Thus, he encourages the one who speaks in tongues to "pray for the power to interpret" (14:13), involving not just the spirit but also the mind (pneuma, nous) in both prayer and praise (14:15; cf. 1:10; 2:16). While Paul implicitly affirms the Corinthians' own preoccupation with knowledge (cf. 1:5; 8:1, 7, 10, 11; 12:8; 13:2, 8), which belongs to the realm of the mind, he judges its merit according to usefulness for the "building up" of others (14:17).

A third factor at work in this discussion about tongues concerns "outsiders" (14:16, 23, 24) or "unbelievers" (14:22–24), probably synonymous terms for onlookers who might assess the gospel message according to its expression within the gathered community. Elsewhere in the letter, Paul has alluded only obliquely to the effects of the Corinthian Christians' witness on those outside the congregation (6:1–8; 10:27–28), but here the evangelistic nature of their conduct is in clear view. First, he notes that an outsider cannot even add an "amen" to a prayer uttered in an unintelligible tongue (14:16). On the other hand, he notes that lucid prophecy might well lead to conversion: "After the secrets of the unbeliever's heart are disclosed, that person will bow down before God and worship him" (14:25). The gifts of tongues and prophecy, Paul maintains, should not hinder the gospel message for any who might enter the community.

What, then, does Paul mean when he claims, "Tongues, then, are a sign not for believers but for unbelievers, while prophecy is not for unbelievers but for believers" (14:22)? Though many interpreters, reading the claim in light of the preceding Isaianic quotation (14:21; Isa 28:11–12), find that tongues signal the condemnation of those outside, a more likely view is that, as a sign, tongues actually lead to—even point the way to—unbelief, while prophecy promotes belief. Regardless, Paul remains determined to fashion a community with permeable boundaries, a commitment that derives from his apocalyptic understanding that Christ's passion inaugurates not the division but the reconciliation of both insiders and outsiders.

14:26–40. The remainder of the chapter provides a framework for worship in which participants deploy a broad array of gifts, including "a hymn, a lesson, a revelation, a tongue, or an interpretation" (14:26). The section both reiterates the vital importance of interpreting tongues and promotes an orderly gathering, perhaps reflecting Paul's concern to differentiate Corinthian worship from other Greco-Roman religious practices characterized by ecstatic expression. The governing principle here lies in Paul's claim that "God is a God not of disorder but of peace" (14:32), so that the injunctions to silence (14:28, 30), together with the instructions for participants to speak "in turn" (14:27) and "one by one" (14: 31), promote a consistently peaceful gathering.

Modern interpreters generally take 14:34–35 (and sometimes v.36) as an early gloss, based on both extrinsic and intrinsic evidence. Though all known manuscripts include the verses, the Western tradition places them after 14:40, a discrepancy that is difficult to reconcile with a view of these instructions as original to Paul. Even more problematic for their authenticity are three internal difficulties: (1) the verses' digression from, even contradiction of, Paul's claims about the interdependence of spiritual gifts within the congregation; (2) their categorical prohibition of women's speech, which is at odds with the assumption, in 11:2–16, that women are indeed active as prayers and prophets in the gathered community; and (3) their authoritative appeal to "the law," which does not fit Paul's use of the term elsewhere (e.g., 9:8; 14:21) to introduce a specific text or to illustrate rather than to prescribe (but cf. Josephus, Against Apion, 2.200–201). Generally, those who do accept the verses as authentic overlook their categorical rhetoric and maintain that they address particular Corinthian women whose disorderly conduct detracted from the community's worship life.

V. Affirming the Resurrection Body (15:1–58)

With the beginning of 1 Cor 15, Paul introduces a matter about which he has been entirely silent to this point in the letter: the resurrection of Christ. Consistently, he has promoted Christ's sacrificial death (2:2)—the "message about the cross" (1:18)—as the pattern believers are called to emulate (11:1). Here he expands that message, drawing into view Christ's resurrection from the dead, along with its implications for the coming resurrection of all who will be "made alive in Christ" (15:22). For Paul, the death and resurrection ultimately stand together as witness to God's decisive victory for all of creation.

A. Christ Raised (15:1–11)

Paul draws his hearers' attention back to the basics, as he recalls for them the "good news that I proclaimed to you" (15:1) as the foundation of their faith. Using transmission-of-tradition language (cf. 11:23), he repeats the gospel proclamation: "that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures" (15:3–4; cf. Rom 1:1–4). Even if the emphasis on scriptural fulfillment derives from the tradition's original setting within Jewish Christianity, it serves Paul's purposes well as he reads this mostly Gentile congregation into Israel's sacred story.

Besides restating such a creedal formula, Paul identifies in succession those to whom the risen Lord has appeared: Cephas (Peter; 1:12; cf. Luke 24:34), the twelve (Luke 24:36; John 20:19), more than five hundred brothers [and sisters] (Acts 2:1–42), James (Gal 1:19), all of the apostles, and finally Paul himself (15:5–7). While the list does not correspond exactly to the accounts in the Gospels or Acts—most notably leaving the women out of account—it does reflect their view that the risen Lord appeared to an ever-expanding group. The section ends with a self-denigrating digression on Paul's own experience of the crucified Christ (cf. Gal 1:15–16; Acts 9:3–6). Perhaps anticipating (or responding to) challenges to his "apostleship," Paul calls himself "one untimely born" (ektro mati; 15:8), a term that in Jewish literature typically denotes a deplorable station in life. He continues the motif, acknowledging that he is "unfit to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God" (15:9), yet he maintains that both God's grace and his own hard work through God's grace place him in the role of apostleship. Thus Paul both identifies with believers who have experienced the risen Lord and distinguishes himself from them, as one whose life story provides a powerful example of God's intervening grace.

B. Christ as the First Fruits (15:12–34)

Paul's claim that some say, "there is no resurrection of the dead" (15:12), has been read to designate a variety of views: (1) a Hellenistic notion of immortality without a body, which would fit the Corinthians' dualistic culture and make sense of Paul's concern with the "body" throughout the letter (cf. e.g. 6:19; 12:27); (2) a "realized eschatology" that posits that a spiritual resurrection has already taken place (cf. 4:8); (3) an Epicurean rejection of any afterlife (cf. 15:19, 32); or (4) a denial of the resurrection of corpses themselves, which might have seemed like base superstition. The immediate context itself suggests that Paul's main concern lies in affirming Christ's bodily resurrection as the preamble to the end-time resurrection of all (15:22; cf. Rom 8:11).

To nullify the "resurrection of the dead," Paul believes, is to deny the resurrection of Christ (15:13, 16) and, in turn, both the gospel proclamation itself (15:14) and the Corinthians' resulting faith (15:14, 17). In other words, without the general resurrection of the dead, the entire basis of believers' life in Christ comes crashing down. Underlying this claim is the (thoroughly Jewish) emphasis on resurrection not as an isolated individual's destiny but as the cosmic expression of God's decisive victory over death.

To make this point more explicit, Paul situates Christ's resurrection within the broader landscape of apocalyptic drama. Depicting Christ as the "first fruits" (15:20, 23; cf. Exod 23:19) and as a new "Adam" (15:22; cf. Rom 5:12–21), Paul elongates the timeframe of that drama in two directions: not only does Christ's story find its roots in "the beginning," but his resurrection also heralds the coming "end." In his concern with the "order" (15:23) of the unfolding saga, Paul situates the Corinthians squarely within the temporary reign of Christ, who is subjecting all evil, and lastly death, before relinquishing ultimate power to the kingdom of God (15:24–28). Such a plotting of the eschatological timetable helps Paul explain the temporal delay between Christ's resurrection and the resurrection of "those who belong to Christ" (15:23), a delay that grows increasingly problematic in early Christianity.

Subverting the tendency to locate hope "for this life only" (15:19), Paul also mentions his own experience of bodily suffering. Consistent with his appeal for sacrificial living based in his own experience (4:9–13), he maintains, "I die every day" (15:31). His motivation comes from more than "merely human hopes" (15:32); thus he endures hardship and steers clear of self-indulgence (15:32), lest his long-term destiny fade from view. The "sober and right mind" (15:34) to which he calls the Corinthians counters the licentiousness that might naturally follow from the denial of coming resurrection.

C. Resurrection of the Spiritual Body (15:35–58)

Paul forges somewhat of a middle ground as he explains the nature of the resurrection he affirms. By distinguishing physical body (so̅ma psychikon, 15:44) or flesh (sarx, 15:39, 50: "flesh and blood"), which is perishable (15:53–54), from the spiritual body (so̅ma pneumatikon, 15:44), which is imperishable (15:53–54), he insists on the bodily nature of resurrection even as he denies the resuscitation of corpses.

Paul turns to the natural world to illustrate such a distinction. From agriculture, he borrows the example of seeds whose bodies differ from the grain they produce (15:38–39). Next, he differentiates diverse earthly bodies (humans, animals, birds, and fish) and heavenly bodies (sun, moon, stars), as well as the glory afforded them (15:39–41). Applying these observations to the question about the resurrection body seems for Paul to be a simple logical step. Sown in "dishonor" and "weakness," the perishable body will be raised in "glory" and "power" (15:43).

Paul returns to the Adam-Christ typology (see above, 15:22) to develop the succession from the physical to the spiritual body. While Adam, as a "man of dust" (15:47) serves as prototype for the physical body, Christ as last Adam functions as the "man of heaven" (15:48) who has become a life-giving spirit (15:45). Paul puts the contrast between the two types in this way: "Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we will also bear the image of the man of heaven" (15:49). While some textual variants read the clause's main verb as a cohortative ("let us bear . . ."), the future tense reading better fits Paul's interest in the resurrection of the dead at Christ's coming.

To bring the matter to a close, Paul clarifies his position: "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (15:50). How then will the dead be raised? Again invoking apocalyptic language, Paul calls the matter a "mystery" (15:51; cf. 2:1, 7; 4:1; 13:2; 14:2) and shifts his discourse from probative explanation to hymnic affirmation: "we will all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet" (15:51–52). In that instant, the final defeat of evil will culminate in victory over death itself (15:26). As he does when he grapples with the mysteries of God elsewhere (cf. Rom 11:33–36), Paul concludes with a word of praise: "but thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (15:57).

VI. Closing (16:1–24)

A. Collection for the Saints (16:1–4)

The cryptic allusion to the Jerusalem collection (cf. Gal 2:10; 2 Cor 8, 9) suggests the Corinthians' awareness of it, and its place near the letter's conclusion hints at its political ramifications. If Paul promotes the mending of factionalism within the Corinthian congregation, seeking monetary support for the mother church in Palestine displays his impulse toward reconciliation on a broader scale.

The delicate nature of the collection task is not lost on Paul, who promotes weekly contributions to the cause so that "collections need not be taken when I come" (16:2). (This verse contains the earliest known reference to "the first day of the week," which may already be recognized as a Christian Sabbath.) Paul does intend to shepherd the gift's delivery, when, after he arrives in Corinth, he will "send any whom you approve" (16:3) to Jerusalem and will accompany them "if it seems advisable that I should go also" (16:4). By involving the Corinthians as both monetary participants and as human ambassadors in this collection, he promotes clear relational ties to the Jerusalem church.

B. Future Plans (16:5–12)

As the letter draws to a close, Paul announces a tentative itinerary. He has already disclosed plans to travel to Corinth "soon" (4:19); now he declares that he will visit "after passing through Macedonia" (16:5). More than simply providing a timetable, Paul presents his imminent return as evidence of his relational commitment to the Corinthian community, where he hopes "to spend some time with you, if the Lord permits" (16:7). He also notes a similar commitment to the church at Ephesus, where "a wide door for effective work has opened to me, and there are many adversaries" (16:9). For Paul, fruitful ministry does not entail the absence of conflict but seemingly its very presence.

For some reason, Paul apparently changed course and stopped briefly in Corinth between his trip to Ephesus and his tour of Macedonia, though he still meant to return to Corinth for a longer period before launching to Judea (2 Cor 1:16). From his report in 2 Corinthians, things did not go well. It was such a "painful visit" (2 Cor 2:1) that he decided to write a letter to give the embers of conflict a chance to die down before his return.

Paul also alerts the Corinthians to anticipated visits by his co-workers. Timothy has already been sent (see 4:17); anticipating potential conflict, Paul advises the Corinthians about their conduct toward his emissary "when Timothy comes" (16:10; NRSV, "if"). Since Apollos has been named earlier in the letter (1:12) as a leader around whom a (rival?) faction has rallied, Paul's explicit endorsement for Apollos's visit (16:12), whenever it occurs, promotes the unity he has fostered throughout the letter.

C. Exhortation and Greetings (16:13–24)

The apostle concludes with words of encouragement and personal greetings from other believers as well as himself. He frames the letter's ending section with eschatological reminders of the Lord's coming. The injunction to "keep alert, stand firm in your faith, be courageous, be strong" (16:13) summons the Corinthians to keen anticipation of the day of the Lord (cf. 1 Thess 5:6, 10) and reverberates in the citation of the Aramaic expression maranatha ("Our Lord, come," 16:22). The word may have been a catchword for the Corinthians, who otherwise would have known little Aramaic. Though it can be translated in the indicative ("our Lord has come"), the imperative better coheres with the letter's tendency to orient present Christian conduct toward the future reality of Christ's return (11:26; 15:28).

Within such an eschatological context, Paul draws attention to key relationships within the Pauline association of Gentile churches. Paul commends individual believers such as Stephanas (cf. 1:16), Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who have together served as intermediaries between the Corinthians and the apostle (16:15–18); he also delivers greetings from the "churches of Asia" and "Aquila and Prisca, together with the church in their house" (16:19; cf. Acts 18:1–3; Rom 16:3–5), as well as from "all the brothers and sisters" (16:20). Paul's ministry throughout the Mediterranean is vast, and he wants individual congregations to view their own ministry in this expansive light.

Though the letter has included sharp rebuke, Paul brings his personal greeting to a close with these words: "My love be with all of you in Christ Jesus" (16:24). Just as he has exhorted them to "let all that you do be done in love" (16:14), he offers himself as example (cf. 11:1). The phrase "in Christ Jesus" underscores the notion that the relationship forged between apostle and congregation is not merely social but intrinsically sacramental as well.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

G. Bray, ed. Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture VII: 1–2 Corinthians (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1999); T. Engberg-Pedersen. Paul and the Stoics (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); G. D. Fee. The First Epistle to the Corinthians. NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); D. M. Hay, ed. Pauline Theology, Volume 2: 1 & 2 Corinthians (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); R. B. Hays. First Corinthians. Interpretation (Louisville: John Knox, 1997); D. B. Martin. The Corinthian Body (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995); M. M. Mitchell. Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation: An Exegetical Investigation of the Language and Composition of 1 Corinthians (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); G. Theissen. The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); A. C. Thiselton. First Corinthians: A Shorter Exegetical and Pastoral Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); B. Witherington, III. Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995).

2 CORINTHIANS

CRAIG S. KEENER

OVERVIEW

The major scholarly debate with regard to 2 Corinthians is its unity; this debate affects how we reconstruct the letter's situation. Some scholars believe that our current letter combines as many as six shorter letters or letter fragments; many others accept only the division between chs. 1–9 and chs. 10–13 (where the shift in thought is most abrupt). Because ancient writers, including Paul, often used digressions and framing devices, an increasing number of scholars also favor the letter's unity as it stands. Following the preference of contemporary literary criticism to read literary works as a whole when possible, we seek here especially to explain 2 Corinthians as a unity, while aware that many scholars construe the evidence differently in terms of sources, especially regarding the transition between 9:15 and 10:1.

In possible contrast to the earlier situation in 1 Corinthians, "opponents" are clear here (2:17; 3:1; 5:12; 10:12; 11:4, 12–14). That they were Jews (11:22) tells us little about them, since in this period most of Paul's allies and rivals alike were Jews. In contrast to the Jerusalem apostles, these Jewish rivals are apparently rhetorically proficient, a high value in Corinth (11:5–6).

Although the teachers' presence is most clear in chs. 10–13, their criticisms of Paul would explain why he must earlier emphasize his own apostleship in chs. 3–6, and why he is concerned that some are alienating the Corinthian believers from him (2:17–3:1; 5:20–6:1; 6:11–7:2). They may have also criticized his collection for the poor in Jerusalem; thus Paul addresses this collection (chs. 8–9, the heart of the letter) and greed (2:17; cf. 4:2) before confronting them at the end (12:14–18). His rivals may question his apostleship (3:1; 12:12) and refusal to accept pay (2:17; 11:7–9), whereas he rejects their criteria for commending themselves (5:12; 10:10–18). Although saving his direct criticism for the end of the letter, Paul is also preparing the Corinthians for it.

Because these rival teachers vie for the Corinthians' loyalty, Paul must quickly resolve any other conflicts between him and some Corinthians. Following rhetorical custom, Paul may reserve his more direct challenge to the rival teachers for the end. In the meantime, Paul's defense of his apostolic ministry reveals some deep working assumptions of this theology. His ministry is outwardly characterized by suffering but inwardly characterized by glory and power (2:14–7:1). As with the cross, only the true eyes of faith will discern its real nature. Paul's present experience of the eschatological Spirit (cf. e.g., 4:16–18; 5:5, 13; 12:1–4) provides him a window into reality that transcends earthly perspectives.

Paul's two defenses of his apostolic ministry (1:12–7:16; 10:1–13:10) frame the urgent issue of the collection—which his rival's criticisms risk hurting. Paul's extensive focus on the collection also reveals another important Pauline conviction: divine concern for the needy.

Throughout the letter, even where he challenges them most firmly (chs. 10–13), Paul's deep love for the Corinthian believers comes through. Paul threatens discipline, yet his reluctance to carry it out invites criticism. His protests are loving, and his tender affection for the believers in Corinth offers a model of pastoral theology.

Paul's letter probably did prove successful: later he did spend a few months with them (Acts 20:3, 6; Rom 15:26).

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1:1–11)

II. Paul's Ministry to the Corinthians (1:12–7:16)

A. Dealing with the Corinthians (1:12–2:13)

1:12–22. Paul's Reliability

1:23–2:11. Discipline and Forgiveness

2:12–13. Paul's Anxiety over Titus

B. Paul and True Ministry (2:14–7:4)

2:14–17. Perspectives on God's Captive

3:1–18. Glory of the Greater Covenant

4:1–15. Glory in Weak Vessels

4:16–5:10. Future Hope for God's Servants

5:11–6:10. Faithful Ambassadors of Reconciliation

6:11–7:4. Choose Paul over Belial

C. Repentant Response to Paul's Letter (7:5–16)

III. Sacrificially Supporting the Saints (8:1–9:15)

A. Examples of Sacrificial Giving (8:1–15)

B. Two Delegations (8:16–9:5)

C. Harvesting Honor for God's Seed (9:6–15)

IV. Confronting the Rivals (10:1–13:10)

A. The Meek Writer's Competitors (10:1–18)

B. Compelled to Counter His Opponents' Folly (11:1–21a)

C. Boasting as a Fool in His Sufferings (11:21b–33)

D. Boasting as a Fool in Revelations (12:1–10)

E. Summary and Final Appeal (12:11–18)

F. Warning About Paul's Visit (12:19–13:10)

V. Closing (13:11–14)

I. Introduction (1:1–11)

Letters opened by announcing the identity of the sender(s), then listed their addressees. Corinth was capital of the Roman province of Achaia. "Achaia" constituted much of Greece; at least forty settlements surrounded Corinth itself. A prosperous Roman colony in Greece, Corinth housed Roman citizens, Greek residents, and settlers from abroad. "Grace" (charis) sounded like the traditional Greek greeting (chairein), and "peace" was the standard Jewish greeting (already combined by some Jews; 2 Bar. 78:2). Such phrases were equivalent to "God bless you," and invoked a deity for blessing (here including both the Father and Jesus as divine; 1:2).

The blessing of praise that Paul then uses (1:3–5) follows a traditional Jewish form (the berakah; e.g., Ps 72:18–19); for whatever reason, it substitutes here for Paul's usual thanksgiving for his recipients. In 1:3–11, Paul praises God for comforting him and his coworkers in the face of sufferings, including potentially deadly perils in Ephesus (cf. 1 Cor 15:32). These sufferings and God's help become a theme running through most of 2 Corinthians, distinguishing Paul from his opponents. Paul also appeals to and reiterates the intimate relationship he has with the Corinthian believers.

II. Paul's Ministry to the Corinthians (1:12–7:16)

A. Dealing with the Corinthians (1:12–2:13)

1:12–22. Paul's Reliability. Various kinds of works in antiquity began with narratives summarizing the events that led to the work's writing. Before Paul dares confront the major issues with the false teachers, he must clear up a misunderstanding. The church was disappointed with Paul's failure to follow through on his visit, when they hoped to show him hospitality (1:15–16).

Greco-Roman culture despised fickleness and unreliability, so Paul reiterates his integrity (1:12, which may serve as a thesis statement for at least this part of the letter). He emphasizes his transparency (1:13), and later his "sincerity" (2:17) and "frankness" (3:12; 7:4). He and the Corinthians may affectionately boast in each other (1:14; 5:12). Paul's change of travel plans reflected no fickleness (1:17).

To some of Paul's critics, who suspected his dishonesty (12:16–18), Paul's change of plans reflected a more fundamental character flaw than a mere schedule conflict. If they could not trust Paul's promise to visit, why should they trust his apostolic message (an issue Paul must confront in 1:18–22 and more fully in 2:14–7:4)? Some probably also suspected Paul's motives regarding the collection, even as time to provide it was coming due (chs. 8–9).

Paul thus replies that his ministry is grounded in a God who is trustworthy regarding his promises (1:18–20); God confirmed that integrity by advancing them the Spirit as the down payment of future blessing (1:21–22).

1:23–2:11. Discipline and Forgiveness. Now Paul explains that the real reason he had delayed coming to Corinth (cf. 1:15–17) was to spare them (1:23). Paul did not want to have to discipline them (2 Cor 2:1), hence confronted them in a letter first to test their obedience (2:9). His failure to carry through on promised threats to come administer discipline (cf. 1 Cor 4:18–21) would lead some of his critics to mock him for "meekly" confronting them by letters rather than in person (10:1–11).

Paul sent this "tearful letter" (2:4) with Titus, hoping to provoke them to repentance before his coming, lest he have to inflict discipline. Until Titus returned to him, however (shortly before the letter he is now writing, 2 Corinthians), Paul did not know the Corinthians' response (7:6–7). With Titus' return, Paul discovered that the Corinthians had repented, obeying the tearful letter (7:7–11).

The church had complied with his demand that they discipline the sin among them. Consequently, the man needing punishment had come to repentance, and they could now forgive him (2:5–11). (Scholars differ over whether the man in question is the same as the person mentioned in 1 Cor 5:1–5, as most church fathers thought, or a vocal critic of Paul, or both.) "Putting" someone "to the test" (2:9) was sometimes a sign of affection (cf. 8:8). What is most obvious here, as throughout 2 Corinthians, is Paul's pastoral affection for the Corinthians.

2:12–13. Paul's Anxiety over Titus. Ancient travel was precarious, and individuals hoping to rendezvous sometimes missed each other. Although Paul had much success in Troas (in northern Asia Minor), he feared how the Corinthians had responded to his letter, since Titus, whom he had sent to them, had not returned. So Paul crossed the Aegean into Macedonia (probably starting in Philippi), hoping to meet Titus on his way from Corinth (see 7:5–7, 13).

B. Paul and True Ministry (2:14–7:4)

2:14–17. Perspectives on God's Captive. Paul digresses so radically in 2:14–7:4 that some plausibly think this portion is a separate letter that has been accidentally inserted. Although that proposal would work well with electronic text or maybe misplaced pages (if they conveniently ended with sentences!), it makes less sense with the sort of documents available in the first century. This section cannot be the letter Paul sent with Titus (2:3–4), though it may draw from Paul's ruminations while waiting to hear their response. Ancient speakers and writers sometimes digressed at length to build suspense and make a point (e.g., Pliny N.H. 28–32; Dio Chrysostom 36.1–7). If Paul is making such a rhetorical move, he is breaking off at the height of suspense and his love for the Corinthians (2:12–13) to begin his digression about his apostolic ministry.

Being led as captives in triumphal procession is not an image of honor to the captives: they were executed afterward. Paul portrays himself as one bound for death—like the crucified Jesus. To those without faith, such a state signified only death, but those with faith found life in it. Paul develops the theme further afterward: the mere letter brings death, but the Spirit brings life (3:6); true perception matters (5:7, 12, 16). God's servants appear to be dying on the outside, but in reality have eternal life (4:11–5:4).

God's servants' sufferings confirm their sincerity, contrasting them with those who simply do ministry for profit (2:17)—perhaps a backhanded warning against the opponents (cf. 5:12; 10:12; 11:13–14).

3:1–18. Glory of the Greater Covenant. Influential people often wrote "recommendation letters" to ask favors on behalf of those who depended on the writers (e.g., Cicero Fam. 13 passim). Although Paul rejects the need for formal letters of recommendation, he is forced at times to "recommend" himself again to the Corinthians, reminding them of what they should already know for themselves. Self-boasting was considered inappropriate unless people were forced to do it—as Paul felt he was by them (cf. 12:11).

Instead, the Corinthians' own faith constituted Christ's recommendation of Paul and his colleagues (3:2–3). People sometimes spoke of laws written in hearts (e.g., Plato Gorg. 784B; Laws 690B; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.178), but in 3:3 and 6 Paul alludes specifically to Ezek 36:26–27 and Jer 31:31–34, both passages about Israel's end-time obedience. Ezekiel promised that God's people's hearts would no longer be "stony" (hard); instead, God's Spirit would make them obedient. Paul also contrasts God writing on hearts rather than (as at Sinai) on stone tablets (Exod 31:18); this contrast fits the promise of the new covenant that he mentions, in which God would write laws on hearts (Jer 31:31–34).

Paul was therefore confident in his ministry (2 Cor 3:4; cf. 3:12; 4:1; 5:6); it was God who made them "competent" (3:5–6, answering the question in 2:16, where the same term is translated, "sufficient"). In 3:6 Paul develops the new covenant image of 3:3, which implies moral transformation (Jer 31:31–34); mere letters written with ink (or in stone) can bring only the law's death sentence for violations, but the Spirit can inscribe believers' hearts so they can obey the law's principles (cf. 2 Cor 3:9; also Rom 8:2–4).

In 3:7–11, Paul develops the logical premise that the new covenant's glory must be greater than that of the old covenant under Moses; Paul develops the point by repetition, antithesis (contrasts), and "how much more" arguments, all readily recognizable to his contemporaries (e.g., 4 Ezra 4:30; m. Ab. 1:5; Sipre Deut. 1.8.2–3). New covenant glory, unlike Moses', was permanent and greater—but is the glory of the Spirit within rather than without. Moses' revelation was incomplete, because no one could see God and live (Exod 33:20); the new covenant glory is complete and does not kill. It is a ministry producing righteousness (2 Cor 3:7), because the law is in the heart.

In 3:12–18, Paul contrasts the concealed (though visible) nature of Moses' glory with the public (though inward) nature of new covenant glory. The Greek version of Exod 34:29–30, 35 claims that Moses was "glorified"; but though the glory was only temporary, Moses had to hide it, since Israel could not bear it. Paul, by contrast, can speak frankly (openly) (2 Cor 3:12; cf. 2:17; 4:2, 13); his "transformation" did not injure his viewers. Without Christ, Moses' followers have only the old covenant, perceiving only the veiled measure of glory (3:13–16). Yet just as Moses removed the veil to talk with God, so one who turns to Christ sees the glory unveiled (3:14–16).

In Exod 33–34, Moses saw part of "the LORD's" glory; here, participants in the new covenant experience the Spirit (hence, "the LORD" of Exodus "is the Spirit," 2 Cor 3:17). Just as Moses was transformed by seeing part of God's glory, so are participants in the new covenant transformed progressively into God's glorious image as they behold God's glory (3:18). Perhaps the Corinthians questioned how much their characters had been transformed, but they could not question the character of Paul, who had brought them the new covenant message (cf. 13:5–6). Many Greek thinkers believed that meditating on a deity's "pure," emotionless character made one like the deity (cf. e.g., Maximus of Tyre 11.9–12); many Jewish mystics sought visions of the divine (e.g., b. Hag. 14b, bar.). Paul is not interested in the passionless divinity of Platonic philosophy; rather, he believes that one meets God's glory in Jesus, God's purest image (4:4). Some Jewish thinkers conversant with Greek thought depicted divine Wisdom as a mirror revealing God's glory (Wis 7:26); but for Paul Wisdom is concrete in Jesus.

4:1–15. Glory in Weak Vessels. Despite opposition, Paul and his colleagues take courage (4:1), as elsewhere in the context (3:4, 12; 4:16). Philosophers emphasized such courage, but in contrast to them, the reason Paul offers for his courage is God's grace involved in his new covenant ministry (alluding back to ch. 3). His "open" presentation of truth (4:2) contrasts with Moses' veil (3:12–13); his persistent denial of "falsifying" God's message (4:2) may contrast with his opponents (cf. 2:17).

Just as a "veil" kept Israel from seeing God's glory (3:13–16), so now the good news was "veiled" from unbelievers (4:3). They could not see the gospel's glory because the god of this age had blinded them (4:4). Paul contrasts the situations in 4:4 and 4:6: the god of this age blinded unbelievers' minds, lest the light of Christ's glory shine in them, but the true God has shined the light of his glory in our hearts. In view of the contrast, most scholars think that "the god of this age" refers to the devil (some ancient interpreters thought of God, and others of the devil); cf. a false "god" in Phil 3:19.

Christ is God's "image" here (4:4, 6). Many Jews thought of divine Wisdom as God's "image" (see comment on 3:18); for Paul, such titles rightly belong to Christ. God made light shine in darkness in the first creation, and continues to do so in the new creation in Christ (4:6; cf. 5:17). (In addition to alluding to creation, Paul's wording alludes to the Greek version of Isa 9:1–2, which goes on to speak of the Messiah.)

Paul preached not himself but Christ (4:5); thus he was ready to acknowledge his own weakness alongside Christ's glory (4:7–11). As Paul earlier emphasized apostolic suffering (2:14–16) yet internal renewal by Christ's glory (3:6–18), so he does here. Archaeologists observe that Corinth manufactured many cheap pots, and such pots were easily discarded (cf. Ps 31:12; Jer 19:11). God's glory and power are hidden in outwardly weak vessels like Paul, so God may receive the honor (4:7).

Paul illustrates the contrast between his external weakness and the resurrection glory of Christ within him in 4:8–11. Here Paul follows an ancient literary form used by philosophers and others to validate their integrity: lists of sufferings (see also 6:3–10; 11:23–33; cf. 1 Cor 4:9–13; e.g., Maximus of Tyre 34.9; see most thoroughly Fitzgerald). Such lists reveal Paul's perseverance (11:23–33), but Paul especially underlines here God's power revealed in his weakness (4:7; cf. 12:9; 13:3–4). As a sharer in Christ's suffering, Paul also depends on resurrection power; he was being transformed into Christ's image (3:18).

Following Jesus' example, Paul was to suffer on behalf of the church (4:12, 15), ultimately for God's glory (4:15). Paul's allusion in 4:13 to Ps 116:10 may evoke the psalm's context of a righteous sufferer whom God has delivered. Corinthians understood the ancient civic practice (reflected in Seneca Ben. passim and many inscriptions) where benefactors contributed good to the public welfare, in turn receiving honor. Here God receives honor (4:15).

4:16–5:10. Future Hope for God's Servants. Paul is prepared to suffer in view of the resurrection life, which was already at work within him (4:8–11). His body suffered, but God kept renewing him (4:16–18; 5:5; cf. 1:9–10); this renewal constituted a foretaste of the ultimate resurrection even of his body and that of others (4:14; 5:1–4).

Suffering for Christ, Paul is inwardly renewed (4:16), i.e., conformed more to Christ's image (3:18; cf. Rom 12:2; Col 3:10). Present sufferings invited eternal glory to which the sufferings were barely comparable (4:17; cf. Rom 8:18). (Paul also knew—though the Corinthians might have not—that the Hebrew word for "glory" also meant "weight.") Greek thinkers often spoke of what was invisible and unchanging in the heavens as being eternal, in contrast to the visible, transitory matters on earth. Paul in 4:18 partly agrees, because he already, although in a hidden way, shares Christ's resurrection life (4:7–11). Eventually his body will also share in the resurrection life (4:14; 5:1–4). Thus Paul does not agree with Greeks who viewed the body as merely the soul's prison or tomb (cf. even Philo Alleg. Interp. 1.108). Nor does he believe, with some Greeks, that meditating on a "divine" entity in the heavens would liberate his soul from the body (cf. Seneca Nat. Q. 1. pref. 6, 11–13; Philo Spec. Laws 3.1); he was already united with Christ and now suffered with him, so he could be assured of resurrection life affecting every aspect of his person.

In 5:1–4 Paul is clear that his goal is not to be disembodied—"unclothed"—but rather to receive a permanent, heavenly sort of body. Some scholars think that Paul speaks of an intermediate body received at death in these verses, but it seems likely that he is simply countering the fear of disembodiment with the promise of future embodiment. Too much of his language echoes his earlier discussion of the resurrection body in 1 Cor 15 for this to be a coincidence (perishable vs. imperishable, 1 Cor 15:42, 50–53; earthly vs. heavenly, 15:49; the mortal clothed with what is not, 15:53–54).

He does not claim in 5:1 that we get the new body ("house") when our earthly body ("tent") dies; rather, we "have" it now, not because we are already resurrected, but because it belongs to us through the down payment of the Spirit (5:5). Thus, though Paul walks by faith and not yet sight (5:7), he trusts Christ's promise of this future body even while he shares Christ's sufferings.

Paul may depict the body as a "house" (5:1) because it is God's (1 Cor 6:19), and Jews expected God to make a new temple. Everyone would also understand his image of the body as "clothing" (5:2–4), since this was a common image of the day (e.g., Seneca Ep. Lucil. 66.3; Epictetus Diatr. 1.25.21). In contrast to Greeks who exercised naked (e.g., Diogenes Ep. 37) or Greek and Roman Gentiles who frequented Corinth's many public baths, most Jews felt that nakedness was shameful (e.g., Jub. 3:21–22; 1QS 7.12–14).

Philosophers often spoke of earthly passions as "weighing down" the soul, obstructing its ascent to the "pure" heavens ("burden" in 5:4 is a related term to "weigh down"; cf. 4:17). But Paul's response to the "burden" in 5:4 is "groaning," like birth pangs awaiting a new body (see Rom 8:23). The Spirit was a "pledge"—literally, a "down payment," a "first installment" on God's future promise (5:5). The Spirit's renewing him in the face of present obstacles reaffirmed the guarantee.

Ancient thinkers sometimes weighed whether it was better to live with suffering or to die (e.g., Cicero Quint. 1.3.1–2; Seneca Ep. Lucil. 58.36; Dial. 7.20.5). Paul's yearning was for a resurrection body more than for death, yet he valued even death (if God gave it) as rest from suffering, because he would be with the Lord undistracted (5:6–8). He could do this because of faith rather than sight (5:7)—depending on the eternal reality that is unseen (4:18).

What mattered from a genuinely eternal perspective was that his (and others') lives pleased the one who would judge them (5:9–10). This "fear of the Lord" (5:11) motivated Paul's preaching.

5:11–6:10. Faithful Ambassadors of Reconciliation. Because of their eternal perspective (4:16–5:10) that includes a view of the future judgment (5:10), God's servants stand in awe ("fear") of God, and hence must preach him (5:11). Paul thus claims to be Christ's agent with integrity—yet the Corinthians were not heeding him.

Paul emphasizes that he has left his heart open, and the Corinthians know it (5:11). His rivals boast merely in appearance, but the heart is what matters (5:12, using the language of 1 Sam 16:7). The term for "appearance" here (proso̅pon) is the same used for "face" in 3:7, 13, where Moses received the veiled outward glory instead of (as in 3:18) the greater glory of the new covenant.

Paul explains that he is not boasting in himself (5:12, as in 3:1); apparently some Corinthians have complained about his previous defenses (see comment on 11:1). Paul is not boasting, he says, but giving them the opportunity to boast about him, as he does about them (1:14; 7:14; 9:2–3).

But even like Moses, Paul has greater freedom of heart with the Lord (5:13). Many "normal" people regarded being "beside oneself" in prophetic ecstasy or a philosophic worldview as madness (e.g., 2 Kgs 9:11; Diogenes Laertius 6.3.82), but prophets and philosophers often countered with the opposite perspective (e.g., Epictetus Diatr. 1.12.9; 1.21.4). Like Moses veiling himself in public, Paul did not publicly boast of his private spiritual experiences, except when he needed to do so (12:2–4; cf. 1 Cor 14:18).

Not only wise fear (5:11), but also love (5:14) motivates the mission. Paul interprets the cross from the perspective of God's purpose, rather than the world's perspective of it as folly (cf. 2:15–16; 1 Cor 1:18–25); even regarding Christ, external, temporal perspectives are inadequate (5:16). Those who embrace Christ's death for them die to themselves and live for Christ in union with him (5:14–15). This is an internal transformation rather than outward appearance. Therefore, evaluation based on a "human point of view" (other translations: the "flesh") or appearance is useless and void (5:16). The proper basis for evaluation is not externals, but the eschatological life already at work within (5:17). Those with the down payment of the Spirit (5:5) have begun sharing Christ's resurrection life.

In view of all this, Paul, having been transformed as God's agent, appeals to the Corinthians to let this same "internal" and future gospel genuinely transform them (5:18–6:2). In ancient Mediterranean culture, true "reconciliation" or friendship with one required accepting the friend's friends and rejecting the friend's enemies (see Marshall). The Corinthians cannot be reconciled to God while rejecting God's agent and welcoming his rivals (cf. 6:14–16; Luke 10:16; Exod 16:8).

Paul and his coworkers have received the "ministry" and "message" of reconciliation (5:18–19) as "ambassadors" for Christ (5:20) and representatives of God's righteousness (5:21). (Paul would undoubtedly apply the principle to all believers who share the gospel with others.) The Corinthian Christians, by contrast, must now be reconciled to God (5:20), lest they have accepted his grace in vain (6:1)! Paul is seeking to seize their attention with dramatic language (cf. 1 Cor 6:9–11; Gal 5:4) to show the Corinthians that they must live consistently with their conversion. Jesus becoming "sin," though sinless (2 Cor 5:21), presumably involves his representative suffering for sin, perhaps combining Old Testament images of unblemished offerings with the scapegoat used to embody Israel's sin (Lev 1:3; 16:21–22).

Paul reiterates the invitation in 6:1, urging them not to "accept the grace of God in vain." Paul often uses such language to warn against failing to persevere in the faith (1 Cor 15:2; Gal 4:11; Phil 2:16). Paul underlines this invitation by appealing in 6:2 to Isa 49:8, showing that the time for salvation has come. The context in Isaiah includes the good news of God's reconciliation with God's people (Isa 52:7); Paul believes that Christ has inaugurated this time (2 Cor 5:18–19).

Paul returns to defending his ministry in 6:3–10, underlining its integrity with a list of sufferings that also should generate sympathy (ancients often appealed to rhetorical pathos; e.g., Rhet. Alex. 34, 1439b15–1440b3; Quintilian Inst. 6.2.20) from the Corinthians who know the sacrifices he has made for them. Contemporary orators produced lists like Paul's here, listing some elements sharing one parallel form, then others in another parallel form, and so forth (cf. e.g., lists in Seneca Ep. Lucil. 95.58; Test. Jos. 1:4–7). Paul lists nine sufferings (in Greek, each is prefaced by "in"; 6:4–5); eight virtues (6:6–7, also with "in"); and ten antitheses manifesting God's power in his weakness (6:7–10, three using the Greek dia, "through"; and seven using "as . . . and"). Lists of virtues (6:6–7) were common (cf. Gal 5:22–23; Phil 4:8), as vice lists were (cf. Rom 1:29–31; 1 Cor 5:10–11; 6:9–10; Gal 5:19–21). Like such orators, Paul also employs some oxymorons to shock his hearers into attention (cf. the philosopher Musonius Rufus 9, p. 74.10–12 Lutz).

While not "boasting" (3:1; 5:12), Paul will recount his sufferings; sages used lists of sufferings to demonstrate their integrity (see comment on 4:8–11). Although Paul labors to avoid giving people any opportunity to find fault with his ministry (6:3–4), people publicly humiliate (6:5) and slander (6:8) him (prison, beatings, and manual labor all exposed one to others' reproach). Yet the issue is not how those who perish view him, but how those with God's true perspective view him (cf. 2:15–16; 4:3–4; 5:12, 16). Living though dying (6:9, evoking Ps 118:17) in particular reiterates sharing Christ's sufferings yet also resurrection power (cf. 1:9–10; 4:10–17). His poverty (6:10) should allay any suspicions that he might abuse the collection (12:16–18; cf. chs. 8–9); it also reflects Jesus' example, who also became poor to enrich others (8:9).

6:11–7:4. Choose Paul over Belial. After defending his ministry's integrity at length (2:14–6:10), Paul now turns to a rousing call to separation from what is evil (6:14–7:1), framed by an emotional appeal to embrace his ministry (6:11–13; 7:2–4). Writers and speakers would sometimes build their argument to an emotional climax, as Paul does here (in a more specialized form, cf. Rhet. Her. 4.34–35; Demetrius Style 5.270). Wronged leaders and lovers sometimes composed affectionate protests to emphasize the depth of their affection (e.g., Cicero Att. 1.5, 9, 12; 7.10; Fronto Ad Verum Imp. 1.3); although this passage does involve real conflict, it also exudes affection. Paul invites the Corinthians to make a choice; just as in the Roman partisan politics and system of alliances Corinth knew so well, they cannot maintain good terms with both Paul and his rivals. Being truly reconciled to God entails being reconciled with Christ's agent, Paul (2 Cor 5:20–6:2; 6:11–13), and rejecting paganizing "unbelievers" (6:14–16).

Paul's frank speech (6:11) is literally an "opened mouth," corresponding to his open heart in 6:11 and 13. This evokes his recent affirmations of his frank speech (cf. 3:12; 4:2; 5:12), which ancients associated with genuine friendship. Paul tells the Corinthians that they are the ones who have closed off the relationship, and that he desires reconciliation (6:12–13).

Because of the sudden shift in topic, many scholars argue that 6:14–7:1 is a later addition. But Paul often frames his digressions with parallel material (e.g., 1 Cor 6:1, 9; 11:2, 17; 12:31; 14:1), as here (6:11–13; 7:2–4). Moreover, it is the Corinthians' welcome of his rivals that has forced his preceding, impassioned defense in 2:14–6:10; now he demands that the Corinthians choose between them. If Paul elsewhere calls these rivals "Satan's ministers" (11:14–15), their association with Beliar and idols here (6:14–16) makes sense. The Corinthians must choose God's enlightenment or Satan's blinding (4:4–6), Christ's ambassadors (5:20) or Satan's (11:14–15).

The language of being "mismatched with unbelievers" (6:14) literally is "yoked with a different species" (cf. Deut 22:9–11); it may apply to Jews avoiding being associated with idolaters, and was also appropriate language for marital unions (Deut 7:3–4). Paul, however, may apply the principle to the Corinthians' affection for his rivals: Paul seeks to deliver them to Christ as virgins, while Satan's ministers seek to corrupt them spiritually (2 Cor 11:2–4).

A series of rhetorical questions, like the stark antithesis Paul uses in them, would underline Paul's point rhetorically in 6:14–16 (cf. 1 Cor 9:1–13). "Belial" or "Beliar" (6:15) was a common name for Satan in this period (e.g., 1QM 13.11; 15.2–3; Test. Reub. 4:7). Qumran texts sometimes portray the chosen remnant as a temple, an image also used by many early Christians. As the temple set apart for God, the righteous could not contain idols (6:16). Because God was to dwell among them, in this temple (6:16), they had to separate themselves from anything that was unclean (6:17). In 6:16, Paul quotes Lev 26:11–12, a promise conditioned partly on avoiding idols (Lev 26:1, 3). In 6:17, Paul adapts the Greek version of Isa 52:11, involving the Levites who will bring back the temple vessels in the promised time of restoration (a restoration that has already spiritually begun; see 2 Cor 6:2). In 6:18, Paul may adapt different texts, but one is 2 Sam 7:14, which Christians and some others applied to the Messiah. Perhaps Paul uses this text because God's promises apply to Jesus' followers in him (2 Cor 1:20).

In view of such promises to those set apart for God, believers should confirm their holiness (being "set apart") by separating themselves from whatever defiles them (7:1). In the context of 2 Corinthians, this would mean separating themselves from the false teachers.

Finally Paul returns to his plea that they welcome him (7:2–4). After asking them to welcome him, Paul in 7:2 makes three denials of wrongdoing (each beginning in Greek with *ouden*a [no one], such repetition reflecting the ancient rhetorical device anaphora—e.g., Cicero Orator 39.135; Fronto Ad Antoninum Imp. 2.6.1; Ad Verum Imp. 2.1.4), which may be meant to contrast him with the rivals. Willingness to die with someone (7:3) demonstrated the highest level of friendship in antiquity (e.g., Euripides Orest. 652, 1069–74, 1155; Chariton Chaer. 4.3.5; 7.1.7). "I often boast about you" (7:4, NRSV) might instead be translated, "I am being frank with you" (cf. 3:12, using the same word), an accepted sign of friendship in their culture.

C. Repentant Response to Paul's Letter (7:5–16)

At this point Paul resumes the narrative he was recounting at 2:13, before he digressed to defend his ministry (2:14–7:4). Some stylistic features show that Paul had not forgotten the intervening chapters: for example, he continues the first-person plural of 6:11–13 and 7:2–3 (contrast 2:12–13), and some language from 6:12; 7:2 and 4 may reappear here. But now that he has explained why the Corinthians should accept him, he gets on with the story of discovering that they have accepted him (at least regarding his previous demand).

Paul faces external conflicts in Macedonia (7:5); if this includes persecution (as in Asia, 1:8–10), it would fit earlier problems there (Acts 16:22–24; 17:5–13; Phil 1:28–30; 1 Thess 2:18; 3:4). But Paul's "fears within" (2 Cor 7:5) probably include his anxiety over how the Corinthians have responded to the letter he sent with Titus (2:13; for his anxiety for the churches, see 11:28; 1 Thess 2:17–3:5). Thus both Titus' safe arrival and his message about their loyalty to Paul encourage him (2 Cor 7:6–7).

While initially unhappy that his letter caused them pain, Paul recognizes that the pain had been necessary for their good (7:8). Grief is good if it produces repentance that leads to life rather than death (7:9–10; cf. the goal of Paul's ministry in 3:6). Ancient moral writers often portrayed themselves as physicians who had to inflict pain or to open wounds for the sake of healing (e.g., Diogenes Ep. 49; Diogenes Laertius 2.70; 6.1.4; 6.2.30). Ancient persuasion theorists recognized that when gentle admonition failed, speakers might need to use harsher reproof, inflicting shame, grief, fear (cf. 7:11) or other attitudes to produce repentance and change (Stowers, Letter Writing [1986], 133–34, notes parallels in Cicero and Plutarch).

The sixfold rhetorical repetition in 7:11 ("what . . ."; the Greek is still more emphatic) would appeal to an ancient audience. The list climaxes in their readiness to punish or (literally) "avenge," perhaps involving zeal to make up for what has been lost; Paul recalls that principle again in 10:6. Paul's real concern was less the offender (2:5–10), whom they did ultimately discipline, than that the Corinthians would recognize their relationship with Paul and obey him (7:12).

Paul returns to his joy at Titus' coming; they had received Titus and his mission warmly, thereby confirming their love for Paul (7:13–16). In this section Paul reiterates his confidence in the Corinthians (7:14, 16; cf. 7:4), but writers sometimes used such expressions to prepare hearers for a monetary (or other) request—to which Paul will turn in chs. 8–9. Paul is not embarrassed by his "boasting" to Titus (7:12), but he seems anxious about his boast about them regarding the collection (9:4). Their continuing zeal for Paul (7:7, 11) must express itself in maintaining their zeal for the collection as well (9:2). If the well-to-do Corinthian church neglects their promise to help the Jerusalem church, it could risk stalling the collection project as a whole (9:3–4).

III. Sacrificially Supporting the Saints (8:1–9:15)

A. Examples of Sacrificial Giving (8:1–15)

Although not as often as with regard to other divisions, some scholars argue that chs. 8–9 (or at least 9) are separate letters from 1–7. But the more complex argument must always bear the burden of proof, and it is usually easier to account for changes of subject in a single letter than to account for how different letters would be fused into one. Paul has had to deal with relational issues and his ministry before addressing the imminent collection more explicitly. His treatment of issues surrounding Titus' previous visit (7:5–15) leads naturally into those surrounding the next one (8:16–9:5). The collection would afford them opportunity to prove their zeal (7:7, 11; 9:2).

Chapters 8–9 may also prepare for Paul's responses to economic criticisms about him (11:7–12; 12:14–19) and of his agents (12:17–18). Not wanting to appear like a charlatan (2:17; 4:2), Paul has refused to accept the Corinthians' gifts (11:7–9; 12:16–18); he will accept gifts only for the Jerusalem church (9:12–13). (Like Jesus, Paul stressed care for the poor.) In 8–9, Paul manages to avoid speaking explicitly of "money," while using various synonyms common in business documents: e.g., "abundance" (8:2, 7, 14; 9:8, 12, sometimes used for "profit margins"); "grace" (NRSV, "privilege") or "generosity" (8:4, 6–7, 19); "case" (9:3); "undertaking" (9:4); "bountiful gift" (9:5); and "ministry" (leitourgia, 9:12). Paul uses diakonia for both proclamation (3:3, 7–9; 4:1; 5:18; 6:3) and social ministry (8:19–20; 9:1, 12–13).

Probably before Paul and the Corinthians had a disagreement, Paul had boasted of the Corinthians' zeal to the Macedonians (8:24–9:2; for the reverse, see 8:1–8). Now, after the disagreement, he wants to be sure that the Corinthians will follow through on their commitment, or else both he and the Corinthians will be embarrassed when the Macedonian delegation arrives (9:3–4; cf. 8:11). Such an expression of concern is diplomatic—since Titus has already reported back to Paul, Paul undoubtedly knows that the Corinthians are not in fact ready. Thus he is sending Titus to them again (along with some colleagues), to ensure that everything is soon ready (8:6, 16–23; 9:5).

To further encourage Corinthian participation, Paul compares them with the Macedonians (the province to Achaia's northeast; 8:1–8, esp. 8:8). (He has also used the Corinthians' promises to spur the Macedonians, 9:1–5.) Leaders often played on cities' or regions' friendly rivalry to spur action (e.g., Xenophon Cyr. 2.1.22; 7.1.18). If the impoverished Macedonian Christians can give (8:1–5), how much more the prosperous Corinthians (8:6–8)? Philippi and Thessalonica had prosperity, but it had little effect on the poor, and Christians there had been persecuted. By contrast, Corinthian Christians are not suffering, and at least one even holds a civic position of some sort (Rom 16:23).

Giving "according to their means" (8:3) recalls Israel's example in Exod 35:24, although the language was also common for donations (language familiar from ancient business documents appears throughout the section). Ancients sometimes praised highly committed donors as giving "themselves" first (8:5; Danker, II Corinthians, 122, cites OGIS 339.19–20; SIG3 495.125); here the behavior imitates Jesus (8:9). Paul praises their spiritual gifts in a virtue list, inviting them to excel in this matter also (8:7).

The poor Macedonians give beyond their means (8:3), and Jesus, though rich in heavenly glory and power, went beyond even this (8:9; cf. Phil 2:5–8). Ancients praised generous benefactors, but no one expected them to impoverish themselves. Jesus made himself poor to enrich others, an example followed by Paul as well (2 Cor 6:10).

Paul reasons with them concerning what is "appropriate" (a term often used in ancient persuasive texts, 8:10); inscriptions also praised donors for "completing" as well as pledging (8:6, 10–11). Jewish sources recognized giving "according to what one has" (e.g., Tob 4:8, 16). Paul is not trying to make them poor, but to establish "equality," which was also to their own benefit; someday others might help them if they were needy (2 Cor 8:13–14). "Equality" was an ideal in ancient friendships, where it involved even quantitative equality (Plato Laws 8.837AB; Aristotle N.E. 8.7.3, 1158b). Whoever had more than enough should share with whoever had less, emulating the same principle exemplified in the manna: God provided just enough, so no one had too much or too little (8:15, citing Exod 16:18). While keeping the collection voluntary, Paul applies Jesus' teaching about possessions beyond individuals to churches in regions of the world. Churches benefiting from prosperous settings should partner with the churches of poorer nations and regions.

B. Two Delegations (8:16–9:5)

Now that Titus has returned with a good report of his relationship with the Corinthians, Paul is sending him back with a well-known brother (and perhaps others, 8:23). Paul is sending this delegation in advance to make sure that the Corinthian church will be ready before the Macedonian delegation arrives (9:3–5).

Having experienced Corinthian hospitality (7:13–15), Titus is eager to return (8:16–17). Paul writes "letters of recommendation" (cf. 3:1) for Titus (8:16–17, 23) and "the brother" (8:18–19, 22), although the latter case is unusual since recommendations (e.g., Cicero Fam. 13 passim) were not anonymous (though inscriptions do not always name delegates). Perhaps the unnamed delegate would risk persecution if a letter naming him were intercepted (though he traveled with the letter); no consensus exists as to why he remains anonymous.

To preclude scandal (8:20–21), the Macedonians and the Corinthians' own delegates, along with representatives of the other churches, ultimately would carry the collection to Jerusalem, verifying for each of the churches its appropriate delivery (1 Cor 16:3). Financial scandals were common (e.g., Josephus Ant. 18.81–84; I. Eph. 1a.17–19), and the mistrust of some (12:16–18) makes such precautions all the more essential (cf. "blame" in 8:20 with the same Greek term in 6:3). It is not Paul's honor here, but the Lord's own honor ("glory"), that is at stake (8:19, 23).

Titus is Paul's own representative, and the others represent the churches (8:23). The use of apostoloi for "messengers" may resemble a title for Diaspora bearers of the Jerusalem Temple tax (cf. Keith Nickle, The Collection). When ancient letters requested a proof of love (8:24), the request was normally meant affectionately (Fronto Ep. Graecae 6; Ad M. Caes. 3.2).

Many scholars divide ch. 9 from its preceding context, citing 9:1 as assuming that the collection has not been mentioned before. But ancient persuaders sometimes ironically raised a matter while claiming not to raise it (e.g., Phlm 19; Rhet. Her. 4.27.37; Cicero Verr. 2.4.52.116; 2.5.8.20–21), and the opening words of 9:1 in Greek are words that normally allude to preceding lines. In fact, a break between 8:24 and 9:1 is quite unlikely, since they belong to the same context. Paul is addressing the delegation in 8:16–23 and 9:3–5, digressing to remind the Corinthians of his trust in 9:1–2. In 9:1–5 he explains his boasting in 8:24; "brothers" in 9:3 depends on 8:16–24.

Paul is clearly anxious lest the Corinthians fail (9:4–5), but politely expresses confidence in 9:1–2; other ancient writers sometimes struggled to balance confidence and caution in such matters (e.g., Cicero Fam. 3.13). The advance delegation would ensure their readiness before the Macedonians came (9:3–5). The term translated "extortion" (pleonexia) in 9:5 might actually warn against the Corinthians accumulating beyond their needs (pleonazo[–]), while others lack (8:15).

C. Harvesting Honor for God's Seed (9:6–15)

Reaping what one sowed was a standard agricultural principle (9:6, 9–10), often applied in moral settings (e.g., Prov 22:8; Hos 8:7) or to generosity and reciprocity. Paul's rhetorical structure in 9:6 (x ... y/x ... y) would appeal to ancient hearers. Their willing heart (9:7) recalls voluntary gifts in Exod 25:2; 35:5, 21–22, and "not reluctantly" recalls Deut 15:10 (LXX). Ancients praised honorable donors who gave "willingly" (cf. Musonius Rufus 19, p. 122.30 Lutz; Cicero Fam. 13.1.2). God's love for cheerful givers (9:7) recalls a Greek addition to Prov 22:8.

Paul reinforces the point in 9:8, by seven "p" words in one verse (five of them different forms of pas, "every"). The phrase translated "having enough" may mean, "having contentment with what one has," a common emphasis in ancient philosophy (e.g., Epictetus Diatr. 1.1.27; Marcus Aurelius 3.11.2).

In 9:9, Paul quotes Ps 112:9, where the righteous give to the poor, hence their righteousness endures. But Paul knows that God supplies for these righteous givers, and hence in 9:10 alludes to Isa 55:10 (God provides seed for the sower, i.e., for those who scatter in 9:9). Thus God would supply the Corinthians seed to sow, hence increase the harvest of their righteousness as they sowed generously (9:10).

Paul develops the principle in 9:11–15, and his argument would make sense to those steeped in ideas popular in Paul's day. Greek and Roman benefactors, or donors, gave gifts; recipients (often cities) reciprocated by giving the benefactors honor (see Seneca Ben. passim). In 9:11–15, however, the Corinthians' gifts do not earn them honor with the receivers (though they are objects of prayer) so much as the honor goes to God, the ultimate benefactor of all.

IV. Confronting the Rivals (10:1–13:10)

A. The Meek Writer's Competitors (10:1–18)

Although Paul nowhere else starts either a letter or a section with "and I" (NRSV, "I myself"), some think that 10:1 begins a new letter. This suggestion is likelier here than for any other proposed break in the letter, and may well be correct, but even here it remains open to debate. Writers could add addenda to letters, or add a second letter with the same messenger, if new reports came (though they usually specified this; e.g., Cicero Fam. 12.12.5; Att. 8.6).

Paul sometimes shifts suddenly in 2 Corinthians (8:1; 10:1), but he does this also in 1 Corinthians (5:1; 8:1; 12:1; 15:1). Whereas in Romans Paul shifts from theological argument to pastoral application at Rom 12:1, here he shifts from theological argument about true ministry to direct polemic at 2 Cor 10:1. If Paul sometimes sounds in tension with what he wrote earlier, Paul's rhetorical tightrope produces the identical effect even within sections: e.g., Paul both commends (4:2; 6:4) and does not commend (3:1; 5:12) himself. Rhetoric emphasized the value of shifting style and tone to keep a work more lively.

Although Paul has earlier noted his reconciliation with the Corinthians (2:6–11; 7:7–13), he views it as incomplete (5:20–6:2). Paul entreats them to receive him (6:12–13; 7:2), yet in a conciliatory way (7:3–4), as here (cf. 11:11; 12:14–15, 19; 13:7–8). Favoring unity with the rest of 2 Corinthians, Paul probably echoes earlier chapters here: testing them (2:9; 8:8; 13:6); speaking "before God in Christ" (2:17; 12:19); "craftiness" and "deceit" (4:2; 12:16); and especially talk of "boasting," "commendation," and "joy."

Paul's "meekness and gentleness" (10:1) was expressed in sending a corrective letter rather than first coming to impose harsh discipline (1:23–2:4). This kindness imitated Christ (10:1; cf. 8:9; Phil 2:8; Matt 11:29). They should have appreciated this, because people widely praised "meek" rulers, by which they simply meant "merciful" ones who used their power benevolently (Xenophon Cyr. 2.1.30; Tacitus Hist. 2.5).

But for Paul's critics (cf. 10:2), Paul was a weak leader (cf. 11:22), who threatened in letters but would not carry through in person (10:9–11). (This complaint may eventually force Paul to discipline them after all; 12:20–13:2.) They criticized him for acting by "human standards" (10:2), as if he had made his travel plans concerning them by "human standards" (1:17). Paul will soon demonstrate that it is his opponents who act by "human standards" (11:18)!

In reality Paul is strong, but expresses this strength not in harshness but in combating their false worldview (10:3–6). Ancient writers often used military imagery for battles against hostile passions or, as here, ideologies (10:4–5; cf. 2:14; 6:7; cf. Seneca Ep. Lucil. 109.8–9; 117.7, 28; Diogenes Laertius 6.1.13). Far from working by "human standards," Paul depends on God's power for this battle (10:4). Paul sought their complete obedience (10:6): although the Corinthians had begun to "obey" (2:9; 7:15) and "punish" or "avenge" their disobedience (7:11), it could not be complete so long as they welcomed Paul's rivals.

Paul fought their ideas, not the Corinthians themselves, because his authority was to "build" them up (10:8; 12:19; 13:10). The Corinthians themselves should have defended him against his rivals (3:1–2; 5:12; 12:11), but since they did not, Paul is forced to defend himself (10:8; see discussion of "boasting" at 11:1). His critics charge inconsistency (cf. 10:11): Paul was a strong writer but a weak speaker (10:9–10; cf. 11:6; 1 Cor 2:1–5). Greeks and Romans expected speakers to have not only good content but good delivery (e.g., gestures, appearance, dress, accent, voice tone), and evaluated them accordingly (e.g., Cicero Brut. 31.117; 55.203; 66.234; Pliny Ep. 2.3.9; 2.19.2–6). In this case, the Corinthians find Paul forceful in his letters but too "nice" in person (10:1, 11).

In 10:12–18, Paul turns the tables by attacking the very values by which his critics evaluate. Paul's rivals are commending themselves (10:12, 18) and boasting (11:12, 18), probably regarding worldly matters like status and impressive speech (5:12; 10:10–12; 11:6). Evaluation by means of comparison was a standard practice in schools used for speeches and literature (cf. Cicero De or. 3.14.52). One could compare oneself with others to exalt oneself (Cicero Brut. 93.321–22; Pis. 22.51), but some mocked those who simply exchanged compliments among their peers (cf. 10:12).

Paul ironically claims that he would not "dare" be so bold as his rivals (10:12; the same verb for "daring" in 10:2), though he will finally "dare" in 11:21 (the verb's only other appearance in this letter). (Paul's vague "certain persons" may have followed an ancient practice of refusing to honor some dishonorable adversaries by so much as naming them; e.g., Aeschines Ctesiphon 1; Dio Chrysostom 40.8–9; 47.20–23.)

To compare oneself with members of a class in which one obviously did not belong was considered unbridled, arrogant hubris (10:13–14). In reality, however, it is the rivals who are boasting outside their class! Boasting "beyond limits" (10:13) suggests that his rivals violate a major standard of Greek ethics (cf. Musonius Rufus 18B, p. 116.12 Lutz).

The "limits" here (10:13–15) probably especially reflect spheres of authority given by God. Paul stayed within his God-given calling (cf. Rom 11:13; Gal 2:7–9), but his opponents did not. They lacked understanding (10:12), like the arrogant people Greeks complained about who did not "know themselves," i.e., their divinely appointed human limits (cf. Plutarch E at Delphi 2, Mor. 385D; Oracles at Delphi 29, Mor. 408E). Whereas Paul fathered the Corinthian church (1 Cor 4:15; cf. 2 Cor 12:14), his rivals boast in someone else's (Paul's) work (10:15). Paul does hope that, with the Corinthians' assistance, his own sphere will be expanded—but into new territory, not in claiming credit for another's work (10:16; Rom 15:18–21, 24, 28).

The only right way to boast is in the Lord (10:17). As in 1 Cor 1:26–31, Paul here refers to Jer 9:23–24. Divine commendation (2 Cor 10:18) was reserved for the judgment (5:10–12).

B. Compelled to Counter His Opponents' Folly (11:1–21a)

Paul trusts the Corinthians can "bear with" his foolishness (11:1), since they show this "courtesy" to his rivals (11:19). By underlining the foolishness of boasting even while reluctantly doing it, Paul exposes the folly of his rivals' behavior. Yet to meet their challenges, Paul must boast himself—though boasting in sufferings and weaknesses (11:23–33) changes the basis for status. He must answer fools according to their folly without being like them (Prov 26:4–5).

Ancient speakers found ways to make boasting seem less offensive, such as: denying they were boasting (3:1; 5:12); claiming that they were responding to charges (10:10); expressing concern for hearers (11:1–4); self-defense (11:5–6); countering others' arrogance (11:12); or noting its necessity (12:1) or that others compelled them to do it (12:11; see Plutarch, Praising Oneself Inoffensively, passim). Likewise, Paul must commend himself for their good (10:8) and within limits (10:13–17; 11:30; 12:5–6).

Like an ancient father (12:14; 1 Cor 4:15), Paul has arranged for the Corinthian church's betrothal (11:2)—here to Christ (cf. 1 Cor 6:15–17). Fathers were considered responsible to guard their daughters' virginity from immoral men (e.g., Deut 22:15–21; Sir 42:9–12). Paul thus feels the kind of jealousy God feels over God's people, whom God had married (e.g., Exod 20:5; 34:14).

Paul thus compares them with Eve, and the opponents, who are ministers of Satan, with the serpent and Satan (11:3, 13–15). In Gen 3:1–7, the serpent deceived Eve; Jewish tradition also claimed that Satan came disguised as an angel to seduce Eve (cf. 11:14; L.A.E. 9:1–2; Apoc. Mos. 17:1–2). How were these rivals preaching another Jesus (11:4)? Insofar as we can gather from the emphasis in Paul's response (11:23; cf. 2:14–6:10), they may play down Jesus' sufferings and the cost of following him, a message that could appeal in prosperous Corinth (as in the modern West).

Preparing for a more thorough comparison at 11:22–23, Paul insists that he is not inferior to these rivals (11:5). He mocks them as "superapostles" (11:5; 12:11), elsewhere portraying such "super-" labels as arrogant (cf. hyper- prepositions in the Greek of 10:14, 16; 12:6–7). Although some scholars associate these with the Jerusalem apostles, most recognize that he refers instead to the rivals in Corinth (11:4; 12:11). These "apostles," unlike those in Jerusalem, could appeal to Greco-Roman speaking skills so as to compete with Paul (11:6). Whatever Paul's conflicts with some of the Jerusalem apostles were, he hardly would have denounced them as "false apostles" (11:13).

Claiming that he is "untrained in speech" (11:6) does not mean that he lacked even basic knowledge of rhetoric (the dominant advanced discipline in antiquity), or even that he was a poor speaker (even famous orators sometimes claimed to be unskilled compared to those who emphasized only rhetorical form; Dio Chrysostom 12.15; cf. Quintilian Inst. 4.1.8–11). As we have been pointing out, he contextualizes his message by using many Greco-Roman rhetorical devices. It does suggest that his rivals thought themselves better, and that Paul was unwilling to lay his emphasis on rhetoric. Just as philosophers criticized orators for valuing form over content (cf. Seneca Ep. Lucil. 20.2; 40.4; 86.16; 100.1), so Paul emphasizes his knowledge (11:6).

In 11:7–9, Paul responds to criticisms that he is a "volunteer," an "amateur," who took money from other churches but not from them. (Some similarly criticized Socrates as not accepting money because he was not worth any; Xenophon Mem. 1.6.12.) Corinthian money probably came with "strings attached"—they would treat Paul as their client or employee. Moreover, accepting support from any one Corinthian faction could expose him to the enmity of the other factions. At the same time, in their culture rejecting a gift constituted rejecting "friendship," preferring enmity (Cicero Fam. 14.3.1; Fronto Ep. Graecae 5). Thus Paul must explain in graphic, ironic language (e.g., "robbing" or "exploiting" churches) why he rejected their offer (probably in contrast to his rivals). Paul accepted Macedonian support for their good (11:9–11); if he boasted about the Macedonians (11:9–10), he had also boasted about the Corinthians (9:2).

Ancients accepted silencing others' arrogance as a justification for boasting (11:12); Paul warned that these boasters in others' labors were false apostles, Satan's ministers (11:13–15; on Satan as an "angel of light," see comment on 11:3–4). In 11:16–21, Paul again reinforces the foolishness of boasting (his rivals' behavior) and implicitly the foolishness of the Corinthians for welcoming this means of the opponents exploiting them. In 11:20, Paul stirs emotion with more rhetorical repetition (the Greek repeats "if someone" five times); he implies that their opponents (not his collection) exploit them financially (cf. 2:17; 11:7–9; 12:13–18).

C. Boasting as a Fool in His Sufferings (11:21b–33)

Paul boasts in both sufferings (11:22–33) and revelations (12:1–10). He did not "dare" to compare himself with his rivals in 10:12, but now he does (11:21b), and matches them point by point (a standard ancient persuasion technique; 11:22–23; cf. Menander Rhetor 2.3, 381.31–32; 386.10–13). (Paul probably uses the three groups in 11:22 interchangeably.) Ancients often provided boastful lists of their exploits and achievements (most famously Augustus' Res Gestae); Paul, however, lists not churches founded but sufferings. Ancients could use lists of sufferings to underline their integrity (see comment on 4:8–11); Paul also uses it to value the weakness through which God displays divine power (4:7, 10–11; 12:9; 13:4).

Paul's rivals cannot compete with him in sufferings for preaching Christ, with which Jesus associated his commission (e.g., Mark 8:34–38; Matt 10:24–25; Luke 10:16). Regardless of their rhetorical prowess or other bases for boasting, they do not sufficiently respect or reflect God's power in brokenness, and hence preach a different Christ (11:4).

Imprisonment and public beatings (11:23–25) were normally matters of public shame, but Paul boasts in sufferings for Christ. Refusing to renounce his membership in Israel, Paul faced synagogue beatings (11:24); much harsher were Gentile floggings with rods (11:25) and a stoning (11:25; cf. Acts 14:19). (Although Roman magistrates were not supposed to have Roman citizens flogged with rods, it did sometimes happen in the provinces, and could happen to Paul occasionally over the course of his ministry.) Expanding on Paul's journeys in 11:26, he uses eightfold repetition of "danger" to rhetorically intensify the point. The verse's climactic "false brothers and sisters" (11:26) fits the situation he now addresses (11:13). Paul's "anxiety" for churches (11:28–29) reflects a pattern the Corinthians had observed throughout Paul's letter to them.

Why does Paul add the account in 11:32–33 as an apparent afterthought? Probably Paul here offers one concrete example of danger in ministry. Romans boasted over the first soldier to scale an enemy wall; here Paul recounts his escape from a wall (though probably more as danger than as humiliation; cf. Josh 2:15; 1 Sam 19:12). The Nabatean ethnarch (not "governor," pace NRSV) need not mean that Aretas IV ruled Damascus (as many argue); the ethnarch may have been simply the leader of the Nabatean quarter there. (Jewish opposition in Acts 9:23–25 may help explain Nabatean opposition, especially if they acted in concert. Judeans and Nabateans had close ties in the region.)

D. Boasting as a Fool in Revelations (12:1–10)

On boasting, see comment at 11:1. After boasting in sufferings (11:23–33) Paul boasts in revelations (12:1), yet offers only one example (12:2–4) and emphasizes again his weakness, which compensates for revelations (12:7–9). Some Greeks sought visions (e.g., PGM 4.930–1114; 77.1–5); some Jews sought to see God's throne (e.g., b. Hag. 14b–15b). Paul does not claim to have solicited them, but only to have been "caught up" (12:2, 4; cf. Ezek 8:3; 1 En. 39:3; 52:1).

Since Paul is boasting in his visions (12:1), his anonymous visionary in 12:2–5 is presumably himself. One could call oneself "that person," and boast less offensively by transferring one's experience to another (while obviously speaking really of oneself). Jewish vision reports can be "in" (1 En. 39:3) or (more like Greeks) "outside" (1 En. 71:1–6) the body; for Paul, an experience outside the body might involve temporary death (5:6–8). Jewish texts promised a future "paradise" in Eden for the righteous (4 Ezra 7:36; 8:52; 2 Bar. 51:11), and placed it in heaven for the present (Test. Abr. 20:14A; 3 Bar. 4:6). (They differed on the number of heavens; "three" [as in Test. Levi 2–3] was one of the lowest estimates.)

Yet instead of recounting his vision's content, he declares that it is too sacred for telling (12:4)—thereby again underlining the folly of boasts. Some others spoke of divine secrets to be shared with only a few, or even too sublime to recount in words (Josephus Ant. 2.276; tos. Hag. 2:1; Iamblichus Vit. Pyth. 18.88; 34.247). When Paul does report the content of a revelation, it is the Lord's teaching of Christ's power in human weakness (12:9).

Scholars differ as to Paul's "thorn in the flesh" (12:7): temptation; a physical problem; or, as I think more likely (with many, including Chrysostom Hom. 2 Cor. 26.2–3), opposition. This opposition could include persecution (cf. 11:23–33; Paul elsewhere uses the term here for "torment" only in 1 Cor 4:11) and also Satan's other messengers (2 Cor 11:13–15). The expression alludes to an OT one used for God leaving Israel's enemies to test them (Num 33:55; Josh 23:13). Paul is ready to embrace any suffering for Christ if he may find there Christ's grace and power (12:10).

E. Summary and Final Appeal (12:11–18)

Paul summarizes (12:11, 13), cites his apostolic signs (12:12), reminds the Corinthians of how he has cared for them (12:13–15), and demands whether he or his colleagues had wronged them (12:15–18). (Speakers often appealed to hearers' emotions especially toward the climax [e.g., Demosthenes Ep. 2]; Paul does so here, although he has done so at other points as well.)

Whether or not his rivals claimed signs, Paul outclasses them (12:12). Although Acts offers more details, Paul's own letters attest that he believed that God provided miracles often as he evangelized (Rom 15:19). A sorer issue with the Corinthians, however, involved Paul's refusal to accept their support (see comment on 11:7–9), which comes up again here (12:13–14). Paul would not be their client; in fact, he is their patron and benefactor (12:14); parents were a sort of benefactor to their children (Seneca Ben. 3.11.2), and benefactors could receive only praise, not money, for their services (the latter made them an employee; cf. e.g., Apollonius King of Tyre 10). Like the greatest donors noted in antiquity, Paul gave even himself (12:15), following Jesus' example (8:9).

Paul asks the Corinthians, who earlier wanted Paul to depend on them, whether he or his colleagues have exploited them (12:16–18). If he would not exploit them for himself, would he do so for the needs of others? This climax of Paul's letter suggests the vulnerability of the collection at its heart (chs. 8–9). Because Paul has used language like "crafty" (12:16) earlier (in the Greek of 4:2; 11:3), and this is not his common language, he may be responding to his rivals' complaints against the collection.

Because Paul says that he "sent" Titus and the brother, many think that 2 Cor 10–13 must be a letter later than 8–9. This suggestion is plausible, yet "sent" could be an epistolary aorist, i.e., past tense only from the vantage point of when the Corinthians would be receiving the letter. (Paul in fact uses "epistolary aorists" in 8:18, 22, although the NRSV translates them as present there.) Those favoring separate letters also note that the "exploitation" question can sound more like an earlier visit.

F. Warning about Paul's Visit (12:19–13:10)

The affectionate parent (12:14) must now exercise discipline, but hates to do it. Paul had gently chosen to warn them by letter rather than by carrying out discipline in person (1:23–2:4). Because he did not carry out his "parental" threats, however (cf. 1 Cor 4:18–21), some critics charged him with talking menacingly in letters yet proving weak in person (2 Cor 10:8–10). Now Paul will carry out the discipline if he must (12:20–13:3)—though he again lovingly warns them, hoping to be able to avoid such harshness (13:10). The Corinthians repented regarding the offender (7:12), but despite Paul's diplomacy earlier in the letter, he must now confront the other issues he has reserved for his finale (as persuaders sometimes did).

Jesus embraced the epitome of human weakness in crucifixion and was raised by God's power; so Paul embraces whatever weakness God brings him, trusting God to compensate (13:4; cf. 12:5, 9–10). The Corinthians who wanted to evaluate Paul (cf. 11:5; 12:11) must now evaluate themselves (13:5). Was Christ in them, as he was in Paul (13:3–5), i.e., were they converted (cf. 5:18)? If so, they are proofs of his ministry (3:1–3). Paul's entire goal was for their good; although God could give authority to build up or tear down (Jer 1:10), Paul's ministry of grace (cf. 2 Cor 3:6) was especially to "build" them up (13:8–10; cf. 10:8).

V. Closing (13:11–14)

In 13:11, Paul summarizes his exhortations (including to unity). In 13:12, he sends greetings. Relatives and other persons who were close used light kisses (usually on the lips; e.g., Jos. Asen. 8:6), normally easily distinguishable from erotic kisses; members of the Christian family thus could express affection. (A letter writer could also ask a receiver to pass on the writer's kiss of greeting; e.g., Fronto Ad M. Caes. 1.8.7; 5.33 [48]; 5.42 [57].)

Finally, Paul closes with a blessing from Jesus, the Father, and the Holy Spirit (13:13; cf. Matt 28:19). Paul already recognized Jesus as divine Lord (cf. 1:2; 1 Cor 1:30; 8:6). Paul's blessing is a prayer for God to perform these works (such as love and fellowship) among them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. W. Danker. II Corinthians. Augsburg Commentary on the NT (Minneapolis: Augsburg Publishing House, 1989); J. T. Fitzgerald. Cracks in an Earthen Vessel: An Examination of the Catalogues of Hardships in the Corinthian Correspondence. SBLDS 99 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); V. P. Furnish. II Corinthians. AB 32A (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Company, 1984); C. S. Keener. 1–2 Corinthians. The New Cambridge Bible Commentary (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); J. Lambrecht. Second Corinthians. SP 8 (Collegeville, Minn.: A Michael Glazier Book, The Liturgical Press, 1999); P. Marshall. Enmity in Corinth: Social Conventions in Paul's Relations with the Corinthians. WUNT 2, Reihe 23 (Tubingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1987); F. J. Matera. II Corinthians: A Commentary. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2003); M. E. Thrall. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. 2 vols. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1994, 2000); B. Witherington III. Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1995).

GALATIANS

SUSAN EASTMAN

OVERVIEW

The power of Paul's letter to the churches he founded in Galatia extends far beyond its original addressees. Its six chapters are polemical, emotionally charged, theologically packed, and rich in scriptural allusions. Paul argues for the singular staying power of God's unconditional grace in Christ Jesus, and against observance of the Mosaic law as a prerequisite for participation and sustenance in the Christian life. He passionately proclaims the enduring themes of grace, freedom, union with Christ, perseverance in the faith, and the life-giving fruits of the Spirit—all instigated and sustained by God's initiative in Christ.

Location and Date of the Letter. Both the destination and date of Galatians are uncertain. "Galatia" comprised all of Asia Minor, from the north, where ethnic Celts, called "Galatians," lived, to the Roman province of "Galatia" in the south. According to Acts, Paul founded churches in both regions: in the southern cities of Derba and Lystra on his first missionary journey (14:6–23), and in northern Galatia on his second and third journeys (Acts 16:1–6; 18:23). He wrote the letter shortly after his founding visit: either 48–49 CE if he wrote to churches in southern Galatia, or somewhere between 50 and 55 CE, if he wrote to churches in the north. His use of "Galatians" as an ethnic term (3:1) favors the latter destination and date.

Situation. Other Jewish Christian missionaries, perhaps representing the "circumcision party" in the Jerusalem church (2:12; cf., Acts 15:5), have come into Galatia, adding to Paul's teaching (2:6) by instructing his Gentile converts in the law of Moses. They teach that full membership in the people of God, and the powerful presence of the Holy Spirit, depend on keeping the "works of the law"—circumcision, food laws, and the liturgical calendar. That is, they teach that the Galatian Christians need to "live like Jews" (2:14). Not unreasonably, they view Gentile faith in Jesus, the Messiah, as entailing adherence to observance of the practices of Judaism. Paul, however, sees the imposition of law observance as a communally divisive subversion of the sufficiency of Christ. Here is the beginning of the parting of the ways between Judaism and Christianity.

In reconstructing the Galatian situation, two cautions are in order. First, Paul is very angry when he writes this letter, and we hear only his version of events. His descriptions of the other missionaries as coercive troublemakers who manipulate people by the threat of exclusion, and who themselves avoid persecution, probably differs significantly from their own self-understanding. Second, it is important not to confuse the issues posed by these teachers with Paul's own message. Their concern is how Gentile Christians can be Abraham's children and heirs. Paul insists that they already are children of Abraham, through Christ (3:29), and encourages them to stand fast in their reliance on Christ alone, rather than their own actions vis à vis the law.

OUTLINE

I. Salutation (1:1–5)

II. Trouble in Galatia (1:6–9)

III. The Authority of Paul's Gospel (1:10–2:21)

A. Paul's Call and Ministry (1:10–2:10)

B. Cephas in Antioch (2:11–14)

C. The Sufficiency of Christ (2:15–21)

IV. Rectified by Faith, Heirs of the Promise (3:1–4:7)

A. The Message of Faith and the Spirit (3:1–5)

B. Sons and Heirs Through Faith (3:6–29)

C. From Slavery to Freedom (4:1–7)

V. Return to Slavery (4:8–11)

VI. Motivational Appeals (4:12–5:12)

A. Argument from Experience (4:12–20)

B. Argument from Scripture (4:21–4:31)

C. Warning Against Circumcision (5:1–12)

VII. Life in the New Community (5:13–6:10)

VIII. Conclusion (6:11–18)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Salutation (1:1–5)

The salutation introduces key themes: the divine origin and hence authority of Paul's apostleship (1:11–12); the identity of God as father (3:26; 4:5–7), who through the resurrection of Jesus demonstrated life-giving power (3:22); the grace and peace that come through Christ (1:6, 15; 2:21; 6:16, 18); and liberation from the present evil age, accomplished by Christ's death on the cross. The phrase, "who gave himself for our sins," is an early creedal statement (2:20; 1 Cor. 15:3; cf. Rom. 4:25; 5:8, 15–19; 8:3, 32; 2 Cor 5:21; Matt 26:28; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet 2:24), which Paul quotes and distinctively interprets as deliverance from the enslaving and death-dealing powers that dominate life in this world (cf., 6:14–15). That is, our human predicament is not simply that we sin and need forgiveness, but rather that we are enslaved by the compulsion to sin and the dominion of death, and need liberation.

II. Trouble in Galatia (1:6–9)

Omitting his usual thanksgiving, Paul immediately launches into the situation that sparked his letter: the Galatians are defecting from his gospel ("good news") of the grace of Christ, and following some "troublemakers" who claim that their message is truly good news. "So quickly" (v. 6) indicates that little time has elapsed since Paul's visit. "The one who called you" (v. 6) is God (5:8; cf., Rom 8:30; 1 Cor 1:9; 1 Thess 2:12; 5:24), not Paul, who also is called by God (1:15; 1 Cor 1:1; Rom 1:1). At stake is the Galatians' adherence to the God of Jesus Christ, who calls human beings solely through grace, apart from the law (2:21; cf., Rom 3:21–26; 6:14).

III. The Authority of Paul's Gospel (1:10–2:21)

A. Paul's Call and Ministry (1:10–2:10)

The character of Paul's ministry (1:10), the divine origin of his calling (1:11–24), and the history of his dealings with the church in Jerusalem (2:1–14), all testify to the authenticity of his gospel.

Paul's gracious gospel might seem to tell people what they want to hear (1:10), but he contrasts such "people-pleasing" with his own calling as Christ's servant (literally "slave"), who indeed suffers for Christ (5:11; 6:17). What would appear to be easy—preaching grace—in fact stirs up violent opposition.

God is the initiator and guarantor of Paul's message, which is not a human teaching about God, but rather the direct apocalypse (vv. 12, 16; NRSV, "revelation") of Jesus Christ himself. More than a visual revelation, apocalypse signifies God's powerful intervention in human affairs, creating a "before" and an "after" (1:4) that is displayed in Paul's own life, as he now preaches the faith he once tried to destroy (1:24). Paul's description of his call echoes that of the prophets called from birth to proclaim good news to the Gentiles (cf. Isa 49:1–6; Jer 1:5). The divine interruption that changes his life also connects him to the purpose for which he was born.

"Arabia" probably refers to the ancient Nabatean kingdom southeast of Damascus. Paul's travel narrative first emphasizes his independence from the Jerusalem Church; he meets Cephas (Peter) and James the Lord's brother (2:9, 12; cf., Acts 15:13; 21:18) privately, as equals, in his first visit to Jerusalem (vv. 18–19). Subsequently, he demonstrates the ecclesial authorization of his ministry (2:1–10; cf., Acts 15:1–29). Despite the "false believers" (v. 4), whose infiltration of the Jerusalem meeting, and attempt to impose circumcision on Gentile converts, link them to the troublemakers in Galatia, the church leaders endorse Paul's circumcision-free mission to the Gentiles.

In all of Paul's letters, this is the only reference to Peter's Jewish mission (vv. 7–8) as distinct from Paul's Gentile mission. Whether either Peter or Paul abides fully by the Jerusalem agreement is unclear: Peter comes to the Gentile Christian church in Antioch and lives "like a Gentile" (2:12, 14), and apparently he baptizes Gentile converts in Corinth (1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5); Paul later boasts of receiving the synagogue discipline of thirty-nine lashes (2 Cor 11:24), implying that he continues to preach in synagogues.

B. Cephas in Antioch (2:11-14)

The Antioch congregation launched Paul's missionary travels to Galatia (Acts 11:19–26; 13:1–3), and it faced similar issues: intruders from the circumcision faction in the Jerusalem church are dividing the community into those who keep the Mosaic law and those who do not. The behavior of Cephas (Peter) illustrates the problem, and Paul's rebuke of "hypocrisy" indirectly addresses the Galatians as well.

C. The Sufficiency of Christ (2:15–21)

Three key concepts first appear in this dense passage. First is the phrase, "works of the law" (3:2, 5, 10). In the immediate situation it refers to practices of Mosaic law such as circumcision and food laws, but in the larger context it refers simply to human performance of the law's requirements (see Exod 18:20). Paul has "died" not simply to "works of the law," but to the law itself as the way to both righteousness (2:21) and the gift of the Holy Spirit (3:2–5).

Second are the terms, "to justify" and "justification." They are better translated as "to rectify" and "righteousness" (as in 3:6//Gen 15:6). To be rectified is to be freed from the power of sin that operates through both condemnation and compulsion. It is, as Paul's own life demonstrates, to be unmade and remade in union with Christ (2:19–20), by the power of the Spirit given freely through the message of faith (3:2). The verb, "justified," is in the passive voice, with God as the implied subject; if the law is what humans do (even when helped by the Spirit), justification is what God alone does to, for, and in human beings.

Third, the NRSV supplies "the faith of Jesus Christ" (2:16), and "the faith of the Son of God" (2:20) as alternative translations (cf. 3:22; Rom 3:22, 26; Phil 3:9). As the structure of 2:16 demonstrates, rectification is God's deed, enacted through Christ's faithful self-giving (2:21; cf., 1:4), which encompasses and guarantees human trust in Christ. Paul's emphasis on God's act rather than human decision liberates us from the self-absorption and paralysis of sin.

Paul then draws his conclusion, paraphrasing Ps. 143:2 (142:2 LXX): "no one will be justified" before God by works of the law. Because all are justified solely on the basis of Christ's faithful death, the distinction between Jews and "Gentile sinners" dissolves in relationship to Christ. To rebuild it through insisting on the "works of the law" is to prove oneself a sinner, acting contrary to the work of Christ (vv. 18, 21).

IV. Rectified by Faith; Heirs of the Promise (3:1–4:7)

The powerful metaphor of inheritance dominates this section, as through Christ the Galatians already are heirs of the blessing promised to Abraham (3:14, 18, 22, 29; 4:7).

A. The Message of Faith and the Spirit (3:1–5)

Paul's initial preaching to the Galatians "publicly exhibited" Christ on the cross (3:1). He may be referring to his scars from persecution (4:4:13–14), which he interprets as marks of the crucified Jesus (6:17) who lives in him (2:20–21). The "works of the law" (vv. 2, 4) are paralleled with "the flesh" (v. 3), which denotes circumcision (6:12–13), merely human existence (2:20), and destructive passions (5:17–21) that war against the Spirit. In contrast, "the message of faith" (3:2, 5; NRSV, "believing what you heard") generates powerful miracles worked by the Spirit (3:4–5). Reminding his converts of that experience, Paul uses the word pasche⁻, meaning, "to suffer" (3:4; NRSV, "experience"); suffering and the power of the Spirit often go together (Rom 5:3–5; 2 Cor 4:7–12; 12:9–10).

B. Sons and Heirs Through Faith (3:6–29)

The abrupt introduction of Abraham suggests that the Galatians have heard about him from the other missionaries, perhaps because Abraham was the first person to practice circumcision (Gen 17:10–14). Abraham and Sarah also were known as the father and mother of proselytes, and according to Jewish tradition they kept the Mosaic law even before it was given at Sinai (Jub 24:11; Sir 44:19–21). Paul, however, emphasizes Abraham's faith prior to circumcision (Gen 15:6), and the promise that the Gentiles will be blessed through him (3:8). Thus linking "faith" and blessing, he argues that all whose identity derives from faith share in Abraham's blessing (3:9, 14; see Rom 4:5).

Almost every verse in the ensuing argument cites Scripture, which speaks and acts on God's behalf (3:22; 4:30).

By contrasting the theme of promise in Genesis with the theme of curse in relationship to the law in Deuteronomy and Leviticus, scripture grounds Paul's argument for the life-giving efficacy of faith, rather than law observance. Verses 9 and 10 are antithetically parallel: those who are "of faith" are blessed, while those who are "of works of the law" are under a curse. Paul gives two scriptural explanations for this "curse of the law." First, according to Deut 27:26; 28:58, a curse falls on all who fail to keep the law's requirements, just as, according to Lev 18:5: "whoever does them will live by them." Second, regardless of human obedience to the law, it is not the way to righteousness because it is not based on faith (v. 11; Hab 2:4). Habakkuk 2:4 (3:11; cf., Rom 1:17) thus governs Paul's interpretation of Deuteronomy and Leviticus (vv. 10, 12), by restating the principle of 2:21: Christ's death, not law, effects righteousness. Therefore, "the one who is righteous will live by faith." In Greek, "by faith" could modify either "will live" or "righteous," implying an interpretive choice between righteousness and life as the outcome of faith. This is a false choice, however, because righteousness is life (3:19–21), and to be rectified is to be made alive—by faith. In light of 2:16–21, this faith is in the first instance Christ's faithfulness; in light of 3:6–9, it is human trust in God. Paul's ambiguity thus leads us to speak of both Christ's faith and the human faith that it awakens. "The one who is righteous" may be a messianic reference to Christ.

Paul's reasoning depends on the logic of interchange: by suffering execution as a condemned law-breaker (Deut 21:22), Christ took our place in "becoming a curse for us" so that all people, including the Gentiles, might be blessed by receiving the Spirit (2 Cor 5:21; Rom 4:5; 8:3).

God's promise to Abraham is like a human will that cannot be annulled. The Greek word (diatheke) can also be translated as "covenant," but "will" fits better as an "example from daily life" (3:15). Abraham's singular seed, Christ (3:16), is the heir through whom others share the inheritance (3:29). Just as Paul puts temporal brackets around his "former life in Judaism" in 1:12–17, now he brackets the Mosaic law: both Paul's and Abraham's "stories" begin with God's promissory call—for Paul, to preach to the Gentiles (1:16); for Abraham, to be a blessing to the Gentiles (3:8). For both, the fulfillment of the promise is delayed by a period of time under the law (1:14; 3:17, 19–24), which is brought to an end by the advent of Christ (1:15–16; 3:24–25). Life under the law is a temporary arrangement that cannot annul God's promise (3:17).

"Why then the law?" Paul answers, "because of transgressions" (3:19). This enigmatic phrase could mean either "in order to provoke sin" (Rom 7:5–13), or "to restrain sin." In view of the law's restrictive function in 3:22–24, the latter seems more likely, yet perhaps the two meanings are not incompatible. Any parent knows that restraint often provokes the very action that it is meant to control.

Paul's point is that the law serves God's purposes by closing off all access to righteousness and life until the advent of Christ (3:22). Yet Paul's ambivalence towards the law is palpable: God gave the promise directly to Abraham's offspring, but the law was given indirectly through Moses (Lev 26:46; Num 36:13) and ordained through angels (Deut 33:2; Ps 68:17). In Jewish texts the presence of angelic hosts at Sinai is a sign of the law's glory, but in Paul's account it distances the law from God.

Furthermore, the law imprisons humanity "under sin" (3:22), like a pedagogue (NRSV, "disciplinarian"), a slave or freedman whose job was to restrain boys until they reached maturity (3:24–25). Most telling is the repeated preposition "under," which signifies "under the power of": "under a curse" (3:10); "under the power of sin" (3:22); "under the law" (3:23; 4:4, 5); "under a disciplinarian" (3:25); "under guardians and trustees" (4:2); "under (NRSV, "enslaved to") the elemental spirits" (4:3). Hence the law and sin function in tandem, the law restraining sin and yet unable to deliver humanity from its power. The implications of this insight are profound. We experience enslavement to sin in many ways, from corporate patterns of oppression to personal addictions, and it is tempting to prescribe a program of behavior as an antidote. Paul's answer to human bondage is not a program, but the powerful and gracious presence of Christ.

Again Paul uses the verb form of "apocalypse" (3:23; NRSV, "faith would be revealed") together with the verb, "to come," speaking interchangeably of the advent and apocalypse of Christ and of faith (3:23–25). Thus faith is not a general human attitude or attribute, but rather Christ himself, who is both its content and author, whose faithful self-giving in turn inaugurates human trust in God (Rom 8:3).

Baptism into union with Christ creates a new community in which the divisions of the old order no longer hold sway (3:27–28). In this community all are "sons of God" (v.26, NRSV, "children of God"), sharing Israel's special relationship to God (Exod 4:22; Jer 31:9; Hos 1:9–10; Jub 1:24–25). The words, as well as the imagery of changing clothes and "putting on Christ," may reflect an early baptismal rite (1 Cor 12:13; Rom 6.3; 13.14; Eph 4.24; Col 3.9–11). Just as name brand logos set people apart from one another in our culture, so in the first century clothing distinguished people's social class and status. Such distinctions are erased within the Christian community. The imagery draws on the OT: God is clothed with majesty (Pss 93:1; 104:1), God's priests are clothed with righteousness and salvation (Ps 132:9, 16), and Jerusalem will be clothed with the garments of salvation and the robe of righteousness (Isa 61:10).

C. From Slavery to Freedom (4:1–7)

Verses 1–7 develop the metaphor of the law as a pedagogue. Paul begins by depicting the change in status that automatically occurs when a minor child legally becomes an adult (vv. 1–3). But then he shifts to the metaphor of adoption, which implies a radical change from the status of a slave to that of a son (vv. 4–5). The point is the same: for adult heirs, enslavement to any overlords other than Christ is obsolete, and a return to such slavery via the works of the law signals regression to an infantile state. Perhaps Paul's opponents are promising the Galatians that law-observance will lead them to maturity (see 3:3), but Paul warns that it will have the opposite effect.

As in 3:13, in 4:5 Paul uses the word exagorazo, to redeem from slavery, to describe the effect of Christ's action. Again the key paradigm is that of a divine-human interchange initiated and sustained by Christ's participation in the human predicament. Christ was "born of a woman" into a cosmos divided by the law, so that we (both Jew and Gentile) might receive "adoption as children." The experience of the promised Spirit (cf., 3:2–5, 14) who inspires us to call God "Abba! Father!" (Rom 8:15–17), is evidence of this new relationship.

V. Return to Slavery (4:8–11)

Paul restates the problem in Galatia: by observing the liturgical calendar, his converts are returning to their former slavery to "the elemental spirits" (4:3). These are the building blocks of the cosmos—earth, water, air, and fire—which in 4:8–9 are associated with "beings that by nature are not gods." Jews of Paul's day viewed pagan worship as veneration of the elemental spirits (stoicheia in Greek), but Paul here links Jewish religious observance itself with such veneration. Two observations will help us understand this radical claim by Paul. In Hellenistic thought the elements of the physical cosmos were divided into pairs of opposites (hot and cold, wet and dry). Similarly, in 3:28, Paul describes the social cosmos prior to Christ as consisting of pairs of opposites, and in 6:14–15 as constructed by the polarity between circumcised and uncircumcised humanity. Paul has died to this divided cosmos (2:19; 6:14–15), and the Galatians are in danger of returning to it as they seek to define themselves through works of the law. Such divisions belong to "the present evil age" from which Christ has redeemed them (1:4).

VI. Motivational Appeals (4:12–5:12)

A. Argument from Experience (4:12–20)

In an emotional appeal that is both personal in tone and cosmic in scope, Paul moves from discussion of Christian identity to matters of behavior. He bases the first imperative of the letter, "become as I am," on his own likeness with the Galatians (4:12). Here the pattern of interchange enacted by Christ's participation in the human condition acquires a personal face through the Galatians' own experience of Paul's intense investment in them. Christ's liberating power is mediated through vulnerable human interaction. Yet in what way did the Jewish Paul become like the Gentile Galatians, and how might they become like him? On one level, Paul became like a Gentile "sinner" by living outside the law (2:17–19). But on a deeper level, Paul and his converts become akin to each other only through Christ, because it is Christ, not the law or its absence, who is the foundation of their existence. Hence to become like Paul is to persevere in faith in Christ alone. This alone is the basis of unity in the church.

Apparently Paul first preached to the Galatians when he was recovering from some physical infirmity that put them "to the test" (vv. 13–14). We cannot know with certainty what this was. But surely Paul's body, scarred from being stoned and whipped (2 Cor 11:24–25), is Exhibit A of the crucified Lord whom he "publicly exhibits" when he preaches (3:1; 6:17). Such a picture of discipleship surely would test the Galatians' faith. Their warm reception of Paul is depicted colloquially by their willingness to tear out their eyes for him (4:15).

Whereas Paul became like the Gentile Galatians in a mutually reciprocal relationship, the circumcising missionaries require the Galatians to become like them—literally! By setting up circumcision as a prerequisite for fellowship, "they want to exclude you" (v. 17), acting like manipulative suitors who play "hard to get." Paul, however, yearns to be with his congregations, displaying a pastoral style that is extraordinarily vulnerable (v. 20). He employs the image of childbirth to depict his anguish (4:19). The metaphor of labor pains occurs frequently in the prophets, with Israel, Zion, the prophet, or God as the subject (e.g., Isa 13:8; 21:3; 45:10; Jer 4:31; 6:24; 8:21; 13:21). Sometimes it signifies the messianic birth pangs that signal the Day of the Lord (1 En 62:6; 4 Ezra 4:42; Mark 13:8//Matt 24:8; Rom 8:22; 1 Thess 5:3; Rev 12:2). Here Paul's anguish melds with the labor pains of God's new creative act (6:15), for God, who in Isa 45:10 is both father and mother to Israel, is undoubtedly the power who brings to birth the community of the new creation through Paul's own apostolic labors. In Paul's labor, Christ who lives in him also labors (2:20). Thus when Christ is "formed" among them (the "you" is plural), their life also will display the presence of the self-giving Lord.

B. Argument from Scripture (4:21–31)

The witness of "the law" as revelatory narrative (4:21b) speaks directly to people who desire to be subject to "the law" as commandments (4:21a). In effect Paul says, "Let me tell you the story of Abraham's two sons (Gen 16–21); if the shoe fits, wear it." In Jewish traditions, Abraham is the first observer of the law, and Ishmael, not Isaac, is the source of the Gentiles (Jub 16:17–18). But by reading Abraham's story through the lens of Isa 54:1, Paul instead highlights the theme of divine promise and power. In Isa 54:1, the paradoxical motif of the "barren mother" depicts the miraculous restoration of Jerusalem, the mother city. This is a familiar motif in Jewish literature; later rabbis list Sarah, Rachel, Rebekah, Leah, Samson's mother, Hannah, and Zion as the "seven barren ones" (Pesiq. Rab Kah. 141), whose miraculous childbirth displays God's power despite human futility.

In Galatians, Hagar the slave and Sarah the free woman represent two ways of "begetting" converts: through the "flesh" and through the promise. As we have seen, flesh has many connotations; here it refers to circumcision in the flesh (6:13) as a missionary method. Hence the children of the slave woman, begotten into slavery, are those Gentiles who are being circumcised by Paul's opponents. The children of promise are those who come to faith and abide in it solely on the basis of Christ's faithfulness. In v. 30, "scripture" quotes Sarah's words to Abraham in Gen 21:10, which command him to cast out the slave woman Hagar and her son Ishmael. In this allegory addressed to those who want to be under the law (4:21), the quotation warns the circumcising missionaries and their followers of the destiny that awaits them if they persist in relying on works of the law, rather than on Christ alone (see 5:2). Paul balances this negative warning with the positive affirmation of their origin and destiny as "children of the free woman" (4:31).

C. Warning Against Circumcision (5:1–12)

The command to stand fast in freedom summarizes the preceding chapter and introduces what will follow: freedom from the yoke of slavery (5:1), for mutual love (5:13). "Yoke" designates the law, but "again" links it to the Gentile Galatians' former enslavement to pagan practices (4:8–10).

Paul solemnly warns the Gentile Christians against being circumcised, giving three reasons: they will be severed from Christ (vv. 2, 4); they will be obligated to keep the whole law (v. 3); they will revert to a social cosmos ordered by the distinction between circumcised and uncircumcised (v. 6). Never opposed to circumcision and law observance for Jewish Christians, Paul objects to law observance as a divisive prerequisite for Christian fellowship. Thus "faith working through love" (5:6) makes clear that Paul is not promoting immorality, but rather arguing against legalistic concerns that obstruct the love that truly fulfills the law (5:14), and constitutes obedience to the truth (5:7).

In the subsequent images of "running" and "yeast" (5:7–9), Paul attacks the opposing missionaries, who are getting the Galatians off the right path and spoiling the whole community. These are familiar sayings: life often is compared to a footrace in Greco-Roman society and in the early church (2:2; 1 Cor 9:24–27; Phil 3:14; 2 Tim 4:7; Acts 20:24); we talk about getting off track. Yeast represents the disproportionate effect of small things on larger matters, rather like our saying, "one bad apple spoils the whole lot" (1 Cor 5:6; Matt 13:33; Luke 13:21; Mark 8:15). And Paul's claim that he suffers persecution rather than preach circumcision (5:11) indirectly implies that his opponents do the opposite (6:11). At stake in this opposition between circumcision and the cross is solidarity with the crucified Christ, and confidence in the operation of God's sovereign grace. The circumcising missionaries are confusing and unsettling the Galatians, and Paul is not above wishing the knife would slip (v. 12)!

VII. Life in the New Community (5:13–6:10)

Having warned against enslavement under the works of the law, Paul now rehabilitates slavery and law in terms of mutual love (5:13–14), and work in terms of mutual burden-bearing (6:4). Verses 13–14 are thematic for Paul's ethics: "Do not use your freedom as a base of operations (NRSV, "opportunity") for the flesh (NRSV, "selfindulgence"), but through love become slaves to one another. For the whole law has been fulfilled (NRSV, "is summed up") in a single commandment, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.'" Here Paul quotes Lev 19:18 as a summary of the law (see Rom 13:8–10). Base of operations is military terminology anticipating the conflict between the flesh and the Spirit in vv. 16–17. The law has been fulfilled because Christ has enacted the perfect love it demands, so that through the Spirit who unites believers to Christ, Christians also may serve one another in love rather than destroying one another through mutual acrimony.

Indeed, rather than fighting among themselves, the Galatians are to wage war against the destructive desires of the flesh (5:16–18). Their general in this war is the Spirit, who leads them to victory through grace that is more powerful than law (5:18; cf. Rom 6:14). Flesh signifies all practices that fracture the community, including works of the law as well as bodily passions. Thus the "works of the flesh" in vv. 19–21 parallel the "works of the law" in their divisive effects, including not only sexual immorality, but also "factions" such as those instigated by the circumcision mission (see 5:15, 26). The power that overcomes such negative influences is not preaching of the law in any form, but rather God's Spirit, given through the proclamation of Christ's faithfulness (3:2–5, 14; 4:6). In conflicts within the church today, Paul's pastoral wisdom guides us also to focus on Christ's faithfulness as the source of unity.

The "fruit of the Spirit" suggests the fecundity of the new age, when the Spirit of God is poured out and the earth is restored to fruitfulness (Joel 2:18–32; Isa 32:15–16). Recalling his own crucifixion with Christ (2:19; 6:14), Paul now tells the Galatians that they themselves "have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires" (5:24). The active verb emphasizes their agency, suggesting that in union with Christ they are empowered to resist the destructive impulses of the flesh and to enact the mutually up-building fruit of the Spirit.

One of those spiritual fruits is the restoration of people who have committed transgressions (6:1). To whom and about whom is Paul speaking? Based on 3:2–5 and 4:6, all Christians have received the Spirit and are thus addressed. Paul is not invoking a new division within the community between those who are Spirit-filled and those who are not; such distinctions would be anathema in this already fractured church. But there are people in need of restoration to fellowship, about whom Paul writes. In view of the letter as a whole, those who submit to the circumcision mission certainly fall within this category. The point is this: having warned that circumcision will sever the Gentile Christians from Christ, Paul still seeks their unity based on Christ alone.

The verb "to bear" appears in 6:2, 5 (NRSV, "carry") and 17 (NRSV, "carry"). Paradoxically, we must bear one another's burdens, and yet "all must carry their own loads" (v. 5). Paul's language suggests that we refrain from arrogant judgment and engage in mutual support, taking responsibility for our own actions while gently "bearing with" our neighbor's failings (see Matt 7:1–5). To do so is to bear the marks of Christ (6:17). "The law of Christ" (v. 2) is the law as accessed through Christ (5:14), and as displayed and enacted in Christ's sacrificial bearing of our sins, so that we also may bear with our neighbor's sins.

Verse 6 commands financial support for teachers (1 Cor 9:3–14; 2 Cor 11:7–11; Phil 4:10–11; 1 Thess 2:7–10), in a practical expression of the fellowship and mutual support that Paul enjoins in 6:2.

Paul's exhortations appear in the context of the final judgment, suggesting that carrying one's own load also implies one's individual responsibility before God. Then, as now, the maxim that "you reap what you sow" was common (v.7; cf. Job 4:8; Ps 126:5; Prov 22:8); here it echoes the imagery of the fruit of the Spirit (5:22–23). "If you sow to your own flesh, you will reap corruption," (v. 8) repeats the warning of 5:19–21 against the works of the flesh, as well as the warning against circumcision (5:4). The promise of eternal life motivates perseverance in loving service, especially to the "family of faith" (6:9–10). Such service is the ethical manifestation of the family system created and sustained by God's promissory faithfulness (4:27–28).

VIII. Conclusion (6:11–18)

As was common practice, Paul probably dictated the letter, but wrote the postscript in his own hand (v. 11; cf. Rom 16:22), in order to drive home his main point—the centrality of the cross and the new creation. The circumcising missionaries want to boast in their converts' circumcised flesh, and to avoid persecution (5:11). Paul boasts only in the cross, through which he has died to the old cosmos ordered and divided by the powers of the present evil age, including the distinction between those who are "in" (circumcised) and those who are "out" (6:14–15). Such divisions have no place in God's new creation. The contrast between circumcision and the cross has its basis in 2:21b: "if justification comes through the law, then Christ died for nothing."

Verse 16 is difficult to translate, and the NRSV nicely preserves the ambiguity of the Greek syntax. The first clause pronounces a conditional blessing of peace on all who follow the rule of the new creation, in a customized peace benediction typical of Paul's letters (cf. 2 Cor 13:11b; 1 Thess 5:23; Phil 4:9b). In 6:16b, however, the recipients of "mercy," and the identity of "the Israel of God," are unclear. The clause could continue the conditional blessing of peace in v. 16a. But because elsewhere in Paul's letters, "Israel" always refers to Jews, and "mercy" occurs primarily in reference to Israel (cf. Rom 9–11), it is equally plausible that Paul is praying for mercy on un-believing Israel. If so, then his vision of God's gracious rule extends beyond the confines of the immediate church, even in this letter so tightly focused on his beloved communities in Galatia.

The "marks of Jesus" probably denote Paul's scars from being stoned and whipped (2 Cor 11:23–30). The word for "marks" is stigmata, which could signify the brand of ownership burned into slaves' flesh. Antithetical to the identity marker of circumcision, Paul's scars show that he belongs to Christ, and thereby is under Christ's authority and protection. As Christ's slave, therefore, he commands, "let no one make trouble for me."

As in all his letters, Paul concludes as he began, with a blessing of the grace of Christ (6:18).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. M. G. Barclay. Obedying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians. SNTW (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988); E. D. Burton. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Galatians. ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1956); C. Cousar. Galatians. Interpretation (Atlanta: John Knox, 1982); S. Eastman. Recovering Paul's Mother Tongue: Language and Theology in Galatians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); R. B. Hays. "Galatians." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 2002) 11:181–348; R. Longenecker. Galatians. WBC 41 (Waco: Word, 1990); J. L. Martyn. Galatians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 33A (New York: Doubleday, 1997); S. K. Williams. Galatians. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1997).

EPHESIANS

MARGARET Y. MACDONALD

OVERVIEW

Ephesians has occupied a central place in the theology and spiritual life of Christians. Its majestic tone and liturgical influences have greatly contributed to its appeal in worship settings. The rich symbolism of Ephesians is especially powerful in articulating the identity of the church—always presented as the universal ekkle⁻sia. Ephesians is, therefore, especially important for ecclesiology. Sharing a cosmological emphasis with Colossians, Ephesians is also promising for modern theological responses to crises of world significance such as environmental problems and the urgent need for peace.

But for all of its influence, Ephesians can prove to be frustrating. From a historical perspective, the work is difficult to pin down, and many commentators now argue that the work had more than one purpose. Unlike Colossians and the undisputed letters of Paul, there are no references to church meetings in the houses of believers. Even the usual troop of Paul's fellow workers is absent, with the exception of Tychicus (6:21–22). Although Ephesians does celebrate the unity of Jew and Gentile in 2:11–22, there is little evidence of the previous tensions, or of community conflicts of any kind. Even the identity of addressees cannot be determined with certainty for the words "in Ephesus" are missing from the greeting (1:1) in several important manuscripts and conclusive evidence for use of the superscription, "To the Ephesians," comes from the end of the second century CE. The only fact that can be recovered with any certainty about the recipients of the letter is that they were (predominantly?) Gentile (2:11–22; cf. 2:1–3; 4:17–19).

Although most scholars continue to associate the document with Asia Minor on account of its ethos, relationship to Colossians, and traditional association with Ephesus, some have argued that the gap in the address along with the universal tone point to more than one audience, and perhaps even to a circular letter (cf. 1 Pet 1:1; Rev 1:4). The majority of commentators today argue in favor of its epistolary genre, but some argue that it more closely resembles a liturgical piece, a sermon, or even an "honorific decree" on account of the formal, public orientation of the work.

Theories concerning the pseudonymous nature of Ephesians have been based on a variety of historical and literary factors. With its reference to a church that is built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, the work seems to look back to the past (2:19–20), offering a type of summary of Paul's thought for a new day. Its theological reflection (e.g., 5:21–33) seems best understood in light of the challenges of the latter decades of the first century CE when the death of the apostles and growing diversity of church teachings, including ascetic extremism, required new emphasis on the identity of the church. With respect to literary factors, the use of words and expressions not typically found in the undisputed Pauline epistles (see comments on 1:3–14), long sentences that bring together synonyms, and especially the parallels between Ephesians and other letters in the Pauline corpus (particularly Colossians, see comments on 6:21–24) have figured prominently in arguments concerning authorship. In modern scholarship, the majority view (e.g., Lincoln, MacDonald, Muddiman) is that the work was written in Paul's name by a close associate. But defenders of the traditional understanding of Paul as author continue to play an important role in the scholarly debate (e.g., Hoehner), and even the traditional understanding of the dependence of Ephesians upon Colossians does not go unquestioned (Best).

OUTLINE

I. Doctrinal Exposition (1:1–3:21)

A. Greeting (1:1–2)

B. Blessing (1:3–14)

C. Thanksgiving and Prayer (1:15–23)

D. God's Plan for the Universe: Believers Made Alive with Christ (2:1–10)

E. The Unity of Jews and Gentiles: Peace Created by Christ (2:11–22)

F. The Role of Paul as Interpreter of the Divine Mystery (3:1–13)

G. Prayer and Doxology (3:14–21)

II. Ethical Exhortations (4:1–6:24)

A. Believers Should Lead a Life Worthy of Their Calling (4:1–16)

B. The Sons of Disobedience and the Children of Light (4:17–5:20)

C. The Household Code (5:21–6:9)

D. Call to Do Battle with Evil (6:10–20)

E. Personal Matters and Final Blessing (6:21–24)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Doctrinal Exposition (1:1–3:21)

A. Greeting (1:1–2)

The opening phrase is identical to that found in Colossians and 2 Corinthians. Although the term apostle can sometimes refer simply to an emissary (literally, one who is sent), the special sense associated with being chosen by God for a mission (cf. Gal 1:12) is in view here as is made clear by the use of the expression "by the will of God." Ephesians is only one of two letters (the other is Romans) in the Pauline corpus that does not refer to a co-author such as Timothy (cf. Col 1:1). This lack of reference to a joint enterprise, coupled with the strong statement about Paul's identity, is in keeping with the emphasis on Paul's divine authority elsewhere.

Commentators who argue that Paul is the author of Ephesians usually view it as having been composed within the context of his imprisonment in Rome (cf. Acts 28:16–31), late in the apostle's career (the early 60s CE), near to the time of the composition of Colossians. For those who view the work as deuterio-Pauline, an Asia Minor context in the latter decades of the first century is the usual explanation. The letter is addressed to the "saints" (tois hagiois; literally "holy ones"). This is a typical manner of referring to all believers in Pauline literature, and it is an expression that is found frequently in Ephesians (cf. 1:15, 18, 3:8; 4:12). Differences in the manuscript tradition account for the fact that the phrase "in Ephesus" often appears in brackets in modern translations or as an alternate reading in the notes. Because the shorter reading is most likely the original (though grammatical difficulties remain), there have been many proposals as to the destination of the work (see Overview above).

The greeting referring to grace and peace is typical of Paul's letters and seems to combine Gentile and Jewish influences, in keeping with emphasis on the achieved unity of Jews and Gentiles in 2:11–22. The key Pauline term "grace" (charis) reflects the standard Greek salutation, "greetings" (chairein) and the traditional Jewish greeting, "peace" (shalom). Not only are both grace (1:6, 7; 2:5, 7, 8; 4:7, 29) and peace (2:14, 15, 17; 4:3; 6:15) central themes in the epistle, but these themes also create a link between the greeting and the closing.

B. Blessing (1:3–14)

The main body of Ephesians begins with a blessing similar to that found in the opening of 2 Corinthians (1:3–4) and 1 Peter (1:3–12). The background is the extended blessing or berakah that is found in the Old Testament (e.g., 1 Kgs 8:15, 56; Pss 41:13; 72:18, 19) and which also formed part of the Jewish worship of the day, as both the Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g., 1QS 11:15; 1QH 5:20) and Luke 1:68–79 demonstrate. Some have argued that Eph 1:3–14 is an early church hymn, but because its language has so many parallels with other Pauline texts, many have preferred the theory that the text is influenced more generally by worship forms.

This text contains many intriguing expressions and theological constructs. Ephesians 1:4, 6 introduce the central theme of love, which with the exception of 1:6 (and possibly 1:4), refers to human and not divine love in the epistle (cf. 1:15, 3:17; 4:2, 15, 16; 5:2, 25, 28, 33; 6:23, 24). The main focus, however, is on God's initiative (with Christ as God's agent), but the three members of the Trinity have a role to play in the text: God (vv.3–6), Christ (vv.7–12), the Holy Spirit (vv. 13–14). Ephesians 1:3 contains an expression not found elsewhere in the Pauline epistles: "the heavenly places" (literally, "the heavenlies"; ta epourania; cf. 1:20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12), here indicating that believers already taste the invisible, heavenly world in Christ. It should be noted that the plural of the expression is in keeping with Hebrew thought and differs somewhat from the view of heaven that was later accepted in Christianity. The heavenly places are in the process of transformation in the new age; they contain evil forces that can still trouble the life of believers (cf. 3:10; 6:12), but they are also the domain of divine transcendence where Christ sits at God's right hand (1:20; 2:6).

Because of its focus on God's plan for the universe, Ephesians often makes use of concepts of election. Emphasis on God's design also shapes the use of the term "mystery" in this passage to refer to the revelation of God's will, the plan (oikonomia) for the fullness of time (1:9–10; cf. 3:3–10; 5:32; 6:19); in Ephesians the content of the mystery is often articulated with notable precision. The use of the term oikonomia (1:10; cf. 3:9) to refer to God's plan is unique to Ephesians. In Col 1:25 the term is best translated as stewardship and it is used in conjunction with Paul's apostolic commission (cf. 3:2); elsewhere in the NT it can refer to stewardship associated with the administration of a house or city (e.g., Rom 16:23). But here the term refers to God's direction of the cosmos and is employed in conjunction with another concept which plays a key role in the distinctive theological vision of both Colossians and Ephesians: "fullness" (pleroma; cf. 1:23; 3:19; 4:13). The term is used in both texts to stress the expansion and filling up of the universe with Christ. Such a theological vision is also central to reference to a summing of all things in Christ in 1:10. Down through the centuries the use of the term anakephalaio̅sasthai ("summing up" or "gather together") has intrigued commentators (especially the Latin Fathers) with its image of the cosmic Christ who draws all things into himself (cf. Col 1:15–20).

Ephesians 1:12–14 offers the first example of the "you"/"we" contrast in the text which has traditionally been taken as an effort to distinguish between the (predominantly?) Gentile recipients of the letter (you) and the Jewish Christians associated with Paul (we) who first came to believe. But the contrast may represent a rhetorical strategy to draw the recipients into the discussion and may not offer reliable insight as to the nature of the audience. Increasingly, Jewish material is seen as offering the most important intellectual background for Ephesians (allusions to Jewish Scripture and parallels with the Dead Sea Scrolls) and there is a general consensus that the document, whether by Paul or an associate, reflects Jewish-Christian authorship. But a growing appreciation of the Jewish presence in Asia Minor and the complexity of their position in Roman society (tolerated or persecuted to varying degrees) is leading to a tendency to leave open the very real possibility of the significant presence of Jewish Christians in the audience (see Muddiman; comments on 2:11–22).

C. Thanksgiving and Prayer (1:15–23)

This passage is closely related to the previous section, with the blessings experienced by the community (vv.1:13–14) providing a thematic link. Thanksgivings are associated with blessings in Jewish liturgical traditions and some of the language (e.g., references to glory) in both sections has a clear liturgical flavor. This thanksgiving offers a particularly long example of a typical feature of Pauline letters (cf. Col 1:3–4; Phlm 4–5), in keeping with Hellenistic letters whereby the author gives thanks to the gods for the health of the recipients. The emphasis on enlightenment and the description of possessing "a spirit of wisdom and revelation" (1:17–19) is especially distinctive and consistent with a broad interest in insight into the mystery of the divine will.

Angels have often been seen as important to understanding this text. Because of parallels with Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g., 1QS 11:7, 8), some have taken the reference to sharing "his glorious inheritance among the saints" (1:18) as a reference to sharing the lot of angels (cf. Col 1:12), which would mean a shift in meaning from Eph 1:15 where the saints clearly refers to believers (cf. 1:1; 2:19; 3:8). But such a shift would be in line with the emphasis on the heavenly ascent or enthronement of believers in Ephesians. Positive angelic powers are also sometimes in view with respect to the expression, "all rule and authority and power and dominion" (1:21)—a reference to spiritual powers subordinate to Christ. But it seems more likely that the "powers" are hostile spiritual beings (Eph 6:12; cf. 1 Cor 15:24–26). Magical practices may underlie the references to spiritual powers. Clinton Arnold has documented the widespread references to naming in the magical papyri; the recipients would have received a powerful message: Christ's name alone triumphs over the powers of evil.

The theological heart is the notion of Christ's exaltation in heavenly places (see notes on 1:3–14). This approach—highlighting God and Christ's power (see quotation of Ps 8:6 in 1:22)—responds to the menacing powers described above. Christ's authority over the church is also celebrated as God has "made him the head over all things for the church" (1:22). The church, referred to for the first time, is given a paramount role in God's plan for salvation (cf. 3:10, 21; 5:23–25, 27, 29, 32). As in Colossians, the church is explicitly equated with the body of Christ with Christ as the head (cf. 1:22–23; 5:23). The reference to "fullness" (see notes on 1:3–14) in 1:23 may refer back directly to Christ in v. 22, but is more likely a second symbol for the church. The notions of Christ, church, and the filling up of the universe are very closely linked. Although the present salvation of believers is stressed above all, Eph 1:21 offers a strong indication that the future remains important.

D. God's Plan for the Universe: Believers Made Alive with Christ (2:1–10)

While the previous section ends with a reference to the universal church (taken up again in 2:11–22), this passage returns to how God's plan for the universe is worked out through Christ. Offering a clear example of the "you-we" contrast found throughout Ephesians (see notes on 1:3–14), the author begins by describing the previous existence of believers as one of spiritual death caused by sin (cf. Rom 7:19–23). The present evil age is ruled by the devil, here described in 2:2 as "the ruler of the power of the air" (cf. John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). Ephesians 2:3 reflects ancient cosmology, including the notion of the air as a type of intermediate realm between the earthly and heavenly realms that is subject to malevolent forces, including the devil (cf. Eph 6:12). Life without Christ is depicted in the most negative of terms, with descriptions of nonbelievers as "those who are disobedient" (literally, sons of disobedience) and "children of wrath." The reference to the "passions of our flesh" also is consistent with Jewish language, particularly characterizations of the Greco-Roman world as one of idolatry and sexual immorality (cf. 1 Thess 4:5). Interestingly, the word for desire in Eph 2:3 (thele⁻ma) is the same as that used to refer to the will of God (cf. 1:1, 5, 9, 11); this passage describes a purely human orientation at odds with the will of God.

Just as Ephesians presents the past existence of believers in dire terms, so too it celebrates the grandeur of God's grace in the most exalted terms. The prominence of the theme of love in Ephesians (see notes on 1:3–14) is reflected in Eph 2:4, "out of the great love with which he loved us," but the emphasis continues to be on the major theological orientation of the opening passages: the initiative, mercy, and grace of God working through Christ. The strong contrast language is probably rooted in baptism where one is raised with Christ (2:1, 2:5–6). In line with Eph 1:20, Eph 2:6 is unreserved in describing the present situation of believers as sharing Christ's destiny, having been raised with Christ and seated with him in the heavenly places in Christ (see notes on 1:3–14). The Pauline expression "in Christ" occurs frequently in Ephesians in the locative sense, indicating the fact that believers are located in his body. Despite the emphasis on the present, the reference to the "ages to come" leaves an opening for a future manifestation of salvation.

The passage concludes with an intriguing expression of the faith-works contrast. Unlike the undisputed letters, there is no specific reference to the meaning of faith in Christ in relation to the works of the Jewish law. With some finding here an indication of deutero-Pauline authorship (the Pauline message for a new day), the works-law contrast is given a broad scope with a strong focus on God's sovereignty and the giftedness of salvation. In stating that believers are created for good works by God beforehand, the author essentially states that good works flow naturally from God's choosing to save us (see Eph 4:1–6:20).

E. The Unity of Jews and Gentiles: Peace Created by Christ (2:11–22)

The author clarifies the relationship between the (predominantly?) Gentile community and Israel. Yet the somewhat ambiguous use of labels, with metaphors that switch back and forth between announcing continuity with Israel (including the implicit equivalence between Israel and the church in 2:12) and projecting the church as a distinct entity (2:15), has led to puzzlement. With such a strong interest in the Jewish origins of church, there is a striking lack of interest in concrete relations with real Jews inside or outside the church. Recent research, however, has read this articulation of the nature of the church in light of an attempt to negotiate the boundaries of identity during a time when, depending on the circumstances, it might be valuable to be linked with the prestige of Israel or, in contrast, to be seen as a new entity in relation to the Jews. Given the significant population of Jews in both Ephesus and Asia Minor generally, there is good reason to suppose that Gentile members of the church had past and current association with the Jewish community and were sometimes labeled as Jews. If Ephesians comes from the time immediately following the destruction of the Jewish Temple in 70 CE, the complexity of the position of the Jews in the Roman Empire would be even more acute. Against prejudice, exclusion, and hostility, the author announces an achieved unity which creates a new entity where old patterns of nationhood, citizenship, and belonging are rendered irrelevant. This text includes politically-charged language with its reference to strangers, aliens, and citizens (Eph 2:12, 19). The four references to the term peace in Eph 2:14–18 include allusions to LXX Isa 57:19, but also to imperial propaganda for Roman rule. In contrast to the Pax Romana, the preaching of peace in Ephesians does not involve terror, intimidation, or military action; it is the peace that comes through the cross and belongs to the ekkle⁻sia—the peace of Christ (cf. 6:15–16). In Eph 2:19–22, architectural, political/military, and familial concepts tied to the visible institutions of society are subverted by the image of the "holy temple" where believers become a dwelling place for God.

F. The Role of Paul as Interpreter of the Divine Mystery (3:1–13)

Although this section may appear at first glance to be a digression, it plays an important role in the transition between the doctrinal and ethical sections of the letter; it is Paul the revealer of the mystery of Christ (3:4) who has the indisputable authority to instruct believers to lead a life worthy of their calling (4:1). Beginning with a strong statement of Paul's authority as the imprisoned apostle, Paul is depicted both as literally in captivity (cf. 4:1), and also captive to Christ's power and control (cf. Col 1:23–29). At the same time, however, Eph 3:2 seems to suggest that Paul does not know the community very well: "for surely you have already heard of the commission of God's grace that was given me for you." The term for commission (oikonomia) is best translated elsewhere in Ephesians as "plan" (1:10, 3:9; see notes on 1:3–14), and here also it is closely tied to that concept to reinforce the notion that Paul's role is to bring God's plan to fruition. Paul is a communicator of the mystery that was made known to him by revelation, recalling themes in the earlier part of the letter (cf. 1:9–10; 1:18; see notes on previous sections). Most commentators today, in fact, take Paul's statement "as I wrote above in a few words" (3:3) as a reference to Eph 1:9–10 and 2:11–22, though it has sometimes been suggested that the phrase refers to Paul's earlier letters or even perhaps to Rom 16:25 (in support of the theory that Rom 16 was originally intended for Ephesus). Ephesians 3:4 presents Paul in an interesting way, as the interpreter of the mystery of Christ. A second reference to revelation in this passage (1:5; cf. 1:3) demonstrates that the source of revelation is the Spirit. Ephesians 3:6 expresses the content of the mystery (Gentiles have become fellow heirs . . .) and constitutes perhaps the most concise expression of the Christian message in Ephesians.

Ephesians 3:7–12 tie many of the letter's themes directly to Paul's mission. Paul is a minister (diakonos, a word that came to designate the office of deacon)—a term used broadly in the ancient world to describe an agent of a highranking person (in this case, God). Ephesians 3:8 affirms Paul's identity as a redeemed persecutor (cf. 1 Cor 15:8–11; Phil 3:5–11). The point of his mission is to make all see the plan of the mystery hidden for ages in God (see 3:4, 9). But the following verses give one of the strongest indications of the importance of ecclesiology for Ephesians. Ephesians 3:9–10 announces the transition from the mystery made known to the select group of apostles and prophets (3:5) to the church and ultimately to the whole cosmos ("the rulers and authorities" are cosmic powers; on this expression and on "the heavenly places" see notes on Eph 1:3–14). It is through the church (the unified body of Jews and Gentiles) resulting from Paul's mission that the manifold wisdom of God is made known in accordance with God's eternal purposes. The final verse in this section, with its use of the term "therefore" (dio) and statement "I pray . . .", provides a transition to the prayer in 3:14–21. The term for sufferings here (thlipsis, "affliction") is regularly used in the undisputed letters of Paul (e.g., Rom 5:3, 8:35; 2 Cor 1:4, 8) and in the parallel text of Col 1:24 is employed to describe the sufferings of Christ. The reference to glory here should not be taken as a glorification of suffering, but as a symbol and manifestation of the promise of salvation (cf. Rom 8:17–18).

G. Prayer and Doxology (3:14–21)

Taking up the thought that was interrupted at 3:1, this text links the prayer with the accomplished unity of Jew and Gentile (2:11–22). But the passage is also to be read in light of the previous section on Paul's authority as the instrument of God's plan to bring about this new creation. Homage is closely associated with prayer (cf. Rom 14:11; Phil 2:10). The description of the object of prayer in 3: 14–15 is especially interesting for its connections to other references to family/household in Ephesians. The word for Father (pater) has a clear relationship to the word for family (patria). The expression, "the Father from whom every family . . ." both recalls the description of the household of God in Eph 2:19 with its cosmic/ spiritual dimensions, the entity joining Jew and Gentile together, and points forward to the ethical exhortations concerning families in 5:21–6:9. Thus, Eph 3:15 connects the earthly community to the heavenly community. "Every family in heaven," probably refers to the company of angels (perhaps good and hostile angelic beings—see notes on 1:15–23), but in keeping with Ephesians as a whole, we are reminded once again of God the Father's supreme authority over all.

The prayer, infused with liturgical expressions (e.g., "riches of his glory") in Eph 3:16–19 is for the most profound spiritual gifts, and is formulated in terms of three prayer requests ("I pray that" [3:16]; "I pray that" [3:18], "so that you" [3:19]). To be strengthened in one's inner being with "power through his Spirit" means that believers are shielded from cosmic powers (cf. 5:20; 6:10; see notes on 1:3–14). The "inner-self" and the "heart" in 3:16–17 are synonymous and in ancient thought represent the zone of commitment (often along with eyes). Similarly, the indwelling of Christ corresponds to the strengthening that comes through the Spirit in 3:16. The central theme of love is juxtaposed with knowledge to make the point that to know the love of Christ surpasses any knowledge of a technical or academic kind (3:17–19). The third prayer request, "that you may be filled with all the fullness of God" is a request for union with God in the strongest possible terms (3:19). The passage culminates fittingly in a doxology proclaiming God's power (3:20–21). The fact that this is the only doxology in the NT containing both the phrase "in the church" and "in Christ Jesus" is especially noteworthy and is consistent with interest in the identity of the church. Doxologies in the NT typically make reference to eternity and end with Amen (cf. Rom 16:25–27; Phil 4:20).

II. Ethical Exhortations (4:1–6:24)

A. Believers Should Lead a Life Worthy of Their Calling (4:1–16)

This section constitutes the beginning of the second part of the epistle, the ethical exhortations. But there are clear linguistic links with the previous section, emphasizing an important theological point seen also in other Pauline letters: descriptions of the nature of salvation in the indicative lead to the imperatives of ethical exhortation. This is made especially clear by the use of the term "therefore" which relates this section to the celebration of God's power in the doxology of Eph 3:20–21. The same introductory term, "I beg you" (parakalo), is found in Rom 12:1 (NRSV, "I appeal to you"), and the self-designation of Paul as the prisoner in Eph 4:1 recalls 3:1 and 3:14.

This text is often cited as one of the most inspirational of the document. Along with Eph 2:11–22 and Eph 5:21–6:9, it plays a key role in weaving the theme of unity throughout the epistle. From the perspective of Ephesians, unity (closely associated with peace and love: 4:2–3, 15–16) is perhaps the most clearly visible product of God's interaction with the world, as believers come to "maturity, to the measure of the full stature of Christ" (4:13). Here the emphasis is on the unity of the Spirit that characterizes the life of the assembly (cf. 2:18). Frequent references to the body (4:4, 12, 15–16), the universal church governed by Christ as its "head," strengthen this emphasis (see notes on 1:15–23).

The beautiful confession of unity in Eph 4:4–6 (including references to the persons of the Trinity) prepares the way for the treatment of the diversity of gifts and ministries that begins at v. 7 and continues to the end of the passage. The list of church leaders in Eph 4:11 seems to emphasize the teacher-preacher role: apostles and prophets as charismatic teachers of the early Christian movement are listed first (cf. Eph 2:20 and notes on 2:11–22). Evangelists (cf. Acts 21:8) and pastors (cf. Acts 20:28, a cognate verb occurs where "shepherding" is a task of the elders) are not mentioned in the undisputed letters of Paul. The importance of the role of teachers (cf. 1 Cor 12:28) is bolstered by the reference to false teaching in Eph 4:14.

Ephesians contains many allusions to Scripture, but only a few direct quotations. One of the most unusual is the citation of Ps 68:18 in Eph 4:8–9. The text may reflect points of contact with ancient rabbinic tradition that understood the psalm in terms of Moses ascending Mount Sinai. Therefore, Christ would be the new Moses who gives gifts (see especially Lincoln). There are also liturgical influences in this passage. The sustained, poetic repetition of "one" in Eph 4:4–6 and "all" in 4:6 suggests a liturgical context. Some have viewed the text as a self-contained hymn, but most view it as including liturgical echoes, especially of baptism (cf. 1 Cor 12:13; Col 3:15).

B. The Sons of Disobedience and the Children of Light (4:17–5:20)

This passage continues the emphasis on ethics begun at 4:1–16. In fact, the word "therefore" connects the two passages. Ephesians 4:17–5:20 is united by two common purposes: an effort to distance the way of life of believers from that of nonbelievers and determination to encourage unity among believers by means of adoption of ethical virtues and harmonious worship.

There is a strong dependence on tradition in this section, including reliance on Colossians (e.g. Eph 4:17–24 = Col 3:5–10), reworked material from the undisputed letters of Paul (e.g., Eph 4:17–19 = Rom 1:21–24), and great similarity to the language of the Qumran literature. With traditional influences brought together and sharpened by the author of Ephesians, the result is an uncompromising distinction between those outside the church and those inside (Eph 4:17–5:20). Comparison of Col 4:5 to Eph 5:15–16 makes this especially apparent, for Colossians leaves some opening for dialogue while Ephesians sets its call for walking wisely within the context of eschatological woes! In a society that was increasingly unfriendly to the early Christians, Ephesians is forthright about menacing evil and its ongoing threat. The stark contrasts of Ephesians do recall similar concepts from the Qumran literature, but the subsequent household code passage with its embracing of family life (Eph 5:21–6:9) makes it clear that Ephesians is not encouraging the kind of visible, physical measures to encourage segregation found among the Essenes.

While the uncompromising, categorical thinking of Ephesians may seem shocking to modern readers (and most see no place for it in Christian dialogue with the world), it is important to recognize that the first Christians were convinced that they now belonged to a perfected creation through Christ (4:20–24) and presented its alternative in the strongest possible terms. Moreover, many of the virtues and vices in this text continue to be viewed as having value for Christian life.

The recommendation of boldness in worship in Eph 5:18–20 should probably be read against an atmosphere where early Christians were being accused of disorderly, immoral behavior like other new cults. Worship for believers should be the opposite of drunkenness and debauchery. Instead, believers are to be filled with the Spirit. The picture is one of intimate worship where community members speak to one another with psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (It is impossible to distinguish between these expressions, but songs, tongues, instrumental music, and psalms from the biblical psalter are all possible; an early Christian hymn is cited at 5:14).

C. The Household Code (5:21–6:9)

Commentators debate whether 5:21 is more closely connected with 4:17–5:20 or 5:22–6:9, but it is nevertheless clear that the 5:22–6:9 is a self-contained unit, the household code. This was a typical form of early Christian discourse (e.g., Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Pet 2:18–3:7), found in a theologically expanded form here, in comparison to Colossians. Although particular features of its structure seem to have evolved within early church circles, in general the exhortations concerning relations between familial pairs originated from Hellenistic discussions of household management. Many have viewed this reinforcement of the traditional arrangements of the family (including slavery) as rooted in the need for apologetic: the need to reassure outsiders that early church groups could live peaceably in society.

Feminist scholars, in particular, have noted the absence of such an explicitly hierarchical vision of family life from the undisputed letters of Paul and have highlighted the problematic nature of the language. It certainly requires sensitive interpretation in a modern context, with warnings against using metaphorical language to reinforce notions of male superiority (husbands are compared to Christ) in the face of female fallibility (wives are compared to the human church). Yet, many have identified some elements of the text with timeless value. For example, it offers one of the best illustrations of the two central and related themes of unity and love in the epistle. Because it is so heavily infused with theological reflection, this passage also offers some of the best illustrations of the fundamental link between doctrine and ethics in the work. Ultimately, it means that daily life, even when largely conventional, is filled with meaning for those who belong to the household of God (2:19) and are under the guidance of the Father from whom every family is named (3:14). The call to mutual submission in 5:21, and warnings against excessive severity and calls to love, warn fathers, masters, and husbands of their ultimate loyalty and accountability.

It is in the teaching on marriage where we find the most frequent allusions to Scripture, serving to anchor the theological message about the relationship between the human and the divine (Eph 5:26 [Ezek 16:9]; 5:28 [Lev 19:18]). A direct citation of Gen 2:24 is found in Eph 5:31, to speak not only about the nature of marriage but also to shed light on the mysterious relationship between Christ and the church (5:32). Mystery is a key concept in Ephesians associated with the revelation of the will of God (see notes on Eph 1:3–14).

A second direct citation of Scripture is found in Eph 6:2, the fourth commandment to honor parents (Exod 20:12; cf. Deut 5:16). Along with the parallel text in Colossians, Ephesians offers arguably the earliest indisputable expression of the valuing of the parent-child relationship in the NT. The direct address to children demonstrates that they were present in the early church assembly. The reference to "the discipline and instruction of the Lord" (6:4) marks the beginning of an interest in the Christian socialization of children that extends into the period of the apostolic fathers (cf. 1 Clem. 21.6, 8; Did. 4.9; Pol., Phil. 4.2).

D. Call to Do Battle with Evil (6:10–20)

The term "finally" signals the conclusion of the ethical exhortation that began in 4:1. The text has been compared to segments of ancient addresses which sought to bring the work to conclusion and arouse the emotion of audiences (Lincoln). The speeches of generals before battle seem to offer particularly appropriate parallels, reminding soldiers of their superior strength and of their disdain for the enemy. Of course, the evil powers are spiritual agencies and not human authorities (6:12). But while they are not earthly enemies, these spiritual powers in Ephesians are understood as deeply affecting the society in which believers live (2:1–3). The dominion of the spiritual powers leads to moral decay and the only true protection is God's armor of ethical and spiritual virtues. The crowning touches of the armor are the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit (6:17) which render the evil one powerless. The recipients of the epistle have been reassured that Christ's power transcends all spiritual forces and fills the universe. But this text offers an especially vivid example of the tension that characterizes the document as a whole between the victory already accomplished against evil (2:6) and the continuing threat of menacing powers. Like the speeches of generals before armed battles, it offers encouragement and strength in the face of suffering. This becomes especially evident in the shift from the image of the believer as armed soldier to the image of the suffering apostle in 6:18–20.

E. Personal Matters and Final Blessing (6:21–24)

The conclusion includes the only real reference to personal matters in the epistle, including the only individual named in Ephesians, Tychicus. He is consistently mentioned in the letters often considered deuterio-Pauline (Col 4:7–8; 2 Tim 4:12; Tit 3:12) and, therefore, may have been associated with the final stages of Paul's ministry. In the Pastoral Epistles he is presented as the emissary to Ephesus. There is a very close literary relationship between Eph 6:21–24 and Col 4:7–8, and this has figured prominently in theories concerning the dependence of Ephesians upon Colossians and deuterio-Pauline authorship.

The conclusion includes a final blessing and typical features of the endings of Paul's letters such as a wish for peace and bestowal of grace. "Peace" and "grace" (but in reverse order) are found in the initial greeting (1:2). The gifts of faith and love are also in keeping with previous teaching. In particular, love plays a key role in the ethics of the second half of the epistle; it is the means by which believers can emulate Christ (e.g., 5:2). The last phrase of Ephesians is subject to a variety of translations. The final expression, en aphtharsia (literally, "in immortality" or "in incorruptibility"), has often been understood as modifying "love" as in the NRSV, "undying love." But others hold that the expression modifies grace: "Grace be to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in immortality" (author's trans.). This is consistent with the cosmic perspective of the epistle: a life with Christ (2:6) that grows into eternity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. E. Arnold. Ephesians, Power, and Magic: The Concept of Power in Ephesians in Light of its Historical Setting. MSSNTS 63 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); E. Best. Ephesians. ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998); H. W. Hoehner. Ephesians: An Exegetical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002); A. Lincoln. Ephesians. WBC 42 (Dallas: Word Books, 1990); M. Y. MacDonald. Colossians and Ephesians. SP 17 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2000); . "The Politics of Identity in Ephesians." JSNT (2004) 419–44; J. Muddiman. The Epistle to the Ephesians. BNTC (London and New York: Continuum, 2001); P. Perkins. Ephesians. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1997).

PHILIPPIANS

J. ROSS WAGNER

OVERVIEW

Locked in chains under Roman custody, the apostle Paul writes a letter full of joy, thanksgiving, and hope to a small group of believers residing in the Macedonian city of Philippi. By the first century CE, Philippi was the civic and economic center of a large, chiefly agrarian Roman colony. Though its population comprised Greeks, Romans, Thracians, and diverse foreigners, as a colony its public life was strongly oriented toward Rome. Its municipal government followed the Roman pattern; Romans held most of the important administrative offices; its official inscriptions appeared in Latin; and its citizens enjoyed Roman citizenship. The small Christian congregation in Philippi would have been surrounded by constant reminders of the power and glory of Rome, its emperor, and its gods.

Acts 16 recounts the founding of the Philippian church by Paul and his co-workers, including Timothy (cf. Phil 1:1; 2:19–23). Following the apostle's departure from the city, the community continued its partnership with Paul, sending emissaries to aid his mission in places such as Thessalonica and Corinth (Phil 4:15–18; 2 Cor 11:8–9). Paul and his coworkers appear to have returned to Philippi periodically (2 Cor 1:16; 2:13; 7:5; Acts 20:3; Phil 2:19–24). Though burdened with poverty, the Philippians further displayed their generous spirit through joyfully contributing to Paul's collection of relief funds for the Jerusalem church (2 Cor 8:1–5). The warmth and affection that pervade the letter reflect this long partnership in the work of the gospel.

The particular circumstances surrounding the writing of Philippians can be reconstructed only with difficulty. Complicating the endeavor is the possibility that our canonical Philippians is a composite of two or three originally separate letters. The arguments are complex but, on balance, the numerous connections of thought and language that run from the first chapter to the last—such as Paul's repeated call to adopt the "same mind" (1:27; 2:2; 3:15; 4:2) and his appeal throughout the letter to Christ's story (2:5–11) as moral paradigm—speak in favor of the unity of Philippians. On this assumption, the occasion for the letter may be sketched as follows.

Paul is in chains awaiting a trial that may well result in his execution (1:19–20; 2:17, 23–24). The place and date of this imprisonment remain uncertain. The traditional setting is Rome (c. 60 CE or later), but strong cases have also been made for Ephesus (early-mid 50s, cf. 1 Cor 15:32; 2 Cor 11:23) and Caesarea (late 50s, cf. Acts 23:33–35). Hearing of Paul's imprisonment, the Philippians send an emissary, Epaphroditus, to encourage Paul and to care for his needs. But in carrying out his commission, Epaphroditus falls seriously ill and nearly dies. Upon his recovery, it is determined that he should return to Philippi (2:25–30). The letter that Paul sends with him expresses thanks to the Philippian congregation for their mission of mercy and offers news of his situation. More than this, however, Paul writes in order to continue his apostolic ministry among them by teaching, encouraging, and admonishing the congregation to pattern their common life after Christ's example of self-giving love. Through his letter, Paul seeks to further God's work in the community so that they may worthily embody the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ in the midst of Roman Philippi.

OUTLINE

- I. Address and Greeting (1:1–2)
- II. Thanksgiving and Prayer (1:3–11)
- III. Paul's Imprisonment and the Progress of the Gospel (1:12–26)
- IV. The Philippians' Calling: Living as a Christ-Shaped Community (1:27–4:3)
 - A. Thematic Exhortation: Live Your Common Life in a Manner Worthy of the Gospel (1:27–30)
 - B. Exhortation: Adopt Among Yourselves the Mindset of Christ (2:1–5)
 - C. Examples to Follow (2:5–3:21)
 - 2:5–11. Christ the Paradigmatic Example
 - 2:12–18, Exhortation: Work Out Your Salvation, for God is Working Among You
 - 2:19–30. Examples of Cruciform Living: Paul's Co-workers
 - 3:1–14. A Further Example of Cruciform Living: Paul's Own Story
 - 3:15–21. Call to Imitation with a Counterexample
 - D. Specific Application: Restoring Unity Between Leaders (4:1–3)
- V. Final Exhortations: The Way of Joy and Peace (4:4–9)
- VI. Gratitude for the Philippians' Partnership in the Gospel (4:10–20)
- VII. Closing Greeting and Prayer (4:21–23)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Address and Greeting (1:1–2)

Paul's refashioning of the typical hellenistic letter opening—"A to B: Greetings"—emphasizes that God's actions in Christ determine the identities of author and recipients alike. Paul and Timothy write as "slaves (NRSV, 'servants') of Christ Jesus" (cf. Rom 1:1; 2 Cor 4:5; Gal 1:10), whose lives belong completely to their master and whose authority derives from his. They address the Philippians as "saints," members of a worldwide people (cf. 4:21–22) set apart in Christ Jesus as God's very own (cf. Exod 19:5–6). Paul greets them with a blessing, invoking "grace . . . and peace" from God, the Father of them all, and from their common "master (NRSV, 'Lord') Jesus Christ." The reason for the special mention of "bishops and deacons," unique among Paul's letter openings, remains unclear. In any case, Paul addresses what follows to the community as a whole, as his repeated references to "all of you" attest (1:4, 7, 8).

II. Thanksgiving and Prayer (1:3–11)

Following his normal pattern, Paul introduces central themes of the letter in his opening thanksgiving and prayer. The clear note of joy struck here (1:4)—remarkable for a letter composed while in chains—resounds throughout the letter. Such joy arises, not from his circumstances or those of the Philippians, but from a deep-seated trust in the reliability of God, who is unfailingly working out God's good purposes for them all (1:6; cf. 2:12–13). A confident expectation of God's imminent triumph at "the day of Jesus Christ" (1:6; 10; 2:16) undergirds Paul's hopeful perspective as he eagerly looks forward to sharing in Christ's resurrection and vindication by God (cf. 2:16; 3:10–11; 3:20; 4:5).

The long partnership (koinōnia) between Paul and the Philippians, stretching from the apostle's founding visit to the present (1:5; 4:15–16), constitutes another major motif of the letter. Their participation in the proclamation, and now the defense, of the gospel is a sharing in God's grace (1:7), for it belongs to the good work God is accomplishing among them (1:6). Similarly, the spirit of mutual love in Christ that pervades Paul's thanksgiving comes to expression repeatedly in what follows. Paul prays that the Philippians' self-giving love, embodied most recently in the embassy of Epaphroditus (2:25–30), will "overflow more and more" (1:9). Shaped by "knowledge and full insight," this love will be able to determine "what really matters" (1:10, ta diapheronta; NRSV, "what is best"). Such discerning love, Paul will soon argue, represents the very mindset of Christ (2:5). Its outcome is "the harvest of righteousness that comes through Jesus Christ," and its goal "the glory and praise of God" (1:11; cf. 2:11; 4:20).

III. Paul's Imprisonment and the Progress of the Gospel (1:12–26)

As he reports on his circumstances, Paul addresses the Philippians in familial language (1:12, NRSV margin, "brothers"), reflecting the new social reality that God, their Father, has called into being in Christ. Rather than focus on the shame, deprivation, and affliction he himself is experiencing, Paul models for his brothers and sisters the Christ-shaped mindset that is able to discern "what really matters." He boldly asserts that, although he is bound with chains, what really matters is that the gospel is making progress (1:12). Because of his chains, the gospel has advanced right to the heart of Roman power (1:13). Moreover, Paul's example has emboldened others in the community to speak God's word publicly without fear (1:14). Most do so out of love, desiring to labor alongside Paul, whom they recognize has been appointed by God "for the defense of the gospel" (1:16). Others, Paul believes, are motivated by selfish ambition, perhaps seeing an opportunity to increase their influence in the community at the apostle's expense while his activities are curtailed. Despite the pain of these personal rivalries, Paul chooses to rejoice. (Contrast his response in Gal 1:6–9, however, when he encounters those who preach "a different gospel.") What really matters are not Paul's own interests, but the interests of Christ that are being advanced as "Christ is proclaimed in every way, whether out of false motives or true" (1:18; cf. 2:4, 21).

A single-minded focus on "what is best" similarly shapes the apostle's reflections on his own uncertain fate. As he awaits trial on a capital charge, his chief concern is to continue to speak boldly (cf. 1:14) so that "Christ will be exalted now as always in [his] body, whether by life or by death" (1:20). Paul derives courage from his friends' prayers, and he relies on "the help of the Spirit of Jesus Christ." Like Job (Job 13:16–18), he trusts that his "deliverance," his vindication, rests firmly in God's hands (1:19; cf. 1:20, "not put to shame in any way"). The memorable phrase, "For to me, living is Christ and dying is gain," captures the heart of Paul's understanding of salvation. To live means sharing the fellowship of Christ's sufferings (cf. 3:10) by engaging in the "fruitful labor" of the gospel (1:22), while dying leads to the reward of life in Christ's very presence (1:23). Drawing on the economic language he will employ more extensively later (3:7–8), Paul acknowledges that he longs for the far greater "gain" that death promises. Yet, once again, he places others' interests above his own. Judging that it is "more necessary" for the Philippians that he remain alive, Paul looks ahead confidently to his release and to the "boasting" in Christ (cf. 1:20) that his reunion with them will occasion (1:24–26).

IV. The Philippians' Calling: Living as a Christ-Shaped Community (1:27–4:3)

Paul does not wait until he is safely back in Philippi, however, to resume his apostolic labor of advancing the community's "progress and joy in faith." In this longest section of the letter, he urges the Philippians to shape their common life in accordance with the pattern of Christ's own self-giving love, and he parades before their eyes a series of exemplary figures who embody this cruciform pattern of life.

A. Thematic Exhortation: Live Your Common Life in a Manner Worthy of the Gospel (1:27–30)

The centrality of Paul's exhortation in 1:27 is underscored by the word which begins the sentence (both in Greek and in English)—"Only." Whether the apostle is present or absent, the community must maintain its focus on the one thing that really matters, namely, conducting their common life in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ. It is difficult to capture the force of v. 27 in translation. The verb rendered by the NRSV, "live your life," politeuesthe, is related to the word "city" (polis), from which derives the English word "politics." Paul speaks here of their life as a community, conducted in public before a watching—and sometimes hostile (1:28)—society. The particular force of this word would not have been lost on Paul's hearers in Philippi, a city whose elites prided themselves on their status as citizens of a Roman colony. (It is conceivable that the Philippian church included citizens among its members, but there is no explicit evidence for this either within the letter itself or in the account of Paul's visit to Philippi in Acts 16.) The quality of their public, communal life is to be judged, not according to the standards of Roman society, but by its conformity to the new reality inaugurated by God's redemptive action in Christ and heralded by the gospel.

Just as concord represented a core value of the ancient city and of the various households and voluntary associations it comprised, so here Paul stresses the importance of unity—"in one spirit . . . with one mind"—for the sake of their communal witness to the faith of the gospel (1:27). Employing athletic imagery ("striving side by side," 1:27), he urges them to band together to "stand firm" in the "contest" (1:30; NRSV, "struggle") in which they are engaged.

Their opponents go unnamed. Evidence for a significant Jewish presence in the city in Paul's time is lacking (cf. Acts 16:13). Most likely these are Gentile neighbors who view this (predominantly Gentile) community's allegiance to the Jewish God and his crucified Messiah as a foreign and un-Roman manner of life. The small church constitutes a potential threat to public order and to the common welfare, which depends on the favor of the gods of the city and of the empire, as well as on the good will of the emperor (cf. Acts 16:20–21; 17:6–7). Paul, however, offers his hearers an alternative narrative by which to interpret this conflict of cultures. God, in "graciously granting" them faith in Christ and partnership in the gospel (cf. 1:7), has also given them the grace, alongside Paul, of fellowship with Christ through sharing Christ's sufferings (1:29–30; cf. 3:10). And their steadfastness in suffering, which Paul likewise attributes to God's working among them (1:28; cf. 1:6), offers incontrovertible evidence that they will also share with Paul in Christ's vindication (1:28; cf. 1:19; 3:11).

B. Exhortation: Adopt Among Yourselves the Mindset of Christ (2:1–5)

In a carefully crafted appeal full of genuine warmth and pathos, the apostle reminds his hearers of the loving fellowship they enjoy by virtue of God's action among them through Christ and the Spirit (2:1). Heaping up expressions for concord ("same mind . . . same love . . . full accord . . . one mind," 2:2), he implores them to "make [his] joy complete" by displaying their unity through loving, self-sacrificial service of one another. Anticipating his retelling of Christ's story in 2:6–8, Paul urges his listeners in "humility" (cf. 2:8) to "regard" (cf. 2:6) others' interests as more important than their own (2:3–4). He calls the Philippians to embody that particular unity which derives from adopting among themselves the "mind" displayed by Christ, a mindset that is already their own by virtue of the fact that God has united them together "in Christ" (2:5; together the NRSV text and margin capture well the—quite possibly intentional—ambiguity of Paul's wording). This mindset will shape their thoughts, affections, and actions in such a way that their lives will come to embody the pattern of self-giving love that characterized Jesus' life. It is this pattern that Paul's retelling of the story of Christ now vividly displays before their eyes.

C. Examples to Follow (2:5–3:21)

2:5–11. Christ the Paradigmatic Example. Although Paul transmits few sayings of Jesus, his depiction of Jesus' obedience to God through loving, humble service of others coheres at a fundamental level with the portraits of this figure painted by the four canonical Gospels. The poetic narration of Jesus' humiliation and exaltation in Phil 2:6–11, paralleled by more compact statements elsewhere in Paul's writings (e.g., Gal 2:20b; 2 Cor 5:14–15; 8:9), is widely thought to derive from an early Christian hymn. Whatever its origin, this narrative plays a central role in Philippians, for Jesus' story serves as the touchstone by which Paul evaluates the other exemplary figures in this letter.

Nearly every aspect of the background and interpretation of this so-called "Christ Hymn" continues to prompt lively scholarly debate. Yet the general plot-line of the story told here is clear. As one who existed in "the form of God," Christ did not exploit this "equality with God" for his own selfish advantage (2:6). Instead, he "emptied himself" for the sake of others (NIV, "made himself nothing") by voluntarily assuming "the form of a slave" (2:7). In "human likeness," he "humbled himself" by becoming "obedient to the point of death"—even to the extent of suffering the utterly shameful death of a slave on a Roman cross (2:8).

One crucial word—"therefore" (2:9)—signals the turning point of the story. Precisely on the basis of Jesus' obedient self-abasement for others, God has now "highly exalted" this "slave" by enthroning him as "master" (2:11; NRSV, "Lord"). The resurrection inverts human ideologies of honor and shame by publicly vindicating Jesus' life of loving obedience to God and self-sacrificing service to others. It thus implicitly calls into question any pretensions to "lordship" founded on conquest and domination. Living in a city that prided itself on its loyalty to the Roman Empire and its "Lord," Caesar, the risks of confessing Jesus as "Lord" would hardly have been lost on the Philippians.

But the implications of the Christ Hymn are more revolutionary still. In describing the universal homage paid to the exalted Jesus, vv. 10–11 draw on the language and imagery of Isa 45:23–25. This stunningly bold appropriation of Israel's Scriptures identifies the man Jesus with the one

God of Israel, who alone is worthy of worship. It finds a parallel in Paul's equally daring rewriting of the Shema (Deut 6:4: "The LORD is our God, the LORD alone") in 1 Cor 8:6 ("for us there is one God, the Father . . . and one Lord, Jesus Christ"). By locating the story of Jesus within the story that determines the identity of the one God of Israel, Paul claims nothing less than this: that the loving self-donation of Jesus reveals what God is like in God's very being. For this reason, the universal acclamation, "Jesus Christ is Lord," serves the ultimate end of glorifying God the Father (2:11).

2:12–18. Exhortation: Work Out Your Salvation, for God Is Working Among You. Because the story of Jesus—indeed, the story of God—told in Phil 2:6–11 sets the pattern of life for Jesus' followers, the exhortations in 2:12–18 flow out of, and find their grounding in, this foundational narrative ("Therefore," 2:12). Just as Jesus was obedient to God (2:8), so the Philippians must continue to practice the obedience (2:12) that they have learned from Paul and consistently displayed in his presence (cf. 4:9). Paul deftly weaves together divine and human agency as he calls them to "work out" their own salvation (2:12) precisely because "it is God who is at work" among them (2:13). The Philippians' ongoing obedience, then, is itself the outworking of the prior and continuing activity of God, who is the one producing in them both "[their own] willing and [their own] working, for God's good pleasure" (2:13, author's translation).

In what follows, Paul fleshes out what it means for them to "work out" their salvation (2:14–16). To this end, he draws on two scriptural narratives—the wandering in the wilderness and the exile in Babylon—to help them envision their calling as God's people in Philippi. Paul's reference to "murmuring and arguing" (2:14) evokes images of the wilderness generation (see Exod 15:22–16:12; Ps 106:25; 1 Cor 10:10), while "children of God without blemish" (2:15) takes up and reverses the characterization of the Israelites in Moses' song (Deut 32:5; cf. Matt 17:17; Acts 2:40). By means of this allusive comparison of the Philippians to Israel in the desert, Paul gently reminds them of the dangers of unfaithfulness to God and exhorts them to a very different pattern of life in the midst of their own "crooked and perverse generation" (2:15; cf. Deut 32:5).

"Holding fast to the word of life" in this dark setting (2:16), the Philippians "shine like stars in the world" (2:15), just as Daniel and his compatriots faithfully bore witness to God in an alien land (cf. Dan 12:3a LXX: "those who have understanding will shine like the stars of heaven," author's translation). As the Philippians live their public, communal life in a manner worthy of the gospel, they commend the "message that brings life" (NRSV, "word of life") to those around them. "On the day of Christ," their faithful perseverance will be proof of God's working among them (cf. 1:6, 10) and the ground for Paul's "boast" that his labors on their behalf have not been in vain (2:16). Paul's reward for "running" and toiling in the gospel, his victor's "crown" (4:1), will be his joyful fellowship with the Philippians themselves in the presence of Christ.

Meanwhile, even as he faces the very real possibility of death as the immediate outcome of his tireless labors on their behalf, Paul rejoices over their lives of faithful obedience, which are a "sacrifice and offering" to God (note the language of worship also in 2:30; 3:3; 4:18). The stress in vv. 17–18 on the mutuality of their joy in one another represents yet another expression of the deep fellowship with the Philippians for which the apostle gives thanks throughout the letter.

2:19–30. Examples of Cruciform Living: Paul's Co-workers. Paul's letters commonly include information about the travel plans of the apostle and his co-workers. Philippians is no exception. Here, however, Paul's report concerning Timothy and Epaphroditus has the additional purpose of drawing the Philippians' attention to two people well known to them, whose lives embody the pattern of life that flows from the mindset of Christ.

Paul's characterization of Timothy recalls the Christ Hymn and its introduction. Just as the community is to strive for unity of mind ("with one mind," 1:27; "of one mind," 2:2), so Timothy is "likeminded" with Paul (2:20, KJV) in his deep concern for the Philippians' welfare as he works side by side with the apostle "like a son with a father" (2:22). Rather than seeking his own interests, Timothy serves "[the interests] of Jesus Christ" (2:21) by being "genuinely concerned for [the Philippians'] welfare" (2:20; cf. 2:4). Following Christ, who willingly made himself a slave (doulos, 2:7; see NRSV margin), Timothy— Christ's slave (doulos, 1:1; see NRSV margin)— has faithfully "served as a slave" (douleuo⁻, 2:22, author's translation; NRSV, "served") alongside Paul.

Turning to Epaphroditus in vv. 25–30, Paul again draws on the Christ Hymn to portray a person whose life replicates the pattern of Christ's self-giving obedience. For the sake of "the work of Christ"—seeking Paul's welfare—Epaphroditus drew near "to the point of death" (2:30, author's translation; NRSV, "close to death"). It was God's mercy (2:27) that delivered Epaphroditus from death and spared Paul the sorrow of losing his "brother and co-worker and fellow soldier" (2:25). Epaphroditus functions as a particularly powerful example to the Philippians, for he is not an apostle, but one of them. His service as "minister" (leitourgos, 2:25) to Paul's need represents the "priestly ministry" (leitourgia, 2:30 author's translation; NRSV, "services") of the entire community, "all" of whom share together with Paul in the work of the gospel (1:4–5). Paul's instruction to "honor such people" implies that there will be other such exemplars of Christ's cruciform (crossshaped) pattern of life among them (cf. 3:17; 4:3).

3:1–14. A Further Example of Cruciform Living: Paul's Own Story. For some, the jarring transition between 3:1 and 3:2 reveals a seam created when a later compiler joined together two originally separate letters of Paul to Philippi. But the pairing of positive and negative examples is conventional in ancient moral instruction, and many scholars, impressed by the consistency of Paul's language and thought throughout the letter (see Introduction), attribute the abrupt shift to invective in 3:2 to Paul's rhetorical purposes and to the circumstances of his writing rather than to the clumsiness of a later editor.

Paul's argument flows more smoothly if his comment in 3:1 about writing "the same things" again as a "safeguard" refers to the sharp warning he immediately issues in 3:2 against "the dogs . . . the evil workers . . . those who mutilate the flesh." Vituperative language such as Paul employs here, while shocking to modern sensibilities, was a commonplace of ancient polemics, whether in political debates or in disputes between philosophical schools. Paul's probable target is rival missionaries who insisted that Gentile believers in Christ submit to circumcision and take on at least some of the stipulations of the Jewish law (cf. Acts 15:1–5; Galatians). These opponents' abrupt appearance in the letter, and their just as sudden departure from it, suggests that they pose no immediate threat to the Philippian church. But hard experience in Galatia and Corinth has taught Paul the necessity of putting his congregations on guard against their eventual encounter with such traveling teachers. He does so by drawing a sharp contrast between zealous concern with outward manifestations of godliness such as physical circumcision—which by a play on words he dismisses as kata-tome⁻, "mutilation" (NRSV margin)—and inward devotion to God, for which he claims the term peri-tome⁻, "circumcision." Presupposing passages in Israel's Scriptures that speak of circumcision of the heart (Deut 10:16; 30:6; Jer 4:4), Paul identifies "the circumcision" as "we . . . who worship in the Spirit of God" (3:3; cf. Gal 3:1–5; Rom 2:28–29). Their confidence rests solely "in Christ Jesus," and they refuse to rely on circumcision or any other mark of distinction that belongs only to "the flesh" to secure their right standing with God.

In 3:4–14, Paul offers himself as the paradigmatic example of what it means for one to "boast in Christ Jesus and put no confidence in the flesh" (3:3). The apostle's comparison of his past life with his present life in Christ has often been interpreted along anti-Jewish lines, but it is crucial to recognize that Paul nowhere renounces his Jewish heritage or disparages his past life as a Pharisee. Indeed, for his argument to work, these must represent real "gains," for only so does Paul's testimony to "the surpassing value" of Christ carry any rhetorical force.

Paul recounts his impeccable genealogy with evident pride: circumcised by parents who strictly observed the law of Moses, a descendant of Israel, a member of the tribe of Benjamin (a fact to which Paul also draws attention in Rom 11:1), a "Hebrew born of Hebrews" (3:5). This latter phrase probably refers to Jews who carefully preserved their ancestral traditions, including the Hebrew language, even in the Diaspora. Paul's identity as a Pharisee marks him as one who was deeply devoted to God and meticulous in observing God's commands. Following the pattern of national heroes such as Phinehas (Num 25:11; Sir 45:23; 1 Macc 2:26) and the Maccabean martyrs (1 Macc 2:27, 50), Paul demonstrated his "zeal" for the law by attempting to extirpate from Israel those he saw as blatantly violating God's covenant (3:6). With great confidence, he judges his former life to have been, in fact, "blameless" when measured by the law's standard of righteousness.

It is only in light of "the surpassing value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord" that Paul now regards the very real "gains" of his past to register as "loss" (3:7–8). What is more, though Paul has lost everything for the sake of Christ, he considers these things to amount to nothing more than "rubbish" ("dung," KJV) in comparison with the immeasurable value of "gaining Christ." Paul has lost all confidence in his "own" righteousness based on his blameless fidelity to Israel's law (3:9). United to Christ by God's action ("found in him"), Paul has a righteousness—a right standing with God—that does not belong to him, but that comes from God dia piste^s Christou. Scholars debate whether this phrase in 3:9 should be translated "through faith in Christ" (NRSV text) or "through the faith of Christ" (NRSV margin). However, in view of Paul's emphasis in Philippians on the believing community's participation "in Christ" (see comment on 4:10) and his conviction that God's agency accompanies and interpenetrates human agency (see comment on 2:12–13), the difference may not be as great as is sometimes imagined. That is, for Paul, the response of faith and trust evoked by the gospel is itself "Christ-faith" (pistis Christou, author's translation), a participation in the faithful, trusting obedience of Christ, to whom they have been joined.

The treasure for the sake of which Paul has gladly lost all things is fellowship with Christ. His one passion is "to know Christ" and to share in Christ's resurrection life (3:10). In the present, this means experiencing the power of Christ's resurrection in paradoxical fashion—through sharing in Christ's sufferings. Paul pours himself out in service to others for Christ's sake (cf. 2:17), increasingly becoming like Christ in his self-giving death, so that he may also share in the resurrection from the dead, of which Christ is the first- fruits (3:11; cf. 1 Cor 15:20–23).

Paul takes pains to prevent misunderstanding at this point. Although fellowship with Christ is a present reality, he has not yet attained his goal or "been made perfect" (3:12, NRSV margin). But because Christ has already laid hold of him, he strives with the single-minded devotion of an athlete to lay hold of the prize to which God has called him: the immediate and unbroken fellowship with God in Christ that resurrection life will bring (3:13–14; cf. 1:23).

3:15–21. Call to Imitation with a Counterexample. Paul does not offer himself as a model of heroic virtue to which only a few may aspire. Rather, he asserts that all who are "mature" in faith will be led by God to share and maintain this same mindset (3:15–16). He calls his brothers and sisters in Philippi to unite in the task of imitating him, and he urges them to take careful note of those in their own midst who faithfully embody his example of a Christ-shaped pattern of life (3:17). Attention to such exemplars is crucial to the community's ability to live worthily, for they are surrounded by "many" whose manner of life is diametrically opposed to the pattern of obedient self-giving love displayed at the cross (3:18). These "enemies of the cross of Christ" indulge their own appetites and set their mind no higher than "earthly things" (3:19). In contrast, Paul and his hearers recognize that they are citizens of the heavenly politeuma, "commonwealth" (3:20, NRSV margin) ruled by God. It is from that realm that they await a "Savior" (a term the Roman emperors arrogated to themselves in order to legitimize their own allegedly beneficent tyranny). The crucified and exalted "Lord Jesus Christ" will return in person to deliver them. Those whose lives have been conformed to the pattern of Jesus' self-giving death will find their "humble bodies" transformed into the likeness of "his glorious [resurrection] body" (3:21; cf. NRSV margin). Christ's subjection of all things, expressed in scriptural terms (cf. Ps 8:6 and Ps 110:1), fulfills the divine purpose announced in Phil 2:10–11.

D. Specific Application: Restoring Unity Between Leaders (4:1–3)

With eyes fixed on the certainty of God's triumph, Paul reprises his opening exhortation (1:27), urging his beloved brothers and sisters to "stand firm" together (4:1; cf. 3:16). Here his call to unity has in view a very specific situation, the current lack of concord between two women who are apparently leaders in the congregation (4:2–3). Paul's respect and affection for them both is evident. He addresses each one by name, commending them as his co-workers, beloved by God ("whose names are in the book of life"). He appeals to these women who have "struggled beside [him] in the work of the gospel" (cf. 1:27) to "be of the same mind in the Lord"—that is, to adopt toward one another the humble mindset of Christ that is oriented toward the other's interests. Paul calls on an unnamed companion to foster their reconciliation, for it is the community as a whole that is charged with living "in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ" (1:27).

V. Final Exhortations: The Way of Joy and Peace (4:4–9)

Paul infuses his closing exhortations with the themes of joy and peace. Rejoicing is the fitting response of those who know the surpassing value of fellowship with Christ in life and in death (4:4). "The Lord is near" (4:5) may well carry a double meaning in this context: Sensible of the nearness of Christ's presence and confident of the nearness of his return (cf. 3:20), the Philippians are to conduct themselves with "gentleness" (NRSV; "moderation," KJV; "forbearance," RSV) toward "everyone" (4:5; cf. 2:15), even those who oppose them (1:28).

Though tempted to anxiety by their challenging circumstances, they are invited to pour out their needs before God in prayer with thanksgiving (4:6). As they do, God's peace will stand guard over their hearts and minds (4:7), enabling them to stand firm "in Christ Jesus" (cf. 4:1). Finally, Paul calls his brothers and sisters to a disciplined habit of mind that focuses on what is excellent and praiseworthy (4:8; cf. 1:10, "what is best") as well as to a consistent practice of the Christ-like pattern that they have seen displayed in Paul's own life (4:9). He reminds them that surrounding and undergirding their own strenuous efforts is the ongoing working of their gracious God (cf. 2:12–13; 1:6): "the God of peace will be with you" (4:9).

VI. Gratitude for the Philippians' Partnership in the Gospel (4:10–20)

Paul has occasionally been criticized for failing to show appropriate gratitude for the Philippians' gift. However, it is important to judge Paul's expression of thanks not by modern standards, but in accordance with ancient sensibilities. In his response to the Philippians' generosity, Paul draws on the language and conventions of friendship current in his day. Friendship was defined by moral philosophers as a relationship between self-sufficient equals. (Note, however, that Paul's own claim to be content is based not on self-sufficiency, but on the empowering presence of God [4:11–13].) It does not grow out of need, nor is it sustained by a relationship of reciprocal exchange. Rather, friends share a kinship of spirit in the pursuit of virtue. For this reason, the profuse expression of thanks for a gift—which was an obligatory feature of the relationship of a client to his patron—would have appeared completely out of place among friends.

Paul walks a thin line as he seeks to thank the Philippians for their generosity (4:10, 14, 15–16, 18) without giving the impression either that he is now under obligation to them or that he desires further gifts (4:11–13, 17, 19–20). Although Paul and the Philippians have a long history of sharing in material goods (4:15–16; cf. 2 Cor 11:8–9; 8:1–5), he resists being positioned as their dependent client, just as he refuses to assume the role of their patron. Instead, he seeks a genuine partnership with them in the work of the gospel, one that grows out of God's gracious working in their midst (cf. 1:3–8).

It is no accident, then, that as he expresses gratitude to the Philippian congregation, Paul very deliberately highlights the presence and activity of God at the center of their relationship. His joy at their recent demonstration of concern for him is joy "in the Lord" (4:10). Phrases like "in the Lord" and "in Christ" that repeatedly punctuate the letter (e.g., 1:1, 8, 26; 2:1, 5, 19, 24, 29; 3:1, 14; 4:1, 2, 4, 7, 19, 21) express Paul's fundamental conviction that their fellowship has its basis in God's having united them all to Christ, so that their partnership is a participation in Christ's own life. The apostle characterizes the ties that bind him to the Philippians as those of family rather than of "friendship" (a term which, like the word "friend," never appears in Paul's letters [cf. NRSV margin at 4:21]). Because God, "our Father," stands at the center of this relationship (4:20), the Philippians' service to Paul is ultimately "a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God" (4:18; cf. 2:17, 30). It is God, not Paul, who will repay them fully out of his superabundant "riches in glory in Christ Jesus" (4:19). And it is God who deservedly receives all the glory (4:20; cf. 2:11).

VII. Closing Greeting and Prayer (4:21–23)

As is typical for Greco-Roman letters, Philippians closes with an exchange of greetings. Even here Paul continues to pursue his apostolic mission of strengthening the Philippian congregation in faith. His reference both to the Philippians and to the "brothers [and sisters]" with him (4:21, NRSV margin) as "saints" reminds his hearers that their identity originates in God's calling (see comment on 1:1) and that membership in God's people extends far beyond their local community (4:21–22). He passes on greetings from "all the saints . . . especially those of the emperor's household," judging that this small, beleaguered community living in the midst of Roman Philippi will find it encouraging to learn that there are "saints" even among the vast network of slaves, freedmen, and other officials who make up the household of Lord Caesar (4:22). With words that echo his opening blessing, Paul's benediction commends them to the boundless grace of the one true Lord, Jesus Christ (4:23).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

K. Barth. Epistle to the Philippians (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); M. Bockmuehl. The Epistle to the Philippians. BNTC (London: A&C Black, 1998); C. B. Cousar. Philippians and Philemon. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2009); G. D. Fee. Paul's Letter to the Philippians. NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); J. T. Fitzgerald, ed. Friendship, Flattery, and Frankness of Speech: Studies on Friendship in the New Testament World. NovTSup 82 (Leiden: Brill, 1996); S. E. Fowl. Philippians. Two Horizons New Testament Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); P. Oakes. Philippians: From People to Letter. SNTSMS 110 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001); M. Silva. Philippians. Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament. 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); J. Reumann. Philippians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. The Anchor Yale Bible 33B (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008).

COLOSSIANS

STEPHEN FOWL

OVERVIEW

Paul (and Timothy) are the inscribed authors of this letter to a congregation located in the Lycus valley in the Roman province of Asia Minor. Although Paul did not found this congregation, Epaphras did (1:7), he feels a deep connection to the Colossians. It is clear that the Colossians and Paul manifest an abiding interest in each other's welfare.

Many contemporary scholars question whether Paul the apostle actually wrote this letter. There are some differences of style, tone, and theological emphasis between Colossians and those letters undisputedly written by Paul. We also know that followers of various ancient teachers sometimes wrote letters in the name of their teacher. This was not primarily with the aim of deceiving the readers, but in order to place their views in continuity with their master. How one judges this matter of authorship largely depends on how much diversity and continuity one thinks is possible for a single author. There is very little at stake here theologically either way. The letter is part of Scripture, and Christians engage it as Scripture.

If the letter is Pauline, then it was probably written in the early part of the 60s, not long before Paul's death. If it is not Pauline, then it was probably written by a disciple of Paul's in the time shortly after his death.

In addition to some close connections to Philemon, Colossians is most closely connected to Ephesians. Although some argue that there is literary dependence between these two letters (usually Ephesians being dependent on Colossians), there is actually very little evidence to sustain the claim that the two letters are literarily dependent on each other.

Some in the congregation appear to be advocating the view that the Colossians should supplement their faith in Christ (Paul calls the view "philosophy and empty deceit" in 2:8). In particular, these teachers argue that if the Colossians engage in a variety of ascetic practices (2:16–23), they can cultivate an ecstatic or mystical state whereby they might participate more directly in the worship of God; they might even participate in the angels' worship of God (2:18). These practices would appear to have a connection to Judaism, but many different groups in Paul's world thought that asceticism could lead to ecstatic visions and experiences.

Paul counters this teaching by asserting Christ's supremacy over all things. One can have no fuller experience of God than to be connected to Christ, "the image of the invisible God" (1:15). In every possible way Christ is superior to anything in the cosmos. Any way in which the cosmos is alienated from God is reconciled in Christ and nowhere else (1:15–20). Thus, because the Colossians have been bound to Christ through their baptism, there is nothing more they can or need to do in order to have the fullest possible knowledge and experience of God.

OUTLINE

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

II. Prayer for the Colossians (1:3–14)

A. Prayer for Faith, Hope, and Love (1:3–8)

B. Prayer for Knowledge and Wisdom (1:9–14)

III. Christ, King and Redeemer (1:15–20)

IV. Being Connected to Christ Through Paul's Gospel (1:21–2:7)

A. The Colossians' Alienation from God (1:21–23)

B. Paul's Calling (1:24–29)

C. Paul's Hopes for the Colossians and Laodiceans (2:1–7)

V. Confronting False Teaching 2:8–23

A. Warning About Philosophy and Empty Deceit (2:8)

B. Fullness in Christ Through Baptism (2:9–15)

C. Practices of the False Teaching (2:16–23)

VI. Seeking Christ/Living in Christ (3:1–4:6)

A. Raised with Christ (3:1–4)

B. Avoiding Vices (3:5–11)

C. Cultivating Virtue (3:12–17)

D. Relations in the Household (3:18–4:1)

E. Final Instructions (4:2–6)

VII. Farewell and Final Greetings (4:7–18)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

The senders are identified as Paul, "an apostle of Christ Jesus by the will of God," and Timothy the brother (cf. 2 Cor 1:1). An apostle is someone sent out, a person with a mission. The fact that Paul identifies himself as an apostle of "Jesus Christ by the will of God" indicates that Jesus Christ is the subject of Paul's mission and that God is the one who appointed Paul.

Timothy (cf. Acts 16:1–6) is identified as a brother in Christ. He is also mentioned at the beginning of Philippians. In Philippians, however, Paul goes on to speak in the first person singular. Here in Colossians, the first person plural is used, giving the sense that Timothy is not simply Paul's co-worker, but even a co-author of the epistle.

The Colossians are identified as "saints and faithful brothers and sisters in Christ." Just as the term apostle indicates someone who is set apart, the term saints also indicates the purpose for which the Colossians and all believers are set apart—sanctity or holiness. Of course, this is the same calling that God gives to Israel, "You shall be holy because I am holy" (Lev.19:2). Moreover, the believers in Colossae are identified as faithful, a characteristic not always noted in greetings to other Pauline churches (e.g. Galatia, Corinth). Finally, they are Paul's brothers and sisters in Christ. This recognizes that whatever else has and will pass between the Colossians and Paul, they are intimately bound to each other because of Christ. Theirs is a three-way friendship. The greeting closes with Paul's standard wish of grace and peace.

II. Prayer for the Colossians (1:3–14)

A. Prayer for Faith, Hope, and Love (1:3–8)

As is typical in a Pauline letter, the greeting is followed by a prayer of thanksgiving. The prayer thanks God for the Colossians and reflects Paul's joys and concerns regarding the congregation. Paul's prayers for the Colossians invoke the three theological virtues of faith, which initiates and sustains their friendship with Christ, love, which guides the common life of the congregation, and hope, which directs them to their ultimate end in Christ. This is followed by a brief recounting of the Colossians' reception of the gospel through Epaphras, Paul's fellow slave and faithful minister in Christ.

B. Prayer for Knowledge and Wisdom (1:9–14)

Paul then moves to pray that God would fill the Colossians with knowledge and wisdom, so that the Colossians might be better able to "walk" in a manner worthy of the Lord. The three particular characteristics Paul prays for are strength, perseverance, and gratitude. In this way, Paul anticipates that growth in knowledge and wisdom will enable the Colossians to lead lives that more worthily reflect the nature of God's work among them. Paul characterizes this work as bringing the Colossians out of darkness and transferring them in the kingdom of Christ. The language here reflects a change of citizenship, and Paul expects the Colossians' affections and allegiances to reflect their new citizenship. Before developing this point, however, Paul moves to identify further the king in whose kingdom the Colossians now dwell.

III. Christ, King and Redeemer (1:15–20)

Rather than describe "the kingdom" of Christ as one might expect from 1:14, Paul describes the king in these verses. There was a period when it was common for scholars to call this passage an early Christian hymn (cf. 3:16), but there is little or no evidence here to support this claim. The passage poetically describes Christ relative to God, creation, and the church. All of these descriptions come into play when Paul combats the false teaching that seems to be attracting members of the congregation. At the same time, Paul does not defend this account of Christ in any way, assuming that the Colossians either know these things already or will find them uncontested.

The passage begins by identifying Christ as "the image of the invisible God." Paul also speaks of Christ as the image of God in 2 Cor 4:4. In each of these cases Paul makes the point that Christ makes God manifest to humans in a way that would not otherwise be possible. Exodus 33:20 and Isa 6:5 both make the point that humans cannot gaze directly on the face of God. Thus, being the image of the invisible God would indicate that Christ uniquely, supremely, truly, and reliably manifests God to humans who could not otherwise see God. This notion will directly come into play as Paul addresses the false teaching that a connection to Christ needs to be supplemented by further spiritual experiences.

Paul elaborates on the nature of Christ's supremacy as the image of God by asserting Christ's primacy in creation because he is "firstborn of all creation." This notion of primacy through temporal precedence is well attested in the NT (Rom 8:29; Heb 1:6; Rev 1:5) as well as the LXX (Ps. 88:28) and Philo (De confusione linguarum 147; Legum allegoriae 3.175; De ebrietate 31). Christ's primacy over creation stems from the fact that all things exist "in," "through," and "for" him. Christ provides creation with its unity, coherence, and telos or goal.

Paul then asserts Christ's supremacy in and for the church. He is the "head of the body" (v. 18). Both in creation and in the church, Christ, the image of the invisible God, reigns supreme.

The second half of this passage continues Paul's uncompromising assertion of Christ's supremacy over all by focusing on Christ's mission of reconciling all things to God. Paul's assertions assume that despite Christ's supremacy over creation, creation had become alienated from God and required reconciliation. Christ accomplishes the first stage of this reconciliation in his resurrection. This is what Paul means by claiming that Christ is the "firstborn from the dead." In defeating death, the most prevalent sign of creation's alienation from the creator, Christ enables all things to be reconciled to God, "making peace through the blood of his cross" (v. 20).

By the end of this passage Paul has laid a firm foundation for his attack on the false teaching. Since Christ is preeminent over all things, since "all the fullness of God" (v. 19) dwells in him, there is nothing more the Colossians need to supplement their experience and life with God than to be connected to Christ.

IV. Being Connected to Christ Through Paul's Gospel (1:21–2:7)

A. The Colossians' Alienation from God (1:21–23)

In 1:18–20 Paul presumes a general story of creation's alienation from God. In these verses he offers a specific account of the Colossians' alienation prior to their reception of the gospel. Christ has overcome their estrangement from God, provided they remain steadfast in their faith in the gospel.

B. Paul's Calling (1:24–29)

Paul describes his calling in terms that support his claim to be an authoritative and reliable interpreter of the gospel. Paul is imprisoned (cf. 4:3) and he begins his discussion by noting that his sufferings are both an occasion for joy and "fill up what is lacking in Christ's afflictions." This formulation probably refers to a Jewish notion that Paul is participating in the "birthpangs of the Messiah," those tribulations that would usher in the messianic age (cf. Gal 4:19). Paul here wants to indicate that his sufferings have a purpose. They do not signify God's rejection of him. Rather, they testify to his full participation in God's drama of salvation. Indeed, Paul has been given a special role to play in this drama. God's surprising plan to bring about the salvation of the Gentiles through the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus has been made known to Paul and the other apostles. It has fallen to Paul to make public this formerly hidden good news, and he devotes himself tirelessly to this task.

C. Paul's Hopes for the Colossians and Laodiceans (2:1–7)

After speaking of his efforts to proclaim the mystery of Christ in general terms, Paul now focuses on the churches in Colossae and Laodicea. Although he has not visited these churches himself, they are connected to him and he to them through their common commitment to the gospel. His desire for them is that they would be encouraged and united in love. This growth in love would lead them into a deeper knowledge of God's drama of salvation which reaches its climax in Christ. It is striking here that rather than increased knowledge leading to growth in love, Paul assumes that growth in love is prior to and necessary for growth in knowledge. As growth in love leads to a deeper knowledge of Christ, vv. 6–7 make it clear that such knowledge is to be directed to leading lives that are rooted and grounded in Christ (see also Rom 12:1–2; Phil 1:9–11).

V. Confronting False Teaching (2:8–23)

A. Warning About Philosophy and Empty Deceit (2:8)

Everything Paul has said thus far indicates that the Colossians are more than willing to "walk" in a manner worthy of the gospel. This verse indicates that they may need instruction about what God's activity in Christ entails for their present situation. In 2:8 Paul addresses this by warning the Colossians not to let anyone capture them, take them off as booty. The metaphor here reflects a situation of battle where the Colossians themselves may be the prize that falls to the victor. If this is the case, then the weapons of the enemy are "philosophy and empty deceit" which is "according to human tradition [and] . . . the elemental spirits of the universe." The terms used here are very general and offer outside readers very little information about the nature of the teaching Paul warns against.

Many scholars take the term "elemental spirits of the universe" [Gk.: stoicheia tou kosmou] to be a reference to demonic forces that were thought to control aspects of human existence. These would be the principalities and powers mentioned in 1:16. The Greek term can just as easily refer to worldly rules and regulations. The problem is that the Greek term stoicheia is quite elastic and can refer to a wide range of things. In such a situation the immediate context in which the term appears must be determinative. In the case of Colossians one must look, then, at 2:8 and 2:20 where the same phrase occurs.

In 2:20 it is quite clear that the stoicheia tou kosmou are closely connected to the rules and regulations mentioned in 2:21–22. It is also clear, however, that Paul refers to the stoicheia as if they were personal forces. In Romans Paul refers to the Torah as both a set of commandments and as something personified, either as a spiritual force on its own or as a something controlled by a demonic force such as Sin (cf. 5:12–21; 7:7–13). It is sometimes hard to disentangle these two things and it is not always clear that one has to. Given the similar contextual factors in Colossians, one might say that the stoicheia can be a set of rules and regulations and that these can function either as representatives or tools of demonic forces to frustrate believers. This would indicate that the teaching Paul warns about in 2:8 is tied to observing special rules and regulations that might seem to enhance one's following of Christ but are ultimately of human origin and will frustrate one's life in Christ.

B. Fullness in Christ Through Baptism (2:9–15)

Having warned against being captivated by false teaching that is according to human tradition and not according to Christ, Paul describes the Colossians' life in Christ in ways that both echo 1:15–20 and directly address the false teaching threatening the Colossians.

All of God's fullness dwells in Christ, and because the Colossians have been joined to Christ in baptism they, too, participate in that fullness. There is nothing more they can do to add to this fullness. The Colossians do not need whatever "fullness" the false teaching offers. No spiritual power, hostile or otherwise, can stand between the Colossians and the fullness of God because in Christ they participate in the one in whom all God's fullness dwells. No further rules and regulations can enliven their experience of God. Although at one point the Colossians were dead and alienated from God, they have now been made alive in Christ, the one who triumphs over death.

The connection between circumcision and baptism in this passage indicates that the false teachers may have advocated that baptized Gentile believers needed to further their life in Christ by becoming circumcised. In any case, this is one of the few places where Paul speaks about baptism. He treats it as the analog to circumcision in that it brings people fully into a covenant relationship with Christ.

C. Practices of the False Teaching (2:16–23)

This is the passage that reveals the most about the practices which the false teachers advocate for the Colossians. In the light of previous passage's emphasis that the fullness of God is only found through participation in Christ, one can infer that these practices aimed to deepen or enhance the Colossians' experience of God. We also know that there were both Jewish and pagan groups that advocated various ascetical practices as a means to attaining mystical visions and ecstatic experiences. Further, one can easily imagine that relatively new believers would be attracted to claims of enhanced spiritual experiences through observance of various ascetical disciplines as a supplement to their faith in Christ. Here in this passage we learn of some of those practices. The teachers seem to advocate the observance of certain festivals and days devoted to God, along with ascetical practices related to food and drink. These same terms describe Israel's distinctive practices (cf. Hos 2:11; Ezek 45:17; 1 Chr 23:31; Letter of Aristeas 141–43). Whatever validity such observances may have had in the past, now in the light of Christ they can add nothing to the Colossians' experience.

As this passage continues it appears that the aim of the practices mentioned in 2:16 is to cultivate a form of self-abasement, leading to an ecstatic state in which one might mystically enter into the heavenly realms and either observe or participate in angelic worship (2:18). Although we know little about the specific details involved in the Colossian false teaching, we do know that both pagan and Jewish groups thought that through specific practices and initiatory rites one could incrementally advance in one's knowledge of divine things.

If the Colossians assent to this way of thinking they will not be advancing in Christ. Rather, they will be abandoning Christ, the head who animates and sustains the church, leading it to true growth in God. What makes this false teaching so pernicious is that it aims at something good, but misperceives the true nature of this good and seeks to achieve this good in misguided ways. Ultimately, it cannot lead the Colossians into a deeper knowledge and experience of God. Rather, it will frustrate and undermine their life in Christ.

As Paul wraps up this part of the argument he reminds the Colossians that becoming a Christian involves dying with Christ to any and all forces that—no matter how well intentioned—keep people alienated from God. Thus, ch. 2 ends with a sustained call to resist any continued allure held by the promises of the false teachers and to hold fast to Christ. As ch. 3 begins, Paul focuses on how one should live in the light of being raised with Christ.

VI. Seeking Christ/Living in Christ (3:1–4:6)

A. Raised with Christ (3:1–4)

The false teaching pursues access into the heavenly realms through self abasement. Paul here tells the Colossians that they have been raised with Christ who is already in the heavenly realms. When Christ is revealed in his final glory, they too will be revealed with him. Hence, they should focus their attention on heavenly matters rather than earthly matters, where Paul has repeatedly located the concerns and practices of the false teaching.

B. Avoiding Vices (3:5–11)

Seeking the things above will involve transformation, just not the type of self-abasement that the false teachers advocate. Instead the Colossians are to "put to death" those habits and practices that alienate them from God and each other. The vices in 3:5b (fornication, impurity, passion, evil desire, and greed) reflect people's overweening desire to grab what is not theirs. In this light, it is not surprising that the final vice, "greed," is characterized as idolatry. This is because idolatry is, at its root, a turning of one's love and attention away from God and toward something or someone else. The second list (anger, wrath, malice, slander, abusive language, and lying, in vv. 8–9) reflect habits and practices that distort one's relationships with others. Paul speaks of these as garments that are to be cast off; the Colossians are to clothe themselves with a new self. As Paul goes on to describe this new self, it becomes clear that it is actually the self God originally intended for humans at their creation and that God is renewing in humanity. As God intended things at the outset, there are no racial, ethnic, linguistic, status, or economic divisions separating people from one another. In Christ they are harmoniously united and perfected.

C. Cultivating Virtue (3:12–17)

In this light, Paul goes on to speak of putting on a new set of clothes. This image is used to convey an admonition to cultivate a set of virtues. These virtues all require the presence of others in order to be displayed. They are relational virtues. Moreover, when there is a failure of virtue, the Colossians are encouraged to forgive each other as God has forgiven them. These virtues and indeed the common life of the Colossian congregation are bound together by love. In addition,, the Colossians are told to let the word of Christ dwell in them, which will enable them to instruct one another wisely and to worship with gratitude.

D. Relations in the Household (3:18–4:1)

After Paul has advocated the cultivation and practice of a variety of virtues, all held together by love, he quickly moves to discuss the three sets of relationships that made up a typical Greco-Roman household: husbands/wives, parents/children, and master/slave. Discussions of household management were quite common in Greco-Roman writing going back at least as far as Aristotle. Jewish writers such as Philo and Josephus also touched on this subject. Although this passage will make modern readers very uncomfortable, there is no way of knowing how the Colossians received this advice. For all of its traditional trappings, there are several points that stand out here.

First, husbands are admonished to love their wives and not to treat them harshly. In addition, fathers are not to provoke their children. These may in some ways modify the sense of absolute control that the father/husband held over the household. The vast majority of the commands in this passage address masters and slaves. Having noted in 3:11 that in Christ the slave/free distinction is dissolved, Paul reminds both slaves and masters that they are both slaves of Christ. (The NRSV does not render the Greek of 3:25 as strongly as it ought in this case.) At the same time, Paul recognizes that slavery in the Greco-Roman world was not going away. Given the large proportion of slaves in this world, it would have been inevitable that masters and slaves both would have found themselves within the body of Christ.

E. Final Instructions (4:2–6)

Paul adds a final set of instructions here. The first focuses on prayer. His brief remarks indicate that he feels it is a great blessing to be able to offer prayers to God. Recognition of this should generate thanksgiving in believers. In addition, Paul reveals that although he is in prison, he hopes to continue to "declare the mystery of Christ." Paul's final admonitions about wisdom and speech indicate that he hopes that the Colossians themselves will be able to participate in declaring the mystery of Christ.

VII. Farewell and Final Greetings (4:7–18)

As is typical, Paul concludes with a list of greetings and tidbits of information about various characters. There is a remarkable diversity in this group, including: Jews and Gentiles, a physician (Luke), a slave (Onesimus, cf. Philemon), a woman of sufficient wealth to be able to host a gathering in her home (Nympha). It is interesting to note that in Acts 15:36–40 a disagreement over Mark's role leads Paul and Barnabas to part ways. Here he is mentioned as one of Paul's companions. Many of the same people mentioned here also appear in the list of greetings in Phlm 23–24. It is also clear that there is a relatively close relationship between the churches in Colossae and Laodicea. (The two towns were about 10 miles apart.) Paul has written to each church and they are to share their epistles. These greetings indicate the rich network of relationships that helped to sustain Paul in his work. Even though he begins his letter by noting that he is an apostle, a particular individual with a specific mission, he cannot fulfill his charge without numerous co-workers, friends, and supporters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Lincoln and A. J. M. Wedderburn. Theology of the Later Pauline Letters (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); P. O'Brien. Colossians and Philemon. WBC 44 (Waco, Tex.: Word, 1982); M. M. Thompson. Colossians and Philemon. Two Horizons New Testament Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005).

1 THESSALONIANS

SZE-KAR WAN

OVERVIEW

Widely regarded as the earliest of Paul's letters, 1 Thessalonians is free of controversies over the law or polemics against his opponents that characterize the apostle's later writings. The letter is distinguished by its irenic spirit and warmth towards the recipients. Paul's praise for the Thessalonians is so effusive that it takes little imagination to categorize this as a "friendly letter," a standard type in ancient epistolography. But the positive tone cannot mask an anxiety over some unspecified persecution the young converts are facing, persecution that may or may not have been also responsible for Paul's own hasty retreat from the city almost immediately after he founded the congregation. In the meantime, deaths of some members unsettled the community and might have caused them to rethink their belief in the Lord's coming. Thus, while Paul is concerned about the perception that he has abandoned the Thessalonians at this critical time, he is equally concerned that the Thessalonians not lose hope in the final revelation of Christ. His personal integrity, the authenticity of his message, and the cohesion and ongoing vitality of the new congregation have all become one and the same issue.

After dispatching Timothy to Thessalonica to strengthen the community and upon receiving favorable news from him (see 3:1–6), Paul writes this letter, declaring his profound love for the community in an effort to draw the Thessalonians closer to him in spite of his absence. He exhorts the congregation to maintain unity in the face of afflictions from without, and he counsels them to console one another about the deaths of members without losing hope in the Lord's coming. Paul also takes the opportunity to answer a number of queries raised by the congregation.

OUTLINE

I. Prescript (1:1)

II. Thanksgiving (1:2–3:13)

A. Prayer (1:2–10)

B. Paul's Sincerity and Purity of Motives (2:1–12)

C. Encouraging the Congregation Under Persecution (2:13–16)

D. Paul's Desire to Visit the Thessalonians (2:17–3:13)

III. Exhortations (4:1–5:22)

A. Warnings Against Sexual Immorality (4:3–8)

B. Concerning Life in the Community (4:9–12)

C. Concerning Those Who Are Asleep (4:13–18)

D. Concerning the Imminence of the Parousia (5:1–11)

E. General Parenthesis (5:12–22)

IV. Postscript (5:23–28)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prescript (1:1)

Paul introduces himself without the usual title "apostle" (contrast to Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Gal 1:1). The only other self-designation comparable in simplicity is that of Philippians (1:1), which like 1 Thessalonians is a friendly letter overflowing with warmth and praise for the addressees.

II. Thanksgiving (1:2–3:13)

A standard feature in ancient letter writing and in most of the undisputed letters of Paul, the thanksgiving in 1 Thessalonians is unique in its unusual length. In fact, this section is so long that it may well be considered the main body of the letter. Some take the thrice-repeated thanksgiving (1:2; 2:13; 3:9) to indicate multiple letters, but the narrative flow of the entire section does not support that theory.

A. Prayer (1:2–10)

The thanksgiving prayer proper conforms to the usual Pauline form and function. The opening is standard: "We always give thanks to God for all of you and mention you in our prayers, constantly"

(1:2; cf. Rom 1:8; 1 Cor 1:4; Phil 1:3; Phlm 4). It announces, as is Paul's custom, major themes of the letter: the Thessalonians' conversion (1:4–5, 9), Paul's past labor in their midst (1:5, 9), persecution (1:6), and apocalyptic urgency (1:10).

That the Thessalonians were Gentile converts is clear, since they "turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God" (1:9). Though used sparingly by Paul, to turn (epistrephein) was a technical term for Gentile conversion to Judaism (e.g., LXX Ps 21:28; Isa 19:22; Jer 18:8, 11; Tob 14:6) and was adopted by the Jesus movement (e.g., Acts 3:19; 9:35; 14:15). "To serve (douleuein, literally "to be a slave") a living and true God" means complete surrender to God as a slave to a master. Here and elsewhere, Paul conceives of conversion not so much as liberation but as switching allegiance to a different master, from mute idols to "a living and true God" (see, e.g., Rom 6:6, 12–23; 7:25; 12:11; 14:18; 16:18; Gal 4:8).

Paul reminds the Thessalonians of their conversion for the purpose of binding them closely to himself despite his absence. He praises his hearers for their "work of faith and labor of love and steadfastness of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:3), but makes clear that all this finds its basis in God's prior love and election; the Thessalonians are "beloved by God" and have been chosen by God (1:4). Verse 5 could be taken as proof of election, as the NRSV translation ("because") might suggest, but more likely it explains how God's election took place—by the preaching of the gospel "not in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit." Paul claims that his initial founding visit was the instrument by which God elected the Thessalonians, Gentiles heretofore being outside the covenant.

Giving his own preaching such a prominent role might seem egotistic, but Paul is adopting the rhetorical strategy of popular philosophers who boasted perfect congruence between words and deeds as basis for confidence in their message. Persuasiveness of the message depended on the authenticity of the messenger. In using this argument, however, Paul also turns it upside down. When Paul boasts of his "full conviction" (1:5), he contrasts his words not to his personal deeds but to the power of the Holy Spirit. Then and only then could the Thessalonians discover what sort of person Paul turned out to be. For Paul, authenticity of the message proves the credibility of the messenger, and that was the warrant for imitating him. Ultimately, Paul hastens to add, the Thessalonians were in reality imitating the Lord (1:6).

Paul has reason to fear for the viability of his relationship with the Thessalonian community. He left the city soon after he established the congregation, and it is now experiencing persecution (2:14; 3:3). To encourage them to stand firm, Paul reminds them of persecution at the time of their conversion (1:6) and informs them of his own before and after his visit (2:2; 3:7). Imitation means more than just mimicking the teacher; it means also sharing his paradigmatic suffering. He alludes to all this in the apocalyptic climax of the prayer, encouraging his new converts to wait for "Jesus, who rescues [note present tense] us from the wrath that is coming" (1:10). Despite the warm tone and praises elaborated on the Thessalonians, therefore, Paul is concerned about the current state of the young congregation, and he is anxious to re-establish relationship with them.

B. Paul's Sincerity and Purity of Motives (2:1–12)

The spotlight that started shifting from the addressees to Paul in the thanksgiving prayer is now trained squarely on Paul. He begins, "You yourselves know" (2:1). The formula is repeated numerous times in this letter (see also 1:5; 2:2, 5, 11; 3:3, 4; 4:2, 4; 5:2; also 2:9, "you remember"; 2:10, "you are witnesses") not only to stress the open honesty with which Paul conducted himself among the Thessalonians but especially to underscore the shared knowledge that establishes a common bond between them. This bond lays a foundation for a friendly persuasion in the remainder of the thanksgiving and especially in the exhortations. He reminds them again of the manner in which he first gained entrance to them (2:1; cf. 1:9) despite the shameful treatment he had received in Philippi (2:2). But that made the Thessalonians' imitation of Paul that much more moving and significant, for they themselves received the gospel "in spite of persecution" (1:5).

In addition, the relationship is also founded on personal integrity. Paul claims purity of his motives (2:3, 5), sincerity of his words (2:5), and upright and blameless conduct (2:10), in the manner of popular philosophers. But just as before, his selfclaims only appear excessive; they are ultimately dependent on God, who alone forms the basis for self-regards and confidence. He maintains that he performed his arduous tasks to please God, not mortals (2:4, 6).

In an effort to bind the Thessalonians to himself, Paul uses a number of familial metaphors. He compares himself to a nurse "tenderly caring for her own children" (2:7). Gentleness of the wet nurse was a well-known trope in Roman literature, but Paul amplifies it by twining it with thalpein ("to warm"), evoking the image of a mother bird warming her eggs. Her own children, as opposed to children under her professional care, emphatically underscores her tenderness. Paul also compares himself to a father (2:11), this time as a moral authority and instructor, "urging and encouraging you and pleading that you lead a life worthy of God" (2:12).

C. Encouraging the Congregation under Persecution (2:13–16)

From professed sincere motives and personal integrity, attention is now returned to the young congregation, which finds itself under some unspecified siege and is in need of encouragement. Paul begins his encouragement the same way he begins the letter, with another thanksgiving prayer that is formally and thematically similar to the first one: "We also constantly give thanks to God" (2:13; cf. 1:2). Why? A thanksgiving, especially in a friendly, paraenetic letter like 1 Thessalonians, highlights the strengths of the recipients as cause for gratitude, thus setting up a common ground for exhortation, even instruction. The Thessalonians had accepted the word of God (2:13), but amidst persecution: "For you, brothers and sisters, became imitators of the churches of God in Christ Jesus that are in Judea, for you suffered the same things from your own compatriots as they did from the Jews" (2:14). All three themes—reception of the word of God, persecution, and imitation—are already adumbrated in the first thanksgiving prayer (1:6). But whereas in the first instance imitation appears to be an act of volition, here it is involuntary. Whether they chose it or not, the sufferings of the Thessalonians have rendered them imitators of the Judean churches. Their choice is to endure the persecution, but in so doing they have followed the path of their fellow believers in Judea. Their conscious emulation of Paul has strengthened them to be in solidarity with other sufferers.

The harsh judgment against the "Jews" in 2:14–16 has led some to judge the passage to be a later interpolation. But many difficulties can be resolved by recognizing that Ioudaioi (2:14) means literally "Judeans." Since the comparison is between the Thessalonians' persecutions by their fellow citizens and those suffered by the Judean communities in the hands of their kinsfolk, the word should perhaps be translated literally. References to killing the prophets and opposition to the Gentile mission (cf. Gal 1:13, 23) all point in the same direction. Paul's strong condemnation is leveled not against all ethnic Jews but against only the inhabitants of Judea. In the same vein, eis telos (2:16) means literally "until the end" so that the final, eschatological judgment should be read: "God's wrath has come upon them continually until the end" (2:16).

D. Paul's Desire to Visit the Thessalonians (2:17–3:13)

Paul continues to cultivate his relationship with the Thessalonians, this time by sharing his deep yearning to be with them in spite of physical separation. He does so by reversing a familiar kinship metaphor: "We were made orphans by being separated from you—in person, not in heart" (2:17a). To say one is present in spirit but absent in body was a standard epistolary device to exhort the recipients to live as though the writer were present. It was especially effective when the writer, such as a teacher or a father, enjoyed a higher status than the recipients. Paul uses this convention to make his presence felt (Funk coins the term "apostolic parousia" to describe the phenomenon), but instead of calling his children (cf. 2:7, 11) orphans, as one would expect, he calls himself orphaned by the separation. The effect is not only deep pathos, as conveyed by "we longed with great eagerness to see you face to face. For we wanted to come to you—certainly I, Paul, wanted to again and again" (2:17b–18). It is also pastoral and paraenetic. Pastoral, because in expressing his dire need to be reunited with the Thessalonians, Paul lets them know that he empathizes with their desolation, for he himself is bereft of them as they are of him. Paraenetic, because the Thessalonians must now fulfill what is lacking in Paul by being blameless until the end: "For what is our hope or joy or crown of boasting before our Lord Jesus at his coming? Is it not you? Yes, you are our glory and joy!" (2:19–20; cf. 3:13; 5:13).

The travelogue in 3:1–10 explains the events that led to the writing of the letter (cf. Acts 17:1–9, 15; 18:1. In his anxiety for the congregation, Paul dispatches Timothy from Athens to Thessalonica "to strengthen and encourage" the children he left behind (3:1–2, 5), so that they might not be shaken by "these persecutions" (3:3). That Paul has actual events in mind, and not just emotional distress, seems clear from his specific references both here and in 2:14, even if the nature of the actual persecutions is far from clear. Paul might well fear that these afflictions could cause his young converts to lose hope for the last day, which is why he is at pains to remind them of the coming of the Lord (2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23). Paul's praises the Thessalonians for their faith, love, and hope (1:3), but Timothy's report mentions only of their faith and love, not hope (3:6). Even though the news is good, therefore, hope for the final rescue (1:10) might be waning. The conclusion of the travelogue introduces the occasion for writing the letter: "Night and day we pray most earnestly that we may see you face to face and restore (literally, "to mend" or "fulfill") whatever is lacking in your faith" (3:10). Paul even makes his living conditioned on the Thessalonians' perseverance: "We now live if you continue to stand firm in the Lord" (3:8). His children must now take responsibility for the well-being of their father.

A concluding prayer (3:11–13) to the thanksgiving recapitulates Paul's deep yearning to be reunited with the Thessalonians and to hold fast "in holiness that [they] may be blameless before our God and Father at the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints" (3:12).

III. Exhortations (4:1–5:22)

The exhortations are introduced by a recapitulation of the urgent theme of holding firm to the formal instructions the Thessalonians had received from Paul (4:1–2). Paralambanein ("to receive," 4:1; NRSV, "to learn") was a technical term for accepting and learning formal tradition, and parangelia ("announcement, military command, precept," 4:2; NRSV, "instructions") referred to a precise message conveyed by one party to another. Paul uses these terms to remind the Thessalonians what they already know: "you received from us how you ought to live" (4:1, author's trans.) and "you know what precepts we gave you" (4:2, author's trans.). Since the integrity of the teacher and his love for his students are no longer in doubt, the authenticity of these instructions can be taken in good faith. Moreover, these reminders serve the same function as the formula "as you know": namely, they establish a bond between Paul and the congregation based on common traditions and behaviors.

A. Warnings Against Sexual Immorality (4:3–8)

These warnings are likewise set in a framework of reminders. Toward the conclusion of this subsection, Paul warns that "the Lord is an avenger in all these things"—referring to the list of injunctions of 4:3b–6a—but adds, "just as we have already told you beforehand and solemnly warned you" (4:6b).

That all the warnings in this section are against sexual immorality is indicated in 4:3: "Abstain from fornication." The meaning of skeuos in 4:4 is uncertain. It can mean the male genital and thus synecdochically body, hence the translation, "Each one of you know how to control your own body in holiness and honor" (NRSV). Because of its literal meaning vessel, the word can also refer euphemistically to a woman engaged in sexual activities. Thus, an alternative is: "Each of you learn how to acquire your own wife in holiness and honor." "Lustful passion" (4:5) was the Stoic moralists' standard pet peeve, since they judged passion irrational. But given Paul's characterization of Gentiles as not knowing God (4:5), it is likely a part of standard Greek-speaking Jewish polemics against Gentiles in general (e.g., Testimony of Joseph 7:8; cf. also Rom 1:24, 26; Col 3:5). The language of exploitation (literally, "do not trespass or covet") in 4:6 also fits the overall theme of sexual immorality, since Greek moralists have compared committing adultery to stripping the man of his prized possession, his wife.

B. Concerning Life in the Community (4:9–12)

That this and the next two topics are introduced by "concerning" suggests that the Thessalonians had raised them with Paul through Timothy (as in 1 Cor 7:1). The two topics covered therein—brotherly love, on which Paul commends them for loving all throughout Macedonia (4:9–10), and working diligently with their hands, a reminder that harks back to an earlier command (parangellein, 4:11; NRSV, "directed," cf. the noun parangelia used in 4:2)—appear to have little to do with each other until we notice that they are set in the context of a community. Its self-conscious distinction from outsiders ("behave properly toward outsiders," 4:12) points to a closeknit community with clear boundaries marking insiders from outsiders. Its love-ethos, which earns profuse praise from Paul and from other Jesus-communities (cf. 1:8–9), combined with Paul's injunction that members of this community must perform manual labor (cf. 2:9), possibly indicates some form of communal sharing that takes care of poorer members within the community. Whatever they do, Paul affirms it. He urges them "to do so more and more" (4:10), and "to mind [their] own affairs" (lit. "to do their own things," 4:11), which is to say affairs proper to the community. But he also warns them of freeloaders, who could threaten the stability of the community and who, Paul demands, must be willing to "work with [their] hands" (4:11).

C. Concerning Those Who Are Asleep (4:13–18)

The discussion of the end time in 4:13–5:11 is the longest and most detailed among Paul's letters. In the first half, 4:13–18, Paul deals with the Thessalonians' grief over those who have "fallen asleep" [author's trans.], specifically what will happen to those still alive at the coming of Christ. In the second half, 5:1–11, he warns against the suddenness as well as the imminence of the Lord's coming. While these issues are certainly theological, the ultimate motive for introducing them is pastoral: both halves end with the consolation, "Encourage one another " (4:18; 5:11).

The issue has to do with deaths in the community after Paul's departure. Paul had obviously instructed the Thessalonians of the Parousia (1:10; 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23), with many details drawn from Jewish apocalyptic imagery ("For the Lord himself, with a cry of command, with the archangel's call and with the sound of God's trumpet, will descend from heaven," 4:16; cf. e.g., Dan 7). The catalyst was the question raised by the Thessalonians: How will those who have fallen asleep before the Son comes be rescued? (1:10). That this topic is introduced differently from the others, "We do not want you to be uninformed" (4:13), indicates the novelty of the question.

Paul's answer is summarized in v. 14, "Since we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so, through Jesus, God will bring with him those who have died" (lit., "fallen asleep"). In this passage, Paul consistently calls the dead "those who have fallen asleep" (4:13, 14, 15; 4:16 the only exception), because they will be awakened. He draws his support from a seldomly used warrant, "the word of the Lord" (4:15), which could refer to a Synoptic-like tradition or a direct prophetic word. The content of the words is summarized in v. 15 and expanded in vv. 16–17: Those who have fallen asleep will be raised first at the Parousia, followed by those still alive being "caught up in the clouds together with [the dead in Christ] to meet the Lord in the air; and so we will be with the Lord forever" (4:17).

D. Concerning the Imminence of the Parousia (5:1–11)

Paul continues his discussion of the Parousia under the heading of the "times and seasons" of the Parousia (5:1). It is evidently an old teaching, "for you yourselves know very well (lit., "precisely") that the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night" (5:2) or "as labor pains come upon a pregnant woman" (5:3). The "Day of the Lord" is a biblical idea that the Almighty will wage war of retribution against the impious (e.g., Isa 13:6; Jer 46:10; Ezek 13:5; Joel 2:1, 11; Amos 5:18, 20). Paul uses it as a synonym for the Parousia, but stresses its salvific outcome for the elect instead (1 Cor 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:10; 2:16). Thus, Paul exhorts his hearers, "God has destined us not for wrath but for obtaining salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, so that whether we are awake or asleep we may live with him" (5:9–10; cf. 1:10). The precondition is that as "children of light" who "belong to the day" (5:5, 8), believers must stay vigilant and sober, "[putting] on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation" (5:8). The imminent arrival of the Lord requires that combatants stay ever alert and maintain their ethical urgency.

The warlike language about children of light and children of darkness was also used by the Essenes, who withdrew themselves from what they regarded as defiled Jerusalem in order to keep themselves pure and ready for the day of the Lord. Though there is no evidence that Paul had direct contact with them, the sectarian tendency in 1 Thessalonians is comparable. In 4:12, Paul calls attention to outsiders to encourage mutual responsibility between members of the same lovecommunity. In 4:13, he makes a sharp distinction between the believers and "the rest" (hoi loipoi, NRSV, "others") of humanity who have no hope. In 5:5–7, he consigns the same outsiders, "the rest" of the world who fall asleep and are drunk, to the night and darkness. Some commentators, perhaps influenced by later Christian apocalypses and 5:20–22, think those who espouse "Peace and security" (5:3) are false prophets. But the saying was a standard slogan of Roman political propaganda designed to boast the superiority of Pax Romana. It therefore cannot be discounted that Paul here mobilizes dualistic symbols of apocalypticism to resist pressure, if not outright persecutions (2:14), from Thessalonian society at large. The difference between the Thessalonian congregation and the Essene sectarians, however, is that Paul never suggests total withdrawal from society. It is still important to him that his Jesus-followers make a good impression on outsiders (4:12).

E. General Parenesis (5:12–22)

These general admonitions begin with a series of imperatives on life in the community (5:12–15) before branching off into a loose collection of aphorisms (5:16–22). Paul counsels respect for leaders of the community because of their labor (5:13). The exhortations, "[to] be at peace among yourselves" (5:13), "to admonish the idlers, encourage the fainthearted, help the weak, be patient with all of them," (5:14), and not "[to repay] evil for evil, but always seek to do good to one another and to all" (5:15), might seem unrelated unless we recognize that they are all issued against "the disorderly people" (atakttoi ; lit., "out of ranks," 5:14; NRSV, "idler"). In 4:11 idle freeloaders take advantage of communal sharing and thereby threaten the order of the love-community; the only remedy is to work with their hands. Thus the appeals of 5:14–15 are all made with such internal relations in mind.

IV. Postscript (5:23–28)

Paul ends the letter with his customary prayer, in which he repeats the theme of being blameless at the Parousia (5:23–24), a request for prayer (5:25), greeting to all (5:26), and a final benediction (5:28). It also includes a "solemn command" (enorkizein ; lit., "to swear") that the letter be read out loud to the congregation (5:27). In spite of the literary quality of the letter, therefore, it is the oral performance of it that is meant to be a substitute for the absent apostle.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. F. Bruce. 1 & 2 Thessalonians. WBC 45 (Waco: Word, 1982); K. Donfried. Paul, Thessalonica, and Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); R. Funk. "Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance." Christian History and Interpretation. W. Farmer et al, eds. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967); V. P. Furnish. I Thessalonians and II Thessalonians (Nashville: Abingdon, 2007); H. Koester. "I Thessalonians: Experiment in Christian Writing." Continuity and Discontinuity in Church History. Essays Presented to George Huntston Williams on the Occasion of his 65th Birthday. F. F. Church and T. George, eds. (Leiden: Brill, 1979); . "Imperial Ideology and Paul's Eschatology in 1 Thessalonians." Paul and Empire. R. A. Horsley, ed. (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1997); R. Jewett. The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); A. Malherbe. The Letters to the Thessalonians. AB 32B (New York: Doubleday, 2000); . Paul and the Popular Philosophers (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); A. Smith. "'Unmasking the Powers': Toward a Postcolonial Analysis of 1 Thessalonians." Paul and the Roman Imperial Order. R. A. Horsley, ed. (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2004).

2 THESSALONIANS

SZE-KAR WAN

OVERVIEW

The interpretation of 2 Thessalonians cannot be separated from the question of authorship; that is, did the apostle Paul actually write this letter. The major reason for questioning the attribution to Paul is that 2 Thessalonians so closely resembles 1 Thessalonians in structure and content. Both letters, for example, have multiple thanksgivings (2 Thess 1:3 and 2:13; cf. 1 Thess 1:3 and 2:13), whereas there is never more than one in all other undisputed letters of Paul. Both close the thanksgiving with a benediction (2 Thess 2:16–17; cf. 1 Thess 3:11–13), immediately followed by "finally" (2 Thess 3:1; cf. 1 Thess 4:1). The prescripts and postscripts of the two letters are nearly identical (prescript, 2 Thess 1:1–2; cf. 1 Thess 1:1; postscript, 2 Thess 3:16, 18; cf. 1 Thess 5:23, 28). Yet, in spite of the similarities between the two letters, there are differences. The tone of 2 Thessalonians is far less personal than 1 Thessalonians. The author does not call for imitation of himself, apart from his example of working for a living so as not to burden the community (3:7–8). Otherwise he displays little of the pathos that characterizes 1 Thessalonians, or the anxiety to maintain his personal bond with his recipients. Instead, the letter is full of warnings and commands (e.g., 3:6, 10, etc.), all set in an apocalyptic context of judgment against unbelievers (e.g., 2:12; 3:2). The end time as envisioned in 2 Thessalonians also appears different from that of the earlier letter. Whereas in 1 Thessalonians the Parousia is said to be coming like a thief in the night (1 Thess 5:2), 2 Thessalonians appears to envision several stages leading to the final revelation of Christ (2 Thess 3:12).

Second Thessalonians might well reflect a later period in the life of the congregation, when persecution, already prevalent at the writing of 1 Thessalonians, grows in intensity and scope.

If so, the main purpose of 2 Thessalonians is not so different from that of 1 Thessalonians. It was written to console a congregation in crisis. Sufferings have created desolation, which combined with an insidious teaching that the day of the Lord had already arrived, fostered a sense of hopelessness (2:2). The underlying problem was not "realized eschatology," but a lack of vigilant expectation for the coming of the Lord, which the present sufferings heralded. The hearers would know if they could interpret the signs. The imminence of the end is thus used in a pastoral letter of consolation. Meanwhile, the social structure of communal sharing practiced by the congregation was threatened by some refusing to work for the good of the community. Concerned, our author adds instructions to correct the situation.

OUTLINE

I. Prescript (1:1–2)

II. Thanksgiving Prayer (1:3–12)

A. Praise for the Thessalonians' Faith and Love (1:3–4)

B. Judgment Against Those Who Inflict Sufferings (1:5–10)

C. Prayer That the Thessalonians Be Worthy of Call (1:11–12)

III. Warnings About the Parousia (2:1–12)

A. Warning Against Thinking the Parousia Has Already Come (2:1–2)

B. The Lawless One Must Be Revealed First (2:3–5)

C. The Restrainer Keeps the Lawless One from Being Revealed (2:6–7)

D. At the Revelation of the Lawless One, He Will Be Destroyed (2:8–10)

E. All Who Do Not Believe In the Truth Will Be Destroyed (2:11–12)

IV. Second Thanksgiving Prayer (2:13–17)

A. Thanksgiving for God's Having Chosen the Thessalonians (2:13–14)

B. Stand Firm and Hold Fast to Traditions (2:15–17)

V. Paraenesis (3:1–15)

A. Prayer Requests (3:1–3)

B. Commandment Against the Disorderly, the Idle (3:4–15)

VI. Postscript (3:16–18)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Prescript (1:1–2)

The author introduces himself simply as "Paul" (1:1), much like 1 Thessalonians 1:1, and except for an additional phrase ("from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ"), the peace (1:2) is identical as well.

II. Thanksgiving Prayer (1:3–12)

The thanksgiving prayer, as is the custom in Pauline letters, announces the major themes to be pursued in the body. It begins conventionally with praise of the hearers' faith and love for one another (1:3), which garners them fame beyond themselves despite persecutions and afflictions (1:4). Hope, however, which plays a prominent part in the thanksgiving of 1 Thessalonians (cf. 1 Thess 1:3), is not mentioned.

The rumor that "the day of the Lord is already here" is causing alarm (2:2), and hope is evidently its first victim.

The next section, 1:5–10, reads like a parenthesis. Its tone changes abruptly from praise to somber warning, but is at heart consolatory, which is the main focus of the letter. How "evidence of the righteous judgment of God" (1:5a) is related to the preceding is unclear; perhaps it introduces a new discussion on how God's judgment will be carried out in the end time and how the discussion is "intended to make you worthy of the kingdom of God" (1:5b). The reprobates, whom the author describes as not knowing God and not obeying the gospel (1:8), and who inflict suffering on the Thessalonians, will be condemned to "eternal destruction, separated from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might" (1:9). Description of the end time in 2 Thessalonians is no less colorful than that of 1 Thess 4:16–17: "The Lord Jesus [will be] revealed from heaven with his mighty angels (lit., "messengers of his power")" (1:7), and when he comes in glory (1:9b) he will be "glorified by his saints" (1:10). Ultimately, though, the main purpose of the thanksgiving prayer is to console the Thessalonians undergoing persecution, for the day of the Lord is a double-edged sword, as is clear from the prophets (e.g., Amos 5:18, 20). While the just God repays with affliction those who mete out affliction, God will also repay the afflicted with relief (1:6–7a). The flip side of condemnation is deliverance.

There is remarkably little that the author asks the hearers to do throughout the prayer, and in that respect the main theme of the thanksgiving and therefore the letter is not paraenesis but consolation and encouragement. Even the concluding prayer asks that God would make the hearers worthy of the call (1:11). The verse does not mean some kind of metamorphosis that might transform the Thessalonians into worthy subjects. The Greek verb used here means to count as worthy; it is up to God to count someone as worthy, just as it is God who "[fulfills] by his power every good resolve (lit., every delight in goodness) and work of faith" (1:11).

III. Warnings About the Parousia (2:1–12)

This section of 2 Thessalonians has often been characterized as the author's countering a "realized eschatology" by postulating stages of development leading to the end (see Overview). But in Jewish apocalyptic literature, the device of dividing world history into periods has a pastoral function: namely, to exhort the readers to hold on until the end, because the current sufferings represent but a temporary stage toward the inexorable glorious consummation that has been foreordained by God and prophesied by the ancients long ago. The value of periodization is not its supposed predictive power but its assertion that God is in charge of world events, not the current pretenders who are perpetrating atrocities and arrogating to themselves the title of the supreme God. That is the main purpose of the apocalypse in 2 Thessalonians, as is also the case of 1 Thess 4:13–5:11, where Paul tries to console the Thessalonians because of those who have died before the coming of the Lord. In fact, both passages presuppose the imminence of the Parousia. While 1 Thessalonians details how the dead will be raised at the Parousia, 2 Thessalonians exhorts his hearers to hold fast, for the current sufferings are not final.

The section begins with a warning against a rumor that "the day of the Lord is already here" (2:2b). That the author has to distinguish sharply his own view from those who purportedly came "either by spirit or by word or by letter, as though from us" (2:2a) suggests that the erroneous view was the result of misinterpreting Paul or an earlier letter, possibly the canonical 1 Thessalonians. A passage like 1 Thess 1:10 ("to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead—Jesus, who rescues us from the wrath that is coming"), which describes Jesus's rescue operation as a present reality (note present tense of rescues), could well lend itself to such an interpretation.

The author introduces a mysterious figure he calls "the lawless one . . . the one destined for destruction" (2:3). He is said to arrogate to himself the place of God, even to set himself up as a supreme object of worship: "He opposes and exalts himself above every so-called god or object of worship, so that he takes his seat in the temple of God, declaring himself to be God" (2:4). The only reason that the lawless one has not been revealed is that an equally mysterious figure, simply referred to as "the one who now restrains," imposes some unspecified restraint on him (2:7; cf. 2:6). The identity of the lawless one remains unknown and probably unknowable, but three observations should be made. First, to attribute all the woes to an arch-villain has been a standard trope in apocalyptic tradition since Dan 7 and the Maccabean Revolt. In all cases the leading figure fighting on the side of Satan is a powerful ruler declaring war on God's elect. Second, the reminder to the Thessalonians of Paul's teachings, "Do you not remember that I told you these things when I was still with you?" (1:5), regardless of the authorship of the letter, is a self-conscious attempt to link up with the historical Paul. While the function of such reminder in 1 Thessalonians was to establish and strengthen a personal bond between Paul and his audience based on common afflictions, here the appeal takes the place of the fictive sage of old, again a standard literary figure in Jewish apocalyptic writings, who has already foretold the mystery that is unfolding now, the end time. Third, even though the "revelation" of the lawless one still is to take place in the future, his lethal effects are felt now, "for the mystery of lawlessness is already at work" (1:7). In all likelihood, this is a reference to the current afflictions the Thessalonians are suffering, which Paul had predicted and which are now coming to pass. The audience might even be given to understand that what they are going through now is the very same persecution that drove Paul and his companions from the city (cf. 1 Thess 2:2). To call the present suffering a "mystery" is to interpret it in an apocalyptic setting, and "revelation" in this connection refers to the apocalyptic disclosure of the lawless one as the enemy of God's elect.

The final revelation of the lawless one will spell his destruction, however, for it will coincide with Christ's Parousia, according to the author's apocalyptic reckoning: "The Lord Jesus will destroy [him] with the breath (lit., "spirit") of his mouth, annihilating him by the manifestation of his coming" (2:8). Before that, though, God gives them up to lies and unrighteousness, sending to them "a mighty work of delusion" (2:11; NRSV, "powerful delusion") so that they will continue to believe in lies and to delight in unrighteousness (2:11–12). A similar sentiment is expressed in Rom 1:18–32.

IV. Second Thanksgiving Prayer (2:13–17)

A second thanksgiving following the first (1:3–12) resembles the two thanksgivings of 1 Thessalonians (1:2–10 and 2:13). A prayer concludes the second thanksgiving in 2 Thessalonians (2:16–17) just as it does in the first letter (1 Thess 3:11–13). In 1 Thessalonians, the second thanksgiving returns to the theme of imitation introduced in the first and turns it into encouragement for the Thessalonians to withstand persecution (1 Thess 2:14–16), a theme that is also touched on in the first thanksgiving. In 2 Thessalonians, however, the two thanksgivings do not correspond in this same way. The second thanksgiving uses the election of God as a basis for exhorting the audience to hold onto "traditions that you were taught by us, either by word of mouth or by our letter" (2:15). Here the author introduces the paraenesis that occupies the rest of the letter.

Elsewhere Paul uses tradition (paradosis) carefully, reserving it for a stable, technical body of knowledge, to be passed on from one to another. In 1 Cor 11:2, the term refers to the tradition of the Lord's Supper. In Gal 1:14, it means the teachings of the sages in Judaism. The verb paradidonai has a broader range of meanings, but among them is to hand down a tradition. So, in 1 Cor 11:2, Paul handed down the words of institution to his congregation. In 1 Cor 15:3, he handed down the teaching on the death and resurrection of Jesus, as well as his resurrection appearances, which he is careful to say did not originate with him but he received in the same way the Corinthians did, by careful transmission. In no case does he call his own words "tradition," as he does twice in 2 Thessalonians (2:15 and 3:6). This use of the language of tradition for Paul's own words may represent a later stage in the Thessalonian congregation, where Paul's earlier letters have taken on the appearance of authoritative writings.

V. Paraenesis (3:1–15)

The exhortations begin with two prayer requests, first for the continual success of the gospel (3:1), the second for the safety of the missionaries in their evangelization efforts (3:2). The intimate relationship between these two requests is made clear in the explanatory sentence, "not everyone has faith" (3:2b). The requests effectively divide the world between those who have faith and those who do not, and it is the latter who are called "perverse and evil." In keeping with the apocalyptic warnings of ch. 2, the underlying perspective is apocalyptic dualism, good versus evil. In such a world dangers remain, but the author continues with a prayer that the Lord will safeguard the Thessalonians and keep them from this evil age (3:3).

The paraenesis proper (3:6–12) is framed by two personal notes designed to appeal to Paul's apostolic authority. The first (3:4–5) stresses positively the confidence with which the author has in the Thessalonians that they will do what he commands (3:4), a command that sounds more like a threat in light of his proposed visit (3:5). The resort to command is repeated later in 3:6, 10, 12. The seriousness of the command is reinforced by another personal note that closes the paraenesis, this time appealing to the letter of Paul which must have attained a status of authority by now (3:13–15).

The paraenesis raises two issues that appear on surface unrelated to each other, disorderliness (3:6, 7, 11) and idleness (3:8, 10, 11, 12), but the intertwined discussion of the two, sometimes in the same sentence (see 3:7b–8, 11), would suggest that they are but two aspects of the same problem. The situation presupposed in this discussion might well be some form of communal sharing that sought to provide for those who were less well off or could not fend for themselves. Such an organization could open itself to abuse, however, by freeloaders taking advantage of the community's generosity. Their refusal to work could threaten the core values of the community and tear at the fabric of its structure. It is unclear how this problem is related to the community's apocalyptic outlook.

The problem was severe enough to warrant a command (3:6, 12). The new command reinforces an old one, "If anyone does not wish to work, let the person not eat" (3:10, author's trans.). Apparently this command was part of Paul's instructions during his initial visit. This stricture refers to assistance of needy members in the form of a meal. It also means that the community is in a position to dictate who could or could not receive such assistance, reflecting an organizational structure based on material sharing and pooling of common resources. The criterion for who could benefit from the communal largesse is not that everyone must work for a living regardless of ability. Instead, only those who do not wish to work would be ostracized and forbidden to participate in communal sharing, for such behavior constitutes disorderliness, and those who abuse the system thus must be separated in order to ensure the continual vitality of communal living (3:6). In this context, tradition must refer to what Paul taught the Thessalonians (3:10).

VI. Postscript (3:16–18)

Other than the usual blessing of peace and grace (3:16, 18), which are identical to their counterparts in 1 Thessalonians (5:23, 28), the postscript is distinguished by its absence of Paul's warm greeting with a holy kiss or his instruction to have the letter be read out loud to the congregation (cf. 1 Thess 5:26–27). Instead, the author calls attention to an autograph signature to assure his audience of its authenticity. Such insistence seems out of place and assumes the recipients would read the letter rather than hear it performed orally.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. F. Bruce. 1 & 2 Thessalonians. WBC 45 (Waco: Word, 1982); K. Donfried. Paul, Thessalonica, and Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); V. P. Furnish. I Thessalonians and II Thessalonians (Nashville: Abingdon, 2007); R. Jewett. The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); A. Malherbe. The Letters to the Thessalonians. AB 32B (New York: Doubleday, 2000).

1–2 TIMOTHY

MATTHEW SKINNER

OVERVIEW

The two Letters to Timothy along with the Letter to Titus form a distinct collection within the NT. These three books address two of the Apostle Paul's prominent associates to guide them in organizing Christian communities in ways that reflect right doctrine and confront challenges brought by rival teachers. The letters offer moral exhortation rooted in theological assertions, insisting that adherence to sound teaching manifests itself through a quality of personal conduct and social organization that was widely valued and also promoted by moral-philosophical traditions of the wider Greco-Roman world.

For almost 300 years Bible scholars have referred to 1–2 Timothy and Titus as the Pastoral Epistles in recognition that these letters' main purpose is to provide instruction about Christian leadership. To understand the nature and significance of this instruction, it is necessary to consider the literary character of the Pastorals and the circumstances they address. Although the letters bear Paul's name, a strong majority of scholars finds much evidence in them to suggest they come from a later time and a different author. Their basic terminology and theological emphases differ greatly from the content of other Pauline letters whose authorship is not disputed. Their ethical outlook and concerns about false teachings appear to reflect circumstances that arose after Paul's death. Written likely within a decade of the year 100 CE by an unknown author to unknown audiences, the Pastorals stage a literary communication between Paul's legacy and later beneficiaries of his ministry. These letters demonstrate their commitment to perpetuating Paul's ministry and teaching by adapting the Pauline tradition and calling it into service in new ways to equip churches facing new challenges and opportunities. They eschew conduct and ideas that outsiders could regard as antisocial, and they promote a vision of Christianity that exists relatively harmoniously with the wider society's values.

First Timothy shares much with Titus, for both books offer instruction about community organization and proper lifestyle. They say little about the specific duties of overseers (from a term that later Christians would equate with the office of bishops), wives, older or respected men (later equated with elders or presbyters), widows, helpers (deacons), and slaves. Rather, the author prescribes qualifications for these people, moral standards that square well with virtues promoted in other Greco-Roman writings concerning the proper ordering of society. In that ancient context, households were the primary social and economic units, headed usually by a man and composed of extended family, slaves, and various clients. First Timothy and Titus conceive of the church as "the household of God" (1 Tim 3:15), which, like any other household in that particular culture, depended upon an established ordering of its members and their roles if it was to thrive, attract repute, and contribute positively to those around it. "Household management" in the church is not merely for show; it manifests the "godliness" (eusebeia) at the heart of the faith that Paul's successors inherited and preserve through their teaching. In the Pastorals' semantics, such "godliness" carries the sense of loyalty—loyalty to God and adherence to God's purposes. Virtuous and godly lives, therefore, express God's gracious intention to bring salvation to all (Titus 2:11–13).

Second Timothy likewise praises the godliness that corresponds to sound teaching and commends good works, but its focus falls less on church order and more on the faithfulness Paul exemplified in his ministry. Written in the voice of one expecting death (4:6–8), it resembles testamentary literature, in which a revered figure gives final, sometimes quite personal instructions and warnings to followers (cf. 1 Kgs 2:1–9; Acts 20:18–35). The letter depicts Paul as an archetypal model of endurance and faithfulness, qualities commended to Timothy as he continues the apostle's ministry while dealing with rival teachers whose radicalism threatens to cause offense and alienate the church from its wider society.

The Pastorals occasionally cite rich material from Christian hymns or liturgies, and yet their most vital theological contribution may not come from their specific assertions about God, the gospel, or faithful living. Instead, their greatest theological value emerges from observing how they do theology by drawing upon the figure of Paul to equip churches that are moving into new circumstances and challenges. The Pastorals take received traditions and recast them in different language with new emphases so as to shape both the witness that Christian faith can offer and the self-understanding of Christian communities within a particular cultural setting. In doing so, these writings imply that Christianity never stands detached from culture but must continually and creatively draw from the societal constructs and norms it encounters as it endeavors to embody the message of God's salvation in ways that people will find relevant and meaningful.

OUTLINE

First Timothy

- I. Salutation (1:1–2)
- II. God's Ordering of Things and the Need for Instruction (1:3–20)
- III. Instructions Concerning Worship (2:1–3:1a)
- IV. Instructions Concerning Church Leaders (3:1b–13)
- V. The Nature of the Church and the Threats It Faces (3:14–4:5)
- VI. Instructions Concerning Timothy's Leadership (4:6–16)

VII. Instructions Concerning Church Organization (5:1–6:2a)

VIII. Commands to Stand Firm amid Conflict (6:2b–19)

IX. Concluding Instructions (6:20–21)

Second Timothy

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

II. Thanksgiving and Reminder (1:3–7)

III. Exhortations to Remain Faithful (1:8–2:13)

IV. Warnings about Those Who Oppose the Truth (2:14–3:9)

A. The Rival Teachers (2:14–21)

B. The Need for Patience and Gentleness (2:22–26)

C. The Moral Bankruptcy of False Teachers (3:1–9)

V. A Charge to Persevere and Proclaim (3:10–4:8)

VI. Concluding Instructions and Greetings (4:9–22)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

FIRST TIMOTHY

Timothy, the letter's addressee, was perhaps the best known of Paul's partners. The book of Acts and several of Paul's letters mention his cooperation with Paul, and some of those letters name him as their coauthor (e.g., 2 Corinthians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians, Philemon). By addressing a known emissary of Paul, both this letter and Second Timothy strengthen their claim to be a reliable expression of the Pauline tradition, for as the apostle's "loyal child" Timothy functions as a conduit for the authority associated with Paul's personal and theological legacy.

1:3–20. The letter restates Timothy's role in Ephesus: to instruct people and correct contrary doctrines, thereby displaying love. Authentic teaching corresponds to the way God would have things ordered, in keeping with God's role as Savior (see 1:1; 2:3–4; 4:10). The word in v. 4 translated by the NRSV as "training" refers rather to God's "household management" (oikonomia). False teachers do not conform to God's gospel, as demonstrated in their profane, disorderly behavior. Regarding their connection to the Christian faith, because they abandon conscience, they exist as if desolated and cut off by a shipwreck.

2:1–3:1a. This section begins with exhortation concerning prayer, including prayers for governing authorities. Such petitions for the well-being of all society do not promote accommodation or loyalty to the Roman Empire merely to insure the church's security (although that is part of it); in 2:3–6 the justification for these prayers cites liturgical language to declare God's authority over the world. Thus the author asserts that "a quiet and peaceable life," a life that corresponds to society's conventional understanding of "godliness and dignity," manages to express God's desire for the salvation of all the world.

Focus on prayer resumes in 2:8, but then the author turns to women's adornment and commands that women remain silent in public worship. Concern for respectable order, as construed according to particular expectations in ancient culture, underlie these verses. Much of what the letter says about women mirrors misgivings expressed by Greco-Roman moralists. Virtuous women were expected to be modest and submissive to their husbands. Also common were suspicions that falsehoods easily ensnare women, an assumption that governs the interpretation of Adam and Eve's story in 2:13–14. By restricting women's roles in worship to conform with certain patriarchal norms about households, the author perhaps tries to curb the influence of women who had been influenced by rival teachers (see 2 Tim 3:6–7) and thus to prevent the specific Christian communities he has in view from appearing scandalous to outsiders. An affirmation of women's salvation, underscored by the author as a reliable "saying," concludes this section, again associating salvation with traditionally prescribed roles and ethical virtues.

3:1b–13. Instructions about overseers (bishops) and helpers (deacons) describe not their functions but the qualifications of those who would assume these leadership roles. Nothing about the expectations concerning these men, their wives, and their children is uniquely Christian. Greco-Roman moralists commended essentially the same practical virtues for military commanders and heads of households. Overseers seem to have possessed significant authority in the congregations (see also Titus 1:7–9), for v. 5 compares their management over households to their administration of the church. Honorable leaders who keep God's household (see 3:15) in proper order give outsiders no cause to take offense, which appears to be a primary rationale behind the prescribed qualifications.

3:14–4:5. As they bring about a pause in the series of instructions to Timothy, these verses offer keys to the letter's purpose. First, in 3:14–16, statements about the church and God provide theological justification for all the exhortations. The church as God's "household" (oikos) draws upon the notion that families or households reflected Roman society as a whole. The Pastorals depict the church as an embodiment of the society God intends, one made possible only by the salvation God provides, and therefore they regard prized social values as capable of modeling God's design for the world. In the context of 1 Tim 2–3, this theological premise explains why women, overseers, and helpers should manifest orderly and honorable virtues. A quotation from a Christian hymn reiterates that part of "the mystery of our religion (eusebeia)" is that it brings heaven and earth into relationship, for the revealing of Jesus results not only in his heavenly glory but also in proclamation and belief among all "throughout the world."

Next, 4:1–5 asserts that certain people threaten the church's ability to live in conformity with the teaching it has been given, making the letter's instructions to Timothy all the more necessary. Rival teachers, described as having renounced the doctrines ("the faith") Timothy must promote, advocate ascetic life-styles. In response, the author strongly confirms the goodness of creation, indicating that perhaps these teachers characterized salvation in terms of escape from or renunciation of the material world—ideas that conflict with Jesus' having been "revealed in flesh" (3:16) and that may have made the church appear socially subversive.

4:6–16. Instructions to Timothy flow from the previous verses' refutation of rival teachings, emphasizing the importance of his leadership in the struggle against divergent ideas. Timothy's role revolves around teaching the tenets of "the faith" that has nourished him thus far. The author apparently assumes readers know these doctrines, for the letter does not delineate them. Paul's connection to "sound teaching" authenticates the teaching, and it coheres with the Scriptures read in public worship (cf. 2 Tim 3:16–17). Timothy's persistence in contending for this teaching involves living an exemplary life. Once again the letter claims that right doctrine aligns with right behavior and that both express the truth that God is Savior (see also Titus 2:11–13).

5:1–6:2a. The string of instructions to Timothy continues, now focusing on various groups within the Christian community. Standard exhortations in 5:1–2 reinforce the familial identity of the church. Discussion of "widows who are really widows" in 5:3–16 refers to women who require support from the wider community of believers because they have no husbands or families to care for them. Only certain aged widows who will not remarry and who display esteemed virtues qualify to be included on a roster. The roster probably identifies the people to whom a church provides material support, although some interpreters think it could indicate an exclusive cadre of older unmarried women who served churches in a formal, recognized way. In any case, the remarks in 5:13–15 betray deep suspicion about women's behavior, probably in response to the influence rival teachings have had (see 2 Tim 3:6–7). Instructions about older men in 5:17–22 refer to those among them who provide leadership through preaching and teaching, distinguished as elders or presbyters. Finally, and in keeping with cultural norms, slaves must honor those whom they serve. All these exhortations apply to the organization of the churches that comprise the letter's intended ancient audience; they reiterate the household character of Christian communities, affirm the need for leadership that maintains the desired organization of those communities, and ensure that vulnerable members receive care. The author expects the communities' good works and upstanding morality to prevent God's name from being dishonored (5:7, 14, 25; 6:1), in keeping with God's salvific intentions for the world.

6:2b–19. Verse 6:2b points backward to preceding instructions while also transitioning into what follows, which contrasts Timothy's conduct with the depravity that accompanies contrary doctrines. In keeping with much contemporary Greco-Roman moral discourse, the Pastorals frequently turn polemical, opposing rival teachings by impugning the character of those who teach them. In this case, dissenters stray from "godliness" and adherence to a particular moral order; desire for riches and willingness to exploit godliness for personal gain are among the causes of their waywardness (see 2 Tim 3:1–5). To guard against their damage, Timothy must stand firm in good conduct and fulfill the commission or "commandment" laid upon him as a leader in ministry until the coming intervention or "manifestation" (epiphaneia) of Jesus Christ, whose glory is extolled with liturgical language in vv. 15–16.

Having spoken sharply about the greed of rival teachers, the letter returns to riches in vv. 17–19 so as not to paint all the wealthy with a single brushstroke. Just as leaders must not be enslaved to money (see 3:3, 8), any who possess wealth must not let it displace God but should attend to good works and generosity. Wealthy persons clearly belonged to churches when the letter was composed. These verses strike a balance between a caution toward riches' power to corrupt and an acknowledgement that wealth allows for generosity that can promote the good works that mark authentic Christian living.

6:20–21. The concluding words to Timothy recapitulate the letter's perspectives. In his role as teacher and manager of God's household he is to "guard the deposit" (v. 20a, author's trans.; see also 2 Tim 1:12, 14). He must vigilantly preserve and propagate a doctrinal, ethical, and pastoral inheritance, summed up as "the faith." This inheritance, anchored in Paul's legacy, has itself been fashioned by the letter's author to render a vision of Christian existence that conforms to the structures, language, and norms of a particular culture. As it contends for believers to embody God's salvation, First Timothy provides an innovative attempt at adapting Christian theology and conduct to certain circumstances, even if the letter's addressee is not himself encouraged to take similarly creative steps toward re-adapting the tradition when those circumstances change.

SECOND TIMOTHY

1:1–2. On the address to Timothy, see the comments on 1 Tim 1:1–2, above.

1:3–7. These opening verses set a tone that resounds throughout the letter, urging Timothy to persist in faith and exercise bold leadership. His faith has deep, sure roots in his family; it is part of who he is (see 3:14–15). The primary exhortation speaks of rekindling (literally, it tells Timothy to persist in "fanning into flame again") a spiritual gift of ministry and thereby suggests that the substance of the whole letter is nothing new. Timothy's ministry perpetuates a received tradition of doctrine and practical instruction, and thus the letter uses the figure of Timothy to transmit that tradition in the authority of the Apostle Paul. When the letter exhorts Timothy to continue faithfully in what has been bequeathed to him, it implies that readers uphold and abide by that illustrious Pauline tradition when they themselves heed the exhortations.

1:8–2:13. The first set of exhortations in this section, in 1:8–14, derive from Paul's experiences and call Timothy to emulate the apostle. The letter describes Paul as imprisoned (see also 1:16; 2:9; 4:16), which meant suffering and shame for him. Timothy remains faithful if he suffers for the gospel as Paul did, by holding to the teaching received from Paul, thereby guarding the "good treasure" (or, "good deposit"; see comments on 1 Tim 6:20–21, above). Contending for the gospel Paul preached and suffering are not separate things but two sides of a single coin (see 3:10–12). Suffering, despite its attendant shame, cannot discredit the gospel, for the gospel both acknowledges and minimizes the reality of suffering as it declares the power of God to bring life from death (1:8b–10). This power demonstrates God's grace, something that was always part of God's salvific plan even "before the ages began" and was made known or "revealed" (phaneroō) through the "appearing" (epiphaneia) of Christ Jesus in the flesh.

Other people's deeds provide negative and positive illustrations of faithfulness in 1:15–18. Those who turned from Paul turned from the gospel and the shame they feared. By contrast, Onesiphorus remained faithful, even though remaining loyal to an imprisoned friend could have brought him great dishonor in that society.

Another set of exhortations to Timothy concludes this passage, beginning in 2:1–7. The notion of power or strength from 1:7–8 reappears in 2:1. Also, just as 1:13–14 told Timothy to guard Pauline teaching, he should entrust others to teach the same (2:2). Talk of suffering, introduced in 1:8, resumes in 2:3. The examples of soldiers, athletes, and farmers emphasize the single-minded devotion, discipline, labor, and expectation of reward that characterize the leadership Timothy must exercise through his suffering. Theological realities justify all these exhortations. The imperative to "remember Jesus Christ" (2:8) gives strength for enduring hardship; Christ, "raised from the dead," demonstrates that God's word cannot be confined. The author likely quotes from an early Christian hymn in 2:11b–13 to reiterate that perseverance is a hallmark of Christian living and ministry, because the gospel is a movement from death to life and nothing can sever Christ's faithfulness toward believers.

2:14–3:9. Attention shifts toward those Timothy should instruct, although exhortations still address his responsibilities as they warn about the influence of those who teach rival doctrines. The "them" in 2:14 may recall "the elect" mentioned in 2:10, indicating all believers, or it may go back to the leaders identified as "faithful people" in 2:2. "Wrangling over words" refers to verbal battles or quarrels, presumably concerning doctrine (see 1 Tim 1:3–5; 6:4; Titus 3:9). The leadership envisioned here does not host discussions, it only explains "the word of truth" (2:15). The author warns about the disruptive effect of false teachings, assuming that readers already know their substance. Just the mention of some who claim "that the resurrection has already taken place" provides a glimpse into a specific contrary doctrine. That vague statement offers little more than the suggestion that other teachers do not focus on a resurrection to come. They instead advocate a kind of spiritual existence in the present time, perhaps an ascetic lifestyle (see 1 Tim 4:3–5). In 2:20–21, attention returns to Timothy's calling and the idea of his presenting himself for God's service (cf. 2:15). The metaphor of utensils in a great house encourages him to strive to be useful to God, for he and all he teaches will be available for honorable purposes and good works if they are not contaminated by the profane teachings and destructive behaviors of rival teachers.

The next part of this section, 2:22–26, urges Timothy to live virtuously and again warns against quarrelling. A new emphasis appears when the author calls for humble "gentleness" in correcting opponents. A refusal to engage in debates over doctrine, therefore, neither requires nor permits a refusal to engage opponents. The one who serves the Lord displays patience with adversaries, specifically because they may yet repent, for God's salvation is never out of reach (see 1 Tim 2:4; Titus 2:11–13). Even opponents of the truth might eventually come to do God's will (following the NRSV's footnote on the translation of 2:26).

False teachings' capacity to harm nevertheless remains great, as 3:1–9 emphasizes through warnings about moral decline in "the last days." These comments do not predict future events but discredit false teachers by linking them to excessive moral depravity. This brand of polemic and the rattling off of vices in 3:2–5 are common in the Pastoral Epistles and other literature from their time (see also 1 Tim 6:2b–5). Surely the specific opponents in the author's crosshairs were not utter antisocial degenerates; the point is that their teachings, which cloak themselves in a guise of godliness, are actually corrupt and therefore hypocritical. They evidence a flawed understanding, which necessarily leads to disorder and danger (cf. comments on corrupted minds and consciences in 1 Tim 1:19; cf. 4:1–2; 6:5; Titus 1:15–16). If, as the Pastorals regularly insist, godly living is made possible by God's salvation as comprehended by adherence to sound doctrine, then false teachers prove the inverse through teachings that go hand in hand with aberrant conduct. To confirm this, the author mentions those who prey on women, whom cultural stereotypes considered easily manipulated by passions and falsehood. Apparently these teachers had converted some female believers to their views, creating situations in which women were violating the social norms that the Pastorals elsewhere go to great lengths to reinforce as appropriate for Christian living (see 1 Tim 2:8–3:1a; 5:13–15; Titus 2:3–5). False teachers foolishly oppose God's servants just like Jannes and Jambres, names traditionally associated with the Egyptian magicians who appear anonymously in Exod 7–9.

3:10–4:8. In this climactic section the letter returns to issuing Timothy exhortations that stem from the experiences and example of the Apostle Paul, similar to the material in 1:8–2:13. As Paul ministered and endured persecutions, he manifested the virtues consistent with sound doctrine (3:10–11a); Timothy is to do the same. Deceivers and deception will continue to pose threats, but Timothy must persist in the truth he has been taught. Exactly what he has been taught is not discussed; the focus falls on the people (the pronoun whom in 3:14 is plural, indicating Paul and other progenitors of Timothy's faith) who have taught him and on how long he has known these things (3:14–15). In this regard, the letter delivers motivation, not explanation. It grounds confidence in the legacy and certitude of this faith, not necessarily in theological proofs. "The sacred writings," namely Jewish Scriptures, are a source of Timothy's theological instruction, for they make him and others "wise for salvation" (3:15, NIV) and thereby equip them for the training and living that correspond to God's salvation.

The future, specifically Christ's return as judge, motivates the charges in 4:1–5. Paul's ministry becomes Timothy's ministry. Like the apostle, Timothy must proclaim, teach, endure suffering, and be an evangelist. Paul's impending death casts these instructions as perhaps his final words to his successor in God's service (4:6–7). Paul's fidelity ensured that "the crown of righteousness" awaited him as his reward (4:8). Still, this crown remained the Lord's to give. Paul did not earn it, but his faithful service buttressed his confidence, just as it can for Timothy and anyone else who eagerly awaits the next manifestation or "appearing" (epiphaneia) of the Lord (see also 1:10; 4:1; 1 Tim 6:14; Titus 2:11–13). Paul emerges as a model for readers to emulate in every dimension: his faithfulness, his conduct, his adherence to sound teaching, his suffering, his endurance, and his expectation of future reward.

4:9–22. Specific commands to Timothy enhance the letter's ability to stage a communication from the apostle to his delegate. Writings composed in the name of a dead and revered figure sometimes included such realistic details, and yet the blessing to a plural "you" in v. 22b, duplicating 1 Tim 6:21b, may acknowledge that the Pastorals were really addressed to a community. The mention of many who abandoned Paul provides an opportunity to reprise the confidence with which the letter began (see 1:5–7, 12b). Although people forsook or opposed Paul, he remained confident in the Lord's care (vv. 17–18). Their turning from him may represent their turning from God, but Paul's endurance remained exemplary.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. M. Bassler. 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, Titus. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996); R. F. Collins. 1 & 2 Timothy and Titus: A Commentary. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); B. Fiore. The Pastoral Epistles: First Timothy, Second Timothy, Titus. SP 12 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, 2007); F. Young. The Theology of the Pastoral Letters. New Testament Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

TITUS

MATTHEW SKINNER

OVERVIEW

The vocabulary, style, subject matter, and theological outlook of Titus reveal its close connections to 1–2 Timothy. The common features of these three books invite interpreters to consider them as a collection, and so they are widely known as the Pastoral Epistles. For more on their background and content, see the overview of 1–2 Timothy in this commentary.

Titus appears last in the canonical ordering of the Pastorals because it is the shortest of the three. No one knows when it was composed in relation to its companion letters, but the presence of an extended theological rationale for Paul's apostleship in 1:1–3 may indicate that it preceded the Letters to Timothy, which have much shorter and less formal salutations, or that it performed an introductory function for the trio. Although Titus shares much with 1 Timothy, especially in its concerns about internal dissension and its exhortations regarding community organization and the value of good works, the two letters do not duplicate one another. Titus mentions neither widows nor helpers (deacons), and its comments about the Holy Spirit and baptism (3:4–7) root its instructions in theological themes that are absent from 1 Timothy.

OUTLINE

- I. Salutation (1:1–4)
- II. Organization That Preserves Sound Doctrine (1:5–16)
- III. Exhortations to Promote God's Doctrine and Good Works (2:1–14)
- IV. Behavior That Manifests God's Salvation (2:15–3:8a)
- V. Commands to End Internal Conflicts (3:8b–11)
- VI. Concluding Instructions and Greetings (3:12–15)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Salutation (1:1–4)

The salutation describes the theological thrust of Paul's apostleship, making use of several of the Pastoral Epistles' most prominent theological topics: faith, knowledge, truth, godliness, and a proclamation that centers on God's identity as Savior and reveals God's word. Titus, the letter's addressee and a Gentile, was one of Paul's associates. He accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem (Gal 2:1) and served as Paul's envoy among the Corinthians (2 Cor 7:13–15; 8:16–24; 12:18). By addressing a known emissary of Paul, the letter strengthens its claim to be a valid expression of the Pauline tradition as it delivers exhortations backed by the authority of Paul's apostleship, transmitted via Paul's delegates, and now to be heeded by its readers.

II. Organization That Preserves Sound Doctrine (1:5–16)

1:5–16. This letter includes no words of thanksgiving but immediately instructs Paul's associate about administering congregations on the island of Crete. No other New Testament writing refers to Christian ministry occurring on Crete, but by the time of this letter's composition there appear to be believers in multiple towns.

These verses first instruct Titus about appointing older men (elders or presbyters) and overseers (bishops) to positions of leadership (vv. 5–9) and then explain that such people play important roles in silencing those who teach contrary doctrines that disrupt households and are tantamount to denying God (vv. 10–16). Any formal distinction between the mature (not necessarily elderly) men who lead and overseers, if there is one, remains vague; the focus falls on their similar qualifications (see also 1 Tim 3:1b–7), virtues that confirm their ability to manage their own households honorably and with authority. Their stable management stands in sharp contrast to the rival teachers' proclivity for "upending whole households" (v. 11, author's trans.; see 2 Tim 2:18). An overseer must adhere to received doctrine ("teaching") to fulfill his role as a teacher who refutes rebellious ideas.

Other than brief references to "circumcision" and "Jewish myths" (see also 3:9), the author gives few clues about the substance of contrary teachings, preferring instead to vilify those who teach them with a slur about Cretans and disparaging remarks about their character.

III. Exhortations to Promote God's Doctrine and Good Works (2:1–14)

2:1–14. The letter shifts to tell Titus to encourage groups of Christians to live in ways that accord with sound doctrine. The moral exhortations of vv. 2–10 call for orderly living and, like the qualifications for leaders given in 1:6–8, align well with recognized Greco-Roman ideals pertaining to the hierarchical structure of households and the roles of their members. The arrangement of this section of the letter has pivotal significance, for the practical exhortations are followed and explained by words about salvation in vv. 11–14. Honorable behavior and "good deeds" are not the totality of Christian faith. The commended virtues serve as "an ornament to the doctrine of God our Savior"; reputable living becomes possible through the salvation God gives and is the appropriate way of life between the time when God's saving grace "appeared" or made itself known (epiphaino⁻) in Christ (v. 11) and the coming "manifestation" (epiphaneia) of Christ in glory (v. 13).

IV. Behavior That Manifests God's Salvation (2:15–3:8a)

2:15–3:8a. Resembling the previous section, exhortations about believers' conduct again precede an explanation of their theological basis. Christians should live peacefully and honorably by submitting to civil authorities. They must shun quarrels, because mistreatment of others characterizes life apart from Christ. For when God "appeared" (epiphaino⁻) and revealed salvation through Christ (3:4), it was an expression of "goodness and loving kindness," which believers now embody through their charitable and irreproachable behavior toward others. The rich statements in 3:4–7 appear to be taken from a hymn or another liturgical formula. The author approves their claims with the comment, "The saying is sure."

V. Commands to End Internal Conflicts (3:8b–11)

3:8b–11. These verses connect closely to the previous section, with v. 8b resuming the instruction that Titus call people to "good works" (cf. 3:1). The author exhorts against debating over issues raised by rival teachers or divisive people (see 1 Tim 1:4; 6:4; 2 Tim 2:23). The courtesy toward others commended in 3:2 gives way in 3:9–11 to unyielding resistance of any dissension that arises within the community. Titus should not entertain theological discussions but teach and maintain traditions bequeathed to him. In this instruction the letter assumes the patent validity of theological traditions associated with Paul's legacy rather than delineating or contending anew for them.

VI. Concluding Instructions and Greetings (3:12–15)

3:12–15. Specific commands to Titus enhance the sense of the letter as communication between Paul and his envoy on Crete. Realistic details like these were sometimes included in writings composed in the name of a dead and revered figure, and yet the concluding blessing to "all of you" in the plural may acknowledge that the letter was really addressed to a community. A final reference to good works underscores the Pastorals' insistence that Christians' lives promote well-being, manifest virtues, and so express the basic conviction that God brings salvation to all.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. M. Bassler. 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, Titus. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996); R. F. Collins. 1 & 2 Timothy and Titus: A Commentary. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); B. Fiore. The Pastoral Epistles: First Timothy, Second Timothy, Titus. SP 12 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, 2007); F. Young. The Theology of the Pastoral Letters. New Testament Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

PHILEMON

EMERSON POWERY

OVERVIEW

Although the letter to Philemon contains only 25 verses and 335 words, through it readers see the rhetorical skill of Paul, the negotiation between church leaders, the network of house churches, and the social world of slavery in first-century Christianity. The letter also raises numerous difficult questions, including: (1) How does Onesimus meet Paul? Is Onesimus an escaped slave seeking Paul's assistance, or is he sent to assist Paul during his confinement? (2) If Onesimus has run away, does he do so because of the the general provocation of "slavery" in first-century Rome, or does Onesimus have other tensions with his owner? (3) What does Paul expect of Philemon—Onesimus's freedom or simply acceptance back into the household without any legal penalty? (4) Does the letter primarily wrestle with the condemnation and possible death of one human being or does it address the entire slave system?

The Greco-Roman world held firm laws on slavery. The enslaved were property, thereby subject to all Roman laws related to ownership. Slaves had no civil rights within Roman society. Although laws were in place to check the most flagrant abuse of slaves, the Roman government rarely intervened in the rights of owners over their property. Indeed, there were severe laws against those who interfered with this part of the social order. Assisting runaway slaves was illegal. Once recaptured, escaped slaves normally received severe punishment, even death. The head of a household, as Philemon apparently was (vv. 1–2), could legally execute returned slaves.

Slavery was also an ancient Israelite practice. What Paul would have heard, when the Scriptures were read in the synagogues, may not have challenged directly what he would have heard in Roman courts. Neither would it have coincided precisely with the slave system of his day. Despite Israel's exodus from Egypt, slavery was allowed. But it was considered punishment for foreign captives whom Israelites could buy and bequeath to their heirs (Lev 25:44–46). The enslavement of fellow Hebrews, however, should last for a 6-year period only (Deut 15:13–15). Finally, most relevant to Paul's letter, an escaped slave should not be returned to his/her master (Deut 23:15). Philo, a Jewish contemporary of Paul, interprets Deut 23 as if the fugitive should not be returned to a cruel master and implies that the enslaved could be sold to someone else (cf. On the Virtues 24.124). In another treatise, On the Contemplative Life, Philo knows of some Essenes who viewed slavery as against nature (9.70–71; cf. Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 18.21; but cf. Damascus Document XI.12; XII.10–11). Yet Paul does not cite Deut 23:15, and he may not have sensed the tension between these two viewpoints, the Roman world and its laws and the story of ancient Israel. Nevertheless, it is hard to imagine that he was not aware of it, given his comments in 1 Cor 7:20–24.

In Philemon, a brief letter to one prominent Christian and the members of this household community, Paul writes from under house arrest (vv. 1, 9, 10, 13, 23) in the early 60s of the Common Era with a plea and a request. Paul's appeal here, in this subtle protest, is based on love.

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1–7)

A. Greetings (1–3)

B. Thanksgiving (4–7)

II. Body of the Letter (8–21)

A. Preface to the Appeal (8–9)

B. The Decision, Appeal, and Mixed Emotions (10–13)

C. Mixed Emotions and Potential Expectation (14–16)

D. Do What Is Right (17–21)

III. Conclusion (22–25)

A. A Rhetorical Transition (22)

B. Final Greetings (23–24)

C. Closing Benediction (25)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Introduction (1–7)

A. Greetings (vv. 1–3)

Paul's opening identification of himself as a "prisoner of Christ Jesus" is unique among the Pauline letters, although he writes other letters from a prison cell (e.g., Philippians). More often, he employs the designation "servant of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1:1; cf. Rom 1:1) or "apostle of Christ Jesus" (e.g., Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Gal 1:1).

This self-description initiates a common motif throughout the letter. This "prisoner of Christ Jesus" (1:1) is the "prisoner" making the appeal (1:9) while "in his chains" (1:10, author's trans.) during his "imprisonment for the gospel" (1:13). Paul's own sacrifice on behalf of others should not go unnoticed, especially as he seeks a "benefit" from Philemon (v. 20).

Other features of this opening should be mentioned briefly. (1) Paul's "brother" and partner, Timothy, appears often in Paul's letters (e.g., 2 Cor 1:1; Phil 1:1; 1 Thess: 1:1; cf. Col 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1). (2) Recognizing Philemon as a "fellow worker" creates an inclusio with the end of the letter (v. 24). (3) This is the only Pauline letter addressed to a female leader, Apphia "our sister," in the early Christian communities. Some scholars suggest that she may be Philemon's wife or sister, for which there is no evidence here; if not, she still bears part of the responsibility for the outcome of the enslaved in this household church. (4) Addressing the "church in your house" reminds readers of the (semi-)public nature of these documents. The social interaction of this house church in Phrygia would affect Philemon's decision.

B. Thanksgiving (4–7)

The thanksgiving offers words of affirmation and encouragement. First, Paul remembers fellow believers in his prayers (v. 4; cf. Rom 1:8–15; Phil 1:3–11; 1 Thess 1:2–10; cf. Col 1:3–14). Second, he recognizes the "love and faith" the addressees share for others in the mission (v. 5; cf. Rom 1:8–15; 1 Thess 1:2–10; cf. 2 Thess 1:3–12). Here, Philemon is singled out for his reputation in the wider, nascent Christian movement. But the idea that Paul himself has been excited (i.e., "received much joy") and comforted (v. 7) because of Philemon's actions toward the "saints" is distinctive. Some scholars argue that v. 7 indicates that the Colossian church sent Onesimus to Paul. Paul hopes, in the construction of this letter, to convince Philemon to "refresh my heart in Christ" (v. 20) once again even as he has previously.

II. Body of the Letter (8–21)

A. Preface to the Appeal (8–9)

Prior to addressing the primary concern of this short letter, Paul offers prefatory remarks that combine "boldness in Christ" with love. He also reinforces his appeal by his status as an "elderly person" (prebyte ^{-s}) and a "prisoner of Christ Jesus." His status as "prisoner" is repeated throughout (vv. 1, 9, 10, 13, 23) and, in first-century culture, maturity commanded respect.

B. The Decision, Appeal, and Mixed Emotions (10–13)

Finally, Paul raises the issue of contention. Significantly, Paul turns to familial language in order to introduce Onesimus as his own child. This "birth" suggests a new beginning for Onesimus, perhaps to his conversion. In addition, Paul describes Onesimus as "my own heart" (v. 12, using splanchna, a term that refers literally to a person's "inward parts" or "bowels." Just as "the hearts (splanchna) of the saints have been refreshed" by Philemon (v. 7), so Paul wishes for his heart (splanchna) to be refreshed (v. 20), an emotion that is entangled with the person of Onesimus (v. 12).

Verse 11 prompts questions about how Onesimus has become "useful" to Paul? Apparently, he is providing some service for Paul during his imprisonment (v. 13). Through wordplay, Paul describes Onesimus as "useful" (euchre⁻ston), not "useless" (achre⁻ston). [These terms play off of the name "Onesimus," which also means "useful" or "beneficial."] It is not clear how Onesimus was "useless" to Philemon, perhaps due to what may have been owed (cf. v. 18) due to his absence from Philemon's household. But Paul is apparently troubled. So, against the dictates of the Torah (cf. Deut 23:15) but in line with Roman mores, Paul has already dispatched Onesimus back to the house church in Colossae.

C. Mixed Emotions and Potential Expectation (14–16)

Paul's anguish seems sincere. He wants Philemon to act on his own accord, that is, "voluntarily" (cf. 2 Cor 9:7). So, Paul offers a compelling suggestion: Philemon should accept Onesimus back "no longer as a slave but more than a slave, a beloved brother." It is unclear whether Paul seeks Onesimus' freedom, his acceptance, or something more countercultural.

Paul also uses "brother" language for Timothy (v. 1) and for Philemon (v. 20), as Onesimus' spiritual status has changed, as he has become committed to Paul's message of the gospel (vv. 10, 11, 13; cf. Col 4:9). May the theological, familial language indicate something more about his social status as well? In Paul's egalitarian words, Onesimus should be considered a brother "in the Lord" and "in the flesh" (v. 16). Can Philemon treat Onesimus as a "brother . . . in the flesh" without altering their own social relationship?

D. Do What Is Right (17–21)

Paul shifts to a series of conditional clauses, establishing the "conditions" for Philemon's decision. First, and perhaps most importantly, Paul considers himself to have a special relationship with Philemon, what he calls a "partner" (koino⁻nos), a term he uses elsewhere for his close relationship with Titus (2 Cor 8:23) and for some Corinthian believers (2 Cor 1:7). The Greek implies that Philemon considers Paul to be his "partner." For Paul, however, this relationship may be at stake if Onesimus is not accepted. Paul claims that he would not have written had he not been persuaded before he wrote. In fact, Paul claims to have written this letter "in my own hand" (v. 19), an emphasis uncommon in the traditional Pauline letters (cf. Gal 6:11). Of course, this is part of the apostle's attempt to influence the decision of his addressee from a remote distance. Paul's partnership with Philemon is dependent on Philemon's treatment of Onesimus. In reality, the whole household church is watching!

The second conditional clause (v. 18) provides the only possible hint that Onesimus may have committed wrongdoing. Paul's conditional statement implies that Onesimus may have committed an injustice or, more likely, owes Philemon something. If Onesimus actually stole something from Philemon, which the passage does not say, it may have been the funds to travel safely to Paul! In any case, Paul suggests that charges should be applied to his own account, an account that already has a surplus from Philemon's debt (v. 19). Paul does not request forgiveness for what Onesimus owes, but promises reparations!

Finally, Paul's switch to the optative mood ("let me have this benefit"; onaime⁻n), the Greek mood furthest removed from reality, indicates Paul's awareness that he cannot control Philemon's actions. It is his "wish" and his "polite request" that Philemon would do what Paul considers to be the right thing to do and, despite the force of his language elsewhere (e.g., "knowing that you will do even more than I say" in v. 21), Paul's use of the optative here betrays how tenuous this situation is.

III. Conclusion (22–25)

The closing provides a rhetorical "bridge" for Paul's argument: his upcoming plans to visit the Phrygian household church (v. 22). Given Paul's imprisonment, it is unclear whether he actually intends a visit or whether this is a strategy for discovering Philemon's decision. Only the addressees, who know Paul's prison status, would know the truth of this sentiment.

As with other letters, Paul sends greetings from "fellow workers" (i.e., Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke), singling out his "fellow prisoner," Epaphras who believers in this region probably know (cf. Col 1:7; 4:12). The other names are also grouped together elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Col 4:10–14; 2 Tim 4:10–11).

Paul's customary final word and blessing ends the letter (v. 25) and the need for "grace" is not perfunctory for the situation at hand.

Whatever interpreters may think about this short and poignant letter, one fact remains. Paul is not indifferent to Onesimus' plight. He uses his vast rhetorical skill to secure a release for his fellow believer in Christ. Why Paul returns Onesimus at all remains unanswerable. His "love" appeal may be one reason. And many readers have wished for a more forceful argument. The ambiguity of his request, and the circumstances surrounding this situation, has led to misunderstanding and misuse of this document in the history of its interpretation. African Americans, for example, have borne the brunt of misinterpretations in the United States. Nevertheless, Paul's expectations are high that Philemon would do "even more" than asked. Paul allows Philemon to act on his own accord in light of the weight of the gospel and in the company of other believers in the household.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Callahan. Embassy of Onesimus: The Letter of Paul to Philemon (Valley Forge, Pa.: Trinity Press International, 1997); C. H. Felder. "Philemon." NIB (Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon Press, 2005) 11:883– 905; C. Frilingos. "For My Child, Onesimus: Paul and Domestic Power in Philemon." JBL 119 (2000) 91–104; J. A. Fitzmyer. The Letter to Philemon: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 34C (New York: Doubleday, 2000); J. Glancy. Slavery in Early Christianity (New York: Oxford University Press, 2002); L. A. Lewis. "Philemon." True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress Press 2007); C. Martin. "The Eyes Have It: Slaves in the Communities of Christ-Believers." Christian Origins: A People's History of Christianity 1 (Minneapolis, Minn.: Fortress, 2005). O. Patterson. Slavery and Social Death: A Comparative Study (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1982); N. Peterson. Redis covering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (Minneapolis, Minn.: Fortress, 1985); S. Winter. "Paul's Letter to Philemon." NTS 33 (1987) 1–15.

HEBREWS

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

OVERVIEW

What is customarily called the Letter to the Hebrews is a sermon in written form for Christians (most likely of Jewish origin). This "word of exhortation" (13:22) may have been written anywhere between 60 and 100 CE. Its literary style and theological conceptuality are very different from those in Paul's letters. It may well have addressed discouraged Jewish Christians at Rome around Nero's time (13:24). For early evidence of the use of Hebrews, see 1 Clement, which is traditionally associated with the church at Rome and dated around 100 CE. But other scenarios are possible.

Hebrews interweaves biblical exposition and exhortation. The author has some familiarity with Platonic philosophical concepts, and is quite adept at writing in a sophisticated Greek style and at employing Greco-Roman rhetorical techniques. He is also familiar with the OT and skilled in using Jewish methods of biblical interpretation. But most of all he is a Christian preacher who uses all his learning and persuasive powers in the service of the gospel. The goal of the exposition that follows is to help readers today to follow the work's rich but often difficult train of thought, and to appreciate better its profound significance for Christian theology.

The main topic of Hebrews is the saving significance of Jesus' death and resurrection (the paschal mystery). Its starting point is the early Christian confession that "Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures" (1 Cor 15:3). It portrays Jesus' death as the perfect sacrifice for sins. And since Jesus went willingly to his death, it presents him as the great high priest who offered himself as the perfect sacrifice (7:27).

The focus of Hebrews is not the earthly or historical Jesus. The author never cites a saying of Jesus found elsewhere in the Jesus tradition, and never mentions specific healings or other miraculous actions done by Jesus. Nevertheless, Hebrews does provide some information about Jesus while developing a theological argument about Jesus as the perfect sacrifice for sins and the great high priest.

In presenting Jesus as the great high priest the author admits the problem that Jesus did not come from the tribe of Levi but rather "was descended from Judah, and in connection with that tribe Moses said nothing about priests" (7:14). Therefore he constructs in Heb 7 a complex scriptural argument to the effect that Jesus represents another priesthood "according to the order of Melchizedek" (Ps 110:4) that is older and better than the levitical priesthood.

While stressing Jesus' identity as the Son of God, the author of Hebrews also insists on Jesus' humanity. In 2:5–9 he interprets Ps 8:4–6 and its mention of "the son of man" to refer not to humankind in general but rather to the humanity or incarnation of Jesus. And in 2:14–18 he insists that Jesus shared our "flesh and blood," and because of his full humanity he "did not come to help angels, but the descendants of Abraham" (2:16). Jesus' humanity is viewed as a necessary condition for carrying out his mission "to make an effective sacrifice of atonement for the sins of the people" (2:17, author's trans.).

OUTLINE

I. Jesus the Son of God (1:1–4:13)

1:1–4. Prologue

1:5–14. Superior to Angels

2:1–9. Superior Salvation

2:10–18. The Son's Solidarity with Humans

3:1–6. Superior to Moses

3: 7–19. The Wandering People of God

4:1–13. God's Sabbath Rest

II. Jesus the High Priest (4:14–10:18)

4:14–5:10. The Great High Priest

5:11–6:12. Call to Spiritual Renewal

6:13–20. God's Promise and Oath

7:1–28. Jesus' Superior Priesthood

8:1–13. Minister of the New Covenant

9:1–10. The Earthly Sanctuary

9:11–22. The Blood of Christ

9:23–28. The Priestly Work of Christ

10:1–18. Christ's One Perfect Sacrifice

III. Implications for Christian Life (10:19–13:25)

10:19–39. Exhortation to Persevere

11:1–40. Example of Faith

12:1–17. Another Call to Persevere

12:18–29. Call to Heavenly Worship

13:1–19. Call to Community Life

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Jesus the Son of God

1:1–4. Prologue. In one long sentence the author introduces the major characters, motifs, and themes. The use of several words beginning with the letter "p" (alliteration) helps attract the hearer's attention. All the clauses are attached in various ways to the main clause in 1:2 ("in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son"). The periodic sentence establishes at the outset the author's command of Greek grammar, style, and rhetoric.

The series of contrasts in 1:1–2a—"long ago" versus "in these last days," "our ancestors" versus "us," and "by the prophets" versus "by a Son"—highlights the climactic and definitive character of God's self-revelation through Jesus. The dynamic here is similar to that of John 1:1–18 where Jesus is celebrated as the Word of God. The fact that God is the speaker in both cases establishes God as the point of continuity between the old and the new ways of divine revelation.

The description of the Son as "heir of all things" in 1:2b alludes to the royal Ps 2—one of the author's favorite biblical texts—and identifies him as the Messiah (see Ps 2:8, "I will make the nations your heritage"). The statement that through the Son, God "created the worlds" evokes the figure of personified Wisdom as present at the creation of the world (Prov 8:22–31).

Jesus' identity as the Wisdom of God is further developed in 1:3a where there are striking parallels with (or perhaps direct influences from) Wis 7:25–26: "a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty . . . a reflection of eternal light." Here Jesus is said to be what Wisdom is and to do what Wisdom does. He reflects God's glory, is the imprint or "character" of God's being, and sustains the world by his word. These attributes and functions point to Jesus as not simply Wisdom personified but rather as a divine figure in his own right.

The major theme of Hebrews is Jesus' death as the perfect (in the sense of truly effective) sacrifice for sins in contrast to the ineffective material sacrifices offered annually on the Day of Atonement by levitical priests (see Lev 16:30). According to 1:3b, Jesus brought about genuine purification from sins through his death on the cross and was therefore exalted (in his resurrection and ascension) to God's right hand, which is a messianic image taken from Ps 110:1 (LXX 109:1), which is another of the author's favorite biblical texts.

Much of Hebrews is concerned with proving the superiority of Christ to the angels, Moses, Joshua, and so on. That motif is introduced in 1:4, which also leads into the first comparison (with the angels) that follows in 1:5–14. The name that Christ "inherited" is that of "the Son" (of God)—an echo of two terms used previously in 1:2.

1:5–14. Superior to Angels. The first comparison consists of seven biblical quotations arranged in three pairs (1:5; 1:6–7; 1:8–12) plus a single text (1:13). The use of biblical texts to make an argument (known as a catena or florilegium) assumes that the texts are authoritative and probative. Examples can be found among the Qumran scrolls and in the NT (e.g., Rom 3:10–18). It is not certain that there was a cult of angels or an angel Christology that needed to be combated. The author's main concern is to show the Son's qualitative superiority to angels on the basis of Scripture.

In the first pair of OT texts (Ps 2:7 and 2 Sam 7:14) the author assumes that God is the speaker and is addressing Christ. Both OT texts were associated originally with the Davidic Messiah, the first as part of the coronation ritual, and the second as an element in Nathan's prophecy to David. In both cases the Messiah is called "my Son," something God never calls an angel (though angels collectively are sometimes called "sons of God").

In the second pair (Deut 32:43/Ps 97 [LXX 96]:7 and Ps 104[LXX 103]:4) the assumption is that the third-person singular pronouns ("he, his, him") refer not to God but to the Son. In the first text the angels are said to worship the Son, thus admitting his superiority to them. The second text identifies angels as servants of the Son and so creatures who are inferior to him.

In the third pair (Ps 45 [LXX 44]:7–8 and Ps 102 [LXX 101]:26–28) the assumption is that the one addressed is the Son and that he is properly called "God" and "Lord." Originally part of a royal wedding song, Ps 45:7–8 affirms that the Son as the anointed one (Messiah/Christ) presides over a righteous and eternal kingdom. Ps 102:26–28 contrasts the eternity of Christ with the corruption that happens to material goods like clothing, and proclaims him to be the same forever (see 13:8). These texts suggest that as God and Lord the Son is qualitatively superior to angels.

The final text (Ps 110 [LXX 109]:1), already alluded to in 1:3b, is (like Ps 2) taken from the coronation ceremony and is here understood as addressed to the Son. As the argument of Hebrews unfolds, Jesus' passion, death, resurrection, and ascension will be interpreted as moments in his exaltation to God's right hand. In 1:14 the author concludes that angels are merely servants of God and their mission is to help humans "inherit salvation."

2:1–9. Superior Salvation. Good preachers combine biblical interpretation and personal application. The exhortation in 2:1–4 begins with a call to pay greater attention to the teachings of Scripture with three first- person plural verbs ("we"), culminating in a warning not to "drift away." The image is that of the ship failing to come to shore into its harbor and thus floating away aimlessly. For Christ as a "a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul," see Heb 6:19.

The seriousness with which the salvation offered under the new covenant is to be taken is indicated by a comparison with the old (Sinai) covenant. The reasoning here is from the lesser to the greater (as is common in both Greco-Roman and rabbinic rhetoric). The Sinai covenant, which is said to have been given "through angels" (see Acts 7:53; Gal 3:19), specified punishments for the infractions of it (2:2). If that covenant was binding and taken seriously, how much more seriously should the new covenant through Christ (2:3a) with its even greater promise of salvation be taken.

The nature of this covenant and the salvation associated with it are specified further in 2:3b–4. It takes its starting point from Jesus' proclamation of God's kingdom. It has been given witness by Jesus' first followers and transmitted to the next generation. And it is carried on in church life through "signs and wonders" and the exercise of the charisms. The trinitarian dimension of this superior salvation is brought out by mentions of "the Lord" (Jesus) as well as "God" and the "Holy Spirit. Such a great act of salvation on God's part deserves even greater attention than the exodus from Egypt under Moses.

How this great act of salvation came about is explained with a christological interpretation of Ps 8:4–6 in 2:5–9. Psalm 8 celebrates the dignity of humans (literally "man" and "son of man") as only a little less than that of angels. The author of Hebrews finds in "man" and "son of man" the person of Jesus. Whereas care of this world or age was assigned to angels (Dan 10:20–21; 12:1), the world or age to come (which has already begun with Christ) is now subordinated or subjected to the risen Christ. In his incarnation and especially in his passion and death, Jesus was made lower than the angels "for a little while." But now since his resurrection, he is "crowned with glory and honor" (see Phil 2:6–11). Although his present dominion over all creation may not yet be visible to all, it is nonetheless real. Moreover, all humans can now participate in the benefits of his vicarious suffering and death, and so come to right relationship with God (justification) through him.

2:10–18. The Son's Solidarity with Humans. What is called "fitting" in 2:10 is a basic theme in Hebrews: In bringing humans to divine glory, God the creator and sustainer of the universe has sent his Son to be our forerunner or "pioneer" (arche-gos) through his passion, death, and resurrection. The Son is "perfect" (teleios) in the sense of having achieved the intended goal or end (telos) of his mission. To do so, the Son became one of us and shared our humanity even to the point of suffering and death.

The basis of the solidarity between the one who sanctifies (Christ) and those who are sanctified (humans) is the fatherhood of God (2:11). Christ's solidarity with humans is demonstrated in 2:12–13 with more OT quotations in which Christ is assumed to be the speaker. According to Ps 22 (LXX 21):22 Christ proclaims God's name to his fellow humans and praises God in their assembly. According to Isa 8:17 and 18, Christ first professes his trust in God and then identifies himself as being in solidarity with his brothers and sisters. As the pioneer of our salvation, Christ has gone through what we go through (suffering and death) and so can bring us closer to our common Father. Thus he functions as the perfect mediator between God and humans.

Why did God become human? This is a famous question in Christian theological history (Cur Deus homo?). The answer given in 2:14–15 is that in this way God could free humans from the (cosmic-apocalyptic) power of death and from the (psychological) fear of death. By sharing fully in our human weakness and undergoing the physical death that awaits us all, Christ overcame and defeated the forces that had enslaved humans. According to 2:16, Christ did this not to help angels (who do not die) but rather to help humans (who do die). The descendants of Abraham include not only the people of Israel but also those who share Abraham's faith in God's promises (Gal 3; Rom 4).

In 2:17 the author introduces the two central christological images of Hebrews: Christ is the "merciful and faithful high priest" who willingly offered himself as the perfect sacrifice for our sins. To do so, he became one of us. The idea of suffering as a test or discipline is common in the Bible and elsewhere. In the case of Christ the Son of God who became human for us, the test (2:18) revealed what kind of Son of God he is (see Matt 4:1–11 and Luke 4:1–13) and enabled him as the merciful and faithful high priest in order to help other humans persevere during their testings.

3:1–6. Superior to Moses. The comparison with Moses is designed not to denigrate Moses but rather to affirm the qualitative superiority of the Son in his status and role. Both are distinguished for their fidelity to God. But Moses was faithful as a servant in God's household (the people of God), whereas Christ is faithful as the Son of God who presides over God's household. Just as in ancient households the firstborn son outranked every servant, so Christ the Son outranks Moses the servant in the economy of salvation.

The author's direct address to the hearers in 3:1 as "holy partners in a heavenly calling" reminds them of their solidarity with God's Son. The christological titles of "apostle" and "high priest," which appear only in the Hebrews in the NT, recall from 2:10–18 why the hearers can now approach God with confidence and pride (3:6).

The comparison developed in 3:2–6 takes its starting point from Num 12:7 with its description of Moses as the servant who was "faithful in all God's house." Here God's house is a metaphor for the people of God. The comparison proceeds on the levels of the house (3:3–4) and status within the household (3:5–6). With regard to the house, the builder who designs and constructs the house deserves and gets more honor than the house itself. The house is the reflection of the builder's good planning and execution. Here the comparison assumes the Son's divine status and role in creation (1:2, 10–12). With regard to their persons, Moses was faithful in the house as a servant of God and fulfilled his role as prophet and mediator on behalf of God's people. But Christ the Son was "over" the household in the sense that he exercised a directive and authoritative role within and for the people of God.

In 3:6b the author reminds his hearers that "we are his house," that is, the people of God. But he also warns them that this dignity is provisional upon their holding firm in faith and hope. The boldness and boasting that undergird their hope reside in the Son who is their pioneer, apostle, and high priest. The warning prepares for the exposition of Ps 95 that follows.

3:7–19. The Wandering People of God. Good preachers use examples. As a way of underlining the provisional character of his hearers' identity as the people of God, the author cites the negative example of the exodus generation (see Exod 17:1–7 and Num 14:22–23). He introduces the quotation of Ps 95 (LXX 94):7–11 as emanating from the Holy Spirit (see 10:15; cf. 2:6). The text of Ps 95:7–11 consists of a call to hear God's voice "today," a warning not to repeat the behavior of the exodus generation at Meribah ("rebellion") and Massah ("testing"), and a reminder of God's anger at their disobedience and his oath that they would not enter his "rest" (katapausis).

Good preachers actualize and apply Scripture to the needs of their congregations. Here the author's application begins and ends in 3:12 and 3:19 with the verb blepo ("take care . . . we see"). In 3:12–13 he urges the hearers to avoid the unbelief and sinfulness displayed by the exodus generation. The term "today" connects the example of the exodus generation cited in David's psalm to the situation of early Christians tempted to give up their new found faith in Christ. The process of actualization is possible because God's word is "living and active" (4:12). The applicability of this text is underscored in 3:14–15 by a reminder of the provisional character of the hearers' identity as God's people and a repetition of Ps 95:7–8.

Good preachers often use rhetorical questions to get their points across. In 3:16–19 the author develops the application of the biblical passage to his hearers' situation with three series of rhetorical questions and their answers. The first series (3:16) identifies the rebels as the exodus generation. The second series (3:17) identifies the exodus generation as the object of God's anger. The third series (3:18–19) identifies the exodus generation as the object of God's oath that they would not enter his "rest." It also explains why they failed to do so. It was because of their disobedience and unbelief (see Num 14:22–23). But it leaves still unexplained what exactly is meant now by "rest."

4:1–13. God's Sabbath Rest. The author clarifies the meaning of "rest" by a combination of biblical exposition and exhortation. He shows that the real Sabbath rest is eternal life with God, and that it demands faith and obedience on the part of those who seek to enter it. As a good preacher the author includes himself among those being addressed ("let us," 4:1, 11). While the promise of entering God's rest remains open, it demands an appropriate response. Again in 4:2 the exodus generation provides the negative example to be avoided by Christians. There was nothing wrong with the promise and the message given to them. But because they did not respond with faith and obedience, they failed to enter the "rest" that God had prepared for them.

In 4:3–5 the author argues that this "rest" was not merely the land of Canaan. He prefaces his quotation of Ps 95:11 with a reminder that those who believe and obey can and do enter God's rest. And after it, he suggests that "rest" must refer to something connected with God's work at "the foundation of the world." This leads into the quotation of Gen 2:2 ("and God rested on the seventh day from all his works") and to the author's use of the ancient Jewish exegetical practice of interpreting one difficult biblical verse by another verse containing the same word or idea. In Gen 2:2 "rest" refers to God's own eternal life, and so the deeper or spiritual sense of Ps 95:11 must be the same.

In 4:6–8 the apparent tension or contradiction between "rest" in Ps 95:11 (the land of Canaan) and "rest" in Gen 2:2 (God's eternal life) is resolved by appeal to Ps 95:7 with its emphasis on "today." The eternal Sabbath rest promised by God remains open today to all who hear God's voice and act upon it. In Jewish circles in NT times David was regarded as the author of the Psalms (see Mark 12:35–37). But David lived long after Joshua led the remnants of the exodus generation into the promised land. The name "Jesus" is a variant of "Joshua" ("the Lord saves"), and in the author's logic Jesus of Nazareth has done what Joshua the son of Nun could not do, that is, lead God's people into eternal life ("rest") with God. And so with his emphasis on "today" David (writing in the promised land) reminds God's people that God's rest remains a possibility for them provided that they respond with faith and obedience in the present ("today").

In other words, "a sabbath rest still remains for the people of God" (4:9). The promise of rest demands a decision and an appropriate response now. Entering this rest will mean entering the kind of rest that God has enjoyed from the time of creation as described in Gen 2:2. The biblical exposition is capped off in 4:11 by an exhortation ("let us") to do whatever is necessary to enter God's perfect rest.

The reflection on the "word of God" in 4:12 serves as an interlude and a bridge between the first two major parts of Hebrews. It explains why Scripture and its interpretation are so important in Hebrews, and identifies Scripture as one way in which God communicates with humankind. While referring most obviously to Scripture (which for the author and his first hearers was the OT), it also points toward Jesus as the Word and Wisdom of God (Heb 1:1–4; John 1:1–18; Col 1:15–20) as the definitive revealer and revelation of God.

The reason why the author (and people of all generations) can engage in the actualization and application of Scripture is precisely because it is not a dead letter left over from the ancient past but rather remains the living and active word of God able like a two-edged sword to penetrate the deepest mysteries of God and human existence.

In 4:13 "before him" seems to refer back to God in the phrase "word of God" in 4:12. As a good preacher the author often tempers his most positive messages with reminders of the divine judgment to which we all must submit. Having laid before his hearers the possibility of eternal "rest" with God and having challenged them to respond positively with faith and obedience, he now warns them that they must render an account before the divine judge who will reward or punish them on the basis of their response.

II. Jesus the High Priest (4:14–10:18)

4:14–5:10. The Great High Priest. Whereas the first part of Hebrews focused on Jesus as the Son of God, the central section (4:14–10:18) emphasizes his identity as the great high priest. Since Jesus belonged to the tribe of Judah rather than to the priestly tribe of Levi, he could not have functioned as a Jewish priest during his lifetime. Fully aware of this fact (see 7:14), the author must explain how Jesus could ever be called a "great high priest."

In the first explanation (4:14–16), the author alternates between theological statements and exhortations. Just as on the Day of Atonement according to Lev 16 the Jewish high priest passed through the curtain separating the Holy of Holies from the rest of the Temple complex, so Jesus the Son of God has passed through the heavens (in his resurrection and ascension) into the heavenly temple. The first exhortation (4:14b) encourages the hearers to persevere in their profession of Christian faith. Then he notes that just as the Jewish high priest as a weak human could sympathize with those for whom he offered sacrifices on the Day of Atonement, so Jesus as fully human knew human weakness and had been thoroughly tested (though without sinning) to the point of offering himself as the perfect sacrifice for sins. The second exhortation (4:16) urges the hearers to approach God not with fear but rather with confidence in full expectation of receiving mercy and divine favor.

In the longer discussion of Jesus' high priesthood in 5:1–10, the author focuses on the themes of mediatorship, solidarity, and divine appointment. He first predicates in 5:1–4 three characteristics of "every high priest" and then in 5:5–10 shows in reverse order how Christ fulfills each of them. In offering sacrifices for sins "every high priest" serves as a mediator between God and humans (5:1), is able to sympathize and deal gently with sinners because he too is a sinner and offers sacrifice not only for others but also for himself in solidarity with them (5:2–3), and must be called and approved by God just as Aaron (Moses' brother) was (5:4).

Then in 5:5–10 the author shows how Jesus met these three criteria. That he was called and appointed by God to be a great high priest is deduced from the combination of Ps 2:7 and Ps 110 (LXX 109):4 in which God is understood to be addressing Jesus and designating him as both Son and high priest (5:5–6). Next in 5:7–8 Christ's solidarity with other humans is established with reference to his suffering and death. His plea to be saved from death (in Gethsemane?) was indeed heard in his being raised from the dead. Despite his divine sonship he showed himself obedient to his Father's will and in solidarity with humans through his sufferings. Finally, according to 5:9–10, by fulfilling his mission to bring about right relationship between God and humans he proved himself to be the effective mediator needed to make the hope for "eternal salvation" possible for all humans. The allusion to Ps 110:4 ("a high priest according to the order of Melchizedek") foreshadows the full explanation of Christ's non-Levitical priesthood in Heb 7.

5:11–6:12. Call to Spiritual Renewal. Between identifying Jesus as the great high priest and explaining the priesthood of Melchizedek, the author places a long exhortation (see 10:19–39). It consists of a rebuke, a warning, and a word of encouragement.

The rebuke (5:11–6:3) begins with an admission that the priesthood of Christ is hard to explain. But in 5:12 the author blames his hearers for their spiritual immaturity as shown in their failure to grasp the "oracles of God," which are most likely those OT passages that point toward and find their fulfillment in Christ (see 6:1). While by now they ought to be teachers, they remain in their spiritual infancy like small children still being fed with milk rather than with solid food. In 5:13–14 he elaborates his distinction between the spiritually immature ("unskilled in the word of righteousness") and the mature ("trained by practice to distinguish good from evil"). For the author as well as other NT writers, Christian spirituality involves both doctrine and practice. The rebuke is softened in 6:1–3 by the resumption of first-person plural language ("let us"). The author urges his hearers to move forward from the basics of Christian life toward greater spiritual maturity. His list of basics includes repentance and conversion, rites of initiation, and belief in resurrection and final judgment. But he realizes the no progress is possible without God's help.

The warning in 6:4–8 is directed against apostasy. In the strongest terms ("it is impossible") the author contends that there will be no restoration for those who have adopted Christianity and then reject it. Such persons are saying that Jesus' passion and death had no effect. The act of apostasy nullifies the confession that Christ died for our sins. For further harsh words about apostasy, see Heb 10:26–29 and 12:17. The point is driven home by the comparison in 6:7–8 between good soil that produces an abundant crop and receives God's blessing, and bad soil that produces only thorns and thistles and deserves to be burned up. For a more extensive treatment of the problem of postbaptismal sin in the mid-second century church at Rome, see Shepherd of Hermas, in which the solution is to allow one act of repentance after baptism but no more than that (see Mand. 4.3.1–7; Sim. 8.8.2–5).

Recognizing the severity of his teaching in the exhortation thus far, the author in 6:9–12 consoles his hearers by addressing them as "beloved" for the first and only time, and by offering them words of encouragement and hope. He expresses confidence that they will attain to "the things that belong to salvation" on the basis of God's justice and their good works, especially the love that they have shown to other Christians ("the saints"). The reason why he has been exhorting them is so that they may attain what they hope for, that is, eternal life with God. While not withdrawing his charge of spiritual sluggishness, he urges them to display even greater faith and patience in order to "inherit the promises."

6:13–20. God's Promise and Oath. In Gen 12:1–3 God promised to make Abraham into a great nation, and in Gen 15:5–6 he repeated the promise to make Abraham's descendants as numerous as the stars in the sky. In Gen 22:16–18, after Abraham had proved his obedience to God's word by his willingness to sacrifice Isaac, God reiterated the promise, "I will surely bless you and multiply you." There the promise is prefaced with an oath: "By myself I have sworn, says the Lord." By his patient waiting Abraham eventually received the promise of many descendants through Isaac (who is a type of Christ).

The combination of God's promise and oath in Gen 22:16–18 leads the author into a reflection in Heb 6:16–18 on the nature of oaths (see also 7:20–22). People usually swear by someone greater than themselves, and often close off arguments or debates with oaths ("I swear to God"). Since no one is greater than God, God can only swear by himself ("by myself I have sworn"). The two "unchangeable things" are God's promise and God's oath. In the context of Hebrews, the heirs of the promise are Christians as the people of God descended from Abraham ("we"). They now can obtain what Abraham was looking for—"a better country, that is, a heavenly one" (11:16).

In 6:19–20 the author returns to the pivotal role played by Jesus in fulfilling God's promise. His role is described with images from three different contexts: nautical ("anchor of the soul"), military ("forerunner, pioneer, scout"), and cultic ("high priest"). The third image sets the stage for identifying Jesus as a priest according to the order of Melchizedek.

7:1–28. Jesus' Superior Priesthood. Besides Ps 110 (LXX 109):4, Melchizedek is mentioned in Gen 14:17–20 in the context of Abraham's victory over a coalition of kings. In their encounter Melchizedek blesses Abraham, and Abraham gives him one tenth of the spoils (a tithe). The name "Melchizedek" can be translated "king of righteousness" or "righteous king," and "Salem" (which is probably a form of Jerusalem) is connected with the Hebrew word for "peace." In 7:3 the author notes that in Gen 14 Melchizedek appears out of nowhere and soon disappears. The absence of his genealogy and of any notice of his further activities makes Melchizedek into a type of Christ who existed before creation (1:2) and now lives forever.

In 7:4–10 the author focuses on two elements in Gen 14:17–20: Abraham gave a tithe to Melchizedek, and Melchizedek blessed Abraham. We expect that an inferior figure might give a tithe to a superior person. By giving a tithe to Melchizedek, Abraham in effect acknowledged his superiority. Likewise, we expect that a superior person might bless an inferior one. By accepting Melchizedek's blessing, Abraham again acknowledged his own inferiority to him. What made this case even more significant for the author was that Abraham was the great-grandfather of Levi, the son of Jacob from whom Jewish levitical priests derived their identity as priests. The author imagines that Levi was somehow already present in "the loins of his ancestor," and thus Levi also acknowledged the superiority of the priesthood of Melchizedek.

In 7:11–19 the author tries to show that Jesus belonged to this older and better priesthood of Melchizedek. He shifts back to the only other OT text about Melchizedek (Ps 110:4) and interprets it as pointing toward the eternal and therefore superior priesthood of Christ. He argues that if perfection (access to God) were possible through the levitical priesthood, there would have been no mention of another priesthood (that of Melchizedek) in the Bible. He admits in 7:13–14 that Jesus could not have functioned as a levitical priest according to the OT law because he belonged to the tribe of Judah and not to the tribe of Levi. By what right then can he speak of Jesus as the great high priest? The chief point of likeness between Melchizedek and Jesus is their eternity (7:3). What made Christ "a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek" was his resurrection and exaltation ("through the power of an indestructible life," 7:16). Whereas the sacrifices offered by the levitical priests could not produce right relationship with God, Jesus' self-offering has given humans a "better hope" in approaching God (see 4:14–16).

Having established that Christ belongs to the older and better priesthood of Melchizedek, the author in 7:20–25 contends that Christ's priesthood is superior to the levitical priesthood in other respects. Since Ps 110:4 is prefaced by another divine oath ("the Lord has sworn," see 6:13–20), the promise attached to this priesthood is founded on the "better covenant" established through Jesus (see 6:13–20). Moreover, although there had been many levitical priests and all died, the risen Christ lives forever. And so his priesthood is permanent, and he can at any time exercise his priestly ministry to "save those who approach God through him" (7:25). The comparison concludes in 7:26–28 with a list of Christ's attributes as the great high priest ("holy, blameless, unde-filed . . .") and a contrast with the levitical priests who every day offered material sacrifices for their own sins and those of the people. In 7:27 the author expresses the major thesis of his whole sermon: "this he [Christ] did once for all when he offered himself." In other words, Christ is both the offering and the priest, that is, the perfect sacrifice for sins and the great high priest who offered that sacrifice. In 7:28

the author observes that whereas under the Mosaic law a succession of weak men were appointed high priests, God has sworn an oath (see 7:20–22) that the Son (the risen Jesus) should be the one great high priest forever.

8:1–13. Minister of the New Covenant. After a summary of ch. 7 ("we have such a high priest"), the author describes the risen Christ in terms of Ps 110 (LXX 109):1 ("Sit at my right hand") and defines his present occupation as "minister in the sanctuary and true tent." The Greek word leitourgos refers to a public benefactor who provides at his own expense some event, entertainment, monument, or service for the local populace. The benefaction provided by Christ—access to "the throne of grace" (4:16)—is the greatest one of all.

The author imagines the heavenly realm as containing the ideal sanctuary that provided the blueprint for the tabernacle in the wilderness and the Temple. What sounds like a Platonic idea is given a biblical basis in 8:5 by the quotation of Exod 25:40. Although Jesus could not have functioned as a levitical priest in the earthly tabernacle, he now exercises his priestly service (leitourgia) in the "true tent" in the heavenly realm. The earthly tabernacle (and the Temple) was merely a "sketch and shadow of the heavenly one" (8:5). Through his death and resurrection Jesus now fulfills his priestly role as "mediator of a better covenant" that is based on "better promises" than those on which the Sinai covenant was founded.

Reference to a "better covenant" leads into the longest sustained OT quotation (Jer 31:31–34) in the NT. The author's main point (8:7) is that talk about a "new" covenant suggests that there was something wrong with the old one. Moreover, since God is the speaker in Jer 31:31–34 ("says the Lord"), it is God who found fault with the Sinai covenant. The author uses the OT quotation to bolster his idea of a new and better covenant enacted by Christ, and his contention that the Sinai covenant failed to achieve its desired effect (right relationship with God) because the people failed to observe it properly. By contrast, the new covenant comes directly from God (cf. 2:2) and is interior in the sense that it is written on the hearts and minds of God's people in Christ. Moreover, this new covenant can bring about genuine forgiveness of sins through the mercy of God.

In a concluding comment on the OT "new covenant" text, the author in 8:13 declares that the first (Sinai) covenant is now "obsolete." Then he qualifies that judgment by noting that the first covenant is "growing old" and "will soon disappear." In other words, it still exists, and when and how it will disappear is not made clear. Will it be with the destruction of the Second Temple (as with Jeremiah's prophecy about the First Temple) or with the full coming of God's kingdom (as with Paul's hope in Rom 11:25–32)? At any rate, the author's qualification pulls him back from full-scale supersessionism (declaring the Sinai covenant absolutely null and void), though among the NT writings Hebrews does come closest to supersessionism.

9:1–10. The Earthly Sanctuary. In preparation for treating the perfect sacrifice of Christ, the author describes the earthly sanctuary (first the tabernacle or tent of meeting, and then the Jerusalem Temple) at which sacrifices were offered daily and especially on the Day of Atonement. The description is based mainly on Exod 25–26 and Lev 16. He begins and ends by referring to the "regulations" of the old covenant under which that worship was carried out.

After noting the Holy Place (which he calls the outer tent) and its furnishings in 9:2, he focuses in 9:3–5 on the Holy of Holies (the inner tent) and its furnishings. According to the ritual described in Lev 16, the high priest once a year, on the Day of Atonement, entered the Holy of Holies and sprinkled blood on the "mercy seat" in order to "wipe away" (the basic meaning of the Hebrew verb kipper) his own sins and those of the people. In 9:8–10 the author asserts that this ritual was at best a symbol that fit the present (now past) age. Nevertheless, these material rituals (especially sprinkling the blood of sacrificial animals) were incapable of really cleansing the consciences of worshipers. They were only provisional until the new age inaugurated by Jesus' life, death, and resurrection took effect.

9:11–22. The Blood of Christ. In the biblical world (and in many places today) blood is a symbol of life rather than death, and is regarded as an agent of purification rather than defilement. Here the author reflects on the power of Christ's blood to take away sins and to inaugurate the new covenant. In 9:11–14 he contrasts the sacrifices of the high priest on the Day of Atonement and the sacrifice of Christ on Good Friday. The sacrifice of Christ was set in the heavenly tabernacle made by God, involved his own precious blood rather than animal blood, and had the effect of obtaining eternal redemption. Whereas the blood of the animals offered in sacrifice at the tabernacle (and the Temple) pertained to the realm of the flesh (the material), the blood of Christ shed in his passion and death as part of the perfect sacrifice offered to God through the Holy Spirit is able to purify the interior spirit ("conscience") of persons and enable them to worship the living God.

In 9:15–22 the author shows how the blood of Christ inaugurated the new covenant. According to 9:15, the sacrificial death of Christ made possible redemption from the transgressions committed under the old covenant and opened up the possibility of eternal life under the new covenant. To explain why Christ had to die, the author in 9:16–17 plays on the double meaning of the Greek word diatheke as "last will" and "covenant." Just as a last will and testament does not take effect until the person dies, so the new covenant did not take effect until Christ died. In 9:18–21 he goes on to remind the readers that when the old or first covenant was inaugurated, Moses sprinkled blood on the sacred vessels and on the people (Exod 24:3–8). Finally in 9:22 he clinches the argument by alluding to Lev 17:11 ("life . . . is in the blood") and by insisting that there is no forgiveness of sins without the shedding of (Christ's) blood.

9:23–28. The Priestly Work of Christ. In the author's Platonic worldview spiritual realities are better than material things. According to 9:23–24, the rituals of the Day of Atonement and the earthly sanctuary were mere "sketches" of Jesus' perfect self-sacrifice for sins and the heavenly sanctuary that he has entered. His sacrifice was "perfect" (teleios) in the sense that it achieved its goal or end (telos). Whereas the Jewish high priest entered the earthly sanctuary every year with animal blood, Christ has entered the heavenly sanctuary once for all with his own blood and removed sin by the sacrifice of himself (9:25–26). His priestly action marked the end of "this age" and the beginning of "the age to come." Yet his priesthood has not ended. In the present time he appears before God on our behalf as a mediator, and in the future he "will appear a second time" to save those who are awaiting him. The priesthood of Christ involves purifying us from past sins, mediating for us in the present, and delivering us in the future.

10:1–18. Christ's One Perfect Sacrifice. At the end of the central section of Hebrews the author restates several of his main points. In 10:1–14 he asserts that the OT law was a "shadow" of better (spiritual) realities, and that its material sacrifices could never achieve what Christ's offering of himself did. The very fact that the old covenant stipulated that its sacrifices had to be offered year after year indicated that they never achieved the goal of bringing humankind into right relationship with God. In a kind of reductio ad absurdum the author in 10:4 observes that "it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins."

In 10:5–10 he uses Ps 40:6–8 to underscore the superiority of Christ's sacrifice to the material sacrifices offered by the OT priests. He assumes that Christ is the speaker in the psalm, and that at the incarnation he recited the words of Ps 40 according to which the sacrifice of his body would replace the material sacrifices offered in the sanctuary. The author argues that the sacrifices of the first covenant have been superseded by the one perfect sacrifice of Christ. It was perfect in the sense of having reached its goals of the forgiveness of sins, right relationship with God, and eternal life with God. This sacrifice was in accord with God's will, brought about sanctification for humans, and took place in "the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (10:10).

Once again in 10:11–14 the author contrasts the repeated sacrifices made by the levitical priests with the single, effective sacrifice made by Christ and his subsequent exaltation at God's right hand in fulfillment of Ps 110 (LXX 109):1. In 10:15–17 he comes back to Jer 31:31–34 (see 8:8–12) with its themes of the new covenant, written by God on the hearts and minds of humans, and bringing about the forgiveness of sins. With 10:18 he proclaims Christ's one perfect sacrifice as the only remedy for sin and thus the end of the material sacrifices offered under the old covenant. This means that all Christian discourse about sacrifice and priesthood must take its starting point from the one perfect sacrifice offered by Christ the great high priest (as in Hebrews), and not from the OT legislation about sacrifices and the levitical priesthood (as in the Torah).

III. Implications for Christian Life (10:19–13:25)

10:19–39. Exhortation to Persevere. The structure of this long exhortation is similar to the one in 5:11–6:12. It consists of an appeal (10:19–25), a warning (10:26–31), and a word of encouragement and hope (10:32–39). In this section and those that follow the author draws out some implications of the divine sonship and the priesthood of Christ for Christian life.

As a good preacher the author begins his appeal (10:19–25) by recalling and building on the two great themes of the preceding section: Christ's sacrifice that made access to God possible, and Christ as the great high priest now presiding over the world. The three appeals in 10:22–25 ("let us") concern faith, hope, and love, respectively, and are based on what Christ has done in the past, what he promises to do in the future, and what should go on in the present within the Christian community.

The suggestion that some have been absenting themselves from the community assemblies recalls the rebuke about their spiritual sluggishness in 5:11–6:12.

The warning in 10:26–31 (see 6:4–8) concerns postbaptismal sin in general and apostasy in particular. Since the OT sacrifices have been superseded and since the apostate has effectively spurned Christ's one perfect sacrifice for sins (10:29), there can be no remedy for this sin. If sins of idolatry and blasphemy merited the death penalty in the Mosaic law on the testimony of two or three witnesses (Deut 17:6), how much more will the penalty be for those who sin against God, the Son, and the Holy Spirit (10:28–29; see 2:1–4). In 10:30–31 the author drives home the seriousness of the warning by quoting Deut 32:35–36 ("Vengeance is mine") about divine vengeance and then issuing the dire statement, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

In 10:32–39 (see 6:9–12), the author closes his exhortation with some words of encouragement and hope. He first reminds the hearers in 10:32–34 how well in the past they have endured persecution, abuse, and loss of material possessions, since they knew that they "possessed something better and more lasting." Then in 10:35–38 he urges confidence and patience in the hope of receiving the reward of eternal life with God. With a combination of Isa 26:20 and Hab 2:4 he reminds them that Christ ("the one who is coming") will come soon and will reward the righteous who have lived by faith. Finally in 10:39 he associates himself with his hearers again ("we") as people who have faith and can expect to be saved when Christ returns.

11:1–40. Examples of Faith. The mention of faith in 10:39 leads into a catalogue of models of persevering faith from the OT. Similar lists of heroes appear in Sir 44–49 and Wis 10:1–11:4. As a good preacher the author develops a rhythm and intensity by introducing the examples with the expression "by faith" (the literary figure known as anaphora)

The famous definition of faith in 11:1 poses problems of translation and interpretation. That faith involves "things hoped for" and "things not seen" is clear enough. The problem comes with the Greek words hypostasis and elenchos, and whether they should be translated subjectively ("assurance . . . conviction") as in the NRSV, or objectively ("realization . . . evidence") as in the NAB (Revised). Of course, faith always has both subjective and objective elements, and it is often hard to separate the two. The examples that follow are intended to illustrate the programmatic statement in 11:1–2. The first set of examples (11:3–7) are taken from Gen 1–11: creation, God's acceptance of Abel's offerings, the assumption of Enoch into heaven, and the rescue of Noah from the flood. The author's comment in 11:6 insists that faith is necessary in order to please God, approach God, and be rewarded by God.

The second set of heroes of faith (11:8–22) includes figures mentioned in Gen 12–50. The focus is Abraham who by faith set out from his homeland, believed that he and Sarah would conceive a child in their old age, and was willing to sacrifice his son Isaac at God's command. However, Abraham never attained what he really wanted, which was to be in his true homeland in the city of God (11:10, 14). Thus he and the other early heroes of faith remained "strangers and foreigners on the earth" (11:13). Why Abraham was willing to sacrifice Isaac (Gen 22) is explained in 11:19 as due to his belief that God can raise the dead to life. The patriarchs Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph are praised in 11:20–22 for their willingness to look into the future and to trust that God would bless and guide his people.

The third set of heroes (11:23–31) includes Moses and other figures from the exodus generation. Faith guided and strengthened Moses in his infancy, in identifying with his own people, in willingness to leave Egypt, in observance of the first Passover, and in passing through the Red Sea. By the faith of Joshua and his people the walls of Jericho came down, and by faith Rahab the prostitute sheltered Joshua and Caleb who had been sent to spy out the land of Canaan. According to 11:26, the abuse that Moses suffered along with his fellow Israelites was in some way related to and prefigured the sufferings of Christ.

Good preachers know when to move on, and so in 11:32 the author begins to wind down his catalogue of OT examples of faith by asking, "And what more should I say?" After listing more heroes from Gideon to Samuel and the prophets, in 11:33–34 he gives examples of the triumphs that these and other heroes have experienced, and then in 11:35–38 he provides examples of the sufferings endured by women and men of faith. The references to resurrection in 11:35 most likely allude to 2 Maccabees (especially ch. 7), and help to explain why the martyrs could endure such terrible trials (see 11:19). They like Abraham were "strangers and foreigners on the earth" (11:13), in search of their heavenly homeland. Despite the admiration that the author has for all these OT heroes of faith, he contends that they did not obtain what has now been made available for "us" through Christ: forgiveness of sins, right relationship with God, and eternal life with God (11:39–40).

12:1–17. Another Call to Persevere. Throughout Hebrews there have been hints about persecution and abuse from outside the community and about discouragement and even apostasy within the community. As he nears the end of his long sermon, the author addresses these problems even more directly. He exhorts his hearers to "run with perseverance the race that is set before us" (12:1). He points to the OT heroes of faith listed in ch. 11 as a "cloud of witnesses" and to Christ as the "pioneer and perfecter of our faith" (12:2). He focuses on Christ's willingness to endure the shame of the cross in order to enter into glory at God's right hand (Ps 110:1). In 12:3–4 he points to Christ as an example of persevering faith that receives its rewards from God, and reminds his hearers that they have not yet suffered to the point of "shedding your blood" (martyrdom).

Having placed before his hearers the example of Christ and other examples of persevering faith, the author in 12:5–13 urges them to look upon their present sufferings as a divine discipline designed to strengthen them and prepare them to share in God's own holiness (12:10). In 12:5–6 he quotes Prov 3:11–12 to the effect that "the Lord disciplines those whom he loves," and in 12:7–11 he applies it to the present situation of the hearers. Just as good parents discipline their children, so God is disciplining them through the present sufferings. Just as the benefits of good parental discipline are great for children, how much greater will be the benefits from the discipline now being administered by God.

With allusions to Isa 35:3 and Prov 4:26 the author challenges his hearers in 12:12–13 to pull themselves together and get back on the road that leads to God. In 12:14–15 he urges them to pursue peace and holiness, and to avoid divisions (the "root of bitterness," Deut 29:18). And in 12:16–17 he brings up again the troublesome matter of apostasy (see 6:4–8 and 10:26–31) by pointing to the negative example of Esau who sold his birthright and was unable to get it back again (Gen 25:29–34; 27:30–45).

12:18–29. Call to Heavenly Worship. The author first contrasts worship under the old covenant symbolized by Mount Sinai (12:18–21) and worship under the new covenant symbolized by Mount Zion understood as the heavenly Jerusalem (12:22–24). The experience of God at Mount Sinai is described with features found mainly in Exod 19 but is presented in such a way as to inspire terror rather than awe. It even terrified Moses (Deut 9:19). By contrast the experience of God in the heavenly Jerusalem is called a "festal gathering" (12:22) and includes angels, the righteous dead, and the martyrs, God ("the judge of all"), and Jesus ("the mediator of a new covenant").

This contrast leads in 12:25–29 to a warning to heed "the one who is speaking" (God) on the grounds that if those who lived under the old covenant were punished severely for their failings, how much more those who live under the new covenant will suffer for their sins. At Mount Sinai God shook the earth, and in Hag 2:6 God promised to shake not only the earth but also the heavens "yet once more." Using his Platonist lens, the author distinguishes between the "shaken" (created, material things) and the unshakable kingdom (heaven). Since Christians already live in the unshakable kingdom symbolized by the New Jerusalem, they can already participate in the heavenly worship. However, they must always approach God "with reverence and love" since "our God is a consuming fire" (Deut 4:24; Isa 33:14).

13:1–19. Call to Community Life. In the present Christians still live on earth and find their identity in the Christian community. In 13:1–6 the author sets forth a general principle ("let mutual love continue") and gives advice about hospitality, compassion, chastity, and avoiding greed. By quoting Ps 118 (LXX 117):6 he affirms that with God as "my helper" there is no reason to fear.

In 13:7–19 instructions about attitudes toward past and present community leaders (13:7–9, 17–19) bracket reflections on community worship (13:10–16). The leaders mentioned in 13:7 may include not only those who evangelized the community but also OT heroes of faith as well as the apostles and Jesus. The description of Jesus in 13:8 ("the same yesterday and today and forever") sounds formulaic, but it also neatly summarizes the author's own understanding of him. The "regulations" about food most likely refer to the Jewish food laws and sacrifices, but may allude to the dispute at Rome between the "weak" and the "strong" (Rom 14:1–15:13). If so, the author clearly sided with the strong.

The instruction concerning worship in 13:10–16 covers many topics. The altar mentioned in 13:10 refers to the "altar" in the heavenly sanctuary at which Christ the great high priest now presides as opposed to the altar on earth where the levitical priests preside. In 13:11–12 the author alludes again to rituals carried out on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16) to explain why Jesus suffered outside the city gate, and once more contrasts the effects of animal sacrifices and of the one perfect sacrifice of Christ. Using this imagery in 13:13–14, the author urges his hearers to share in the abuse and shame that Christ suffered so that they may also share in his heavenly glory in "the city that is to come." Meanwhile, according to 13:15–16, the proper worship for Christians is "a sacrifice of praise to God," consisting of professions of faith, good works, and sharing possessions. These are the earthly sacrifices that "are pleasing to God."

The leaders mentioned in 13:17–19 include the current leaders of the hearer's community as well as the author himself. He urges their obedience to and cooperation with the former, and asks for prayers and good thoughts for himself until he meets them again in person.

13:20–25. Final Prayer and Greetings. The prayer in 13:20–21 asks that the "God of peace" may make the recipients able to do God's will and what pleases God. While the references to Jesus' resurrection and to his "blood of the eternal covenant" recall major themes in Hebrews, the identification of him as "the great shepherd of the sheep" is not (see John 10:11 and 1 Pet 5:4). The prayer concludes with a doxology.

In 13:22 the author describes his work as a "word of exhortation" (usually interpreted to mean a sermon), and characterizes it (somewhat disingenuously) as "brief." The mention of Timothy in 13:23 is the only link with Paul. The author may have known and worked with Timothy. Or perhaps the notice was added by a later scribe to establish a connection with Paul. The greeting from "those from Italy" in 13:24 can be interpreted to mean Christians who were originally from Italy but now resided elsewhere and were addressing other Christians in Italy (perhaps Rome). But it can also be read in the opposite way, that is, as referring to Christians in Italy who were greeting others somewhere outside of Italy. The final blessing in 13:25 ("Grace be with all of you"), while formulaic (see Titus 3:15), expresses well the author's own theological conviction that Jesus' life, death, and resurrection are the ultimate manifestation of God's favor toward humankind.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

H. W. Attridge. The Epistle to the Hebrews. Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); F. B. Craddock. "The Letter to the Hebrews." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998) 12:1–174; D. J. Harrington. What Are They Saying About the Letter to the Hebrews? (New York: Paulist, 2005); L. T. Johnson. Hebrews: A Commentary. NTL (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2006); E. Käsemann. The Wandering People of God: An Investigation of the Letter to the Hebrews (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); C. R. Koester. Hebrews: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. AB 36 (New York: Doubleday, 2001); W. L. Lane. Hebrews 1–8; Hebrews 9–13. WBC 47A-B. (Dallas: Word Books, 1991); B. Lindars. The Theology of the Letter to the Hebrews (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); T. G. Long. Hebrews. Interpretation (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); A. J. Mitchell. Hebrews. SP 13. (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2007); V. C. Pfitzner. Hebrews. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1997); A. Vanhoye. Structure and Message of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1989).

JAMES

ROBERT W. WALL

OVERVIEW

No scholarly consensus has been reached on any detail of this letter's point of origin, in large part because its hortatory idiom and lack of specific background information make it difficult to pin down a particular provenance and date. The Jewish character of James and its measured use of Hellenistic literary conventions (e.g., paraenesis, diatribe) have led some to suggest "the twelve tribes in the Dispersion" (1:1) is the actual address of a Jewish Christian community living somewhere outside Palestine. The absence of any mention of circumcision suggests a date prior to Paul's Gentile mission. This evidence coupled with images from first-century Palestine has led to the conclusion that the letter's author (or source) is likely James, the Lord's brother and leader of the Jerusalem church, whose exhortation—perhaps to dislocated former congregants living outside of Palestine—is an exercise of his pastoral office.

When considering the book's correspondence with the ideas and language of a Pauline canon already in circulation, however, others place James in a post-Pauline era when the earlier controversies of the Gentile mission were replaced by other conflicts between Pauline and non-Pauline Christianities. In this case, the letter's address may recall a Jewish (i.e., non-Pauline) Christianity represented by the figure and teaching of the venerated James the Just.

Theological considerations may prompt a shift of interest altogether from the letter's origins to its subsequent reception as the first of seven Catholic Epistles. This interpretive angle considers the role of James within the final redaction of the NT and privileges the ecclesial context of the letter. Whatever circumstances occasioned the composition of each Catholic Epistle, their subsequent formation into a discrete and coherent collection sometime during the fourth century was in some sense a response to the church's use (or misuse!) of its extant Pauline canon (cf. 2 Pet 3:15–16). This fresh combination of Catholic and Pauline letter collections provides the church with a more "apostolic" conception of Christian existence, and James' repeated insistence upon a practiced "faith that works" reminds the faith community that a professed "faith without works" forged by a myopic reading of Paul alone is an insufficient condition for maintaining a community's covenant relationship with God.

The Pauline index of the Jerusalem "Pillars" (Gal 2:9) finally frames the relationship between the two epistolary collections, Pauline and Pillars, aptly introduced by Jas 2:22 (author's trans.): "faith [in Christ=Pauline] is made complete by works [like Christ=Pillars]." This conception of Christian existence is the principal characteristic of friendship with God (Jas 2:23). For James, whenever the gospel is distorted by the appropriation of one to the exclusion of the other—whether as a faith without works or works without faith—the community's friendship with God is seriously threatened.

OUTLINE

- I. Greetings (1:1)
- II. Introduction: The Nature and Source of the Community's Wisdom (1:2–21)
- III. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Quick Listening" (1:22–2:26)
- IV. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Slow Speaking" (3:1–18)
- V. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Slowing Anger" (4:1–5:6)
- VI. Conclusion: The Future of the Wise Community (5:7–20)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Greetings (1:1)

James follows the form of most Hellenistic letters by beginning with an author's salutation of the audience. The attribution of James recalls two earlier traditions that help to contextualize the reading of this letter: Paul mentions the story of Jesus' appearance to James on Easter (1 Cor 15:7; cf. Jas 2:1) and Acts portrays him as the leader of the Jewish church (Acts 15:13–21; 21:18–26; cf. Gal 2:11–12). His pastoral concern is aimed at the corporate effect of saving grace embodied in a congregation's purity practices (cf. Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; cf. Jas 1:26–27); and his only appearances in Acts are to resolve intramural conflicts provoked by his church's misunderstanding of Paul's mission (cf. Acts 15:1–21; 21:21–26; cf. Jas 2:14–26).

The letter's recipients are greeted as "twelve tribes in the Dispersion." This address is symbolic of a religious location in which "twelve tribes" are believers whose spiritual "dispersion" (diaspora) within a hostile world unsettles their faith and tests their allegiance to God. James proffers wisdom that will help secure this community's embattled faith.

II. Introduction: The Nature and Source of the Community's Wisdom (1:2–21)

The main body of James is introduced by a powerful vision of Christian existence. Central to this vision is the believer's routine experience of "trials of any kind" (1:2), which tests a faith in God (1:3) but to which thoughtful believers respond with "nothing but joy." This response is possible when trials are "considered" against the horizon of a coming age when human existence will be "mature and complete, lacking in nothing" (1:4b). Restated as a beatitude, God promises to bless those who "endure temptation" with "the crown of life" (cf. Rev. 2:10) as reward for their devotion to God (1:12).

But hardship also occasions a theodicy that tests the devotion of immature believers who are "unstable in every way" (1:8). "Trials" (1:2) and "temptation" (1:12) translate the same Greek word, peirasmos, so that James is connecting suffering with the potential of spiritual failure. According to James, hardship can produce either a steady allegiance to God or it can "give birth to sin" and "death" (1:14–15). Although demonic impulses (cf. 3:15; 4:5, 7) and external factors (cf. 2:2–7; 5:1–6) may tempt the believer to failure, James stresses the individual's responsibility to make wise choices since the inward "desire" is "one's own" (1:14) to control.

But the believer enjoys heavenly support in controlling his self-centered desire. When God is trusted as generous and impartial (1:5), God is petitioned for the necessary wisdom or knowhow one may lack to pass the spiritual tests that trials occasion. Rather than doubting God's goodness (1:6–8) or being deceived by the belief that God is responsible for one's misfortune (1:16), the knowing response is to petition "the Father of lights with whom there is no variation" (1:17b) for wisdom; and God will invariably respond with "generous acts of giving, with every perfect (teleios) gift" (1:17a). The perfect gift is "the word of truth" (1:18) because it is God-given and because it supplies the wisdom necessary for a life that is "mature (teleios) and complete" (1:4).

The stated content of "the word of truth" is a stock synthesis of proverbial wisdom—"let everyone be quick to listen, slow to speak, slow to anger" (1:19b); but the primary role of the letter's main body is to provide the reader with a fresh and elaborate commentary of this "implanted word that has the power to save your souls" (1:21).

III. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Quick Listening" (1:22–2:26)

The letter's main body consists of three essays that comment on the nature of a wise response that passes the test of faith. The sequence of these essays is determined by the proverbial triad of 1:19: accordingly, the first essay concerns the wisdom of "quick listening." Simply put, to listen quickly means to obey the "perfect law, the law of liberty" promptly (1:22–25), which commands the merciful treatment of the poor neighbor (1:26–2:7). "The distress of orphans and widows" (1:27) is a biblical metaphor for society's most vulnerable members, and their presence in a congregation occasions a spiritual test that requires a fresh application of heavenly wisdom. To care for poor and powerless is the hallmark of God's covenantkeeping people (cf. Exod 22:22; Deut. 24:17–21; Ps. 146:9; Isa. 1:17; Jer. 5:28; Acts 2:45; 4:32–35; 6:1–7; 9:36–42), and to abandon them risks God's displeasure (cf. 2:12–13).

Two case studies of "quick listening" are mentioned. The first concerns the community's leaders who discriminate against the poor in favor of the rich, giving the rich the best seats in the house while seating the poor "at my feet" (2:2–4). These practices are foolish in an assembly of the "glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (2:1), who exemplifies God's preferential option for the poor (cf. Luke 14:7–14). The second case studies discrimination in the civil-law court to draw a damning analogy between the community's leaders and the very rich they foolishly privilege who "drag you into court . . . and blaspheme the excellent name" of Jesus (2:6–7; cf. Luke 18:1–8).

Two congregations are differently appraised by God (1:23–27, author's trans.). Those who "hear the word but are not doers" and so delude themselves since what they profess but fail to enact is worthless to God (v. 26; cf. 1:22–23; 2:15–16). Rather the "pure and undefiled" religion is approved by God because of what it does: it cares for its own poor without being contaminated "by the world" (1:27).

The word that is heard is "the perfect (teleios; cf. 1:4, 17) law, the law of liberty" (1:25). While this law is "perfect" because its source is divine (cf. Ps 18:7 LXX), the prior uses of perfect in Jas 1:4, 17 forge a still thicker meaning of perfection that relates the law to the congregation's moral practices. "Perfect" signifies the goal of Christian existence, formed in faithful reception of God's gifts (1:17–18) and in response to spiritual tests (1:3–4). A "perfect law," then, is a "word of truth" that "saves your souls"; the wise response is to obey such a law and live. Moreover, this phrase trades upon Torah's Jubilee legislation: the "law of liberty" concerns "the year of liberty" (Lev 25:8–24), which became important especially during the Second Temple period for fashioning a sociological model of God's coming kingdom (cf. Luke 4:16–21; Jas 2:5). The promise of future blessing introduced in 1:12 is here repeated to link enduring temptation/trials with the wisdom of law keeping.

The economic practices of the "glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (2:1) establish the criterion by which God measures the community's treatment of its poor (cf. 2:12–13). While the Lord's used here alerts the reader to the letter's Easter ethos, more significant is the question related to the reader's faithfulness: better translated, "do you have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ?" This phrase recalls the similar phrase used by Paul in which "the faith of Jesus Christ" (cf. Rom 3:22; Gal 3:22, author's trans.) is a subjective genitive of the crucified Christ's faithfulness that secures the world's salvation from sin. James 2:1 is aimed differently: it concerns Christ's ministry to the poor in obedience to the "royal law" (2:8) rather than Christ's death on the cross.

The reception of the wisdom of quick listening is profusely illustrated by both positive and negative example. God's appraisal that "you do well if you really do the royal law" (2:8) contrasts sharply with the "senseless person" who supposes that "you do well" by merely professing orthodox faith (2:19–20) but without a complement of works (2:14–17).

Besides the example of Jesus, two other biblical figures, Abraham and Rahab, are mentioned as wise exemplars of caring for the poor in their distress. Their cases are introduced by the commonsense assertion that profession does not save. For example, if the pious benediction, "go in peace," is given to the hungry and naked without also feeding and clothing them, nothing redemptive happens either for the poor or for the community (cf. 2:14–17). The believer who claims to have the faith of Jesus apart from doing his will is no different from the shuddering demon who does the same (cf. 2:18–20).

The final example combines patriarch Abraham (2:21–24) and prostitute Rahab (2:25) to make a universally valid claim: a profession of "faith without works is also dead" (2:26). According to rabbinic tradition, Isaac's binding is Abraham's final exam. Whether he passes or fails his spiritual test secures the promises God makes regarding Israel's destiny. According to James, Abraham is befriended by God because his faith is "brought to completion by the works" (v. 22).

Rahab's story (cf. Josh 2:1–15) makes this same point by what it does and does not mention. Hardly another biblical figure offers a more impressive profession of faith than does Rahab (cf. Josh 2:8–11); yet James does not mention it. Only her hospitable and courageous actions toward "the messengers" are noted. The rhetorical effect is to impress upon the reader that the wise believer understands that God befriends people on the basis of their merciful "works and not by faith alone" (2:24).

IV. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Slow Speaking" (3:1–18)

The wisdom of "slow speaking" is directed at those who aspire to become teachers (3:1). The letter has already noted that even believers sometimes lack the wisdom necessary to control the inward desires that incline them toward doubt and sin (1:5–6, 7–8, 13–15). That is, "all of us make many mistakes" (3:2). This realism is deepened by the bracing awareness that God will judge believers on the basis of what they say and do (1:12; 2:12–13).

To slow down what one says is not a matter of better diction; it concerns the careful choice of words the teacher uses. The difficulty of controlling what is said is illustrated by three examples from everyday life with increasing tension. The teacher controls the tongue (= speech) much like the rider controls the bit to guide the movement of a horse (3:3) or the pilot controls the rudder to maneuver a ship through strong winds to safe harbor (3:4–5a). The teacher's failure to control the tongue is likened to the "small fire" (lit. "spark") that can destroy a great forest (3:5b–6a).

James applies the problem of a teacher's careless speech with damning effect (3:6): careless speech is a "world of iniquity (that) stains the whole body" (cf. 1:27) and directs the community's destiny—its "cycle of nature"—away from God's reign toward a future "inflamed by Gehenna" (author's trans.; cf. Mark 9:45, 47; 1 Enoch 26–27). Gehenna is the Hellenized form of Hinnom, a valley on the south side of Jerusalem used as a garbage dump. Over time this site became an important metaphor for evil and even envisaged as a possible location for the final defeat of those who have sinned against God. No doubt this is the subtext of James' use in v.6.

The more positive application of talking the walk is framed by the practical question: "who is wise and understanding among you?" (3:13). The question alludes to the instruction of Moses for Israel to search for "wise and understanding" leaders to broker disputes that might threaten the tribal confederacy (cf. Deut 1:12–13). The readers of this letter, faced with their own search for congregational leaders/teachers, are guided by a sharply worded contrast between two different kinds of wisdom with very different outcomes.

The wise and understanding teacher has a skill set that is not learned from experience or education; rather its source is a "wisdom from above" (3:17; cf. 1:17–18). Unlike the foolish teacher whose selfish character (cf. v. 14, 16a) is formed by a wisdom that "does not come down from above, but is . . . devilish" (v.15) and whose résumé chronicles "disorder and wickedness of every kind" (v. 16b), the wise and understanding teacher is formed by "the wisdom from above" and mediates "a harvest of righteousness . . . sown in peace" (v. 18).

The catalogue of virtues in v. 17, which characterizes the peace-making speech of the wise and understanding teacher, has many parallels in antiquity. Even though consisting of universally upheld virtues, such lists are carefully fitted into their writings to perform particular roles for their audiences. The Pauline letters, for example, include similar lists of virtue that characterize those in Christ (Gal 5:22–23). Central to Pauline anthropology is the profile of a new creature whose existence is the effect of divine grace made possible by the faithfulness of Christ and mediated by his life-giving Spirit. The anthropology of James assumes that believers must take responsibility for their destiny with God by making wise choices that resist doubt or their desire for worldly evils.

V. An Essay on the Wisdom of "Slowing Anger" (4:1–5:6)

Anger toward others stems from an inward desire for material pleasure and threatens the community's internal life (4:1–3). This text uses images of strife both military ("conflicts" and "war") and interpersonal ("disputes" and "murder") to characterize its seriousness. The experience of being poor can provoke the impulse to covet the worldly goods of others (4:4–5), which tests the believer's friendship with a God who resists the arrogant and exalts the pious poor (4:6–12; cf. 2:5). To slow down anger requires one to resist "friendship with the world" (4:4; cf. 1:27; 3:6) and submit to God. James conforms to teaching found in other Jewish texts that human nature contains two competing "spirits" or yetsrim—one inclined toward evil, the other toward good: to engage the one is to resist the other (4:7).

In response to this spiritual reality, v. 5 is better translated to pose a pair of rhetorical questions that expect a negative answer: "Or do you think Scripture says foolish things? Does the spirit that God made to dwell within us incline us intensely toward envy?" The wisdom of Scripture rather discloses that the promise of divine exaltation (vv. 6, 10) is aimed at a congregation that worships God by purifying its heart (vv. 7–9). The sanctified sinner no longer covets the goods of others but is a doer of God's law (4:11–12) that forbids coveting his neighbor's possessions.

The opening invocation, "Come now" (4:13a; 5:1a), links together two examples of friendship with the world to illustrate how a passion for things can subvert the believer's devotion to God and relations with others. The first example is the arrogant merchant (4:13–17) whose single-minded pursuit of financial profit takes him "to such and such a town" to "[do] business" (rather than God's law; cf. v. 15) and "[make] money" (rather than receive God's grace; cf. v. 6). The shift of pronoun to "you" (v. 14) suggests this merchant typifies the kind of arrogance opposed by God (v. 6). They are functional atheists who plan their lives as though God does not exist (cf. vv. 14, 16) instead of making choices that please God (cf. vv. 15, 17).

The related illustration is of the rich farmer whose practices embody the foolishness of those who choose friendship with the world rather than with God and so "wail for the miseries that are coming" (5:1). The choice against God rests on two catastrophic mistakes. The first is a misappraisal of the long-term worth of material goods: they do not endure but riches "rot, clothes are moth-eaten . . . gold and silver" rust (5:2–3; cf. Matt 6:19–21). The second is a faulty assessment of theodicy and God's sense of justice: their luxurious lifestyle, purchased at the expense of workers who are mistreated and underpaid, is the hard evidence of guilt that will be used against them in the heavenly court case convened by "the Lord of hosts" (v. 4). In a vivid reminder of the coming "great reversal," their death sentence will be carried out in "the last days" (v. 3) as a "day of slaughter" (v. 5).

The antecedent of James' curious reference to the murder of a single "righteous one" in v. 6 is much debated. In Christian tradition, the phrase fulfills the promise of the Isaianic servant whose suffering on behalf of the world is marked by his "righteousness" before God (Isa 53:11; cf. Luke 23:47). In a letter that emphasizes God's vindication of the pious poor and indictment of the rich (cf. 1:9–11; 2:2–7; 4:4–6), however, the metaphor more likely functions as a metonym of poor laborers who are starving for lack of food, either because of neglect (especially during famine) or juridical injustice (cf. 2:6–7). If the intended readers are believers whose marginal existence is characterized by these kinds of financial trials, then they might rightly hope—and so make their choices—for a future of reversed fortune, when the last will be first and the first last.

VI. Conclusion: The Future of the Wise Community (5:7–20)

The letter's conclusion recalls important catchwords from the letter's opening to form an inclusio that frames the three wisdom essays between. But this repetition is more than a retrospective on what has already been written; it supplies the principal motivation for following the letter's exhortation to make wise choices when faith is tested by tribulation: the coming triumph of the Lord is near (5:7–9). God's epic battle against and eventual victory over the evil forces that provoke human suffering is among Scripture's principal responses to the problem of suffering. The farmer's experience waiting for "the early and the late rains" (5:7) to water the crops to harvest exemplifies the kind of intelligent patience that awaits God's ultimate victory. This exhortation is made more urgent by the pointed assertion that the Lord's parousia is imminent (v. 8)—"see, the Judge is standing at the doors" (v. 9).

The exhortation not to engage in "[grumbling] against one another so that you may not be judged" (v. 9) recalls the story of Job (v. 11) who endured to the end despite his complaining friends. James places him among the prophets who suffered with patient confidence when they "spoke in the name of the Lord" (v. 10; cf. Luke 11:47–54). The background for this exemplary Job is the LXX, followed by the Testament of Job, which unlike his portrait in the Hebrew Bible links his famous patience with his merciful treatment of the poor and it to his eventual restoration by a "compassionate and merciful"

God (T. Job 51–53; v. 11; cf. Jas 1:26– 2:26). To care for the poor without complaint is to deal with life wisely.

This exhortation for patience is complemented by another to pray for healing (5:13–16a). Patience and prayerfulness are the twin dispositions of an apocalyptic worldview, which views Christian existence before the Lord's arrival through the lens of suffering and powerlessness. The opening imperative to pray for the lacking wisdom (cf. 1:5–6), which when "implanted" and acted upon is able to "save the soul" (1:21), is here recast as "the prayer of faith will save the sick" (v. 15). The elders are summoned because they "implant" the saving word in the community's life and so now lead in a liturgy of healing that "prays over (the sick)" and "[anoints] them with oil" (v. 14). The olive oil administrated "in the name of the Lord" can either be understood as medicinal or, more likely in a worship practice, as invocative of the powerful presence of the risen Lord who "will raise them up" (v. 15; cf. Mark 6:13; 9:38; Acts 3:6, 16)—whether at the end of the age or in physical healing is uncertain (cf. Acts 3:19–21). The logical connection between the healing of sick and the forgiving of sinner is thematic of the gospel tradition (vv. 15b–16a; cf. Matt 6:12).

The earlier uses of "righteous/-ness" in James suggest the "prayer of the righteous" (5:16) is "powerful and effective" because it coheres with God's pattern of salvation (cf. 2:23–24; 3:18). According to Jewish and Jesus traditions, the prophetic exemplar of effective prayer is Elijah (5:16b–18), whose words on Mt. Carmel produced rain because they aligned with God's words for Israel (cf. 1 Kgs 18; Sir 48:1–11; Luke 4:25). That is, prayer offered by the righteous for healing or forgiveness is a practice of wisdom because it produces "powerful and effective" results.

The final verses of James (5:19–20) form a benedictory that enlists readers for a mission to "save the sinner's soul from death" (cf. 1:21). These sinners are lapsed believers who have "[wandered] from the truth" of God's word (cf. 1:18, 21). Without this sacred compass, doubt and inward desire "[give] birth to sin" and sin, death (1:14–15). The practice of the wisdom of James, then, concludes on these final words of hope: the repentance and restoration of those believers who have failed their test of faith is mediated by the community made wise for salvation by the instruction of this letter (cf. 2 Tim 3:15).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Bauckham. James (London: Routledge, 1999); P. H. Davids. Commentary on James. NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); P. J. Hartin. James. SP (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2003); L. T. Johnson. The Letter of James. AB 37A (New York: Doubleday, 1995); R. W. Wall. Community of the Wise: The Letter of James. NTC (New York: Continuum, 1997).

1–2 PETER

M. EUGENE BORING

1 PETER OVERVIEW

This letter is attributed to Peter, one of the earliest disciples of Jesus (Mark 1:16–20; John 1:35–42), who became the principal leader of the earliest Jewish Christian community in Jerusalem and advocate of Jewish Christianity (cf. Gal 2:11–14). Peter later came to Rome, where he continued his apostolic ministry, which he finally sealed with a martyr's death (1 Clement 5–6; Ignatius Romans 4:3; cf. John 21:18–19). In Rome, the ministry of the Apostle Peter continued among disciples influenced by him and in a stream of tradition emanating from him.

Paul, advocate of Gentile Christianity, had also come to Rome and had been martyred there (1 Clement 5–6; 2 Tim 4:7–17; Acts 20:25, 36–38; 28:30–31). In the next generation, the church in the capital of the empire found itself the heir of both Paul and Peter, and the custodian of the traditions associated with each. While the traditions represented by Paul and Peter were different, they were not mutually exclusive alternatives, and were not seen as such by the Roman church, which in the latter part of the first century began to see itself as supporter of and teacher to other struggling churches outside Rome.

First Peter represents this Roman combination of Petrine and Pauline tradition expressed in a letter encouraging churches in five provinces of Asia Minor who are facing a hostile social situation. The letter includes and interprets a considerable amount of earlier Christian tradition, including materials used in teaching and liturgy. It is not, however, a baptismal sermon modified into the letter form. This view, popular in the last century, has now been generally rejected. Like the Pauline letters, it was intended for reading in the worship services of the congregations, not for private study. Like other early Christian letters, it functions not so much by directly teaching doctrine and offering specific instructions, but by projecting a narrative world that stretches from creation to eschaton, a grand story of which the God revealed in Christ is author, and which will have a worthy conclusion at the final revelation of Jesus Christ. First Peter is thus preeminently a message of hope, encouraging its readers to understand themselves as called to follow the example of Christ in the context of a hostile world that misunderstands them, and to hold fast to their faith until the end. Although written in the name of the beloved apostle, 1 Peter was most likely not written by Peter himself (who was killed ca. 64 CE), but by one of his disciples in Rome, about 90 CE. This conclusion is widely accepted in current scholarship for the following reasons. (1) The letter lacks the kind of material one would anticipate from an eyewitness, such as sayings of Jesus that would be relevant to the author's purpose. (2) Instead, the letter reflects much of the language and thought of the Pauline letters, and, like Paul, appeals to the OT (cited consistently in the LXX Greek translation) rather than sayings and deeds of Jesus. (3) Paul's companions are associated with Peter (Silvanus = Silas; Mark, 5:12–13). (4) The letter is written in sophisticated Greek, some of the best in the NT, not likely to have been written by a Galilean fisherman. (5) There are indications of a late date such as "Babylon" as a designation for Rome, which became current only after 70 CE. (6) Except for the first word, the letter makes no claim to authorship by an apostle, but specifically indicates that the letter was written by an elder (5:1).

Writing in the name of one's authoritative teacher in order to extend his teaching into a new situation was a common and respected practice in the ancient world. That 1 Peter was not written directly by Simon Peter does not impinge on its status as Holy Scripture, but acknowledging its pseudonymous authorship is an aid to understanding the text in its own terms.

OUTLINE

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

II. Thanksgiving (1:3–12)

III. Body of the Letter (1:13–5:11)

A. The New Identity as the Elect and Holy People of God (1:13–2:10)

B. Christian Existence and Conduct in the Given Structures of Society (2:11–3:12)

C. Responsible Suffering in the Face of Hostility (3:13–5:11)

IV. Conclusion of the Letter (5:12–14)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

1:1. Apostle means "authorized representative." By attributing the letter to Peter, the author expresses the claim that the letter represents the apostolic faith. Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia were five Roman provinces comprising most of modern Turkey. The elect is the characteristic biblical designation of Israel as the chosen people of God (e.g. Deut 7:6; 10:15; 14:2; 1 Chron 16:13; Ps 105:6). Likewise, "exiles of the Dispersion" reflects the terminology used in the OT and Jewish tradition for the scattered people of Israel who live as Jews throughout the world, often in a hostile environment. The term designates "sojourners" or "resident aliens," people living in a land where they are more than tourists but do not have the rights of citizens ("transients," "undocumented migrant workers"; cf. Gen 23:4; Ps 39:12; Heb 11:13). The words are not meant literally, but express the outsider status in their own country which they now experience because of their Christian faith. The contrast is not between earthly life and their true heavenly homeland, but refers to their marginal social status in this world.

1:2. The readers are chosen because God the Father has destined them, has sanctified them through the Spirit, and set them apart for obedience to Jesus Christ. Sprinkling with blood reflects the language of the OT covenant (cf. Exod. 24:3–8). The readers are addressed as members of this (renewed) covenant, now sealed with the blood of Christ (Mark 14:24; 1 Cor 11:25; Heb 9:20; 10:29; 13:20).

II. Thanksgiving (1:3–12)

The salutation of Hellenistic letters was usually followed by a brief thanksgiving section that typically began with "'I thank God" (as e.g. Rom 1:8; 1 Cor 1:4), but could also begin with familiar synagogal form of prayer, "Blessed be God . . ." (2 Cor 1:3; cf. Eph 1:3).

1:3. The language of new birth continues to emphasize the divine initiative—people do not choose to be born, but are given life as a gift. The believer receives a new life of hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ encountered by the word of God in Christian preaching (1:12, 23). For 1 Peter the Christian life has an essential future dimension. Hope in biblical perspective refers to that which is real, but not yet—the certain future victory of God. Hope plays an even more decisive role than "faith" for this author, and can serve as the one word that sums up the meaning of the Christian life as such (e.g. 1:3; 3:5, 15). This hope has to do with the inheritance God has already kept in heaven for believers, but the picture here is not of going up to heaven to receive it, but going forward in history to receive it in the last time (1:5) when Christ is revealed (1:7).

1:6. The trials are not the ordinary difficulties of everyday life, but the harassment and discrimination the readers suffer on account of their faith. The joy here described is not a superficial "feel good," but is a deep, inexpressible joy permeated by the presence and glory of God.

1:8. The contrast is not between author and readers, as though the author had seen Jesus but the readers had not, but is a statement about the Christian life as such. Christians, including the author, love, trust, and obey Christ on the basis of the faith that has come to them by Christian preaching and the power of the Holy Spirit (1:12).

1:9. In the biblical understanding, soul is not a part of the person, immortal or otherwise, but is a way of talking about the whole person (cf. 1:22; 2:25; 3:20; 4:19; in which the same Greek word is used). 1:10–11. Since they believed that the Christ had come and that the eschatological age had begun, early Christians reread their Bible in the light of this conviction, and found many texts they believed spoke directly of Christ and the church. The early Christian community rightly saw that the biblical prophecies had a future orientation, pointing to a later time when the ultimate plan of God would be revealed. The readers were regarded suspiciously by their neighbors, who thought of them as belonging to a new cult. The author assures them that they have been incorporated into the plan of God of which the ancient prophets spoke, a plan that embraces all history from creation to the final revelation of Christ.

III. Body of the Letter (1:13–5:11)

A. The New Identity as the Elect and Holy People of God (1:13–2:10)

1:13. The flowing garments worn in the ancient Near East were tightened about the waist and hips in preparing for work. "Roll up your mental sleeves and get ready for hard thinking" is the modern equivalent. The ancient Israelites ate the first Passover "[with] their loins girded" (Exod 12:11; cf. Luke 12:35). The author throughout applies to Gentile converts the whole exodus experience of Israel: former slaves are freed by the mighty act of God, are redeemed by the blood of the lamb, have been made participants in the divine covenant within which they have pledged their obedience, and are presently underway through a series of testings and harassments toward their promised inheritance, en route becoming a holy people and royal priesthood. As Israel in the wilderness longed for the fleshpots of Egypt, Christians are now tempted to long for their former social life.

1:15. Holiness is the quality of being separate from the ordinary. It belongs first of all to God, the Holy One, the Wholly Other, the Creator who is different from everything created (Isa 6:1–5). God's people are holy because God has called them to live a distinctive life within the world as witnesses to God's mighty acts (2:9). The author applies Lev 19:2, originally spoken to Israel, directly to his Christian readers.

1:17–19. Since the readers, as newborn children of God, now invoke God as father, they must live differently from the way they have been conditioned to live by the cultural traditions inherited from their ancestors (lit. "fathers").

1:19. The imagery is from Exod 12:1–28. The Passover lamb was not a sacrifice for sins, but the means of deliverance from death and slavery. The ransom of Jesus' blood does not here deliver us from the guilt of sin, but from the old way of life, continuing the exodus imagery that forms much of the metaphorical framework for this section.

1:22. The love called for by the author should not be sentimentalized or romanticized. When outsiders said, "See how they love one another," they did not intend a compliment, but were expressing the resentment and suspicion of those who loved each other but disdained outsiders and had been charged with "hatred for the human race" (cf. Tacitus, Annals 15.44; Tertullian, Apology 39). First Peter specifically resists yielding to the temptation to show love only to insiders.

2:1–3. The family imagery continues. The newborn babes of the Christian family are to mature as they are nourished by the word of God that generated faith in them (cf. (Deut 8:3; Matt 4:4). They are to put away those attitudes and behavior that destroy community: malice, deceit, hypocrisy, envy, slander. They now belong to the household of faith, and their ethic cannot be individualistic and privatistic.

2:4–10. The metaphor now changes from household to the house itself. Making use of a collection of three "stone" texts that had already become traditional, the author understands the rejectedbut-vindicated stone to be both Christ and the Christians (Isa 8:14; 28:16; Hos 1:6–9). Christian lives are paralleled to the life of Christ. He was and is rejected by the world in general (not just by the Jewish leaders); in him the Christian readers of 1 Peter recognize their own experience of being rejected by pagan society. Christ was vindicated; the rejected stone turned out to be the chief cornerstone. Christian readers will be vindicated at the eschaton.

The imagery expands still further, as additional biblical descriptions of Israel are applied to the Christian community. The readers are addressed as a "holy priesthood" or "royal priesthood" (2:5, 9). The point is that the Christian community as a whole plays the role of the continuing people of God in history, which includes being a priestly community on behalf of the world. Like the Israel of the Bible and history, the church as the people of God is called into being not for its own sake, but as an expression of the divine mission to the world, and is itself charged with a mission. The gift becomes a responsibility.

B. Christian Existence and Conduct in the Given Structures of Society (2:11–3:12)

For many modern Christians, this section is the most difficult part of the letter to take seriously. It gives instructions for Christians who live their lives in the established social structures of another time and place. It is neither a protest against Rome and the cultural standards of the time, nor simply a call to conform. The distinctiveness the author calls for is a nuanced, discriminating countercultural conformity. Codes of household duties had been developed in the Hellenistic world to represent what an orderly society should be. Hellenistic Jews and Christians in the Pauline tradition had already adapted these traditional codes as a means of teaching Jewish and Christian ethics (cf. Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Tim 2–3; 5:1–6:3; Titus 2:1–10). The author of 1 Peter is not formulating new rules, but joining a discussion and adapting a tradition. Household slaves in non-Christian households and wives married to non-Christian husbands are taken as examples illustrating the attitudes and behavior to which all Christians in such a society are called. The slaves and women here addressed have already made a courageous decision to join a despised foreign cult that is not the religion of their non-Christian masters and husbands. That is, they have already shown that they are not merely submissive. This makes them a model for the church as a whole. Mission, not submission, is the focus of this text. The challenge is to remove a false stumbling block, so that people may decide for or against the truth of the Christian message without being put off by [their perception of] the cultural forms associated with it. To be good citizens subordinate to the civil authorities is to silence the objections of outsiders, i.e. it is in the service of the Christian mission (2:15).

3:1–7. In the same way as all Christians, including husbands and young people, wives are to fit into the existing social order as part of the Christian mission (see on 2:13). Women are directly addressed as responsible members of the community. Like all Christians (3:16), they are to offer their witness to the faith through gentleness and meekness. Their new-found freedom does not mean that they may now dress in what would have been a countercultural manner that calls attention to themselves. For women of another culture in later generations to adopt these instructions as normative rules would make them stand out from expected social conventions—the precise opposite of their intention. Likewise, Christian husbands are not simply to accept the dominant role assigned to them by first-century society, but are to show consideration and honor to their wives as co-heirs of the gift of (Christian) life received from God. Husbands are to relate to their wives not merely in terms of cultural expectations, but according to knowledge, i.e. as those who understand the Christian faith as articulated in 1:3-2:25. 3:8–12. Just as the unit began in 2:11–12 with general instructions to the whole Christian community, so it concludes by addressing all Christians. Jesus had suffered unjustly and had taught non-retaliation (Matt 5:44/Luke 6:28). While aware of Jesus' example (2:21), the author typically does not quote Jesus to support his point, but the Scripture (Ps 34:13–17).

C. Responsible Suffering in the Face of Hostility 3:13–5:11

3:13–17. Christian conduct is not a strategy for success. Christians are to respond to misunderstanding and abuse not only by patient suffering, but also with a coherent explanation of the meaning of the Christian faith to outsiders who misunderstand.

3:18–22. The ethical conduct to which Christians are called is grounded not on the basis of logic, general principles, or common sense, but christologically. How to understand the details of this obscure passage continues to be debated, but the main point is clear: the Christ who endured unjust suffering has triumphed completely over all the hostile forces of the universe, so Christians can endure unjust suffering in the assurance of sharing this ultimate victory. These verses probably include part of an ancient Christian hymn familiar to the readers then, but now lost. Such hymns celebrated the cosmic victory of Christ (cf. Phil 2:5–11; Col 1:15–20; 1 Tim 3:16). "Spirits in prison" probably refers to the rebellious transcendent beings (also called "angels," "demons" and "sons of God") who corrupted the human race and were imprisoned in the nether world awaiting eschatological judgment (cf. Gen 6:1–4; 1 Enoch 10:4–6; 1 Cor 6:3; 2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6). It is not clear whether the proclamation Christ made to them after his death communicated doom or salvation. As the waters of the flood separated Noah and his family from the old world, so baptism separates Christians from their old life. As only a few in Noah's time were delivered, so the minority status of Christians in society does not mean they are rejected by God. That angels, authorities, and powers are finally subject to Christ (3:22) may point to their final redemption (cf. Eph 1:9–10, 19–22; Phil 2:9–11; Col 1:19–20).

4:1–2. The preceding line of thought continues: the sinless Christ (2:22) suffered to bring the reign of sin to an end. Christians too have finished with sin, since they participate in Christ's suffering and death because they are baptized, and their own sufferings are part and parcel of the Christ-event that is now their own story. They can never return to their old way of life.

4:6. This text has traditionally been interpreted in relation to the "spirits in prison" of 3:19, but there is probably no connection. The dead to whom the gospel was preached are deceased members of the Christian community. From the perspective of this world, their death was a judgment, i.e. they died like everyone else, despite their Christian faith. But their death was not the end; they are vindicated in the transcendent spiritual world.

4:7–8. Like much of early Christianity, the author believes that with the advent of Jesus the end of history had come, and that Christ's final manifestation would occur in the near future. This faith encouraged loving care for other people, especially those of the Christian community.

4:10. Each member of the community has received a gift. There is a variety of gifts, and the gifts are not for individual self-aggrandizement but for strengthening the Christian community as a whole (Rom 12:4–8; 1 Cor 12:4–31).

The name Christian is found in the NT only here and Acts 11:26; 26:28. Though the name later became a badge of honor, it was originally a demeaning term, "Christ-lackeys," and those who designated themselves by this name suffered ostracism and worse. The Christian response to unjust suffering is not sullen resignation but actively doing good, in the glad confidence that their lives are in the hands of the faithful Creator.

5:1–5. Speaking in the first person for the first time since the opening greeting, the author presents himself as a presbyter (elder) in the Roman church, who writes with apostolic authority (cf. Overview; on elders, see Acts 11:29–30; 14:23; 20:17–38; 1 Tim 5:17–25; Titus 1:5–9; Jas 5:13). The author does not claim to have been present at the crucifixion. Rather, he is presenting his testimony to the meaning of the cross, as all Christians are called to do. The churches addressed are led by elders who, like the author, participate in the apostolic authority, but all are subordinate to Christ the chief shepherd (5:5).5:9 The little house churches scattered throughout Asia Minor are members of the one church, a world-wide community of faith.

IV. Conclusion of the Letter (5:12–14)

Silvanus is the same as Silas (cf. 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:19; Acts 15:22 and often in Acts). "Through Silvanus" does not mean he is co-author or secretary in the composition of the letter, but that he was active in delivering it (cf. Acts 15:22–23). This [unjust suffering for the sake of Christ] is the true grace of God: see on 2:19–20.

5:13. In 70 CE the Romans had destroyed the second Temple just as the Babylonians had destroyed the first in 586 BCE. After 70 CE, Rome was thus sometimes called "Babylon." "My son Mark" is not literal, but refers to Mark as Peter's convert and younger coworker, as Paul had referred to himself as "father" of Onesimus and Timothy (Phlm 10; 1 Cor 4:17; cf. 1 Tim 1:18; 2 Tim 1:2). Both Silvanus/Silas and Mark had been associated with Paul (1 Thess. 1:1; Phlm. 24). Their association with Peter is here a signal of the later combination of Petrine and Pauline traditions in Rome (cf. Overview).

2 PETER OVERVIEW

Second Peter combines two literary genres, the letter and the testament. Beginning with the conventional letter framework adopted and adapted from Paul, the body of the composition has the typical form and content of the "farewell speech" or testament known in both traditional Judaism and early Christianity.

In this letter an early Christian teacher of the first half of the second century writes in Peter's name, giving instruction to the church struggling to consolidate its faith in the face of false teaching and disappointed hopes. On the writing of letters in Peter's name, see the overview of 1 Peter. Second Peter stands in this same tradition, reflecting later developments in the circle of Peter's disciples that continued his teaching. Compelling evidence indicates that the letter was not written by Peter himself: (1) The letter has excellent command of Greek language and rhetoric, tending toward a grandiose style. (2) Theological concepts represent an integration of traditional Christian faith and Greek philosophical terminology unlikely for a Galilean fisherman. (3) Second Peter uses the Letter of Jude as a primary source, reflected throughout and incorporated almost bodily into the author's argument (compare especially the wording of Jude 3–18 and 2 Pet 2:1–3:4). (4) The church of the second and third centuries was hardly aware of the letter, and many churches did not accept it as canonical after the fourth or fifth century. (5) The letter reflects evidence of a date long past the lifetime of Simon Peter, including 3:2, which looks back on the time of the early prophets and apostles, 3:4, which reflects the viewpoint of a later generation, and 3:15–16, which indicates Paul's letters have already been collected, circulated, and regarded as Scripture.

OUTLINE

- I. Salutation (1:1–2)
- II. Thematic Summary: God's Blessings and the Believers' Response (1:3–11)
- III. Body of the Letter: Peter's Testament, Responding in Advance to the False Teachers (1:12–3:13)
- IV. Concluding Exhortation and Doxology (3:14–18)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

In the opening words, an authoritative apostolic voice from the past addresses readers of a later generation. Using the Jewish form of his name (cf. Acts 15:14), Simeon speaks as one who was a companion of Jesus and rooted in the earliest church, declaring that the readers of a later generation share the same faith. Here, as in Jude 3, faith refers not only to the personal trust with which one believes, but to the content of the faith itself. Those who come after the first generation do not have a hand-me-down, second-hand faith, but one that is equal to that of the first generation.

II. Thematic Summary: God's Acts and the Believers' Response (1:3–11)

1:3–4. God has acted in the past not only in the saving Christ-event, but by calling the readers into the community of faith. God will act in the future—this is the implication of "his precious and very great promises" that are denied by the false teachers. Living one's life on the line between God's act in Christ and the final coming of God's kingdom has ethical consequences. For the author, this weaving together of faith and life is crucial. Bad ethics results from bad theology; good theology must produce ethical living.

1:5–11. This combination of faith and ethics is immediately illustrated by adapting a Hellenistic list of virtues to represent the distinctive substance of the Christian life. Typically, such lists began with knowledge, and right understanding was considered the basis for the good life. In contrast, Peter begins with faith, which here refers not to the content of what is believed, but personal trust in the God revealed in Christ. The conventional Hellenistic virtues follow, but the whole is flavored by Christian content. The list that begins with faith concludes with love, expressed by the word (agape). While this term itself can be used in a variety of ways, in early Christianity it developed a distinctive meaning and was often used to express the unselfish love of God made effective in the church as love for others (e.g. John 13:35; Rom 5:5). The author again emphasizes that such living is based on and is the expression of their call and election received in the past, and their confident hope of the eternal kingdom that will appear at the return of Christ. Those who do not live this way—the author has the false teachers and their disciples in mind—have forgotten their past and denied their future.

III. Body of the Letter: Peter's Testament, Responding in Advance to the False Teachers (1:12–3:13)

1:12–15. Here the author makes the testamentary character of his writing explicit. The tradition that Jesus informed Simon Peter of his impending martyr's death is also found in John 21:18–19. Although the author himself is reinterpreting the traditional faith into new categories, he presents his interpretation as only reminding the readers of what they already know, i.e. their inherited traditional faith, which does not become something new by being reinterpreted in new language and concepts.

1:16–21. The author does not charge his opponents with propagating such myths (contrast 1 Tim 1:4; 4:7; 2 Tim 4:4; Titus 1:14). The false teachers charge traditional Christians who affirm the eschatological parousia with believing myths, fabricated to manipulate immature people. The author responds that the basis of faith is not mythology spun out of speculative imagination, but authentic apostolic testimony of actual events (16–18) and the prophetic word of Scripture (19–21). Since the event described "on the holy mountain" is similar to the Transfiguration scene portrayed in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt 17:1–8; Mark 9:2–8; Luke 9:28–36), this text has traditionally been understood as "Peter's" claim to have been present at the transfiguration. So understood, it is difficult to see the connection between this claim and the following references to the prophetic word of Scripture being confirmed. It is more likely that the author's line of thought is as follows. He and other traditional Christian teachers appealed to the Scriptures to support their view of the eschatological parousia of Christ. The false teachers dispute this interpretation of Scripture. The author responds that this interpretation is not merely a matter of private, idiosyncratic interpretation, but is confirmed by a revelatory experience that revealed Jesus as God's Son enthroned in heavenly glory, the one who will come as eschatological judge and savior. The church may be assured of seeing the glory of Christ in the future, because the glory of the exalted Christ has already been seen in the past. In this reading "Peter" is not appealing to a pre-Easter transfiguration, but to a post-Easter prophetic revelation that confirms his reading of the prophetic Scriptures (cf. Matt 28:18–20; 1 Thess 4:15–17). Neither Scripture nor interpretation is a matter of arbitrary human will, but divine prophetic revelation.

2:1–22. This extensive central section is an attack on the false teachers, responding to their objections and charging them with defective theology, rejection of proper authority, and personal immorality. The author relies heavily on Jude, adapting the earlier material by making some significant changes: (1) He adjusts the chronology to conform to that of biblical narrative. Jude's triad Israel / sinful angels / Sodom and Gomorrah becomes sinful angels / Noah / Lot, in the order found in Gen 6–19. (2) He includes positive examples of God's deliverance (Noah, Lot) contrasting with the negative examples of God's judgment. (3) He omits Jude's citations from non-canonical literature (I Enoch, Testament of Moses), basing his argument entirely on material considered biblical. The point of all this is not to convert the false teachers, who are not addressed, but to warn the unsuspecting churches of the dire threat in their midst.

3:1–13. Broad streams of first-generation Christianity had expected Christ to return soon to complete his saving work by establishing God's justice and bringing in the kingdom of God (e.g. Matt 10:23; 16:28; Mark 9:1). The false teachers of the author's own time argue that the whole idea of Christ's second coming was false and should be abandoned, adducing three main arguments: (1) Since Jesus did not return within the expected time, history has shown it to be a false expectation. (2) The constancy and consistency of the world order, that continues to function as it always had done, shows that history will continue without divine intervention—hence there is no final judgment to be feared. (3) In any case, Christ has set us free from the law, we will not be called to account, so judgment is unnecessary.

The author understands this view to promote moral laxity and opposes it by appealing to the constancy of God's act as seen in Scripture. The biblical pattern of creation, judgment, and recreation will be repeated at the end. The delay of the parousia does not mean it will not happen. Appealing to Ps 90:4, the author argues that as a (human) day is a thousand years for God, and a thousand (human) years is one day for God, so God's promises are not constrained by human conceptions of time. The "delay" from the human perspective is in reality an expression of the patience of God who wants all people to repent and gives them more time. The author's ultimate conviction is that the parousia is certain, whenever it may come, because it is not a matter of human speculation but of God's promise.

IV. Concluding Exhortation and Doxology (3:14–18)

3:14–16. The writings of Paul had apparently been exploited by the false teachers, who interpreted Paul's emphasis on Christian freedom and the presence of salvation to mean there would be no future judgment. The author reclaims Paul for emerging mainstream catholic Christianity. This affirmation of Pauline Christianity by "Peter" is an extension of the unifying theology of 1 Peter.

3:17–18. The brief concluding doxology emphasizes remaining steadfast in the traditional faith until the return of Christ, the day of eternity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Bauckham. Jude, 2 Peter. WBC 50 (Waco, Tex.: Word, 1983); M. E. Boring. 1 Peter. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999); A. Chester and R. P. Martin. The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude. NTT (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

1, 2, 3 JOHN

GEORGE PARSENIOS

OVERVIEW

Pauline scholars often claim that reading Paul's letters is like reading someone else's mail. For, while inclusion in the biblical canon means that Paul's letters are now addressed to all believers, each letter was first addressed to first-century believers. We are reading their mail. First, Second, and Third John push this historical distance one step further. They are not only the mail of someone else, but of someone whose identity is cloaked in mystery. They provide only a few enigmatic details about both senders and recipients. Second and Third John, for instance, are the shortest writings in the New Testament, and identify their sender by the cryptic title "the Elder." Second John is sent to the equally enigmatic "Elect Lady and her children." And, even though 3 John helpfully tells the name of its recipient (Gaius), and refers to a conflict with a certain Diotrephes, the very brevity of the letter makes it unclear precisely what this conflict is. As for 1 John, it is much longer than the other two, and contains an elaborate polemic against beliefs that it opposes. But it mentions nothing about who sent it, to whom it was sent, and who specifically is committing the wrongs it seeks to correct. The circumstances that produced 1–3 John, then, are not immediately obvious.

A related problem arises regarding authorship. Since antiquity, people have wondered whether all three writings come from the same pen. Among those who reject common authorship, the most frequent assumption is that the author of 1 John, who is anonymous, is different from the Elder, who wrote 2 and 3 John. The evidence of the letters themselves, however, strongly suggests a common origin. Second John provides the adhesive that unites the trio. For, on the one hand, 2 John addresses more briefly the same theological errors that occupied 1 John, and, on the other hand, it shares the same author (the Elder) with 3 John. Because 1 John and 3 John are thus connected to 2 John, they are also connected to one another. A common language and style across all three letters, with appropriate levels of variation, also points to common authorship.

In addition to debating how they relate to one another, interpreters also question the relationship of 1–3 John to the Gospel of John. Among early Christian interpreters, 1 John was early attributed to the same author as the Gospel, while 2 and 3 John were only later accepted as his. Similarities in language, thought, and style, however, make some connection with the Fourth Gospel all but certain for all three. Less certain is the precise nature of that connection. Were 1–3 John written before, during, or after the composition of the Gospel? Were they all written at the same time? The evidence is not conclusive. A persistent assumption has been that the three letters reflect the later controversies of the community that produced the Fourth Gospel, and so are written after it, but are still products of the Johannine school. This will be the perspective adopted here. If 1–3 John follow the Gospel of John, which is dated to around 90, they can be hypothetically dated to somewhere between 100 and 110.

This does not mean, however, that the connections between 1–3 John and the Gospel of John are straightforward. Indeed, ideas from the Fourth Gospel often appear in the letters in an altered form, as when the letters apply to the Father things that the Fourth Gospel applies to Jesus. In the Gospel of John, for instance, Christians abide in Jesus (15:4–10, etc.), but in 1 John they abide in God (2:5–6, etc.). Likewise, the Gospel of John places the command to love one another in the mouth of Jesus (13:34, etc.), but 2 John ascribes the love command to God (4–6). The significance of these variations will be discussed in the commentary.

OUTLINE

I. 1 John

A. Prologue (1:1–4)

B. The Message Is "Light" (1:5–3:10)

C. The Message Is "Love" (3:11–5:12)

D. Epilogue (5:13–21)

II. 2 John

A. Greeting (1–3)

B. Body (4–12)

C. Farewell (13)

III. 3 John

A. Greeting (1–2)

B. Body (3–14)

C. Farewell (15)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

I. 1 John

A. Prologue (1:1–4)

First John does not open as ancient letters typically did by naming its sender and recipient. It begins with a prologue that resembles in various ways the prologue to the Gospel of John (1:1–18). Both prologues employ key Johannine terms such as testify, life, Father, Son. Further, while the Fourth Gospel opens (1:1) by speaking of the word (logos) that was in the beginning (arche⁻), 1 John discusses the word that was from the beginning. The respective meanings of "beginning" and "word" are different, however. In the Gospel, Jesus is the Word who existed in the beginning, where beginning has an eternal, cosmic sense. In 1 John, by contrast, the word is not Jesus, but the proclaimed word that the disciples preached from the beginning, meaning the beginning of their earthly ministry. The same key terms are used, therefore, but very differently. What explains this similarity in difference? It likely reflects a conflict over the proper interpretation of the Johannine tradition. By opening with such elaborate allusions to the Fourth Gospel, 1 John claims that it represents the proper extension of the Johannine tradition, and argues against former members of its community who separated themselves (2:19) and distorted this tradition. The ensuing argument against these opponents does not develop in clear, linear fashion, however, but cycles back and forth over several issues that can be conveniently summarized under the headings of christology and ethics.

B. The Message Is "Light" (1:5–3:10)

To divide 1 John into coherent units is difficult due to its repetitive structure. R. Brown, however, helpfully observes that the phrase "This is the message (angelia)" at 1:5 and 3:11 divides the letter into two parts. Beginning at 1:5, the argument focuses mostly, though not exclusively, on ethics. At 3:11 the argument turns for the most part, though again not exclusively, to christology.

The first section, then, opens at 1:5. The claim that God is light (1:5) is an ethical claim that describes neither an attribute of God nor his nature, but tells us what God does. A little further on we read that to walk in the light is to love one another (2:9–11), and God is later even defined as love (4:8, 16). Therefore, although the debate in this letter seems to be one centered on beliefs, light is not here connected to the clarity of true belief but to the purity of correct practice, to the call to love one another. This is what it means to say that God is light.

The section from 1:5–2:2 contains six clauses that begin with "if" and then define a particular condition as true or false. The notion of truth here has the typical Johannine sense of "reality." What is true is what is real, and two things especially are affirmed here as real. The first is human sin (1:8, 10, 2:1), and the second is that sins are forgiven through Jesus, the atoning sacrifice for sins (2:2). Both are real, and to deny one is to deny the other. For, if human beings have no sin, then Jesus need not have been an atoning sacrifice for sin.

Since he was such a sacrifice, however, and so has changed the human situation, the next section (2:3–11) emphasizes the reality of new life in Christ. It claims that "the darkness is passing away and the true light is already shining," (2:8). To walk in this light, believers must put aside the darkness of hatred and show love for one another. Verses 2:12–17 develop an important Johannine theme (John 15) that love for God and for one another is possible only for those who do not love the world (2:15).

Christology appears explicitly for the first time in 2:18–27, as does the term "antichrist," which in the entire New Testament appears only in 1–3 John (2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7). The connection between christology and the antichrist is not accidental, and recurs throughout 1–3 John. In 2:22–23, the antichrist is one who "denies the Father and the Son," and a similar christological concern accompanies every reference to the antichrist (see also 4:3; 2 John 7). This explains why 2:18 quickly shifts from the antichrist to many antichrists. The many opponents who hold a false christology are all antichrists. What they believe is not clear, though. What does it mean, after all, to "[deny] the Father and the Son?" (2:22). Interpreters disagree. In the Gospel of John, Jesus' opponents saw him only as a human being, not the divine Son or the Messiah. Because Jesus was persecuted for making himself equal to God (John 5:18), the Fourth Gospel defends the divinity of Jesus. Does the same christological problem arise here, with some believers denying that Jesus is the Messiah? That is highly unlikely, since they are part of the community that wrote the Fourth Gospel and so surely accept its message. The current passage is too cryptic to conclude anything absolutely. Later verses (4:1–6) provide more clues.

First John 2:28–3:10 emphasizes that those who abide in God do not sin, which seems to contradict the emphasis on human sin in 1:5–2:2. But there may be no contradiction. It is possible that the opponents insisted on human sinlessness when they rejected 1 John's christology. To combat this teaching, 1 John first underscored the reality of human sin (1:5–2:2). But 1 John also emphasizes that Jesus achieved the forgiveness of sins. In light of this new circumstance, 1 John now urges believers to transform their lives in order to reflect their new life, with special emphasis on the need to love one another (3:10).

C. The Message Is "Love" (3:11–5:12)

Verse 3:11 opens the second half of the letter by repeating the phrase "this is the message" from 1:5, and here the "message" is to love one another. The greater emphasis in the first half of 1 John was on ethics, with some concern for christology. In the latter half, the greater concern is on christology, but without ignoring ethics. Indeed, 3:11–18 actually emphasize the ethic of the love command, and the need to love "not in word or speech, but in truth and action" (3:18). First John 3:19–24 include a dual commandment that weds christology and the love command: "And this is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ and love one another" (3:23). The command regarding belief in Jesus will dominate verses 4:1–6, while the command to love one another occupies 4:7–18.

The issue of true belief occupies 4:1–6 and recalls the earlier mention of christology (2:18–22). When 4:2 insists that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," it tells us more about the opponents' beliefs we heard in ch. 2. The problem in 1 John seems to be the opposite of that in the Fourth Gospel. Where the Gospel of John affirmed Jesus' divinity against those who considered him only a human, 1 John affirms Jesus' humanity against those who see him as only divine. The opponents seem to have overemphasized Jesus' divinity to such a degree that his humanity, his work in the flesh, is considered irrelevant for salvation. Those who "[deny] that Jesus is the Christ" (2:22), therefore, might accept that the divine Word entered the world in Jesus, but they deny that the earthly Jesus performed any act necessary for salvation. Later groups called Docetists also devalued human flesh, refusing to believe that the divine Word saved humanity through the flesh. The English term docetic comes from the Greek word dokein, "to appear," suggesting that the divine Word only appeared to take on human flesh and suffer pain and crucifixion, but did not do so in reality. Some seed of docetism seems to characterize the opponents in 1 John. Against them, 1 John insists that it is precisely Jesus' work in the flesh, especially his atoning death, which is required for the remission of sins and human salvation (2:1–2). That the divine Word took on humanity, real humanity, is necessary for him to renew humanity.

Precisely since humanity is new in Christ, new possibilities are available in human relations. To explain this, 4:7–18 develops the latter part of the commandment in 3:23, to love one another. Love among believers imitates God's love reflected in the sending of the Son in human flesh (4:9–11), since the purpose of this sending was a loving act of sacrifice. To affirm that Christ acted out of sacrificial love requires believers to imitate this sacrifice in their interactions with one another. But, even more, God's love that was manifest in the sending of the Son is continued wherever believers love one another. Christology and ethics, then, are not separate concerns, but variously connected.

D. Epilogue (5:13–21)

Verse 5:13 draws 1 John to a close as it explains, "I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, so that you may know that you have eternal life." This statement connects 1 John to the Fourth Gospel by echoing what many believe was the original epilogue of the Gospel: "But these are written so that you may come to believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and that through believing you may have life in his name" (20:31). As in the prologue, therefore, allusions to the Fourth Gospel emphasize that 1 John presents the true extension of the Johannine tradition. This may explain why 1 John closes with the obscure and dire warning to avoid idols (5:21). How does this conclude the preceding argument? If idols are taken as false gods, the admonition may refer to the false beliefs of those who seceded from the community and no longer know the true God. To end with this negative tone, however, differs from the optimistic ending of the Fourth Gospel (21:25). The ominous conclusion of 1 John reflects the severity of the rift it addresses and the immediacy of the issues at stake.

II. 2 John

A. Greeting (1-3)

Like a standard ancient letter, 2 John begins by announcing that it is sent from the Elder to "the Elect Lady and her children." The term Elder (presbyteros) is a common leadership title in the early church (Acts 14:23, etc.). Some speculate that the Lady and her children are actual people, but these names surely symbolize a church (the Lady) and its members (her children).

B. Body (4–12)

By adhering to the standard letter form, 2 John differs from 1 John. In its content, however, it closely resembles 1 John. Verses 4–6 repeat and stress the command to love one another, while vv. 7–9 defend the reality of Jesus' coming in the flesh (cf. 1 John 4:2). Why was 2 John written if it seems only to summarize 1 John? Theories abound. One possibility is that both documents combat the same teaching at the same time in different places.

Further, 2 John not only refutes its opponents but urges that they not be permitted "into the house" (10) which means the church. For, showing false teachers hospitality supports their teaching (11). The connection between the Elder's authority and hospitality are even more important in 3 John.

C. Farewell (13)

Second John closes with an echo of its beginning, by saying, "The children of your elect sister send you their greetings," referring symbolically this time to the Elder's church and its members.

III. 3 John

A. Greeting (1–2)

Like 2 John, 3 John fits the formal criteria and typical brevity of ancient letters. It is the shortest New Testament document, and the only one not to mention the names Jesus or Christ, though it employs Johannine terminology like love, truth and testify. It is a letter of recommendation from the Elder to Gaius, on behalf of Demetrius (12). Recommendation letters were a formal convention between friends in antiquity, being sent to one friend in support of another for various reasons.

B. Body (3–15)

The letter commends Gaius for showing hospitality to strangers, suggesting that he provides material support to Christian missionaries (5–8). The crux of 3 John is the conflict with Diotrephes, who refuses such hospitality to the Elder's envoys (9–10). The verb epidechesthai is often translated differently in vv. 9 and 10. In 9, it is rendered as "recognize authority," while in 10, it is translated "receive." The change is unjustified, however, and in both cases epidechesthai should mean "receive." In v. 9, therefore, Diotrephes does not receive the Elder's letter, and in v. 10, he does not receive the Elder's envoys. Some interpreters associate Diotrephes with the christological conflict in 1 and 2 John, but 3 John makes no such connections, avoiding theological concerns altogether.

C. Farewell (15)

The connection between recommendation letters and the conventions of ancient friendship makes it interesting that 3 John closes by sending greetings from the "friends" (15). The term friend evokes also the typical language of the Fourth Gospel (John 15).

Although 3 John appears unconnected to the theological conflicts in 1 and 2 John, a theological bond connects all three works. 3 John works out in practical terms what 1 and 2 John address more abstractly. 1 and 2 John connect the love command to correct christology, while 3 John associates the spread of true teaching with hospitality among believers. By supporting traveling missionaries, Gaius actualizes the connection between love for others and the preservation of the truth. Thus, a common theological emphasis is clear throughout 1–3 John

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. C. Black. "1, 2, & 3 John." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998) 12:363–470; R. E. Brown. The Epistles of John. AB 30 (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1982); J. Lieu. The Theology of the Johannine Epistles. New Testament Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); D. Rensberger. 1 John, 2 John, 3 John. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon, 1997).

JUDE

STEVEN KRAFTCHICK

OVERVIEW

Because of its brevity, oblique style, and harshness of tone, Jude presents interpretive challenges. In its few verses one finds references to ancient traditions (vv. 6, 9, 14–15), an apostolic prophecy (vv. 17–18), and a mysterious set of false teachers (e.g. vv. 4, 12–13, 16, 19). This is a letter not penned in the calm of theological reflection, but as an intervention to protect the "common salvation" from forces that would destroy it.

Most pointedly Jude wanted to reveal the error of those who displayed an arrogant disrespect for God (vv. 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 15) and the ethical consequences of their false beliefs. In this writer's calculus, purity is related directly to fidelity: right belief results in godly obedience while false belief necessarily manifests itself in acts of immorality. Thus Jude writes to warn against the danger of self-delusion, especially of confusing the church's status as one of privilege rather than responsibility. Because the narrow difference between faithfulness and infidelity is easily missed, Jude calls the church to a life of self-scrutiny, which requires a diligent pursuit of truth and obedience (cf. vv. 4, 20–23).

The problems cited in the letter were typical of the early Gentile church, and the characterization of the "intruding" teachers is created from stock religious polemic, making the dating of the letter difficult. The author purports to be the brother of Jesus (v. 1), which would mean a date sometime between 50–70 CE. If "Jude" is a pseudonym, then the exhortations to contend for the "faith" as received (v. 3) and "to remember the apostolic predictions" about the end times (v. 17) point to a second or third generation church community and a later date. Since Jude was a source for 2 Peter (see 2 Peter 2:1–6; 10a–18), an upper limit for composition would be 100 CE.

OUTLINE

I. Greeting and Prescript (1–2)

II. The Letter's Themes (vv. 3–4)

III. Three Examples of Disobedience (5–7)

IV. Disobedience of the Intruders (8)

IV. Obedient Archangel Michael Contrasted to the Arrogant Intruders (9–10)

VI. Three Examples of Disobedience (11)

VII. The Moral Identity of the Intruders Exposed (12–13)

VII. Prophetic Judgments of the Disobedient (14–19)

VIII. Exhortation to Faithfulness (20–23)

IX. Concluding Doxology (24–25)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

The author calls himself "Jude, the brother of James" (v. 1), a reference to "Lord's brother" (Mark 6:3), who was a leader of the Jerusalem church. The letter begins with a conventional salutation and a wish for peace (vv. 1–2) among those God has called, but the tone shifts abruptly in v. 3 when the author urgently states the reasons for writing: to contend for the truth in thought and action. Although Jude desired to write about "our common salvation," he found it necessary to redirect his letter and initiate a "contention for the faith" (v. 3, author's trans.). It had come to his attention that false teachers were threatening the existence of the congregation by denying "the authority of God and Christ" (v. 4, author's trans.), and so wishing to warn his audience but fearing that they would not perceive the danger these teachers posed, the author changed his letter from one of exhortation to warning in order to reveal the false nature of the intruding teachers' belief and behavior. This is done in the starkest and most acerbic of terms. Throughout the letter Jude presents the opponents as immoral deceivers bent on destroying the truth. They are described not simply as present but as "intruders" (v. 4) who are polluting the community's worship (v. 12). They do not just hold alternative understandings of the gospel, but they "defile the flesh" (v. 8), "slander whatever they do not understand" (v. 10), and follow their own ungodly desires (vv. 15, 16, 18). They are devoid of substance, "waterless clouds," "trees without fruit," and "wandering stars" (vv. 12–13) who delude themselves with specious references to spirituality (v. 19). The author further isolates the opposition by the strategic use of impersonal pronouns ("these/these people," vv. 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 19), which results in their objectification as a malevolent and insidious influence that sates itself at the expense of the community's health and wholeness (vv. 12, 19). In contrast, the audience is referred to warmly as those "who are beloved" or "loved by God" (vv. 1, 3, 17, 20, 21). As such they have been given a status maintained by God's grace (v. 24) and sustained in their willing acceptance of responsible care for God's people and purpose (vv. 20–23). The implication of the author's portrayals is obvious: he hopes that once the congregation recognizes the true nature of the teachers and remembers its own identity, it will understand the threat posed by the intruders and expunge them from its midst.

The author gives substance to his depictions of the intruders with three examples of disobedience drawn from Israel's past (vv. 5–7). Comparing the intruders to those who murmured in the wilderness (Num 14:1–35), the angels who mated with humans (Gen 6: 1–4, cf. 1 Enoch 6–19), and the Sodomites who attempted to rape angelic messengers (Gen 19:4–11), Jude reveals the base nature of the false teachers (v. 8). This is contrasted with the faithful allegiance demonstrated by the archangel Michael when he disputed the devil's claim to Moses' corpse (Testament of Moses). A second set of examples compares the teachers to Cain, Balaam, and Korah (v. 11), archetypes of those who defy the ordinances of God. The argument concludes with references to the prophetic witness of Enoch (vv. 14–16; cf. 1 Enoch 1:9) and the original apostles (vv. 17–19), both of whom anticipated the apostasy the false teachers represent. The author thus presents a cohesive argument against the intruders, revealing the nature of their disobedience and its consequences both in present forms of immorality (vv. 8, 11, 18) and future judgment (vv. 14–15). The letter draws to a close with an exhortation to his audience to persist in their own faithfulness (vv. 20–23; see v. 3) and to trust in God who will deliver them from the present trial and evils intrinsic in this world (vv. 24–25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. J. Harrington and D. Senior. 1 Peter, Jude and 2 Peter. SP 15 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2003); R. J. Bauckham. Jude, 2 Peter. WBC 50 (Waco: Word Books, 1983); S. J. Kraftchick. Jude/2 Peter. ANTC (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2002).

THE REVELATION TO JOHN

JUDITH L. KOVACS

OVERVIEW

"Hallelujah! the kingdom of this world is become, the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever." These words, set to glorious music in Handel's Messiah, have inspired generations of Christians. Many who sing them would be surprised to learn that they come from the Revelation to John (19:16; 11:15), a book better known for its visions of world cataclysm than for its promise of a perfect world centered on worship of the divine creator. For many readers the essence of the book is the three plague sequences of the seven seals, trumpets, and bowls. Interpretations of the book in music and art, however, remind us that these images of destruction are framed by scenes of divine order, peace, and blessing (Rev 4–5; 21–22) and punctuated by stirring hymns and scenes of worship.

Historical Context. As is the case with many other biblical books, we know nothing about the author or the addressees of Revelation except for what we can infer from the book itself, namely that the author was an early Christian prophet named John, who experienced visions on Patmos (1:9), an island off the western coast of Asia Minor (modern Turkey). According to a tradition that goes back to church fathers in the second century, John is the son of Zebedee, one of the twelve closest followers of Jesus, who also composed the Gospel and Letters of John. This attribution seems unlikely, among other reasons because the son of Zebedee, a fisherman from Galilee (Mark 1:19), is unlikely to have written a book in Greek. Also the author never calls himself an "apostle," and when he speaks of the "twelve apostles" as the foundation of the New Jerusalem (21:14) he suggests no connection with himself. Further, there are marked differences in style and theological emphasis between Revelation and John's Gospel.

The prophet John addresses his book to seven Christian communities in cities on or near the western coast of Asia Minor: Ephesus and Smyrna on the coast, to the east of Patmos, and the other five in the interior (1:4, 14; chs. 2–3). If John was an itinerant prophet, the order of the messages may reflect his circuit, running north from Ephesus to Smyrna and Pergamum, then heading south through Thyatira, Sardis, and Philadelphia to Laodicea. From early times the book has been thought to date from the late first century, in the latter part of the rule of the emperor Domitian (81–96), and this receives support from internal evidence (see on 17:1–6).

John addresses his readers: "I, John, your brother who share with you in Jesus the persecution and the kingdom and the patient endurance." (1:1, author's trans.) Based on this verse as well as scattered references to persecution (e.g. 2:13; 17:6), it has often been assumed that Revelation is a martyr text whose main concern is to offer consolation to a persecuted church, but there is actually little evidence of extensive persecution of Christians in the first century. More likely is that John expects increased persecution in the near future. The book's message is not, however, confined to exhortations to passive endurance or comfort in the face of persecution. John also writes to alert Christians to a less obvious danger, the threat to their faith posed by normal life in the Roman Empire and the ideology that supports it. He challenges his audience to active resistance, not in the form of armed revolt, but as courageous witness to Christ, the "Lamb that was slain." Underlying the concrete realities of daily life, the book argues, is a life-and-death struggle between God and Satan; and the Roman Empire, the power that dominates political, social, and economic life, is on the side of Satan. John challenges his audience to witness to the sovereignty of God and Christ and refuse to participate in any activity that is in opposition to Christ, which might include not only obvious affronts such as offering divine honors to the emperor but also the more everyday activities such as participating in trade associations that have a connection to pagan gods. (See on Rev 13 and 17).

Biblical Context. John's Revelation is unusual in its style and literary genre (see on 1:1), but there is much that connects its teaching to the rest of the Bible. In every chapter, John's visions are informed by the traditions and images of the OT. Understanding this background provides a richer appreciation of the book's message and the resonance of its symbols. Three parts of the tradition are particularly important:

(1) The exodus from Egypt. First is the exodus, his most important salvific event in the OT, which brought the people of Israel into being as a covenant people. The rescue from slavery in Egypt is narrated in Exodus 3–15, recalled again and again in the OT, and celebrated by Jews throughout the centuries in the festival of Passover. According to Exod, Pharaoh's decision to let the Israelite slaves go is brought about by means of ten plagues visited on the Egyptians. The book of Revelation also teaches that redemption—in this case eschatological redemption—will be preceded by suffering inflicted on the enemies of God (see on 6:1–17; 8:2–9:21; 16:1–21). A key event in the exodus, the crossing of a great sea (Exod 14), is celebrated in the "song of Moses" (Exod 15). In Revelation God's triumph over his enemies is celebrated in the "song of Moses . . . and of the Lamb" (15:3–4), sung by his victorious people who stand by a "sea of glass" in heaven. Also reminiscent of the exodus is the dominant christological title, "the Lamb," which recalls the festival of the Passover in Exod 12, when Israelites were commanded to sacrifice of the Passover lamb. The exodus from Egypt is followed by the giving of the Law of Moses on Mount Sinai (Exod 20–Deut 34), preceded by a theophany in which God's presence is signaled by thunder, lightning, smoke, earthquake, and trumpet blast (Exod 19). Revelation uses similar imagery to describe the awesome nature of God's presence (Rev 4:5; 8:1–5; 15:5–8).

(2) The Davidic monarchy and the Temple in Jerusalem. Revelation also presupposes OT traditions about the Davidic monarchy and the Temple in Jerusalem. Only three kings ruled over all of the twelve tribes of Israel—Saul, David, and Solomon—but this period of their rule (ca. 1020–922 BCE) had enormous influence on Israelite religion and politics. David, the greatest king Israel ever had, conquered the city of Jerusalem and made it his capital, the center of a strong state whose boundaries were the largest Israel ever achieved. In later centuries, people looked back to the time of David as the golden age; and when Israel was weaker, prophets expressed their hope for a better future by looking for a "messiah," i.e. an "anointed one," who would be like David, a strong political and religious leader. Revelation, like all NT books, expresses the belief that Jesus Christ is the expected "messiah, son of David," come to rescue his people (5:5; 22:16). Echoing the royal Ps 2, which speaks of the Davidic king's triumph over the enemies of Israel, Revelation presents Jesus as the "lion of the tribe of Judah"(cf. Gen 49:9) who through his death has "conquered" (5:5) and who will return to complete his victory over the "kings of the earth" (12:5,10; 19:15).

Closely associated with the Davidic monarchy is the Temple in Jerusalem. Built by David's son Solomon, it became the center of Israelite worship and a powerful symbol of the special presence of God with his chosen people. The exaltation of Jerusalem and its Temple on Mount Zion, is evident in many strands of the OT, for example in the Psalms: "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised/in the city of our God. / His holy mountain . . . / is the joy of all the earth, / Mount Zion" (Ps 48:1; cf. Ps 84:1). While only one passage in Revelation (11:1–3) speaks of the Temple in Jerusalem (which was destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE), imagery from the Jerusalem Temple pervades the scenes of worship in the heavenly temple that punctuate John's narrative (Rev 4:1–5:13; 8:1–5; 11:19; 15:5–8).

(3) Prophetic traditions. John refers to his book as prophecy (1:3; 10:17; 22:19), and the influence of the OT prophets is evident throughout the book. Central to the message of the OT prophets is the proclamation of God's judgment and redemption, as it is revealed in the history of Israel. These themes are also prominent in Revelation, which announces that the time of God's final judgment is at hand (11:18; 16:7; 19:2; 20:11–15) and offers in the plague sequences a vivid portrayal of God's judgment on the wicked. John celebrates the redemption of a new people for God through Jesus Christ (1:5–6; 5:9–10), and he looks forward to the completion of this work of salvation in the New Jerusalem (21:1–22:7), where death will be no more and God will dwell with his "peoples" (21:3)

From the OT prophets, John inherited a rich tradition of symbols. Prophets such as Hosea, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel spoke of the intimate relation between God and his covenant people by comparing it to a marriage, in which Israel played the part of the wife. In prophetic poetry Israel appears variously: as beloved wife, expressing God's special love for her, and also as adulteress and whore, symbolizing her lack of faithfulness to the covenant (Hos 1–3; Jer 2–3; Ezek 23). Another common feature of prophetic symbolism is the personification of the capital cities of Israel and her enemies (e.g. Babylon) as women whose varying status symbolizes the fate of the people (Ezek 23; Isa 54; 60; Jer 50–51). Revelation employs both types of symbolism when it portrays Babylon (a code name for Rome) as a great whore (Rev 17–18) and Jerusalem as the bride of the Lamb (Rev 19–21). Another prominent image in Revelation, the beast from the sea (Rev 13), reflects an ancient tradition of portraying the chief enemy of God as a sea monster (e.g. Dan 7; Job 41; Isa 27:1; 51:9–11). By using ancient imagery to depict the situation of Christians in the first century CE, John ties the church's story to the long history of the people of God.

Literary Techniques. John tells us his book is based on visions experienced on the island of Patmos; this connects his work with other vision accounts in the NT (see, e.g., 2 Cor 12:1–4; Matt 3:16–17, Acts 7:54–56; 9:1–9). But features of the book such as asides to the reader (13:18) and cross references suggest that when John turned his recollections of what was shown to him into a book, he made use of a number of literary techniques to organize and interpret his material. These include the following:

(1) First is the use of the number seven as an organizing principle, for example the seven messages to the churches in Rev 2–3 and the three series of seven plagues in Rev 6–9 and 15–16. In the ancient Mediterranean world seven appears frequently as a symbol of completion or perfection.

(2) Second is the deliberate repetition of themes and images. This presents a challenge for interpreters who try to read the book as a blueprint for eschatological events that will follow one after another exactly as depicted. Take, for example, the picture of the last battle, the final act in the conflict of the armies of God with the forces of evil. In the popular imagination this is often referred to as the battle of Armageddon, a name that derives from the sixth bowl vision of in 16:12–16, which pictures the marshalling of armies "for the great day of God the Almighty." The seventh bowl vision (16:17–20) goes on to describe the destruction of Babylon and the fall of the cities of the nations. One might think that the book has reached its climax and that the description of the New Jerusalem would follow. But the next chapter envisions a still standing city/lady of Babylon riding on the beast and predicts that the Lamb will make war on the beast (17:14). Another picture of the last battle follows in 19:11–21 when Christ returns as a rider on a white horse to "judge and make war," with a coda in 20:1–9 when the dragon (Satan) is imprisoned only to be released and defeated again.

A more obvious example of repetition is the portrayal of divine judgment through three separate series of seven plagues each. The book is more profitably read not as a blueprint of end time events but as a poetic work that appeals to the emotions as well as the mind, moving and instructing the reader through the heaping up of vivid images.

(3) Another literary technique is the use of interludes that separate two sections that belong together. For example, between the sixth seal (6:12–17) and the seventh (8:1–6) John inserts a vision of the 144,000 who are sealed by the Lamb, a scene of calm and triumph in the midst of the dramatic unfolding of the plagues. Similarly, between the sixth and seventh trumpets (9:13–20; 11: 15–19) John has inserted a description of John's commission to "prophesy again" (10:1–11) and a narrative of two mysterious witnesses (11:1–14), both of which portray the situation of Christians in the present. This technique of interweaving connects different blocks of material and also gives particular emphasis to the interludes and to the penultimate member of the interrupted series.

(4) A fourth technique is the juxtaposition of heavenly and earthly scenes. In ch. 12, for example, the story of the woman clothed with the sun (12:1–6; 13–17) is interrupted by a vision of a heavenly battle in which the archangel Michael defeats the great dragon (Satan). The events are interconnected: Satan is cast out of heaven and the battle spreads to earth as the dragon pursues the woman and her messianic child. A central claim of Revelation is that for true understanding of what is going on in the present, an apocalypse, a revelation of heavenly truth, is required. This is also illustrated in chs. 2–6. Chapters 2–3, the messages to churches, portray the present situation of Christians in seven churches in ancient Asia Minor; then in 4:1 the scene suddenly shifts as John see a door open in heaven. Taken up, he gets a glimpse of what is really real (4:1–5:13). Then, with the opening of the seven seals (6:1– 13), John's vision returns to earth, as God's plans for the consummation of human history begin to unfold.

Central Themes. The juxtaposition of heavenly and earthly scenes is more than a literary technique. it is also provides a clue to the central message of the book. When John goes through the door into heaven (4:1), what he learns is the nature of the other level of reality that underlies and is at the heart of what happens on earth. In the sights and sounds of the divine throne room he glimpses the sure reality of God's kingship over all, acknowledged by countless heavenly powers who bow in adoration before him. The three plague sequences, which describe God's righteous judgment on human sin, are framed by Rev 4–5 on the one hand and Rev 21–22 on the other. The plotline of the book goes from the present situation when God's rule is celebrated in heaven but hidden on earth—where it is obscured by the activity of Satan and the weakness of God's earthly witnesses—to a "new heaven and a new earth" (21:1), where God's kingship is universally recognized.

A second theme, in counterpoint to the first, creates narrative tension: the revelation or "unmasking" of the true nature of the reality faced by Christians in the present time, viz. the potent nature of evil powers on earth. Seeing this requires revelation—heavenly insight—for the powers of evil are deceptive and seductive (Rev 12:9; 13:14; 17:1–5; 18:23). Apparent virtues, such as acting as good citizens of the Roman Empire, might actually involve service of Satan. The powers of evil are involved in a life-or-death struggle with the Lamb. The challenge addressed to the seven churches is to take sides: to recognize that in the concrete events of their daily lives the eschatological battle has begun and to have the courage to enroll in the winning side, the army of the Lamb, whatever the cost.

Related to both these themes is a third, encapsulated in two scenes at the end of the book. In 19:9–10 and 22:8–9 John, overwhelmed by all he has seen and heard, prostrates himself before the angel who has mediated his revelation, only to be admonished: "You must not do that! . . .Worship God!" John's apocalypse is an invitation to worship the only true God and a strong warning against false worship (see especially 13:3–17; 9:20; 14:9–11 16:2; 19:20). The reward for those who are victorious in the battle against evil is not only the absence of sorrow, trouble, and death (21:4) but also the joy of worshiping God: "But the throne of God and of the Lamb will be in [the city], and his servants will worship him; they will see his face" (22:3–4).

OUTLINE

I. Introduction (1:1–20)

1:1–3. Prologue

1:4–8. Salutation

1:9–11. Author and Setting

1:12–16. Vision of the Son of Man

1:17–20: Christ Commissions John

II. Messages to the Seven Churches (2:1–3:22)

- 2:1–7. To the Church in Ephesus
- 2:8–11. To the Church in Smyrna
- 2:12–17. To the Church in Pergamum
- 2:18–29. To the Church in Thyatira
- 3:1–6. To the Church in Sardis
- 3:7–13. To the Church in Philadelphia
- 3:14–22. To the Church in Laodicea

III. God's Kingship Acknowledged in Heaven (4:1–5:14)

- 4:1–7. The Heavenly Throne Room
- 4:8–11. Worship of God by the Heavenly Host
- 5:1–7. The Lamb Appears to Open the Scroll
- 5:8–14. Worship of the Lamb

IV. First Cycle of Seven Plagues (6:1–17; 8:1–6)

- 6:1–8. Seals 1–4: The Four Horsemen
- 6:9–11. Seal 5: Cry of the Martyrs
- 6:12–17. Seal 6: Cosmic Upheaval

V. Interlude: Sealing of the Elect (7:1–17)

- 7:1–8. Sealing of the 144,000
- 7:9–17. The Multitude from Every Nation

VI. Second Cycle of Seven Plagues (8:1–9:21; 11:15–19)

- 8:1–6. Seal 7 and Distribution of 7 Trumpets
- 8:7–13. Trumpets 1–4
- 9:1–12. Trumpet 5
- 9:13–21. Trumpet 6
- (11:15–19. Trumpet 7)

VII. Interlude: The Situation on Earth (10:1–11:19)

- 10:1–11. The Little Scroll: John's Second Prophetic Commission
- 11:1–2. Measuring the Temple
- 11:3–14. The Two Witnesses
- 11:15–19. Trumpet 7: A Hymn of Victory

VIII. Combatants in the Final Battle (12:1–14:20)

- 12:1–6. The Woman Clothed with the Sun and Her Child
- 12:7–9. The Great Dragon Defeated by the Angel Michael
- 12:10–12. Hymn Celebrating Victory in Heaven
- 12:13–17. The Dragon Attacks the Woman
- 12:18–13:10. The Beast from the Sea
- 13:11–18. The Beast from the Land
- 14:1–5. The Lamb and the 144,000
- 14:6–13. Messages of Three Angels
- 14:14–20. Harvest of the Son Of Man

IX. Third Cycle of Seven Plagues (15:1–16:21)

- 15:1–4. Preparation in Heaven: The Song of Moses
- 15:5–8. Seven Bowls Prepared in the Heavenly Temple
- 16:1–11. Bowls 1–5 Poured out on Earth
- 16:12–16. Bowl 6: Armageddon
- 16:17–21. Bowl 7: Babylon Destroyed

X. The Whore of Babylon and Her Destruction (17:1–19:10)

- 17:1–6. Vision of the Whore of Babylon
- 17:7–17. Explanation of the Vision
- 18:1–3. An Angel Celebrates the Fall of Babylon
- 18:4–8. Call to Come out of Babylon
- 18:9–20. Kings, Merchants, and Sailors Lament Babylon's Fall
- 18:21–24. Angel Predicts Fall of Babylon
- 19:1–10. Hallelujah!: A Hymn Celebrates the Coming of the Kingdom of God

XI. The Completion of God's Kingdom (19:11–22:7)

19:11–16. The Second Coming of Christ as the Rider on a White Horse
19:17–21. The Last Battle: Defeat of the Two Beasts
20:1–6. The Millennium: Satan Imprisoned While the Martyrs Rule for 1,000 Years
20:7–10. Satan Released and Defeated
20:11–15. The Last Judgment
21:1–8. The New Jerusalem: Establishment of God's Kingdom
21:9–27. Description of the City
22:1–7. The City as Paradise

XII. Epilogue (22:8–21)

DETAILED ANALYSIS

"The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave him to show his servants what must soon take place" (1:1). The best known parts of Revelation are the eschatological events signaled in v. 1 by "what soon must take place": the scenes of judgment and redemption that begin with the seven seals in ch. 6 and conclude with the glorious picture of the New Jerusalem in chs. 21–22. But these chapters are to be read in the context the first five chapters, which provide important clues for understanding the message of this eschatological scenario. These chapters identify the book's author, its intended recipients, and its purpose.

I. Introduction (1:1–20)

1:1–3. Prologue. The first word of the book, "revelation" or "apocalypse" (Gk.: apokalypsis), indicates the origin and authority of what follows. This is the only time "apocalypse" is used in the book. The original meaning of the word is not, as in common English usage, the cataclysmic end of the world, but an "unveiling"; a means to insight into the past, present, and future; an alternative vision to the normal perception of reality. John's book has provided the name for a literary genre represented by Jewish apocalypses written in the last centuries BCE and in first century CE, including Dan 7–12, the Apocalypse of Abraham, the Apocalypse of Moses, 1 Enoch, and 2 Esd (= 4. Ezra), as well other Jewish and early Christian works. Characteristics of this genre include: a two-level view of reality in which heavenly and earthly events are closely linked, a narrative framework within which the secrets of heaven and God's eschatological purposes are revealed, cosmic dualism, description of ascents to heaven and the final battle between the armies of God and Satan, elaborate images and symbols, and the mediation of revelation through angels. John also calls his book a prophecy (1:3; cf. 10:11; 22:19). Although he does not quote directly from prophetic books, the influence of earlier prophetic traditions is evident throughout the book (see Overview, Biblical Context).

1:4–8. Salutation. John's opening greeting to the seven churches contains a three-fold description of Jesus Christ as "the faithful witness, the firstborn of the dead, and the ruler of the kings of the earth," celebrating his sacrificial death, his resurrection from the dead, and his kingly power. The first two titles recall Paul's summary of the gospel as proclamation of the saving events of Jesus' death on the cross and his resurrection (1 Cor 15:3–7). The word translated "witness," martyrs, later took on technical meaning of "martyr," one who dies for a cause. Testify and testimony in 1:2 are from the same Greek root, and witnessing is an important theme throughout Revelation. The third title, "ruler of the kings of the earth," indicates Christ's future role as universal ruler and judge. Revelation is much concerned with kingship and kingdom. It celebrates the kingship of God and Christ the Lamb, presently acknowledged by the hosts of heaven (4:1–5) and soon to be clearly established over all the earth (19:11–22:5). In 1:6 the addresses of the book are described as God's "kingdom."

The reference in 1:1 to "what must soon take place" is given more specific content in 1:7, which speaks of Christ's "coming with the clouds," the first of several allusions to Dan 7. The salutation concludes with a direct address from God the Father: " 'I am the Alpha and the Omega', says the Lord God, who is and who was and who is to come, the Almighty" (1:8). The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, used to designate God's all-encompassing power, are repeated in another word of God at the end of the book (21:6), and in 22:13 Christ uses them of himself. From early on Alpha and Omega appear frequently in Christian art. Although Revelation does not call Jesus "God," as does John 1:1, its use of the same epithets for God the Father and Christ expresses a high Christology. The phrase "who is and who was and who is to come" (cf. 4:8; 11:17; 16:5), recalls the revelation of God's name to Moses at the burning bush as "I am who I am," alternately translated as "I will be what I will be" (Exod 3:14). God is in control of the world from beginning to end.

1:9–11. Author and Setting. The divine revelation is doubly mediated, through an angel (1:1) and the prophet John. John tells us little about himself, saying only that he was on the island of Patmos "because of the word of God" and that he shares "the persecution and the kingdom and the patient endurance" (1:9). The author is an otherwise unknown early Christian prophet (1:3), perhaps an itinerant prophet who traveled among the seven churches mentioned in Rev 2–3 (see Overview, Historical Context).

Artists such as the Limbourg Brothers and Hieronymus Bosch present John in exile on a tiny island, attended by an eagle. Ever since Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons in the late second century, interpreted the four living creatures in 4:7 as symbols of the four Evangelists, the eagle has been associated with the apostle John in Christian art (with the lion standing for Mark, the ox for Luke, and a man or angel for Matthew). John says that he was on Patmos for the sake of the "testimony of Jesus" (1:9); this is often interpreted to mean that he was exiled because of his preaching. John says he has experienced suffering for his Christian activity, using two terms that will be repeated in subsequent chapters, "persecution" (cf. 2:9, 10, 22; see on 7:14) and "patient endurance" (cf. 2:2, 3, 19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12), but he gives no details of his situation. His vision takes place on the Lord's Day (1:10), probably a reference to Sunday (see 1 Cor 16:2).

1:12–16. Vision of the Son of Man. Martin Luther initially relegated Revelation to a subordinate place within the NT canon, saying "Christ is not taught or known in it." This judgment is hard to square with the wealth of christological description in this opening vision and the prominence of Christ the Lamb in the rest of the book (and in fact Luther modified his view in later editions of his NT, after he recognized the book's usefulness for anti-Catholic polemic). Both the vision of 1:12–20 and the christological epithets in the preceding verses present Christ as a powerful, awe-inspiring figure, who deserves honor equal to that of God the creator.

Christ is portrayed as a "one like a Son of Man," a title for the expected eschatological judge and sovereign based on Dan 7:13–14 and used in all four gospels to refer to Christ's role at the end time (Mark 14:62 par.; John 5:27; cf. Rev 14:14). Between seven lampstands (explained in 1:20 as the heavenly counterparts of the seven churches) Christ appears in majestic form, with brilliant face, eyes like fire, and a deafening voice. In his hair like white wool he resembles God the "Ancient of days" in Dan 7:9. The two-edged sword issuing from his mouth (cf. 2:12, 16; 19:15, 21) is a warning of divine judgment.

The seven lampstands of 1:12 recall the menorahs that burn before God in the Jerusalem Temple (Exod 27:20–21)—the first of many examples of temple imagery in Revelation. Worship is seen as communion with heaven, in which the earthly saints join with the heavenly hosts in lauding God. The book's frequent mixing of past and present may reflect a liturgical sense of time, in which different times are inextricably linked.

1:17–20. Christ Commissions John. John's response of fright, a common motif in prophetic call visions (Isa 6:5; Ezek 1:28), prompts a word of reassurance. Christ proclaims that he is alive forever; he is the "first and the last" who holds the keys of Death and Hades. He commissions John to write "what you have seen, what is, and what is to take place after this." In addition to giving a glimpse of eschatological events, John's book is to unveil the true nature of present reality.

II. Messages to the Seven Churches (2:1–3:22)

In chs. 2–3 the heavenly Christ addresses individual messages to seven churches in Asia Minor. Speaking in the Spirit, he addresses them through their angelic counterparts, who resemble the angels in charge of nations or individuals in Jewish texts (Deut 32:8 LXX; Dan 10:13; 12:1; Jubilees 15:31–2; 1 Enoch 89: 59–62; cf. Matt 18:10). The messages provide important clues about the book's purpose. A reader who focuses only on the plague sequences in chs. 6–9 and 15 could assume that the book's only concern is to reassure Christians that God will wreak vengeance on their enemies. The seven messages make clear, however, that the book's warnings of God's impending judgment are in the first instance directed to a Christian audience.

The messages can be understood as modeled on letters or edicts. The letter was an important vehicle for early Christian teaching; 21 of the 27 books of the NT are called letters, and the letters of Paul and his followers were particularly influential. In their structure the seven messages resemble the edicts of ancient kings and emperors. All have a common form, including: (1) an address to the angel of each church, (2) a description of Christ as sender, (3) words of praise and/or blame, and (4) promises to "the one who conquers."

There are no criticisms in the messages to Smyrna (2:8–11) and Philadelphia (3:7–13), only praise and warnings of trials to come. The message to the church in Laodicea (3:14–22), on the other hand, consists entirely of criticism and a call to repent. In the other four messages praise is mixed with blame. While study of the culture and topography of the seven cities suggests John's familiarity with the situations of the various communities, much of the criticism and commendation is in very general terms. This has facilitated an interpretation, popular through the ages, that the seven churches typify the church as a whole. (Another popular interpretation has been to see them as symbols of the different epochs of church history or world history). More specific clues to the situation in the churches are given in the warnings against false teachers and references to suffering for the faith. Christ praises Christians who have patiently endured such trials and predicts that more trials will follow.

The seven messages look back to the opening vision of Christ as the glorious Son of Man and anticipate the themes of judgment and apocalyptic battle that figure prominently in the rest of the Apocalypse. Christ promises to subdue his followers' enemies at Philadelphia (3:9) but also to exercise judgment upon unfaithful Christians (3:19). He will "make war . . . with the sword of my mouth" on those Christians in Pergamum who follow the teaching of the Nicolaitans (2:16) and punish Jezebel and her followers in Thyatira (2:22–23 cf. 3:16). The reference to the devil who will attack Christians in Smyrna (2:10) prepares for descriptions of the last battle between the forces of God and Satan in chs. 12–20, as do the promises to "the one who conquers" that conclude each of the seven messages (2:7, 11, 17, 26; 3:5, 12, 21).

2:1–7. To the Church in Ephesus. Ephesus was the largest city of the Roman province of Asia, and Paul was active there (1 Cor 15:32; Acts 18:19–28; 19:1; 20:16–17). This message, like the other six, begins with a christological epithet. Most of these echo ch. 1, especially the vision of the glorious Son of Man. Christ describes himself as: (1) one who holds seven stars and walks among the lampstands (to Ephesus in 2:1, cf. 1:13, 16); (2) "the first and the last, who was dead and came to life" (to Smyrna in 2:8, cf. 1:17–18); (3) holder of the "two-edged sword" (to Pergamum in 2:12 cf. 1:16); (4) as possessing "eyes like a flame" and feet of "burnished bronze" (to Thyatira in 2:18, cf. 1:14–15); (5) holding seven stars and seven spirits (to Sardis in 3:1; cf. 1:4, 16, 20); (6) is "the holy one, the true one who has the key of David / who opens and no one will shut, / who shuts and no one opens" (to Philadelphia in 3:7; cf. the keys of Death and Hades" in 1:18); (7) "the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the origin of God's creation" (to Laodicea in 3:14, cf. 1:17: "I am the first and the last"). Christians at Ephesus are praised for resisting "false teachers" and Nicolaitans, about whom we have no specific information (2:6; cf. 2:16).

2:8–11. To the Church in Smyrna. While several of the messages refer to suffering for the faith in a general way, the messages to Smyrna and Philadelphia speak more specifically of slander at the hands of the "synagogue of Satan" (2:9; 3:9), probably a reference to Jews bringing charges against Christians before Roman authorities. An example of such a case is narrated in Acts 18:12–17, which tells of Jews in Corinth bringing charges against Paul. Christ warns Christians in Smyrna that they will soon be tested by having to endure ten days in prison, and he exhorts them to be faithful unto death (2:10). Official, widespread persecution of Christians began only a century and half after the book of Revelation was written, under the emperor Decius. The experiences of persecution referred to in Revelation were of a sporadic and local nature, and one should not overemphasize the role that actual persecution played in the genesis of the book. The persecution of Christians is more something anticipated than already experienced.

2:12–17. To the Church in Pergamum. Pergamum was a large and prosperous city, whose native Attalid rulers built a splendid acropolis intended to rival that of Athens. Its temple of Augustus and Roma, built in 29 BCE, was an important center of the imperial cult. This may be the reference of "Satan's throne" (2:13); another possibility is that it refers to the magnificent altar of Zeus, built around 190 BCE and now occupying a large room in the Pergamum museum in Berlin. The message to Pergamum contains the book's only reference to a specific Christian who has died for the faith, a man named Antipas who, like Christ in 1:5, is called a faithful "witness" (martyr).

Several letters speak of false teachers, who are variously identified as "apostles" (2:2), Nicolaitans (2:6, 15), Balaam (2:14) and Jezebel (2:19–23), but John says little about their teachings, except that both Balaam and Jezebel persuade people to "eat food sacrificed to idols and to practice fornication" (2:14, 20). Both teachers are referred to by a pseudonym that associates them with figures from the OT. Numbers 22–24 presents Balaam positively as a pagan seer who refuses the command of a Moabite king to curse Israel, but in Num 31:8, 16 he is put to death for causing the Israelites to commit idolatry at Peor. An account of this idolatry was given in Num 25 immediately following the Balaam story. Several other biblical texts present Balaam in a negative light (Deut 23:4–5; Josh 13:22; Neh 13:2; 2 Pet 2:15–16; Jude 11).

2:18–29. To the Church in Thyatira. Christ castigates Christians in Thyatira for tolerating a prophet he calls "Jezebel," giving her the name of a villain from the OT. Jezebel was the Canaanite wife of Ahab, king of Israel in the eighth century BCE, who became a symbol of idolatry because she persuaded Ahab to sanction the worship of other gods besides the God of Israel (1 Kgs 18–19; 2 Kgs 9). By calling the teachers in Pergamum and Thyatira "Balaam" and "Jezebel" Christ warns first-century Christians that they face dangers similar to those of their Israelite ancestors. It is likely that "fornication" refers not to sexual sins but rather to the worship of other gods, following the usage of OT prophets, who describe Israel's idolatry as "whoring after other gods" (see, e.g., Jer 2; Hos 2). Christ gives stern warning against any compromise with the dominant Greco-Roman religious cult. The phrase "food sacrificed to idols" (2:20; cf. 2:14) suggests that certain teachers active in the churches at Thyatira and Pergamum were encouraging a more relaxed attitude. We know from Acts 15 and 1 Cor 8 and 10 that it was a matter of debate among early Christians whether they could eat meat from animals slaughtered in pagan rituals, much of which was sold in the ordinary markets. According to Acts 15:20, 29, an early meeting of Christian leaders in Jerusalem forbade eating such meat, but Paul says that there is nothing intrinsically wrong with this as long as it does not involve the intent to worship of pagan gods (1 Cor 8:4–8; 10:23–27).

3:1–6. To the Church in Sardis. Members of the church at Sardis are exhorted to "wake up!" and repent. As in all the other messages, those who "conquer"—that is who play their part in the eschatological battle against Satan—are promised blessings. As the christological epithets in the messages relate back to the opening vision of ch. 1, so these promises at the end of the messages anticipate themes from later visions of the last battle, the resurrection of the dead, and the New Jerusalem in 19:11–22:5. These promises include: (1) eating from the tree of life (2:7, cf. 22:2); (2) not being harmed by the second death (2:11, cf. 20:14; 21:8); (3) hidden manna and a white stone (2:17); (4) ruling with a rod of iron (2:27; used of Christ in 12:5) and the morning star (2:28, used of Christ in 22:16); (5) white robes (3:5; 6:11; 7:9, 13; 19:14) and a name written in the book of life (3:5; cf. 20:15; 21:27; 13:8; 17:8); (6) becoming a pillar in the temple of God (3:12); (7) possessing God's name (3:12, cf. 22:4; 14:1) and the name of the New Jerusalem that comes down out of heaven (cf. 21:2); (8) a place on Christ's throne (3:21; cf. 20:4).

3:7–13. To the Church in Philadelphia. Although Christ has no words of blame for Christians at Philadelphia, he warns of the "hour of trial that is coming on the whole world" (3:10). Here and elsewhere in the book—most notably in the three plague sequences of chs. 6–9 and 16—is reflected a tradition common in Jewish apocalypses, the "messianic woes," that is a time of great suffering expected right before the advent of the kingdom of God (see on Rev 6). Christ identifies himself as the one who holds the "key of David" (3:7), a symbol of his messianic power.

3:14–22. To the Church in Laodicea. The description of this church as neither hot nor cold but "lukewarm" has found much resonance, as interpreters through the ages have seen therein a reference to their own context. The Christians in Laodicea are exhorted to "buy" gold and white robes (both of which symbolize purity) and salve for their eyes. The last item is an example of how the messages reflect local realities; the medical school at Laodicea was known for its eye ointment. Verse 19 makes clear that the judgment of which Revelation speaks applies to Christians as well as outsiders: "I reprove and discipline those whom I love." The immediate relevance of the warnings and promises in the seven messages is highlighted in Christ's proclamation in 3:20: "Listen! I am standing at the door, knocking; if you hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to you and eat with you, and you with me."

III. God's Kingship Acknowledged in Heaven (4:1–5:14)

4:1–7. The Heavenly Throne Room. After the messages to the seven churches, which ground the book in a concrete situation, there is an abrupt shift of scene in 4:1. John sees a door opening into heaven and hears a voice instructing him to come up to see "what soon must take place" (author's trans.). This signals the book's central message: that behind ordinary human experience there is a something higher and deeper, and this is what ultimately matters. What John sees and hears in this chapter is not the timetable of eschatological events but the supreme reality that underlies past, present, and future: the glory of God the creator. The message that there are two distinct but closely connected levels of reality—earthly and heavenly—is something John's book shares with other apocalypses. Their claim is that a privileged glimpse of the higher level is required in order to understand ordinary experience, for example the experience of Jews troubled by the Romans' destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE (the situation the concerns the seer in 2 Esdras) or the challenges faced by seven fledgling churches in Asia Minor.

Interest in visions of God and God's throne is a central component of Jewish mysticism, from the return from exile in Babylon down to the Hasidic movements in our own day. In several Jewish apocalypses (e.g. 1 Enoch 14, Apocalypse of Abraham 11–18) an ascent to heaven is followed by a vision of God dependent on Ezek 1 and Isa 6. Short of the eschaton, describing God's throne is a way of talking about what cannot be fully seen or expressed. In the eighth century BCE Isaiah receives his prophetic commission during a vision of God enthroned in the holy of holies of the Jerusalem Temple (Isa 6:1–13), where the wings of two enormous creatures called cherubim covered the ark of the covenant and formed the symbolic throne of God (1 Kgs 6:23–28; 8:6–7; 2 Kgs 19:15). Ezekiel, living in exile in Babylon in the sixth century BCE describes in detail his vision of the divine throne, which appears as a fiery chariot, and of the four "living creatures"—half human and half animal—on whose wings the throne is carried (Ezek 1:1–28). He describes the divine figure seated on the throne with great reserve: "something that seemed like a human form"; fire, lightning, amber, and a splendid rainbow symbolize God's awe-inspiring presence (Ezek. 1:26–28).

In Revelation, as in the Jewish apocalypses to which it is akin, much of the symbolism is traditional, adapted from prophetic books and earlier apocalypses. This is evident in Rev 4, where many of the images from Ezek 1 reappear: the glory of God is symbolized by precious stones, flashes of fire, lightning, and thunder, and his majestic throne is surrounded by a rainbow, a crystal sea and four "living creatures." In Ezek 1 each of the living creatures has four faces, which resemble a human being, a lion, an ox, and an eagle respectively; in John's vision each of the four creatures resembles one of these four. The transformation of Ezekiel's image continues in later Christian tradition; ever since the church father Irenaeus interpreted the human being, lion, ox, and eagle as symbols of the four Evangelists (Against the Heresies 3.11.8), these images have been used in Christian art to represent Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, respectively.

Features of John's vision not paralleled in Ezek 1 are the seven flaming torches, identified as the seven spirits of God (cf. 1:4), and twentyfour elders dressed in white and wearing golden crowns. While it is not clear what these beings represent—possibly heavenly counterparts of the twelve tribes of Israel and the twelve apostles—they have captured Christian imagination, appearing for example on the portals of medieval cathedrals, along with the four living creatures.

4:8–11. Worship of God by the Heavenly Host. In v. 8 visual imagery gives way to sounds, as the living creatures initiate an unending song of praise, the first of many hymns that punctuate the book's visions: "Holy holy, holy, / the Lord God the Almighty; / who was and is and is to come." The triple sanctus, which first appears on the lips of seraphim in Isaiah's Temple vision (Isa 6:3), has echoed through the centuries in Christian liturgy and hymns. The sound is magnified as the twenty-four elders join in the praise of God as creator, prostrating themselves before the throne and casting down their crowns.

5:1–7. The Lamb Appears to Open the Scroll. Although Revelation owes much to the conventions and imagery of Jewish apocalyptic, ch. 5 makes clear that this is a Christian book. Continuing the vision of God's heavenly throne room, it portrays the "one seated on the throne" holding a scroll. Written on both sides and sealed with seven seals, it symbolizes God's plans for the eschaton, the consummation of world history. A search in heaven and earth finds no one worthy to open the scroll, which leads the prophet John to weep bitterly. One of the twenty-four elders consoles him: "See the Lion of tribe of Judah, the Root of David, has conquered, so that he can open the scroll and its seven seals." This description encapsulates a christological claim made throughout the NT: that Jesus came as the messiah ("anointed one") from the line of David (see, e.g. Matt 1:1; Luke 1:26–33; Rom 1:3; Acts 2:30–32). "Lion of Judah" is a messianic title that goes back to Gen 49:8–12, where the patriarch Jacob prophesies that a "lion" will arise from the tribe of Judah (from which king David came), triumph over his enemies, and rule his brothers; the "root of David" (cf. 22:16) echoes other messianic prophecies (Isa 11:1, 10; Jer 23:5).

Verse 6 introduces the christological title that will dominate the rest of Revelation: the Lamb of God. He has conquered not, as expected for the Davidic messiah, by military conquest (see e.g. Ps 2), but through his faithful death, a sacrifice that ransomed and redeemed a people coming from every tribe and nation (5:9). This title is less common in the NT, being reflected outside of Revelation only in John 1:29, 36 and 1 Pet 1:19 (in both texts a different Greek word for "lamb" is used) and 1 Cor 5:7, where Paul says: "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." The latter text suggests that the title has its background in the sacrifice of the Passover lamb (Exod 12); it may also recall the twice daily sacrifice of a lamb in the Temple in Jerusalem (Exod 29:38–42; Josephus, Antiquities 3.237–247). In Acts 8:32 Jesus is identified as the "lamb silent before its shearer" of Isa 53, a passage that became important in later Christian interpretation of Christ's death. The Lamb John sees has seven horns and seven eyes (5:6), the eyes suggesting his omniscience and the horns the power he will exhibit as the book unfolds.

The awkwardness the juxtaposition of "Lion" and "Lamb" points to the unique eschatological reality to which John bears witness. Experience of Christ as Lamb has affected normal apocalyptic conventions, and hitherto accepted patterns of discourse are shattered along with the understanding of the course of history. As John looks on, the Lamb appears before the divine throne and receives the scroll from God. The divine plan for the eschaton, begun in the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, is about to be brought to completion.

5:8–14. Worship of the Lamb. The significance of the appearing of the Lamb is made clear through a series of hymns, as an ever-widening chorus celebrates his power and wisdom. The living creatures join the twenty-four elders, carrying bowls of incense that symbolize the prayers of Christians and praising his sacrificial death that has ransomed a people for God and made them a kingdom and a priesthood (cf. 1:5–6). They are joined by an enormous company of 10,000 times 10,000 angels, who sing: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slaughtered/to receive power and wealth and wisdom and might/and honor and glory and blessing!" The sound becomes deafening as all earthly creatures join the heavenly song. The narrative that follows will be punctuated with visions of the divine throne room (7:9–17; 8:1–5; 11:15–19; 14:2–3; 15:2–8; 19:1–10; 21:3–8), a reminder that the kingship of God and of the Lamb is fully established in heaven and soon to be established over all who dwell on earth.

IV. First Cycle of Seven Plagues (6:1–17; 8:1–6)

Chapter 6 begins one of three sequences of seven plagues each (seals, 6:1–17; 8:1–2, trumpets, 8:2–9:21; 11:15–19, and bowls, 16:1–21). These ordered, enumerated pronouncements of woe on an unrepentant world reflect a widespread Jewish and early Christian tradition of "messianic woes," which predicts disaster preceding the time of bliss (Dan 12:1; Mark 13, Matt 24; Luke 21; Rom 8:22). In two apocalyptic texts roughly contemporary with the Apocalypse, 2 Esdras 5:1–12 and the Apocalypse of Baruch 25–7, there is a fixed quota of "messianic woes" (see also Jubilees 23:31). The term apocalyptic is often associated with such catastrophes.

The second and third plague cycles also draw on the biblical accounts of the exodus. According to Exod 7–10 Pharaoh's decision to release the Israelite slaves is brought about by means of ten plagues visited on the Egyptians. Revelation also teaches that redemption—in this case eschatological redemption—will be preceded by suffering afflicted on the enemies of God.

The plague cycles are the part of Revelation that tends to call forth the strongest emotional reactions, whether of fear or revulsion. The graphic description of the plagues of the end time raises difficult theological questions. John follows OT prophets in proclaiming God's justice as well as his mercy. God's wrath—his righteous anger that leads to acts of judgment—is a prominent theme in the OT, and it also runs through the NT (see, e.g., Matt 25; Rom 1:16; 2:1–10), though this is often overlooked because of the NT emphasis on God's mercy and love. The Bible as a whole teaches that a holy, just, and loving God cannot forever tolerate human unfaithfulness and injustice. Revelation particularly emphasizes God's opposition to the injustice present in social and political systems as well as individual lives. For this reason it has spoken especially to oppressed groups, such as African-American slaves or South Africans living under apartheid. John's warnings of impending judgment, like those of the prophets, imply a hope that the working out of God's righteous anger will be averted if people repent (9:20–21; 16:9–11); this message is especially emphasized in the messages to the seven churches (2:5, 14–16, 20–23; 3:1–3, 16–19).

6:1–8. Seals 1–4: The Four Horsemen. The first verse of ch. 6, like 4:1, emphasizes the link between heaven and earth: earthly trials are unleashed by two figures from the heavenly throne room; the Lamb opens the first seal, and one of the four living creatures calls forth a rider with a bow, who is told to ride out and conquer. This pattern is repeated in the next three seals, as the three other living creatures call forth riders who bring war, famine, and death to the earth. These four visions may be inspired by the four of horses of Zech 1:8 and 6:1–3, who execute God's judgment over the earth. The description of the fourth horseman in Rev 6:8 summarizes the consequences of all four: a quarter of the earth is to suffer death and famine, a combination familiar from prophetic sources (Jer 14:12; 15:2; 21:7; Ezek 5:12–15; 14:21; 33:27). The vision of the four horsemen unleashed one after the other has particular dramatic power, and it has had considerable influence on popular imagination, inspiring many songs, book titles, and works of art (e.g. the famous woodcut Albrecht Dürer made in 1511).

6:9–11. Seal 5: Cry of the Martyrs. The opening of the fifth seal produces a very different scene. John sees the altar of incense in the heavenly temple, a counterpart to the altar of incense in the earthly tabernacle (Exod 30:1–10). Under it are the souls of those who have died because of their testimony to Christ (on witness cf. 1:2; 11:1–13; 12:11; 20:4). Their martyrdom is presented as a cultic sacrifice (cf. 2 Tim 4:6 and Phil 2:17). Echoing the language of the Psalms, the souls cry out, asking God "how long?" before he will vindicate them (cf. Ps 79:5; 2 Esd 4:35). The divine response offers both comfort and challenge. The martyrs are told to rest and are given a white garment, symbolizing their purity and their standing in heaven (cf. 4:4; 3:4–6; 7:13). But Christian readers are presented with a challenge. Following a Jewish apocalyptic tradition that God has foreordained a fixed number of martyrs (cf. 2 Esd 4:35–38; 2:36; 2 Bar 30:2) the souls are told that their final reward must wait until this number is fulfilled. John sees the world's persecution of Christians as just beginning; his prophecy does not offer Christians easy comfort but calls them to courageous witness, no matter what the cost. The martyrs' cry will find a fuller answer at the end of the book: 19:1–8 announces that the blood of God's servants has been avenged in the destruction of the whore of Babylon, and Christian martyrs receive a special reward in the millennial kingdom (20:4–6).

6:12–17. Seal 6: Cosmic Upheaval. While the first four seals bring about disorder in human society, the sixth seal unleashes cosmic catastrophes: there is a great earthquake, the sun is darkened, the moon becomes like blood, and stars fall from the sky, all images used in prophetic oracles of judgment (Isa 13:10; 38:19; 50:3; Joel 2.10). The sky is rolled up (cf. Isa 34:4), a preview of its later transformation into a "new heaven" (21:1). According to Mark 13:24–31 (cf. Matt 24:29–35; Luke 21:25–33), Jesus predicts similar phenomena before the coming of the Son of Man to gather his elect, as signs that end is near (cf. 2 Esd 5:1–12).

These cosmic signs prompt a reaction of utter terror. The rich and powerful, along with slaves and free men, seek hiding places in caves and mountains, fearing the "great day" of the wrath of God. From the time of the prophets the "day of the Lord" and similar phrases (e.g. Rev 16:14: "the great day of God the Almighty"; 1 Cor 3:13: "the day") are used in the OT and NT to designate the time of God's judgment, either within history (e.g. Amos 5:18–20: judgment on Israel; Jer 50:27–31: judgment of Babylon; Isa 24:21: judgment of "the kings of the earth"; Ezek 38:17–23, judgment of the mythic enemy of Israel, Gog of Magog), or at history's end (e.g. 1 Cor 1:8; 3:13; 5:5; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Thess 2:2; 2 Peter 3:10). African-American spirituals such as "My Lord, What a Mornin' " use images from the plague sequences, such as falling stars and darkening of sun and moon (6:12), falling rocks (cf. 6:16; 8:8), fire from heaven (8:5, cf. 20:9) and trumpets (8:2–9:20; 11:15–19) to describe the dramatic end of the present situation.

V. Interlude: Sealing of the Elect (7:1–17)

7:1–8. Sealing of the 144,000. This chapter is the first example of a phenomenon that recurs several times in Revelation: the interruption of a sequence at a point just before its completion (cf. 10:10–11:14). The rush of eschatological events unleashed by the opening of the first six seals is interrupted by a two-part vision of the assembly of the people of God. This vision, together with its counterpart in Rev 14, has its roots in prophetic texts that predict an assembly of the dispersed Israelites in Zion

(Isa 2; Mic 4; Ezek 37:12; cf., Deut. 30:3-5; 2 Esd 13).

The opening of the seventh seal is postponed for a different kind of seal: a mark placed on the forehead of faithful believers to identify them as God's own, as the Hebrews at the time of the exodus were protected from the plagues on the Egyptians by means of a mark of blood on their doorposts (Exod 12:21–27). This sealing closely mirrors a vision of the prophet Ezekiel set in Jerusalem shortly before the Babylonian exile. As God's executioners are about to punish those whose idolatrous practices have polluted the Temple, Ezekiel beholds a figure sent to mark the foreheads of those who refuse to participate in idolatry (Ezek 9). In Rev 7 the angels in charge of the four winds are about to punish recalcitrant humanity; this recalls Jer 49:36, where God promises to deliver punishment by unleashing winds from the four quarters of heaven.

The four angels are told to wait by a fifth angel who appears from the "rising of the sun" to seal the elect. The sealing suggests a signet ring used to guarantee a person's identity; there may also be a secondary allusion to baptism, which several NT texts call "the seal" (1 Cor 9:2 2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13; cf. Eph 4:30). This seal that marks the faithful is mentioned several times in what follows (9:4; 14:1; 22:4), and it has its opposite number in the mark on the forehead and right hand that identifies those who follow the "beast from the sea," the arrogant enemy of God (13:16–17; 14:9; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4).

This vision of the 144,000 expresses the continuity of the church as the true Israel with God's chosen people of the OT (cf. Rom 9:6–7; 11:17–21; Gal 6:16; cf. Jas 1:1). The symbolic number, a multiple of twelve, suggests the twelve tribes of Israel, as the list in 7:5–8 confirms. Possibly this group refers to Jews or Jewish Christians, while the countless multitude "from all tribes and peoples and languages" in 7:9–17 symbolizes Gentile Christians. More likely is that the first group refers to Christians who are faithful to the point of martyrdom and the second, larger group symbolizes all faithful Christians including the martyrs. The identification of the 144,000 as martyrs is suggested by another description in 14:1–5, where they are said to "follow the Lamb wherever he goes"; they are called "first fruits," an OT image for a sacrificial offering (Exod 23:19; Deut 26:2; Jer 2:3; cf. Rom 16:5). Although there is no evidence of widespread persecution of Christians at the end of the first century, Revelation issues a repeated call to be faithful unto death (cf. 2:13; 6:9–10; 11:7–14; 20:4–6).

7:9–17. The Multitude from Every Nation. While the sealing of the 144,000 takes place on earth, the second vision of ch. 7 is located in the heavenly throne room (cf. 4:1–5:13), where the throng of the faithful "from every nation" who have survived the "great ordeal" (thlipsis, 7:14) stand before the throne of God, in the company of angels, elders, and living creatures, and sing praises to God and to the Lamb, echoing the hymns of 5:11–13. This is a proleptic vision of the blessed reward of all those who will triumph with God in the eschatological battle, an anticipation of the New Jerusalem described in Rev 21–22. If the first vision of Rev 7 implies the continuity of the church with Israel, the second expresses the universality of its mission.

Elsewhere in the NT thlipsis (used in Rev 1:9; 2:9, 10, 22), which can also be translated "tribulation," describes the suffering that is to come immediately before the fulfillment of God's saving purposes (see, e.g. 1 Cor 7:26; Col. 1:24). Those who survive this "tribulation" are said to have "washed their robes . . . in the blood of the Lamb" (7:14), probably a reference to the redemptive effects of Christ's death (cf. 1:5; 5:6–9; cf. Heb 9 on the cleansing effect of Christ's blood). They are promised great reward, but this does not mean they will be spared from all suffering, contrary to the claims of some interpreters of Revelation who insist that true Christians will not experience one moment of the "tribulation" because they will be snatched up to heaven before the plagues of the end time are unleashed. This idea of the "rapture," an important theme in many other popular interpretations of Revelation, goes back to the teaching of nineteenth-century English clergyman John Nelson Darby, which was popularized in The Scofield Reference Bible. (Belief in a "rapture," a theme not found in Revelation, is based on 1 Thess 4:13–17, where Paul speaks of the second coming of Christ). In Rev 7 the 144,000 are marked with the Lamb's seal not in order to be "raptured" but for faithful witness, even onto death; and the multitude of Christians from the nations must come through the "great ordeal."

The chapter concludes with a moving picture of the life of the faithful will experience at the consummation (7:15–17). The specific promises of freedom from hunger and thirst, protection from scorching sun, and abundant water echo words uttered to the exiles in Babylon by the prophet, Deutero-Isaiah (Isa 49:10) and anticipate the description of the New Jerusalem in Rev 21:1–22:5. Their greatest blessing will be the direct presence of God and of the Lamb. The awesome figure on the throne, adored by the heavenly hosts (4:1–11), is also the one who will "wipe every tear from their eyes" (cf. 21:4 and Isa 25:8).

VI. Second Cycle of Seven Plagues (8:1–9:21; 11:15–19)

8:1–6. Seal 7 and Distribution of 7 Trumpets. The seven trumpets are preceded by a vision of heavenly worship. Once again we glimpse the heavenly throne-room (cf. 4:1–5:13), a reminder that what happens on earth has its origins with God. This paragraph joins together the first two plague sequences. After the interlude of the sealing of the 144,000, the Lamb opens the seventh seal, which leads to a half-hour of silence in heaven, after which seven angels are entrusted with trumpets. The eschatological silence is reminiscent of several OT texts (Ps 46:10; 62:1; Zech 2:13; cf. Letter of Aristeas 95). In 2 Esd 7:30 the universe returns to silence after the upheavals of the last things.

The sounding of the trumpet has a long history within the Bible: it is a sign of crisis, marking decisive moments in the nation's life (Lev 25:9) and also signaling the judgment of God (Joel 2:1). In Matt 24:31, 1 Thess 4:16, and 1 Cor 15:52 it forms part of the eschatological scene when Jesus returns to gather the elect.

8:7–13. Trumpets 1–4. The seven trumpet visions of Rev 8–9 and the seven bowl visions of Rev 16 are largely repetitions of the seven seals in Rev 6; all three cycles describe the same eschatological scenario, the "messianic woes" that according to Jewish tradition would precede God's final redemption of his chosen people. One difference of the second and third plague sequences from the seven seals is that their consequences are even more severe. While the seals affect a quarter of the earth (6:8), the trumpets affect a third (8:7; 9, 10, 11, 12; 9:18) and the effects of the bowls have no limit (16:3). A further difference from the seal cycle is that trumpet and bowl visions use imagery from the ten plagues by which God delivered the Israelites from slavery in Egypt. Three of the first four trumpets call forth plagues reminiscent of those in Egypt: the first brings hail, fire, and blood that destroy vegetation (cf. the seventh plague of Exod 9:13–25); the second resembles the first Egyptian plague, as water in the sea is turned to blood (cf. Exod 7:14–25); the darkening of sun, moon and stars brought by the fourth trumpet recalls the darkness of the ninth Egyptian plague (Exod 10:21–28). The third trumpet causes a blazing star called "wormwood" to fall into rivers and springs, making them bitter. This has no parallel in Exodus, but it recalls Jer 23:15: "I am feeding this people with wormwood, and giving them poisonous water to drink" (cf. Prov 5:4 on the bitterness of wormwood). Also without parallel in Exodus is the burning mountain called forth by the second trumpet.

Over the centuries, some readers have understood the twenty-one plagues of the seal, trumpet, and bowl cycles as describing a literal, chronological sequence of end time events (one contemporary example is the popular Left Behind series of novels). This reading is made difficult by obvious discrepancies in the narrative; for example, the sixth seal implies that all the stars fall from heaven (6:13), but they are still in place in 8:12 when the fourth trumpet blows, causing a third of them to be darkened. The visions are better read as evocative rather than predictive of a literal sequence of events. They use images from the OT and Jewish tradition to make real to the reader the seriousness of human injustice and impiety and the certainty that God will judge them; his holiness cannot tolerate human evil forever.

9:1–12. Trumpet 5. The introduction to the last three trumpet blasts in 8:13 as three woes suggests that their consequences will be particularly disastrous. When the fifth trumpet is blown, John sees a star fall from heaven with a key to the "bottomless pit" (or "abyss"), the temporary abode of demons (cf. 9:11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:1–3). From the pit comes a swarm of terrifying locusts, reminiscent of the eighth plague visited on the Egyptians (Exod 10:1–20) and also of Joel 1:1–2:11. Joel describes a loathsome attack by swarms of locusts, an image to express how God will execute judgment by handing Israel over to its enemies. Like the locusts in Joel 2:4–9, the frightening creatures in John's vision look like "horses equipped for battle" (9:7). The demon who is the locusts' king is called Abaddon, the destroyer (9:11, from the Hebrew meaning "place of destruction"; cf. Job 26:6; Prov 15:11), and also Apollon, from the Greek word for "destroy," perhaps also playing on the name of the Greek god Apollo

The locusts are allowed to torture humans for five months, and the suffering they inflict will be so great that their victims will long for death. Protected from their attack, however, are those who have the "seal of God" on their foreheads, an allusion to the sealing of the 144,000 in 7:1–8.

9:13–21. Trumpet 6. The sounding of the sixth trumpet brings the second great woe, and John sees the Euphrates River, the boundary between the Roman and Parthian empires. A voice from the heavenly altar of incense (cf. 6:9–11 and 8:3–5) orders the release of four angels bound there, who become an immense army, 200 million strong, whose horses do even more damage than the locusts. They kill a third of humanity by breathing fire, smoke, and sulfur out of their mouths and stinging with their tails.

The chapter concludes in 9:20–21 with a reminder of the purpose of the plagues: they are God's judgment on human idolatry and the sins of murder, sorcery, fornication, and theft, a judgment that should lead to repentance. But those who experience the plagues do not repent (cf. 16:9, 11, 21; 11:13), repeating Pharaoh's "hardness of heart" (Exod 7:13, 22: 8:15). In the letters to the churches, however, Christ holds out hope for repentance (2:5 21; 3:19).

VII. Interlude: The Situation on Earth (10:1–11:19)

10:1–11. The Little Scroll: John's Second Prophetic Commission. In the first two plague sequences, the action is interrupted after the penultimate number, creating a sense of dramatic tension and giving emphasis to the material inserted. Depicted in 10:1–11:14 are John's renewed prophetic commission and the story of two mysterious witnesses. This time John is told not only to write and see as in 1:10–11 but also to prophesy to nations, peoples, and languages (10:11). Allusions to the commission of Jeremiah (Jer 1:10) and Ezekiel's eating the scroll (Ezek 3:1–10) connect John's vocation with that of the OT prophets.

As in 5:2, revelation is given through a "mighty angel." The appearance of this angel is magnificent, underscoring the importance of his revelation. Like the Son of Man (Christ) he appears in a cloud and has a face shining like the sun (cf. 14:14; 1:12–16). With a rainbow over his head (cf. the rainbow surrounding the throne of God in 4:3), he takes a stance with one foot on sea and the other on land, indicating that his revelation is valid for all of creation. His legs "like pillars of fire" are reminiscent of the "pillar of fire" in which God was present with the Israelites in Exod 13:21.

The "little scroll" open in the angel's hand recalls but is not the same as the scroll that was opened by the Lamb in Rev 5; both concern God's plans for the end time. Like the OT prophet Ezekiel, John is commanded to eat the scroll, symbolizing his acceptance of his prophetic commission (10:8–11) and providing an authentication of the prophecies that will follow in the rest of the book. Up to this point John has been a witness to the revelation unfolding before his eyes and ears; now he is commanded to participate in it. John finds that the scroll tastes sweet at first, but then bitter. Like the prophets of the OT, he is to deliver a message of judgment and redemption; before God establishes his kingdom in all the world, humanity must experience God's righteous judgment over all idolatry and injustice. As Paul says in Rom 1:16–18, God's salvation and his wrath are revealed at the same time.

John's encounter with the mighty angel is interrupted by a mysterious revelation from heaven, as the angel's shout, loud as a lion's roar, is drowned out by something even more deafening: seven thunders followed by a voice from heaven (10:3–7). This voice tells John to "seal up" the message of the seven thunders and declares that the mystery of God that was revealed to the prophets will be fulfilled with no delay, when the seventh trumpet is blown.

11:1–2. Measuring the Temple. Revelation is full of imagery of the heavenly temple, but this is the only passage that speaks of the earthly Temple in Jerusalem. The motif of measuring the temple comes from the OT prophets. During the Babylonian exile Ezekiel saw a vision of a superhuman figure measuring the various parts of the Jerusalem Temple (Ezek 40:1–42:20); this image of restoration is repeated in Zech 2:1–5. In Revelation John is told to measure not only the temple and the altar but also those who worship there, suggesting the preservation of those who are faithful to God (cf. 7:3–8); but this does not preclude their suffering, as we see from the rest of ch. 11. The picture of hostile forces trampling the Jerusalem Temple to the very threshold of the holy place suggests the siege of Jerusalem in 70 CE (recorded in Josephus' Jewish War), when Roman legionaries drew ever closer to the Temple precincts. Either John's visionary imagination was suffused by the searing impact of this event, or, as early historical scholars suggested, he made use of a Jewish oracle from the days before the fall of Jerusalem, when Zealots took refuge in the sanctuary and were inspired by a prophet who promised deliverance (Josephus, War vi.122; 285–7; cf. Luke 21:24).

11:3–14. The Two Witnesses. Bearing faithful witness is an important theme in Revelation, which summons Christians to follow in the footsteps of Christ, the "faithful witness" (1:5, 9; 2:13; 3:8–11; 6:9; 12:11, 17; 19:10; 20:4; 22:16, 20). Christ urges the members of the seven churches to be fearless in testimony, in their lives as well as their words. Chapter 11 makes clear the cost of Christian witness. It presents two witnesses, who prophesy for 1260 days—a symbolic number used in Daniel and elsewhere in Revelation (12:6; cf. Dan 7:25; 12:7) to represent a predetermined, limited time. They perform incredible miracles, but after the appointed time is over they are killed by a beast that ascends from the "bottomless pit." Their bodies are exposed in the streets of Jerusalem, and all peoples of the earth celebrate the removal of the witnesses and their disturbing prophecies.

Images from the OT color the picture of the witnesses. They are compared to two olive trees, a symbol in Zech 4: 3, 14 for God's "anointed ones": Zerubbabel, the Davidic heir, and Joshua, the high priest, who were involved in efforts to restore the Temple after the Babylonian Exile. In their power to perform miracles the witnesses resemble Moses and Elijah. Like Moses, they turn water into blood (cf. Exod 7:14–25); like Elijah, who could control rain (1 Kgs 17:1; 18:1), they have power to "shut the sky" (11:6).

In the messages in Rev 2–3, Christ promises great things to "those who conquer." In ch. 11 we begin to see what this means, as we are introduced to the main earthly adversary with whom Christ and his followers have to contend, the beast (11:7) that will be the focus of attention in 13:1–10 and 17:8. In later interpretations of Revelation this beast is often referred to as the "antichrist." His power is indeed great, and he wins the first skirmish, killing the witnesses and brutally exposing their bodies in the streets of Jerusalem (here called "Sodom" and "Egypt"), the city where their Lord was crucified. But this is not the last word; after the time appointed by God (11:11, "three and a half days"), God acts both to redeem and judge: the witnesses are brought back to life and snatched up to heaven; a great earthquake strikes the city, killing 7,000 of its inhabitants and bringing the rest to worship God – a rare account of divine punishments leading people to repentance (contrast 9:20–21).

11:15–19. Trumpet 7: A Hymn of Victory. With the blowing of the seventh trumpet the scene shifts back to the heavenly throne room, where voices sing: "The kingdom of the world has/ become the kingdom of our Lord/and of his Messiah,/and he will reign forever"—a text well known from its setting in the "Hallelujah Chorus" from Handel's Messiah. The twenty-four elders join the chorus, announcing that the time for judgment and reward has arrived. The time has come for God's kingship—celebrated in heaven in the hymns of Rev 4–5—to be acknowledged by all on earth. This message is reinforced by a dramatic vision of the heavenly temple opened to reveal the ark of the covenant—the heavenly counterpart of the inner sanctum of the Jerusalem Temple. God's awesome presence is indicated in lightning, thunder, earthquake, and hail.

VIII. The Combatants in the Final Battle (12:1–14:20)

12:1–6. The Woman Clothed with the Sun and Her Child. The abrupt announcement of "a great portent in heaven" begins a series of visions in which the main combatants in the eschatological battle are introduced more clearly. In a complex of visions that have affinities with the popular culture of the ancient Mediterranean world and roots in early Christian mythology, John sees a woman clothed with the sun pursued by the dragon, followed by war in heaven between the archangel Michael and Satan. The woman clothed with the sun exemplifies the multivalence of Revelation's symbols. Many different interpretations have been suggested, no one of which accounts for all the details of her depiction. Similarities with various figures—including the Egyptian queen of heaven, Isis, who wore a crown of stars, and Leto, who in Greek myth was pursued by the dragon Python when she was about to give birth to the Greek god Apollo—suggest that this image would have resonated with John's audience.

The child the woman bears is the Messiah, who is destined to rule the nations "with a rod of iron," an allusion to the royal Ps 2:8–9 (also cited in 2:26–27; 19:15). For this reason the woman is sometimes interpreted as the people Israel, from whom the Messiah came. In the earliest Christian interpretations (e.g. Hippolytus, Antichrist 61) she was understood as a symbol of the church, who "bears" the Messiah by teaching the nations about him. More influential has been her identification as the Virgin Mary, mother of the Messiah; and this vision has influenced the development of doctrine and iconography concerning her: the moon under the woman's feet and stars in her crown appear frequently in artistic portrayals of Mary. Compared with the rest of Revelation this passage is unusually prominent in Christian lectionaries because of its Marian connections and its association with the feast of Michael and all angels. After the pope's approval of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary in 1476, it became one of the proper scriptural readings for the corresponding feast.

The great red dragon, who reappears in 13:2–13 and 16:13, is identified as Satan in 20:2. The dragon attacks the woman as she is about to give birth to the Messiah. In this preliminary skirmish God protects both the son, who is snatched up to heaven, and the woman, who is given a safe haven in the wilderness. Her story is interrupted by a scene of the heavenly battlefront, to be continued in 12:13–17.

12:7–9. The Great Dragon Defeated by the Angel Michael. This chapter exemplifies especially clearly the two-level drama that is characteristic of apocalyptic writings, as heavenly and earthly events are juxtaposed and closely related to each other. The great battle between the forces of God and the army of Satan—a theme hinted at in the calls to "conquer" in Rev 2–3—is now given fuller description, in both its heavenly and earthly aspects. The war in heaven and Satan's expulsion are both familiar themes in Jewish and early Christian sources. The War Scroll (1QM) from the Dead Sea Scrolls describes elaborate preparations for a final battle in which spiritual and human forces join (cf. Dan 10:10–21). In John's vision the human side of the battle involves prophecy, endurance, and witness, rather than force of arms (12:11).

The struggle with suprahuman powers is an important theme in early Christian writings (1 Cor 2:6–8; Eph 6:11–17). Particularly close parallels to our passage are Luke 10:13–15 and John 12:31: "Now is the judgment of this world; now the ruler of the world will be driven out"; the story of the temptation of Jesus by Satan (Matt 4:1–11 par.) belongs to the same theological complex.

12:10–12. Hymn Celebrating Victory in Heaven. The hymn of victory expresses the close connection of the two levels of the battlefield, in heaven and on earth. The victory achieved by the faithful death of Christ the Lamb, celebrated in the hymn of 5:9–13, is here connected with the ancient story of Michael's victory in heaven and also with the witness of Christian believers in the present time. Like the hymn in 11:15, it anticipates the arrival of God's kingdom. Battle imagery gives way to language of the courtroom as Satan is called the "accuser," a reminder of his role in Job 1:9–11.

12:13–17. The Dragon Attacks the Woman. Expelled from heaven, the dragon wreaks havoc on earth, once again attacking the woman and then "making war" on the rest of her children, i.e. Christians who "hold the testimony of Jesus" (cf. 11:7). The story of the woman's escape to the wilderness (cf. 12:6) is repeated, but this time she flies on the wings of a great eagle, a detail that connects her story to that of the Israelites preserved in the wilderness after the exodus. Arriving at Mount Sinai, they are told by God: "You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself" (Exod 19:4).

12:18–13:10. The Beast from the Sea. John pictures the dragon taking his stand beside the sea, where he gives his power to a beast arising from the sea, his chief earthly minion. This beast, who first appeared in 11:7 emerging from the abyss to make war on the two witnesses, is now described more fully. Like many other symbols in Revelation, the beast is a traditional image, shared with other biblical and apocalyptic books. The influence of Dan 7, seen already in John's call vision in 1:9–20 and in 11:7, is particularly evident here. In Dan 7:1–8 four beasts that arise from the sea represent four kingdoms and serve as a kind of philosophy of history, explaining the necessity of a pre-ordained succession of world empires before the arrival of the kingdom of God. In Revelation, features of Daniel's four beasts are combined in a single beast with multiple heads.

The beast, like the woman clothed with the sun, has more than one level of meaning. It evokes Dan 7 and also the ancient myth of cosmic combat, a story told in many forms, for example the Babylonian creation story, the Enuma Elish, the Canaanite tale of the victory of the chief god, Baal, over Yam (= the Sea), and the story of Leto attacked by the serpent Python. In these stories, which express the triumph of order over chaos and life over death, the enemy of the divine order is often portrayed as a dragon or a sea monster. In the Enuma Elish, for example, the god Marduk becomes king of the gods by defeating a sea monster called Tiamat. Traces of this ancient story are evident in prophetic and poetic texts in the OT, most notably in the depiction of God's power over the terrifying sea monster Leviathan in Job 41 (cf. Job 3:8; 7:12; 26:12–13; Ps 74:13–14; 89:9–10; Isa 27:1; 51:9–11); and it informs descriptions of the last battle between God and the forces of evil in apocalyptic texts, including Dan 7. In a startling example of political protest, the ancient image of the sea monster now serves to describe the dominant power of John's day, the Roman Empire and the emperors who rule it.

Specifically the beast evokes the emperor Nero (who ruled 54–68), the first emperor to order persecution of Christians. Blaming Christians for a great fire in Rome in 64 CE, he had Christians set alight as human torches. Although his persecution was short and limited to the city of Rome, it had a lasting effect on Christian consciousness, and Nero became a prime symbol of evil power. Nero also lived on in the memory of his Roman supporters, but in a positive way. After he was forced by political opponents to commit suicide, many of his followers believed he would return and restore their fortunes, giving rise to the myth of Nero redivivus, that is "Nero alive again." In Jewish and Christian texts this myth is turned on its head: Nero the expected hero becomes Nero the chief adversary of God in the end time (Sibylline Oracles 3 24:119–124, 138–39; 5:137–52, 362). There is an allusion to this tradition in Rev 13:3: "One of its heads seemed to have received a deathblow, but its mortal wound had been healed" (cf. 13:14: "the beast that was wounded by the sword and yet lived"; 17:8).

The association of the beast from the sea with Nero is strengthened by 13:18: "Let him who has understanding reckon the number of the beast, for it is a human number; its number is 666" (author's trans.). Over the centuries there have been thousands of different interpretations of this verse, but Nero is the most likely referent. This is an example of an ancient practice called gematria, the symbolic interpretation of numbers. In Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, where there are no separate numbers, letters are used to indicate numbers, with a=1, b=2, etc. If you add up the numerical equivalents of the name "Nero Caesar" in Hebrew you get 666. Perhaps this example of gematria based on Hebrew was preserved in the Greek-speaking churches of Asia Minor; several features of Revelation, including its odd, Semitic Greek, suggest that the author was a Jewish Christian from Palestine. On another level, the beast may also symbolize the emperor Domitian, during whose reign (81–96) Revelation was probably written (see on 13:11–18 and 17:1–6).

13:11–18. The Beast from the Land. A second beast appears from the land to enforce worship of the beast from the sea. Here again John uses traditional imagery to represent contemporary reality. In Job 40–41 the sea monster Leviathan is joined by a beast called Behemoth, who dwells on the earth (a tradition echoed in 1 Enoch 60.7–10, 24 and 2 Esd 6.47–52). Together the two beasts represent the forces of evil and chaos defeated by God at the beginning of creation. John's description of the beast from the land as performing signs and wonders and deceiving the people is also reminiscent of the false prophet of Deut. 13:1–5. This second beast probably symbolizes the local priesthood of the Roman imperial cult, or perhaps the local authorities in Asia Minor who encouraged worship of the emperor in order to curry favor. In Rome itself a number of emperors, beginning with Augustus, were worshiped as divine (divus) after their death; according to the Roman author Pliny (Pan. 52.1, 7) the emperor Domitian went further and demanded sacrifices to himself during his lifetime. In the Eastern provinces such as Asia Minor worship of the living emperor was more common. For example, in 89–90 a temple called the "temple of the Sebastoi [revered ones]" was dedicated to Domitian.

Interpreters of Revelation often refer to the beast from the sea as the antichrist, a word used in 1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3 and 2 John 7 for an earthly representative of Satan. Although the word does not occur in Revelation, it is an apt description of this beast, who is the opposite number and chief earthly opponent to Christ. He is also a counterfeit Christ, who has a "mortal wound" (13:3) that mimics the crucifixion of the Lamb (13:8; 5:6). This was given graphic illustration in a fresco entitled "The Preaching of the Antichrist" painted by Luca Signorelli around 1501 in the San Brizio Chapel of the cathedral in Orvieto, Italy; here the antichrist has features traditionally used to depict Christ. In Rev 13:8 the beast mimics Christ in receiving worship from the "whole world," but this is false worship, not the true worship of God and the Lamb celebrated throughout the book of Revelation.

14:1–5. The Lamb and the 144,000. Once again John sees 144,000 people who have God's name on their foreheads (cf. 7:3). Now they stand with the Lamb on Mount Zion, the Temple mountain in Jerusalem (cf. 2 Esd 13, where the savior figure assembles a throng on a mountain). In 14:2 the scene shifts to the heavenly throne room (cf. 4:1–5:14), and John hears a thundering chorus as the 144,000 join the heavenly hosts in a "new song." The 144,000 are described as "virgins," which suggests the traditions of holy war in the OT; abstaining from sexual relations was required as preparation for battle (Deut 23:9–14; 1 Sam 21:5; 2 Sam 11:9–13; 1QM 7:3–9; 11QT 58:17–19; cf. Exod 19:15, where sexual relations are to be avoided before approaching the holy mountain of Sinai). That the 144,000 represent Christian martyrs is suggested by their description as "first fruits" (an image from the OT for a sacrificial offering; Exod 23:19; Deut 26:2; Jer 2:3; cf. Rom 16:5), who follow the Lamb "wherever he goes."

14:6–13. Messages of Three Angels. With the loud singing in his ears, John looks up and sees three angels flying in mid-heaven, and attention shifts from the faithful followers of the Lamb to the unrepentant worshipers of the beast. The first angel proclaims an "eternal gospel," a call to all people to worship God. Like 7:9–17, this call "to every nation and tribe and language and people" expresses the universal scope of the Christian mission. The next two angels pronounce judgment. Those who fail to repent of their false worship and turn to the true God will drink the "wine of God's wrath" (an image for divine judgment in Jer 25:15–17) and experience eternal torment (cf. 20:10). The second angel proclaims: "Fallen is Babylon"—the first reference to Babylon, used in Revelation as in other apocalypses as a code name for Rome, whose destruction will be described more fully in Rev 17–18. As in 11:11–15, the conclusion of the eschatological events is anticipated. The stark contrast this chapter draws between followers of the Lamb and those marked by the beast resembles the two-way doctrine in early Christian texts such as Didache 1–3 and the Epistle of Barnabas 18–20. Now is the time for a decision.

14:14–20. Harvest of the Son of Man. The chapter concludes with images that anticipate the last judgment that will be narrated in 20:11–15. Judgment is portrayed through the traditional image of a harvest (cf. Hos 6:11; Matt 3:12; 9:37; 13:30, 39). John sees "one like the Son of Man" seated on a cloud, wearing a golden crown and carrying a sickle (cf. 1:12–16). The title is based on Dan 7:13–14, where it describes an angelic figure installed as universal ruler; it is used often for Jesus in the Gospels, which expect his second coming seated on the clouds and accompanied by angels (Mark 8:38; 13:26–27; 14:62; cf. Rev 1:7 where it is said of Christ: "he is coming with the clouds").

The "one like the Son of Man" is told to reap by an angel who emerges from the heavenly temple, symbolizing that the judgment is ordered by God. His sickle recalls the description of God's judgment on the nations in Joel 3, which includes the oracle: "Put in the sickle, / for the harvest is ripe. / Go in, tread, / for the wine press is full. / The vats overflow, / for their wickedness is great" (Joel 3:13). John sees two harvest scenes: a grain harvest in 14:15–16 and a harvest of grapes in 14:17–20. The first harvest may depict the gathering of the elect; according to Mark 13:26–27 the Son of Man and his angels will gather his elect "from the four winds" (cf. the harvest image in John 4:33–38). The grape harvest symbolizes the negative side of divine judgment; the vivid imagery of treading the "wine press of the wrath of God" recalls a frightening depiction in Isa 63 of God's coming to redeem Israel by wreaking judgment on the nations, his garments red with the juice of grapes.

IX. Third Cycle of Seven Plagues (15:1–16:21)

15:1–4. Preparation in Heaven: The Song of Moses. Chapter 15 sets the stage for the third plague sequence, which will unfold in ch. 16. John sees a heavenly portent, seven angels who will unleash the seven last plagues. As in 4:2–5 he sees God's heavenly throne room, with its "sea of glass" and four living creatures. Beside the heavenly sea stand "those who had conquered the beast and its image and the number of its name"—a description that looks back to 13:5–18, where "conquering" indicates worshipping God alone, no matter what the costs, and refusing to be complicit in the idolatrous worship demanded by Rome.

The sea of glass recalls the miraculous crossing of the great sea in Exod 14. The song Moses and the Israelites sang after seeing their pursuers drowned in the sea (Exod 15) is recast as the "song of Moses . . . and the Lamb": "Great and amazing are your deeds, / Lord God the Almighty! / Just and true are your ways . . . / All nations will come / and worship before you, / for your judgments have been revealed" (15:3–4). In contrast to 13:3, where the "whole earth" worships the beast, this text expresses an optimistic view of the success of the Christian witness to God (cf. 21:24–25; 22:2), a counterpoint to the many images of God's judgment on an unrepentant world.

15:5–8. Seven Bowls Prepared in the Heavenly Temple. Next John sees "the temple of the tent of witness" being opened (cf. 11:19), which reflects the view that there is a heavenly model for the tabernacle in the wilderness (cf. Exod 25:9; Heb 8:2; 9:11). Tabernacle/Temple imagery continues in the seven golden bowls full of God's wrath that one of the living creatures hands over to the angels, which suggest the vessels of the tabernacle and the Jerusalem Temple (Exod 27:3). God's awesome power and glory is evident as the Temple fills with smoke; his holiness cannot forever endure the evil and injustice that reigns on earth.

16:1–11. Bowls 1–5 Poured out on Earth. Chapter 16 contains the third series of plagues, all of which describe the messianic woes, the trials of the eschaton. While there is much here that repeats the earlier plagues, this sequence is introduced as the "last plagues" (15:1, cf. 16:17) indicating finality. The bowl sequence, like the seven trumpets, contains much imagery from the Egyptian plagues. When the first bowl is poured out, those who worship the beast (13:4–8) experience painful sores, paralleling the sixth plague in Egypt (Exod 9:8–12; cf. 7:14–25). The emptying of the next two bowls causes sea and rivers to turn to blood, recalling the first plague when Moses turned the Nile and all the waters of Egypt to blood (Exod 7:14–25). When the angel empties the fourth bowl over the sun, it scorches people with intense heat; the fifth bowl, poured over the throne of the beast, brings darkness over his whole kingdom, similar to the ninth Egyptian plague (Exod 10:21–28).

The plagues are punctuated by commentary. After the first three bowls an angel sings a doxology that interprets them as God's judgment on an unjust world: "You are just, O Holy One, who are and were,/for you have judged these things;/ because they shed the blood of saints and prophets." Descriptions of the fourth and fifth plagues include judgment of those affected for their failure to repent.

16:12–16. Bowl 6: Armageddon. John again sees the Euphrates River (cf. 9:14), the boundary between the Roman and Parthian empires; now it is dried up so that the Parthians and their allies can cross and attack, a common Roman fear. The dragon and the two beasts of Rev 12–13 reappear. From their mouths come forth evil demons in the form of frogs who assemble kings from the whole world for the last battle in the "great day of God the Almighty" (see on 6:17). A direct address of Christ to the reader warns that this day is near: "See I am coming like a thief" (16:13, cf. 3:3 and 22:7).

The frogs recall the second plague in Exodus (8:1–15). That the demons issue from the mouths of a dragon and beasts may imply a war of words in which Roman propaganda extolling the universal sovereignty of emperor and empire competes with Christian claims for God and his Messiah (cf. 13:11–14). The kings of the world assemble at Armageddon (NRSV, "Harmagedon"), a transliteration of a Hebrew word that means the mount of Meggido, the site of many important battles in the history of Israel, a name deeply rooted in Jewish hope and fears (see Judg 5:19; 2 Kgs 23:29–30; 2 Chr 35:22–24; Zech 12:11). The word Armageddon pervades popular imagination about global cataclysm. The site of Israel's victory over Canaanite kings and of king Josiah's defeat has become an image of the ultimate conflict. In popular interpretation, the battle scene described here is the end of the story, but the narrative of Revelation continues for six more chapters, and the theme of the last battle will be repeated several times (17:12–16; 18:8–10; 19:11–16; 20:7–9).

16:17–21. Bowl 7: Babylon Destroyed. With the emptying of the seventh bowl, John hears a voice from the heavenly temple saying "It is done!"— a proleptic statement of the end (cf. 21:6). There follows a powerful earthquake, accompanied by lightning, rumbling, and thunder, signs of divine power and holiness evident in the theophany at Mount Sinai (Exod 19:16) and in descriptions of God's heavenly throne in 4:5 and 11:19. These bring about the destruction of Babylon/Rome (announced in 14:8), which is split in three parts, and the fall of the "cities of the nations." The aweinspiring character of the divine appearance for judgment is further underlined as mountains and islands flee (cf. Ps 97:5; Ezek 38:20; Isa 40:3–4). The last plague concludes with the fall of hail, echoing the seventh Egyptian plague of thunder and hail (Exod 9:13–35) as well as the "heavy hail" brought on by the seventh trumpet (11:19). Here, at the climax of the twenty-one plague visions, the punishment is magnified so that each hailstone weighs 100 pounds.

X. The Whore of Babylon and Her Destruction (17:1–19:10)

17:1–6. Vision of the Whore of Babylon. John is carried away in the Spirit to the wilderness, where he beholds an arresting sight: a sumptuously clad woman who holds a golden cup "full of abominations" and seduces the "kings of the earth" to fornicate with her. The personification of a great city opposed to the ways of God as a wayward woman is common in the prophets (e.g. Jerusalem and Samaria in Ezek 23, Tyre and Sidon in Isa 23; Babylon in Jer 51). The whore of Babylon symbolizes the city of Rome and the seductive power of the Roman Empire with its ideology of might and prosperity. In Revelation as in the OT, fornication is a metaphor for idolatrous worship of other gods and also for putting trust in earthly political powers instead of the true God (cf. Hos 1–3; Jer 2–3). The whore is intoxicated by her power, including the power to claim political and religious allegiance and to persecute those who do not comply. She is drunk with the blood of saints, i.e. Christian martyrs (cf. 6:9–10). Her attire in luxurious fabrics and precious jewels symbolizes the attraction of earthly power in general, and Rome in particular—a vivid contrast to with two other symbolic women in Revelation, the women clothed with the sun in Rev 12 and the pure bride of the Lamb in 19:7–8; 21:2–27.

17:7–17. Explanation of the Vision. The extraordinary vision of Babylon enthroned on the beast includes a feature that is unusual in John's apocalypse. While the book of Daniel is full of explanations of its dreams and visions, John's images usually remain without interpretation. Revelation 17 offers a notable exception (cf. 1:20; 4:5; 13:18). We are told that she represents the "great city that rules over the kings of the earth" (17:18; cf. 17:15) and that the heads of the beast she rides are seven mountains (17:9), suggesting the seven hills of Rome. Facilitating this personification of Rome was the practice of worshiping Rome as a goddess (Dea Roma), to whom temples were dedicated. John follows Jewish apocalyptic tradition in using "Babylon" as a code name for Rome (17:5; cf. 2 Esd 4:2.28–31; 16:44, 46; 2 Apocalypse of Baruch 10:2; Sibylline Oracles 5:143, 159), an association suggested by the Roman destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE, which recalled the Babylonian destruction of the first Temple in 586 BCE.

Chapter 17 is closely linked with the depiction of arrogant powers in rebellion against God in Rev 13. The scarlet beast on which the whore rides has seven heads and ten horns and is full of "blasphemous names," like the beast from the sea in 13:1 (which in turn plays on Dan 7:7, 20, 24). The heads of the beast are given a second interpretation as seven kings: "five of whom have fallen, one is, and the other has not yet come, and when he comes, he must remain only a little while" (17:9–10, author's trans.). Ancient Jewish writers engaged in similar allusive reference to Roman emperors (e.g., Sibylline Oracles 5:12). The sixth king (the one who "is") must be the emperor during whose rule John writes—probably Domitian, though there is no agreement on how to match up the six "kings" to whom John refers with the list of the Roman emperors. Perhaps seven is used only as a general symbol of a complete sequence. In the beast who "was, and is not, and is about to ascend from the bottomless pit" (17:8; cf. 17:11: who is "an eighth but it belongs to the seven"), there is another allusion to the myth of Nero redivivus (see on 12:18–13:11). This description parodies the praise of God as the one "who was and is and is to come" in 4:8 (cf. 1:4, 8).

The ten horns of the beast are explained as ten kings (cf. Dan 7:24), mirroring the practice of Roman generals of enlisting client kings in the eastern provinces. The ten kings join the beast in "making war" on the Lamb; the battle described here is the same eschatological battle narrated in 19:11–21, and prepared for in 9:13–19 and 16:12–16. Such repetitions tell against interpretation of Revelation as giving a literal blueprint of end time events that will follow one another in a strict chronological sequence. As in 19:16 the victorious Lamb is called "Lord of lords and King of kings," a title used for God in Dan 2:37, 1 Enoch 9:4, and 1 Tim 6:15.

18:1–3. An Angel Celebrates the Fall of Babylon. God's judgment on Rome/Babylon is made vivid by being portrayed from several points of view. First a resplendent angel announces "Fallen is Babylon the great"; as in 11:15 and 14:8 present and future are intertwined. John's critique of Rome/Babylon follows a common prophetic form, and it parallels in many specific points Jeremiah's predictions of judgment on Babylon (Jer 51) and Ezekiel's lament over the city of Tyre (Ezek 27–8). The chapter echoes many prophetic texts and contains several word-for-word quotations, e.g. 18:2: "fallen, fallen is Babylon" (Isa 21:9) and 18:4: "Come out of her!" (Jer 51:45). The critique of Rome has religious, political, and economic dimensions. Babylon is cursed as the dwelling place of foul animals and demons (cf. Isa 13:21–22; Jer 51:37); she has seduced nations and kings to give her their primary loyalty, thus committing "fornication" against the only true God.

18:4–8. Call to Come out of Babylon. A voice from heaven makes clear the point of this chapter for the Christian audience. Echoing words of the OT prophets, it commands them: "Come out from her," i.e. do not participate in her sins. Lady Babylon (Rome) is mocked for her love of luxury and her arrogance. Her fall will come suddenly, as she is overtaken by pestilence, mourning, famine, and fire; and she will be paid double for all her misdeeds.

18:9–20. Kings, Merchants, and Sailors Lament Babylon's Fall. In contrast to Jer 51, which describes Babylon being destroyed by enemy armies, Rev 18 does not describe Rome's destruction directly but instead reports what three groups of onlookers see and feel as they behold the destruction from afar, rather as the chorus in a Greek tragedy comments on the play's action. The dirge for Babylon/Rome is spoken in three parts by kings of the earth, merchants, and sailors. The kings, seeing Babylon burn, are awe-struck by the swiftness of her judgment. The lament of the merchants contains a detailed list of the luxury goods they carry for Rome (cf. the lament for Tyre in Ezek 27). Rome is judged not only for her arrogance and love of luxury but also for her injustice: the list of precious cargo ends with "human lives"—a condemnation of slavery. John's voice is heard, calling on heaven and "saints and apostles and prophets" to rejoice (18:20). The cry for justice by the souls of the martyrs (6:9–11) has been answered; God has given them justice against Rome.

18:21–24. Angel Predicts Fall of Babylon. The prophets of the OT delivered their message through prophetic actions as well as words. Jeremiah orders the bearer of his oracles of judgment against Babylon to tie them to a stone and throw them into the Euphrates River, symbolizing the total demise of the city (Jer 51:63–64). A similar symbolic action concludes Rev 18: a mighty angel throws an immense millstone into the sea, foretelling the total destruction of Rome.

19:1–10. Hallelujah!: A Hymn Celebrates the Coming of the Kingdom of God. Throughout the book, John's accounts of his visions are punctuated by hymns that celebrate the power and glory of God and the Lamb, and their triumph over the powers of evil (4:8, 11; 5:9–13; 7:10–12; 11:15–18; 12:10–12; 15:3–4; cf. 16:5–7 and 21:3–4). The last of these songs in 19:1–8 celebrates God's judgment of the whore of Babylon, which has avenged the blood of God's servants. This echoes the hymn in 11:18 that rejoices that the time has come "for destroying those who destroy the earth." God's judgment is part of his salvific action, which is praised as just: "Salvation and glory and power to our God, for his judgments are true and just"—a point emphasized also in earlier songs (15:3; 16:5–7).

This hymn has four strophes: the first two are sung by a "great multitude" in heaven (cf. 7:9), after which the twenty-four elders and four living creatures of 4:4–11 join the chorus. In the last strophe, a multitude again sings, now in deafening tones: "Hallelujah!/For the Lord our God/the Almighty reigns." The coming of the kingdom of God is a major theme in the teaching of Jesus (see, e.g., Mark 1:14–15). In Matt 6:10 Jesus teaches his followers to pray: "Your kingdom come./ Your will be done,/on earth as it is in heaven" (cf. Luke 11:2). The movement of Revelation is from the present situation, when the kingship of God and of Christ the Lamb is acknowledged by all the hosts of heaven (4:1–5:13) to the final visions of the New Jerusalem, the ideal state of affairs when God's kingly rule is fully established in all the earth, and death and evil are no more. This final state, anticipated in the hymnic praises of 11:15–16; 12:10, and here in 19:6, is about to be realized by the return of the Lamb of God, his final defeat of the powers of evil, and his marriage to his pure bride, the antithesis to the whore of Babylon.

An angel instructs John to write: "Blessed are those who are invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb." John prostrates himself before the heavenly messenger, only to be rebuked and told: "Worship God!" (19:9–10) These two words encapsulate the message of the book (see on 22:6–9).

XI. The Completion of God's Kingdom (19:11–22:7)

19:11–16. The Second Coming of Christ as the Rider on a White Horse. In 4:1 John saw a door open up into heaven, and now in 19:11 he sees the heaven opened, and the last act of the eschatological drama begins. Like many other NT books, Revelation understands Christian existence as poised between the two advents of Christ, his first coming as Jesus of Nazareth to live and die for the sake of humanity, and his second coming in glory to complete God's redemption of the world through a final victory over the forces of evil. Many NT texts speak of the parousia, the second coming of Christ (e.g., Matt 25:31–46; Mark 13:4, 24–27; Luke 19:11; 21:27; Acts 1:8–11; 1 Pet 1:5–7; 5:4; 1 John 2:28–3:3). Saint Paul eagerly anticipates Christ's return, when all the dead will be raised and Christ will complete his victory over the enemies of God and deliver the kingdom over to God the Father (1 Cor 16:22, 15:22–28, 50–56; cf. 1 Thess 4:13–17; Rom 13:11). In Revelation the visions of judgment are framed by references to Christ's first coming, as the Lamb that was slain in Rev 5, and this vision of his second coming to judge and "make war" in 19:11–16.

The description of Christ as rider is full of messianic images and titles of honor. It echoes biblical passages where God is portrayed as divine warrior (e. g. Exod 15:3; Isa 59:17–19) and recalls John's vision of Christ as "one like the Son of Man" who has eyes "like a flame of fire" and a sword issuing from his mouth (1:12–20; cf. 14:4–20). The sword in his mouth to smite the nations parallels messianic prophecies like Isa 11:4: "With righteousness he shall judge the poor . . . he shall strike the earth with the rod of his mouth" (cf. 2 Esd 13:9–11; Psalms of Solomon 17:24; 2 Thess 2:8). These passages suggest that judgment comes by the power of the word of God rather than through force of arms. His rule with the "rod of iron" is based on a description of God's "messiah" in Ps 2:8–9 (cf. Rev 12:5). In the NT Christ is called Logos, or "Word of God" only here and in John 1:1 and 1 John 1:1. "King of Kings" (cf. 17:14) was used as an honorific for Persian rulers (see Ezra 7:12); elsewhere in Jewish and early Christian literature it refers to God the creator (Dan 4:37; 1 Enoch 9:2; 1 Tim 6:15). The robe dipped in blood connects the rider to the slain Lamb of Rev 5. That it also refers to the enemies' blood is suggested by Isa 63:1–6, where the divine warrior wears garments stained red from treading the winepress of his wrath. The heavenly armies that accompany the rider may also have a double reference to angelic hosts and human beings who follow the Lamb.

19:17–21. The Last Battle: Defeat of the Two Beasts. Christ comes to judge and to make war (19:11). God's final judgment on all that resists his righteous rule is at hand. This is described in 19:17–20:10 with battle imagery; a picture of the Last Judgment follows in 20:11–15. Imagery of war conveys the seriousness of the threat posed by human and superhuman evil powers. First introduced in the calls to Christians to "conquer" in Rev 2–3 and running through the book (9:7; 12:3–13; 13:7; 14:17; 16:12–16; 17:12–14), it climaxes in Rev 19–20 with the declaration of final victory over the beast, the "false prophet" (cf. 16:13; 13:11) and the "kings of the earth." The grisly feast of birds called to consume the flesh of the "kings of the earth" is a macabre twist on the "messianic banquet" that in Jewish and NT texts expresses the joy of the eschaton (e.g. Isa. 25:6–8; 55:1–2; 65:13–14; Matt 8:11; Luke 13:29; 14:15; 22:16, 29–30; cf. the "wedding feast of the Lamb" in Rev 19:9, author's trans.). The text closely parallels Ezek 39:4, 17–20, where God promises to hand over the mythic enemy of Israel, Gog of Magog, to the birds of prey. When the beast and the false prophet are confined to the "lake of fire," God's victory over his human enemies is complete. The picture of eternal punishment of those who resist God up to the end reinforces the book's repeated calls to repentance. Though the time of the last battle is near, there is still time to repent and turn to God (22:12–21).

20:1–6. The Millennium: Satan Imprisoned While the Martyrs Rule for 1,000 Years. After the rider's victory over all human enemies, the reader awaits the final victory over Satan. But first there is a surprising detour, lasting for 1,000 years, when Satan is locked into a pit so that he cannot deceive "the nations," and the martyrs are resurrected and reign together with Christ. The expectation of an earthly kingdom was common in Jewish eschatology and was also typical of Christian hope in the second century (e.g. in Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, the Montanists), though no other text speaks of a "millennium," i.e. a 1,000-year kingdom. There are hints of God's reign on earth elsewhere in the NT (Mark 14:25; 1 Cor 6:9; 15:25), but with no mention of a specific time period. Papias of Hierapolis (early second century) recalled a saying of Jesus that the creation would return to and exceed the perfection of the original creation (cited in Irenaeus, Against the Heresies 5.33.3–4). The two-stage eschatology in Rev 20–21, in which an intermediate this-worldly messianic period precedes the further eschatological events of resurrection, judgment, and descent of the New Jerusalem, has parallels in the Jewish works Apocalypse of Baruch and 2 Esdras. There was considerable debate about this subject in the early centuries of the church, with influential theologians such as Origen and Augustine disputing the belief that there would be a literal earthly kingdom.

In Revelation the millennial rule of the martyrs provides them with a special reward, an answer to the souls of those slain for their testimony in 6:9–11, who cry out for vengeance. Although description of the millennium takes up only three verses (20:4–6), this special feature of the book's eschatology has been very influential in later interpretations of the book, especially among those who understand Revelation as providing a blueprint for the eschaton. The words millennial, millenarian, and chiliastic, which are based on the Latin or Greek words for "one thousand," are used in a variety of ways, often to refer more generally to an expectation of an earthly kingdom without any specific reference to its length. Chiliastic is used to describe the earliest phase of Christian hope when an earthly kingdom of God was earnestly expected. In the sociology of religion, millenarian designates groups that expect a radical change in history and an earthly reign of the saints or the down-trodden. Millennialism takes several forms. Premillennialism, which has been very popular among American evangelicals in the 20th and 21st centuries (e.g., Hal Lindsey, Jerry Falwell, and the Left Behind series) holds that Christ's second coming will take place before the messianic reign on earth. This is often associated with a cataclysmic eschatology that envisages a divine invasion of history in a period of "tribulation" (see on 7:9–17). Postmillennialism holds that Christ's appearance will take place only after the millennium, a view often linked with evolutionary views of history inexorably moving towards its eschatological goal. This view was popular in early America. Christopher Columbus wrote in his journal of his vocation to find on earth the "new heaven and the new earth" of which John spoke in 21:1. The Boston minister Cotton Mather (d. 1638) expected that the New Jerusalem would be centered in New England. The term amillennialism refers to those who reject the idea of a future messianic reign on earth, either because they believe that 20:4–6 refers to what has already happened in the cross and resurrection of Christ or in the emergence of the church, or because they understand the passage in a purely symbolic sense. Augustine's interpretation of the millennial kingdom as time of the church is an influential example of the former. He held that the binding of Satan (20:1–3) happened in the first coming of Christ and is repeated whenever men and women are converted to the Christian faith (City of God xx.7–8). This interpretation, which drew on NT texts such as John 5:24–25 that emphasize the "already" rather than the "not yet" of God's eschatological action (cf. Mark 1:15; Luke 17:21; 3:19, Rom 3:21), became the standard interpretation in the early Middle Ages. Much of Christian eschatology can be called "amillennialist," and in many interpretations of Revelation the millennial kingdom of 20:4–6 is conflated with the description of the New Jerusalem of 21:1–22:5.

20:7–10. Satan Released and Defeated. At the end of the thousand years Satan is released and proceeds to "deceive" a multitude from the "nations," described as Gog and Magog in dependence on Ezek 38–39 (see on 19:17–21). With their attack on the saints in the "beloved city" (Jerusalem), the really last battle is engaged. Fire from heaven destroys the devil's army, and he is thrown into the "lake of fire" to experience eternal torment.

20:11–15. The Last Judgment. There follows the "second resurrection" when all the dead join the martyrs raised in the "first resurrection" (20:5), and all are judged according to their works (cf. Matt 25:31–46; Rom 2:5–11). The theme of judgment pervades biblical books from Noah's flood in Gen 6–8, through repeated predictions of judgment on a recalcitrant people in the books of Kings and prophets to the Gospels, Paul, and the Apocalypse. In the OT most judgment texts are not strictly-speaking eschatological. However severe the prophetic predictions, they usually envision continued life on earth after the divine judgment is executed in history (e.g. by delivering his people over to foreign powers such as Babylon), not a final assize after which there would be no future on earth. The idea of a last judgment for all at once appears relatively late in Jewish history, in Daniel 12:1 and 7:9–10 (second century BCE) and in the earliest parts of the Enochic corpus, e.g. 1 Enoch 10 (probably third century BCE). As in Dan 12:1, judgment in Revelation is preceded by the resurrection; the judgment scene in Revelation is particularly close to that of Dan 7:9–10 with its heavenly courtroom and books opened for scrutiny (for heavenly books see also 1 Enoch 81 and Testament of Abraham, Rec A 12). In the NT the theme of judgment appears frequently, but there are only a few descriptions of a final tribunal (Matt 25:31–45; cf. John 5:28–29). Paul looks forward to a personal assize (Rom 2:3–10; 14:10; 2 Cor 5:14) and also one in which the saints will judge the world (1 Cor 6:9).

21:1–8. The New Jerusalem: Establishment of God's Kingdom. In 21:1–22:7 the visions of God's righteous judgment on sinful humanity give way to a moving picture of what human life will be like when God's rule, celebrated in heaven in 4:1–5:14, is fully established also among the creatures of earth. Chapter 21 draws together themes from the rest of the book: as in 1:8 God proclaims himself "Alpha and Omega"; reference to one who conquers (21:7) takes up promises that conclude the messages to the seven churches (2:7, 11, 17, 26; 3:5, 12, 21). The radical nature of the transformation that establishes God's kingdom is expressed in language from the last chapters of Isaiah (65:17; 66:2): John sees a "new heaven and a new earth," and God declares that he is "making all things new." The statement that "the sea was no more" (21:1), read in the context of the ancient myth of cosmic combat (see on 12:18–13:6), is a powerful statement of the absolute sovereignty of God. While texts such as the Babylonian Enuma Elish and Job 41 recount God's defeat of the fearsome sea monster, the symbol of evil and chaos, here the hostile sea is entirely obliterated.

Next John sees the New Jerusalem coming down from heaven; that there is a Jerusalem above is alluded to briefly in Gal 4:26 and Heb 12:22 (cf. Phil 3:20). A voice coming from the heavenly throne describes the ideal state of affairs at the end time when God is truly worshiped by all in his holy city. "They will be his peoples," the voice promises, both echoing and expanding the covenant promise made to Israel by God, who proclaimed at Mount Sinai "You shall be my treasured possession out of all the peoples" (Exod 19:5; cf. Ezek 37:27–28). The message of Revelation is intended for all peoples (cf. 14:6; 15:3–4). Mourning and pain, and death itself will be abolished (cf. 1 Cor 15:26, where Paul says that at his second coming, Christ will conquer death, the "last enemy"). Promises given to the 144,000 servants of God in 7:15–17 are extended to all the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem: they will drink from the springs of the "water of life," and God himself will "wipe every tear from their eyes" (cf. Isa 25:8, author's trans.).

After this intimate and inspiring promise of divine presence and blessing, readers are reminded that they must make a choice. For only the second time in Revelation, God speaks directly in 21:5–8, declaring that the promised blessings are for those who "conquer"—that is Christians who side with the Lamb in the eschatological battle against the forces of evil. Those who prove to be cowardly and faithless will share the "lake of fire" with murderers and other grave sinners.

21:9–27. Description of the City. The New Jerusalem, symbol of the culmination of God's gracious plans for humanity, announced in 21:2, is described in 21:9–22:7. Jerusalem is a place—the promised abode for those who "conquer"—and also a people, the bride of Christ (mentioned in 19:7–9; cf. 2 Cor 11:2 and Eph 5:25–33, which describes the church as the bride of Christ). OT prophets had compared the intimate relation between God and his covenant people Israel to a marriage, in which Israel played the part of the wife. In prophetic poetry female images—beloved wife, adulteress, barren woman, widow—express the varying status of the covenant people, depending on her degree of faithfulness to her marriage vows (see, e.g., Hos 1–3; Jer 2–3; Ezek 23; Jer 50–51). For example, during the Babylonian Exile, the prophet Deutero-Isaiah portrays Jerusalem as a barren and forsaken wife who will be taken back by her divine husband and become the mother of many children (Isa 54; 60). Details of John's vision echo these prophetic texts: Jerusalem will be built with precious stones (21:11, 18–21, cf. Isa 54:11–12); the Gentiles will stream into her, bringing tribute through gates that are always open (21:24–26 cf. Isa 60:5–13).

As God is opposed by Satan and the Lamb has a negative counterpart in the beast from the Sea (the antichrist), so the New Jerusalem is contrasted to lady Babylon/Rome. The detailed description of the beauty of the city, which far surpasses the superficial beauty of the whore of Babylon (17:1–6) serves as a powerful counterweight to the attractions of Rome. Like the holy of holies of the Jerusalem Temple, the city is described as a perfect cube (21:15–16; cf. 1 Kgs 6:20). Hyperbolic description indicates that the glory of God's final kingdom is beyond imagination: the city is of immense size, fifteen hundred miles square. It is of pure gold; the foundations of its walls are made up of every precious stone imaginable, and an immense pearl forms each of the twelve gates.

Similar descriptions are found in the description of the renewed Jerusalem and its Temple in Ezek 40–48 and the Temple Scroll found in Cave 11 at Qumran. The main point of Ezekiel's vision is the return of the glory of the Lord to the Temple in Jerusalem, which would be rebuilt after the Exile (Ezek. 43:3–5). Similarly, in Revelation the divine glory previously located in heaven now returns to a transformed earth. The throne of God which John glimpsed in heaven (4:1–5:14; cf. 7:9–17; 8:1–5; 11:15–19; 15:2–8; 19:1–6), is now found on earth. The New Jerusalem of Revelation differs from its precedents in the presence of the Lamb (21:9, 22), and also in the absence of a temple.

22:1–7. The City as Paradise. An angel brings John further revelation about the city where the throne of God and the Lamb will be found, now in terms reminiscent of the garden of paradise in Gen 2–3, with its rivers (Gen 2:10–14) and "tree of life" (Gen 2:9). In the Christian Bible, the last chapters of Revelation offer a fitting conclusion to the story of God's dealing with humanity that began in Genesis: the end recapitulates and surpasses the beginning, with its new creation of heaven and earth (21:1) and a park-like city reminiscent of the garden of Eden, where God "walked" with the first human beings (Gen 3:8). Absent is the serpent of Gen 3: "nothing accursed will be found" (22:3; cf. 21:27; cf. Gen 3:14). The description also recalls the renewed temple of Ezekiel's vision, from which water will gush out, bringing great fertility (Ezek 47:1–12). The "tree of life" found "on either side of the river" whose leaves will heal the nations (22:2) resembles the many trees of Ezek 47:12 whose "fruit will be for food, and their leaves for healing." Echoing the prophecy of a renewed Jerusalem in Isa 60, the angel tells John that in the New Jerusalem the brilliance of divine glory will be such that there will be no need for lamps or even the sun (22:5); God will be its light and the Lamb its lamp (21:23–24; cf. Isa 60:1–3; 19–20).

The picture climaxes in 22:4, which promises that the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem "will see his face." Much of Jewish tradition holds that no human being can see God's face and live (e.g. Exod 33:12–23); the Gospel of John says that "No one has ever seen God" (1:18). The only other reference in Revelation to God's face says that heaven and earth flee before it (20:11). In the vision of Rev 4 John does not see God but only glimpses his glory, which he compares to precious jewels and flashes of lightning. In the beatitudes Jesus promises: "Blessed are the pure in heart for they will see God" (Matt 5:8), and Saint Paul presents seeing "face to face" as the ultimate hope (1 Cor 13:12). This is what awaits those who are faithful witnesses to Christ: the direct enjoyment of God, their creator.

XII. Epilogue (22:8–21)

A concluding word of the revealing angel relates back to 1:1–3, authenticating John's revelation and setting him in the line of inspired prophets. Christ himself then speaks, declaring "See I am coming soon!" and pronouncing a blessing on all who keep the words of John's prophecy. John addresses the reader: "I, John, am the one who heard and saw these things" (cf. 1:4, 9). In a scene that closely resembles the one in 19:9–10, the prophet, overawed by all he has seen and heard, falls down in homage before the angel and is once again admonished: "Worship God!" (22:9 cf. 19:10). This theme, introduced at the very beginning of the book (1:5–6), is portrayed vividly in 4:1–5:14 where John sees the hosts of heaven falling down in adoration before God and the Lamb. The scenes of judgment that make up so much of this book are framed by this picture of heavenly worship, on the one hand, and the vision of the New Jerusalem (21:1–22:5) on the other. As the heavenly hosts are even now falling in adoration before God, so will he be worshiped by all humanity in the New Jerusalem (cf. 15:3–5). As writers of hymns and spirituals and composers such as Handel have realized, John's Apocalypse provides not only the command to worship but also words for carrying it out, in its many hymns of praise: "Holy, Holy, Holy,/the Lord God the Almighty" (4:8); "Worthy is the Lamb that was slaughtered,/to receive power and wealth and wisdom and might" (5:12); "Hallelujah!/For the Lord our God,/the Almighty reigns" (19:6; cf. 4:11; 5:9–13; 7:10, 12; 11:15–18; 12:10–12; 15:3–4; 16:4–7; 19:1–8; 16; 21:3–5).

The final verses in 22:12–21 offer testimonies about the importance of the book, warnings to all who alter or fail to heed its words, blessings, and invitations. Blessings reinforce images from the book's visions: those who "wash their robes" (cf. 7:14) are promised food from the "tree of life" (cf. 22:2; 2:7), drink from the "water of life" (cf. 7:17; 22:1), and the right to enter the city by its gates (cf.

21:21, 25–26). The Apocalypse began with an appearance of the awe-inspiring "one like the Son of Man" (1:12–16), followed by his words to the seven churches (2:1–3:22). Here at the end, John again hears words of Christ, who declares himself David's heir and the "bright morning star" and claims for himself a title earlier given to God: "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end" (22:13, cf. 1:8; 21:6). The book ends on a note of eager expectation: a thrice-repeated command to "Come!" invites all to partake of the blessings John's visions promise. Repeating his earlier words (1:3, 7–8; cf. 2:16; 3:11) Christ promises to come soon, and John responds: "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!"

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. Aune. Revelation. 3 vol. WBC 52A–C (Dallas: Word, 1997–98); R. Bauckham. The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); A. Y. Collins. Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984); J. Kovacs and C. Rowland. Revelation. Blackwell Bible Commentaries (Oxford: Blackwell, 2004); F. Murphy. Fallen is Babylon: The Revelation to John (Harrisburg, Penn.: Trinity, 1998); B. Rossing. The Rapture Exposed (Boulder: Westview, 2004); C. Rowland. "Revelation." NIB (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994) 12:503–743; F. Van der Meer. Apocalypse: Visions from the Book of Revelation in Western Art (London: Thames and Hudson, 1978).

HOW THE BIBLE WAS CREATED

DAVID L. PETERSEN

The object of this commentary, the Christian Bible, is the result of a long and complicated process of growth. Portions of the OT (e.g., Judg 5) probably date to the Early Iron Age, prior to the time that David ruled Israel. The most recently completed literature (e.g., 1 John) in the New Testament stems from ca. 100 CE.

The literature that emerged in this one-thousand-year period reflects a number of differing perspectives. Some were designed to testify to momentous events in the life of the religious community, whether poetic versions of God's victories on Israel's behalf (Exod 15) or prose accounts concerning the arrival of the Holy Spirit among early Christians (Acts 2). Both Testaments preserve accounts created to narrate the lives of pivotal individuals, e.g., Moses and David in the OT, Jesus and Paul in the NT. Such accounts include a "biographic" component—where possible constructing accounts of births and/or deaths—but the literature includes far more than that, namely, the torah presented by Moses and the numerous sayings of Jesus. Biblical authors attended both to individuals and to the communities of which they were a part.

This literature emerged in diverse ways. Some literature may be readily traced to an identifiable individual—a Micah who uttered the oracles preserved in the book known by his name or a Paul who composed lengthy letters such as the book of Romans. (Letters or, more generally, communications within the religious community, e.g., Jer 29 and the NT epistolary literature, are prominent in the Bible.) Other literature is anonymous. No one knows for certain who wrote either the book of Ruth or the Gospel known as Matthew. Nonetheless, there can be little doubt that each book was composed by one individual. Other literature, also anonymous, emerged from the community's life, such as worship. For example, Psalms (100 or 150) are made up of traditional and oft-repeated phrases. Similarly, the hymn preserved in Col 1:15–20 was available for use by the author of this putative letter. The community itself is best understood as the author of these hymns.

Once emergent biblical literature was at hand, editors/redactors arranged and often supplemented it. Someone ordered the Psalter and divided it into five books, no doubt mirroring the five books of the Torah. Someone else placed the sayings of Jesus in a meaningful sequence. Such individuals also created additions to the literature they inherited, e.g., Hosea 14:9 and Mark 16:9–20. These unnamed contributors were responsible for the shape of the Christian Bible.

Religious communities preserved particular forms of the Christian Bible. Early Christians used the Greek Old Testament (LXX), which includes a form of the book of Jeremiah that is one eighth shorter than that in the Hebrew Bible. The shorter form of Jeremiah is still used by the Orthodox churches. As a result, one must recognize that there are multiple versions of the Christian Bible, the differences reflecting the needs and practices of particular religious communities.

CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

EILEEN M. SCHULLER

The phrase "Canon of the Old Testament" depends upon concepts and vocabulary adopted by the Christian church from the fourth century CE. Canon designates the list of those books that are considered to be inspired, sacred, and authoritative, and, hence, that make up the Bible. These books constitute a norm or a standard (the basic sense of the Greek word kanon is "a reed/measure") for the definition of both what is to be believed (faith) and what is to be done (action). The language of canon per se was not traditionally used in Judaism, though other terminology such as "the holy writings" and "books that make the hands unclean" designated a body of literature of special sacredness and authority.

In its strictest sense, canonicity concerns the decision of what books are to be included and what books are to be excluded so as to result in the formation of a fixed corpus. In the early Christian world, the development of the idea of canon was probably influenced by changes in the ways in which texts were written. The codex (a book with pages) came to be the standard format for writing the Bible, in contrast to earlier collections of loose scrolls, each containing one or more works. With a codex, it was immediately obvious what was "in" or between the covers. The scope of the term canon was sometimes expanded to include the ordering of the individual books. Though it has sometimes been assumed that the establishment of canon also involved the identification of a specific text of a given book, the decision about canonicity was in fact usually limited to a book per se, without specifying a specific textual form. For example, the book of Jeremiah was judged canonical, whether in its longer Hebrew form or its shorter edition preserved in Greek translation in the Septuagint. Many other matters are closely related to issues of canonicity, such as the authority of a particular biblical book, the establishment of its authenticity (i.e., who really wrote it), and the language of inspiration ("inspired by God" 1 Tim 3:16).

There are different Old Testament canons: the Jewish Canon, the Protestant Canon, the Roman Catholic Canon, and the various canons of the Orthodox churches. This variety is not surprising since a canon is intrinsically linked to a community and to the authority of that community to make decisions about what will define its identity. Such decisions represent the "process of canonization."

One may examine this process by looking at the final stage and then moving to the question of when and how these lists were compiled. Judaism has a canon of twenty-four books, divided into three sections: the Law/Torah (five books of Moses, the Pentateuch); eight books of Prophets/Nevi'im (Joshua, Judges, 1–2 Samuel [one book], 1–2 Kings [one book], Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets [considered as a single book]); eleven books of Writings/Ketuvim (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth Lamentations Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah [one book], 1–2 Chronicles [one book]). The order of this third section is that of the talmudic lists (b. B. Bat 14b–15a) though in many Masoretic manuscripts (e.g., the Leningrad Codex) the order can vary, with Chronicles coming first. The rabbis used the acronym Tanak (Torah – Nevi'im – Kebuvim) to designate their scripture. The Protestant canon, as defined at the time of the Reformation, contains the same books as the Jewish canon, but counted as thirty-nine (for example, each of the Minor Prophets is counted separately). The Roman Catholic Canon, as defined by the Council of Trent in 1546, contains these books plus seven more (Tobit, Judith, 1–2 Maccabees, Wisdom Ecclesiasticus (also called Sirach), and Baruch, as well as Additions to Daniel and Esther). The canon of the various Orthodox churches has been less clearly defined but regularly includes additional books such as 1 Esdras, Prayer of Manasseh, 3 and 4 Maccabees, and Esdras. In the various Christian canons, the books are divided into four sections that come in the order: Pentateuch, the Historical Books, the Wisdom Books, and the Prophets, i.e., in an order different from that of the Tanak. In the Christian church, it is the Old Testament canon followed by the New Testament canon that makes up the Bible (Biblica, "the books").

Scholars are now challenging and revising many of the traditional assumptions about the development of the canon.

The traditional view, articulated in the Middle Ages, was that, in the post-exilic period, Ezra and "Men of the Great Assembly" had already assembled a collection of twenty-four books that were then divided into three parts. In the nineteenth century, a number of scholars (such as Heinrich Graetz, Frants Buhl, Herbert Edward Ryle) formulated what came to be the standard hypothesis. They theorized that the canon emerged in three distinct historical stages: (1) the Law/Torah was in place circa 400 BCE, as is suggested by Ezra bringing back "the law of your God" from Babylon (Ezra 7:14), a book that was apparently read and accepted by the community in Jerusalem (Neh 8). (2) The Prophets were fixed by approximately 200 BCE as attested by Ben Sira especially in his "Praise of Famous Men." Sirach 9–44 clearly knows most of the prophets and the collection of the twelve minor prophets. Moreover, in the Prologue of Ben Sira (written in 132 BCE), his grandson writes that "many great teachings have been given to us through the law and the prophets and the others that followed them" (vv. 1–2, 7–10, 23–25). (3) The third section (Writings) was fixed at the end of the first century CE at the so-called "Council of Yavneh" (Jamnia in Greek), an assembly of learned sages that was supposedly held at a coastal city that had become the center of Jewish learning after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. At that time, the sages debated the status of certain disputed books (Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs) and made decisions about what belonged in the canon. This theory explained certain puzzling features of the Bible (for example, Daniel, though containing prophetic-like words, appears in the Writings. It could not have been placed with the Prophets, since that collection had been "closed" prior to the time that Daniel was written.)

Beginning in the 1960s, a number of scholars (e.g., Jack Lewis, Peter Schäfer, G. Stremling) reexamined the rabbinic materials related to Yavneh and concluded that there is little evidence to support the aforementioned theory. The picture of a council of sages drawing up a list and making decisions about what to include and exclude was largely a retrojection from how later Christian church councils worked. Whatever discussions went on at Yavneh were concerned only with limited questions about a few specific books that were already accepted, even though debate about these books continued for a long time. Then, in the 1970s, various scholars (especially Albert Sundberg) reexamined the evidence for the claim that there had existed an alternate, more expansive

"Alexandrian canon" that had been fixed by Diaspora Judaism and then taken over by the Greek-speaking Christian church. Sundberg demonstrated that there is no evidence that such an Alexandrian canon existed and hence it was not passed on to the Christian church as the basis for the fourth and fifth century CE Christian codices (Vaticanus, Sinaiticus).

But if a "Council of Yavneh" was not the defining moment, when can one begin to talk of a "canon"? Certain scholars, (e.g., Sid Z. Leiman, Roger Beckwith) have attempted to push the fixing of set lists of books back to the second century BCE, making central such texts as 2 Mac 2:14, "Judas also collected all the books that had been lost on account of the war that had come upon us." But such a view reads far too much into an isolated statement, and there is much evidence that simply does not fit with such an early dating for the lists of biblical books.

With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls (1948–1956) and their subsequent publication, scholars now have literature that provides a window on what were the authoritative texts for at least one group of Jews in the Second Temple period. These documents reveal a much more complicated picture than the older paradigm presented. Many scholars contend that to use the language of "Bible, biblical" during the Second Temple period is inappropriate. There is no evidence for a set list of "books of the Bible" during this time. Nonetheless, it is clear that some books were authoritative and used for teaching and interpretation. As a result, one can speak about a developing concept of scriptures, if not yet Bible. In the Scrolls and in the New Testament, the formula "Moses and the prophets," often clearly refers to written texts—the books of Moses and the prophets—and these are cited as authorities for teaching and legal regulations, "as God said through xxx," "as it is written in xxx." Clearly Moses and the Prophets are the two primary canonical categories (so the Prologue to Ben Sira quoted above); and there is sometimes a third category of "David" or "Psalms" (cf. Luke 24:44, "everything written about me in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the Psalms") but the contents of this third category is much less clear during this period.

The Scrolls present clues about the importance and stature of individual biblical books. One might infer that Genesis, Deuteronomy, and Isaiah—with fifteen, twenty-nine, and twenty one copies, respectively—had a somewhat different status or at least played a different role than books like Proverbs or Chronicles, of which only one or two copies are preserved. In addition, commentaries were being written on the Torah and many of the prophetic books, not only to explain problematic passages (e.g., the Commentary on Genesis, 4Q252) but more frequently to indicate how these words from the past have ongoing relevance and, when properly interpreted, are actually addressing the contemporary community (e.g., Peshar Habakkuk, 1QpHab). It is especially significant that there are also at least eleven copies of 1 Enoch and fifteen or sixteen copies of Jubilees (more copies than of many "biblical" books), and these are taken up in later works, e.g., the Damascus Document quotes Jubilees (CD 16:2–4) and the Letter of Jude cites 1 Enoch as a source of authority (Jude 14–15). A book such as the Temple Scroll, which is formulated in the first person as the very words of God, may have functioned as authoritative scripture for this particular group of Jews, whose scrolls were preserved at Qumran, but it may not have had similar stature among other groups like the Pharisees.

The Dead Sea Scrolls demonstrate that there was not yet a uniform and standardized textual form for many or even most important books. Both long and short books of Jeremiah, for instance, seemed to have been read and quoted; the same is true for different editions of the books of Samuel. For the book of Psalms, there were different collections in circulation, some closer to what became the standard Masoretic collection of 150 psalms, others with some different contents and ordering, suggesting that at least the final third of the Psalter was not yet standardized. For the Pentateuch, it is sometimes very difficult to know whether a particular manuscript would have been considered simply another version of the text or whether it was now something different, a commentary on or "rewriting" of Scripture. Clearly there was a developing sense of a "sacred scripture," but the definitive canon was still not in place.

The earliest evidence concerning the enumeration of biblical books—though not an actual list—comes from two Jewish sources, both circa 90–100 CE. In Contra Apionem 1.34–43, Josephus claims that there are twenty-two "justly accredited books"—the same number as the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet. According to Josephus, antiquity of composition was a prime consideration for inclusion in this list; all these books were written in the time from "from Moses until Artaxerxes," the time of "the exact succession of the prophets." In addition, Josephus included four books that "contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life." The author of 4 Ezra (2 Esdras) 14:45–46 knows ninety-four sacred books, but he distinguished between "the twenty-four books" that all have access to, in contrast to "the seventy that were written last" and reserved for "the wise." Fourth Ezra probably had much the same corpus in mind as Josephus, but they were arranged and enumerated differently.

In the decades after the destruction of the Temple, the process of defining what books were to be considered authoritative for the Jewish community continued. Some books were excluded, e.g., 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra, Jubilees, though the reasons for such decisions are not self-evident. These reasons may have included the language in which a book was written; no books written in languages other than Hebrew (though portions of Ezra-Nehemiah and Daniel are written in Aramaic) were included. No books containing revelations to figures other than Moses (for instance, Enoch) were included. In addition, there was apparently minimal interest in books filled with apocalyptic speculations and in books promoting a solar calendar (rather than the lunar calendar of the rabbis). The Babylonian Talmud (b. B. Bat 14b–15a) includes one of the earliest lists of biblical books. The early Christian community was going through much the same process in the first centuries of the Common Era. The major Christian codices (Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, Alexandrinus) did not share exactly the same combinations or orderings of books. The letter of Melito of Sardis gave one of the earliest lists (though Esther is omitted) and the Festal Letter of Athanasius of Alexandria (367 CE) used the language of "the books included in the canon and handed down and credited as divine." In the late fourth century, Jerome distinguished between those books that were accepted by the Jews and those that were not, calling the latter "apocrypha" or "deuterocanonical" (that is, a "second" list). Other church fathers, especially Augustine, advocated an expanded canon; and his view prevailed. At the time of the Reformation, debates about what books to include in the canon came to the fore for a variety of reasons, including renewed attention to reading the Bible in Hebrew and debates over doctrinal issues, some of which were justified on the basis of texts in books not in the shorter canon (e.g., 2 Macc 12:46, "it is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead"). In the end, Luther and the Anglican church adopted the shorter "Hebrew" canon, although they urged the publication of the Apocrypha in a separate section of the Bible. The German Bible of 1534 states, "these books are not held to be equal to the sacred scriptures, yet are useful and good for reading." And the Anglican "Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion" (1563) says that the books of the Apocrypha are to be read "for example of life and instruction of manners" though "not for the establishment of doctrine." Churches that followed the Reformed tradition of Geneva gave no status to the Apocrypha, and these books were not printed with the Bible. It was in this context that the Council of Trent (1546) for the first time made a definitive conciliar list of books, including seven not present in the Hebrew Bible (Tobit, Judith, 1–2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch) that are to be accepted as "sacred and canonical . . . in their entirety and with all their parts" (Session 4, Decree 1). In recent years, many editions of the Bible, especially those published for scholarly use, have included a full selection of Apocryphal books (not only those accepted at Trent, but others used by various Orthodox churches), usually printing these as a separate section.

In addition to seeking a better understanding of the processes by means of which the OT canon developed, there has recently been renewed interest in thinking theologically about canon. For a religious community that has a canon, no one book can be read in isolation; one portion of the canon must be read as a part of a larger whole. For example, precisely because the reward–punishment dynamic of Proverbs is read in conjunction with the radical questioning of Job, both are read quite differently than if only one of those texts were in the canon. Canon assumes a foundational and underlying unity, even as it highlights and allows for theological diversity. For Christians, the Old Testament is always read with the New Testament, and concomitantly the New Testament is always read with the Old Testament. In recent discussion, much attention has been devoted to the formative stages of the process—the movement from communal, epic literature to authoritative texts and then to a set list of canonical books. Yet the closure of canon is not the final word. A religious community that has a canon must engage in ongoing interpretation of it; in that sense the fixing of canon is a starting point as much as it is an end point.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. Beckwith. The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); S. Leiman. The Canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures: The Talmudic and Midrashic Evidence (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1976); L. Martin MacDonald. The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission and Authority (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1995, 3rd edition); L. M. MacDonald and J. Sanders. The Canon Debate (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 2002); J. Sanders. Canon and Community: A Guide to Canonical Criticism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); A. C. Sundberg. The Old Testament of the Early Church (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1964).

CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

SHANE BERG

The New Testament canon refers to the collection of ancient Christian documents recognized in varying ways as authoritative and normative by most Christian traditions. The term canon derives from a Greek word that means "rule" (i.e., a tool for measurement), and by extension "standard" or "norm," and in the ancient church originally connoted a list of approved writings. The term eventually came also to refer to the normative status of such approved writings for Christian life and faith.

I. THE EMERGENCE OF THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH

The earliest core of the New Testament canon comprises the Pauline letters, the four Gospels, and Acts. The letters of Paul began to be compiled not long after his death, though such collections went beyond the letters typically regarded by modern scholars as being from Paul's own hand (Romans, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians, and Philemon) to include the pseudepigraphic Ephesians, Colossians, 2 Thessalonians, 1–2 Timothy, Titus, and sometimes also the anonymous Epistle to the Hebrews. References in the writings of Clement of Rome and Ignatius of Antioch clearly indicate that such Pauline letter collections were in circulation by the early second century CE. The earliest attested manuscript evidence for the Pauline letter collection is P46, a papyrus codex dating roughly to the beginning of the third century CE that originally contained ten epistles arranged according to length (Romans, Hebrews, 1–2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, 1–2 Thessalonians).

By the end of the second century CE, the four Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John) were circulating together, at least in the West, as is attested by Irenaeus in his creative apology for the fourfold Gospel in Adversus Haereses (3.11.8). Tertullian, writing in north Africa at the beginning of the third century, also clearly regards Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John as the exclusively authoritative Gospels for Christians. In the Greek-speaking East, however, other Gospels seem to have flourished alongside Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John well into the third century CE. The papyrus codex P45, dating to the first half of the third century CE, is the earliest manuscript witness to a collection of the four Gospels (it includes Acts as well).

The Acts of the Apostles was written by the same author as the Gospel of Luke and clearly intended as a literary complement to it. Acts was nonetheless separated from Luke at an early stage of transmission and had a textual history independent from it for more than two centuries. The Catholic Epistles—so called because they do not address specific communities or congregations and thus are "catholic," or universal—came together as a collection much more slowly than the Pauline Epistles or the Gospels. 1 Peter and 1 John were known in the second to fourth centuries CE, but their status is unclear. Even more murky is the standing of 2 Peter, Jude, 2–3 John, and James. Their circulation seems to have been limited to particular local areas until the fourth century, when Eusebius characterizes them as widely-known but of disputed status as authoritative Christian literature (Ecclesiastical History 3.25.3).

The Apocalypse of John, also known as Revelation, has a colorful history in the ancient church. It is widely attested from the second century CE onward, but its status as authoritative wavered due to disputes about its appropriate interpretation. Despite some dissenters, Revelation was generally accepted in the West by the third century CE. Disagreements continued late into the fourth century in the East, however; and even after it acquired authoritative standing, its interpretation was a frequent source of contention.

An important snapshot of the emerging canon is provided by Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, in his Ecclesiastical History (c. 325 CE). He assigns books to one of three categories based on their status in the Christian communities with which he was familiar.

The first category comprises the universally recognized books, and Eusebius places here the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Pauline epistles, 1 Peter, and 1 John. The second category contains books whose status is disputed, and here he lists James, Jude, 2 Peter, and 2–3 John. The final category is that of spurious books, in which he puts the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Didache. Eusebius lists Revelation under both the recognized and the spurious books, indicating both times the uncertainty of its inclusion. He also notes that some regard the Epistle to the Hebrews as spurious.

A variety of canon lists is attested in the fourth and fifth centuries CE. Athanasius' Festal Letter of 367 CE is the first known time that the canon is defined as the 27 books that comprise the contemporary Christian canon. While the boundaries of the canon were not definitively set at this point, especially in the East, its overall shape changed little in the ensuing debates about particular books in the following two centuries.

The great parchment codices of the fourth and fifth centuries CE are the earliest extant manuscript witnesses to an entire canon of the New Testament. Sinaiticus and Vaticanus are typically dated to the fourth century CE, while codices Alexandrinus and Ephraemi belong to the fifth century CE. All five of these codices contain the 27 books of the traditional New Testament canon, but they contain a few additional works as well, such as the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas (Sinaiticus) and 1–2 Clement (Alexandrinus).

II. THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSIONS ABOUT THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH

Older scholarship tended to emphasize the significance of conflict as the definitive factor in the emergence of a canon of the New Testament in ancient Christianity. The threat posed by Marcion and his unique canon (the Gospel of Luke and select Pauline letters, all heavily edited) in the second century CE, for example, was regarded as a major impetus for the formation of a canon among orthodox Christians. The Montanist and Gnostic movements of the second and third centuries CE were similarly considered significant catalysts for the definition of a canon of the New Testament.

While there is little doubt that such conflicts exerted some influence on the emerging canon, their impact has been exaggerated by those who view ancient Christianity as a struggle between a protoorthodox church and various heretical groups. Locating the development of the canon of the New Testament against this sort of historical narrative falls short in two ways. First, the historical narrative itself is flawed insofar as its portrait of an embattled orthodox church is anachronistic and grossly oversimplifies the fluid and complex landscape of Christianity in the second, third, and fourth centuries CE. Second, emphasizing the role of conflict in the formation of the canon of the New Testament ignores the fact that early Christian theological discussions do not themselves typically highlight the role of conflict. They rather tend to provide positive reasons for the inclusion of books in the canon.

Leaders in the ancient church articulate several positive criteria by which the canonical status of a book is to be judged. Though these criteria are not constant and vary widely in their interpretation and application, they nonetheless are broadly attested. One key marker of a book's status within the canon was its coherence with apostolic teaching as summarized in the "rule of faith," a narrative summary of core Christian beliefs. Another was a book's "catholicity," by which was meant the relevance of its content for the wider church rather than for a limited community. Finally, a book that had been profitably read over a long sweep of time by a large number of Christian communities of faith was often regarded as canonical, and it is reasonable to suggest that such traditional use of a book was the most influential factor in the ultimate shape of the canon of the New Testament.

The 27 books that came to comprise the canon of the New Testament by the end of late antiquity remain authoritative to the present day for Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Orthodox Christians.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. Barr. Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); H. Von Campenhausen. The Formation of the Christian Bible (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); H. Gamble. Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts (New Haven: Yale, 1995); L. McDonald. The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission, and Authority (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 2007); B. Metzger. The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance (Oxford and New York: Oxford, 1987).

HEBREW NARRATIVE

TOD LINA FELT

Approximately 3000 years ago, there emerged in ancient Israel a new form of storytelling: extended prose narrative. There are, to be sure, extended narratives from the ancient world that predate biblical narrative, including the justly famous Epic of Gilgamesh and the less well-known but more closely related Ugaritic (or Canaanite) narratives. But these are in verse, or poetic, form, and bear more clearly the markings of oral composition. However, with the earliest Hebrew biblical narratives, one can see the effects of the transition to writing, including a more flexible prose form of storytelling, where composition is not bound to the strict rhythms of the poetic line. Moreover, the author of a literary text, unlike the singer of an orally composed tale, can work at a more leisurely pace, can stop writing and return to the work, and can edit at will. The resulting long narrative form—found for example in the books of Genesis and of Samuel—displays many of the literary techniques that will come to mark both history-writing and the novel: a third-person narrator who is removed from the plot and whose presence is less strongly felt by a reader than the traditional oral storyteller's presence is felt by an audience; the ability to track changes undergone by characters over the course of a lifetime and by families or nations over several generations; and the presence of allusion, of ambiguity, and of irony. Later biblical authors, working out of this tradition of written, prose narrative, will produce a shorter form—represented by the books of Ruth and Esther—in which the complexities of plot and character are condensed to the length of a short story. And in the late books of Ezra and Nehemiah one finds, unusually for the Bible, a first-person narrator (e.g., Ezra 8:15–34; Neh 13).

Perhaps the most distinctive characteristic of biblical Hebrew narrative is its rigorous economy of style. That is, biblical narrative evinces a drastically stripped-down manner of storytelling, making use of a fairly limited vocabulary and tending to avoid metaphors and other sorts of figurative language. Indeed, biblical narrative tends to avoid description of any sort, metaphorical or otherwise. What do Adam and Eve look like? Abraham? Sarah? Moses? Readers do not know. Occasionally a certain quality is ascribed to some person or object: readers are told that Eve perceives that the tree of knowledge is "a delight to the eyes" (Gen 3:6), and likewise we are told that Joseph is "handsome and good-looking" (Gen 39:6). But, as a rule, such minimal notations are given only when necessary to introduce some element that is important to the development of the plot. In the present cases, the attractiveness of the tree of knowledge leads, of course, to the eating of its fruit, and Joseph's attractiveness leads, in the next verse, to the sexual aggression of Potiphar's wife and thus indirectly to Joseph's imprisonment. But even here, readers are not told what it is that makes the fruit attractive or just what physical qualities make Joseph so handsome.

Beyond a lack of physical description in the biblical stories, descriptions of personal qualities are largely absent. Characterization in biblical narrative, in other words, is rarely explicit, but rather must be teased out of the narrative based on what characters do and what they say. One learns Jacob is cunning and deceptive, for example, not because readers are told so but because they see him trick his brother, his father, and his brother-in-law Laban, and they hear him lie to them. As a rule, it is the actions and the dialogue of the characters that leads the readers' judgments about them, rather than explicit commentary or moral evaluation on the part of the narrator. By not directly revealing the qualities of character of the actors in the narrative, the narrator puts the onus of interpretation on the readers, who must work out on their own—albeit with hints given—what they think of these characters.

Beyond the question of what characters might look like or what sort of people they might be, readers may best see the complexity of this mode of characterization when it comes to the inner lives of the characters. Biblical narrators rarely report what a character might be thinking or feeling at any given moment. What are Eve and Adam thinking when they reach for the fruit from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil in the garden of Eden? What is God thinking in forbidding that fruit? (Despite Christianity's long tradition of original sin, the answer to neither of these questions is immediately clear, and both prove quite interestingly complex if taken seriously.) What goes through Abraham's mind when God demands, in Gen 22, that he sacrifice his son Isaac? (The inner calm of absolute faith? Perhaps. But perhaps also anger, disbelief, or even disgust—with God for demanding such a sacrifice, or with himself for failing to protest.) What is going through Aaron's mind when his two sons are burned alive with fire from God (Lev 10)? (The narrator reports only that "Aaron was silent." Does this indicate mute acceptance? Crippling grief? A barely controlled anger? Pure shock?) As these representative examples show, biblical narrative exploits to great effect a genuine inner life and a complex, private subjectivity. Biblical narrative is, then, essentially "realistic" in its portrayal of human characters, since in real life people do not have direct access to the complicated inner lives of those they encounter, learning to rely instead on hints they receive about what people are really thinking or feeling, and basing their sense of what sort of people they are on what they do and what they say, on actions and dialogue.

One way, at least, in which biblical narrative is not entirely realistic is the sometimes jarring concreteness with which God is imagined as active in the world: God shows up at the tent of Sarah and Abraham to promise them offspring (Gen 18); God destroys Pharaoh's army at the Red Sea (Exod 14); God inscribes with God's own hand the tablets of the covenant at Sinai (Exod 34:1); and in the final, poignant scene of the Torah, God buries Moses after allowing him a vision of the promised land that he is not finally to enter (Deut 34:1–8). But if the Hebrew literary imagination is relentlessly concrete in its workings, including its imaginings of God, it is not without subtlety. In fact, divine agency and human agency are imagined in these narratives as being bound together in such a way that neither is autonomous or effective in and of itself. And so, God announces to Rebekah (Gen 25) that the elder of her twins (Esau) will serve the younger (Jacob), but two chapters later, when the time has come to deliver the blessing to the proper son, God has apparently left the matter to Rebekah to work out, which she does with great effectiveness. In Gen 50, Joseph may declare to the brothers who, thirteen chapters and many years earlier had sold him into slavery, that "even though you intended to do harm to me, God intended it for good," but the story also makes clear that it is largely his own wits and talent, rather than any supernatural intervention, that allow him to survive and prosper in Egypt. And in the exodus story, we learn that God claims responsibility for "hardening" Pharaoh's heart so that he refuses to allow Israel to leave (Exod. 7:3; 14:4); but Pharaoh is said by the narrator to have hardened his own heart (8:15, 32). Still other times a passive voice is used, so that Pharaoh's heart "was hardened" or "became hard" (7:14; 8:15; 9:7), thereby leaving the agency behind the hardening unclear. This ambiguity allows the narrative to retain a sense of God's sovereign activity in history, while at the same time affirming the moral culpability of Pharaoh, whose repeated promise of freedom is never fulfilled and thus represents rather realistically the psychology of tyranny. Logically, readers may want to know, which was it? Did God harden Pharaoh's heart, or did Pharaoh harden his own heart? But the story refuses to come down on one answer or another, giving us a "both/and" that reflects a pronounced trend in biblical narrative to render not only the inner lives of both humans and God, but creation and history itself, as unfathomably complex and finally unresolvable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. Alter. The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic, 1981); E. Auerbach. "Odysseus' Scar." Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1953) 3–23; J. P. Fokkelman. Reading Biblical Narrative (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005); E. Greenstein. "On the Genesis of Biblical Prose Narrative." Prooftexts (1988) 347–63; D. M. Gunn and D. N. Fewell. Narrative in the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993); R. Kawashima, Biblical Narrative and the Death of the Rhapsode (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004); M. Sternberg. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987).

LEGAL LITERATURE

JAMES W. WATTS

The Old Testament collects almost all laws in the Pentateuch/Torah. Here ancient Near Eastern traditions and genres of legal, ritual, and wisdom literature are mixed together in collections of laws to reflect the divine identity of the law-giver. Normative applications of this prescriptive literature were initially based on the Pentateuch's status as Temple law, and only later extended to other aspects of ancient Jewish life.

The laws of the Old Testament appear in several distinct collections. Both Exodus and Deuteronomy present the Decalogue as a separate unit (Exod 20:2–17; Deut 5:6–21) and give it priority before the larger collections that follow it. Exodus continues with three chapters of instructions and regulations ("the Covenant Code," Exod 20:22–23:33). Its contents resemble but do not match the much larger collection of laws in Deut 12–26 and to a lesser degree the stipulations of Lev 17–27. The latter collection is usually called "the Holiness Code" because of the refrain, "You shall be holy as I, the LORD your God, am holy" (19:2, 20:7, etc.). Other materials in the Pentateuch may also count as legal literature, depending on how one defines "law." Scholars often label the instructions for offerings and rituals in Lev 1–7 and 11–16 as "the Priestly Code." Related materials are scattered through Numbers (18–19, 28–30, 35–36). The instructions for building the tabernacle and for ordaining the priests (Exod 25–31; cf. Exod 35–40; Lev 8–10) share many similarities in style and content with the Priestly Code, but are not usually included in it. Counting inclusively, however, laws and instructions make up more than half the contents of the Pentateuch.

That explains the Jewish name for this collection, the Torah. The word, torah, may be translated as "law" or "instruction" (see "Torah," NIDB). That term appears in the Pentateuch to designate individual provisions ("This is the torah of the guilt offering," Lev 7:1; author's trans.) and to function as a summary term for the entire divine revelation ("This is the torah that Moses set before the Israelites," Deut 4:44, author's trans.). The latter usage led to its application to the Pentateuch as a whole. The designation of the five books as the Torah, however, does not just reflect the preponderance of legal material in that literature. It also refers the fact that law appears almost exclusively here in the Hebrew Bible. The only exception is Ezek 40–48, which also presents itself as "the law of the Temple" (43:12). Like the Pentateuch, these chapters depict God delivering law through the vision of a priest-prophet, but Ezekiel instead of Moses. Other biblical books contain many genres of literature, but no law. Despite the fact that they narrate stories about many kings, they never depict kings issuing laws. The Old Testament portrays almost all of Israel's laws as having come from God through Moses. Though the Pentateuch's legal collections were written at different times, mostly long after Moses, the biblical writers nevertheless retrojected them back into the period just after the exodus from Egypt. For these writers, all Israel's laws were presented to Israel by Moses.

The diverse legal collections of the Pentateuch show clear indications of deriving from a tradition of legal literature rooted originally in Mesopotamia. Archeologists have uncovered legal collections by Sumerians and Babylonians dating from the late third and early second millenniums BCE. These traditions of criminal and civil laws influenced the later codes of the Assyrians and the Hittites, as well as biblical law. For example, the law of the goring ox appears in almost all of the collections (e.g., Exod 21:28–32). Though each presents a variant on the regulation about how to compensate for damage inflicted by an ox, they contain enough similarities to confirm that they are the products of a continuous tradition of legal thought.

Biblical legal collections, however, distinguish themselves from this tradition in two major respects. Their contents mix ritual regulations and moral exhortations among the civil and criminal laws, something unprecedented in the Mesopotamian legal collections. Of course Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Hittite literatures contain many ritual and exhortatory texts, but they do not include that kind of material with their legal collections. The Pentateuch stands out for combining genres of ritual instruction and of wisdom teachings with legal traditions. That the Pentateuch's legal literature appears within a story that credits all of it to God is its other major distinguishing feature. Many other ancient legal collections also appear between narrative introductions praising the law-givers' achievements and concluding sanctions promising blessings on those who preserve the laws and curses on those who do not (cf. Lev 26; Deut 27–31). While Mesopotamian legal collections sometimes credit a god with inspiring the sense of justice behind a particular text, however, they give the credit for formulating the laws themselves to a king (e.g. Hammurabi). The Pentateuch, by contrast, has no room in its story for an Israelite king (though Deut 17:14–20 makes brief provision for the possibility of a future king). Instead, Yahweh God of Israel takes the role of king, defending Israel against its enemies (Exod 6–13) and issuing its laws. Because the royal lawgiver is also divine, however, the Torah shows as much concern for ritual regulations (frequently credited to divine revelation in the ancient Near East) and moral exhortation (often attributed to divine wisdom if not inspiration) as for criminal and civil laws.

It would be easy to assume that the Bible owes its normative authority to the fact that the Torah contains so much legal literature. Yet legal collections do not seem to have played normative roles in ancient Mesopotamia. None of the many documents from law courts that have survived cite written laws or legal collections, nor do ancient courts seem to have conformed to written laws in any other ways. Court procedures were governed by oral custom. Written collections of law seem rather to have been the product of an academic tradition of legal reflection, which was occasionally employed as propaganda by kings like Hammurabi to legitimize themselves as just and, therefore, legitimate rulers.

Ritual texts, on the other hand, were frequently cited to justify the ritual practices of temples and kings. In Egypt, lector priests displayed the scrolls publicly that mandated the proper performance of various rites. Mesopotamian kings would search for old foundation texts to tell them the architectural plans for restoring ruined temples. Hittite kings cited old texts to revive abandoned rituals in hopes of warding off plagues and famines. The first written documents to have been used as normative guides for practice seem to have been ritual texts.

That was also the case in Israel. The accounts of Israel's history after settlement in the land (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and even Chronicles) do not depict the Torah, or any written law, being explicitly cited very often except by the narrators of these accounts. When a "book of the Torah" does finally appear in the narratives late in the Judean monarchy and again after the Babylonian Exile, it is mainly used by Josiah and Ezra to persuade the people of Judea to engage in ritual reforms, especially to revive proper observance of the pilgrimage festivals, Passover and Sukkot (Tabernacles). The stories imply a lack of attention to written Torah in Israel's previous history by noting that these festivals had not been observed correctly, or perhaps observed at all, since the time of the Judges (2 Kgs 23:22; Neh 8:17).

Thus Torah first wielded normative authority over ritual affairs. During the Persian period, it was recognized as Temple law in Jerusalem. Only later in the Second Temple period, as the ritual requirements of Temple worship were gradually extended to other places and aspects of Jewish life, did written law come to be applied directly to criminal procedures (Sus 62). During the same period of time (the last half of the first millennium BCE), other Mediterranean cultures (e.g., Athens, Gortyn, Rome) also employed public inscriptions and written law collections more frequently to promulgate and revise ritual, civil, and criminal laws.

The Pentateuch anticipates this development in its literary portrayal of Moses. Though only the messenger of the divine law-giver in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, he emerges in Deuteronomy as the authoritative reinterpreter of divine law for a new generation. The Deuteronomic laws in Moses' voice claim continuity with God's law from Sinai even as they revise and modify many of its provisions. Thus the Pentateuch not only promulgates divine law as normative for Israel, it also models the continuous interpretation and revision necessary to keep any law relevant over time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

F. Crüsemann. The Torah: Theology and Social History of Old Testament Law. A. W. Mahnke, trans. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996); G. N. Knoppers and B. M. Levinson, eds. The Pentateuch as Torah: New Models for Understanding its Promulgation and Acceptance (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 2007); M. LeFebvre. Collections, Codes, and Torah: the Re-characterization of Israel's Written Law. LHBOTS 451 (New York: T&T Clark, 2006); B. M. Levinson, ed. Theory and Method in Biblical and Cuneiform Law: Revision, Interpolation and Development. JSOTSup 181 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); J. W. Watts. Reading Law: The Rhetorical Shaping of the Pentateuch. The Biblical Seminar 59 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); . "Ritual Legitimacy and Scriptural Authority." JBL 124/3 (2005): 401–17.

PROPHETIC LITERATURE

ROBERT R. WILSON

The prophetic literature of the OT developed from the work of prophets, who were active in Israel throughout the biblical period. Stories about their activities sometimes appear in the narrative literature of the OT, particularly in the books of Samuel, Kings, Jonah, and Jeremiah, while collections of their words appear in the books to which the names of individual prophets have been attached. However, the process that led from prophetic deeds and words to the final form of the prophetic literature was complex and involved the behavior of the prophets themselves, as well as the reactions and interpretations of the people who heard them, collected their stories and sayings, wrote them down, and finally edited them in their present form. A full appreciation of the prophetic literature, therefore, requires some understanding of the nature of prophecy itself, as well as some insights into the general processes by which prophetic materials reached their final written form.

PROPHECY AND THE OT PROPHETS

The phenomenon of prophecy is known outside of ancient Israel and is particularly well attested in Mesopotamia, with a few examples coming from Canaan. In general, ancient Near Eastern prophecy involved deities transmitting messages through human intermediaries, who bore various titles and who thought about their responsibilities in various ways. In biblical Israel, the prophets claimed to have received their revelations from God, either through the agency of dreams and visions or, more commonly, by means of divine words spoken directly to the prophet. Once the divine messages were received, they were delivered to audiences in a number of different social settings.

All prophetic speeches involved claims of divine revelation, claims that could not easily be tested by the people listening to the prophets. The problem of the authentication of the prophets' words was particularly difficult when prophetic messages conflicted with each other. In such cases the audience seems to have relied on various means of testing prophetic claims (e.g., Deut 13:1–5; 18:21–22; 1 Kgs 22; Jer 28). However, false prophecy always remained a danger, and, in the end, some hearers believed a particular prophet's words and some did not. Those who believed sometimes became the prophet's supporters and may have helped to collect and preserve the prophet's words.

The contents of Israel's prophetic messages were highly variable. The prophets usually addressed a specific audience, so they often spoke to a contemporary situation. On other occasions, they spoke about events in the future, although those future events were sometimes contingent on actions taken or not taken by the audience at the time the prophecies were delivered. Similarly, addresses to the present and predictions about the future occasionally involved the past, so past, present, and future references could appear in the same prophetic oracles. The OT prophets often spoke of social and religious change, which was necessary to avoid a future disaster. At other times, however, they advocated preserving current conditions.

ORAL AND WRITTEN PROPHECY

Scholars generally agree that the OT prophets originally delivered their oracles in oral form. The oracles were usually brief and poetic, marked by short, parallel, or echoing lines and the use of vivid imagery. The prophets often prefaced their messages with a "messenger formula" ("thus says the Lord"), in order to indicate the source of the revelation and to give it added authority (e.g., Amos 1–2). Prophets employed a number of different literary genres and drew language from a variety of social settings. Legal language from the courts, laments and words of woe from experiences of disaster, hymns from worship settings, songs from public gatherings, curses, threats, warnings, announcements of judgment, and promises of a brighter future all found their way into the prophets' oracles. Prose materials were used as well, and the prophets sometimes described visions that they had seen (e.g., Amos 7–9) or symbolic actions that they were to perform (e.g., Jer 19).

The process by which the prophets' oral oracles were collected and preserved in writing is not fully understood. Scholars usually assume that the prophets' supporters remembered and collected the oral sayings and eventually wrote them down or paid scribes to record them (Isa 8:16–18). The prophet Jeremiah is said to have dictated a collection of his oracles to a scribe and later to have added materials to the original collection (Jer 36). There were at least two reasons for wanting to record the prophets' words in writing. First, when the prophets spoke about future events there was often no way to determine the truth of their words except to wait for the future to unfold. In such cases, the written record could be used to test the accuracy of what the prophets had predicted. However, a second factor was sometimes involved as well. At least in some cases prophecies that had already been fulfilled were thought to be still applicable to new situations, so the written record could be used for the benefit of future communities experiencing circumstances similar to those of the original audience (e.g., Isa 7–11).

In addition to preserving the words of the prophets, the prophets' supporters may have also been responsible for collecting stories of prophetic activities, and these stories too may have eventually been written down. It is important to note, however, that the writing down of oral material did not necessarily mean the end of oral prophecy. Rather, prophets seem to have continued to deliver oral oracles even after earlier prophecies had been recorded in writing.

Although much of the OT's prophetic literature originated in oral form, some prophets may have themselves created written works. This phenomenon seems to have begun about the time of the exile, perhaps because the dispersion of Israelites at that time made the circulation of oral materials unusually difficult. Scholars have suggested that books such as Ezekiel, the latter portions of Isaiah, the narrative material in Jeremiah, and most of the post-exilic prophetic books did not go through an oral stage but were originally created in written form.

THE GROWTH OF THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

With the advent of written oracle collections and written prophetic narratives, a new phase began in the development of the prophetic writings. As long as oral prophecies were still being delivered, the collecting and shaping of prophetic materials presumably remained in the hands of the prophets themselves and in the hands of the prophets' supporters. However, once the transition to written prophecy began to take place, a new influence in the growth of the prophetic literature began to emerge. Even with the relatively simple Hebrew alphabet, the production of lengthy written texts required specialized literary and scholarly skills, and, as a result, about the time of the exile trained scribes began to play an increasingly important role in the shaping of prophetic texts.

The degree to which the scribes influenced the contents as well as the shape of prophetic texts is uncertain. It is possible that some prophets such as Ezekiel were scribes themselves and therefore capable of shaping their own prophetic writings. Others, such as Jeremiah, may have hired scribes and then dictated the contents of their prophetic writings. However, it is also likely that in many cases the scribes who produced or copied oracle collections also felt free to edit their contents. This editorial activity occurred in different ways with different prophetic works, but it seems to have been in full flower by the beginning of the post-exilic period.

The extent of scribal editorial shaping remains a matter of scholarly dispute, but there is general agreement on the likely sorts of literary developments that took place. Oracles were organized according to various literary principles, sometimes according to literary form (Amos), sometimes according to contents (Hos 12–14), and sometimes according to chronological sequence (Ezekiel). Superscriptions were added to oracle collections in order to situate them in particular historical and social contexts. Many of the prophetic stories were placed in the so-called historical books (Samuel, Kings, Chronicles), although some stories were integrated into prophetic books (Isaiah, Jeremiah). Collections of oracles were updated to take into account later events such as the exile and the subsequent return to the land of Israel. There is some evidence for scribal interpretive activity involving the recognition of apparently related prophetic texts and the addition of interpretive comments. Finally, some of the smaller prophetic collections, known today as the Minor Prophets, were organized loosely into a unit, perhaps in stages, with smaller collections eventually giving rise to a larger one.

At the end of this period of scribal activity, the prophetic writings were fixed in their present form. Although prophets continued to appear in Israel, their words no longer had authority for the whole biblical community, and new prophetic revelation came through the process of interpreting the earlier prophetic writings. Through this interpretive process, the ancient prophetic materials continued to speak to new communities and historical contexts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. Blenkinsopp. A History of Prophecy in Israel. Rev. and enlarged ed. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1996); D. L. Petersen. The Prophetic Literature: An Introduction (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); P. L. Redditt. Introduction to the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); R. R. Wilson. Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980).

HEBREW POETRY

BRENT A. STRAWN

Poetry in any language is hard to describe. Samuel Taylor Coleridge's (1772–1834) definition remains memorable: "poetry,—the best words in their best order." In the case of Hebrew poetry, "the best words" typically include: (1) the presence of rare terms not found extensively in prose, and (2) the absence of many "prosaic" elements like relative pronouns, definite articles, even the conjunction. "The best order" in Hebrew poetry means that the syntax is more varied than it is in comparable prose texts.

These characteristics indicate that Hebrew poetry is like poetry in other literature: it is terse, compressed language with unusual diction that renders it evocative and simultaneously more difficult to interpret. The concision of poetic language is, ironically, what makes it dense. This density causes the reader to slow down and pay attention not only to the what of the language, but also to its how. Poetry is and becomes atypical speech—elevated language that, in and by means of its elevation, speaks of significant topics in arrestingly profound ways. Poetry can also speak of the mundane, of course, but in so doing, poetry invests the normal with the super-normal meaning.

Other types of literature—excellent prose, for instance—have many of the same characteristics. Poetry is not, therefore, completely unlike other literature. This is especially true for Hebrew verse, which apparently lacks the hallmark of poetry as classically known and defined—namely, meter. While some scholars still look for meter in Hebrew prosody, most now admit that the verse present in the Old Testament is too varied to permit talk of a metric system. Meter, if present, that is, is not a dominant or regular characteristic of Hebrew poetry. This should not be misunderstood, however, as suggesting that Hebrew poetry and prose are basically identical. While one may need to reckon with a continuum of shared features (Kugel), most scholars agree that poetry is to be differentiated from prose by its comparatively denser use of images and tropes and the way in which these are structured into recurrent patterns. Another distinctive feature of Hebrew poetry is what has come to be called "parallelism." This is the way two (a bicolon) or three (a tricolon) lines of poetry are related to one another. Ever since Lowth's groundbreaking study of parallelism in the mid-eighteenth century, it has been common to treat parallelism as fundamentally of three types: synonymous, in which the two lines say the same thing; antithetical, in which they say the opposite; and synthetic, which designates those lines that do not fit either of the first two categories. These three types of parallelism (along with Wilson's alternative nomenclature) can be illustrated by virtually any example of Hebrew poetry:

Synonymous (or affirming):

I called to the LORD out of my distress, and he answered me;
out of the belly of Sheol I cried, and you heard my voice. (Jonah 2:2)

Antithetical (or opposing):

Hear, my child, your father's instruction and do not reject your mother's teaching. (Prov 1:8)

Synthetic (or advancing):

He has broken down his booth like a garden,

he has destroyed his tabernacle;

the LORD has abolished in Zion festival and Sabbath, and in his fierce indignation has spurned

king and priest. (Lam 2:6)

Nonetheless, Lowth's typology has outlived its usefulness. Synthetic parallelism, in particular, is particularly suspicious (and specious) due to its "catch-all" nature. Close attention to almost any example of synonymous or antithetical parallelism reveals problems with these categories as well. In Prov 1:8, for example, the "father's instruction" and "mother's teaching" are hardly opposed. Similarly, in Jonah 2:2, "distress" is not coterminous with Sheol throughout the Bible, nor is one's self always the same as one's voice. Perhaps more significantly, there is an identifiable progression of thought from the first line to the second, marked by the shift from third person ("he answered me") to second person discourse ("you heard my voice").

Paradoxically, then, parallelism is both more complex and more simple than Lowth's three categories would permit. It is more complex because parallelism can be exceedingly complicated, e.g., a semantically "antithetical" construction may be stated in a grammatically "synonymous" structure. It is more simple since the two (or three) lines of a Hebrew verse are typically related in terms of their seconding (Kugel) or intensifying nature (Alter). This seconding or dynamic movement between lines is evident in the progression in Jon 2:2, in the shift from father to mother in Prov 1:8, and in the specification of the Lord's targets in Lam 2:6. In each case, this parallelistic seconding or dynamism is predicated on similarity/repetition (a hallmark of all poetry). Difference, that is, is also present, giving the lines their cumulative sense, their forward movement. That being granted, difference should not be (overly) emphasized at the expense of sameness. It is the nature of Hebrew parallelism to traffic in both qualities.

The same is true for the imagistic language found in Hebrew poetry. This too tends to function by means of comparison. Nowhere is this truer than in the case of figurative language par excellence: the metaphor. Metaphors both compare and contrast—they make connections even while dissimilarities remain evident. Yahweh can be likened to a lion (Hos 13:7, 8b), for example, but not solely a lion, also a bear or other wild animal (13:8a, 8c). That demonstrates, among other things, that Yahweh is not a lion or a bear—at least not exactly—despite the straightforward sense of the metaphor. All images function in this manner: speaking of one thing in terms of another, emphasizing both similarity and distinctiveness.

It should come as no surprise that imagistic language and metaphor, on the one hand, and parallelism, on the other, share this quality of similarity and difference. Poetry in no small measure is an attempt to speak of one something in terms of another something—speaking in ways that are recognizable but at the same time different than usually or otherwise known. Poetic similarity and difference is manifested linguistically, especially in word-pictures and various poetic forms or structures, which for Hebrew includes, but is not restricted to, parallelism. Key words, repetition, allusion, personification, rhythm, word/sound play, imagery, metaphor, acrostic design, inclusios, and refrains are all important. In brief, poetry creates an alternative world. It is "not just a set of techniques for saying impressively what could be said otherwise. Rather, it is a particular way of imagining the world" (Alter, 151). All literature does this—at least to some degree—but poetry does it in a way distinct from and more powerfully than prose, most especially by its terseness, which does not answer every question, and by its metaphorical nature, which invites every kind of question. In these ways, poetry makes a seminal contribution to the Old Testament, a third of which is poetic. This richly poetic Old Testament, in turn, is of signal importance to the Christian canon given the marked lack of things poetic in the New Testament. Without poetry and the poetic imagination, theology and Scripture becomes prosaic in the worst sense of the term. With poetry, along with its concomitant gifts of imagery and metaphor, imagination and evocation, theology and Scripture become an alternative world—a place imagined and figured by psalmist, sage, and prophet, ready to be inhabited by those of us living in a flatter, less colorful, and a-theistic landscape.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

L. A. Schökel. A Manual of Hebrew Poetics. SubBi 11 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2000); R. Alter. The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic, 1985); A. Berlin. The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); M. Kinzie, A Poet's Guide to Poetry (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999); J. L. Kugel. The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); R. Lowth. Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews. 4th ed. G. Gregory, trans. (London: Tomas Tegg, 1839 [orig: 1753]); M. Oliver. A Poetry Handbook (San Diego: Harcourt, 1994); D. L. Petersen and K. H. Richards. Interpreting Hebrew Poetry. GBS (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan, eds. The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993); G. H. Wilson. Psalms, Vol. 1. NIVAC (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Zondervan, 2002).

WISDOM LITERATURE

HAROLD C. WASHINGTON

The wisdom literature of the OT includes Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes (Qoheleth); and in the Apocrypha or deuterocanonical books, Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), and the Wisdom of Solomon. In these writings, Wisdom (khokhmah), is the rare attainment of intelligence, sound judgment, ethical conduct, humility, and the distinctive piety named in the motto of the book of Proverbs: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Prov 9:10; cf. 1:7, 29; 14:27; 19:23; Eccl 12:13; Job 28:28; Sir 1:11–30). The wisdom literature teaches readers how to live well and faithfully; it also tests the limits of human understanding. Wisdom is a divine attribute, evident in creation. Wisdom is also the hard-won result of long experience, learning, and critical reflection. Although wisdom can be taught, ultimately it is a gift from God.

The basic unit of the wisdom literature is the proverb, a short saying (marshal), typically consisting of two, parallel poetic lines. Major collections of proverbs are found in Prov 10:1–22:16; 25–29; and individual proverbs appear frequently in Ecclesiastes and Sirach. The instruction form comprises longer units of second person address: from father to son, or teacher to student. Such instructions appear chiefly in Prov 1–9, 22:17–24:22. The dialogue or disputation on divine justice characterizes the book of Job, where it is combined with lawsuit language and the lament form of the psalms. Pseudo-autobiography appears in Prov 4:3–9; 24:30–34; Eccl 1:12–2:26; Sir 33:16–18; 51:13–22; and Wis 7:1–8:21. The Hellenistic genre of philosophical exhortation is found in the Wisdom of Solomon. Other literary forms, e.g., the numerical saying, allegory, and riddle, appear less frequently in wisdom literature.

Biblical wisdom literature belongs to a broader tradition found in ancient Egyptian and Mesopotamian writings. The Egyptian instruction genre spans from the Old Kingdom period (third millennium BCE) into the Ptolemaic era. Typically set in a royal milieu or in the ranks of officialdom, Egyptian instruction commends just conduct, prudent speech, receptiveness to learning, and other topics familiar in the instruction of Proverbs. The Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope (ca. 1100 BCE) is noteworthy for its influence on the book of Proverbs, especially in the "Words of the Wise" (Prov 22:17–24:22). Several Egyptian texts extol, like Sirach, the elevated position of the scribe or sage. Other writings invite comparison with Job and Ecclesiastes in their struggle with the inequities of human existence and the question of life's value in the face of death. From Mesopotamia there are numerous collections of proverbs as well as instruction from the third millennium BCE onwards. Several works anticipate Job's theme of the righteous sufferer: a Sumerian text, A Man and His God; and Akkadian writings including I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom, also known as the Babylonian Job; and the Babylonian Theodicy (ca. 1000 BCE). The sixth century BCE Aramaic book of Ahiqar contains sayings similar to those of Proverbs, though set within a narrative frame.

The biblical wisdom books are relatively late compositions. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes were likely composed in the Persian or the Hellenistic period, fifth to third centuries BCE, presumably in Jerusalem. Job, also of Judean provenance, might have been written as much as a century earlier. Sirach wrote his work in Jerusalem, ca. 180 BCE. A half-century later in Alexandria, his grandson translated the book from the original Hebrew into Greek. The Wisdom of Solomon was composed in Greek by a Hellenistic Alexandrian Jew in the first century BCE.

The Hebrew wisdom tradition likely originated with the folk wisdom of the earliest Israelite villages and families. From time immemorial, children received their elders' wisdom in proverbial form, and adults invoked traditional sayings for amusement and persuasion. The wisdom books, however, are the product of an intellectual elite with the luxury of education, expensive writing equipment, and time for literary pursuits. Consequently the wisdom literature at times reflects an upper-class perspective (e.g., Prov 14:20; 17:8; Eccl 5:8, 13–16). In the pre-exilic period, these privileged scribes and scholars were likely attached to the royal court and administrative offices. There is no evidence of institutional schools for the training of this select professional class. Instead, individual education probably occurred through apprenticeship. Apart from the royal administration, however, there could also have been some urban elite families with the means to sustain literary cultivation. Perhaps these households preserved the Hebrew wisdom tradition after the monarchy ended with the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BCE.

In the post-exilic period, sages and teachers independent of the royal court and Temple produced the biblical wisdom literature. In this era Proverbs appears to have been directed toward the education of young Judean men preparing for adult responsibilities. Ecclesiastes is described as a sage and a teacher of traditional wisdom forms, though radical in his approach (e.g., 12:9–12). In the second century BCE, Sirach celebrates the honored role of the scribe, who studies wisdom, torah, and prophecy (i.e., the whole of scripture; 38:24–39:11); and he invites the uneducated to his school ("house of instruction;" 51:23).

Major OT themes such as the promises to the ancestors, the Exodus-Sinai tradition, the Davidic monarchy, and Temple worship are markedly absent from Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, though they appear to some extent in the later wisdom books (cf. Sir 35:1–12; 44:1–50:24; Wis 11:1–19:21). Rather than viewing God as Israel's redeemer and covenant partner, wisdom literature centers upon God as Creator. Wisdom is found not in divine revelation, but from recognizing the divinely established moral order of creation. The sages observe the benefits of living in accord with this divine order and the detriments of violating it. These may be conceived as inherent relations between acts and their consequences (Prov 26:27), or as instances of divine retribution and reward (e.g., Prov 16:5, 7). Righteous living results in well-being, prosperity, and long life; wickedness leads to suffering, deprivation, and early death. The way of the wise and righteous is characterized by qualities such as integrity, diligence, insight, self-restraint, prudent speech, and generosity; that of the foolish and wicked by dishonesty, indolence, thoughtlessness, gluttony, rash speech, and meanness.

This neatly two-sided perspective sets the terms for instruction and character formation in Proverbs (e.g., Prov 4:10–27), but it runs afoul of the reality that, sometimes, the wicked prosper and the righteous suffer. The moral discourse of wisdom, therefore, is subject to challenge and critique.

The sages are keenly aware of the limitations of human understanding and the inscrutability of God's ways. Proverbs is far from a collection of immediately applicable teachings; the book raises as many questions as it answers. The sages recognize that things are not always what they seem (17:28), and that the proverbs are beneficial only when accompanied by insight (26:7, 9). Many sayings stand in tension with others, and some appear to contradict each other (e.g., 26:4–5). The proverbs therefore are context-sensitive, within the book and in their relevance to life; they are multivalent and not to be applied mechanically. Job presses the question of innocent suffering to its limits, and in doing so, profoundly complicates the moral scheme of righteous and wicked. Ecclesiastes observes the futility of the human urge to secure one's life or to understand God's providence. Nonetheless the book commends enjoying life and work, living in the fear of the Lord.

In Prov 1–9, divine wisdom is vividly personified as a woman. Like a prophet, she cries out dire warnings; she beckons her followers with the language of love; and in the manner of a grand hostess, invites the unwise to a life-giving banquet. Divine wisdom is more precious than silver or gold. She is present with God at creation, taking delight in the world and in humanity. In Sir 24, divine wisdom comes forth from the mouth of God, covering the earth like mist. She traverses the heavens, seeks a dwelling place on earth and, at God's command, lodges with Israel in Jerusalem. Ultimately wisdom is identified with Torah, "the book of the covenant of the Most High God" (Sir 24:23). Wisdom of Solomon conceives divine wisdom as a breath of God's power, an emanation of glory, reflection of eternal light, and perfect image of divine goodness (7:25–26).

Other early Jewish writings with affinities to the wisdom literature include Tobit, whose last testament resembles the instruction genre (4:1–19) and Baruch, which heightens Sirach's identification of wisdom with Torah (3:9–4:4). There are several wisdom writings among the Qumran texts. The Mishnaic treatise Pirke Abot (Sayings of the Fathers) and subsequent rabbinic writings carry on the traditions of the sages. Likewise in the NT there are important strands of wisdom thought. Jesus appears in the synoptic Gospels as a wisdom teacher; a Wisdom Christology is especially evident in Matthew (e.g., Matt 11:28–30; cf. Sir 51:23–27). The Prologue to the Gospel of John adapts the motif of personified wisdom, conceiving Christ as the preexistent Word (logos), with God and through whom God created the world. Paul refers to Christ as the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24), and the hymn of Col 1:15–20 is also based on the figure of divine wisdom. Finally, the Epistle of James contains many wisdom themes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Clifford. The Wisdom Literature. IBT (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998); J. L. Crenshaw. Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction. Rev. and enlarged ed. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); R. E. Murphy. The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature. 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); K. M. O'Connor. The Wisdom Literature. MBS (Collegeville, Minn.: Michael Glazier, 1993).

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

CAROL A. NEWSOM

The terms apocalypse and apocalyptic derive from the Greek apokalypsis, meaning "revelation." The earliest use of the term to refer to a literary work comes from the opening line of the book of Revelation, "The apokalypsis of Jesus Christ." Indeed, this book is sometimes referred to simply as "the Apocalypse." Even though many other Jewish and Christian works of similar genre do not use this term for themselves, scholars commonly refer to them as apocalypses and to the worldview characteristic of these works as apocalyptic.

I. LITERARY GENRE AND WORLDVIEW

A widely used definition of the genre apocalypse takes it to be a writing with a narrative framework in which a revelation is mediated to a human by an otherworldly being. The content of the revelation concerns a transcendent reality that has a temporal dimension, insofar as it is concerned with eschatological salvation, and a spatial dimension, insofar as it refers to a supernatural world. Apocalypses vary considerably from one another, but can be roughly grouped into two types, depending on which dimension of transcendent reality is more prominent. In historical apocalypses the seer frequently receives symbolic visions that disclose the course of history over a long period, culminating in an eschatological climax in which evil is defeated by divine forces. The other type features an otherworldly journey in which the seer is shown the mysteries of the cosmos and of heaven itself. These otherworldly apocalypses may also be concerned with the eschatological climax of history or may focus more on personal eschatology, that is, the fate of individual souls after death. Apocalypses also incorporate a variety of other genres within themselves (e.g., exhortations, dialogues, midrashic narratives), giving them a diverse character.

With the exception of the book of Revelation, whose actual author, John of Patmos, is named, apocalypses are typically pseudepigraphic. That is to say, they are attributed to important figures from the past (e.g., Adam, Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Ezra). Early Christian apocalypses were also written in the names of Peter and Paul. These attributions were not intended to deceive but represented the author's conviction that he wrote in the tradition of these figures and so could claim their authority for his work. Apocalypses also construct a sense of authority for their claims through their vivid, often highly visual descriptions of heavenly scenes or the content of mysterious visions. The reader thus shares in the experience of the seer. Although many apocalypses are simply literary creations, it is likely that religious practices designed to encourage ecstatic experiences were also part of the apocalyptic phenomenon.

Many of the beliefs and assumptions common in apocalypses (e.g., interest in supernatural realities, concern for personal and cosmic eschatological fates, a dualistic struggle between good and evil) were widely shared in the Hellenistic and Roman eras. Thus it is not surprising to find these ideas in many other types of literature besides apocalypses. They are prominent in the letters of Paul, in the Synoptic Gospels, and in various types of literature from the Dead Sea Scrolls. Thus the category of apocalyptic literature is broader than just the literary genre of apocalypse.

II. ORIGINS OF APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

Apocalyptic literature emerges at a time of rich cultural mixing in the late Persian and Hellenistic periods, and it is not surprising that the scribes responsible for its development appropriated elements from a variety of foreign cultures, combining them with native Israelite traditions. In 1 Enoch the biblical patriarch (Gen 5:18–24) incorporates traits of the legendary Mesopotamian sage from before the flood, Enmeduranki. The interest in astronomical phenomenon also reflects Babylonian intellectual interests, while the section of 1 Enoch known as the Book of the Watchers engages Greek myths and traditions of cosmic geography. The figure of Daniel is represented as someone learned in the language and literature of the Chaldeans (i.e., Babylonians), and there are elements of Persian historiography in the eschatological dream in ch. 2. The Mesopotamian tradition of literary prophecies, in which pseudo-predictions of past events are followed by a genuine attempt to predict a coming event, has probably influenced the similar phenomenon in Jewish historical apocalypses. Although Persian traditions are notoriously difficult to date, elements of cosmic dualism, belief in resurrection, periodization of history, and traditions of heavenly journeys bear striking resemblance to early Jewish apocalyptic ideas. The influence of Persian dualism is virtually certain for the Two Spirits Treatise in the Qumran Community Rule.

Authors of apocalyptic literature also made creative use of older Israelite traditions. Ancient mythic motifs concerning God's combat with the chaotic sea are alluded to in Daniel, 4 Ezra, and Revelation; and the representation of the "Ancient of Days" and the "Son of Man" in Daniel 7 bears a striking resemblance to the imagery of the Canaanite gods El and Baal, already appropriated for Yahweh in Israelite religion. Apocalyptic authors also made use of biblical traditions concerning the divine council (cf. 1 Kgs 22:19–22; Ps 82:1) to speculate on the nature of the heavenly world, and invoked the prophetic "Day of Yahweh" as they envisioned eschatological events. Liturgical traditions from the Temple clearly influenced apocalyptic notions of heavenly praise (cf. Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice from Qumran; Rev. 4–5). Above all, the prophetic vision of the divine Glory in Ezek 1 and the symbolic visions of Zech 1–6 were models for envisioning the divine presence and the apocalyptic seer's reception of hidden knowledge. This lively appropriation and transformation of both traditional and foreign religious and historiographical traditions made apocalyptic literature a highly creative form of religious literature that flourished for centuries and served to address a variety of changing social circumstances.

III. DEVELOPMENT OF APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE IN JUDAISM

Although apocalyptic is often referred to as "crisis literature," that is something of a misconception. The earliest Enochic traditions and many later apocalypses featuring otherworldly journeys (e.g., The Similitudes in 1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, 3 Baruch) seem largely interested in the mysteries of the heavenly world and the workings of the cosmos. Nevertheless, even in many of these apocalypses, there is a sense that something is out of joint in the cosmos that will require an ultimate judgment of God to put right. In some texts (e.g., the Book of the Watchers in 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra, the Qumran Two Spirits Treatise) there is an explicit concern to explain the origin of evil and its ultimate defeat. In significant measure, the sense of something wrong with the world reflects the experience of Israel as subject to a succession of harsh imperial powers. Apocalyptic literature reaffirms the sovereignty of God over the whole cosmos and God's eventual defeat of both supernatural and human enemies of Israel and of the righteous.

Apocalyptic's preoccupation with these issues made it well suited to engage acute political crises. Thus several apocalypses (Daniel 7–12, the Enochic Apocalypse of Weeks and Animal Apocalypse, the original version of the Testament of Moses) were all composed as responses to the persecutions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 167 BCE and the Maccabean revolt. Yet they differed from one another in their understanding of the appropriate stance to take, the Enoch traditions embracing militancy, the Daniel apocalypses urging insight into God's plan, and the Testament of Moses endorsing martyrdom. Following the Maccabean revolt, apocalyptic literature continued to be influential. Although the Qumran community did not compose apocalypses, they were influenced by them and created new literary genres and even a form of communal life that was deeply informed by apocalyptic perspectives. Whether there were other apocalyptic social movements at this time is difficult to tell, although both Daniel and the Enoch literature suggest some sense of a social group that identified with these figures.

The crisis of the Jewish revolt against Rome (65–70 CE) and the destruction of the Temple evoked another outpouring of apocalyptic literature, most notably 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, the Apocalypse of Abraham. In these works there is less a sense of a group or movement and more of an individual writer attempting to use the resources of apocalypse to make sense out of an unbelievable tragedy. At least from the early first century CE on, apocalyptic speculations had fueled messianic hopes, and such hopes also attached to Bar Kochba, the leader of the last revolt against Rome (132–135 CE). The devastating consequences of his defeat did much to discredit apocalyptic ideas within Judaism, and it subsequently played a more limited role in Jewish religious experience. Except for the book of Daniel, none of the Jewish apocalypses composed between the third century BCE and the second century CE was preserved in Jewish circles.

IV. DEVELOPMENT OF APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY

Christianity emerged in an environment in which apocalyptic ideas were widespread and influential. Although a few scholars have argued that Jesus was primarily a wisdom teacher who was relatively unin-fluenced by apocalyptic ideas, most think that he, like John the Baptist, shared many of the eschatological expectations that characterized apocalyptic theology at that time. Certainly the early Christian writings reflect the imprint of the apocalyptic. Paul claims to have experienced a heavenly journey and to have had visions (2 Cor 12:1–7) and often speaks of the enmity of Satan (1 Thess 2:18). He understood the resurrection of Jesus to be the first act of the eschatological drama that will soon be fulfilled (1 Cor 15:15–28; 1 Thess 4:13–18). The Synoptic Gospels clearly incorporate apocalyptic ideas and motifs. In each, Jesus is presented as giving an apocalyptic discourse (Mark 13; Matthew 24–25; Luke 21) in which he describes the events of the end time, which is to occur soon. Matthew, for example, describes the eschatological coming of the Son of Man with an angelic host and the final judgment (Matt 25:31–46).

The only actual apocalypse in the New Testament is the book of Revelation, composed in western Asia Minor in the late first century during the reign of Domitian. As in similar Jewish writings, the resources of apocalyptic imagery are used to resist the claims of imperial power, which is represented as part of Satan's dominion. In a heavenly journey that takes him to the divine throne room (Rev 4), John is made privy to the contents of the sealed scroll that contains the events of the end times, including the defeat of Satan and the beasts who are his servants (the Roman empire), the triumph of Christ, resurrection, the final judgment, and the descent to earth of the new Jerusalem.

The Christian experience of marginalization and persecution during the second and third centuries made apocalyptic literature, with its vivid narratives of hope, judgments of the wicked, and divine triumph over evil, a significant religious resource. Many of the Jewish apocalypses were preserved only in Christian circles, sometimes being edited to include specifically Christian beliefs (e.g., the Ascension of Isaiah). In addition, new Christian apocalypses, such as the Shepherd of Hermas and the Apocalypse of Peter were composed. With the change in status of Christianity that resulted from Constantine's edicts in the early fourth century CE, the importance of the apocalyptic as resistance literature receded. Despite the ambivalence of many Christian theologians, apocalyptic ideas have remained an important element of Christian religious culture and have periodically experienced a revival of popularity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. H. Charlesworth, ed. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. 2 vols. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983–1985); A. Y. Collins, Cosmology and Eschatology in Jewish and Christian Apocalypticism (Leiden/ Boston: Brill, 2000); J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature. 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); A. Y. Reed, Fallen Angels and the History of Judaism and Christianity: The Reception of Enochic Literature (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982).

NARRATIVES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

SUSAN R. GARRETT

The narratives of the NT consist of the Gospels, Acts, and brief sections of other writings (e.g., Gal 1:13-2:14). A narrative is a type of writing in which a narrator recounts a story centering on characters' actions, speech, and relationships. The events in a narrative follow a plot, meaning that they are causally related and move through some kind of tension or problem to resolution. In all narratives, the narrator relates events from a particular point of view, which is conveyed through the narrator's selection and rhetorical presentation of all aspects of the story world. Point of view may be expressed through direct address (Luke 1:1–4), the voices of characters in the story (Mark 8:17), portrayal of characters' emotions and motivations (Luke 23:8), and various other details of plotting and characterization.

CHANGING QUESTIONS IN STUDY OF THE NT NARRATIVES

Since the Enlightenment, debate has raged on how best to understand the narratives of the NT. As scholarly opinions about the nature of the documents have shifted, so have the questions put to them—and hence also meanings assigned to them.

A. What Really Happened?

One persistent line of inquiry has aimed to ferret out what really happened in the ministries of Jesus and his followers. The premise of this quest for the historical Jesus (and also of study of the early church) has been a conviction that the NT narratives are not unbiased accounts but have been shaped by the mythic sensibilities and apologetic concerns of the earliest believers. Since it first began in the eighteenth century, the quest has been through many phases and has given rise to convictions about the Gospels and Acts that have in turn shaped subsequent study. For example, the search for the most reliable foundation for Jesus research led to the discrediting of the Gospel of John as a historical source because it was, supposedly, much later and more influenced by Hellenistic thought than the Synoptic Gospels. This supposition has, however, come under intense scrutiny and dispute. Meanwhile, the status of the Gospel of Mark rose in the nineteenth century as scholars concurred that it was the earliest of the Gospels and therefore closest in proximity to the events it recounts. Today many scholars agree that Mark is the earliest of the Gospels, but insist that it, like the others, incorporates post-Easter perspectives into its portrayal of Jesus and the disciples.

B. How Were the Traditions Preserved, and Why?

Another line of inquiry has pertained to oral traditions about Jesus and his followers. Known as form criticism, this method of inquiry dates back to the early twentieth century and was influenced by studies of folklore and its transmission. Form critics noted that within the Synoptic Gospels it is possible to identify discrete units of tradition, which they termed pericopes. They divided these pericopes into various categories, such as miracle stories and controversy dialogues (different researchers offered different classifications). Form critics argued that the traditions circulated orally during the decades between the crucifixion of Jesus and the composition of the Gospels, and were shaped by their transmitters to accomplish various functions within the religious lives of communities of faith. In form criticism, the focus was not on what really happened in the depicted events but on the lives of these early Christian communities. Form critics' assumption that the communities controlled the shape and content of the traditions—and the corollary that minimized the evangelists' authorial role—would be disputed in following decades. But the attention to the form and social function of specific traditions (not just Gospel stories but also stories in Acts, and speeches, epistles, and sections of epistles) would continue, with effort devoted to understanding these traditions in light of literary and rhetorical forms current in the first century.

C. What Did the Evangelists Believe?

Yet another line of inquiry has focused on the work and thought of the evangelists. In the 1950s, some scholars had begun to notice that Matthew and Luke each adapted their source material from Mark and from another presumed shared source (dubbed Q) in consistent ways. This observation suggested that the evangelists weren't mindless collectors of oral traditions as form critics had alleged, but creative authors with distinct viewpoints. Known as redaction criticism, this method of inquiry endeavored to lay bare the evangelists' respective theologies by paying special attention to differences in Luke and Matthew over against Mark and the original form of Q with respect to word choice, additions and modifications, and the ordering of traditions. Redaction critics applied their analytical skills also to texts whose sources are no longer extant, including Mark, John, and Acts. They did this by postulating an earliest form of traditions within these works, based on such data as the respective authors' typical vocabulary and stylistic habits and the existence of literary seams (places where distinct traditions had apparently been joined together).

Though it is still enlightening to compare the Gospels' parallel traditions, researchers have identified shortcomings in the redaction critical approach. Composition critics argued that because redaction critics focused on literary differences among the Gospels, their summaries of the evangelists' theologies highlighted their distinctive emphases but neglected their many shared convictions. Only by attending also to what the evangelists took over without change from their sources can a full portrait of each one's theology be painted. Narrative critics rejected the effort to mine the Gospels and Acts for theologies assumed to precede and transcend the narratives. Rather, the meaning of a given narrative can scarcely be separated from the structural details of the narrative itself. Influenced by literary critical methods popular in the mid-twentieth century, narrative critics engaged in close readings of the Gospels and Acts, paying special attention to aspects of their form such as plot, point of view, character development, and the use of irony and various other rhetorical techniques. They tended to view the narratives as theologically cohesive works that effectively conveyed meanings intended by their respective authors. (Luke and Acts were treated as a two-volume work reflecting a single authorial perspective.) But from the late 1980s on, scholars influenced by postmodern and deconstructionist literary critical methods have questioned the supposed thematic integrity of the NT narratives. Might this unity not reside chiefly in the eye of the beholder? Highlighting the fissures, tensions, and outright contradictions in the narratives, deconstructive critics have also questioned the supposed transparency of authorial intention as well as its sufficiency. Authors are themselves partially governed by cultural and other factors of which they are imperfectly aware, and never exercise perfect mastery over the meaning of their own writings. Meanings that are implicit in their words but that they themselves never considered will be evident to readers of different backgrounds or generations.

D. What Role Does the Reader Play?

Taking cues from literary critics, in the late 1970s some biblical scholars began to shift away from the discipline's longstanding emphasis on the authors of the NT narratives and to emphasize the role of their readers (or hearers). Readers are, after all, partners with authors in negotiating the meaning of texts. Some reader-oriented critics have focused on describing the way a first-time, "naïve" reader (i.e., one without substantial knowledge of depicted events) would encounter and make sense of the documents. Thus, whereas an experienced Christian would discern Eucharistic allusions in the accounts of the loaves and fishes, a first-time reader would not—but might hark back to the feeding miracles when coming to the account of the Eucharist itself. Other reader-oriented critics have tried to estimate how historical audiences would have responded to the narratives. What ancient cultural knowledge and specific knowledge of Jesus traditions might a Gospel's readers have possessed, and how would that knowledge have inclined them to interpret the story? Are they likely to have known the Exodus story of manna in the wilderness, for example, and if so, how might their knowledge of that earlier narrative have affected their reading of the miraculous feeding accounts? Still other reader-oriented critics have explored ways in which the cultural context and life experience of the modern reader affect the interpretation of the NT narratives. Thus, an African-American reader might interpret the depictions of master-servant relationships in the Gospels and Acts (e.g., Matt 21:33–41; Acts 16:16–19) differently than would a reader of another cultural heritage, insisting that such depictions are not innocuous but potentially dangerous because they seem to validate such oppressive relationships (even portraying them as normative for the relationship between humans and God: see Matt 18:23–35).

CONCLUSION

The great variety of interpretive approaches to the NT narratives in recent centuries—and the multiplicity of outcomes of these approaches—is instructive for interpreters today. The lesson to be learned concerns the incredible complexity of the task of interpretation. As in premodern times so also today, readers' cultural and rhetorical assumptions and the questions they ask play a large role in the meanings that they take away from the NT narratives. Some readings will be more historically sensitive, and therefore more congruent with meanings intended by the evangelists or perceived by the first readers of the narratives. But even first-century readers had to make interpretive decisions as they read through the NT narratives, and disagreed about where interpretive crossroads were to be found and how best to traverse them. There is not nor has there ever been one "correct" interpretation of each of the NT narratives; rather, there are many possible interpretations, each of which responds to the interests, assumptions, and questions of a particular interpretive community. It is against the norms of such communities—norms that may be informed by Scripture or theological tradition as much as by academic standards—that the legitimacy of a given reading is to be measured.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. K. M. Adam. Faithful Interpretation: Reading the Bible in a Postmodern World (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2006); S. D. Moore. Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989); M. A. Powell. Fortress Introduction to the Gospels (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress Press, 1997); C. Tuckett. Reading the New Testament: Methods of Interpretation (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987).

LETTERS

DAVID DOWNS

Much of the story of the early Christian movement is a story told in letters. Though less frequent today in an age of email, faxes, and cell phones, correspondence through the sending of letters is perhaps as old as the written word itself. In the Greco-Roman world of the first century, letters facilitated communication between parties separated by distance. Of the twenty-seven documents that make up the canon of the NT, twenty-one are letters. These include thirteen letters ascribed to the Apostle Paul, the anonymous letter to the Hebrews, James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, and Jude. Letters are also embedded in other NT writings, such as those found in Acts 15:23–29; 23:25–30; and Rev 2:1–3:21.

How Were Letters Written?

Modern (particularly Western) notions of letter writing typically involve images of a solitary figure sitting at a desk with pen and paper. In Rembrandt's classic painting "The Apostle Paul" (ca. 1657), for example, Paul the letter-writer is depicted in just such a fashion: alone and deep in thought in a dark room, Paul leans forward at his desk, his quill pen resting in his right hand, sheaves of blank paper spread across a wooden table. This image does not correspond with what is known about the composition of letters in the ancient world, however.

Letter writing in the Greco-Roman world was anything but an isolated endeavor. First, ancient letters were frequently transcribed by secretaries. In a context where, by some estimates, only around 10 percent of the population was literate, dictation to scribes was necessary for the vast majority of those who wished to send a letter. Scores of official letters and legal documents, for example, are punctuated with a formulaic clause indicating that the letter was composed by a scribe: "I [name of scribe] have written for [sender] because he/she does not know letters" (cf. P. Oxy. II 275.41–43). Yet secretaries were also employed even by the literate. In Rom 16:22, for instance, a scribe named Tertius identifies himself as "the writer of this letter" and sends his greetings to the church in Rome. Paul was clearly the author of Romans (Rom 1:1–7), yet Tertius was involved in the production of the epistle as the secretary who transcribed it (cf. Gal 6:11). It might be helpful to think of the function of secretaries in terms of a continuum from mere transcribers of dictated words to contributors in the process of composition to freely-empowered composers of epistles.

Second, the concept of the authors of NT letters as isolated figures is challenged by the fact that these letters were communal products. On the one hand, most of the letters attributed to Paul contain references to co-senders in the greeting, including Sosthenes (1 Cor 1:1), Timothy (2 Cor 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col 1:1; 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1; Phlm 1:1), Silvanus (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1), and "all the members of God's family who are with me" (Gal 1:2; cf. 1 Pet 5:12; Jude 1:1). Although the exact role played by these cosenders in composition is debated, their presence in the greetings indicates that Paul was not alone when writing to his churches and that he had some assistance in crafting his missives. On the other hand, the NT letters themselves were, for the most part, documents addressed to communities and not individuals. The instructions in Col 4:16 suggest that letters were to be read aloud in church and then perhaps shared with other congregations. Even letters ostensibly addressed to individuals typically assume community involvement. Philemon is an epistle written from Paul to his beloved friend and co-worker, yet also named in the address are Apphia, Archippus, and the church that meets in Philemon's house (Phlm 1–2). Indeed, the persuasive rhetoric that Paul employs to challenge Philemon is made more effective by the public nature of the document, for the community is implicitly invited to gauge Philemon's response. Even 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, and Titus, often called the "Pastoral Epistles" because they are the only Pauline letters addressed to individuals and not churches, conclude with wishes that God's grace be with "you" in the plural (1 Tim 6:21; 2 Tim 4:22; Titus 3:15). 3 John, written from an anonymous "elder" to an individual named Gaius is the exception to this communal emphasis among the NT letters, yet even that text ends with an exchange of greetings among other anonymous "friends" (15).

How Were Letters Sent?

In the 1st century, there was a well-organized postal system for the official correspondence of the Roman Empire. Private citizens had to rely on other methods for conveying letters, however. Those with greater wealth could employ carriers or commission slaves; those with lesser means often relied on merchants, friends, and even strangers who happened to be traveling to the same locale as the letter. The early Christian communities frequently used individuals and envoys associated with the churches in order to transmit correspondence (Rom 16:1–2; Col 4:7–8; 1 Pet 5:12). Upon arrival, these carriers might read the letter aloud to the congregation (1 Thess 5:27) and they could provide additional information from and about the sender (1 Cor 1:11; Eph 6:21–22). It appears that the apostle Paul sometimes sent letters when communication via the written word would be more effective (or less controversial) than a personal visit (cf. 2 Cor 2:1–4; 7:5–16).

What Were the Types of Letters?

There were many varieties of letters in antiquity, and it is not possible to provide a simple system of classification for the assortment of types. Literary theorists in the classical world struggled with this problem of categorization. One ancient text (probably designed as a handbook for scribes) identifies and provides examples of twenty-one different types of letters based on their purpose. Letters are classified as friendly, commendatory, blaming, consoling, allegorical, thankful, etc. (Pseudo-Demetrius, Epistolary Types). In the early part of the 20th century, scholars often drew a distinction between "letters" (i.e., nonliterary, common, private) and "epistles" (i.e., literary, artistic, public). To some extent the division of nonliterary and literary letters holds true. For example, a short, occasional letter from a Roman soldier to his father in Egypt requesting news from home (BGU II 423) reads quite differently from, say, the philosophical missives from the hand of the elite Roman statesman Seneca to his wealthy friend Lucilius. Yet any sharp distinction fails to recognize that nonliterary (including diplomatic) and literary letters often overlap in both form and function. Although NT letters are sometimes classified as nonliterary because of their occasional nature, they contain many of the sophisticated rhetorical devices seen in literary texts.

In spite of the difficulty of classifying letters according to function or literary style, it is possible to speak broadly of the form of ancient letters. Just as modern letters follow a relatively fixed format (i.e., opening: "Dear John"; closing: "Sincerely Yours"), so also letters in the Greco-Roman world regularly adhered to a standard pattern of organization. A brief look at a 3rd-cent. CE Greek letter from Egypt illustrates this form (P.Mich. 8.513):

Chairemon to Serapion.	Sender and Addressee
Greetings.	Salutation
Before all else I pray that you are well and I make your obeisance before the Lord Sarapis daily.	Thanksgiving or Prayer
I want you to know that you have sent me no word from the day that I came to Alexandria. If then you love me, do not neglect to write to me.	Body of Letter
I greet Sarapis and her children. Pasoxis the carpenter greets you and your children . . . and his wife . . .	Closing Salutation
[Opposite side]
Deliver to Sarapion from Chairemon

The NT letters tend to employ this same basic structure, although often with some elaboration, particularly of the salutation and thanksgiving. For example, the typical Hellenistic salutation "greetings" is often replaced in NT letters with some variation of the phrase "grace and peace [from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ]" (cf. Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 1 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; Phil 1:2; Col 1:2; 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:2; 1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; Titus 1:4; Phlm 3; 1 Pet 1:2; 2 Pet 1:2; 2 John 1:3; Rev 1:4). Similarly, the thanksgiving section in NT letters is frequently developed in a sophisticated manner that anticipates major themes developed elsewhere in the epistle (see e.g., 1 Cor 1:4–9). That is not to say that all NT letters adhere to this standard format; deviations from the conventional structure are also telling. Galatians, for instance, contains an extended letter opening (1:1–5) yet lacks a thanksgiving section, features closely related to the rhetorical context of that epistle. The opening of Hebrews does not conform to the customary letter form, which has led to suggestions that the document is not a letter but a Jewish-Christian homily. Yet the closing benediction (13:20–21) and postscript (13:22–25) do seem to place Hebrews within the genre of Greco-Roman letter.

Conclusion

It is often said that reading NT letters is like reading other people's mail. This is partly true. Since letters in the NT address particular historical and rhetorical contexts, they represent one side—or one moment—of an ongoing conversation. Thus, the task of reading these letters calls for careful consideration of the contexts in which they were produced.

Yet certain early Christian letters were included in the canon of the NT, located in this canon after the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles but before the Apocalypse of John. This placement too provides a context for reading the letters. The Pauline writings are positioned first among the letters and organized in order of descending length. Presumably they follow Acts because of the important role that Paul plays in the second half of that narrative. Hebrews, which was initially associated with Paul but now no longer is comes next, followed by the so-called "Catholic Epistles," named for their allegedly universal appeal. These "Catholic Epistles" include James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, and Jude, a grouping that may be based on the order of the names of the apostles mentioned in Gal 2:9, with Jude coming last since Jude is not mentioned in that passage. The fact that these early Christian letters are placed in the canon of the NT also means that they are not strictly "other people's mail." In addition, they are documents that belong to the communities that canonized them as Scripture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

H-J. Klauck. Ancient Letters and the New Testament: A Guide to Context and Exegesis (Waco, Tex.: Baylor University Press, 2006); E. R. Richards. Paul and First-Century Letter Writing: Secretaries, Composition and Collection (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 2004); S. K. Stowers. Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); J. L. White. Light from Ancient Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986).

CULTURES OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST

JOEL LEMON

Introduction: The Bible as an Ancient Near Eastern Text

Until the early nineteenth century, the Old Testament was the single most important cultural relic from the ancient Near East. Other artifacts had endured through the centuries, including pyramids, obelisks, colossi, ziggurats, mummies. And while these testified to humanity's long and complicated history in the Near East, the writing that appeared on these artifacts was largely indecipherable. Thus the objects and the cultures that produced them were shrouded in mystery. Only the Bible could be read; so it provided the clearest source of data about the cultures of the ancient Near East. And since the Bible alone seemed to speak straightforwardly about its own historical and cultural context, the Bible was, in a sense, its own best interpreter.

This situation began to change, however, when scholars deciphered the ancient scripts of Mesopotamia (cuneiform) and Egypt (hieroglyphs) in the early and mid-1800s. Modern readers began to hear voices from long-silent cultures. Standing alongside biblical texts were ancient stories of heroes and gods, accounts of creation and the flood, laws, prayers, and historical annals. Today, the Bible is no longer the lens through which the ancient Near East is viewed. In fact, the very opposite is the case. Now the ancient Near East serves as the dominant lens through which scholars view the Bible.

Material Culture of the Ancient Near East

One could define culture quite simply as the particular set of beliefs and behaviors that characterize a group of people. When one cannot observe the behaviors of such a group firsthand, one must rely on archaeological artifacts to formulate a picture of the society. Scholars refer to these physical remains as material culture, a category that includes (but is not limited to) tools, pottery, architecture, writing, and art. Of these, the literary artifacts of the ancient Near East have received the most intense scrutiny, especially the so-called "Ancient Near Eastern parallels" to biblical texts.

Comparison with ancient Near Eastern texts has illuminated every major category of biblical literature. Prayers to various gods and goddess have revealed standard forms of addressing deities—forms such as laments and hymns of praise that also appear in the Bible. Annals of Mesopotamian and Egyptian kings have provided a better understanding of the nature, accuracy, and rhetorical features of comparable biblical histories. Cuneiform law codes have enabled scholars to classify and date various legal materials in the Bible. Divination texts have shown how the activities of biblical prophets reflect practices of ancient diviners, even as they remained quite unique within that cultural landscape. From covenants to love poetry, literature from the ancient Near East has enabled fruitful

Of all the so-called "parallel" texts, the ancient Near Eastern creation stories may well be the most compelling. Creation myths provide a deep sounding about a culture's conception of itself, how it understands the various relationships among gods, the cosmos, humans, and all other forms of life. Further, cultures often seek to work out critical issues such as the nature of sin, suffering, power, sex, and justice in those accounts. They have thus proven to be some of the most important texts for comparative analysis. What follows, then, is a brief survey of creation mythology in the Ancient Near East and an account of the significance of these texts for interpreting biblical creation accounts.

A Case Study: Creation Accounts in the Ancient Near East

Sumerian civilization, which thrived in southern Mesopotamia during most of the third millennium BCE, produced some of the earliest Near Eastern creation accounts. One of them, the story of Enki and Ninmah (COS 1.159) recounts how Enki, the god of subterranean waters, creates humans to relieve the burden of lesser gods who were hard at work digging channels for water in the newly created earth. Enki forms these humans out of lumps of clay (cf. Gen 2:7; 3:14), which are then placed in the womb of his mother Nammu. The clay figures come to life when Nammu gives birth to them, and she sets them promptly to work. Another Sumerian text, known as KAR 4 (see Clifford 1994, 49–51), describes the origin of the world rather differently. This account begins with the creation of the world, seen as a process of separating heaven and earth (cf. Gen 1:6–7), after which a divine council convenes and determines to slay two gods. From their blood, the council decides to create humans. As in the story of Enki and Ninmah, the humans are then set to work cultivating and irrigating the earth (cf. Gen 2:15; 3:23). One other Sumerian creation account deserves mention, the Song of the Hoe (COS 1.157). It describes the god Enlil creating the world by wielding a hoe, a tool used for brick-making among many other things. After he sets the cosmos in order with his hoe, Enlil uses it to bring humans up from the ground (cf. Gen 2:7) as one would scoop up mud for making bricks. Once created, humans take up their own hoes to commence constructing temples for the gods.

Sumerian culture had a palpable impact on later Mesopotamian ones. By the middle of the second millennium BCE, Semitic-speaking people came to prominence in both Northern and Southern Mesopotamia, known as Assyria and Babylonia, respectively. Their common language of Akkadian drew its writing system from the Sumerians. Moreover, themes and figures in Akkadian literature reflect Sumerian influence. For example, the Atrahasis Epic (COS 1.130) begins with a description of a class of lesser gods complaining about all their hard work. In response, Enki and the mother goddess create humans by mixing clay with the flesh and blood of a slaughtered god. As humans take up the drudgery of the gods, they multiply rapidly and create an unbearable din. The earth-god Enlil is so vexed by the humans that he sends a series of plagues and, ultimately, a flood to wipe out humans. Only Atrahasis, having been forewarned of the coming deluge, escapes the waters by building a large boat (cf., generally, the creation and flood story of Gen 2–11).

An equally dramatic Akkadian account of creation is found in the Enuma Elish (COS 1.111), a text that also shows the influence of Sumerian myth. In this text, the creation of the world is the result of a violent conflict between the gods. Its critical moment occurs when the Babylonian god Marduk slays Tiamat, the goddess of the chaotic primordial waters, and splits her body in two. He elevates one half of her corpse to be the heavens and stretches out the other half as the foundation of the earth (cf. Gen 1:1–8). Through the eye sockets of the slain Tiamat flow the great rivers, the Tigris and Euphrates (cf. Gen 2:14). As the new head of the Babylonian pantheon, Marduk continues his creative work by ordering his father Ea to fashion humans out of the blood of Tiamat's slain partner. In the Enuma Elish, like the earlier Sumerian and Akkadian myths, humans assume the heavy labor that was formerly imposed upon the lesser gods.

As in Mesopotamia, the literary traditions of ancient Egypt spanned thousands of years and preserved multiple creation myths. Three of these accounts—from the important cities of Heliopolis, Memphis, and Hermopolis—illustrate how certain common themes and motifs reappear in various forms. The Heliopolis creation account (ANET, 3) is the most ancient. It describes how the god Atum emerged from the primordial waters as a mound of earth. His appearance in this form recalls the mounds that emerge teeming with life when the yearly Nile floods recede. Atum alone sets creation in motion when he produces, through his own bodily fluids, the god of air, Shu, and the goddess of moisture, Tefnut. Shu and Tefnut then produce two more gods: Geb, the earth god, and the sky goddess Nut, whose body is the dome of the heavens (fig. 1, cf. Gen 1:6–8). These gods, who embody the essential cosmic elements, are part of the Ennead—a family of nine primary gods. This Ennead appears in the Memphis tradition as well (COS 1.15), though there it was Ptah who ultimately created these gods and the cosmos that they represent. His creativity is described not through emitting bodily fluids but through a twofold work. First he plans in his heart to create the world and then he speaks the world into existence (cf. Gen 1:3). The tradition at Hermopolis presents yet another variation of the creation myth (COS 1.16), here with Amun as the primary actor and source of all created things. The god of hiddenness and obscurity, Amun initiates a mysterious process of evolution through which everything else ultimately emerges. In this tradition, he is the one associated with the primordial mound that first rises from the waters of chaos.

Comparing these texts with each other and with the biblical material yields important insights. First, it is clear from this survey that even within one culture multiple creation myths could exist side by side for long periods of time. Many modern readers find this phenomenon odd—especially given current "creation vs. evolution" debates—though, in fact, the Bible itself exhibits this very tendency to confirm and record the numerous creation accounts that typically coexisted within a single ancient Near Eastern culture. The varying descriptions of creation in Gen 1:1–2:4a and Gen 2:4b–11:9 serve as the parade example of how different ideas about origins can coexist even within Israel.

Second, readers encounter ancient Near Eastern creation accounts in diverse literary genres. These include epics, songs, hymns, funerary texts, and monumental inscriptions. It is difficult to establish a single theology of creation in a given Near Eastern culture not only because of the various, divergent creation accounts within that culture but also because they appear in so many genres.

Determining an Israelite theology of creation is similarly difficult because Israel likewise described creation through diverse genres. Accounts of the origins of the world exist not only in the narratives of Genesis but also in prophetic literature, psalms, and wisdom texts. For example, at critical points within Second Isaiah, the reader encounters poetry in which the divine voice describes the works of creation (see Isa 40:12–31; 44:24–45:25; 51:12–16). Likewise, in the book of Job, God issues an account of creation in the context of a wisdom discourse (Job 38:4–39:30). Job too reflects upon God's creative work in his speeches, wherein he describes creation as God's act of conquering the chaotic waters, personified as Rahab, the sea serpent (Job 9:5–13; 26:5–14). This motif of cosmic combat appears in the Psalms as well (e.g., Ps 74:12–17) and clearly resonates with other ancient Near Eastern creation accounts, especially Marduk's battle with Tiamat in the Enuma Elish and Baal's conflict with the sea god Yamm in the Ugaritic Baal Cycle (COS 1.86). In the Psalms, these cosmogonic activities are routinely conflated with God's saving works during the exodus at the Re(e)d Sea (e.g., Pss 77:11–20; 89:5–18; 114:1–8; cf. Isa 51:9–10). In doing so, the psalmist modifies and reframes ancient Near Eastern creation traditions, binding them with the story of the exodus into one cosmic and creative event.

This observation leads to a third important insight about the ancient Near Eastern creation accounts. Ancient Near Eastern cultures borrowed heavily from one another. In many cases they shared names and functions of deities, details of plot, motifs, and themes. As a result, it should be no surprise that the biblical creation accounts have numerous commonalities with ancient Near Eastern myths. For example, the Sumerian theme of gods creating humans to work on their behalf persists both in later Babylonian and Assyrian creation accounts. This theme also appears in modified form in Genesis, as God appoints the human to tend the garden of Eden (Gen 2:15) and later to toil in the earth to produce food (Gen 3:17–19). Likewise, the idea that humans are fashioned from the blood of gods or clay or from both appears in virtually all Mesopotamian accounts. A version of this idea occurs too in the Genesis accounts, in which humans are created not from the stuff of gods (i.e., their blood) but in the image of God (Gen 1:26–27) and from the dust of the ground (Gen 2:7). Also, the Egyptian idea that creation commenced by Ptah's divine fiat resonates strongly in Gen 1:1–2:3 with its emphasis on God's creative word. Finally, the notion that creation was the outcome of a divine conflict between a warrior god and a sea god(dess) is broadly shared throughout the ancient Near East. It likely originated in Syria, then migrated into both Akkadian and Canaanite literature, and ultimately into the biblical text itself (e.g., Ps 74:12–17, see above).

These texts illustrate that when borrowing exists, the ideas are not simply adopted and applied indiscriminately in new literary and cultural contexts. Rather, adaptation and appropriation always obtain. It is clear then that the biblical authors did not simply copy ancient Near Eastern literary prototypes, but modified them to suit their own theological agendas. The same is true, of course, for other ancient Near Eastern cultures.

Reconsidering Ancient Near Eastern "Parallels"

When one begins to grasp the extent of the cultural interchange that these texts exhibit, it is worth asking whether in fact one should refer to them as ancient Near Eastern "parallels" at all. Parallel lines, after all, never intersect. The fact that these lines are completely independent of one another classifies them as parallel. Yet, as this survey of creation myths shows, intersection and mutual interdependence are the very hallmarks of ancient Near Eastern literary works.

It is more accurate then to speak of these Near Eastern creation accounts as exhibiting various degrees of congruency with one another. That is to say, the different Egyptian creation accounts, while not identical, share a high degree of congruency with one another. In contrast, the Heliopolis creation account shows relatively less congruity with the Enuma Elish or Gen 1:1–2:4a. That granted, there are nevertheless congruent elements between the Egyptian and other texts, such as the idea that creation is an act of separating heavens from earth, or that the chaotic primordial waters existed prior to the creative act. When such areas of congruity appear across cultures, we can inquire how and why these emerged. It is possible that the situation arose: (1) through a direct borrowing and adaptation of another culture's ideas; (2) through a process of mediated borrowing by which a third culture transmits various elements of an idea; or (3) through independent but nevertheless similar ideas endemic to more than one culture.

Ancient Near Eastern Iconography

Ancient art, or iconography, is another element of material culture that has proved helpful in understanding the cultures of the ancient Near East and their relationship to the Bible. By comparing ancient Near Eastern iconography and biblical texts, scholars have identified various levels of congruency between literary images in the Bible and pictorial material from the ancient Near East. Three crucial areas deserve mention.

1. Vivid literary imagery is a common feature in the Bible's poetry and prose. These compelling images often seem odd. For instance, the modern reader might wonder what it means for the lover in the Song of Songs to say, "your eyes are doves" (Song 4:1). Study of ancient Near Eastern iconography includes numerous scenes in which doves fly from the outstretched arms of goddesses as messengers of the deity (fig. 2). When aware of these ancient visual images, the modern reader can better understand the significance of the literary image—like the doves coming from a goddess, the look from the woman's eyes expresses a message of love.

2. The value of ancient iconography for biblical studies is not limited to unlocking native and now opaque literary images, however. Iconography serves as a critical resource for historical reconstruction. The "Siege of Lachish," a massive wall relief found at Sennacherib's palace in Nineveh (near the modern city of Mosul, Iraq), provides a well-known example. The relief shows the Neo-Assyrian army's brutal and effective campaign against the Judean town of Lachish (fig. 3). The Bible also describes this event, along with its immediate political implications for King Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:13–18; 2 Chr 32:9). Both the biblical texts and the congruent Neo-Assyrian iconography provide different, yet mutually illuminating perspectives on the political and military events that occurred at Lachish in 701 BCE.

3. Iconography also serves an equally important role in understanding religious history. Gods and goddesses are common subjects for ancient artists in virtually every period and location throughout the ancient Near East. Thus, representations of gods, shrines, altars, and temples—and the way these representations changed over time—provide crucial data. These artifacts show how religious systems interacted and developed over the course of thousands of years and how the theological ideas and ritual practices in Israel relate to these larger movements.

Conclusion: When an Ancient Near Eastern Text Is Scripture

Situating Scripture within the ancient Near Eastern world can have the effect of archaizing the text, making it seemingly inaccessible for readers in the twenty-first century.

Yet the Christian tradition has consistently recognized the Bible's antiquity. Indeed, its antiquity has often been seen as substantiating its authoritative position. The designation Scripture underscores the Christian belief that the Bible speaks beyond its ancient context into our own. Seen in this light, it is not only helpful but critical to understand the differences between our culture and the cultures that gave rise to the Bible. Indeed, much harm has been done by those who have read the Bible as if it were written just yesterday, just around the corner, and just for them. Realizing the ancient Near Eastern context of the Bible provides a helpful corrective for such myopic readings.

In light of the material culture of the ancient Near East, modern interpreters of the Bible as Scripture must work within a constant tension. On the one hand, they are aware that given its antiquity the Bible requires interpretation. On the other hand, they realize that being a faithful interpreter requires a certain recognition—that the same Spirit that inspired the writing, editing, and transmission of the text is active in each successive interpretation, including their own. Evidence of this activity may be found in the remarkable and undeniable fact that modern communities of faith continue to be deeply shaped by this ancient text—that the Bible really can and does speak from its ancient Near Eastern context to our own.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. J. Clifford. Creation Accounts in the Ancient Near East and the Bible. CBQMS 26 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic Biblical Association, 1994); B. R. Foster. Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature. 3rd ed. (Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 2005); W. W. Hallo, ed. The Context of Scripture. 3 vols. (Leiden: Brill, 1997); O. Keel. The Song of Songs. F. J. Gaiser, trans. CC (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1994); . The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms. T J. Hallett, trans. (New York: Crossroads, 1985); O. Keel and C. Uehlinger. Gods, Goddesses, and Images of God in Ancient Israel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); A. Kuhrt. The Ancient Near East, c. 3000–330 BC. 2 vols. Routledge History of the Ancient World (London: Routledge, 1995); M. Lichtheim. Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings. 3 vols. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973– 1980); J. B. Pritchard. The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament. 2nd ed. with suppl. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1969); . Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. 3rd ed. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1969); K. L. Sparks. Ancient Near Eastern Texts for the Study of the Hebrew Bible: A Guide to the Background Literature (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 2005); C. Uehlinger. "Clio in a World of Pictures—Another Look at the Lachish Reliefs from Sennacherib's Southwest Palace at Nineveh." "Like a Bird in a Cage": The Invasion of Sennacherib in 701 BCE. L. L. Grabbe, ed. (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003) 221–305.

Fig. 1. An Egyptian cosmogony with Shu, the god of dry air supporting his daughter Nut, the sky god, while his son Geb, the earth god reclines below. (After Othmar Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms [translated by Timothy J. Hallett; Eisenbrauns, 1997], fig. 27.)

Fig. 2. Middle Syrian Cylinder Seal. (Taken from Gods, Goddesses and Images of God in Ancient Israel by Othmar Keel and Christoph Uehlinger, copyright © 1998 Augsburg Fortress. Used by Permission.)

Fig. 3. Siege of Lachish. Stone panel from the South-West Palace of Sennacherib, Nineveh, 700–681 BCE. (Courtesy of the Institute of Archaeology, Tel Aviv University.)

CULTURE OF EARLY JUDAISM

AMY-JILL LEVINE

From ca. 538 BCE, when Judeans exiled to Babylon returned to what became known as the Persian province of Yehud, to 135 CE, when Rome destroyed Jerusalem, Jews were, in general, indistinguishable from Gentiles and Samaritans in terms of physical features, dress, and use of local languages. Nor was Jewish life static: each imperial shift—Babylonian, Persian, Ptolemaic-Greek, Seleucid-Greek, Hasmonean autonomy, Roman—and each neighborhood setting from Jerusalem to the far reaches of the Diaspora influenced its traditions and practices, texts and beliefs.

Scholars no longer speak of "Late Judaism" with its negative connotations of ossified post-exilic legalism. Preferred terms include Early Judaism, Middle Judaism, and Second Temple Judaism. In some cases the Greek term ioudaios should be translated "Judean" to signal an ethnic group from a particular area; in other cases, "Jew"—with its emphasis on belief and practice—is the more appropriate translation. "Judaism" (2 Macc 2:21; 8:1; 14:38; Gal 1:13—14) refers to the way of life, and it has religious, cultural, and geographical connotations. To complicate the articulation of Jewish/Judean identity: Judeans could reject "Judaism" in the sense of practice and belief (see, e.g., 3 Macc 1:3; Philo, On the Virtues 182; On the Life of Moses 1.31). Conversely, Gentiles could adopt Judaism's beliefs and practices.

To understand Early Jewish culture, the best scholars can do is sketch parameters using, with caution, all available sources: the Scriptures of Israel (broadly defined), Dead Sea Scrolls, Josephus and Philo, the Deuterocanonical and Pseudepigraphal literature, Greek and Roman reports, the New Testament, early Rabbinic texts and targums, archaeology, macrosociological studies and cross-cultural models, and so on. To address Early Judaism in a Bible commentary means focusing on materials that Bible, and especially New Testament, readers need to know to understand the texts. Given this consideration together with the limitations of word count, the following ten general categories offer helpful parameters.

First, Jews claimed an ancestry from Abraham, with whom their God had established an eternal covenant. Converts were welcome (e.g., Achior the Ammonite [Jdt 14:10]; Nicolaus [Acts 6:5]; the royal house of Adiabene [Josephus, Antiquities 20:2]; proselytes [Philo, Virtues 182]). Jews generally did not seek converts, for they did not believe Gentiles needed to be Jewish in order to be in a right relation with God. Some promoted the concept of seven Noachide commandments (establishing just courts, prohibiting idolatry, blasphemy, murder, theft, sexual immorality, and eating the limb of a living animal) for Gentiles; these appear in inchoate form as early as the third-century Jubilees 7:20–28.

Second, Jews worshiped the God of Israel, whom they regarded as having made covenants with Noah, Abraham, and David, as well as with the people Israel through the hand of Moses at Mt. Sinai.

This God became present in the lives of Israel via the holy spirit (ruach ha-kodesh), the Word (logos, memre), and Wisdom (Chochma/Sophia). The Shekinah, the feminine manifestation of the divine, has its origins in later texts (e.g., Sanhedrin 39a, Berachot 6a, Megillah 29a). Jews generally understood God to be a loving provider—their "father" or "abba"—rather than a distant judge.

Third, they related to the ancestral land of Israel, seen as promised to Abraham (Gen 12:7; 13:15–17, etc.); specific borders changed as did the empires. Galilee returned to Jewish rule under the Hasmoneans, and all evidence indicates the population's full investment in Torah and Temple (Antiquities 20:118; Luke 13:1). Diaspora Jews maintained their connection to the land by participating in the pilgrimage festivals of Sukkot (Booths, Tabernacles), Pesach (Passover), and Shavuot (Weeks, Pentecost).

Fourth, the Torah, their sacred book, contained the commandments of their God along with their history. Some Jews, such as Sadducees, held only the Torah as sacred; most had a broader canon including the Prophetic writings (Nevi'im) and Psalms. By the late first century CE, most of the Writings (Ketuvim) were included. Some Jews included in their canons I Enoch; others 1 and 2 Maccabees, and so on. Jews heard their Scriptures in Greek, in Hebrew, or through Aramaic paraphrase (Targumim). Some read literally, others allegorically; interpretations were as varied as the Jews who held them.

These texts represented both a connection to the past and the influences of the present. By writing their story, Israel created an ethnic/national identity with its own ancestry, history, practices, and role in the divine plan. The books that were in use by the end of the first century CE constituted a canon that is close to the Jewish canon of today. They offered historical narrative, ethnic claims, specific legal teachings, and broad theological views: thus they offered a coherent identity and a breadth of theological views.

Fifth, the Torah mandated specific practices that in the aggregate served as identity markers, including male circumcision, Sabbath observance, dietary restrictions with a particular avoidance of pork, and the eschewal of idolatry. Jews needed to determine the extent to which they would participate in Greek and Roman culture (e.g., arts, philosophy, gymnasium education, politics, avoidance of circumcision); the responses were as varied as the possibilities. Some Jews saw themselves as different from Gentiles in that they regarded Gentiles as participating in idolatry and sexual immorality. Conversely, Jewish/Gentile intermarriage was not unknown.

Mark 7.3–5 refers to "the tradition of the elders," and Josephus (Antiquities 13.297) describes the Pharisees as following "observances handed down by their fathers" (see m. Avot 1.1). Some of the 613 commandments (Makkot 23b, Yevamot 47b) take precedence over others (see, e.g., 1 Macc 2.35–41 on fighting on the Sabbath). Most Jews would have celebrated a healing on the Sabbath (see Luke 13:16–17) and all would likely have agreed that saving a life overrides other commandments. Such interpretations contributed to the formation and maintenance of groups such as Pharisaic schools, Sadducees, Essenes, and the Jesus movement as well as engaged individual thinkers, such as Philo.

Commandments concerning ritual purity refer generally to temporary, unavoidable conditions (e.g., menstruation, ejaculation, childbirth). They are unrelated to sin. Sickness, unless caused by leprosy or manifested by genital discharge, does not convey impurity. Purity concerns focus on matters of life and death, with a corpse being the most defiling. However, burying corpses was a mitzvah (see Tobit 1:16–20; Josephus, Against Apion 2.30.211; m. Nazir 7:1; Luke 10:31–32 depicts the failure of the priest and Levite to do what was expected). Regaining a state of purity typically involved a period of waiting and immersion in water.

By the Herodian period, purity had become a strong marker of Jewish life. In Galilee, the absence of pig bones and graven images, as well as the extensive presence of stone vessels (see John 2:6) and miqva'ot [ritual baths] show increased concern for purity. Purity was a means of sanctifying the body, resisting assimilation, proclaiming identity, and reinforcing community boundaries. Gentiles also engaged in practices of ritual purity, usually associated with visiting temples.

Sixth, Jews had a relationship to the Jerusalem Temple, an enormous complex of approximately 169,000 square feet that could accommodate almost half a million pilgrims. It was designed, like most temples in antiquity, to reflect increasing degrees of sanctity, from the outer court of the Gentiles to the court of the Jewish women, then of Jewish men, then of the priests. At the center was the Holy of Holies. The Temple was the place of pilgrimage, prayer, teaching, sacrifice, and national identity.

In 152 BCE, the Hasmonean ruler Jonathan arranged with his Seleucid allies to be appointed high priest, and the priesthood stayed in the family until Herod's rule. Herod appointed successors from minor families; when Rome took control of Judea in 6 CE, it took control of the priesthood as well. High priest and Roman governor worked together, and by maintaining control of the priestly vestments, the governor controlled Temple festivals. When in 41 Caligula attempted to place his statue in the Temple, "tens of thousands of Jews with their wives and children" told the Syrian governor that they would not fight, but they would rather die than violate their laws (Antiquities 18:264; see War 2.197; Philo, Embassy to Gaius). The Temple also served as national bank. Roman governors raided the treasury for public works projects. At the end of the First Revolt, Rome transformed the half-shekel/two denarii Temple tax (Antiquities 14:110–114; Matt 17:24) into the Fiscus Judaicus, the "Jew tax," to be paid by all Jews for the upkeep of the temple of Jupiter in Rome (War 7.218).

Popular support for the Temple did not always translate into support for its administration. The Dead Sea Scrolls posit an alternative eschatological temple (11QTemple; 4QFlor 1.1–12; 1 Enoch 89–90). Josephus (War 6.300–305) mentions a Jesus ben Ananias who in 62 began, like Jeremiah and Jesus of Nazareth, to predict the destruction of the Temple. In 67, Zealots replaced the high priest, appointed by Agrippa II, with a priest chosen by lot. Bar Cochba put images of the Temple on his coinage.

Seventh, Jews gathered in "synagogues" (Greek for, appropriately, "gather together") for Torah reading, worship, and general social, political, and educational activities (see Josephus, Against Apion 2.175; Luke 4:16–17; Acts 13:14–15). This regularized reading of Scripture in synagogues appears to have been a uniquely Jewish practice. Synagogues were not run by Pharisees but by "synagogue leaders" (Mark 5:22–38; Luke 8:49; 13:14; Acts 13:15; 18:8, 17), a capacity in which both women and men served. Synagogues did not restrict women to balconies (most synagogues are single-story buildings), and there is no evidence women were hidden behind screens or relegated to separate rooms. Synagogues welcomed Gentile affiliates.

The first-century Greek "Theodotus inscription" found in Jerusalem, records that Theodotus, a priest, a "leader of the synagogue," (archisynagos) and the son of a synagogue leader, built the synagogue "for the reading of Torah and for teaching the commandments" and as lodging for strangers. Although John 9:22; 12:42; 16:2 mention synagogue expulsion, early Jewish sources do not record this practice. To the contrary, synagogue discipline consisted of physical sanctions (Matt 10:17; 2 Cor 11:24).

The eighth consideration turns to family life. The Ketubah (marriage contract) secured the marriage and protected wives financially in case of divorce. Early Jewish culture offered several opinions on divorce, from prohibition (Mark 10:11; 1 Cor 7:11) to gradations of cause, to the most trivial reason (similar to the system available to Roman citizens; see m. Gittin 9.3, 10). Celibacy was rare but not unknown (e.g., War 2.120, 160; Philo, On the Contemplative Life 68; Matt 19:12; Rev 14:4).

Jewish women conformed to the same gender roles as their Gentile sisters within homosocial Roman society. They had freedom of travel, appeared in public spaces including synagogues, law courts, the market, and the Jerusalem Temple. They had access to their own funds, owned homes, ran businesses, and served as patrons as well as clients. No law prohibited their conversing with men, or men with them. They were not ostracized during menstruation or after childbirth.

Ninth, there was a diversity of messianic and soteriological thought. Not all Jews expected a messiah or held eschatological hopes. Some awaited a prophet like Moses (cf. Deut 18:15), a military figure, a priest, Enoch, Elijah, the "son of Man" (cf. Dan 7; 1 Enoch 37–71) or the angel Michael. The messiah of the Psalms of Solomon (ca. 63 BCE) combines the roles of king, judge, and shepherd. Most but not all expected a messianic figure of Davidic descent, and most messianic views were not militaristic. Many anticipated a messianic age marked by the ingathering of the exiles, peace, universal worship of the God of Israel, and a general resurrection. Some were apocalyptic visionaries with a sense of an imminent eschaton; some expected, and even hoped, that the world would continue. Jews did not, in general, follow Torah in order to earn divine love or other-worldly salvation (see m. Avot 1.3; John 11:24; m. Sanhedrin 10); these qualities were inherent in the covenant.

Finally, tenth, Jewish life was so sufficient, robust and diverse that some scholars prefer to speak of early "Judaisms." Different schools of thought, such as Pharisees and Sadducees, provide only small indication of this diversity; most Jews did not fall into any of these categories. Claims that the "council of Jamnia" (Yavneh) ca. 90 established the canon, mandated synagogue policy and liturgy, and created a normative Judaism grossly overstate the evidence. Jews generally claimed a common ancestry and history, set of practices and texts, theology, relation to land and Temple, and synagogue communities. Within these parameters, they were able to accommodate various beliefs and practices, adapt to changing rule, and survive national disasters without losing their identity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

B. Chilton, H. C. Kee, A-J. Levine, E. M. Meyers, J. Rogerson, and A. J. Saldarini. The Cambridge Companion to the Bible, 2d edition; Part Two: Jewish Responses to Greek and Roman Cultures, 322 BCE to 200 CE (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007); S. Cohen, J.D. The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999); M. Goodman. Judaism in the Roman World: Collected Essays (Leiden/Boston: Brill, 2007); E. S. Gruen. Diaspora: Jews Amidst Greeks and Romans (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2002); A-J. Levine and M. Brettler, eds. The Jewish Annotated New Testament (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011 [forthcoming]); , D. C. Allison Jr. and J. D. Crossan, eds. The Historical Jesus in Context. Princeton Readings in Religion (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2006); G. W. E. Nickelsburg. Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction. 2nd ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2005); J. VanderKam. An Introduction to Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001).

CULTURES OF THE GRECO-ROMAN WORLD

JOHN T. FITZGERALD

The Greco-Roman world requires careful analysis because of its daunting complexity. The following brief survey will focus on its political history, its cultural interactions, its religions, and its education, rhetoric, and philosophy.

POLITICAL HISTORY

The Persians were the major power in the ancient Mediterranean world for some two centuries (539–331 BCE), but their domination was brought to an end by Alexander of Macedon (356–323) when he decisively defeated them at Gaugamela (in modern Iraq) in 331. With Judea (332) and Egypt (332–331) already under his control, Alexander turned his attention eastward, going through Iran and Afghanistan, and proceeding into India. In the words of one Jewish author, Alexander thus "advanced to the ends of the earth" (1 Macc 1:3). Along the way he founded at least six cities, including Alexandria in Egypt and Kandahar in Afghanistan. The latter's connection with the Macedonian is reflected in "al-Iskandar," the Arabic name for Alexander.

When Alexander died in 323, his vast empire began to fall apart, and his generals and their descendants began jockeying among themselves for power. What emerged from these power struggles were ultimately three major Hellenistic kingdoms whose founders traced their origins to Alexander and thus are known as his "Successors" (Diadochoi). These were the Antigonid kingdom centered in Macedonia, the Ptolemaic kingdom centered in Egypt, and the Seleucid kingdom centered in Syria. In addition to these three successor kingdoms, there were other Hellenistic kingdoms that attained considerable distinction. Of these, the two most prominent were the Attalid kingdom centered at Pergamum, which had an excellent library and developed the use of parchment as a material for writing, and the rulers of the island of Rhodes, which, with its five harbors, became the major Hellenistic clearing house for commercial traffic between the East and the West.

For the history of early Judaism during the Second Temple period, the most important of these Hellenistic kingdoms were the Ptolemaic and the Seleucid, which fought six Syrian Wars over the control of Coele-Syria (lower Syria, including Judea) during the third and second centuries. The Ptolemies were in effective control of the region from 301 to 198, during which time Alexandria not only emerged as the greatest city of the Mediterranean world but also became a major center of Diaspora Judaism. It was here that the Old Testament began to be translated into Greek, a project that culminated in the version known as the Septuagint. The Ptolemies lost control of Coele-Syria during the Fifth Syrian War (202–195) when the Seleucid king Antiochus III (the Great) defeated them. In an effort to foster Jewish support for his regime, he granted various rights and privileges to Jerusalem and its Temple. One of his sons, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, endeavored to incorporate Egypt into his realm during the Sixth Syrian War (170–168), but failed when Rome intervened and issued an ultimatum forcing him to withdraw. It was at this point that Antiochus IV revoked the rights granted by his father to the Judeans, prompting the revolt led by Judas the Maccabee and his brothers. This revolt led ultimately to the establishment of an independent Jewish state led by the descendants of Judas' family.

All of the Hellenistic kingdoms, including that of the Maccabees, were eventually to lose their independence as Rome rose to power. Rome's expansion into, and ultimate control of, the Mediterranean world is a remarkable story. At the beginning of the Hellenistic Age in 336 (when Alexander became king of Macedon), Rome was a small city-state in central Italy. By its end in 31, when Octavian (Augustus) defeated Marc Antony and Cleopatra VII at Actium and proceeded to incorporate Ptolemaic Egypt into the Roman realm, it had conquered or absorbed all of the Hellenistic kingdoms and become the world's undisputed superpower. During those three centuries it had first gained control of central Italy by defeating the Samnites, and then proceeded to conquer the Italian peninsula (Magna Graecia). Next, by defeating Carthage in the course of three Punic Wars (262–241, 218–201, 149–146), Rome established control of the western Mediterranean, and it began its expansion eastward by engaging in four Macedonian Wars (214–205, 200–196, 171–167, 150–148). The last of these wars resulted in the establishment of Macedonia as a Roman province in 148, with Thessalonica as its capital. The subsequent Achaean War (146–145) brought the razing of Corinth in 146 and the partial dissolution of the Achaean Confederacy, functionally ending Achaia's political independence. When Attalus III, the last king of Pergamum, bequeathed his kingdom to Rome in 133, he was only recognizing political and military reality. Three wars against Mithridates VI (89–85, 83–81, 73–63), the Hellenistic king of Pontus (1 Pet 1:1), solidified Roman control of Asia Minor, setting the stage for the end of both the Seleucid and the Maccabean kingdoms, and the establishment of Syria as a Roman province in 63. Octavian's victory at Actium in 31 ended the Ptolemaic kingdom and marked the beginning of the Roman Empire. By that point, Herod the Great had already become one of Rome's client kings, having been declared king of the Jews by the Roman senate in 40 and having won his kingdom by 37. Ten years later, in 27 BCE, the Roman senate bestowed on Octavian the title of "Augustus." That same year Achaia was established as a Roman province, with Corinth (having been refounded as a Roman colony by Julius Caesar in 44) as its capital. Two years later (in 25 BCE), the Roman province of Galatia was formed. The pattern begun during the waning years of the Republic and the early years of the Empire continued for centuries. Rome controlled the ancient Mediterranean world through its provinces and its client kings, sending Romans to the provinces to serve as proconsuls (such as Gallio, Acts 18:12), legates (such as Quirinius, Luke 2:2), prefects or procurators (such as Pontius Pilate [Matt 27:11], Felix [Acts 23:24], and Festus [Acts 24:27]), and other administrators, or appointing non-Romans as client kings (such as Herod Agrippa I [Acts 12:1] and Aretas IV [2 Cor 11:32]).

Augustus (31 BCE–14 CE) and his four immediate successors (Tiberius, 14–37 CE; Gaius Caligula, 37–41; Claudius, 41–54; and Nero, 54–68) were related by birth, adoption, or marriage, and comprise what is known as the Julio-Claudian Dynasty. Following a period of civil conflict (68–69), the Flavian Dynasty arose, which consisted of Vespasian (69–79) and his two sons, Titus (79–81) and Domitian (81–96). It was followed by a long period during which each emperor adopted his successor: Nerva (96–98), Trajan (98–117), Hadrian (117–138), and Antoninus Pius (138–161), who was the first ruler of the Antonine Dynasty (138–192). He was followed by Marcus Aurelius (161–180), Lucius Verus (161–169), and Commodus (177–192). Politically and economically, the first two centuries of the Empire were its strongest, with declines in both areas becoming manifest in the late second century.

CULTURAL INTERACTION

Alexander's campaigns set the stage for much greater cultural interaction during the subsequent centuries. He did not initiate this interaction, which was already underway, but rather accelerated the pace at which it transpired. Among the texts found at Kandahar, for instance, is a third-century bilingual Buddhist inscription (SEG 20.326), written in Greek and Aramaic, of the Mauryan king Ashoka (ca. 268–232). Without Alexander's campaigns and the cities that he founded—his most important cultural legacy—such a text is inconceivable. The term that is most often used to describe this cultural interaction is "Hellenization," which is especially used with reference to the Hellenistic Age, that is, the period from 336 to 31 BCE. The term itself has been used both positively (to refer to the diffusion and triumph of Hellenic values) and negatively (to condemn cultural imperialism and the ruthless imposition of Greek practices on resistant Eastern populations). It is best used neutrally to describe an interactive process by which Greek customs, ideas, institutions, practices, and terms spread into non-Greek regions and, to varying degrees, were not only appropriated by some indigenous individuals and groups but also resisted and rejected by others. The adoption or adaptation of Greek culture was usually selective rather than comprehensive. Those who learned the Greek language and adopted some aspects of Greek culture did not necessarily embrace all aspects of that culture. Given this selectivity, Greek culture did not replace local, indigenous culture but either became amalgamated with it or existed alongside it. Local customs during the Hellenistic Age continued not only to exist but also, in many cases, to thrive. The same is true of most Eastern languages; although Greek became the lingua franca of the Mediterranean world, local languages continued to be spoken (e.g., Acts 14:11), and translations both from Greek and into Greek were routinely made. The same selectivity is seen in buildings. For example, whereas temples to Greek deities are well attested for cities such as Gadara (Matt 8:28), which Meleager (fl. ca. 100 BCE) called "an Attic fatherland among Syrians" (Anth. Pal. 7.417), there is no evidence for theaters anywhere in Hellenistic Syria or Palestine. Depending on the time and place, the degree of Hellenization was sometimes significant, at other times superficial. In general, Hellenistic influence is discernible in cities rather than in villages, and among the social elite rather than the lower classes. Except in rare circumstances, the adoption or rejection of Hellenism was voluntary, and there was never any prolonged systematic attempt on the part of the Greeks to impose their culture on others. When compulsory measures were applied and traditional indigenous practices banned, these steps were typically taken with the support of many local inhabitants. Even in the case of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who prohibited any practice that made the Jewish people distinctive, the author of 1 Maccabees makes clear that the initiative for Hellenization came from members of the Jewish community (1:11–15) and that even the oppressive measures had the support of many Jews (1:43, 52). In short, Hellenistic cultural interaction led to social, cultural, and religious changes, some of which enjoyed broad support and others which were fiercely resisted.

Rome's rise to power brought no significant cultural change to the eastern Mediterranean. Although individual Romans in the East regularly spoke Latin and sometimes used Latin for their monumental inscriptions (as Pontius Pilate, for example, did at Caesarea Maritima for a dedication to Tiberius), Rome itself made no attempt to Latinize its provinces in the East. The Greek language remained the lingua franca of the eastern Mediterranean, and Greek became increasingly used at Rome. Indeed, Paul's letter to the Christ-believers at Rome was written in Greek, and Greek remained the primary language of the Christian community at Rome for many years. Many natives of the East traveled to Rome or became residents of the city, and numerous Romans had extensive contact with Greece and the East. Cicero, for example, was a student in both Rhodes and Athens, and served as proconsul of Cilicia, the province where the Apostle Paul was born (Acts 22:3). Moreover, some Roman emperors were philhellenes, such as Hadrian, whose journey to the Roman East in 129–131 CE brought Hellenistic influence to an unprecedented new apex in Syria-Palestine. Yet it also had disastrous consequences. His plan to rebuild Jerusalem as a Roman colony (Aelia Capitolina), complete with shrines to the major deities of the region as well as a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, was one of the factors that led to the Bar Kokhba revolt of 132–135.

RELIGION

Religion took diverse forms in the Greco-Roman world, including civic cults, healing cults, hero cults, mystery religions, private associations, and ruler cults. It was practiced in cities and in the country, in homes and at shrines, by priests and prophets, and publicized with festivals and processions. There was continuity with the past as well as a host of new options for religious expression. Traditional Greek religion, which centered on the worship of the gods depicted by archaic writers such as Homer and Hesiod, was a continuing religious option, with temples built and worship offered to deities such as Zeus and Hermes (Acts 14:12). One key difference, however, was that the peoples of the Greco-Roman world tended to identify the gods and goddesses of the Greek pantheon with their non-Greek counterparts. For example, instead of regarding Zeus and the Roman god Jupiter as two different gods, they equated them. Similarly, Hermes was identified with Mercury, Hera with Juno, Poseidon with Neptune, and Aphrodite with Venus. The same kinds of identifications were made with the gods of other peoples, including the Jews, with Yahweh equated with Olympian Zeus (2 Macc 6:2). Such crosscultural identifications reflected the syncretistic principle of polyonymy, that "the gods have one nature but many names" (Maximus of Tyre, Or. 39.5).

Greco-Roman religions were polytheistic and non-exclusive, so that the worship of one deity did not exclude the worship of another. To insist on the worship of just one god to the total exclusion of others, as did both Judaism and Christianity, struck many people as being narrow-minded, intolerant, and disdainful of most of the divine world. The salient feature of divinity was widely regarded as power—an idea still reflected in the modern use of "omnipotent" as an epithet for God—so that it was thought that it was only prudent to acknowledge that reality. One did not have to love the gods, but it was foolish to ignore their power, which could be used to harm the religiously negligent. In a sense, Greco-Roman religion was essentially concerned with the management of divine power, seeking to ensure it was used to one's benefit rather than detriment. A Greek word used to designate this attitude was deisidaimonia, "fear of/reverence for divinity." It entailed taking precautions against needlessly offending the gods, and the Athenians' erection of an altar to "an unknown god" was interpreted as a display of such religiosity (Acts 17:22–23). Philosophers, on the other hand, tended to regard this fearfulness as superstitious cowardice, and the Pauline emphasis on love for God and confident boldness in approaching the divine (Eph 3:12) was the antithesis of deisidaimonia.

We also know that many pagans' understanding of the divine world was quite similar to that of Jews and Christians, prompting some scholars to speak of "pagan monotheism." Pagan monotheists may have worshiped a multiplicity of gods, but they tended to think in terms of one supreme deity whose power was conveyed through lesser divinities, such as minor gods, angels, or other supramundane mediators. This pagan monotheism, which arose independently of Judaism and prior to Christianity, is evident, for example, in the widespread cult of "The Greatest God" (Theos Hypsistos), which was especially popular in Asia Minor and is attested as early as the second century BCE. This pagan tendency toward a monotheistic conception of the divine, along with a henotheistic penchant to pay homage to a particular deity, means that it is fundamentally misleading to make a simplistic contrast between "pagan polytheism" and "Jewish and Christian monotheism." The Apostle Paul himself acknowledged the existence of "many gods and many lords" yet did not view that as a contradiction of his monotheistic understanding of God (1 Cor 8:5–6). Like Augustine centuries later (City of God 9.23), what he denied was the ultimate divine status of such beings, not their existence.

Worship typically took three principal forms: prayers, votive offerings (gifts offered in fulfillment of a vow), and sacrifices, with both animals and vegetables offered. Of these, sacrifice merits emphasis because it was so widespread and central to many Greco-Roman religions. Within this context, the fact that the early Christians, while using the language of sacrifice (e.g., in regard to the death of Jesus), did not practice animal sacrifice was conspicuous. This absence of sacrifice, which was tantamount to a modern religion not praying, was one of the aspects of Christianity that its religious neighbors found baffling.

EDUCATION, RHETORIC, AND PHILOSOPHY

Greco-Roman education, though fluid and varied, generally involved three stages: primary, secondary, and tertiary, with a diminishing number of individuals advancing to the second and third stages. The standard curriculum developed early in the Hellenistic Age, not long after Alexander's campaigns, and always gave emphasis to physical education. Elementary students, who were usually escorted to and from school by a custodian (paidagogos, Gal 3:24), learned simple arithmetic, how to copy and read aloud simple texts, and how to write. Already at this initial stage students were introduced to such forms as gnomes and chreiai (anecdotes). The liberal arts (grammar, literature, mathematics, music, etc.) were the focus of the secondary stage, with a core curriculum that included Homer and Euripides as well as an extended curriculum that exposed students to Menander (quoted in 1 Cor 15:33) and some rhetoric. Basic instruction in the writing of letters was taught at this stage, and the "preliminary exercises" (progymnasmata), which were designed as transitional exercises that prepared students for more difficult and sophisticated rhetorical exercises, were increasingly introduced into the secondary curriculum during the late Roman Republic and early Empire, though some students did not learn them until the third stage of education.

Tertiary education involved a choice between philosophy and rhetoric, with the vast majority of students opting for the latter. The goal of rhetoric was the acquisition of the art of persuasive eloquence, an indispensable skill whatever one's profession or role in civic life and administration. That entailed knowledge of the various parts of a speech, skill in developing arguments and proofs, expertise in the rhetorical methods involved in composing and delivering speeches, and mastery of three basic types of speeches: the forensic speech, designed for courtroom accusations and apologies relating to past actions; the deliberative speech, aimed at persuading or dissuading the undertaking of future endeavors; and the epideictic speech, devoted to the bestowal of praise and blame in the present. Epistolary theory was also a concern of tertiary education, where attention was given to enhancing literary style and to developing skill in how to write different kinds of letters, such as thank-you notes for gifts received or services rendered, congratulatory letters for accomplishments and awards, notes of condolence on occasions of death and disappointment, requests, paraenetic letters of moral exhortation, letters of recommendation, and words of advice.

Various philosophical schools developed during the Hellenistic Age, with the four major sects being Platonism, Aristotelianism, Stoicism, and Epicureanism. Others included the Cynics, the Neopythagoreans, the Skeptics, and various eclectics. At the beginning of the period, Athens was the unquestioned center of philosophy, and any serious student went there to study. Toward the end of the second century BCE that began to change, in part because of the expansion of Roman power into the eastern Mediterranean and the growing interest of Romans in philosophy. Influential philosophers began to leave Athens and teach elsewhere, such as Panaetius (d. 109 BCE), who lectured in his native Rhodes and was a frequent visitor to Rome. When the Roman general Sulla sacked a considerable portion of Athens during the First Mithridatic War (89–85 BCE), it precipitated a major exodus of philosophers, their schools damaged or destroyed. This had two major consequences. The first was the radical decentralization of philosophy, with schools now established all across the Mediterranean world and influential philosophers active in various places. Posidonius of Apamea in Syria (ca. 135–51 BCE), for example, the most important Stoic of the first century BCE, taught at Rhodes and was never head of the Stoic school in Athens. Similarly, the Epicurean philosopher Philodemus (ca. 110–40 BCE), who was born in Gadara of Syria and studied in Athens, made Italy his base of operations. There were, of course, philosophers still in Athens in the first century CE (Acts 17:18), yet Athenian supremacy in philosophy was over. The second major consequence was a corollary of the first. Philosophical education increasingly involved instruction in the doctrines of all the philosophical schools, not just those of the particular sect with which one was affiliated, along with the exegetical study of the various "classic" texts of philosophy. Editions of, and commentaries on, key texts now began to appear, and histories of philosophy began to be written. The canonization and exegetical study of the Old and New Testament thus took place within a cultural context in which philosophers were similarly engaged in discussions about what the founding fathers had written and taught.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

P. Athanassiadi and M. Frede, eds. Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity (Oxford: Clarendon, 1999); M. Beard, J. North, and S. Price. Religions of Rome. 2 vols. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); P. Green. Alexander to Actium (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990); H.- J. Klauck. The Religious Context of Early Christianity (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000); A. A. Long and D. N. Sedley. The Hellenistic Philosophers. 2 vols. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); T. G. Parkin and A. J. Pomeroy. Roman Social History (London: Routledge, 2007); M. Sartre. The Middle East Under Rome (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2005); D. Sedley. "Philodemus and the Decentralisation of Philosophy." Cronache Ercolanesi 33 (2003) 31–41; Y. L. Too, ed. Education in Greek and Roman Antiquity (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

BIBLE AND SPIRITUALITY

RICHARD VALANTASIS

Spirituality—the practices that reflect, influence, and sustain the interior religious life of a person or community that in turn flows outward into exterior activities—has always connected deeply with the Bible for Jews and Christians because the core of Jewish and Christian religious life emerges from a sustained reflection on Scripture. Spirituality may be described as both corporate and personal.

PUBLIC PRAYER

All biblical interpretation takes place in a social context so that corporate spiritual formation emerges from interpretative strategies by individuals and groups in community. In the most general sense, the corporate spiritual reading and interpretation of the Bible represents a discursive practice, a meditative and philological exploration of the meaning of biblical texts perceived to be hidden or inherent in the words, narratives, personalities, events, and experiences expressed in the text. The earliest years of rabbinic Judaism and formative Christianity, when the books of the Bible began to be organized into the canonical texts read today, witness to this discursive practice. The rabbis debated the interpretation of Scripture and engaged with other rabbis with differing interpretations. Their students recorded these discursive studies of the meaning of the Bible and eventually enshrined them around the biblical text in the Talmud, the Jewish books that compiled the various oral teachings of the rabbis. In contemporary Judaism this discursive practice is called "learning" and it constitutes the primary contemporary spiritual practice for the majority of Jews. Early Christians also engaged in this discursive practice for the development of their spirituality. Christian scholars, theologians, bishops, and educators produced commentaries and sermons engaging the various levels of the text, searching out its hidden and spiritual meanings in a process of allegorical reading (reading for "other" moral or spiritual understandings). The central role of the mind as a medium of connection to the divine mind of God founds the spirituality of these discursive practices.

Communities of faith regularly read biblical texts as part of their worship, often reading through entire books of the Bible over the course of a liturgical season. The liturgical reading of texts achieves a number of spiritual goals: it founds the community in its sacred narrative and books; it connects contemporary understandings of God to those of the ancients who produced the Scriptures; it provides a window into the ways in which God has been perceived in previous generations; and in some cases it constitutes a set of rules for the regulation of community behavior and beliefs. Some communities, both Christian and Jewish, gather daily to read the Scriptures, to sing hymns (often including the Psalms), and to pray as part of the regular expression and development of their spirituality. Most communities also gather on their holy day (Saturday for Jews, Sunday for Christians) to read Scripture, hear an exposition of the text and apply that exposition to the daily lives of the people and the community, and to pray as a means of renewing their identity as a spiritual group.

by expressing and developing their particular spiritual perspective. But it is not only religious communities that use the Scriptures as a way of articulating their identity. Often the Bible is used to establish the spiritual and religious identity of a nation, as when the Supreme Court invokes biblical precedents for its decisions, or when a politician refers to a biblical text to support a political position.

Worship most always includes hymnody as a primary expression of spirituality because hymns often paraphrase, reference, metaphorize, or in some other way invoke biblical texts. The Psalms of David in particular have formed the heart of Christian and Jewish worship, not only in their direct recitation and chanting but also in their versified forms in hymns. And virtually every other book of the Bible has become part of a hymn text. Christmas hymns explore the riches of the story of Jesus' birth, and there are hymns to guide the spiritual life of the seeker through the exodus, the mission of Jesus and his followers, the transfiguration on Mount Tabor, the passion and death, and the resurrection of Jesus. Hymns make the biblical narratives accessible to the imagination, emotions, and intellect of seekers, and provide a rich medium of spiritual formation for individuals and communities. The Bible has provided ample resources throughout the ages for operas, oratorios, anthems, and other musical pieces.

Iconography and art also advance the experiential dynamic of reading Scripture and worship. For centuries, artists have made renditions of biblical stories that may be found in many art museums around the world. Moreover, it is now commonplace to find the architecture of religious buildings adorned with biblical stories, motifs, iconography, and art. These renditions frequently reflect the spirituality and theology of the age from which they come, and provide not only a window into the spiritual experience of the artist and the artist's audience but also a way of reading how they read the Bible, how they applied biblical texts to the understanding of their own lives. The standard iconography of an Eastern Orthodox Church presents the history of salvation in pictorial form on the interior walls of the church. Beginning with Adam and Eve and the creation at the west entrance to the church, the icons follow the life of the Christian Old Testament until the birth of Jesus, which is represented in a number of forms in the east sanctuary. Then from the sanctuary, it proceeds with the New Testament stories leading to the Last Judgment in the west entrance opposite the creation. In an Eastern Orthodox Church, one not only reads the Bible but also enters it and lives in it during the various worship services. The Bible also has influenced other arts that enhance the religious life of individuals and communities: plays, poems, television documentaries, films, popular music, advertising, novels and short stories, and Internet sites. These continual references to the biblical text indicate the way that the Bible has become a part of the spiritual and cultural fabric of modern society. The Bible forms an integral part of communal formation, both religious and secular.

PRIVATE PRAYER

Personal spirituality also employs the Bible as an important resource. In addition to the spiritual benefit accrued to the individuals who participate in the corporate settings, some specific personal spiritual practices have become prominent.

Ignatian

The Bible plays an important part in personal meditative practices. In its most general description, the meditator actively applies the imagination to a biblical story in order to experience the biblical event by stepping into it. Ignatian meditation, for example, begins with a "composition of place" in which the meditator visualizes every minute detail of the story as it is written, and then begins to imagine the sights, smells, conversations, emotions, thoughts, and reactions of the context and the characters in the story. The meditator thus becomes not only a spectator but also a participant in the story. Many variations of this Ignatian method exist in both individual and group settings, where a leader will guide the meditator through the complexities and intricacies of a biblical story. The goal in this sort of meditation is to bring the biblical story to life in the imagination and to break down the perceived distance between the reader of the biblical text and the text itself.

Mantra

Another very basic form of meditation is the biblical verse mantra. Taking a short verse or phrase from the Scriptures, the person repeats the phrase slowly and deliberately for a period of time, sometimes regulating the breathing in order to quiet the body and focus the mind. Many Eastern Orthodox Christians, for example, use the phrase "God, be merciful to me, a sinner" (Luke 18:13) as such a mantra, repeating it fifty or a hundred or a thousand times in a slow sequence. Frequently Western Catholic Christians will use phrases from the psalms such as "God, make speed to save me" (Ps 70:1; Catholic Bible 69:1). The use of such scriptural mantras enables the meditators to inscribe the Scriptures onto their mind and body.

Memorization

Related to mantra meditation is simple memorization of biblical verses. This practice, with its deep monastic roots, frees the person from dependence upon the written word in order to make the biblical text a living and vital part of the meditator's life. Through memorization, the body (specifically the eyes and hands) is released from the physical work of reading in order to concentrate attention on the spiritual, mental, or oral assimilation of the verse, which may even take place in the dark or in places where books hinder.

Scripture may also be used as a spiritual talisman, as a verbal or written object to ward off evil forces and to sanctify a space for spiritual activity to occur. The Jewish mezuzah contains written portions of the Torah that observant Jews hang on every door of their houses in order to remind them of their obligation and joy of faithful living as well as to ward off any evil that might intrude. For Christians, Bible verses have been used since early Christianity to ward off the deadly vices or sins (pride, envy, gluttony, lust, anger, greed, sloth, and sometimes listlessness) in a process of using scriptural verses as a means of changing the psychological dynamics of a person from a temptation to evil activities toward the embracing of virtuous and godly ones. Even some modern Bibles contain pages of references for people to use when, for example, they are depressed, troubled, frustrated, angered, or weary. As a talisman, the Scripture verses intervene in a negative psychological dynamic or simply remind the person of trusted spiritual realities.

The talisman also seems related when Scripture functions as an instrument for the reformation of character. The reader searches out the Scriptures for clues about ways of living a spiritual life satisfying at once to God and to the person. Over years of personal spiritual work and memorization, the seeker changes to reflect the biblical principles that have emerged. In the tradition such biblical metaphors as restoring humans to the "image" and "likeness" of God (Gen 1 and 2) and "holiness" articulate the goal of such reformation.

Biblical spirituality also plays a major role in kataphatic and apophatic theology. Kataphatic theology is the theology that assembles the names and attributes of God by reading and meditating on the Scriptures. For example, because of the creation story in Genesis, God is Creator, the One who names all things good, the Good itself. Because of the exodus, God is Light, Pillar, Savior. Based on John 6, the Bread of Life Discourse, God is Bread, Life, Manna from heaven, and Eternal Life. These attributes help the seeker to discover the reality of God and to perceive God's nature as it is manifest in Scripture. Scripture comes to life as a place for encountering the divine names that then feed the mind, soul, and body of the seeker. Apophatic theology strips away the scriptural divine names to come to a knowledge of God that is beyond human discourse and comprehension in a post-discursive union with God.

Lectio divina ("divine reading") is the Western Christian counterpart to the Eastern kataphatic and apophatic tradition and constitutes the most common use of the Bible in personal corporate spiritual formation today. This reading begins with a slow, methodical, meditative reading of the text with the mind and heart attuned to the way God is speaking through it. This reading leads to meditation upon the text in which the personal life of the reader begins to blend with the text. Lectio divina ends in prayer, a conversation with God aimed toward the consecration of the reader, and contemplation, a resting in the divine presence.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

M. Cox. A Handbook of Christian Spirituality (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1985); P. Sheldrake. Brief History of Spirituality (Oxford: Blackwells, 2007).

THE BIBLE IN THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH

BEVERLY ROBERTS GAVENTA

Any discussion of the place of the Bible in the church's life threatens to dissolve into the problem of chicken and egg, since there is no Bible without the life of the church and no church exists without the Bible. The earliest generations of Christians continued to turn to Jewish Scriptures (Christian Old Testament) for instruction and understanding. And their developing need to give expression to their convictions about Jesus Christ gave rise to the writing, the communal use, and the collection of Christian texts into what is known as the New Testament. To be sure, today the Bible is of broad interest in the academy and beyond because of its deep influence on Western history and culture, but that interest exists because of the church's relationship to the Bible, not apart from it.

If the Bible emerged from the life of the church, it is also true that the church draws its life from the Bible's testimony to God. That testimony shapes the church in a variety of ways, although given the vast diversity within the churches, any description of those ways is at best partial. Perhaps the most obvious place of the Bible in the church's life is in worship, since the reading and interpretation of the Bible is a hallmark of virtually all forms of corporate Christian worship. The precedents for this practice derive from the Bible itself, which depicts Ezra reading and interpreting "the book of the law of Moses" at a religious ceremony (Neh 8:1–8) and Jesus reading and interpreting Scripture in the synagogue (Luke 4:16–30; see also Acts 13:13–43). Paul closes his earliest letter with a strong admonition that the letter be read aloud when the entire community is gathered together (1 Thess 5:27), underscoring the notion that the practice of reading Christian texts together is an ancient one.

The Bible also plays a significant role in the teaching ministry of the church. Contemporary distinctions between teaching and preaching would have been lost on early generations; the two activities were linked together (as in Acts 28:31) and there would have been no separation between worship life and educational program. The Bible's own testimony to the necessity of education is as ancient as the instruction that Israel should teach God's commandments to every generation (see Deut 11:18–21; also 5:31; 31:9–13).

In ways that shift across denominational lines, the Bible shapes the church's very self-understanding. That may mean particular forms of ecclesiology, ranging from an emphasis on the priesthood of all believers (as in 1 Pet 2:9) to the centrality of Peter and his successors (as in Matt 16:18–29 and Acts 6:1–6). It also means particular forms of service, ranging from civil disobedience (Acts 5:29) to peacemaking (Matt 5:9) to the provision of food and other necessities (e.g., Acts 2:44–45, 6:1–6) to acts of healing (James 5:13–18). Although Christians of goodwill disagree about the exact character of the Bible's witness, they share a commitment to take that witness seriously.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ellen F. Davis and Richard B. Hays. The Art of Reading Scripture (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2003); John Webster. Holy Scripture: A Dogmatic Sketch (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003).

LECTIONARIES

DAVID L. BARTLETT

OVERVIEW

A lectionary is a list of Scripture readings assigned for use in the worship of the synagogue or the church. Though lectionaries have been used in some communities for centuries, the twentieth century saw a growth in interdenominational use of lectionaries for worship and preaching. In response to a revived interest in the Bible at the Second Vatican Council the Roman Catholic Church published its "Order of Readings at Mass" (The Common Lectionary) in 1969. In 1992 the North American Consultation on Common Texts published the Revised Common Lectionary, a revision of the Catholic lectionary for official use in Episcopal, Presbyterian, United Methodist, Reformed, Lutheran, and Disciples of Christ denominations. Many local congregations of other denominations also use a lectionary on a fairly regular basis.

The History of Lectionaries

According to Luke 4:16 Jesus stands up in the synagogue at Nazareth and reads the text handed to him from Isaiah 61, presumably the text assigned for that particular Sabbath. Acts 15:21 does not indicate that there was a list of assigned verses for synagogue worship but does indicate that the books of Moses were read aloud on every Sabbath. Acts 13:15 suggests that the weekly readings included texts both from the Torah and from the Prophets. The Mishnah, a codification of Jewish legal interpretation from the third century CE, indicates that Sabbath worship was to include readings both from the Law and from the Prophets.

Though there is no evidence of commonly used lectionaries in the early church, there is evidence that particular preachers had their own collections of readings that they used as the basis for their sermons. Ambrose of Milan directed that at each worship service the Prophets should be read, and then the Epistle, and finally the Gospel. From studying Augustine's sermons scholars can discover the series of readings he used in leading worship at Hippo. In Augustine's use of biblical texts it also becomes clear that particular readings are associated with particular feasts of the church.

By the sixth century in the Western Church there were lists of readings called the Comes, which were wrongly attributed to Jerome but which did have widespread use beyond the worship of any single congregation. Up until the tenth century a number of lists of assigned readings appeared. With the publication of the Missal in the tenth century CE the lectionary texts were incorporated into the Missal itself until the publication of the Common Lectionary in 1969.

In the Eastern Church we have lectionaries of the Greek readings of the Epistle and Gospel lessons going back to the early Middle Ages. The lectionaries were organized around the Gospel lessons, and the Gospel lessons were often coordinated to feasts of the Christian year—texts on baptism for the Baptism of the Lord, for example.

The Church of England published a lectionary in 1871, and the Episcopal Church in the United States did so shortly thereafter.

The twentieth century revival of interest in the Lectionary began with the "Constitution on the Liturgy" of Vatican II with its concern that the riches of Scripture—OT and New—should be provided more fully for Catholic congregants over a set cycle of years. From this directive followed the Common Lectionary of 1969. Shortly thereafter many North American Protestant congregations came together to produce the Revised Common Lectionary, a first proposal in 1983 and the finished work in 1992.

Principles

The Revised Common Lectionary provides a three-year cycle of readings for use in Christian worship. Each year focuses on one of the three Synoptic Gospels (Matthew in Year A; Mark in Year B; Luke in Year C.) On the whole the Lectionary assigns the texts in the same order as they are found in the Bible itself, but there are exceptions dictated by the liturgical calendar. For instance the Advent readings always include eschatological material from chapters later in the Gospel than the "next" chapters in canonical order. (Year A of Advent goes from Matt 14 to Matt 3 to Matt 11 to Matt 1). Most, but not all, of the Synoptic Gospels are included as is a goodly portion of the Gospel of John, especially during the Sundays after Easter in every cycle.

In the Roman Catholic Common Lectionary the assigned OT texts for each Sunday (almost) always have a kind of typological relationship to the NT text; that is, for Christians the OT text can be read in conversation with the Gospel text, either as a kind of foreshadowing or as a promise whose fulfillment is found in the Gospels. Those who designed the Revised Common Lectionary were concerned that the typological constraint limited both the range and the meaning of OT texts that could be read. Therefore in the season from Pentecost to Advent (so-called "Ordinary Time") the Revised Common Lectionary is more apt to go through one OT book at a time, in a kind of continuous reading. For instance in year B the Sundays immediately after Pentecost provide the opportunity to go through 1 and 2 Samuel at some leisure, and over a period of almost three months.

For the sake of those churches that want to maintain the close thematic connection between OT and Gospel texts a second set of OT readings is given for those weeks between Pentecost and Advent. So while one set of lections in Year B is going through 1 and 2 Samuel in order, the other set of OT lections is drawn from Genesis, Ezekiel, Job, the Wisdom of Solomon, Amos, Jeremiah, 1 and 2 Kings, Exodus, and Proverbs.

The Revised Common Lectionary also assigns an Epistle reading for each Sunday. These readings draw for several weeks from one epistle and follow the order of that epistle. The lectionary is not designed with the assumption that the epistle text will have any particular thematic connection with the Gospel text for that Sunday. During the Sundays after Easter, texts from Acts are often substituted for the OT readings.

The Psalms are assigned with an eye more to prayer than to preaching. Psalms are chosen because of the rich possibility they provide for penitence and praise, and no particular attention is paid to the way in which their content may relate to the content of the Gospel texts. (This does not mean that the psalm cannot provide an appropriate text for a sermon in its own right.)

The use of the lectionary in worship represents a juxtaposition between the content of the Christian story and its replication in time. That is, the lectionary balances attention to the Bible with attention to the liturgical year. Historically it seems that the lectionaries were first used in conjunction with the great festivals of the church, and the richness of lectionary preaching and liturgy is most evident in those seasons like Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost where calendar and text reinforce and illumine one another.

Advantages and Disadvantages of Preaching from the Lectionary

The very juxtaposition of calendar and content can enrich both Christian preaching and worship. Furthermore the use of the lectionary has the following clear advantages.

The use of the lectionary can broaden the range of texts that the preacher preaches and the congregation hears. The lectionary provides a protection against the tendency of preachers to recycle favorite texts and favorite themes week after week and helps to ensure that, for instance, justice and mercy will be balanced not only among the attributes of God but among the sermons preached to honor God.

The use of the lectionary also allows the congregation to participate in the life of the church universal. For lectionary-based congregations, worship provides the opportunity not just to gather around a common table but around a common set of texts. Less crucially, the use of a common lectionary provides for lectionary study groups among preachers from diverse denominations as they prepare their diverse sermons based in the same assigned texts.

On the other hand, the lectionary is highly selective. The Gospel of John is seriously underrepresented. No Gospel, not even any Epistle—except for the conveniently brief Philemon—is present in its entirety. Even the decision about which verses to include and which to omit from a particular pericope sometimes seems arbitrary and oddly anti-canonical.

The list of four lessons sometimes tempts the preacher to use the sermon as an opportunity to determine what it is that these four texts all have in common. Apart from a reference to the God of Abraham, Sarah, Jesus, and Paul the answer is sometimes precious little.

Many preachers complain that devotion to the lectionary prevents attention to the pressing needs of the congregation. No doubt from time to time this is true. More often the lectionary—like the church it is intended to serve—puts the pressing needs of the congregation in the larger framework of the liturgical year and the scriptural promises.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. W. Aageson. "Early Jewish Lectionaries." Anchor Bible Dictionary (Doubleday: New York, 1992) 4:270–271; P. C. Bower, ed. Handbook for the Revised Common Lectionary (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1996); F. West. Scripture and Memory: The Ecumenical Hermeneutic of the Three-Year Lectionaries (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1997).

PREACHING THE BIBLE

THOMAS G. LONG

sChristian preaching, from its very beginning, was the proclamation of good news "in accordance with the scriptures" (1 Cor 15:3b). Patterned in large measure on the ways that synagogue preaching brought Scripture to bear on events in the present, early Christian preaching announced the events that constituted the core of the gospel—the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ—in relation to the images, themes, promises, and prophecies of the OT. Luke's description of Jesus' conversation with the two followers on the road to Emmaus almost surely expresses a concise definition of early Christian preaching: "Then beginning with Moses and all the prophets, [Jesus] interpreted to them the things about himself in all the scriptures" (Luke 24:27).

The essential movements of Christian preaching from the outset, then, were in two directions. The sermon both beckoned the hearers into the Scriptures as attentive listeners and out into the world as faithful disciples. We can see these two movements reflected in Justin Martyr's second-century description of a typical Christian worship service:

And on the day called Sunday, all who live in cities or in the country gather together to one place, and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read, as long as time permits; then, when the reader has ceased, the president verbally instructs, and exhorts to the imitation of these good things.

Notice that both the OT ("the prophets") and what will eventually become the NT ("the memoirs of the apostles") are read. The hearers are drawn into the readings in order that, through the sermon by the presider, the Scripture may become a pattern for the Christian life ("the imitation of these good things").

BIBLICAL PREACHING AND THE ACT OF INTERPRETATION

Christian preaching is biblical preaching. While not all Christian sermons are biblical in the strict sense of being acts of interpretation based on particular biblical texts, even those sermons that are called "topical," that is, sermons based on some general theme or issue or theological concept, if they are Christian sermons, are finally grounded in biblical understanding. There is room, of course, for the Trinity Sunday sermon that begins by exploring a doctrine or a pastoral care sermon that examines the experience of grief or a prophetic sermon that engages a political development from the front page of the newspaper. But normative Christian preaching—normative both in the sense of being the norm, the standard by which all preaching is measured, and the normal and customary practice—involves sermons that are explicit expressions of biblical texts. In this sense, Christian preaching is a continuation of Jesus' inaugural sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth, in which he read a passage from the prophet Isaiah and then proclaimed, "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Luke 4:21).

In order to preach biblically, preachers must first be exegetes, interpreters of biblical texts. This is a matter of prayer, freedom, and method. First, biblical interpretation is a matter of prayer because it is not finally the words of the text we wish to hear and repeat but the voice of God speaking in and through the Bible. All faithful preachers do exegesis on their knees, pleading prayerfully, "Speak to me that I may speak."

Good exegesis is also a matter of freedom, freedom for the text and freedom for the interpreter. Theologian Klaus Berger has argued that exegesis and application (of the sort that occurs in preaching) are obviously connected but that they should also be seen as separate activities for the sake of these freedoms. If the looming needs of the preacher become too dominant, if the preacher simply "uses" the text to get up next Sunday's sermon, then the freedom of the text is curtailed. It cannot interrupt the preacher's agenda by raising concerns not anticipated by the preacher. On the other hand, if the text is allowed to dominate the conversation completely, the freedom of the interpreter to raise questions and issues never envisioned by the text in its original setting is eliminated. Effective biblical interpretation is like a good conversation between two friends: each person in the dialogue is, in some sense, an independent agent and worthy of respect. If one of the partners does all of the talking or narrowly sets the agenda, the conversation will ultimately be unsatisfying. But if the interchange proceeds in freedom, each making a contribution and each attending to the other, then the conversation between them creates something new, fresh, and unexpected.

Finally, interpreting biblical texts for preaching involves specific methods and techniques. Preachers do not go to biblical texts as naïve readers or as blank tablets; they go with strategies of reading. If two people are standing on the side of a high mountain road at a scenic overlook and suddenly one of them cries out to the other, "Look!" it is not immediately clear exactly what the other is supposed to do. "Look where? Look at what?" they will probably respond. Just so, preachers as biblical interpreters need to approach biblical texts knowing where to look, how to look, and what they are looking for. In order to answer those questions, preachers have employed, throughout the history of the church, a variety of methods of biblical interpretation. At one point, the method of allegorical interpretation, that is, seeking to find the deeper, symbolic and spiritual meanings of texts, was in vogue. At another point, typological interpretation, seeing past events in Scripture as patterns or types of events in the future, was in fashion. In other eras, "plain sense" interpretation of texts or theological interpretations were the methods of choice. A number of forces determine a preacher's preferred method of interpretation: theological perspective, education, ecclesial tradition, and others.

It is tempting to say that these methods of biblical hermeneutics are developed in the academic laboratory by biblical scholars and then borrowed and employed by the practitioners, by preachers, but this would be misleading in two ways. First, for most of the history of the church, there was no such division of labor. Biblical scholars were preachers and preachers were the biblical scholars of the church. For example, Augustine wrote one of the first scholarly treatises on biblical interpretation for preaching (On Christian Doctrine), but he wrote it while serving as pastor of a congregation and preaching almost every day. Second, even when contemporary biblical scholars, serving in the academy, write books and articles about biblical interpretation, the best of them never take their eye off of the practices of the faithful community. They develop and refine critical methods for engagement with Scripture not to silence the voice of the preacher but to give it clarity, truthfulness, and strength.

THE METHODS OF BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

It is a feature of contemporary church life that preachers have available not just one or two approaches to biblical interpretation but a quiver full of methods and strategies. Textual criticism, form criticism, redaction criticism, canonical criticism, sociological criticism, literary criticism, narrative criticism, feminist and liberationist criticism are but a few of the entrees on the cafeteria line of biblical hermeneutics. Most preachers have found value in all of these methods, and rather than settling in to one well-worn approach the biblical texts, it is better if these many methods are viewed as tools in a surgeon's bag. The preacher can select the best set of tools depending upon the task at hand.

For example, imagine that a preacher is developing a sermon on Mark 10:13–16, the story of the day when people were bringing their children to Jesus to have him touch them, only to be rebuked by the disciples. It would be helpful for the preacher to pull several hermeneutical tools out of the "surgeon's bag." Form and literary criticism would reveal that this is a pronouncement story and that the center of attention in the story is in Jesus' statement, "Let the little children come to me; do not stop them; for it is to such as these that the kingdom of God belongs. Truly I tell you, whoever does not receive the kingdom of God as a little child will never enter it." Sociological criticism would give another perspective, making it clear that the children in this story are not the cute "Gerber babies" that modern readers tend to see, but persons of low social standing, many of whom would not live to see age six and who are utterly dependent upon their parents, especially their fathers, for every scrap of life's resources. Historical criticism would uncover the fact that this story was important to the early church because they were struggling, in quite practical ways, with the role of children in the community.

In broad terms, preachers can use the multiple methods of biblical interpretation to explore behind the text, under the text, and in front of the text. To look behind the text is to examine the social, cultural, and historical conditions out of which the text comes. For instance, some of the rather harsh "woe to you!" language that Jesus directs against the scribes and Pharisees in the Gospel of Matthew has sometimes been misinterpreted in ways that pit Christianity against Judaism and has led to sermons that have, at least in an unconscious way, the tint of anti-Semitism. This language is clarified, perhaps even softened, in light of the fact that, historically, Matthew was addressing a young and fragile Jewish Christian community, which was in a tense yes-and-no relationship with its former community of faith, the synagogue. The text is not the language of non-Jews denouncing Jews. Everybody involved is Jewish, and the language reflects the stresses and strains of an urgent intramural debate over how God intends for the heritage and promise of Judaism to be carried forward.

To probe under the text is to examine the text's form and structure, to crawl around under the chassis and to see how the gears and pulleys of the text are assembled to make it work. For example, exploring under the text of Mark 5:21–43 discloses what some biblical scholars have named the "sandwich technique": Mark tells one story, in this case the story of the synagogue leader Jairus and his gravely ill daughter, but before he finishes this first story he interrupts it by inserting, like sandwich filling between two slices of bread, a second narrative, here the account of the woman suffering from hemorrhages for twelve years. This is not an accidental technique but a very sophisticated way to invite the reader to interpret the two stories simultaneously.

One place this simultaneous reading is quite strong is at the seam between story #2 and the ending portion of story #1. Story #2 ends with Jesus saying to the ill woman, "Daughter, your faith has made you well; go in peace, and be healed of your disease" (5:34). Notice, however, how the next verse reads, "While he was still speaking, some people came from the leader's house to say, 'Your daughter is dead' " (5:35, emphasis added). In other words, the sandwich technique in the text has created here a stereophonic effect. The two statements—"Daughter, your faith has made you well" and "Your daughter is dead"—are meant to be heard at one and the same time. The way the text is structured has, in effect, placed before us simultaneously two theological views of the world, one with the power of the gospel and one without it.

To explore the world in front of the text is to ask what possibilities for the preacher, and for those who will hear the sermon, the text opens up. Take, for example, the parable of the widow and the judge in Luke 18:1–8. It is important, of course, to do the homework of inquiring behind this text and under this text, to see the parabolic structure of the story and to realize both the importance of and the struggle with prayer, the theme of the story, to Luke and to Luke's community historically. Finally, though, the preacher must stand in that middle space between the text and the preacher's own situation. This parable moves to create the insight that if a widow who has no power or standing can finally wrangle justice from a judge who has no honor, how much more will God's "chosen ones" receive what they need when they cry out to God for justice. In front of this text, then, is a reassurance about prayer, but not only about prayer. In front of the text is a world in which the faithful are God's "chosen ones" and are in a relationship of deep trust with God. This opens up insights not only about prayer but about many other things, such as taking risks in faith, being hopeful in a world of injustice, and the eternal worth of self and others.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. Barton. The Nature of Biblical Criticism (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007); Y. Brilioth. A Brief History of Preaching (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1965); T. G. Long. Preaching and the Literary Forms of the Bible (Minneapolis: Forstress, 1989); B. K. Lundblad. Marking Time: Preaching Biblical Stories in Present Tense (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2007).

TEACHING THE BIBLE

GORDON S. MIKOSKI

The cornerstone of Christian education through the ages has been the teaching of Scripture. The task of teaching the Bible is both lofty and difficult. Teaching the Bible involves important decisions about aims, characteristics of learners, roles and responsibilities of the teacher, shape of the curriculum, and appropriate methods of engagement with learners.

Aims. In the long history of teaching the Bible, many different, often overlapping, aims have been pursued: religious conversion, edification and guidance of the church, prophetic critique and correction of society, cultural literacy, and mystical insight. While the ends of teaching the Bible can in some sense only be determined in relation both to larger theological or philosophical questions and to the complexities of social location, most Christian communities tend to agree with Augustine that the purpose of teaching the Bible is love. Most centrally, this means bringing into bold relief the amazing and tireless love of God for the human family through the ages, culminating in the life, teachings, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus. Metaphorically stated, teaching the Bible is akin to the preaching of John the Baptist: it points authoritatively beyond itself to the living Word of God, Jesus Christ (John 5:39-40). As the aim of teaching the Bible, love also means hearing and heeding the call to respond to God's love through grateful obedience and love for God, love for one's fellow human beings, and loving care for all of creation. For Christian communities and individuals, the purpose of teaching and studying the Bible can never function as an end in and of itself; teaching the Bible always points to reconciliation and transformation in the direction of the reign of God.

Learners. Teaching the Bible also involves deep attentiveness to the character, needs, capacities, and social contexts of the learners. Students of the Bible come in all shapes, sizes, ages, ability levels, and cultural backgrounds. Teaching the Bible necessarily involves interaction between the multidimensionality of the text and the multidimensionality of those who encounter the text in particular situations. For example, how one teaches the Bible to three year olds in an American upper-middle-class, white, suburban, mainline Protestant church school setting on a Sunday morning differs considerably from the way one might teach the Bible with older women in an impoverished, inner-city Pentecostal setting in Central America during a midweek prayer meeting. Teaching the Bible entails knowing the learning profiles, needs, capacities, and life situations of those who seek to learn from its contents. Basic principles of developmental psychology and educational sociology need to be combined with personal knowledge of particular learners in order to maximize the effectiveness of teaching the Bible. Recent research in the interdisciplinary sciences of learning and social constructions of meaning can greatly enrich an understanding of those who seek to learn from the Bible.

Teachers. Christian communities teach the Bible through the ethos they foster in their pattern of life together. That is, the life of a church—and subgroups within it—make up a significant part of what curriculum theorist Eliot Eisner calls the "implicit curriculum." Individual learners learn to make meaning out of what they encounter in the Bible partly as a result of what they experience in the social air that they breathe. Parents and other primary caregivers in the home, along with occasions for intentional instruction in the church, provide ways for learners to learn the "explicit curriculum" of biblical instruction. This means that parents, primary caregivers, volunteer teachers and youth group leaders, and peers teach the Bible. Theologically trained pastors and church educators play a particularly important role as catalysts for learning and as knowledgeable resources about the Bible. There are also countless, subtle ways that the larger societal context in which learners live teaches important lessons about the Bible and its message.

At the deepest level, the Holy Spirit serves as the primary and most effective teacher of the Bible. Christian communities through the ages have consistently maintained that divine illumination is required to understand the Bible and to grasp its central message for one's life and times. While many teachers and scholars in the humanities have rightly held that a basic knowledge of the Bible is available to unaided reason and that such knowledge is a necessary component of a well-rounded cultural education, Christian churches through the ages have and do affirm the necessity of divine pedagogy. Ideally, those who teach the Bible combine the best tools of textual, literary, historical, and theological scholarship with the practices of prayer, dialogical discernment, and openness to the subtle work of the Holy Spirit.

Curriculum. According to John Chrysostom, one of the greatest teachers of the early church, studying the Bible always involves three levels: a depiction of a some key revelatory event, figure, or teaching that has significance beyond its original facticity; engagement with what the writer of the biblical text thought about the subject matter; and a confrontation with the culture and life situation of the contemporary reader. Chrysostom made clear that teaching the Bible is never simply about the book and its contents; it is always and necessarily also about the context, needs, problems, and frameworks of meaning of the reading community or individual. Given this complexity, what specifically ought teachers of the Bible to teach?

To draw again briefly from Augustine, one can say that the central content involved in teaching the Bible is God's love for human beings and the call of God to human beings to love God, neighbor, and creation. To be sure, the central theme of love can be parsed and nuanced in a myriad of ways. Still, each part of the Bible needs to be taught with an awareness of this central theme.

There are many ways to structure the content of biblical teaching. Curricula and programs have been developed that lead learners on a journey of discovery through the Bible as a whole. Other curricular approaches mesh with the three-year Common Lectionary. Curricular approaches that emphasize particular genres of biblical literature or individual books are readily available or can be improvised. Key themes or particularly pithy or difficult passages can also serve as organizing principles for study of the Bible. Still other options highlight the importance of gaining a working knowledge about the historical, cultural, linguistic, and religious backgrounds of biblical literature.

Methods. In section four of his book On Christian Doctrine, Augustine emphasizes the crucial importance of finding the appropriate register for biblical teaching and preaching. The methods employed must be informed by a clear sense of the aims, capacities and contexts of the learners, the role and responsibilities of the teacher, and the shape of the curriculum. However, several other principles should be included. For instance, learning activities should be selected that allow for the active engagement of the learners with the subject matter. A variety of modes of encounter with the subject matter also tends to result in effective and durable learning. Methods of interaction between learners and the relevant subject matter should reflect sensitivity to the learning preferences, cultural norms, and interests of the learners. The methods used must reflect and reinforce the curricular content being purveyed.

Several methods for Bible study have proven effective over time. For example, a whole family of methods for studying the Bible situate study within the larger context of prayer or worship, as in the Lectio Divina approach. Other groupings of methods highlight the integration of the arts (music, drama, visual expression, multimedia, and creative writing). Many methods of teaching the Bible share family resemblances in that they emphasize the importance of small group interaction, spiritual care, personal disclosure, and empathy. Yet another collection of methods stresses the importance of the use of literary, historical, and comparative tools for analysis of the text.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Augustine. On Christian Teaching [De Doctrina Christiana] (New York: Oxford, 1999); K. Barth. Church Dogmatics I/1, The Doctrine of the Word of God (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1975); W. Brueggemann. The Creative Word: Canon as a Model for Biblical Education (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. Calvin. Institutes of the Christian Religion. LCC 20–21 (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1960); E. Eisner. The Educational Imagination: On the Design and Evaluation of School Programs (Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Merrill Prentice Hall, 2002); H. Gardner. Frames of Mind: The Theory of Multiple Intelligences (New York: Basic Books, 2004); H. R. Lang and D. N. Evans. Models, Strategies, and Methods for Effective Teaching (Boston: Pearson, 2006); A. C. Orstien and F. P. Hunkins. Curriculum: Foundations, Principles, and Issues (Boston: Pearson, 2004); J. Pelikan. Whose Bible is it? A History of the Scriptures through the Ages (New York: Viking, 2005); R. K. Sawyer, ed. The Cambridge Handbook of the Learning Sciences (New York: Cambridge, 2006).

CHRONOLOGIES

Old Testament Chronology

Because of the fragmentary nature of available literary and archaeological sources, dates are approximate.

? Creation

? Flood

2000–1500 _{BCE}? The Patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph)

1300 _{BCE}? The Exodus from Egypt

1200–1020? The Judges

1020–1000 _{BCE}? King Saul

1000–960 _{BCE}? King David

960–930 _{BCE}? King Solomon

930–922 _{BCE}? Division of the Kingdom

Kings of Judah	Kings of Israel
Rehoboam 922–915	922–901 Jeroboam I
Abijam 915–913
Asa 913–873
	901–900 Nadab
	900–877 Baasha
	877–876 Elah
	876 Zimr
	876–872 Tibni ^{†*}
	876–869 Omri
Jehoshpaphat 873–849 [†]
	869–850 Ahab
Jehoram 849–843	850–849 Ahaziah
Ahaziah 843–842	843–815 Jehu
Athaliah 842–837
Jehoash 837–800
	815–802 Jehoahaz
Amaziah 800–783	802–786 Joash
	786–746 Jeroboam II [*]
Azariah/Uzziah 783–742 [†]
	746–745 Zechariah
	745 Shallum
	745–737 Menahme
Jotham 742–735 [†]
	737–736 Pekahiah
Ahaz 735–715 [†]	736–732 Pekah

[†] Date range includes coregency years. ^{*} Rival rule.

Kings of Judah (cont.)	Kings of Israel (cont.)
	732–24 Hoshea
Hezekiah 715–687	722 ^{BCE} Fall of Samaria (the Northern Kingdom) to Assyria
Manasseh 687–642
Amon 642–640
Josiah 640–609
Jehoahaz 609
Jehoiakim 609–598
Jehoiachin 598–587
Zedekiah 587

597 BCE First deportation of Judah

587 BCE Fall of Judah (the Southern Kingdom) to Babylonia. Second deportation of Judah.

538–539 BCE Cyrus, King of Persia, decrees that the Jews may return to Judah and rebuild the Temple. The Jews return under the direction of Sheshbazzar.

520 BCE Zerubbael, the new governor of the Persian province Yehud (formerly central Judah) attempts to rebuild the Temple. Local opposition thwarts these efforts.

516/515 BCE By decree of Darius I, work continues on the Temple, which is completed and dedicated.

458 BCE With a commission from Artaxerxes I, Ezra goes to Jerusalem to establish pentateuchal law as the law in the province of Judea and to regulate temple worship, (Some scholars date this event and all of Ezra's ministry to 398 BCE and after).

457/458 BCE Ezra reads the law publicly and launches a formal inquiry into mixed marriages.

445 BCE Artaxerxes I appoints Nehemiah governor of Judah.

445–433 BCE Nehemiah serves as governor of Judah, rebuilds Jerusalem's city walls, and enlarges the city's population.

433? BCE or later Nehemiah returns to Judah and initiates various religious reforms.

Hellenistic, Maccabean, and Roman Era Chronology

Because of the fragmentary nature of available literary and archaeological sources, many of the dates are approximate.

332 BCE Alexander the Great conquers Palestine.

301 BCE After Alexander's death in 323, Palestine eventually falls under the control of Ptolemy I Soter.

301–198 BCE Palestine ruled from Egypt by the Ptolemaic dynasty.

198 BCE The Seleucids, from Damascus, defeat the Ptolemies at the Battle of Panium and take control of Palestine.

167 BCE The Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes uses repression to stop political infighting in Jerusalem. Torah scrolls are burned, circumcision is forbidden, the Sabbath is outlawed, participation in Greek religious festivals is forced, Jews are forced to eat pork, the Jerusalem Temple is devoted to Zeus Olympios and other gods.

167 BCE The priest Mattathias and his sons, known as the Maccabees, revolt against Seleucid repression.

165 BCE Following the death of Mattathias, his son Judas Maccabeus assumes leadership of the revolt, defeats the Seleucid forces, and reoccupies and cleanses the Temple.

164 BCE Judas opens negotiations with Roman ambassadors, thus initiating Rome's involvement in the affairs of Judah.

161 BCE Upon Judas's death, Jonathan Maccabeus continues the resistance against the Seleucids and becomes effective ruler of Judea.

143–135 BCE The last surviving son of the Maccabees, Simon, becomes high priest and effective ruler of Judea.

143–37 BCE In the midst of internal political infighting and wars with the Seleucids and other surrounding states, the Hasmoneans (the later name for the Maccabean Dynasty) take control of Palestine, and Judah becomes an independent state.

63 BCE Political unrest and opposition to Hasmonean rule results in the Roman general Pompey's being invited to intervene. Pompey takes Jerusalem.

37 BCE The Hasmoneans retain nominal rule until the Romans execute Aristobulus (Antigonus Mattathias).

40 BCE Rome elevates Herod the Great (son of an official in the local Roman government) to kingship.

37 BCE Herod the Great begins to rule.

New Testament Chronology

Because of the fragmentary nature of available literary and archaeological sources, many of the dates are approximate.

4 BCE Jesus born? Herod the Great dies.

28–33 CE Jesus' one-year ministry within this period?

30 CE? Jesus' crucifixion, death, and resurrection.

40 CE? Paul's conversion/call on the road to Damascus (Acts 8; 2 Cor 11:32).

41–44 CE Herod Agrippa I rules Judea; apostles persecuted (Acts 12); James executed.

44 CE Herod Agrippa I dies (Acts 12:20-23).

51–53 CE Paul in Corinth.

63–64 CE? Paul's execution in Rome?

66 CE First Jewish Revolt begins.

70 CE Jerusalem destroyed.

95 CE Domitian emperor of Rome; localized persecutions in Asia Minor. John of Patmos writes Revelation?

112 CE Trajan emperor of Rome; localized persecutions in Asia Minor under Pliny the Younger.

1 Chronicles	2 Samuel
1 Chr 18	2 Sam 8
——	2 Sam 9
1 Chr 19	2 Sam 10
1 Chr 20:1a	2 Sam 11:1
——	2 Sam 11:2–27
——	2 Sam 12:1–25
1 Chr 20:1b	cf. 2 Sam 12:26
——	cf. 2 Sam 12:27–29
1 Chr 20:2–3	cf. 2 Sam 12:30–31
——	2 Sam 12:1–21:14
——	2 Sam 21:15–17
1 Chr 20:4–8	2 Sam 21:18–22

MEASURES AND MONEY

GORDON B. DUNCAN

Calculations of biblical measures are at best approximate. For convenience the equivalents in the tables given here have been chosen as round numbers. Though obviously not exact, they lie within the limits indicated by the varying data.

Table 1. Lengths

Unit	Relation to Cubit	Approximate Equivalent finger	$\div 24$.75 in. / 1.9 cm
handbreadth	$\div 6$	3 in. / 7.6 cm
span	$\div 2$	9 in. / 22.8 cm
cubit		1.5 ft. / .46 m

Table 2. Dry Volumes

Unit	Relation to Ephah	Approximate Equivalent
kab	$\div 18$.89 qt. / .84 L
omer	$\div 10$	1.6 qt. / 1.5 L
seah	$\div 3$.67 pk. / 5.9 L
ephah		.5 bu. / 17.6 L
lethech	$\times 5$	2.5 bu. / 88 L
homer	$\times 10$	5 bu. / 176.1 L
cor	$\times 10$	5 bu. / 176.1 L

Table 3. Liquid Volumes

Unit	Relation to Bath	Approximate Equivalent
log	$\div 72$.56 pt. / .26 L
hin	$\div 6$	3.33 qt. / 3.15 L
bath		5 gal. / 18.9 L
cor	$\times 10$	50 gal. / 189.2 L

Table 4. Weights, Sanctuary Standard

Unit	Relation to Shekel	Approximate Equivalent
gerah	$\div 20$.017 oz. / .48 g
beka	$\div 2$.17 oz. / 4.8 g
shekel		.33 oz. / 9.35 g
mina	$\times 60$	1.25 lb. / .56 kg
talent	$\times 3,000$	62.5 lb. / 28.3 kg

Table 5. Weights, Commercial Standard

Unit	Relation to Shekel	Approximate Equivalent
gerah	$\div 24$.017 oz. / .48 g
beka	$\div 2$.2 oz. / 5.7 g
pim	$\div 1.5$.267 oz. / 7.6 g
shekel		.4 oz. / 11.3 g
mina	$\times 50$	1.25 lb. / .56 kg
talent	$\times 2,500$	62.5 lb. / 28.3 kg

Lengths and Areas

The measure of length most often mentioned in the Bible is the cubit, which originated as the distance from elbow to tip of middle finger. The span, originally the distance between the tips of thumb and little finger of the outstretched hand, came to be considered half a cubit. In the vision of the restored temple in Ezek. 40:1-48 the dimensions are given in cubits described as a handbreadth longer than usual (40:5; 43:13). Probably this represents a return to a standard known or at least believed to have been in use when Solomon's temple was built (cf. II Chr. 3:3).

In the NT fathom translates a Greek measure based on the distance between fingertips of the outstretched arms, ca. 6 feet. It was used for land as well as water. Mile in Matt. 5:41 is probably the Roman mile of 1,000 paces (double steps), standardized at ca. 58 inches each, or a total of ca. 1,618 yards. Elsewhere in the NRSV miles are conversions into modern terms of Greek distances in stadia, the stadion being 400 cubits, ca. 200 yards. Similarly hundred yards (John 21:8) is a conversion of 200 cubits.

A sabbath day's journey was the distance one could travel from home on the sabbath without violating the injunction of Exod. 16:29. Most evidence indicates it was 2,000 cubits, ca. 1,000 yards (cf. Josh. 3:4). Day's journey was not a standardized distance.

Area, when not indicated by dimensions in cubits, was measured by the "yoke," translated acre—i.e. the land a yoke of oxen could plow in a day, perhaps ca. 0.6 acre like the corresponding Roman term—or else by the amount of grain needed to seed the plot (cf. Lev. 27:16; 1 Kings 18:32).

Volumes

The derivation of the name homer shows that originally it was an assload of grain, which would be carried in a large sack (cf. Gen. 42:27). No doubt the quantity became standardized along the trade routes, and at various places local smaller measures came to be adjusted to convenient fractions of this major unit. The series in Table 2 may represent a combination of 2 or more systems that developed in this way.

Measure is the regular NRSV translation for seah (Gen. 18:6; Ruth 3:15, 17; 1 Sam. 25:18; 1 Kings 18:32; 2 Kings 7:1, 16, 18; Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21; see footnotes). It is also occasionally the translation for ephah (Deut. 25:14-15; Prov. 20:10; Mic. 6:10), bath (Luke 16:6), and cor (Luke 16:7).

Weights and Weighed Money

Most references to weights in the OT concern precious metals used as money. Until the introduction of coins into Palestine during the Persian period pieces of gold, silver, and bronze used in exchange had to be valued by weighing in balances.

All the biblical data about relationships among weights are found in connection with the shekel of the sanctuary, specified repeatedly in the P legislation (e.g. Exod. 30:13-14; Lev. 5:15; Num. 3:47-48) as the standard for offerings, esp. the contribution of a half shekel, or beka (Exod. 38:24-26), required yearly of each adult male. In several of the passages the sanctuary shekel is defined as containing 20 gerahs, evidently in distinction from a shekel containing another number, probably that referred to elsewhere in P (Gen 23:16) as "according to the weights current among the merchants," i.e. the commercial standard. Calculation from the figures in Exod 38:24-26 shows that there were 3,000 sanctuary shekels in a talent. Ezekiel 45:12 states the relation of the sanctuary shekel to the mina.

The repeated insistence of the P legislation on the sanctuary standard might suggest that it was heavier than the commercial standard, and this has often been assumed. On the other hand the reference in Neh 10:32 to the yearly temple contribution as a 3rd of a shekel, presumably commercial, implies otherwise. If the same amount as half a sanctuary shekel is intended, the commercial shekel would be heavier by a ratio of 3 to 2. Other evidence, however, suggests a lesser difference. In Babylonia the shekel contained 24 gerahs, a relation that may well have been customary in Palestine also. Evidence indicates that the Canaanites counted 50 shekels to the mina and 50 minas to the talent, and thus it is likely that by the Palestinian commercial standard there were 2,500 shekels in a talent. If so, 2,500 24-gerah shekels by the commercial standard would make a talent of the same weight as the 3,000 20-gerah shekels by the sanctuary standard indicated in Exod. 38:24-26. Probably, therefore, the sanctuary standard differed from the commercial by having a shekel a 6th lighter. No doubt the name "beka"—derived from a root meaning "split"—was used for a half of either shekel.

Tables 4 and 5 display the assumed relations and equivalents of the OT weights according to the sanctuary and commercial standards as explained above. The pim is included on the basis of excavated weights so inscribed. No example has been found, however, of the qesitah (Gen 33:19; Josh 24:32; Job 42:11; see NRSV footnotes) and its value and relations are unknown.

In the NT weights are specified only in John 12:3; 19:39, where pound probably means the Roman pound of ca. 11.5 oz., and Rev 16:21, where a hundred pounds is a translation of "talent." Elsewhere in the NT both "pound" and "talent" refer to sums of money (see below).

Coined Money

Coins seem to have been invented in Asia Minor or Greece in the seventh century BCE, and some of them soon found their way into Palestine, as revealed by excavations. The first coins officially used there, however, were the Persian gold darics issued by Darius the Great (522–486). Sums in darics appear in Ezra–Nehemiah; a reference to them in the time of David (1 Chr 29:7) is of course an anachronism. The Persians also issued silver shekels, valued at 20 to the daric, which weighed only half a shekel by the Palestinian commercial standard. Whether a tax of 40 shekels which Nehemiah mentions (5:15) refers to these coins or to weighed silver is uncertain.

Alexander the Great introduced Greek drachmas throughout the Near East. In the Greek monetary system, which had developed in Asia Minor under Babylonian influence, the terms mina and talent were used for larger sums, mina meaning 100 drachmas and talent 60 minas, so that a talent was 6,000 drachmas. Since the drachmas issued by the Ptolemies in Egypt in the third century approached the weight of half a sanctuary shekel, the LXX translators in some of the passages translated "shekel of the sanctuary" as "didrachma," i.e. 2-drachma coin. For "gerah" they used "obol," the smallest Greek silver coin, which was actually a sixth of a drachma rather than a tenth.

Later the drachma was devalued so that a talent became 100 minas or 10,000 drachmas, while silver shekels minted in the Phoenician coastal cities of Tyre and Sidon followed a heavier standard than that of Table 5. Thus in NT times the shekel was equated with the tetradrachma, i.e. 4-drachma coin. In the NRSV of Matt 17:24 temple tax is an interpretation of the lit. "didrachma," and coin in v. 27 stands for "stater," here meaning a tetradrachma. The lost coin in Luke 15:8-9 is a drachma, and the pounds in the parable of Luke 19:11-27 represent minas. The payment to Judas, lit. "thirty of silver" (Matt 26:15), means 30 shekels as in the corresponding Hebrew phrase in Zech 11:12. Since the Jews first minted shekels during their revolt against Rome in 66–70 CE, the coins given Judas would have to be Phoenician shekels or else tetradrachmas counted as shekels.

The money most often mentioned in the NT is the denarius, a Roman silver coin bearing the likeness and title of the emperor (Matt 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24). Though slightly lighter than a drachma, it was valued more highly because officially required for paying taxes (cf. Matt 22:19). The implication that a denarius was a normal day's wage for a field laborer (Matt 20:2; cf. Tobit 5:15, where a drachma is the daily wage for a guide and bodyguard on a long journey) provides a basis for judging the actual value of money in ancient times. Perhaps the suggestion that 200 denarii would buy a minimum meal for 5,000 (Mark 6:37, 44) gives a clue to its purchasing power.

Penny as a price for sparrows (Matt 10:29; Luke 12:6) refers to the assarion, a bronze coin issued by local rulers as an approximate equivalent for the official Roman bronze as, which was valued at a sixteenth of a denarius. Elsewhere (Matt 5:26; Mark 12:42) "penny" stands for the quadrans, the smallest Roman bronze coin, worth a fourth of an as. The smallest Greek bronze coin, the lepton, is represented by the two copper coins contributed by a poor widow, which together are said to equal a quadrans (Mark 12:42).

INDEX

A

Aaron
Aaronic priesthood
Abaddon
Abba
Abednego
Abel
Abiathar
Abigail
Abihu
Abimelech, Canaanite king
Abimelech, son of Gideon
Abiram
Abishag
Abishai
Abner
Abraham (occurs x in Genesis)
Abram (Abi-ram)
Absalom
Acco
Achan
Achish
Achor
Acrostic
Acts of the Apostles
Acts of Paul
Adam
Adam (city)
Additions to Esther
Admah
Adonijah

Adoption
Adultery
Agag
Against Apion
Agape
Agrippa
Agur
Ahab
Ahasuerus (Xerxes I)
Ahaz
Ahaziah
Ahijah
Ahikam
Ahimaaz
Ahimelech
Ahithophel
Ai
Akkadian
Alexander, son of Simon of Cyrene
Alexander Epiphanes
Alexander the Great
Alexandria
Allegory
Allotments of land
Almsgiving
Alpha and Omega
Alphabet
Altar
Amalek, Amalekites
Amarna documents
Amaziah
"Amen"
Amenemope, Instruction of Ammon, Ammonites
Amon (god)
Amorites
Amos

Amos Book of Anak sons of Ananias of Damascus
Ananias the husband of Sapphira
Anathoth
Andrew disciple of Jesus
Andronicus
Angels
Angel of the Lord
Animals
Anna
Annas
Annunciation
Anointing
Antichrist
Antioch
Antioch of Pisidia
Antipas
Antiochus II
Antiochus III the Great
Antiochus IV Epiphanes
Antiochus V Eupator
Antiochus VI
Antiochus VII
Antiphonal
Antisemitism
Antitheses
Antoninus Pius
Aphrodite
Apocalypse of Moses
Apocalypse of Peter
Apocalypticism
Apocrypha
Apodictic law
Apostasy
Apostles
Apostolic witness

Aquila
Arabah
Arabia Arabians
Arabic versions
Aramaic language
Archelaus
Archippus
Archite clan
Areopagus
Aretas IV
Ariel Jerusalem
Aristarchus
Aristeas Letter of Aristobulus
Aristobulus II
Aristotle
Ark of the Covenant
Armageddon
Arnon River
Artaxerxes I
Artaxerxes III
Artemis temple of Asa
Asahel
Asaph
Ascension of Isaiah Ascension of Jesus
Ascents Song of Asceticism
Ashurbanipal
Ashurites
Asia Minor
Asmodeus
Assyria
Astarte
Astrology
Athaliah

Athanasius
Athens
Atonement
Atrahasis epic of Augustine
Augustus
Avarice
Azariah Uzziah
Azazel
Azekah
Azotus Ashdod

B

Baal baalism
Baalzebub
Baalzebul
Babel tower of Babylon
Babylonians
Babylonian Job
Balaam
Balak
Balm in Bamoth
Bamothbaal
Baptism
Barabbas
Barak
Barnabas
Bartimaeus
Baruch
Bashan
Bathsheba
Beatitudes
Bectileth

Beelzebul
Beeri
Beersheba
Behemoth
Bel and the Dragon Book of Belshazzar
Belteshazzar
Benaiah
Benedictions
Benhadad
Benjamin son of Jacob and Rachel Benjamin tribe of; Benjaminites
Ben Sira Jeshua
Beor brook
Berenice
Beroea
Bethany
Bethel
Bethlehem
Bethlehem Ephrathah
Bethrehab Rehob
Bethsaida
Biblical interpretation
Bildad
Bilhah
Birds
Bishops of the church
Blasphemy
Blood
Blood revenge
Boanerges
Boasting
Boaz
Bochim Bethel
Boils plague of Bones
Booths feast of

Borrowing and lending
Bowls seven in Revelation
Bread
Brickmaking in Egypt
Brideprice
Bronze altar
Bronze serpent
Bull
Bunyan John
Burial
Burning bush
Burnt offerings
Business

C

Caesar
Caesarea
Caesarea Philippi, Peter's confession at Caiaphas
Cain
Cairo
Caleb
Calebites
Calvin John
Cambyses
Canaan
Canaan the son of Noah
Canaanite mythology
Canaanites
Cana miracles at Canon NT
Canon OT
Capernaum
Capital offenses
Carchemish battle of

Carmel city
Carmel Mt.
Catholic Church
Celibacy
Cenchreae
Census
Cephas
Chaldeans Babylonians
Chaos
Chariots Ezekiel's vision of Charisma
Charity
Chastity
Chebar River
Cherethites
Cherubim
Childbirth uncleanness from Childlessness Children
Chloe
Christ
Christianity
Christology
Chronicles First and Second Books of Chronology biblical Church
Church History Eusebius
Church of England
Circumcision
Cities biblical Cities of refuge
Citium
City of God Augustine
Claudius Emperor
Clement of Alexandria
Clement First Letter of Clement Second Letter of

Clement of Rome
Cleopas
Cleopatra VII
Cloud
Codex Alexandrinus
Codex Sinaiticus
Colossae
Colossians Letter of Paul to Confession
Constantine
Conversion
Corinth
Corinthians First and Second Letters of Paul to Cornelius
Corpse defilement of Corruption
Cosmology
Covenant
Creation
Crete
Cross
Crucifixion
Cubit
Cultic formula
Cultic purity
Cult mask
Cult procession
Cult prostitution
Cuneiform
Curses cursing
Cush
Cushanrishathaim
Cushan tribe
Cushites
Cyprus
Cyrene

D

Dagon
Damascus
Damascus Document
Daniel
Daniel Book of
Daniel Daniel—ancient sage
Darics Persian coins
Darius I the Great
Darius the Mede
Darius III
Daughters
David
Day of the Lord day of Yahweh
Day Star
Deacons in early church
Dead Book of the Egyptian
Dead Sea
Dead Sea Scrolls
Debir
Deborah Debt
Decalogue
Decapolis
Decius
Dedan
Dedanites
Defilement
Deification
Delilah
Demas
Demetrius I
Demetrius II
Demons
Demons cont.

Deuteronomy Book of Devil
Diaspora
Didache
Didactic writings
Dietary laws
Dinah
Diogenes
Dionysus Bacchus worship of Diotrephes
Disciples
Discipline Disease
Dishonesty Disobedience
Dispersion
Divination
Divorce
Domitian
Doom
Dorcas
Dothan city
Dove symbolism of Doxologies
Drachma coin
Dragon
Dreams
Drought
Drunkenness
Dualism

E

E (Elohism) tradition or source
Easter Letter of Athanasius
Ebal Mt.

Ecbatana
Ecclesiastes Book of Ecclesiasticus
Eden garden of Eden town
Edom
Edomites
Egypt
Ehud
Ekron
El
Elam
Elamites
Elders of the church
Eleazar
Elhanan
Eli
Elihu
Elijah
Elim
Elimelech
Eliphaz
Elisha
Elizabeth mother of John the Baptist Elkanah
Elkosh
Elohim
Elohism E document
Elon
El Shaddai God as Emmaus experience on the road to End time
Engedi
Enkidu
Enoch
I Enoch
II Enoch

Enthronement psalms
Epaphras
Epaphroditus
Ephah container
Ephesians Letter of Paul to Ephesus
Ephod instrument of divination
Ephod priestly vestment
Ephraim
Epistles NT
Er
Erastus
Esau
Eschatology
Esdraelon Plain of Esdras First Book of Esdras Second Book of Essenes
Esther
Esther Book of Esther Book of Additions to Ethan
Ethiopia Cush
Ethiopians
Eucharist
Eunuchs
Euphrates River
Eusebius
Eve
Excommunication
Execution
Exile
Exodus Book of Exodus period of Exodus second
Exorcism of demons
Expiation

Ezekiel
Ezekiel Book of Ezra
Ezra Book of

F

Fables
Fall the False witness
Family
Famine
Fasting
Feasts
Feeding of the multitudes
Festivals
Festus Porcius
Fidelity
Fire
Firmament creation of Firstborn:
First fruits:
Fish
Flavian emperors
Fleece used for oracles
Flies plague of Flood narrative
Flute
Folly contrasted with wisdom
Food
Foot washing by Jesus
Forced labor
Foreigners
Foresight
Form criticism
Former Prophets

Freedmen
Freewill offering
Frescoes
Frogs plague of Fruit trees preservation of Funerary laws
Furnace smelting

G

Gaal
Gabael
Gabriel angel
Gad Gadites
Gaius a convert
Gaius of John
Galatia
Galatians Letter of Paul to Galilee
Gamaliel the Pharisee Rabbi Gatekeepers temple
Gath
Gaza
Gazara Gezer
Gedaliah
Gehazi
Gehenna
Genealogies
Generosity
Genesis Book of Genital discharges uncleanness from Genitals of assailant protection of Gennesaret
Gentiles
Gentiles cont.
Gerasene demoniac

Gerizim Mt.
Gershom
Gershon
Gershonites
Geshem
Geshur
Geshurites
Gethsemane
Gezer
Gibeah
Gibeon
Gibeonites
Gideon
Gihon Pool
Gihon River
Gihon Spring
Gilboa Mt.
Gilead Transjordan
Gilgal
Gilgamesh
Gloss
Gluttony
Gnats plague of Gnosticism
Godliness
Go'el "redeemer"
Gog
Gold
Golden calf :
Golden Rule
Golgotha
Goliath
Gomer
Gomorrah
Good news
Goodness basis of Gorgias

Goring by an ox
Goshen
Government Gospel
Gospels
Grace
Gratitude
Greed
Greece
Greek language
Greek mythology
Guidance prayer for Guilt
Guilt offering

H

Habakkuk
Habakkuk Book of Hadadezer
Hadas M.
Hadassah
Hades
Hadoram
Hadadram
Hadrian
Hagar
Haggadah
Haggai Book of Hail plague of Hallel psalms
Ham
Haman
Hamath
Hammurabi
Hamor

Hanamel
Hanani
Hananiah
Hananiah ben Azzur
Hannah
Hanukkah
Hanun
Haran
Harvest
Harvest weeks feast of Hasideans
Hasidim
Hasmoneans
Hazael
Hazereth
Hazor in N. Galilee
Hearth
Healing
Health
Heaven
Heavenly beings
Heber
Hebrew canon
Hebrew language
Hebrews
Hebrews Letter to the Hebron
Heliiodorus
Heliopolis
Hellenism
Hellenization
Heman
Hermeneutics
Hermon Mt.
Herod Agrippa I
Herod Agrippa II
Herod Antipas

Herod Archelaus
Herod the Great
Herodians
Herodias
Herodotus
Hesed steadfast love
Heshbon
Hexateuch
Hezekiah
Hezron descendants of High priest
High Priestly Prayer of Jesus
Hilkiah
Hinnom Valley
Hippolytus
Hiram king of Tyre
Hiram workman in bronze
History of Israel
Hittites
Hivites
Hobab
Holiness
Holiness H Code
Holofernes
Holy bread
Holy City vision of Holy kiss
Holy Land
"Holy" offerings
Holy place
Holy Spirit
Holy war
Homer measure of volume
Homicide laws relating to Homosexuality
Honesty
Hophra

Hor Mt.
Horeb
Hormah
Horns
Horsemen
Horses celestial Hosanna
Hosea Book of Hoshea
Hospitality
Host of heaven
Huldah
Human nature
Human sacrifice
Human situation Paul on Humanitarian ordinances Humanity the new Hunger
Hur
Hurrians Horites
Husband
Hushai
Hymns

I

Ibzan
Iconium
Iddo
Idolatry
Idumea
Idumeans
Immanuel sign of Immortality
Incarnation
Incense

Incense altar
Infanticide
Ingathering
Inheritance
Innocence Inscriptions
Interest
Intermarriage
Intertestamental literature
Isaac
Isaac Solomon ben Rashi
Isaiah
Isaiah Book of Isaiah Second
Isaiah Third
Iscariot meaning of Ishbaal
Ishbosheth
Ishmael member of royal house of Judah
Isahmael son of Hagar
Ishmaelites
Israel N. kingdom
Issachar
Ithamar

J

J Yahwist tradition document
Jabesh Jabeshgilead
Jabez
Jabin
Jackals
Jacob
Jael
Jaffa Joppa
Jahaz

Jahaziel
Jair
Jairus' daughter
Jambres
James Letter of
James the brother of Jesus
James the son of Zebedee
Jamnia
Jannes
Japheth
Jashar Book of Jashobeam
Jason the brother of Onias III
Jason the Cyrene
Jason of Thessalonica
Jazer
Jebusites
Jeconiah
Jedidiah
Jehoahaz
Jehoash Joash
Jehoiachin Jeconiah
Jehoiada
Jehoiakim
Jehoram of Israel
Jehoram of Judah
Jehoshaphat
Jehoshaphat valley of Jehu
Jephthah
Jerahmeel
Jeremiah
Jeremiah Book of Jeremiah Letter of Jericho
Jeroboam I
Jeroboam II

Jerubbaal Gideon
Jerusalem
Jerusalem cult
Jeshua Joshua the high priest
Jeshurun
Jesse
Jeshua ben Sira Jesus son of Sirach
Jesus
Jesus cont.
Jethro
Jewish canon
Jewish Christians
Jewish Wars (Josephus)
Jews
Jezebel
Jezreel city
Jezreel in Judah
Jezreel used to mean northern tribes
Jezreel Valley of Joab
Joakim the husband of Susanna
Joanna
Joash
Job
Job Book of Job Testament of
Joel Book of John First Letter of
John Gospel According to John Second Letter of John Third Letter of
John the Baptist
John the disciple of Jesus son of Zebedee
John Hyrcanus
John Mark
John of Patmos
Jonadab

Jonah
Jonah Book of Jonathan the son of Saul
Joppa
Joram
Jordan River
Joseph
Joseph of Arimathea
Joseph the father of Jesus
Joseph tribes
Josephus Flavius
Joshua successor of Moses
Joshua Book of Joshua the high priest
Josiah
Jotham
Jubilee year
Jubilees Book of Judah kingdom of Judah son of Jacob
Judah tribe land of Judaism
Judas the Galilean
Judas Iscariot
Judas Maccabeus
Jude Book of Judea
Judea wilderness of Judge office of Judges Book of Judith
Judith Book of
Julius Caesar
Junias
Justin Martyr

K

Kadesh
Karnak inscription
Kedar
Keilah
Kenites
Keret
Kerioth
Keturah
Khirbet Qumran
Kidron Valley
Kings First and Second Books of King's Highway
Kingship
Kiriathjearim
Kish
Kiss holy Kittim
Kohath
Kohathites
Korah
Kothar

L

Laban
Labor forced Labor hired payment of Lachish
Ladder Jacob's vision of Laish Dan
Lamb
Lamech
Lamentation Book of Lampstands

Languages
Laodicea
Laodiceans Letter to the Last judgment
Last Supper
Latin
Lavers in temple
Law courts integrity in Laws
Laying on of hands
Laymen
Lazarus brother of Mary and Martha
Lazarus poor man in a parable
Leah
Learning
Leaven
Lebanon
Lebanon mountains
Legends use of
Legal quarrels of Corinthians Lemuel
Leprosy
Letters
Letters of Paul
Levant the
Levi Matthew son of Alphaeus
Levi patriarch—tribe
Leviathan
Levirate marriage
Levites
Leviticus Book of Lex talionis
Liberty year of see Jubilee
Libnah
Light
Lilith

Lion
Lioness and young lions
Liturgy
Loans
Locusts plague of Lodebar
Logos
Lord's Prayer
Lord's Supper
Lot
Lots casting of Love songs
Lucius
Lud
Luke
Luke Gospel According to Lunar calendar
LXX
Lydda
Lydia
Lying
Lyre
Lysias
Lysimachus
Lystra

M

Maacah Absalom's mother
Maacah Aramean state
Maccabees Hasmoneans
Maccabees First Book of Maccabees Second Book of Maccabees Third Book of Maccabees Fourth Book of Macedonia

Macedonians
Machir
Machpelah Magic Magi vist of Magog
Malachi
Malachi Book of Malta
Mamre
Manasseh
Manasseh Judith's husband
Manasseh king of Judah
Manasseh Prayer of Manna
Manoah
Mara
Marah spring at Marcion
Marduk
Mark
Mark Gospel According to Marriage
Martha
Martyrdom
Martyrs
Mary
Mary Magdalene
Mary the mother of James and Joses
Mary the mother of Jesus
Mary the sister of Martha
Masoretic Text
Massah
Mattaniah Zedekiah
Mattathias father of the Maccabees
Matthew
Matthew Gospel According to

Matthias
Measures and money
Meat
Media Medes
Megiddo Plain of Melchizedek
Memorials
Menahem
Menorah
Mephibosheth Meribaal
Merari
Merarites
Mercy seat
Meribah
Merneptah
Merodachbaladan
Merodach Marduk
Merom
Meroz cursing of Mesha
Meshach
Meshech
Mesopotamia
Messiah
x in Matthew through John
Micah
Micah the prophet
Micah Book of Micaiah
Michael angel
Michal
Midian
Midianites
Midrash midrashic teaching
Milcom
Millo
Mina weight

Miracles
Miriam
Mishnah
Mizpah
Mizpeh
Moab
Moabites
Modein
Molech
Monarchy Israelite
Money
Monotheism
Mordecai
Moresbeth Moresbethgath
Moriah land of
Moriah Mt.
Moses x in Exodus through Deuteronomy
Moses Apocalypse of
Most holy offerings
Most holy place
Murder
Mysticism Christ

N

Naaman healing of Nabal
Nabateans
Nabonidus
Naboth
Nadab Nadin
Nahash
Nahum Book of Names
Naomi Naphtali

Nathan Nathanael
Nazareth
Near East
Nebo Mt.
Nebucharezzar
Nebuchadnezzar
Neco
Negev
Nehemiah
Nehemiah Book of NeoBabylonian Empire
Nephilim
Nero
Nerva
New year observance of Nicanor
Nicodemus
Nicolaitans
Nicolaus
Nile River
Nimrod Assyrian Empire
Nineveh
Nisan month
Noah
Nob
Noncanonical early Christian writing
Numbers Book of Numerical proverbs
Nympha

O

Oaths
Obadiah
Obadiah Book of

Obed
Obededom
Occultists
Octavian Augustus
Offerings
Og
Oholiab
Olives Mount of Omri
On Heliopolis
Onan
Onesimus
Onesiphorus
Onias I
Onias III
Oracles
Oracles of the Lord Papias
Oral law
Ordeal trial by Ordination
Origen
Original sin doctrine of Ornaments discarding of Orpah
Orphans special consideration for Orthodox churches canons of Osiris
Ostraca
Othniel
Ox

P

P Priestly Code tradition source Palestine
Papias of Hierapolis

Papyrus Parables
Paraclete
Paradise
Paran Mt.
Paran wilderness of Parchment used for writing
Parousia
Parsin "halves"
Parthians
Pashhur the son of Immer—
Passion of Jesus
Passover
Patience exhortation to Patmos
Paul x in Romans through
Philemon
Paul Acts of Peace offerings
Pekah
Pekahiah
Peleg
Pelethites Philistines
Pentateuch
Pentecost
Peor
Perez
Perfection
Pergamum
Perizzites
Persian Empire
Persians
Pesher
Pestilence
Peter
Peter Apocalypse of Peter First Letter of

Peter Second Letter of Pethor
Pharaoh
Pharisees
Philadelphia
Philemon Letter of Paul
Philip
Philip the disciple of Jesus
Philip the evangelist of Acts
Philippi
Philippians Letter of Paul to Philistia
Philistines
Philo of Alexandria
Philosophy
Phinehas
Phoebe
Phoenicia
Phoenicians
Phoenix
Phrygia
Phylacteries
Pilate Pontius
Pillar of cloud and fire
Pillars
Pisgah
Pishon River
Pithom
Plagues
Platonic philosophy
Poetry
Poll tax
Potiphar
Potsherds
Prayer
Prayer of Azariah
Preaching

Pride Priesthood
Priestly Code
Principalities and powers
Priscilla Prisca
Promised Land
Prophecy
Prophetesses
Prophets Book of the Twelve Prostitution
Prostration
Protestant churches canon of Proverbs
Proverbs Book of Psalms
Psalms Book of Psalms Book of cont.
Pseudepigrapha
Ptah later Osiris
Ptolemaic dynasty
Ptolemy II
Ptolemy III
Ptolemy IV
Ptolemy VI Philometer
Public confession of guilt
Public sacrifices
Publius of Malta
Pul Tiglathpileser III
Pur "lot"
Purgation oath of Purification
Purification offering Purim
Put

Q Quelle Source
Quarreling
Quirinius P. Sulpicius
Qumran

R

Rabbah Amman
Rabbis early biblical interpretation by Rachel Rad
Rages Ragae Rhagae
Raguel
Rahab monster Egypt as Rain a gift from God
Ram of ordination
Ramah
Rameses
Ramoth
Ramothgilead
Ram'shorn trumpet shofar
Ramesses II
Ransom
Rape
Raphael
Rashi
Reason
Rebekah
Rechabites
Red Sea
Redemption
Reeds Sea Lake of Refuge cities of Refugees concern for Rehob
Rehoboam

Release year of Religion
Religiosity
Remarriage
Remnant of Israel
Renunciation discipleship and Reparation offering
Rephaim
Rephidim
Rest day of Restoration
Resurrection
Retaliation law of Reuben
Reuel
Revelation
Revelation cont.
Revelation to John book
Reverence
Rhoda
Riddles
Ritual uncleanness
Rizpah
Roman Catholic Church
Roman Empire
Romans Letter of Paul to Rome
Rosh Hashanah
Royal psalms
Rufus son of Simon of Cyrene
Ruth
Ruth Book of

S

Sabbath

Sabbatical feast of booths
Sabbatical year
Sacraments
Sacrifice
Sadducees
Salem Jerusalem
Salome a woman at the crucifixion
Salvation
Samaria
Samaritans
Samson
Samuel
Samuel First and Second Books
Sanballat
Sanctification
Sanctuary
Sanhedrin
Sarah the daughter of Raguel
Sarah the wife of Abraham
Sardis
Sargon
Satan
Saul
Saul of Tarsus
Scourging of Jesus
Scribes
Scribes cont.
Scripture
Scrolls
Scythopolis Bethshan
Sea
Sealed scroll vision of Seals seven in Revelation
Seir Mt.
Selah
Seleucia
Seleucid dynasty (Empire) and Greece, Judea ruled by, Maccabean revolt against, persecution of

Jews by Seleucus I
Seleucus II
Seleucus III
Seleucus IV Philopator
Semites
Semitic languages
Senate supreme council of the Jews
Seneca
Sennacherib
Septuagint LXX
Seraphim
Sergius Paulus
Sermon on the Mount
Sermon on the Plain
Seron
Serpent bronze
Servant songs
Seth
Seti I
Shaalim
Shaddai
Shadrach
Shallum
Shalmaneser
Shalom
Shamgar
Shaphan
Sharon Plain of Sheba
Shebna
Shecaniah
Shechem place name
Shechem son of Hamor
Shechemites
Shekels
Shekinah

Shelah
Shem
Shema
Shemaiah
Sheol
Shephelah
Shepherd
Shepherd of Hermas
Sheshbazzar
Shihor River
Shiloah
Shimei
Shinar Sumer
Shishak
Shittim
Showbread
Shulammite Shulmanitu
Shunammite woman of Shunem:
Sibylline Oracles
Sidon
Sihon
Silas Silvanus
Silence
Siloam
Silver money
Simeon
Simeon the prophet
Simeon the son of Jacob
Simeon the tribe
Simon a temple official
Simon the Cananean the Zealot
Simon of Cyrene
Simon the Just high priest
Simon Maccabeus
Simon the magician
Simon Peter
Simon the Pharisee

Sin
Sin Zin wilderness of Sin offering
Sinai Mt.
Sira
Sirach Wisdom of Sisera
Skin diseases uncleanness from Slander
Slavery
Slaves
Sloth
Smyrna
Sodom
Sojourner
Solomon
Son of God Jesus as
Son of man
Song of Songs
Sorcery
Sosthenes
Sparta Maccabean friendship with Spirit
Spiritual blessing
Spiritual gifts
Stands bronze to hold lavers
Steles
Stephanas
Stephen
Stoic philosophy
Strangers caution against Succoth
Suez Gulf of Suffering
Suffering cont.
Suffering servant
Suicide

Sumer Sumerians
Sun
Suretyship
Susanna Book of
Susanna and the elders
Swearing
Synagogue
Syria
SyriaPalestine geography of Syriac versions
Syrians
SyroEphraimitic War

T

Taberah
Tabernacle:
Tabernacles booths feast of Tabith Dorcas
Table sanctuary
Tablets of stone
Tabor Mt.
Tacitus
Tadmor Palmyra
Talent
Talmai
Talmud
Tamar a Caaanite woman
Tamar David's daughter rape of Tammuz
Targums
Tarshish
Tattenai
Tax poll
Tax collectors
Taxes Jesus' words on

Teachers wisdom
Tekoa
Tells Tema
Teman
Temple
Temple Scroll
Temptation
Ten Commandments
Tent of meeting
Terah
Testament of Job
Testimony
Thankfulness
Thanksgiving
Thebes
Thebez
Theodicy
Theodotion
Theodotus
Theophany
Theophilus
Thessalonians First Letter of Paul to Thessalonians Second Letter of Paul to Thessalonica
Theudas
Thomas
Thummim
Thunder and lightning plague of Thyatira
Tiamat
Tiberius
Tibni
Tiglathpileser I
Tigris River
Timbrels
Timnah

Timothy Ammonite leader
Timothy associate of Paul
Timothy First and Second Letters of Paul to Timsah Lake
Tithes
Titus companion of Paul
Titus Roman emperor
Titus Letter of Paul to Tobias
Tobit
Tobit Book of Toil
Tola
Torah
Trade routes Egypt to Fertile Crescent
Trajan
Transfiguration of Jesus
Transjordan
Trials
Tribute
Troas
Trumpets
Truth
Trypho
Twelve Prophets Book of the Tychicus
Tyre

U

Ugarit
Uncleanness
Underworld entrance to Unleavened bread
Ur
Uriah the husband of Bathsheba

Uriah the prophet
Uriel angel
Urim
Uz
Uzzah
Uzziah Azariah of Judah
Uzziah elder of Bethulia

V

Vanity
Vashti
Vengeance
Vespasian
Vineyard
Vineyard cont.
Virgins
Visions
Votive gifts commutation of Votive offering
Vows
Vulgate Bible

W

War
War Scroll
Washing
Water
Wealth
Weeks feast of Weeks of years
Weights and measures
Widows
Wife

Wifesister motif in Genesis
Wine Wisdom
Wisdom literature
Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach
Wisdom of Solomon book
Wise men wisdom teachers
Witchcraft
Witnesses
Woes
Women
Word of God
Works
Worship
Worship cont.
Writing
Writing on the wall
Writings

X

Xenophon
Xerxes I Ahasuerus

Y

Yahweh
Yahwist J tradition

Z

Zacchaeus
Zadok
Zadokite priesthood

Zealots
Zebah
Zebedee
Zebulun
Zechariah father of Jahaziel
Zechariah father of John the Baptist
Zechariah king of Israel
Zechariah the prophet
Zechariah Book of Zedekiah
Zelophehad daughters of Zephaniah prophet
Zephaniah Book of Zerubbabel
Zeruiah
Ziklag
Zilpah
Zimri
Zin wilderness of Zion
Ziph Wilderness of Zipporah
Zobah
Zophar
Zophim
Zorah
Zuph