It is up to us to carry on Jesus' mission—to make God known to others. Because Jesus sends us into the world, we should not try to escape from the world, nor should we avoid all relationships with non-Christians. We are called to be salt and light (Matthew 5:13-16), and we are to do the work that God has sent us to do.

17:19 Jesus set himself apart to do the Father's will like a priest consecrating himself to make the sacrifice. His final act of dedication was his offering himself on the cross (see Hebrews 10:10). The purpose of that death was so that the disciples (and all believers) might be entirely God's possession. Jesus died to set us apart for him.

JESUS PRAYS FOR FUTURE BELIEVERS / 17:20-26 / 221

The pattern of Jesus' prayer provides a helpful outline for us. He prayed for himself, for those close to him, and for those beyond his immediate sphere who would be affected by the ministry of his friends.

17:20 After praying for his disciples, Jesus prayed for all who would ever believe in him because of their testimony. In a sense, everyone who has become a Christian has done so through the apostles' message because they wrote the New Testament and were the founders of the Christian church. So Jesus was praying for all the believers who would ever exist. He was praying for you and others you know. And he was praying for those he wants us to reach! Knowing that Jesus prayed for us should give us confidence as we work for his Kingdom.

17:21 There are three requests in verse 21, and they hinge on one another. In the first request, the Lord asked for unity—that they will be one. This all-encompassing petition includes all the believers throughout time. This oneness does not readily fit the idea of one unified church structure. Rather, this unity becomes most visible through love, obedience, and commitment to the Father's will.

In the second request, Jesus prayed for a unity among the believers that is based on the unity of Jesus and the Father. Christians can be unified if they live in union with God. For example, each branch living in union with the vine is united with all other branches (see 15:1-17); or each part of the body is united with the other parts so that when one hurts, they all hurt, and when one rejoices, they all rejoice (1 Corinthians 12:12-27).

This union with the Father and Son would result in people all over the world believing that Jesus had been sent by God as the world's Savior—and not only believing, but receiving this Savior as their own. This is the third request.

17:22-23 Jesus further explained this oneness in terms of mutual indwelling: “I have given them the glory you gave me.” Jesus was still referring to all his followers, not just the immediate disciples. The phrase is a promise. Jesus gave all true believers his glory by completing his mission of revealing God (17:4-6). Jesus' work was not only to speak and model the character of God. His ultimate purpose was to present both the splendor and character of God (God's glory) in such a way that God would become personally real to the disciples. They, in turn, were to pass on what they had received to others who would also believe. Those who, in fact, received the glory would become unified by their shared relationship with Christ. Complete and perfect unity between God and believers results in worldwide belief. When we demonstrate this oneness, we will convince the world that the Father sent the Son, and that the Father loves believers deeply and eternally, just as he loves the Son.

17:24 Jesus wants all believers (the eleven disciples and all others) to be with him where he is so they can see his glory. What wonderful assurance Jesus' prayer gives us to know that the Lord of heaven wants us to be with him. This request impacts our present experience and future hope. In the present, we unite with Christ in God the Father (see 14:6; Colossians 3:3). In the future, we will be with Christ in eternal glory and enjoy with him the love he experienced with the Father forever.

17:25-26 Jesus addressed his Father as righteous Father because God's righteous judgment reveals that the world's knowledge of God is incorrect and that the disciples' knowledge is correct. Just as Jesus had chosen the name “Holy Father” (17:11) to present his request for protection of the disciples, so here Jesus added righteous as a highlight to the gulf that exists between the world and God. Jesus knew he was the living connection between the lost world and his loving, righteous Father.

The world failed to recognize that Jesus was God's communication to them. The disciples did recognize this, for they had come to believe that Jesus was the one sent from God. Jesus, who knew the Father personally and intimately, had revealed the Father to his disciples and would continue to do so. Thus, Jesus could say, "I have revealed you to them and will keep on revealing you." Finally, Jesus asked the Father to love the disciples with the same love he (the Father) had for his Son.

Jesus asked that the Father's love would be in believers and that he himself (Jesus) would be in them. This expresses the heart of the Father's desire, which is to have his Son in his people: "I . . . in them." And because it is the Father's desire, he will make sure it is accomplished. How do you understand your relationship with God the Father? Is his love in you?

JESUS IS BETRAYED AND ARRESTED / 18:1-11 / 224

After the prayer recorded in John 17, Jesus again predicted Peter's denial (Matthew 26:31-35; Mark 14:27-31). The synoptic Gospels then record Jesus' agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (see Matthew 26:36-46; Mark 14:32-42; Luke 22:39-46). Here is a summary of that section: After arriving in Gethsemane, Jesus sat his disciples down and told them to wait for him while he went and prayed. Then he took Peter, James, and John aside, expressed his great distress to them, and asked them to stay awake with him. How touching that Jesus, in this great hour of distress, sought human companionship from his closest friends—just someone to stay awake and be with him.

18:1 To get to the Garden of Gethsemane, Jesus and the disciples had to cross the Kidron Valley, a ravine that starts north of Jerusalem and goes between the hill where the Temple is built and the Mount of Olives, then moving on to the Dead Sea. During the rainy season, the valley filled with water torrents, but at this time it was dry.

18:2 Though Judas had left the group while they were still in the upper room (13:26-31), he calculated that Jesus would go to Gethsemane with his disciples because that seemed to be a favorite place for Jesus and the disciples to get away from the crowds when they were in Jerusalem (see Luke 21:37).

18:3-4 Judas acted as a guide to two groups: (1) a battalion of Roman soldiers (about 600 men), and (2) Temple guards who were Jewish Temple police. The Jews were given authority by the religious leaders to make arrests for minor infractions. The soldiers probably did not participate in the arrest but accompanied the Temple guard to make sure matters didn't get out of control. The leading priests and Pharisees may have asked the Romans for help in arresting Jesus because their ultimate intention was to obtain assistance in executing Jesus. The police and the guards were prepared to meet violent resistance, for they carried blazing torches, lanterns, and weapons. It was still night—Judas's departure into the night to go and betray Jesus had occurred only hours earlier (13:30). John did not record Judas's kiss of greeting (Matthew 26:49; Mark 14:45; Luke 22:47-48), but the kiss marked a turning point for the disciples. They ran away (Matthew 26:56).

Jesus' betrayal, arrest, and crucifixion transpired according to the prearranged, divine plan—he fully realized what was happening. The betrayer, Judas Iscariot, had been selected by Jesus. He knew from the beginning that Judas was a devil and would be his betrayer (see 6:64, 70). The time of his arrest was predetermined; it would happen during Passover, not before or after. The method of execution (crucifixion) was predetermined, so Jesus knew that he would be lifted up on the cross (see 12:32-33).

18:5-6 Jesus' response is literally only "I am." With these words, he declared his deity (as in 8:58; see Exodus 3:14). The reaction this utterance produced in those who were there to arrest him (including Judas) indicates that Jesus' words startled this mass of armed men, for they all fell backward to the ground. Because some Temple guards were among the Roman soldiers, quite possibly they understood the significance of Jesus' claim. Or perhaps they were overcome by his obvious power and authority. Among them may have been some of those who earlier (7:46) had concluded that, "We have never heard anyone talk like this!" The response of the guards shows that Jesus could have exercised his power to thwart his arrest, but chose not to.

18:7-9 Jesus was willing to turn himself over to the soldiers, but he asked them to let these others go, referring to the eleven disciples who were with him. By this action, he fulfilled his own statement, "I have not lost a single one of those you gave me." Jesus was referring to words recorded in 6:39 and 17:12. Jesus was the Good Shepherd who would lay down his life for the sheep (10:11).

18:10-11 Peter had promised to die for Jesus (Matthew 26:33-35), and he wasn't going to let Jesus be taken without a fight. Peter's sword was probably a dagger. Luke mentions that the disciples had two swords among them (Luke 22:38). Peter slashed off the right ear of Malchus, the high priest's servant. Luke added that Jesus then healed the servant's ear (Luke 22:50-51).

Jesus was determined to do his Father's will. (This is the only mention of the cup of suffering in John's Gospel. See Mark 14:36.) In the Old Testament, the "cup" often referred to the outpouring of God's wrath (see Psalm 75:8; Isaiah 51:17; Jeremiah 25:15; Ezekiel 23:31-34). For Jesus, the cup meant the suffering, isolation, and death that he would have to endure in order to atone for the sins of the world. Peter may have shown great loyalty, but he missed the point. All that was happening was part of God's plan.

Immediately after the same reference to the cup of suffering, both Matthew and Mark mention that all the disciples deserted Jesus and fled (Matthew 26:56; Mark 14:50).

ANNAS QUESTIONS JESUS / 18:12-24 / 225

Once the religious leaders had Jesus in their power, the events began to move with planned precision. Since the point of the effort was to kill Jesus, determining his guilt or innocence was a mere formality. To the leaders, the issue of timing the death was more important than asking whether Jesus deserved to die.

18:12-13 The Jews and the Romans arrested Jesus and tied him up like a common prisoner. Jesus was immediately taken to the high priest's residence even though it was the middle of the night. The religious leaders were in a hurry—they wanted to complete the execution before the Sabbath and get on with the Passover celebration. First they took him to Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, the high priest that year. Both Annas and Caiaphas had been high priests. According to Jewish law, the office of high priest was held for life. But the Romans didn't like such concentration of power under one person, so they frequently changed the high priest. However, many Jews still considered Annas to be the high priest and still called him by that title. But although Annas retained much authority among the Jews, Caiaphas made the final decisions.

18:14 Caiaphas was the one who had advised the Jews that it was better to have one person die for all (see 11:49-52). Caiaphas said this because he feared the Romans. The Jews had limited religious freedom so long as they kept the peace. The Jewish leaders feared that Jesus' miracles and large following would cause Rome to react and clamp down on them. So better that Jesus die than that many be endangered by an uprising.

18:15-18 Although all the disciples had fled when the soldiers arrived, two of them returned and decided to follow Jesus. So these two disciples followed Jesus to Annas's house. This house was more like a compound surrounded by walls with a guarded gate. Only one disciple was identified: Peter; the other was apparently a disciple who was an acquaintance of the high priest. This other disciple only entered with Jesus into the courtyard of the high priest.

Some scholars think the other disciple was John because of similar references to himself in 20:2 and 21:20, 24. But many scholars argue that John, the son of Zebedee from Galilee, would not have been known by Annas. Whoever this disciple was, he secured permission for Peter to enter the courtyard.

Immediately Peter was put on the defensive. Just as he entered, the woman who was watching the gate (actually a servant) asked Peter, "Aren't you one of Jesus' disciples?" In striking contrast to Peter's earlier declaration that he would lay down his life for his Lord (13:37), Peter denied it: “I am not.”

It was a spring evening, and the city of Jerusalem sits 2,500 feet above sea level. The charcoal fire kept the cold at bay. Peter’s story continues at 18:25.

18:19 Meanwhile the high priest wanted to know what Jesus had been teaching his followers. If a rebellion was feared by the authorities, Annas may have wanted to know how many disciples Jesus had gathered so as to estimate the force of their retaliation. Or Annas may have wanted to question the disciples about what Jesus had taught them. Jesus said nothing about his disciples, so as to protect them (as in 18:8), but was willing to talk about his teaching.

18:20-23 Jesus was not the leader of a cult or secret organization. He was not planning a religious coup. Instead, Jesus noted that everything he taught had been taught in public. Even the quiet and private talks with his disciples included no secret or subversive teachings. Everything he said to the disciples was told to the crowds, but they refused to understand. If Annas wanted to know the substance of Jesus’ teachings, he could ask anyone who had heard Jesus speak on several occasions. Interrogating the disciples would not be necessary. So Jesus turned the questioning back to Annas: “Why are you asking me this question? Ask those who heard me. They know what I said.”

This incited anger. One of the Temple guards, seeing Jesus’ answer as a sign of contempt for the high priest, struck Jesus on the face (probably a good hard slap). Jesus defended himself, for he had been slapped unjustly. This incident is similar to that recorded in Acts 23:2-5, where Paul was struck for not answering the high priest “correctly.” Jesus denied that he said anything wrong.

18:24 After being interrogated by Annas, Jesus was sent on to Caiaphas, the ruling high priest. Mark records that this questioning before Caiaphas included the entire Jewish council (Mark 14:53-65). The religious leaders knew they had no grounds for charging Jesus, so they tried to build evidence against him by using false witnesses.

PETER DENIES KNOWING JESUS / 18:25-27 / 227

While Jesus was countering the questions of Annas (see 18:19-24), who was trying to gather information against the disciples, Peter denied knowing Jesus three times. Jesus displayed his great moral character by not disowning his disciples, even though they had denied him. John captured the pathos of the moment by merely reporting that Peter’s final denial was made with the rooster crowing in the background.

18:25 These verses are a continuation of verses 15-18. Peter was still in the courtyard of Annas's house and was standing beside a fire with several other people. Again Peter was asked: "Aren't you one of his disciples?" Peter denied it saying, "I am not." The vehemence of Peter's denial may have caught the attention of several others who were gathered around the fire. To at least one of them, Peter looked very familiar.

18:26-27 This, the third denial, happened exactly as Jesus had predicted (see 13:38; Mark 14:30). The other three Gospels say that Peter's three denials happened near a fire in the courtyard outside Caiaphas's palace. John places the three denials outside Annas's home. This was very likely the same courtyard. The high priest's residence was large, and Annas and Caiaphas undoubtedly lived near each other. This time a household servant who happened to be a relative of the man whose ear Peter had cut off, asked, "Didn't I see you out there in the olive grove with Jesus?" But for the third time, Peter denied it. A crowing rooster and the piercing look of Jesus (Luke 22:61-62) made Peter realize how quickly he had abandoned his Lord.

JESUS STANDS TRIAL BEFORE PILATE / 18:28-37 / 230

The same rooster that announced the third denial of Peter also welcomed the day that Jesus was to be crucified. John gives us none of the details of Jesus' further questioning before Caiaphas, since the two parts of the preliminary "trial" were perfunctory and repetitious. The faces changed, but the false accusations remained the same. Early morning found Jesus and his accusers at Pilate's gate demanding an audience. Pilate quickly concluded that the charges against Jesus were groundless. But he was also clearly puzzled that Jesus refused to defend himself. The imperial representative of Rome found himself uncomfortably pressed between a rock and a hard place.

18:28-29 By now it was the early hours of Friday morning. This headquarters was also called the Praetorium, where the Roman governor resided when he was in Jerusalem. By Jewish law, entering the house of a Gentile would cause a Jewish person to be ceremonially defiled. As a result, a Jew could not take part in worship at the Temple or celebrate the feasts until he or she was restored to a state of "cleanness." Afraid of being defiled, Jesus' accusers stayed outside the house where they had taken Jesus for trial. They kept the ceremonial requirements of their religion while harboring murder and treachery in their hearts. Because the Jews were outside, Pilate went out to them and asked, "What is your charge against this man?"

Pilate was in charge of Judea (the region where Jerusalem was located) from ^{A.D.} 26–36. Pilate was unpopular with the Jews. He resided in Caesarea, but came to Jerusalem during the major feasts in order to handle any problems that could arise with so many people in the city during the festival. Passover was a very important feast to the Jews as they remembered their freedom from bondage in Egypt.

To go to Pilate, these Jewish leaders must have been really desperate to get rid of Jesus. Normally, the Jews would never turn one of their own people over to the hated Romans.

18:30-31 Pilate realized that something wasn't normal about this case. He must have sensed the jealousy of the Jewish leaders who brought this popular teacher to him. Pilate certainly had seen or at least had heard about Jesus' glorious entry into Jerusalem only a few days earlier, so he understood the motives of these religious leaders. Therefore, Pilate demanded that they provide a bona fide legal charge against Jesus. The Jewish leaders answered as vaguely as possible: "We wouldn't have handed him over to you if he weren't a criminal!"

But Pilate, uninterested in the constant squabbling among the Jews, was satisfied that this potential troublemaker was in custody. He had no reason to push the trial any farther, so he tried to dismiss them: "Take him away and judge him by your own laws."

But the Jewish leaders persisted and gained Pilate's attention by insinuating that they had already found reasons in their own law for Jesus' execution. But the Jews needed Pilate to give Jesus a trial because only the Romans were permitted to execute someone. Being under Roman rule, the Jews were not permitted to carry out the kind of execution they were planning without the sanction of the Roman government. It seems that "spontaneous" executions like the stoning of Stephen or the woman taken in adultery were overlooked by the Romans. But in the eyes of the Jewish leaders, Jesus needed to be executed publicly. Thus, the Jews needed the Romans to execute Jesus for them.

18:32 Jesus knew all along that his would be a Roman execution, for he had predicted that he would die on a cross. Capital punishment for the Jews was by stoning and for the Romans by crucifixion. Jesus had always foretold his death in terms of crucifixion, not stoning (Matthew 20:19).

18:33-34 Since Jesus' enemies had accused him of sedition against Rome (Luke 23:1-2), Pilate asked Jesus if he really was the King of the Jews. Jesus then asked Pilate where the question came from. If Pilate was asking this question in his role as the Roman governor, he would have been inquiring whether Jesus was setting up a rebel government. But the Jews were using the word “king” to mean their religious ruler, the Messiah. Israel was a captive nation, under the authority of the Roman Empire. A rival king might have threatened Rome; a Messiah could have been a purely religious leader.

18:35-36 Pilate’s response indicates that his interrogation was motivated by the Jews. The impression is that he was merely performing his task. Jesus explained that he was not a threat to Rome because he was not an earthly king. Instead, his Kingdom was not of this world. Jesus was referring to all he had done and would do as God’s Son and all that is under his authority. When believers are born again, they become subjects of this Kingdom—a spiritual Kingdom.

18:37 Pilate tried to get his original question answered (see 18:33): “You are a king then?” Jesus explained that he was indeed a king, and born for that purpose. But he was the king of a different realm, a king who had come to bring truth to the world. Jesus did not enter the world for any political purpose; instead, he came to testify to the truth. There seems to have been no question in Pilate’s mind that Jesus spoke the truth and was innocent of any crime. It also seems apparent that while recognizing the truth, Pilate chose to reject it. It is a tragedy when we fail to recognize the truth. It is a greater tragedy when we recognize the truth but fail to heed it.

PILATE HANDS JESUS OVER TO BE CRUCIFIED / 18:38–19:16A / 232

Pilate mused on the possibility of truly comprehending “truth” and then declared Jesus “not guilty.” He had no basis for a charge against Jesus and certainly no evidence that required a death penalty. But it wouldn’t be that easy.

18:38 Pilate was cynical; he thought that all truth was relative—it could be whatever Rome wanted it to be. To many government officials, truth was whatever the majority of people agreed with or whatever helped advance their own personal power and political goals. When there is no basis for truth, there is no basis for moral right and wrong. Justice becomes whatever works or whatever helps those in power. In Jesus and his word we have a standard for truth and for our moral behavior.

At that point, Pilate had the power and authority to simply set Jesus free because Jesus was not guilty of any crime. But he lacked the courage to stand by this conviction in the face of opposition from these Jews and a possible ensuing riot. Problems like that could mean that Pilate would be removed from his position because of being unable to keep the peace. So Pilate tried first to pass Jesus off on Herod, who was ruler of Galilee, the region of Jesus’ hometown (Luke 23:6-7). But Herod only mocked Jesus and then sent him back to Pilate.

18:39-40 Pilate hoped to escape passing judgment on Jesus by allowing the Jews to determine Jesus’ fate. As a custom, Pilate had released someone from prison each year at Passover. He hoped they would ask for the King of the Jews.

The screaming Jewish officials demanded that a convicted rebel, Barabbas, be pardoned instead of Jesus. Barabbas was a rebel against Rome (Mark 15:7), and although he had committed murder, he was probably a hero among the Jews. Barabbas, who had led a rebellion and failed, was released instead of Jesus, the only one who could truly help Israel.

19:1 Pilate handed Jesus over to the soldiers to be flogged. This was another attempt by Pilate to set Jesus free. Pilate knew that Jesus was innocent of any crime, and he desperately wanted Jesus freed to quiet his own conscience. So Pilate thought the flogging would appease the Jews. This was ruthless but not intended to kill him. Nevertheless, it was not uncommon for prisoners to die of floggings. Some of the whips used for flogging were designed to inflict terrible damage to the human body. The leather thongs that formed the striking surfaces were lead-tipped so that victims were both bruised and cut severely. Punishment was applied to the bared upper body of a bound prisoner. Apparently, Pilate thought this flogging was a humane alternative to crucifixion. He was avoiding condemning Jesus to death.

19:2-3 The Roman soldiers jammed a crown of long, sharp thorns onto Jesus' head and obtained a purple robe (purple was the color of royalty) in order to mock Jesus' supposed kingship. The Roman soldiers mocked Jesus further by bowing before him and striking him. This had been prophesied in Isaiah 50:6 (see also 52:14–53:6).

19:4-7 After Jesus' beating and the display of mockery, Pilate, for the second time (see 18:38), declared Jesus not guilty—that is, not guilty of a crime warranting death. Pilate hoped the sight of this beaten, bloody person would elicit pity and make the crowd realize that there could be no possible threat from this poor fellow. The tone of these words implies ridicule, as if he said, “How can you possibly believe this pitiful man's claim to be a king?”

But the bloodthirsty chief priests and officials responded: “Crucify! Crucify!” That they demanded crucifixion reveals their intense hatred of Jesus. Crucifixion was a shameful death reserved for criminals, slaves, and rebels. Jesus was none of these, and Pilate knew it. But the Jewish enemies of Christ wanted not only to kill him but also to discredit and humiliate him thoroughly.

Pilate dared the Jewish leaders to usurp the exclusive Roman authority of capital punishment by crucifying their “King” themselves. The leaders responded that Jesus ought to die because he called himself the Son of God. The law they were referring to is Leviticus 24:16. For anyone to claim to be God (as Jesus did) was a clear case of blasphemy and thus required that the person be put to death. The irony here is that Jesus was not violating the law, for what he had said was true! The Jews just didn't believe it.

19:8 Pilate's fear may have had its origin in a combination of three factors:

1. Romans were inclined to believe in human deities; so Pilate may have sensed that the man in his presence was a god.
2. According to Matthew 27:19, Pilate's wife may have influenced his thoughts about Jesus, for she had had a troublesome dream, and had sent word to Pilate to leave Jesus alone.
3. Pilate may well have been concerned that a riot was about to break out among the Jews. Hatred for Romans and the extremely crowded conditions in Jerusalem created a powder keg of unrest that needed only a good spark to become explosive.

19:9-11 Pilate asked Jesus about his origin: “Where are you from?” But Jesus gave no answer. Some commentators see Jesus’ silence as fulfilling Isaiah 53:7. Pilate, astounded by Jesus’ silence, reminded Jesus: “Don’t you realize that I have the power to release you or to crucify you?”

Pilate’s power did not intimidate Jesus because God’s authority overrules all human authority. Instead, the one who had brought Jesus to Pilate had the greater sin. Jesus referred to Caiaphas, the high priest, who handed Jesus over to the Romans, not to Judas, who had betrayed him to the Jews. For a Jewish high priest to deliver the Jews’ King and Messiah over to the Romans for execution was an even more heinous sin than for the Roman governor to sentence him to death. Pilate was merely a pawn in a very elaborate game, but the high priest would be more severely judged because he should have known better. Caiaphas turned from the “light” in order to side with the darkness and made excuses for disobeying God’s law. However, Jesus was at the same time clearly charging Pilate with sin. Pilate was responsible for his choices.

19:12 By this time Pilate was apparently convinced that Jesus was some kind of extra-special, supernatural person, so he tried still another time to release him. But the Jewish leaders were not about to let Jesus escape. In a final desperate ploy, they played their trump card: “If you release this man, you are not a friend of Caesar.” Since the Jews despised Roman rule, this was blatant hypocrisy. But these Jews hated Jesus so much that to get rid of him they were claiming their allegiance to Rome and to Caesar! Their strategy worked—very likely Pilate was afraid that he would be reported to Caesar as having released a man who had been charged with claiming to be a king. Historical records indicate that the Jews had already threatened to lodge a formal complaint against Pilate for his stubborn flouting of their traditions. Most likely such a complaint would have led to being recalled by Rome, losing his job, or even losing his life. The Roman government could not afford to put large numbers of troops in all the regions under its control, so one of Pilate’s main duties was to do whatever was necessary to maintain peace.

19:13-14 Pilate brought Jesus out and sat down on the judgment seat. Although the text does not explicitly state that Pilate passed judgment on Jesus, the fact that Pilate seated himself on the judgment seat indicates that the judgment originated from him; thus, he was responsible. But the judgment was very indirect. Perhaps Pilate was too guilt-ridden to summarily condemn Jesus, and he was angry at having his hand forced against his better judgment. So his words ring with anger and mockery at these Jews by saying to them: “Here is your king!”

19:15-16a But the Jews continued with their shouting: “Away with him—crucify him!” Again Pilate retorted, “What? Crucify your king?” His repetition of Jesus as “your king” angered the leaders all the more, to the point where they made a ludicrously hypocritical statement: “We have no king but Caesar.” Nothing could be farther from the truth than this pronouncement of loyalty to Caesar from the Jewish leading priests. These religious men, in the heat of the moment and in their blindness, had forgotten their faith—the Jews were God’s people. God was their King (Judges 8:23; 1 Samuel 8:7). But perhaps the words rang with truth, for in their murderous plans against Jesus, God’s Son, they showed that God was no longer their king. And if that was the case, they, the Jewish leaders, were committing blasphemy. Pilate gave Jesus to them to be crucified, but Roman soldiers actually carried out the crucifixion.

JESUS IS LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED / 19:16B-17 / 234

We must never forget the reason Christ died. Unless we recognize the eternal tragedy that would have occurred to the human race without the Cross, we will not be able to see the Cross as our victory. At great personal cost, Jesus won eternal life for us. He paid the price for our sin with his own life. That he offers us life as a free gift ought to give us deep joy. We must be touched by Christ’s death, for he died in our place!

19:16b-17 Jesus was led away, forced to carry his cross by himself. But he became weak because of the flogging, and Simon was commanded to take over (see Matthew 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26). Jesus was taken to Skull Hill. This hill may have been called this because of its stony top or because it was shaped like a skull. Golgotha is the Hebrew word for “skull.” The familiar name “Calvary” is derived from the Latin calvaria (also meaning “skull”).

As the drama of the cross unfolds, John’s writing captures the simple ironies of the tragedy. The soldiers who escorted Jesus to Calvary didn’t know who he was; they were just doing their duty. Pilate knew that Jesus wasn’t guilty of death, but he still didn’t understand who Jesus was. The people, roused to a fever pitch by the religious leaders, didn’t take the time to care about who Jesus was (even though they had hailed him as their king a few days earlier. Obviously, they were disappointed by the mocking display of him as a pitiful king). The chief priests perhaps were the most blind of all, for they had totally lost sight of everything they stood for, seeking Jesus' death only to hold onto their precious positions and to stop the teachings that were threatening their status quo.

JESUS IS PLACED ON THE CROSS / 19:18-27 / 235

Jesus knew his destiny (see 18:37), and he approached death boldly and courageously. Jesus endured the shame of crucifixion, the ridicule of the crowd, and the insults of those who cast lots for his clothing as he died. Though he was in agony, his thoughts included the care of his aged mother, whose care he entrusted to the disciple he loved. The Jews and the Romans were not taking Jesus' life from him; he was laying it down of his own accord.

19:18-22 The others were criminals (see Matthew 27:38; Mark 15:27; Luke 23:32). This again fulfilled prophecy (see Isaiah 53:12). Luke records that one of the criminals insulted Jesus, while the other turned to Jesus and asked to be saved (Luke 23:42). To which Jesus replied, "Today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43).

Pilate had a sign prepared and fastened to the cross. It read, "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." Pilate wrote this notice in three languages so that anyone passing into or out of the city would be able to read it: Hebrew (or, Aramaic—the language of the Jews), Latin (the Roman language, the official language), and Greek (the lingua franca, the common tongue).

Probably bitter over his political defeat at the hands of the Jewish leaders, Pilate posted a sign over Jesus that was meant to be ironic. The sight of a humiliated king, stripped of authority, fastened naked to a cross in public execution could only lead to the conclusion of complete defeat. But the irony that Pilate hoped would not be lost on the Jews pales before the irony that God wanted to communicate to the world. The dying King was actually taking control of his Kingdom. His death and resurrection would strike the death blow to Satan's rule and would establish Jesus' eternal authority over the earth. Few people reading the sign that bleak afternoon understood its real meaning, but the sign was absolutely true. Jesus was King of the Jews as well as the Gentiles, the universe, and you. This sign became a universal proclamation, an unconscious prophecy, that Jesus is the royal Messiah.

The leading priests wanted Jesus' crime posted as a false claim to kingship, but no persuasion from the chief priests could induce Pilate to change his mind. He dismissed them by saying, "What I have written, I have written."

19:23-24 Contrary to the paintings depicting the Crucifixion, Jesus died naked, another horrible part of his humiliation. The Roman soldiers who performed the Crucifixion divided the victim's clothes among themselves. Clothing was not a cheap commodity in those days as it is today. Thus this was part of the "pay" the executioners received for performing their gruesome duties. But his robe was not divided because it was seamless. So they threw dice to see who would get it. In so doing they fulfilled the Scripture: "They divided my clothes among themselves and threw dice for my robe" (quoted from Psalm 22:18).

19:25 The four women, in contrast to the four soldiers, are the faithful; they stayed with Jesus until the end. Even more so, in contrast to the disciples who had fled after Jesus was arrested, these women followed Jesus to the cross and became eyewitnesses of his crucifixion. The first woman mentioned is Jesus' mother (see 2:1ff.). Imagine her incredible grief, helplessly watching her son suffer and die unjustly. Indeed the prophet Simeon, who had spoken to her in the Temple just after Jesus' birth, had been correct when he had told her, "A sword will pierce your very soul" (Luke 2:35). Surely Mary was feeling that "sword" at that very moment.

The other women mentioned here have not appeared earlier in John's Gospel. Mary's sister could have been Salome (see Matthew 27:55ff.; Mark 15:40ff.), the mother of John (the Gospel writer) and James. If this is true, Jesus, John, and James were cousins. Mary (the wife of Clopas) was the mother of James the younger. Mary Magdalene is mentioned here for the first time in this Gospel. She will be a prominent figure in the next chapter—for Jesus appears first to her after his resurrection.

19:26-27 Seeing his mother and the disciple he loved (John, the Gospel writer), Jesus directed his disciple John to take care of Mary, his mother, in his absence. Mary had apparently been widowed and was being cared for by Jesus himself. Even while suffering in agony, Jesus demonstrated his care for his mother.

JESUS DIES ON THE CROSS / 19:28-37 / 236

As he had stated in 17:4, Jesus knew he had carried out the mission his Father had given him. His success was complete at the moment of his death. He was about to surrender his life to his Father who would carry out the crowning touch of the plan by raising the Son from the grave.

19:28-30 Some scholars believe this fulfilled Scripture is Psalm 69:21, "They offer me sour wine to satisfy my thirst." Thus, Jesus said, "I thirst." This emphasizes Jesus' humiliation. Others point to Psalm 42:2, "I thirst for God, the living God." This affirms Jesus' submission to the Father. In either case, Scripture was fulfilled.

This sour wine was not the same as the drugged wine offered to Jesus earlier (Mark 15:23). Jesus did not take the wine earlier because he wanted to be fully conscious through the entire process. Jesus tasted it, and then said, "It is finished!" According to the Greek, the one word, tetelestai, means "it is accomplished," "it is fulfilled," or even, "it is paid in full." Jesus' death accomplished redemption—"paid in full"; and his death fulfilled all the Old Testament prophecies. It was time for Jesus to die (see 4:34; 17:4).

Up to this point, sin could be atoned through a complicated system of sacrifices. Sin separates people from God, and only through the sacrifice of an animal, a substitute, and faith in God's promise could people be forgiven and become clean before God. But people sin continually, so frequent sacrifices were required. Jesus, however, was the final and ultimate sacrifice for sin. With his death, the complex sacrificial system ended because Jesus took all sin upon himself. Now we can freely approach God because of what Jesus did for us. Those who believe in Jesus' sacrificial death and resurrection can live eternally with God and escape the penalty that comes from sin.

Then Jesus bowed his head and gave up his spirit. The language describes Jesus voluntarily yielding his spirit to God. Luke records Jesus' last words from the cross: "Father, I entrust my spirit into your hands" (Luke 23:46, echoing Psalm 31:5). Jesus' life was not taken from him; he gave his life of his own free will (see 10:11, 15, 17-18; 15:13). This shows Jesus' sovereignty over all—he was even in control of his death!

19:31-34 The Jewish leaders were concerned that the dead bodies would remain on the crosses during the Sabbath. The Sabbath began on Friday evening—and this was a very special Sabbath because it coincided with the Passover festival. The Jews did not want to desecrate their Sabbath (Deuteronomy 21:22-23) by allowing the bodies of three crucified Jews to remain hanging on crosses overnight. Thus, they asked Pilate to hasten their deaths by ordering that their legs be broken. A person being crucified could use his legs to lift up his body in an attempt to take more oxygen into his collapsing lungs. To break the legs of one being crucified would, therefore, speed up the death. Pilate agreed with the request.

However, when the soldiers came to Jesus, they saw that he was dead already, so they didn't break his legs. Instead, one of the soldiers pierced his side with a spear, and at once blood and water flowed out. This piercing would make sure that Jesus was really dead. Medical experts have tried to determine what was punctured to create a flow of blood and water. Some think the pericardial sac was ruptured. John's testimony of this occurrence was important to affirm a major argument in this Gospel against the Docetists who were denying Jesus' humanity. Jesus was indeed a man composed of blood and water. He actually experienced death as a human being (see 1 John 5:6-7). The mention of the blood and water also answers the argument by some that Jesus did not really die but fell into some type of coma from which he later awakened in the tomb. But the eyewitness account of the blood and water refutes that. The piercing itself would have killed Jesus, but he was already dead as the separation of blood and water reveal. Jesus did indeed die a human death. In addition, the Roman soldiers, who had participated in numerous crucifixions, reported to Pilate that Jesus was dead (Mark 15:44-45).

19:35 The eyewitness who saw the Crucifixion and witnessed the issue of blood and water is John the apostle (see 20:30-31 and 21:24-25). Luke's prologue (Luke 1:1-4) and John's words demonstrate that the Gospel writers were writing reliable history, not just a subjective description of what they felt (see also 2 Peter 1:16-18).

19:36-37 Without knowing it, the soldiers fulfilled two biblical prophecies when they lanced Jesus instead of breaking his bones: (1) Not one of his bones will be broken. Exodus 12:46 and Numbers 9:12 speak of the bones of the Passover lamb that are not to be broken. Because Jesus was the final sacrifice, these verses apply to him; and (2) They will look on him whom they pierced. This is from Zechariah 12:10; see also Revelation 1:7. The risen Christ bore this mark in his side (20:19ff.).

JESUS IS LAID IN THE TOMB / 19:38-42 / 237

Two secret disciples of Jesus came forward to take care of Jesus' burial. They both had feared persecution from the Jewish religious leaders, so they had not openly declared their faith in Jesus as the Messiah (see 12:42).

19:38-39 Joseph was from Arimathea, a town not exactly pinpointed today but generally considered to have been about twenty miles northwest of Jerusalem. He was a secret disciple. Matthew's Gospel says Joseph was a rich man (Matthew 27:57); Mark describes him as "an honored member of the high council" (Mark 15:43); and Luke adds further that he was "a good and righteous man," who had "not agreed" with the council regarding Jesus (Luke 23:50-51).

Joseph would not have been able to stop the council's planned murder of Jesus, but he did what he could afterwards by boldly going to Pilate to ask for Jesus' body so he could give it a proper burial. He had to ask for permission because the Romans usually left the bodies exposed without burial, both as a lesson to anyone passing by, and as a final humiliation for those executed. So Joseph went to ask Pilate, and Pilate agreed to let him take and bury the body.

Jesus had talked at length with Nicodemus about being born again (3:1ff.), and Nicodemus had stood up for Jesus among the leading priests and Pharisees (7:50-52). Nicodemus joined Joseph in embalming and wrapping Jesus' body in regal style. The seventy-five pounds of embalming ointment was an extraordinarily large amount and must have been extremely expensive.

Perhaps the action of Joseph and Nicodemus points to a lesson in teamwork. Both men were naturally cautious. Perhaps they had been chastised repeatedly for not openly rejecting Jesus. But when the moment for boldness came, they worked together. When we join with other believers we can often accomplish what we would not dare to try alone. Though Joseph and Nicodemus were probably each very much afraid, they nevertheless acted courageously. Obedience will often require us to act in spite of our fears.

19:40-42 The Jewish custom of burial did not include mummifying or embalming; instead, they washed the body, then wrapped it in a cloth soaked with aromatic oils and spices. According to Matthew 27:60, this new tomb was Joseph's own that he gave up for Jesus (see also Luke 23:53). Such rock-hewn tombs were expensive. Even in burial, Jesus fulfilled prophecy (see Isaiah 53:9). It was fortuitous that Joseph had a tomb nearby and that he wanted to put Jesus' body there; the burial had to happen quickly because it was the day of preparation, prior to the coming of the Sabbath. So they laid Jesus there.

JESUS RISES FROM THE DEAD / 20:1-10 / 239

The truth of Christianity rests heavily on the Resurrection. If Jesus rose from the grave, who saw him? How trustworthy were the witnesses? Those who claimed to have seen the risen Jesus went on to turn the world upside down. Most of them also died for being followers of Christ. People rarely die for halfhearted belief. Chapter 20 of John's Gospel contains the record of Jesus' resurrection, the first appearances to his followers, and John's personal discovery of the empty tomb.

20:1-2 Mary Magdalene was one of several women who had followed Jesus to the cross, watched his crucifixion (19:25), and then remained to see where he was buried (Matthew 27:61). She, along with other women, was an early follower of Jesus who traveled with him and helped provide for the financial needs of the group (Luke 8:1-3). Mary was obviously grateful to Jesus for freeing her from the torment of demon possession. She was from Magdala, a town near Capernaum in Galilee.

Because of the short interim between Jesus' death and the coming of the Sabbath on Friday evening, the women who had stood by the cross had not had time to anoint Jesus. When the Sabbath arrived with the sunset on Friday, they had to go to their homes and rest. But after sundown on Saturday, the end of the Sabbath, they probably purchased and/or prepared the spices, then early Sunday morning Mary Magdalene came to anoint the body of Jesus with certain spices. According to the other Gospel accounts, she was joined by Mary the mother of James, Salome (Matthew 28:1; Mark 16:1), and perhaps other women as well.

Mark records that as the women were on their way to the tomb, they were discussing how they would remove the stone that had been rolled across the entrance (Mark 16:3). But this would not be a problem, because as they approached they found that the stone had been rolled away. The other Gospel accounts record that angels spoke to the women.

Mary Magdalene, and the other women, ran and found Simon Peter and the other disciple, the one whom Jesus loved (probably John). They had been in the tomb, the body was gone, and they assumed that someone had taken the Lord's body.

20:3-5 Though John's youthful legs carried him more swiftly to the grave, once he was there he stooped and looked in, but he waited for Peter's arrival before entering the cave. Resurrection would not have been their first thought. None of the possible natural explanations for the missing body were of any comfort. If Jesus' body had been stolen or moved by the religious leaders, the disciples would have reason to worry about their own fate.

20:6-7 Close examination revealed that the linen wrappings had been left—perhaps as if Jesus had passed right through them. The cloth that had covered Jesus' head was rolled up separately from the other wrappings that had enveloped Jesus' body. A grave robber couldn't possibly have made off with Jesus' body and left the linens as if they were still shaped around it. The neatness and order indicated that there was not a hasty removal of Jesus' body. Rather, Jesus arose and left the wrappings lying there, empty.

20:8-9 When John saw the empty tomb and the empty graveclothes, he instantly believed that Jesus must have risen from the dead. The text stresses the importance here of John “seeing and believing” to affirm the eyewitness account of an apostle. Most believers would not have this opportunity; they would have to base their faith on what these witnesses reported. John explains that until then they hadn't realized that the Scriptures said he would rise from the dead. Though Jesus had told them, it took the experience for them to understand. Some of the Scriptures that foretold this included Psalm 16:10 and Isaiah 53:11.

John's account also demonstrates that the disciples couldn't have “invented” the Resurrection in order to fulfill the Old Testament prophecies because they did not immediately see any Old Testament connection. The fact of the Resurrection opened the disciples' minds to see that God had foretold his plan through the prophets.

20:10 Perplexed, John and Peter left and went home. They “believed” in something miraculous; that is, they did not fear that Jesus' body had been stolen, as Mary had, but they did not know for sure what they believed or what they should do next. So they just went home. Later, they joined with the other disciples behind locked doors (see 20:19).

JESUS APPEARS TO MARY MAGDALENE / 20:11-18 / 240

We see Jesus' humility in his resurrection, as well as in his crucifixion. Jesus did not rise and then march into the Temple to confront the religious leaders or Caiaphas; he did not dash to the Praetorium to say to Pilate, “I told you so!”; he did not go stand in the center of Jerusalem to impress the crowd. Instead, Jesus revealed himself only to believers. The first person to see him was a woman who had been healed and forgiven and who tearfully stayed at the cross and followed his body to the tomb. As Jesus demonstrated throughout his life, he responded to those who waited attentively and faithfully. Jesus dissolved the perplexities of the disciples. He dried their tears. He dispelled their doubts. Jesus knows how similar we are to his original disciples, and he does not overpower us either. Even though our faithfulness wavers, Jesus faithfully stays with us.

20:11-12 Mary apparently followed Peter and John back to the tomb. When the two disciples left, she was there alone, still crying, still hoping that somehow she could discover where Jesus' body had been taken, but fearing the worst. Then she saw two white-robed angels. The angels actually looked like humans—not beings with halos and wings. The angels had appeared to the women and then sent them to spread the good news that Jesus was alive (Matthew 28:1-7; Mark 16:1-7; Luke 24:1-12), but apparently they were not in the tomb when Peter and John arrived. Yet they are here again to speak to Mary.

20:13 The angels asked Mary, “Why are you crying?” Under normal circumstances this would seem to be an odd question. People might be expected to be crying beside the tomb of a loved one. However, the angels knew why the tomb was empty. They also knew that if these people had listened to Jesus' words about his resurrection while he was alive, they would not be sad and confused; instead, they would be leaping for joy. So the angels' question was not odd, but obvious. It was not meant as a rebuke, but as a reminder of heaven's perspective. Mary simply answered the angels' question with her fears, “Because they have taken away my Lord and I don't know where they have put him.”

20:14-15 Something caused Mary to look over her shoulder, probably a feeling that a person was standing behind her. And indeed, next to the tomb stood Jesus, but Mary didn't recognize him. Perhaps this was the same kind of blindness that afflicted the two who walked with the risen Jesus on the road to Emmaus (see Luke 24:15-16). Or perhaps Mary's eyes were so full of tears and her grief so intense that she literally could not see who was standing there. Jesus repeated the angels' question and added an additional question, asking Mary to specify her request. “Who are you looking for?”

Mary was trying to grasp what might have happened to Jesus' body, so thinking Jesus was the gardener, she asked if he knew anything. If only she could find him, she herself would go get him.

20:16-17 Mary had been looking for the body of her dead Lord; suddenly, to her amazement, she stood face to face with her living Lord. Jesus spoke her name, and immediately she recognized him. Imagine the love that flooded Mary's heart when she heard her Savior saying her name!

Mary's immediate response was to touch Jesus and cling to him. But Jesus stopped her. Perhaps Mary wanted to hold Jesus and not lose him again. She had not yet understood the Resurrection. Perhaps she thought this was his promised Second Coming (14:3). But Jesus was not to remain on this earth in physical form. If he did not ascend to heaven, the Holy Spirit could not come. Both he and Mary had important work to do.

Prior to his death, Jesus had called the disciples his "friends" (15:15). But here, because of the Resurrection, Jesus' disciples had become his brothers. Christ's resurrection creates this new level of relationship because it provides for the regeneration of every believer (see 1 Peter 1:3). After Jesus ascended to his Father, he would come to his disciples and give them this new life and relationship by breathing into them the Holy Spirit. Thus, for the first time in the Gospel, it is made clear that Jesus' Father is our Father, that Jesus' God is our God. The death and resurrection of Jesus ushered in a new relationship between believers and God.

20:18 Mary was the first person to see the risen Christ. She obeyed Jesus and found the disciples, telling them, "I have seen the Lord!" Then she gave them Jesus' message. Jesus' words should have been a great comfort to the disciples. Despite their deserting him in the Garden, he was calling them his "brothers" and explaining that his Father was theirs, his God was theirs. But this report was no more believed by the disciples than the women's report of the angels' words (see Mark 16:10-11; Luke 24:10-11). The disciples were still hiding behind locked doors, for fear of the Jews.

JESUS APPEARS TO HIS DISCIPLES / 20:19-23 / 244

Mary's announcement (20:18) must have stunned the disciples. Later the news that the Lord was alive came from two travelers who had unknowingly spent the day walking to Emmaus with Jesus (Luke 24:15-16). Confused, elated, doubtful, and fearful, the disciples stayed close together, hoping to endure the waiting in one place. They were huddled behind locked doors when Jesus appeared to all of them.

20:19 The disciples were still perplexed and apparently had gotten together that night behind locked doors. They probably were discussing the women's reported sighting of angels, what Peter and John saw at the tomb, and Mary's astounding claim that she had seen Jesus. At some point during the day, Jesus had appeared to Peter (Luke 24:34), and the women had reported the angel's words that the disciples were to go to Galilee and meet Jesus there (Matthew 28:7). But for some reason, they did not go; instead they stayed in Jerusalem, afraid of the Jewish leaders. Suddenly, Jesus was standing there among them. Jesus could do this because his resurrection and subsequent glorification had altered his bodily form. In this new spiritual form, he was able to transcend all physical barriers. He gave the standard Hebrew greeting, "Peace be with you," but here it was filled with deeper meaning (see 14:27; 16:33). Jesus would repeat these words in verse 21.

20:20 Due to Jesus' sudden, miraculous appearance among them, the disciples at first thought he was a ghost (Luke 24:37). Jesus needed to convince them that he, including his touchable physical body, was present with them, so he held out his hands and showed them his side. When they realized who he was, they rejoiced. Jesus had said, "Your grief will suddenly turn to wonderful joy when you see me again" (16:20). Indeed, they were filled with joy.

20:21-23 Jesus gave his peace to them and then commissioned them to be his representatives, even as he had been the Father's (see 17:18). Jesus again identified himself with his Father. He told the disciples by whose authority he did his work. Then he gave the task to his disciples of spreading the gospel message around the world. They were sent with authority from God to preach, teach, and do miracles (see Matthew 28:16-20; Luke 24:47-49)—in essence, to continue across the world what Jesus had begun in Palestine. Whatever God has asked you to do, remember: (1) Your authority comes from God, and (2) Jesus has demonstrated by words and actions how to accomplish the job he has given you. As the Father sent his Son, Jesus sends his followers . . . and you. Your response is to determine from day to day those to whom the Father has sent you.

Before the disciples could carry out this commission, however, they needed the power of the Holy Spirit. And Jesus gave them this power by breathing into them the Holy Spirit. This act reminds us of what God did to make the first man come alive—he breathed into him and he became a living soul (Genesis 2:7). There is life in the breath of God. Man was created but did not come alive until God had breathed into him the breath of life (Genesis 2:7). God's first breath made man different from all other forms of creation. Here, through the breath of Jesus, God imparted eternal, spiritual life. With this breathing came the power to do God's will on earth.

Jesus gave the disciples their Spirit-powered and Spirit-guided mission—to preach the Good News about him so that people’s sins might be forgiven. The disciples did not have the power to forgive sins (only God can forgive sins), but Jesus gave them the privilege of telling new believers that their sins have been forgiven because they have accepted Jesus’ message. All believers have this same privilege. We can announce the forgiveness of sin with certainty when we ourselves repent and believe. Those who don’t believe will not experience the forgiveness of sins; their sins will be retained (i.e., not forgiven).

JESUS APPEARS TO THOMAS / 20:24-31 / 245

Thomas was not with the other disciples for Jesus’ first visit in 20:21-23. Consistent with his character elsewhere in the Gospel (see 14:5), Thomas was skeptical toward his friends’ report about seeing Jesus. He epitomized hardheaded realism by insisting that seeing and touching Jesus for himself would be the only proof that would satisfy him. When Jesus did appear to him, Thomas realized the inappropriateness of his demand.

Jesus made it clear that our faith must be based on the testimony of those who were with him. Insisting on seeing and touching Christ ourselves would indicate a reluctance to believe. We have no right to require God to prove himself; but he has every right as our Creator to expect our belief and obedience. The fact that God blesses those who believe is simply an added gift of his grace.

20:24-25 When the disciples told Thomas that Jesus had appeared to them, he did not believe. Thomas insisted that he see the Jesus who had been crucified. He wanted bodily proof—to see and touch the nail scars in Jesus’ hands and to place his hand into the wound in Jesus’ side. Sometimes people overemphasize the doubtful part of Thomas’s character. John 11:16 reveals Thomas as tough-minded and committed, even if he tended to be pessimistic. And Matthew points out (Matthew 28:17) that all the disciples shared Thomas’s skepticism. It was part of his character to put the group’s feeling into words. Most of the other disciples (with the exception of John—20:8) did not believe until they saw Christ face-to-face.

20:26-28 After eight days, Thomas got his chance. This time he was present when Jesus appeared. The disciples were still behind locked doors when Jesus appeared among them as he had before and gave the same greeting, “Peace be with you!” But this time he spoke directly to Thomas, supernaturally knowing of Thomas’s doubt and what he needed in order to be convinced. Jesus told him to touch and see his hands and side. Jesus’ resurrected body was unique. It was no longer subject to the same laws of nature as before his death. He could appear in a locked room; yet he was not a ghost or apparition because he could be touched and his wounds were still visible.

When he saw Jesus, “doubting” Thomas became believing Thomas. His response rings through the ages as the response of many doubters who finally see the truth, “My Lord and my God!” This clear affirmation of Jesus’ deity provides a good conclusion to John’s Gospel, which continually affirms Jesus’ deity (see 1:1, 18; 8:58; 10:30).

20:29 Though Thomas proclaimed Jesus to be his Lord and God, Jesus reproved Thomas because he had to see before he could believe. The blessed ones are they who haven’t seen and yet believe. Some people think they would believe in Jesus if they could see a definite sign or miracle. But Jesus says we are blessed if we can believe without seeing. We have all the proof we need in the words of the Bible and the testimony of believers.

20:30-31 In the last two verses of the chapter, John explains why he wrote this Gospel: to encourage belief in Jesus as the Christ and as the Son of God. All the miraculous signs in this Gospel point to Jesus as being the Christ and God’s Son, who came to give life to all those who believe. Most likely, John wrote this Gospel to encourage those who already believed to continue in their faith. We who believe are encouraged to read and reread John in order to continue in our belief. And this Gospel has also been used far beyond that as a powerful tool for evangelism, bringing people to faith in Christ.

To understand the life and mission of Jesus more fully, all we need to do is study the Gospels. John tells us that his Gospel records only a few of the many events in Jesus’ life on earth. But the Gospels include everything we need to know to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, through whom we receive eternal life.

JESUS APPEARS TO SEVEN DISCIPLES / 21:1-14 / 246

Chapter 21 is an epilogue to John's narrative. Very likely, John decided to add this chapter some time after he completed his Gospel in order to clarify the misconception about the relationship between his (John's) death and the Lord's return. The rumor that John would not die before the Lord's return (21:23) had to be corrected; otherwise, the church might experience great trouble at his death before the Lord's return. John, therefore, decided to add a chapter that would make it clear that Jesus did not say that he would return before John died.

21:1-3 This chapter records Jesus' appearance to the disciples beside the Sea of Galilee. Jesus had made at least six appearances in (or around) Jerusalem. After the Jerusalem appearances, the disciples evidently had returned to Galilee. Jesus made several appearances in this region: to five hundred believers (1 Corinthians 15:6); to James, his brother (1 Corinthians 15:7); and the appearance recorded here.

Prior to his resurrection, the Lord had told his disciples that he would meet them at an appointed place in Galilee after he arose (Matthew 28:10; Mark 14:28). But due to the disciples' unbelief and fear, they had remained in Jerusalem. After Jesus appeared to them behind locked doors, they did as they had been told and returned to Galilee. But as they waited there, they remained unsure, confused. So they did what they knew how to do best—they went fishing. Seven disciples were together at this time:

Having returned to Galilee, the disciples did not know what to do next, so it was natural for some of them to return to their occupation. Simon, Andrew, and James and John (the sons of Zebedee) had been fishermen (see Mark 1:16-20). Peter took the lead, and the other six disciples went with him. Although fishing was often good during the night while the fish were active and feeding closer to the surface, the disciples caught nothing. When daybreak arrived, they were tired, hungry, and probably more than a little frustrated.

21:4-6 Jesus had come to make another appearance to the disciples, especially to Peter. Perhaps because of the distance, haze over the water, or lack of light at dawn, the men in the boat did not recognize the man on the shore. He called out, "Friends, have you caught any fish?" They were only about a hundred yards out (21:8) and called back, "No."

The man then said, "Throw out your net on the right-hand side of the boat, and you'll get plenty of fish!" The disciples, tired as they were, responded to the obvious authority in the voice, and cast their nets to starboard—and a miracle occurred! This recalls Luke 5:1-11, another occasion where Peter and the other disciples were fishing, catching nothing. Jesus gave a command to go out into the deep water. Peter, though doubtful, followed Jesus' orders. When they obeyed, a miracle occurred! When Peter saw the first miracle, he recognized beyond Jesus' power a holiness that was not part of his own life.

On this occasion, Peter is again a central character. Jesus identified himself by his unexpected and seemingly useless request. The fishermen's actions involved them in another miracle. If the request did not give them a clue, the results unmistakably pointed to the power of their Lord: They couldn't draw in the net because there were so many fish in it. Both John and Peter recognized that Jesus was behind the overwhelming catch of fish.

21:7 John (the disciple whom Jesus loved) may have immediately recognized the repeated miracle, for he was part of the incident recorded in Luke 5. As John peered through the morning mist, he recognized that the man on the shore was the Lord. Peter immediately jumped into the water to swim to Jesus. Though his love for Jesus was very great, Peter may have thought a barrier still existed between the Lord and him because of his denial.

21:8-9 We can only guess what Peter did when he came out of the water, dripping wet, facing the one he had denied. He may have been at a loss for words. Peter must have appreciated the fire that Jesus had burning; there he dried off while he felt the inward chill of remembering what he had done the last time he had stood by a fire warming himself. If any words were said, they were kept between Jesus and Peter, since the others were still too far away to hear.

21:10-11 The miraculous catch of fish must have affected Peter profoundly. Peter did not say a word as he dragged the heavy net full of 153 large fish to shore and then, with the other disciples, ate the breakfast of bread and fish the Lord had prepared even before they caught the fish.

The number of fish probably has no other significance than that it was a very large amount of large fish—especially after having caught nothing all night. And the exact number is recorded simply as a matter of historical fact. It was the usual procedure for a group of fishermen to count the day's catch and then divide it among themselves. Once again, John observed that when Christ takes action, the results bring overabundance.

21:12-13 Any question or any comment seemed trite at that moment. They stood around in awed silence before this one who, as always, was doing the serving, inviting them to have some breakfast. This special meal with the risen Jesus had a profound effect on these seven disciples. Peter would later make claim to his reliability as a witness of Jesus (see Acts 10:41). John does not record that Jesus ate anything, but Luke 24:41-43 describes an appearance of Jesus where he did eat some fish.

21:14 This was the third time Jesus had appeared to his disciples; the first two times had been behind locked doors in Jerusalem. Jesus had come to them to encourage these disciples, especially Peter, concerning their future work. The text seems to imply that Jesus had come to remind them that they were not to return to their old life of fishing. He had called them to be fishers of people (Luke 5:10) and to start the church (Matthew 16:19). Peter, the leader among them, needed to be ready for the responsibilities he soon would assume. He would lead and feed the flock—not with physical food (which Jesus would provide) but with spiritual food.

JESUS CHALLENGES PETER / 21:15-25 / 247

After the meal, Jesus and Peter had a talk. During their conversation, Jesus led Peter through an experience that would remove the cloud of guilt that came from Peter's denial. The Master-Teacher conveyed both forgiveness and usefulness to this disciple who must have concluded he was beyond being useful to Jesus.

21:15-17 Simon son of John was the name Jesus had said when he first met this man who would become his disciple (1:42). But Peter had not yet proven himself to live up to that name—Peter, “the rock.” According to Luke 24:34, Jesus had probably met with Peter previously. Jesus' first question to Peter, “Do you love me more than these?” could be translated in three ways: (1) “Do you love me more than these men love me?” (2) “Do you love me more than you love these men?” (3) “Do you love me more than these things?” (that is, the fishing boat, nets, and gear). Of the three options, the first seems the most appropriate because Peter had boasted that he would never forsake Jesus, even if all the other disciples did (see Matthew 26:33; Mark 14:29; John 13:37). This was the same as saying that he had more love for Jesus than the others did.

Peter did just the opposite of what he boasted: He denied Jesus three times. As a consequence, Jesus asked Peter three times, “Do you love me?” to affirm Peter's love and commitment. Each time Peter told Jesus, “I love you,” Jesus exhorted Peter to care for his flock: “Feed my lambs” (21:15); “Take care of my sheep” (21:16); “Feed my sheep” (21:17). Lambs and sheep can be taken as words of endearment. Jesus’ love and concern is for all believers—the entire “flock” that would grow as a result of the apostles’ ministry.

21:18-19 Jesus used a proverbial statement about old age to depict Peter’s death, which was by crucifixion. From this day onward, Peter knew what death lay before him. Peter never forgot this prophecy from Jesus; Peter referred to it in his Second Epistle when he spoke about his imminent death (see 2 Peter 1:14). Peter was crucified in Rome under Nero around A.D. 65–67. By his words, “Follow me,” Jesus was reinstating and restoring Peter as his disciple. What assurance these words must have been for Peter. Despite what glory or trial or death lay ahead, he would always be under the Savior’s care, for he would be following Jesus.

Three years earlier, along the same lake, Jesus had said the same words to Peter—“Follow me.” These words mean “Keep on following.” Stripped of pride, impulsiveness, and false expectations of leadership, Peter was ready to follow Christ in a new way because of new experiences and a clearer picture of himself. “Follow Me” means consistent discipleship and steadfast pursuit of Christ, even if that requires martyrdom. It means continuing Christ’s work in the way he wants it done, not in a way we want it done.

21:20-23 Having been told his destiny, Peter wanted to know what would happen to John (called the disciple Jesus loved). In this profound but loving rebuke, Jesus explained to the impulsive Peter that he was not to be concerned about God’s plans for anyone else but himself. Indeed, Peter’s contribution to the beginnings of the Christian church would be astounding (from his sermon on Pentecost in just a few weeks, to his leadership of the Jerusalem church, to his being the first to understand that Gentiles too could become Christians), and both his miraculous escape from death (Acts 12:1-19) and his death by martyrdom would be heroic. John, although he would remain alive, would be called to a different kind of service, even through exile on a remote island—for John would write this incredible Gospel, three letters, and the astounding account of the triumphant return of the Son of God in the book of Revelation. Peter, the impulsive one, would write two epistles to encourage patience while we wait for Christ’s return. Peter and John were called to different kinds of service for their Lord; neither was to question why.

Jesus’ statement to Peter had been interpreted to mean that John wouldn’t die, but would remain alive on earth until the Second Coming. John had to correct this rumor. If John died and the Lord still had not come, this tiny rumor could throw many believers, and the church itself, into confusion. John insisted that Jesus' words had been misunderstood. Jesus had not said that John would not die; rather, if Jesus were to want him to remain alive, it wasn't any of Peter's business. The point is that the decision was up to Jesus—not John or Peter. What Jesus was communicating to Peter was that it was not for Peter to be concerned about what would become of John's life. He, Peter, was responsible to follow the Lord according to what the Lord had revealed to him. And so was John.

21:24 The last two verses of John's Gospel contain the finishing touch to the book that attests to the truth of John's written testimony. The testimony is trustworthy because John was an eyewitness of Jesus Christ. After many years of experience and reflection, John wrote an account that reflects his spiritual insight into the life of Jesus Christ (see 1:14; 1 John 1:1-3).

The statement, "We all know that his account of these things is accurate" is probably from some of John's contemporaries who knew that what John wrote was true. Some scholars think these contemporaries were the Ephesian elders, who had been told and/or read the preceding narrative. Early church history reports that after John spent several years as an exile on the island of Patmos (see Revelation 1:9), he returned to Ephesus where he died as an old man, near the end of the first century.

21:25 This final statement is not mere hyperbole. It is an affirmation of the fact that John's one book is far from being exhaustive because John recorded only some of the things that Jesus had done. If John had covered every event, how many more books would be required to contain all the material? Some of this material can be found in the other three Gospels. But there is so much more that could have been said about Jesus. Nonetheless, what was written has provided believers with a true biography of the greatest person who ever lived: Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

ACTS

INTRODUCTION

Acts has it all—supernatural intervention, astounding miracles, powerful preaching, breathtaking escapes, harrowing journeys, life-and-death decisions, courtroom dramas, thrilling rescues, action, mystery, and adventure! Acts will grab your attention, trigger your imagination, and tug at your emotions. It’s a terrific story and a great read . . . and it’s true.

As you flip through the pages, however, don’t miss the story behind the stories. Underlying the stimulating sermons and the display of miracles, look for God at work in individuals. In fact, as much as Acts could be called the story of the early church, it could also be titled “The Miracle of Changed Lives.”

Consider this: When we last saw the disciples, they were running scared and abandoning their Lord (Matthew 26:56). Fleeing, denying, disillusioned, and crying, these men seemed the least likely candidates to be boldly proclaiming the gospel. Yet that’s what happened. Peter, James, John, and the rest had been transformed from cowardly to courageous, argumentative to articulate, and selfish to selfless. Then they were joined by Paul, whom God also miraculously transformed.

What made the difference? Acts reveals the profound answer. This is their story—the history of the early church and the changed men and women who changed the world.

As you read of the Holy Spirit, the gifts, persecution and power, Paul’s dramatic conversion, and the rapid spread of the gospel beyond Jerusalem and Judea to the ends of the earth, look for yourself in the stories. Ask God to transform you into the kind of person he can use to change your world.

AUTHOR

Luke: doctor, Gentile Christian, traveling companion of Paul, and writer of the Gospel according to Luke.

Luke was a close friend and companion of Paul. He is listed as the writer of the Gospel bearing his name by nearly all the ancient church fathers, including Justin Martyr (A.D. 100–165), Irenaeus (c. A.D. 120–200), and Tertullian (A.D. 160–230).

The text of the book of Acts clearly reveals the same author as the Gospel of Luke. Both books are addressed to “Theophilus” (Luke 1:1; Acts 1:1). It makes sense, as well, in light of Luke’s commitment to recording the facts, that Acts be seen as a continuation of the story, a second volume detailing what happened subsequent to Christ's death and resurrection.

Although the writer does not identify himself by name anywhere in the book, he does use the pronoun "we" beginning with 16:10, thereby indicating that the writer had joined Paul in his journeys in Troas at that point. As such, Luke must have become one of Paul's coworkers, which is what Paul explicitly acknowledges in Philemon 1:24.

Although Luke had a major role in the formation of the early church through his writing and through his ministry with Paul, he is only mentioned in three of Paul's letters (Colossians 4:14; 2 Timothy 4:11; Philemon 1:24). It is significant that Luke was not a Jew but a Greek and not one of the original disciples of Christ. Thus he was not a member of the inner circle of Jesus' followers nor one who saw Jesus as his long-promised Messiah. Luke must have been a convert, convinced of the truth of the gospel message and determined to spread the message to others. Perhaps little is said of Luke because he chose not to give himself a prominent place in the text of his books.

Luke's research into what had already been written about Jesus gave him a start. And his close relationship to the apostle Paul (20:5-15; 27:1-28:16) undoubtedly gave him access to an abundance of information concerning Christ, thus helping him write the Gospel. Certainly there also could be no better person to record the history of the early church than an eyewitness of the tremendous spread of the gospel (himself a convert) and a close friend of the church's greatest missionary.

For more about Luke, see the Author section in the Introduction to the Gospel of Luke.

DATE AND SETTING

Written between A.D. 63 and 65 from an unknown location.

The final event of Acts—Paul's ministry in Rome—provides a clue to the date and setting of the book. Christianity, perceived as a sect of Judaism, was tolerated by the Roman authorities before A.D. 65, but then Nero began persecuting followers of the Christian faith. Yet Acts makes no mention of this persecution. It also does not comment on the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, something that would surely have been mentioned if Luke had written in the 70s. The Gospel records Jesus' words regarding the destruction of the temple (Luke 19:41-44; 21:20-24), so Luke certainly would have mentioned in Acts the prophecy's fulfillment. Noting that the gospel account, probably written A.D. 60-61, was the first of his two books to Theophilus (1:1), the two books probably were written within a short time of each other, possibly during Luke's stays with Paul while in prison in Caesarea (23:33) and Rome (28:14-16).

Biblical scholars suggest a number of possible places where Luke may have written Acts. Because Luke is traditionally associated with Antioch, some believe that Luke penned the book in that city, where the disciples were “first called Christians” (11:26). Rome is another option because the book of Acts concludes with Paul’s ministry there. A third option is the city of Ephesus because the book focuses on many events in that Greek city, including Paul’s farewell to the leaders of the church. In summary, there is no consensus among scholars about where Luke actually wrote the follow-up to his gospel account.

AUDIENCE

Theophilus (“one who loves God”), Gentiles, and people everywhere.

Both the Gospel of Luke and Acts name Theophilus (Luke 1:1; 1:1) as the addressee. Because the literal meaning of “Theophilus” is “lover of God” or “friend of God,” some have thought that the books were addressed generally and written to anyone who loves God, not a specific, first-century individual. Others note that “most excellent” is attached to “Theophilus” in Luke 1:3. In that day, this title was used only when addressing a Roman officer, thus leading to the conclusion that Theophilus was a Gentile and possibly someone of high rank in Roman society. Beyond those inferences, little is known—the name Theophilus appears nowhere else in Scripture. Many biblical scholars think that Theophilus was a new believer who was having some difficulty with the Christian faith. Thus Luke wrote the gospel account in order to provide solid answers to Theophilus’s questions.

Luke also elaborated in Acts about a subject that he had mentioned in his Gospel account—that the Gentiles are heirs of God’s salvation together with the Jews. The Gospel records stories of Jesus healing non-Jewish people and proclaiming his message to them (Luke 7:1-10; 8:26-39). Acts describes the spread of Christianity among the Jews and then well beyond, to the vast Gentile world. Clearly, then, Gentile Christians would have been eager readers of this book.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

To give an accurate account of the birth and growth of the Christian church.

After reading what Luke had written in his gospel account, Theophilus may have had unanswered questions. So Luke wrote Acts to answer those questions and to underscore the truth of the gospel. By tracing the growth of the Christian church throughout the known world at that time, Luke demonstrated that God’s good news of salvation applies to every person—from the lowliest slave to the most respected nobleman and from the Jews to the Greeks and Romans.

Luke probably had other purposes in mind for writing the book of Acts. These are mentioned below.

Historic. In writing his Gospel, Luke wanted to present “a careful summary” (Luke 1:3). Thus, he took great pains to verify the historical accuracy of the events he was recording, because his purpose was to write a careful and accurate account of what he had researched and seen. Evidence of his accuracy can also be seen throughout Acts. For example, the Roman famine prophesied by Agabus is confirmed and dated through a parenthetical note by Luke that the prophecy had come true during Emperor Claudius’s reign (11:28).

These facts, along with the numerous details in Acts, reveal the careful and diligent research of a precise historian. In Acts, Luke was writing history.

Kerygmatic. The Greek word kerygma literally means “that which is preached”—i.e., the message. An important purpose of the book of Acts is to highlight the kerygma, the core of the gospel message proclaimed by the apostles. The good news of Jesus’ death and resurrection, proclaimed fearlessly in streets, synagogues, and prisons, changed thousands of lives and the course of history. Paul’s three missionary journeys and voyage to Rome provide solid evidence that the gospel was being proclaimed to the ends of the earth (1:8).

Apologetic. The word “apologetic” refers to a rational defense of the faith, a presentation of solid evidence that the gospel is true. Because of the rapid spread of the Way (i.e., Christianity) across the Roman Empire, Luke wanted to assure readers that Christianity was not a political movement or threat but the reality of God becoming flesh and the fulfillment of Israel’s hope of a Messiah.

Roman law defined religions as either licitia (legal) or illicita (illegal). Even though Christianity was the offspring of Judaism, it was having difficulty acquiring licitia status because the Jewish establishment considered it a breakaway sect. Thus, Luke may have written this as an apology to the Roman government. Because Luke probably wrote this book while Paul was awaiting trial in Rome, the intended audience may have included Paul’s trial judge. Acts includes several defenses presented both to Jews (see 4:8-12) and Gentiles (see 25:8-11).

Conciliatory. The early church contained two dominant factions—Jewish believers and Gentile believers. Paul had become the champion of reaching the Gentiles, while in many ways Peter had been leading the charge for ministering to the Jews. The council at Jerusalem was held to discuss the issue, and the matter was resolved amicably (15:1-35). But old ways are hard to change, so the same issues were raised again and again. Each time, Paul would write to the church to try to defuse the potential explosion and to keep believers focused on the truth (see, for example, Galatians).

The book of Acts presents a noteworthy parallel between Peter and Paul. Each conceded specific aspects of the church to the other. For example, Peter conferred upon Paul a second mode of apostolic authority as well as approval for reaching out to Gentiles, not on the merits of the law. At the same time, Paul conceded primacy in the church to Peter and apostleship to the Twelve, due to their earthly relationship with Christ.

In many ways, the church struggles today with the same issues: new believers need encouragement and assurance, nonbelievers need to know that the Christian message is true, and the church needs to avoid petty wrangling and unite around the core of the gospel message.

As you read Acts, recommit to unity in the church, working together with Christian brothers and sisters to spread the gospel throughout the world. And thank God for his grace, which extends salvation to all kinds of people, even you.

MESSAGE

The book of Acts begins with the outpouring of the promised Holy Spirit and the commencement of the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ. This Spirit-inspired evangelism began in Jerusalem and eventually spread to Rome, covering most of the Roman Empire. The gospel first went to the Jews, but they, as a nation, rejected it. A remnant of Jews, of course, gladly received the Good News. But the continual rejection of the gospel by the vast majority of the Jews led to the ever-increasing proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles. This was according to Jesus' plan: The gospel was to go from Jerusalem, to Judea, to Samaria, and to the remotest part of the earth (1:8). This, in fact, is the pattern that the Acts narrative follows. The glorious proclamation began in Jerusalem (chapters 1–7), went to Judea and Samaria (chapters 8 and following), and to the countries beyond Judea (11:19; 13:4 and on to the end of Acts). The second half of Acts is focused primarily on Paul's missionary journeys to many countries north of the Mediterranean Sea. He, with his companions, took the gospel first to the Jews and then to the Gentiles. Some of the Jews believed, and many of the Gentiles received the Good News with joy. New churches were started, and new believers began to grow in the Christian life.

The main themes in the book of Acts include: Church beginnings; Holy Spirit; Church growth; witnessing; and opposition.

Church Beginnings (1:4-8, 12-26; 2:1–8:40). Acts is the history of how the Christian church was founded and organized as well as how the early church solved its problems. Led by outspoken and courageous apostles, the community of believers grew as individuals put their trust in the risen Christ. Filled with the Holy Spirit, they were empowered to witness, to love, and to serve. Although pressured and persecuted, they continued to preach, considering it a privilege to suffer for Christ. And the church thrived.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. New churches are continually being founded, but true Christian churches preach the crucified and risen Christ. Although believers continue to be pressured to give up or give in, by faith in Jesus Christ and in the power of the Holy Spirit, the church can be a vibrant agent for change. God wants to work in you and through you. Filled with his Spirit, as a courageous witness, you also can share the Good News with the world—with your world.

The Holy Spirit (1:5, 8; 2:1-13, 17-18, 33, 38-39; 4:8, 25, 31; 5:3, 9, 32, 6:3, 5; 7:51, 55; 8:15-24, 29, 39; 9:17, 31; 10:19, 38, 44-47; 11:12-18, 24, 28; 13:2-12, 52; 15:8, 28-29; 16:6-7; 19:2-6, 21; 20:22-28; 21:4, 10-12; 28:25). The church did not start or grow by its own power and enthusiasm. The disciples were empowered by God's Holy Spirit. He was the Comforter and Guide promised by Jesus and sent when Jesus went to heaven. The Holy Spirit came upon the assembled believers at Pentecost and continued to fill those who trusted in Christ as Savior. Through the Spirit's power, the gospel was preached, and people were healed.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. The filling of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost demonstrated that Christianity was supernatural. As a result, the church became more Holy Spirit-conscious than problem-conscious. Then, led and empowered by the Spirit, they changed the world. Everyone who trusts in Christ as Savior receives the Holy Spirit. By faith, therefore, any believer can claim the Holy Spirit's power to do Christ's work. Allow God to fill you with his Spirit; then follow the Spirit's leading as you live and minister in this world.

Church Growth (2:37-47; 4:1-4, 32-37; 5:12-16, 42; 6:1-7; 8:12, 40; 9:31-35, 39-42; 10:44-48; 11:19-21, 24; 12:24; 13:42-43, 44-49; 14:1, 21-28; 16:4-5, 13-15, 29-34; 17:1-4, 10-12, 32-34; 18:7-8; 19:17-20; 28:23-31). Jesus had told his disciples to take the gospel to all the world (Matthew 28:19-20). He also had said that they would be his witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. Acts shows the fulfillment of this prediction, presenting the history of a dynamic, growing community of believers from Jerusalem to Syria, Africa, Asia, and Europe. In the first century, it spread from believing Jews to non-Jews in thirty-nine cities and thirty countries, islands, or provinces.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. The Holy Spirit brings movement, excitement, and growth. He gives believers the motivation, energy, and ability to spread the gospel. God still loves the world (John 3:16)—the whole world. And he wants men and women everywhere to hear his wonderful, life-changing message. Consider how you are part of God's plan to expand the Christian gospel.

Witnessing (1:8; 2:4-40; 3:12-26; 4:8-15; 5:29-32, 42; 6:7; 7:1-56; 8:4-40; 9:20-22, 28-29; 10:34-43; 11:4-17, 20-21; 13:4-6, 16-47; 14:1, 6-7, 14-17, 21; 16:9-15, 25-34; 17:2-4, 22-34; 18:4-11, 19-20, 24-28; 19:8-10; 20:7, 20-27; 22:1-21; 23:1, 6; 24:10-21, 24-26; 26:1-23, 28-29; 28:17-31). Peter, John, Philip, Paul, Barnabas, and thousands more witnessed to their new faith in Christ. By personal testimony, preaching, or defense before authorities, they told the story with boldness and courage to groups of all sizes. Paul, in particular, took every opportunity to tell others about Jesus' life, death, and resurrection, and Paul told how God had changed his life. Whether in a synagogue (17:10) or lecture hall (19:9), on a riverbank (16:13) or in prison (16:31-32), or in the public square (17:17), in front of a mob (21:40) or in front of rulers (24:10), Paul courageously spoke the truth.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. We are God's people, chosen to be part of his plan to reach the world. We have the truth, the good news about the only way to God, and the message of eternal life. Like the apostles and early believers, we must share this message with boldness and love. And God has promised that the Holy Spirit will help us as we witness or preach. Witnessing is also beneficial to us because it strengthens our faith as we confront those who challenge it. To whom has God called you to share his message of forgiveness and hope? Who needs to hear from you about Christ? What can you do to take the Good News to the world?

Opposition (4:1-22, 29-30; 5:17-42; 6:8-14; 7:54-60; 8:1-3; 9:1-2, 22-30; 12:1-19; 13:50-52; 14:1-7, 19-20; 16:16-39; 17:5-9, 13-15; 18:12-17; 19:9, 23-41; 21:26-36; 22:22-29; 23:2, 7-10, 12-21; 24:1-9; 25:2-7). Through imprisonment, beatings, plots, and riots, Christians were persecuted by both Jews and Gentiles. Countless numbers suffered financial loss and physical and emotional pain, and many died. Although Christ's message focused on love and forgiveness, it threatened the pagan establishment and brought furious opposition. But this opposition became a catalyst for the spread of Christianity as believers, convinced of the truth of the gospel, courageously continued to hold on to the faith and to share it with others. This showed that the Christian movement was not the work of humans but of God.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Christ still threatens the establishment because he identifies sin and calls people to repent and to turn to him. And Jesus' claim to be the only way (see John 14:6) is said to be impossibly narrow and politically incorrect. So believers continue to be threatened and persecuted for believing in Christ and telling others about him. But God can work through any opposition, and persecution can help spread his word. When severe treatment from hostile unbelievers comes, realize that it is because you have been a faithful witness.

Then look for the opportunity to present the Good News. Stay focused on Christ, and seize the opportunities that opposition brings.

OUTLINE OF ACTS

I. PETER'S MINISTRY (1:1–12:25)

- A. Establishment of the church
- B. Expansion of the church

II. PAUL'S MINISTRY (13:1–28:31)

- A. First missionary journey
- B. The council at Jerusalem
- C. Second missionary journey
- D. Third missionary journey
- E. Paul on trial

Modern names and boundaries are shown in gray.

The apostle Paul, whose missionary journeys fill much of this book, traveled tremendous distances as he tirelessly spread the gospel across much of the Roman Empire. His combined trips, by land and sea, equal more than 13,000 air miles.

Judea Jesus ascended to heaven from the Mount of Olives outside Jerusalem, and his followers returned to the city to await the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, which occurred at Pentecost. Peter gave a powerful sermon that was heard by Jews from across the empire. The Jerusalem church grew, but Stephen was martyred for his faith by Jewish leaders who did not believe in Jesus (1:1–7:60).

Samaria After Stephen's death, persecution of Christians intensified, but it caused the believers to leave Jerusalem and spread the Good News to other cities in the empire. Philip took the gospel into Samaria, and even to a man from Ethiopia (8:1–40).

Syria Paul (Saul) began his story as a persecutor of Christians, only to be met by Jesus himself on the road to Damascus. He became a believer, but his new faith caused opposition, so he returned to Tarsus, his home, for safety. Barnabas sought out Paul in Tarsus and brought him to the church in Antioch of Syria, where they worked together. Meanwhile, Peter had received a vision that led him to Caesarea, where he presented the gospel to a Gentile family, who became believers (9:1–12:25).

Cyprus and Galatia Paul and Barnabas were dedicated by the church in Antioch of Syria for God's work of spreading the gospel to other cities. They set off on their first missionary journey through Cyprus and Galatia (13:1–14:28).

Jerusalem Controversy between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians over the matter of keeping the Law led to a special council, with delegates from the churches in Antioch and Jerusalem meeting in Jerusalem. Together, they resolved the conflict, and the news was taken back to Antioch (15:1–35).

Macedonia Barnabas traveled to Cyprus while Paul took a second missionary journey. He revisited the churches in Galatia and headed toward Ephesus, but the Holy Spirit said no. So he turned north toward Bithynia and Pontus but again was told not to go. He then received the "Macedonian call" and followed the Spirit's direction into the cities of Macedonia (16:36–17:14).

Achaia Paul traveled from Macedonia to Athens and Corinth in Achaia, then traveled by ship to Ephesus before returning to Caesarea, Jerusalem, and finally back to Antioch (17:15–18:22).

Ephesus Paul's third missionary journey took him back through Cilicia and Galatia, this time straight to Ephesus in Asia. He visited other cities in Asia before going back to Macedonia and Achaia. He returned to Jerusalem by ship, despite his knowledge that arrest awaited him there (18:23–23:30).

Caesarea Paul was arrested in Jerusalem and taken to Antipatris, then on to Caesarea under Roman guard. Paul always took advantage of any opportunity to share the Good News, and he did so before many Gentile leaders. Because Paul appealed to Caesar, he began the long journey to Rome (23:31–26:32).

Rome After storms, layovers in Crete, and shipwreck on the island of Malta, Paul arrived in Sicily and finally in Italy, where he traveled by land, under guard, to his long-awaited destination: Rome, the capital of the empire (27:1–28:31).

THE PROMISE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT / 1:1-5

The book of Acts, written by Luke, picks up where Luke's Gospel left off, providing details of the birth and early years of the church that Jesus had promised to build. Together the two books, Luke and Acts, form a seamless account of how the followers of Jesus turned the world upside down.

Before documenting this rapid spread of the gospel, however, Luke asserted two important truths in what serves as an introduction to the book of Acts: (1) the indisputable fact of Christ's resurrection; and (2) the indispensable presence of the Holy Spirit. Apart from these two strong foundations, the church would be without hope and without power. What was true in the first century is still true today.

1:1-2 Luke's opening statement ties this volume to his first book, the Gospel of Luke. That book was also addressed to Theophilus, whose name means "one who loves God." While some scholars have argued that this is a general term for all believers, it is more likely a proper name. When addressing Theophilus in Luke 1:1, Luke called him "most honorable." A proper name with a title indicates that this was probably a real person, someone who belonged to the nobility, possibly as a high-ranking Roman official. Most likely Theophilus was a Roman acquaintance of Luke's with a strong interest in the new Christian religion.

Whether or not Theophilus was a believer, he had apparently learned some of the facts, but he may have needed further clarification. Luke set out to explain the entire gospel story to Theophilus, telling him about everything Jesus began to do and teach until the day he ascended to heaven after giving his chosen apostles further instructions from the Holy Spirit. The book of Acts would show the continuation of his work on earth through his church, his body.

1:3 During the days after Christ rose from the dead, he appeared to the apostles from time to time. The word proved refers to demonstrated, decisive evidence. Jesus' resurrection had not been sleight of hand or illusion, with Jesus being merely a ghostly presence. Instead, these were solid, visible, and undeniable proofs of the fact that Jesus was alive.

During Jesus' post-Resurrection appearances, the main subject of Jesus' remarks was the Kingdom of God. Throughout the Gospels the Kingdom was always on Jesus' lips, for this unified his teachings and activities (see, for example, Luke 13:18-21; 17:20-37). When Christ came to earth, he brought God's Kingdom, but it was not an earthly kingdom. The promised Kingdom is present now only in part. The New Testament writers confirmed that through his death and resurrection, Christ bound Satan (Colossians 2:15; 1 Peter 3:22), provided forgiveness and holiness to sinners (Romans 3:21-26; Hebrews 9:11-12; 10:10), and is now enthroned as Lord over all (Acts 2:33-36; 5:31; Ephesians 1:20-22). Believers become participants of this Kingdom through God's power (Matthew 19:24-26; John 3:3), by repentance and trust in Jesus (Matthew 4:17; John 14:6; Acts 8:12). His Kingdom began in the hearts of his followers. When Christ returned to heaven, God's Kingdom remained in the hearts of all believers through the presence of the Holy Spirit. God promised, however, that he would ultimately reign over all and bring about the end of all death and disease. The ultimate culmination of the Kingdom of God will not be fully realized until Jesus Christ comes again to rule, defeat his enemies, and consummate the Kingdom (Matthew 24:29-31; 25:31-46; John 14:1-3). Before that time believers are to work to spread God's Kingdom across the world.

1:4-5 As the risen Christ met with his disciples, here eating a meal with them, he surely told them many things. Luke records only a handful of sentences from those forty days of instruction, so they certainly are important words. Christ first told his followers to stay and not leave Jerusalem until the Father sends you what he promised. This points back to Luke 24:49. He had spoken about this before, at the Last Supper: "And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor, who will never leave you. He is the Holy Spirit" (John 14:16-17).

This would be a new kind of baptism. John baptized with water, said Jesus, but these believers would be baptized with the Holy Spirit. John the Baptist had baptized people as a sign of repentance. They had confessed their sins and had determined to live as God wanted them to live. Baptism was an outward sign of commitment. To be effective, it had to be accompanied by an inward change of attitude leading to a changed life. John's baptism did not give salvation; it prepared a person to welcome the coming Messiah and receive his message and his baptism (Matthew 3:11).

The Old Testament promised a time when God would demonstrate his purifying power among people (Isaiah 32:15; Ezekiel 39:29). The prophets also looked forward to a purifying fire (Isaiah 4:4; Malachi 3:2). This looked ahead to Pentecost (Acts 2:1-6), when the Holy Spirit would be sent by Jesus in the form of tongues of fire, empowering his followers to preach the gospel. All believers, those who would later come to Jesus Christ for salvation, would receive the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the fire of purification (in the Greek one article precedes these words, indicating that they were not two separate baptisms). This baptism would purify and refine each believer. When Jesus baptized with the Holy Spirit, the entire person would be transformed by the Spirit's power.

If Jesus had stayed on earth, his physical presence would have limited the spread of the gospel because physically he could be in only one place at a time. After Christ was taken up into heaven, he would be spiritually present everywhere through the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit was sent so that God would be with and within his followers after Christ returned to heaven. The Spirit would comfort them, guide them to know his truth, remind them of Jesus' words, give them the right words to say, and fill them with power. As promised by Christ in the upper room (John 13–17) and by the Father (see Peter's speech in Acts 2:17 and following), the Holy Spirit would be the next great event in the life of the church. Many believe it to be the very birth of the church.

THE ASCENSION OF JESUS / 1:6-11

When would the risen Lord set up his Kingdom? This was the question uppermost in the apostles' minds. They were eagerly hoping for a glorious earthly kingdom free from Roman rule. Christ, however, sidestepped these questions about earthly kingdoms and divine timetables. Instead, he reminded his followers of their calling to be Spirit-filled witnesses who would take the gospel message everywhere. A spiritual revolution needed first to take place in the hearts and minds of people. With this final charge on the top of the Mount of Olives, Christ ascended into heaven. Moments later divine messengers appeared and assured the apostles that the Lord would one day return in similar fashion.

1:6 The average Jew of Jesus' day was looking forward with great anticipation to the literal coming of the Messiah's earthly kingdom and with it the restoration of the fortunes and military might that the nation had enjoyed under King David. Jesus had certainly taught a great deal about his coming Kingdom in his ministry with the disciples. During this forty-day instruction period, the disciples had questions about the promised Kingdom, for their anticipation had been heightened with their Master's resurrection from the dead. Fully expecting Jesus to bring in his Kingdom on earth at that moment, the apostles asked: "Are you going to free Israel now and restore our kingdom?"

The coming of the Kingdom was closely associated with the coming of the Holy Spirit (as implied in passages such as Isaiah 32:15-20; 44:3-5; Ezekiel 39:28-29; Joel 2:28–3:1; Zechariah 12:8-10). When Christ told the disciples of the imminent coming of the Spirit, therefore, they were even more likely to assume the coming of the Kingdom would also be at hand. During the years of Jesus' ministry on earth, the disciples continually had wondered about the coming of the Kingdom and what their roles would be in it. In the traditional view, the Messiah would be an earthly conqueror who would free Israel from Rome. But the Kingdom about which Jesus spoke was first of all a "spiritual" Kingdom established in the hearts and lives of believers (Luke 17:21); behind it was the earthly kingdom that Christ promised to institute at his return.

1:7 The dates of the restoration of the Kingdom were not the disciples' business. These are set by the Father. Later revelation through Paul and others would help clarify the issue (1 Thessalonians 5:1-2). What should concern and consume the disciples, however (notice the contrastive word "but" that begins 1:8), was the loaded statement that follows.

1:8 This is the last recorded statement of Christ on earth. It is thus final, authoritative, and of utmost importance. The Holy Spirit is a major theme in Luke and Acts and is the major point of continuity between the life of Jesus and the ministry of the church.

Who is the Holy Spirit? God is three persons in one—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. God became a man in Jesus so that Jesus could die for our sins. Jesus rose from the dead to offer salvation to all people through spiritual renewal and rebirth. When Jesus ascended into heaven, his physical presence left the earth, but he promised to send the Holy Spirit so that his spiritual presence would still be among mankind (see Luke 24:49). The Holy Spirit first became available to all believers at Pentecost (Acts 2). Whereas in Old Testament days the Holy Spirit empowered specific individuals for specific purposes, now all believers have the power of the Holy Spirit available to them. For more on the Holy Spirit, read John 14:16-28; Romans 8:9; 1 Corinthians 12:13; and 2 Corinthians 1:22.

When the Spirit comes, he told his followers, you will receive power. To do what? To tell people about him. They were to start right there in Jerusalem (1:4). Judea was the region surrounding Jerusalem (possibly including Galilee). Samaria was Judea's hostile next-door neighbor, a more difficult but equally important place to take the gospel. The ends of the earth may have referred to Rome or the Roman Empire, the world power at that time. The direction was of primary importance: Beginning from where you are at this moment, take the message of Christ outward, like ripples caused by a pebble thrown into a pond, not stopping at just your city or state but moving on beyond regional influence to the very “ends” of the earth. In other words, reach it all!

The disciples took Jesus at his word and went about their task exactly as he directed: they began in Jerusalem (1–7), spread to Judea and Samaria (8–12), then filtered out across the world to the imperial capital, Rome (13–28).

1:9 After giving this important charge, Jesus was taken up into the sky while they were watching, and he disappeared into a cloud. This cloud symbolized the glory of God. In the Old Testament, we read that a cloud led the Israelites through the wilderness (Exodus 13:21-22) and that God made his presence known to the people by appearing in a cloud (Exodus 16:10; 19:9, 16; 24:15-18; 33:9-10; 34:5; 40:34-35). A cloud also enveloped Jesus and three of his disciples at the Transfiguration (Luke 9:34-35) as a visible symbol of God’s presence. So when Jesus returned to glory, he returned in a cloud.

The disciples needed to see Jesus make this transition. The Ascension confirmed for them that Jesus truly was God. In addition, they witnessed the fact that he had physically left earth and had returned to his heavenly home; thus, the remaining work would be done by the witnesses he had left behind, operating in the power of the promised Holy Spirit.

1:10-11 While the disciples were straining their eyes, staring into the sky, two angelic messengers appeared among them. The angels confirmed what had just happened: indeed, Jesus had been taken away into heaven. They also reminded the disciples of Jesus’ promise: “Someday, just as you saw him go, he will return!” Most likely, this refers to Jesus’ coming in a cloud to show his glory (see Matthew 24:30; 26:64; Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27).

MATTHIAS REPLACES JUDAS / 1:12-26

Having been instructed to wait for the coming of the Holy Spirit, the disciples withdrew to an upstairs room in Jerusalem. There they wisely spent time praying. It was during this lull that the apostles, under Peter’s leadership, filled the vacancy in their ranks created by the defection of Judas. It was important for them to have twelve apostles, representing the twelve tribes of Israel, to position the church as the fulfillment of the righteous remnant (see 1:21). Practical and simple steps in organization often play an important part in God’s Kingdom plan.

1:12-13 Following the instructions of Christ (1:4), the disciples stayed in Jerusalem. The upstairs room seems to have been a specific and well-known place (the noun has the definite Greek article). This may have been the same room in which they had eaten the Last Supper with Christ (Luke 22:12), as well as the location of many of the post-Resurrection appearances. At this time it became the first meeting place of the church.

This list of names of the eleven disciples parallels the lists in the Gospels (Matthew 10:2-4; Mark 3:16-19; Luke 6:14-16).

1:14 Luke took special note of the fact that the disciples were joined by Mary the mother of Jesus and several other women, likely the ones who had been present at the Crucifixion and at the empty tomb (Luke 8:2-3; 23:49; 23:55–24:10). Also present were the brothers of Jesus. During his lifetime, Jesus' brothers (Mary and Joseph's other sons) did not believe he was the Messiah (John 7:5) and actually thought he was out of his mind (Mark 3:21-35). But Jesus' resurrection must have convinced them otherwise. Jesus' special appearance to James, one of his brothers, may have been an especially significant event in James's conversion (see 1 Corinthians 15:7). This gathering may have included all of Jesus' other brothers—Joses (or Joseph), Judas (or Jude) and Simon (see Matthew 13:55-56; Mark 6:3).

The main emphasis, however, is not who was present but what they were doing—praying! Prayer begins to appear as a mark of the early church. When they were fearful, they prayed. When they were confused, they prayed. When they were waiting for God to fulfill his promise to them, they prayed. When they needed an answer to a question (such as who was to be the twelfth apostle), they prayed!

1:15-16 The group was a little larger than the previous verses seem to indicate. During this “waiting” period, evidently, the meetings in the upper room were regular (during this time), repeated (on a day when), and growing in size (about 120 believers attended this particular meeting). Peter, who had taken a prominent role among the disciples throughout the Gospels, continued in that leadership role.

Peter put the events concerning Judas's betrayal and suicide into biblical perspective by explaining how it was necessary for the Scriptures to be fulfilled, and then he called the believers to the task of choosing Judas's replacement, something he likewise said was necessary (1:21). Peter gave a great lesson in healthy biblical leadership: it is a combination of insight from the word of God and corresponding practical action. Peter's reference to King David refers to the Spirit-led predictions recorded in some of David's psalms, such as Psalm 69:25 and Psalm 109:8.

1:17-19 It is hard to believe that someone who had been with Jesus daily could betray him. Judas had received the same calling and teaching as everyone else. Though chosen to share in the ministry by Christ himself, Judas hardened his heart and joined in the plot with Jesus' enemies to put him to death. Judas remained unrepentant to the end, and he finally committed suicide. Although Jesus predicted this betrayal and bitter end, it was Judas's choice. Those privileged to be close to the truth are not necessarily committed to the truth.

The section set off by parentheses was not part of Peter's speech but rather was an insertion by Luke explaining the suicide of Judas, the resulting spread of the news, and the naming of the place where it happened. Matthew reports that Judas hung himself (Matthew 27:5); here Luke says that he fell. The traditional explanation proposed by Augustine of this seeming contradiction is that both reports are true: when Judas hung himself, the rope or branch broke, Judas fell, and his body burst open.

1:20 The psalms picture the Messiah as the ideal king. Thus, the enemies of King David (addressed in certain psalms where curses are called on God's enemies) are a prototype or foreshadowing of the enemies of the Messiah. Peter applied the meaning in those psalms to the enemies of Jesus, particularly here to Judas. Peter saw Psalm 69:25 as a prediction of Judas's horrible end, the desolate name of the place of his demise. Peter then quoted Psalm 109:8 as the basis of the necessity of choosing someone to replace Judas. Thus Peter's Spirit-led application of David's Spirit-inspired prediction became the basis for the gathered believers' first significant decision—replacing Judas.

1:21-23 The main reason for this process was to make sure that there were twelve apostolic witnesses. They also believed that a twelfth disciple would be necessary to fulfill such promises as Matthew 19:28 and Luke 22:28-30 (the twelve disciples sitting on twelve thrones in the Kingdom government). The church was regarded as a fulfillment of the Old Testament righteous remnant, those faithful to God, and so must assure its rightful place. The Twelve were needed to lead. Because Judas betrayed Christ, he had to be replaced because twelve faithful leaders were needed. James was not replaced after his death (12:2) because he had not defected from the faith. Even after James's death, he still was regarded as one of the Twelve.

Peter pointed out the qualifications of the one who was to be chosen. Notice that it had to be someone who had been with Jesus and the other disciples throughout Jesus' ministry on earth. Such eyewitness involvement was absolutely necessary for the credibility of the person bearing witness to the words and the works of Christ. This one would join the other apostles in being a witness of Jesus' resurrection. What this witness said would be a testimony to the credibility of the life of Christ and the words of Christ. It is clear that, in addition to the twelve disciples, many others had consistently followed Jesus throughout his ministry on earth. The Twelve were his inner circle, but many others shared deep love for and commitment to Jesus. It was now simply a matter of finding the one who would be elevated to the title of apostle. In answer to Peter's request, the eleven apostles nominated two men who met the qualifications of 1:21-22.

1:24-25 As they all prayed for direction in this decision, the apostles reminded themselves of God's omniscience. God knew that Judas would betray Christ and subsequently take his own life. God also knew the hearts of all the people in that room. All these believers needed God to show them which one—either Matthias or Barsabbas—he had already chosen.

1:26 The final phase of this choosing process was that they cast lots. This casting of the lots was not done casually or flippantly, for the apostles had carefully chosen two candidates according to certain qualifications (1:21-22) and then had spent time in prayer (1:24-25). The final process of casting the lots was likely done by writing the two names on two stones and then placing them into a container. The first stone to fall out when the container was tipped would be considered God's choice. Proverbs 16:33 mentions this practice. It is also similar to the use of the Urim and Thummim in the Old Testament (see Leviticus 8:8; 1 Chronicles 26:13; Ezra 2:63; Nehemiah 7:65).

As far as we know, this practice did not continue after Pentecost because the "Guide," the Holy Spirit, had come to indwell the hearts and minds of God's people. Later the elders would select the leaders at the various churches, but not with lots. Christians—then as now—were encouraged to search the Scriptures and to know the will of the Lord (Ephesians 5:17-18; Colossians 1:9; 1 Thessalonians 4:1; 2 Timothy 3:16-17).

Matthias was chosen to be the twelfth apostle. That may seem odd because Paul (who is also called an "apostle") is not mentioned here. Remember that all of this occurred prior to Paul's conversion. Paul's calling was unique. To begin with, he did not meet the qualifications spelled out by Peter. Thus, though Paul was not technically one of the Twelve, he clearly was designated an apostle with authority equal to any of them.

THE HOLY SPIRIT COMES / 2:1-13

In Old Testament times, the Spirit of God came upon isolated individuals or smaller groups, only on special occasions, and only in a temporary way to help them accomplish God's purposes (Exodus 31:3; Judges 14:6; 1 Samuel 16:13). As the apostles were gathered together in Jerusalem for the feast of Pentecost, the time had come for the fulfillment of Christ's promise to send his Spirit completely and permanently upon all believers (Luke 24:49; John 14:16-17, 26; 16:5-15). This marvelous outpouring of God provided the supernatural power for believers to take the life-changing message of the gospel to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). This is the day Christ made good on his promise to send the Helper, the Comforter, the Holy Spirit who would take up permanent residence in those who put their faith in Christ. And what a day it was! God's individualized pouring out of his Spirit into the lives of 120 believers resulted in the effective pouring out of his story, changing the lives of three thousand people in one day!

2:1 The day of Pentecost was an annual feast celebrated on the day after the seventh Sabbath after Passover (Leviticus 23:15-16). Since the date was determined by the passing of a "week" of weeks (seven weeks), it was often called the Festival of Weeks. The word "Pentecost" means "fifty," so named because this festival was celebrated fifty days after Passover. Pentecost was one of three major annual festivals celebrated by the Jews (along with Passover, fifty days earlier, and the Festival of Shelters about four months later). Jesus was crucified at Passover time, and he ascended forty days after his resurrection. The Holy Spirit came fifty days after the Resurrection, ten days after the Ascension.

The believers were the 120 mentioned in 1:15. The one place where they were meeting was likely the same upper room mentioned in 1:13. Most likely the believers were praying, as had been their regular practice during the period since the Ascension (1:14). What happened this day would forever change the world.

2:2 Suddenly, as the believers were gathered, they heard a sound from heaven like the roaring of a mighty windstorm. The wind is a good analogy for the Spirit: it is not seen, though its effects are, and it can be found everywhere in never-ending supply. The sound filled the house where they were meeting. The "house" probably refers to the upper room mentioned in 1:13 where the believers had been meeting and praying.

2:3 To the great sound of wind was added a visual image: what looked like flames or tongues of fire appeared and settled on each of them. Why tongues of fire? It may be that “tongues” symbolized speech and the communication of the gospel. “Fire” symbolizes God’s purifying presence, which burns away the undesirable elements in people’s lives and sets their hearts aflame to ignite the lives of others.

At Pentecost God confirmed the validity of the Holy Spirit’s ministry by sending fire. And while at Mount Sinai fire had come down on one place, at Pentecost fire came down on many believers, symbolizing that God’s presence is available to all who believe in him. This event certainly fulfilled John the Baptist’s words about the Holy Spirit baptizing with fire (Luke 3:16). Peter declared that this event had been prophesied by Joel (Joel 2:28-29). Note, too, that every believer in the room received this blessing; no one was excluded. It was clear to all present that God was at work.

2:4 At this point in this wonderful scene, Luke recorded that everyone present was filled with the Holy Spirit and began speaking in other languages. The “filling” that occurred on Pentecost is called a “baptizing” (1:5 and 11:16) and a “receiving” (10:47). “Baptizing” or “filling” can be used to describe the basic act of receiving the Spirit. It can be understood to refer to the first occurrence of the Spirit indwelling a believer. Acts 1:5 looks forward to this day; Acts 11:15-16 refers back to it. Here, four short verses record it.

In principle, the filling of the Holy Spirit can be distinguished from the term “baptism” of the Spirit. “Baptism” is the theological, objective term referring to the Spirit’s initial work in a believer’s life, beginning the relationship, and—like water baptism—is not a repeated act (Acts 11:15-16; Romans 6:3; 1 Corinthians 12:13; Colossians 2:12). The believer who has taken this initial step of Spirit baptism must, however, continue to take advantage of the Spirit’s active work in his or her life. That phenomenon is described in the New Testament as the Spirit’s filling (see Acts 4:8, 31; 6:3, 5; 7:55; 9:17; 13:9, 52; Galatians 5:16; Ephesians 4:30; 5:18).

At Pentecost (2:1-4) the Holy Spirit was made available to all who believe in Jesus. Believers receive the Holy Spirit (are baptized with him) when they trust in Jesus Christ for salvation. The baptism of the Holy Spirit must be understood in the light of his total work in Christians:

- The Spirit marks the beginning of the Christian experience. No one belongs to Christ without his Spirit (Romans 8:9); no one is united to Christ without his Spirit (1 Corinthians 6:17); no one is adopted as God’s child without his Spirit (Romans 8:14-17; Galatians 4:6-7); no one is in the body of Christ except by baptism in the Spirit (1 Corinthians 12:13).

- The Spirit is the power for the new life. He begins a lifelong process of change as believers become more like Christ (Galatians 3:3; Philippians 1:6). Those who receive Christ by faith begin an immediate personal relationship with God. The Holy Spirit works in them to help them become like Christ.
- The Spirit unites the Christian community in Christ (Ephesians 2:19-22). The Holy Spirit can be experienced by all, and he works through all (1 Corinthians 12:11; Ephesians 4:4).

These people literally spoke in “other languages” (see comments on the following verse)—a miraculous attention-getter for the international crowd gathered in town for the feast. All the nationalities represented recognized their own languages being spoken. Jews believed that spoken prophecy had ceased with Malachi, the last of the writing prophets. They believed that from that point on, God spoke through the Torah as interpreted by scholars and teachers. So this was truly a remarkable day for the church, fulfilling Ezekiel 37:11-14.

The believers could speak in these other languages because the Holy Spirit gave them this ability. This is the clear teaching of the New Testament—that the Holy Spirit sovereignly determines which gift(s) a believer will have (1 Corinthians 12:7, 11). Furthermore, these gifts are meant to be used to build up the body of Christ.

2:5-8 Such an event could not help but attract attention, and a crowd must have quickly gathered. The godly Jews from many nations who were living in Jerusalem at that time were the Jews among the Diaspora (the Greek word for “scattering”), whose families had been driven from Jerusalem and forced to live in other nations but had since returned to Jerusalem to live. These people had been born and raised in other nations, so among them many different languages were spoken. Thus, they were bewildered to hear their own languages being spoken, languages of the lands where they were born! As the international, multilingual crowd gathered, they were astonished to hear their native tongues spoken by these Galileans. At this point, “tongues” was not the ecstatic or heavenly utterance to which Paul referred in 1 Corinthians 12–14; these were languages people understood.

This gathering of the nations was a perfect platform for launching the worldwide mission of the church. This event told the Jerusalem church that God intended the gospel for all the nations in their own languages.

2:9-11 This list includes the many lands from which Jews came to Jerusalem—some living in Palestine and others who had been dispersed throughout the world through captivities and persecutions. The list begins from the east of the Roman Empire and sweeps to the south and west. Very likely, some of the Jews who responded to Peter’s message then returned to their homelands with God’s Good News of salvation (for example, see Acts 8). Through this divine manifestation of languages, therefore, God prepared the way for the spread of the gospel across the world. Throughout the book of Acts, it is clear how often the way was prepared for Paul and other messengers by people who had become believers at Pentecost. The church at Rome, for example, was probably begun by such Jewish believers. The list of countries reads mostly from East to West geographically, but why they are cited and why in this order is not known.

The content of these speeches in each language was the wonderful things God has done. The subject of discussion was not sin, repentance, judgment, not even the gospel, but rather the proclamation of the mighty works of God. This was a sign for unbelieving Israel that the Messiah had come.

2:12-13 These two verses describe a typical response of the crowd, leading up to Peter’s speech. The crowd continued to be amazed (see 2:7), but their amazement led them to be perplexed and to try to figure out what was happening. Some were mocking. Others were speculating that the believers were drunk. Such confusion and the drawing of such wrong conclusions was just the prodding Peter needed to clear things up. There will always be those who misunderstand the working of God, who mock it and call into question its integrity. Christians can either wring their hands and worry or, like Peter, seize the opportunity to tell the watching world about the work of God in their midst.

PETER PREACHES TO A CROWD / 2:14-42

In Luke’s history of the church, there is always a close connection between the activity of God’s Spirit and the proclamation of the gospel. Time and again those who experience the baptism of the Spirit begin immediately speaking with others about God and his Son, Jesus Christ (1:8; 2:4, 17; 4:8, 31; 6:10; 10:44-46; 13:9; 19:6).

2:14 Peter, the early spokesman for the Twelve, seized the opportunity and shouted to the crowd. Peter explained to the people why they should listen to the testimony of the believers: because the Old Testament prophecies had been entirely fulfilled in Jesus (2:14-21), because Jesus is the Messiah (2:25-36), and because the risen Christ could change their lives (2:37-40).

2:15-18 Peter answered the accusation that they were all drunk (2:13) by saying it was too early in the day for that. He then proceeded to tie the event the crowd had just witnessed to the words of the prophet Joel, quoting from Joel 2:28-32. Not everything mentioned in Joel 2:28-32 was occurring that particular morning. The last days include all the days between Christ's first and second comings; it is another way of saying "from now on." Peter was reminding these Jewish listeners that from prophecies like this one recorded by Joel, I will pour out my Spirit upon all people, they should recognize the event they had just witnessed as the work of the Spirit. It would be to all kinds of people—Jews and Gentiles, rich and poor—not just to kings and priests.

The "prophesying" mentioned by Peter is likely not only prediction of the future but also declaration of the nature and will of God. The visions and the dreams were common means that God used to reveal himself to all people. The point was that the insight into these visions and dreams would be the product of the Spirit's work.

At Pentecost the Holy Spirit was released throughout the entire world—to men, women, slave owners, slaves, Jews, and Gentiles. Everyone can receive the Spirit. This was a revolutionary thought for first-century Jews. Pentecost was designed to be a clear indication—to Jew and Gentile alike—that the messianic age had arrived. The Messiah had come!

2:19-20 Not everything mentioned in Joel 2:28-32 was happening that particular morning. This part of Joel's prophecy probably refers to the future period surrounding the second coming of Christ, placing the period of the church age (between Christ's ascension and his return) between verses 18 and 19 (see Revelation 6:12). These events bear more resemblance to the phenomena of the Tribulation period as spelled out by many other Old Testament prophets, as well as Jesus himself (see Matthew 24:14, 21, 29-30 and the judgments of Revelation 8, 9, and 16).

It is possible that Peter was quoting the entire prophecy from Joel—even some of the parts that are still future—in order to avoid being accused of improper use of Scripture (the crowd would certainly know the Joel passage) and to get all the way through Joel's passage to its final sentence, quoted in the next verse.

2:21 This is Peter's punch line. This salvation is available to anyone. Any person who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved. God's special relationship with Israel will continue, but it has been broadened to include everyone who calls on the name of the Lord. God's plans for Israel had their climax in Christ. Access to God—for all people—now comes through Jesus Christ. With these words Peter witnessed to the crowd, as Jesus had predicted (1:8).

It would be a while before these new believers understood that the “anyone” included Gentiles. God had to work in a special way to make Peter understand that the message was meant for the whole world, not just the Jews (see Acts 10).

2:22 The coming of the Messiah, the miracles, and the events described by Joel were all well-established concepts to these people of Israel (the Jews). Now all that remained was for Peter to connect those events to Jesus of Nazareth—the teacher many of them had heard and seen, the teacher who had been crucified. Peter began this sermon by stating that God himself had publicly endorsed Jesus by doing wonderful miracles, wonders, and signs through him. Certainly many of the gathered crowd had seen or heard of the famous ministry of Jesus.

2:23 With little forewarning Peter suddenly accused his Jewish audience of an awful participation in the Messiah’s death. This is a perfect presentation of God’s sovereignty and people’s responsibility—both in the same sentence. God’s prearranged plan was his sovereign will to bring salvation to people through the death and resurrection of Christ. Though God’s will is sovereign, he works through people and events of history (see 4:28). Even putting Jesus to death fulfilled God’s plan. God’s prearranged plan led to Christ’s death, but people were culpable. The lawless Gentiles (the Romans) had been involved, but they had been merely “helping.” Ultimately, the Jews had been responsible. Whether or not anyone in this audience had literally participated in the trials, accusations, and crucifixion (many in the crowd could have been involved) was not important. Peter was saying that they were at least culpable because, as Jews, they had missed their Messiah and had allowed their leaders to kill him. Thus, they were guilty by their relationship to the actual murderers. Peter was pointing his finger at the crowd and shouting, “You nailed him to the cross and murdered him.”

2:24 But the murdered Messiah had not stayed dead. God raised him back to life again, and many people could testify to having seen the risen Christ. This was a powerful statement because many of the people listening to Peter’s words had been in Jerusalem fifty days earlier at Passover and may have seen or heard about the crucifixion of this “great teacher.” Jesus’ resurrection was the ultimate sign that what he said about himself was true. Without the Resurrection, no one would have any reason to believe in Jesus (1 Corinthians 15:14). Peter phrased it appropriately: death could not keep him in its grip.

2:25-28 Peter continued his witness to Jesus' Messiahship by quoting from Psalm 16:8-11, written by King David. He explained that David was not writing about himself because David had died and was buried (2:29); his audience would have walked right past his tomb many times in their pilgrimages to Jerusalem. This quote from Psalm 16 and the one from Psalm 110:1 (2:34-35) were both prophesying Jesus' resurrection (2:24). The emphasis is that Jesus' body had not been left to rot in the grave, but had been, in fact, resurrected and glorified. Peter wanted his audience to realize that David was not speaking of himself in these psalms but rather of the Messiah.

2:29-31 The Old Testament spoke of the resurrection of the Messiah—and this was very important for Peter's Jewish listeners to understand. Peter argued that the words of this psalm could not have been referring to David himself, for David died and was buried. The reference to his tomb may have been a site on the south side of Jerusalem, near the pool of Siloam.

If David was not speaking of himself, then he was speaking as a prophet; he was writing about one who would be resurrected from the dead. The oath looks back at Psalm 132:11 and 2 Samuel 7:15-16, recording the promises God made to David that one of his descendants would sit on David's throne as the Messiah. David did have children who ruled, but this promise was for someone to be on the throne for eternity. The Jewish listeners of Peter's day understood the words of this psalm, as well as others, as referring to the Messiah.

2:32 Having begun by tying these Old Testament references to Jesus of Nazareth, here Peter again made it clear that David's prophecy was speaking of Jesus. The resurrection of Christ had taken place less than two months previously. The post-Resurrection appearances and instruction sessions of the forty days prior to Christ's ascension must have caused a stir around the city. Peter pointed out that he and the others with him—who had just experienced this Spirit's coming—had been witnesses to the predicted resurrection of Christ.

2:33 Peter had one more major point to make: this crucified one, the resurrected one, is now the exalted one, who occupies the throne of highest honor in heaven, at God's right hand (see 5:30-31; Ephesians 1:20; Colossians 3:1; Hebrews 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Peter 3:22). Not only is Christ the predicted one in the Psalms, not only had he risen from the grave, but he now sits in the most authoritative, sovereign position in the universe. That is why Jesus had the authority to pour out the Spirit with results that the audience could see and hear.

2:34-35 In Psalm 110:1, again David was not speaking of himself but of Christ. This verse is the most frequently quoted Old Testament passage in the New Testament (thirteen times) and was the primary text used to explain the exaltation of Christ. The Jews believed that this psalm referred to their coming Messiah. All three synoptic gospels—Matthew 22:41-46; Mark 12:35-37; Luke 20:41-44—report that Jesus applied this verse to himself as the one having the highest authority because he would be instructed to sit in honor at God's right hand. The victory belongs to Christ and not to any created being. The greatest archangels stand before God (Luke 1:19; Revelation 8:2), but none are allowed to sit, for sitting next to God would indicate equality. Jesus' sitting also indicates the completion of his task, the successful accomplishment of his mission. God promised to make Jesus' enemies a footstool. This pictures Christ as completely victorious over his enemies.

2:36 Peter concluded his message with a solid review of his main point: So let it be clearly known by everyone in Israel that Jesus was both Lord and Messiah. In the prophesied plan of God, this Jesus of Nazareth had been crucified by the Jews, raised from the dead, and exalted to the throne of God.

2:37 That these people were convicted deeply speaks of genuine pain. It means to “strike, prick violently, sting sharply, stun.” The crowd was stunned! They asked the question that warms the heart of any messenger of the gospel: “What should we do?” Peter was ready with the answer.

2:38 In answer to the people's question, Peter presented a fourfold challenge:

1. Turn from your sins—In other words, “repent.” It is a basic and wholehearted change of mind that results in a change of purpose, direction, and values. The words, each of you, remind the listener (and modern reader) that this message is for all. Everyone needs to make a decision about Christ. His offer is the only effective solution for the sin problem that plagues every descendant of Adam.
2. Turn to God—In addition to turning from sin, people must turn to God. It does no good to turn from sin without turning then to the one who can solve the sin problem.
3. Be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins—For believers, baptism is visible proof of repentance and commitment to follow Jesus, the Messiah. The idea of baptism for the forgiveness of sins does not mean that baptism results in forgiveness of sins but rather that forgiveness of sins as a result of accepting Jesus as Savior should result in a baptism—an outward display of an inner conviction. Repentance, not baptism, is what brings forgiveness.

4. Receive the gift of the Holy Spirit—Only through the coming of the Holy Spirit into believers' hearts can they truly experience forgiveness of sin. The “gift of the Holy Spirit” (not multiple or varied gifts but rather a singular gift) is the Spirit himself. The Holy Spirit is a gift from God. As Jesus had promised, he is the Comforter and the one who guides his people.

2:39-40 The truths presented in the previous verses here find their universal application. This promise of the work of the Spirit in the life of the believer has a personal application (to you), a generational application (to your children), and a global application (even to the Gentiles). Luke recorded no more of Peter's words to the gathered crowd except to say that Peter kept talking for a long time, warning and pleading with the people to be saved.

2:41 What a response! Three thousand people believed and took the step of faith in Christ and were baptized—they took that first step of obedience, publicly identifying themselves with Christ. And they were added to the church; that is, they immediately joined the fellowship of believers.

2:42 This first report of the newborn church describes early church worship in the first decade of the church. The three thousand new believers joined with the other believers. That is, they gathered with others of like mind and faith. Devoted themselves implies that they were regularly, continually persisting in the activities that follow. These activities form a practical map for not only the day-old church but for any church of any age.

The apostles' teaching was central to the content of what was to be studied. The apostles, the eyewitnesses of all Jesus had done, would be the ones whom the Holy Spirit would remind of the crucial truths by which the church would be directed for centuries to come (John 14:17, 25-26; 16:13). From the beginning the early church was devoted to hearing, studying, and learning what the apostles had to teach.

The fellowship (koinonia) means association and close relationships. This was more than just getting together, certainly more than just a religious meeting. It involved sharing goods, having meals together, and praying together.

Sharing in the Lord's Supper refers to communion services that were celebrated in remembrance of Jesus and patterned after the Last Supper, which Jesus had eaten with his disciples before his death (Matthew 26:26-29). It likely included a regular meal shared together (Acts 2:46; 20:7; 1 Corinthians 10:16; 11:23-25; Jude 1:12).

Prayer is joined with the expression “sharing in the Lord’s Supper” to explain the word “fellowship.” These are at least two of the activities that were part of their regular meetings. Prayer has always been a mark of the believers’ gatherings.

THE BELIEVERS MEET TOGETHER / 2:43-47

Books about church planting, church health, and church growth are popular. Seminars about the church abound, with pastors and church boards eager to copy the techniques of a successful pastor or a fast-growing congregation. The following paragraph is a snapshot of the church a few days old. At Pentecost, after the coming of the Holy Spirit, the gathering of 120 exploded! In one day three thousand people came to faith in Christ. Now what do they do? This handful of verses provides a concise summary of what the early church was about; it provides a model that can be applied to the modern church, as well.

2:43 The word awe is the Greek word phobos, literally translated “fear.” This awe was partly caused by the many miraculous signs and wonders performed by the apostles. The “wonders” (terata) were fabulous miracles that evoked awe in those who saw them. The “miraculous signs” (semeia) were given to authenticate the message and the messenger, pointing observers toward a divine source of the miracle or a divine truth. Here these signs and wonders authenticated the apostles’ message, identifying it as divine truth.

2:44-45 Of the thousands of Jews who had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem for Pentecost, many may have come as early as Passover (fifty days earlier). Now they were extending their stay in Jerusalem even longer to learn the basics of this newfound Christian faith. Many would likely need financial or physical help from those who lived in Jerusalem to be able to remain this long. When a need arose, believers would sell their possessions to help those in need. This practice of sharing everything they had was likely a response to that specific need.

2:46-47 With these words this marvelous chapter comes to a close. Luke pointed out the everyday nature of the church’s meetings. Believers were gathering both at the Temple (that is, in large groups, possibly for apostolic teaching) and in homes to celebrate the Lord’s Supper and, presumably, for fellowship, the sharing of needs, and prayer.

A common misconception about the first Christians (who were Jews) was that they rejected the Jewish religion. But these believers saw Jesus' message and resurrection as the fulfillment of everything they knew and believed from the Old Testament. At first the Jewish believers did not separate from the rest of the Jewish community. They still went to the Temple and synagogues for worship and instruction in the Scriptures. But their belief in Jesus created great friction with Jews who didn't believe that Jesus was the Messiah. Thus, believing Jews were forced to meet in private homes for communion, prayer, and teaching about Christ. By the end of the first century, many of these Jewish believers were excommunicated from their synagogues.

We also see here one of the repeated themes of the book of Acts: joy. The early church was marked by joy. Two final statements reveal two significant results of the presence of this regularly meeting, money-sharing, miracle-working, Bible-studying, God-praising group:

1. The watching community was favorably impressed (the believers were enjoying the goodwill of all the people).
2. The watching community was coming to faith (and each day the Lord added to their group those who were being saved).

These are two measurable results of any church that is living like the early church. Note, too, that the credit for the salvation of souls is not given to Peter's preaching, the apostles' miracles, or the Spirit's manifestations—it was the Lord who was adding to their number daily.

PETER HEALS A CRIPPLED BEGGAR / 3:1-11

Commissioned by Christ to preach the Good News to all the earth (Matthew 28:18-20), the apostles had his authority. Miracles such as healing the sick (9:34; 19:11-12; 28:8), liberating the demon possessed (5:16; 8:7), even raising the dead (9:36-42; 20:7-12) highlighted their ministries. These supernatural signs authenticated the message being preached and drew people to the Savior. The first eleven verses record a miracle. Peter's ensuing sermon explains the point of the miracle, particularly for the Jewish audience who witnessed it.

3:1 The Jews observed three times of prayer—morning (9:00 A.M.), afternoon (3:00 P.M.), and evening (sunset). At these times devout Jews and Gentiles who believed in God often would go to the Temple to pray. Peter and John were going to the Temple for the three o'clock prayer service. Note that Peter and John were still living, for the most part, as obedient Jews, keeping the appointed times of prayer, though they now had a significantly different mission.

3:2-3 Beggars would often wait in places where they would have the most traffic—such as along the roads near cities or, as here, at the entrance to the Temple. The Beautiful Gate was one of the favored entrances into the Temple complex, and many people passed through it on their way to worship. Since giving money to beggars was considered praiseworthy in the Jewish religion, the lame man wisely had himself placed where he could catch the almsgivers headed both to and from religious gatherings. As Peter and John entered the Temple area, the lame man called out to them and asked them for some money.

3:4-6 Peter demanded the man's attention, and the beggar gave it, obviously expecting a gift. What was offered, however, was not money, but rather something far more valuable. Peter commanded the beggar to get up and walk. Note that the command was not by Peter's authority but rather in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, calling on Christ's power and authority. The apostles were doing this healing through the Holy Spirit's power given to them by Christ, not their own (see Luke 10:17).

3:7-8 To encourage the lame man to begin walking, Peter reached for him to help him up. The terms that follow here reflect Luke's medical orientation—the man's feet and anklebones, which to this point had never been able to support the man, were healed and strengthened. Not only could he stand, but he also immediately tried out his new legs at full throttle, moving quickly from standing, to beginning to walk, to ultimately leaping. In the midst of his excitement and this obviously emotional moment, he praised God, who had given him a new lease on life.

3:9-10 This must have been some scene. The beggar, known for years for his crippled condition danced into the Temple area with words of praise to God. There could be no doubt about who he was or about what had happened. Nor could there be any doubt about whom the beggar thought should get the credit for the miracle. The people, quite appropriately, were absolutely astounded.

3:11 The scene broadened as the beggar, almost like a young child, was pictured clinging to Peter and John. Even more people came running to Solomon's Colonnade, a covered porch or entrance with columns that stood just east of the outer court of the Temple. The reference to this site would remind the Jews of the golden days of Israel's history, making the healing here all the more poignant.

For the Jewish observers and readers, the sign here was too spectacular to overlook. Isaiah had written of such a time: "The lame will leap like a deer, and those who cannot speak will shout and sing!" (Isaiah 35:6).

PETER PREACHES IN THE TEMPLE / 3:12-26

A good sermon introduction is supposed to capture attention, raise a need, and orient listeners to the subject at hand. Peter and John's healing of the lame man in the Temple courts did all those in a powerful way. It drew a huge crowd of awed spectators. It prompted these onlookers to want to know how such a miracle was possible. It gave the apostles an open door to declare plainly that Jesus, crucified and resurrected, was the long-awaited Messiah who fulfilled all the predictions of the prophets.

3:12-13 Peter took advantage of a gathered, attentive crowd, and he addressed them by making it clear that this miracle was not the product of his personal power or godliness. Rather, this miracle had been performed by God himself, for a very explicit purpose. Peter wanted to make it clear to this Jewish crowd that this miracle was the handiwork of the very God they claimed to follow, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, the God of all our ancestors. The miracle also had purpose: to bring glory to his servant Jesus. God the Father was exalting the Son through this miracle. The term "servant" called to mind the Servant of Yahweh in Isaiah 42:1; 49:6-7; 52:13; 53:11. Peter wanted Jesus identified with the Servant-Messiah of the Old Testament. Then, as his audience was thinking about this connection, he pressed home the brutal truth—Peter told them point-blank that they were responsible for Jesus’ death.

The Roman leader, Pilate, had decided to release Jesus, but the Jews had rejected Pilate’s offer and had clamored to have Barabbas, a murderer, released instead (see Luke 23:13-25). When Peter said, Jesus whom you handed over, he meant it literally. Jesus’ trial and death had occurred right there in Jerusalem only weeks earlier. All Jews were there (and thus guilty) through their representative leadership.

3:14-15 Note the number of times in the balance of the sermon Peter used the words “you” or “your.” This was a pointed condemnation of those who stood before him: You handed over. . . . You rejected. . . . You killed. Peter called Jesus the holy and righteous one. This clearly identified Jesus’ equality with God. But the Jews had rejected him. The horrendous nature of their deed was made all the worse by the contrasting character of the murderer (Barabbas) whose release they had demanded. Not only had the Jews rejected him, but they had killed him. With a ring of irony, Peter stated that they had killed the author of life, the one who had written the book on life, the Creator (John 1:1-4; Colossians 1:16).

The sense of outrage here is heightened by the use of three strong contrasts in three straight verses: (1) 3:13—the Jews had delivered Jesus to be killed, though Pilate had decided to free him; (2) 3:14—they had rejected Jesus, and requested the release of a murderer; (3) 3:15—they had killed Jesus, though God raised him from the dead. The one the Jews had killed was presently alive, raised by God himself! Peter and hundreds of others were witnesses of that (see 1 Corinthians 15:5-8).

3:16 Peter referred to the miracle that had gotten everyone’s attention. As before, he took no credit for himself or his companions but, instead, credited the name of Jesus with the healing. As in his earlier use of the “name,” Peter was referring to the full identity of Jesus. Jesus was the Healer.

3:17-18 The concluding ten verses record Peter’s plea to his audience to make a change. He acknowledged that their actions were done in ignorance, as were the actions of their leaders (see also 17:30; Ephesians 4:18; 1 Peter 1:14).

That God was fulfilling what all the prophets had declared probably refers to such prophecies as Psalm 22, Isaiah 50:6, and Isaiah 53:1-12. The Jews had not expected a suffering Messiah; instead, they had anticipated a great ruler, a conquering king. When he arrived as a lowly carpenter and then died a criminal's death, they missed it. But Peter explained that it wasn't too late. They may have acted in ignorance, but now they could understand that Jesus was exactly what the Messiah had been prophesied to be.

3:19 They had rejected, despised, and killed Jesus, but they could still turn from their sins, turn to God, and be cleansed. They could change their minds about Jesus. The words "turn from your sins" are the standard Greek term (metanoeo) for repentance. The verb means to turn away from a former way of life and toward a new way of life. The term "cleansed" (exaleipthenai) is often used in Greek as a figure of speech, meaning to erase, especially of writing.

3:20-21 The "turning" of 3:19 promises two results: (1) the coming of wonderful times of refreshment, and (2) the return of Jesus your Messiah to you again. In other words, the repentance of Peter's audience would have a part in bringing in the marvelous events of the end times. This final restoration likely refers to the final era of salvation—the Second Coming, the promised coming Kingdom of God, the Last Judgment, and the removal of sin from the world.

3:22-23 This quote from Moses in Deuteronomy 18:15 refers to Christ. The Messiah would come with deliverance, just as Moses had. Most Jews thought that Joshua was this prophet predicted by Moses. Peter explained that the Prophet who would be from among the Jews was Jesus Christ. Jesus had fulfilled this prophecy, for he was their long-awaited Messiah! Moses had warned the people that they should listen carefully to everything he would tell them. Those who refused to listen would be cut off from the true people of God—the believers.

3:24 The prophet Samuel lived during the transition between the judges and the kings of Israel, and he was the first in a succession of prophets. Samuel had anointed David as king and had spoken clearly of the establishment of David's kingdom (1 Samuel 13:14; 15:28; 16:13; 28:17; see also 2 Samuel 7:12-16). Peter wanted his audience to come to understand that from the inception of the prophetic office—down through the whole order of the prophets—every prophet had spoken of what was happening right then.

3:25 The Jews to whom Peter was speaking were the children of those prophets. God had promised Abraham that he would bless the world through Abraham's descendants, the Jewish race (Genesis 12:3), from which the Messiah would come. They were included in the covenant, for God intended the Jewish nation to be a separate and holy nation that would teach the world about God, introduce the Messiah, and then carry on his work in the world. Through them, because of the Messiah coming from them, all the families on earth would be blessed. Israel had been given the promise of one who would come from the line of Abraham and sit forever on David's throne.

3:26 The message of salvation came first to the people of Israel, the descendants of Abraham, Moses, Samuel, and the prophets. They—of all people—should have known the prophecies and recognized him when he came. They were to have been the prime beneficiaries of the blessings of the covenant.

Notice that the primary nature of the blessing was to turn them back from their sinful ways. Christ's work, at its core, is to turn lives around, taking individuals on sinful paths and turning them from those paths to the path of blessing. Israel had every reason to turn to Jesus—history, heritage, bloodline, centuries of warning from prophetic messengers. And they had not recognized him.

PETER AND JOHN BEFORE THE COUNCIL / 4:1-22

Evidently a large crowd had gathered at Solomon's Colonnade (3:11) where Peter began to preach. While Acts is a record of powerful sermons, astounding miracles, and the rapid spread of the Christian church throughout the world, it is also a reminder of the truth of spiritual warfare. Whenever believers are seeking to impact their culture, whenever the gospel is preached in power, wherever the church is growing and making inroads, the enemy stirs up fierce opposition.

4:1 This crowd in the Temple drew the attention of the religious leaders, who came over to see what was going on. The leading priests were mostly Sadducees. The Sadducees were members of a small but powerful Jewish religious sect that did not believe in the resurrection of the dead. They were the religious leaders who stressed cooperation with the Roman Empire. They also rejected the idea of a coming Messiah, believing that he was an ideal, not a person who would intervene in history.

The captain of the Temple guard was also a high-ranking Sadducee. He was the leader of the guards who ensured order in and around the Temple. The captain was considered second in authority only to the high priest himself. The Temple guard had arrested Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane (see Luke 22:52-54).

4:2 Imagine these Sadducees, who did not believe in the resurrection of the dead, listening to Peter claiming, right there in the Temple, the resurrection of the dead. No wonder they were very disturbed. Peter and John were refuting one of the Sadducees' fundamental beliefs and thus threatening their authority as religious teachers. The religious leaders had thought this uprising would be finished with the death of its leader, so it disturbed them to find Jesus' followers teaching the people in the Temple.

4:3 Even though Israel was under Roman rule, the Sadducees had almost unlimited power over the Temple grounds. Thus, they were able to arrest Peter and John for no reason other than teaching something that contradicted their beliefs. Assuming that the healing of the crippled man occurred as Peter and John made their way to the 3:00 P.M. prayer time (3:1) and that Peter's sermon to the gathered masses followed this miracle, it would have been too late in the day (already evening) to gather the necessary religious leaders to hold an official inquiry.

4:4 The Jewish religious leaders were able to arrest (at least for one night) Christ's messengers; they could not, however, stop the spread of Christ's message. The miraculous healing of the crippled man in such a visible place, combined with the powerful preaching of the apostles, sent spiritual shock waves through Jerusalem. This brought the total number of believers to about five thousand men, not counting women and children. God was mightily using Peter, for at his first sermon, three thousand people had become believers (2:41)! Estimates of Jerusalem's population at this time range from twenty-five thousand to eighty-five thousand. Josephus recorded that there were a total of six thousand Pharisees in Palestine. Thus, a total of five thousand Jewish Christian men (not counting women and children) was a very high percentage of the population!

4:5 The rulers, elders, and teachers of religious law made up the Jewish council—the same council that had condemned Jesus to death (Luke 22:66). This council acted as the ruling government of Israel. They handled the local problems and religious questions but had to work under Rome's supervision. For crimes that carried capital punishment, they had to obtain Rome's approval. For instance, the council had condemned Jesus to death, but it could not carry out the sentence; the Roman leader in the area alone had the authority to order an execution. That is why the religious leaders had taken Jesus to Pilate, the Roman leader in the Jerusalem area (Luke 23:1).

The council had seventy members plus the current high priest, who presided over the group. The Sadducees held a majority in this ruling group. These were the wealthy, intellectual, and powerful men of Jerusalem. Jesus' followers stood before this council, just as he had.

4:6 Annas had been deposed as high priest by the Romans, who then had appointed Caiaphas, Annas's son-in-law, in his place. But because the Jews considered the office of high priest a lifetime position, they still called Annas by that title and gave him respect and authority within the council. John, Alexander, and other relatives of the high priest were also there, supporting the power base of the high priest's office. Annas and Caiaphas had played significant roles in Jesus' trial (John 18:24, 28). It did not please them that the man whom they thought they had sacrificed for the good of the nation (John 11:49-51) had followers who were just as persistent and who promised to be just as troublesome as he had been.

4:7 The council asked Peter and John by what power, or in whose name, they had healed the man (see 3:6-7). “In whose name” refers to exorcism practices. They wanted to know what formula Peter and John had used. Their concern was more about the apostles’ teaching, but they began their questioning with the miracle, for the healed man was there as well (4:14). The actions and words of Peter and John threatened these religious leaders who, for the most part, were more interested in their reputations and positions than in the glory of God.

4:8-10 Peter, the rough ex-fisherman, stood before a room of disapproving, scowling faces and, filled with the Holy Spirit, began to speak. There are two kinds of courage: reckless courage that is unaware of the dangers it faces, and the courage that knows the peril and yet is undaunted. Peter’s boldness is of the latter variety as he clearly stated in whose name they had healed and how they could do so.

4:11 Peter quoted a familiar Old Testament passage—Psalm 118:22—and gave it new meaning. Most Jews regarded their nation, Israel, as the stone chosen by God but rejected by the nations. Jesus had referred to himself as the stone that the builders rejected. The cornerstone was the most important stone in a building, used as the standard to make sure that the other stones of the building were straight and level. Israel’s leadership, like the builders looking for an appropriate cornerstone, would toss Jesus aside because he didn’t seem to have the right qualifications. They wanted a political king, not a spiritual one. Peter made it clear that you builders were the Jewish religious leaders.

Yet God’s plans will not be thwarted. One day the rejected stone will become the cornerstone, for Jesus will come as King to inaugurate an unending Kingdom. He already had begun a spiritual Kingdom as the cornerstone of a brand-new “building,” the Christian church (see also 1 Peter 2:7). Jesus’ life, teachings, death, and resurrection would be the church’s foundation.

4:12 The resurrected Jesus had healed the crippled man physically. That same Jesus, the long-awaited Messiah, can heal all people spiritually. Salvation does not come from being a descendant of Abraham (Luke 3:8) or by following the law of Moses (John 6:32-33). The clear gospel teaching is that there is salvation in no one else but Jesus (John 14:6; 1 Timothy 2:5).

4:13 Peter and John, fishermen by trade, had never received formal theological or rhetorical training in the rabbinical schools; they were ordinary men who had had no special training. Yet they were bold, composed, confident, and undaunted in their defense. As the apostles stood there with the healed cripple, speaking with authority, the members of the council recognized them as men who had been with Jesus. Their boldness was possible only because they were filled with the Holy Spirit (4:8; cf. 4:29, 31; 9:27-28; 13:46; 14:3; 18:26; 19:8; 26:26; 28:31).

4:14-15 In the same way that the words and works of Jesus had often left the Jewish leaders speechless (Mark 12:34), the council had nothing to say in the face of this supernatural healing and preaching. The council chamber was cleared so that the leaders could decide on a course of action. How Luke knew what went on in this closed discussion has been debated. Possibly a sympathizer among the council “leaked” the information. Perhaps Gamaliel, a member of the council, told his student Paul, who later told Luke (5:34; 22:3).

4:16-17 The council was in a quandary. The apostles had performed an undeniable, widely publicized miraculous sign. The masses were gravitating toward this new sect. How could the religious leaders save face (in light of the obviously healed man), discourage further teaching and healing in the name of Jesus, and preserve the status quo? Their solution was to order the apostles not to speak to anyone in Jesus’ name again. It seems as though they thought that their power and position could convince these men to be silent.

4:18 Because Peter and John had not broken any laws and were enjoying popular support among the people, the Jewish council’s best attempt at damage control was to summon the apostles and try to scare them into silence with vague warnings. They were told never again to speak or teach about Jesus. Jewish law specified that at the first instance of wrong or illegal action, the guilty were to be warned and released. The second time they did wrong, they were to be beaten with rods (5:28, 40). With this official order, the council would have legal grounds to impose more punishment in the future should the apostles choose to disobey.

4:19-20 Commanded by Christ to be witnesses (1:8) and utterly convinced of the truth of the gospel, Peter and John announced their rejection of any such ban on speaking in the name of Jesus. In effect, the apostles’ response accused the council of being at odds with the will of God. The apostles already knew the answer, so they asked the council members to judge for themselves whether they should obey the council’s orders or God’s. This principle of obeying God rather than people is a major Christian ethical principle (see commentary at 5:29).

These men had indeed “been with Jesus” (4:13), and he had completely transformed their lives. They had lived with him; they had witnessed his resurrection; they had experienced the filling of the Holy Spirit. And so they said, “We cannot stop telling about the wonderful things we have seen and heard.” To have obeyed the council’s command would have been to disobey God.

4:21-22 Stunned by the courage of Peter and John and fearful of their popularity among the masses, the religious leaders could do nothing more than threaten them and let them go. One would think that these leaders would be thrilled that the people were praising God. But that was not the case. Luke’s comment heightens the significance of the miracle—the man had been healed of a forty-year condition.

THE BELIEVERS PRAY FOR COURAGE / 4:23-31

After being sternly threatened by the same group of men who had orchestrated the crucifixion of Jesus only six weeks earlier, the followers of Jesus gathered and prayed. Their prayers weren’t for an end to persecution or for easy times. Rather, the believers asked God for the boldness necessary to continue proclaiming the good news about Jesus. God gave them what every church needs: a reminder of his power and a fresh outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

4:23-24 Upon their release, the apostles found the other believers and shared with them the details of their experience. In the face of this recent persecution, the believers spontaneously joined in prayer to acknowledge God’s sovereign control (see Psalm 146:6; Isaiah 37:16). This appeal to the God of creation shows that God, who had power to create the universe, will have power over their enemies. Everything in heaven and earth is subject to God and his will.

4:25-26 The group’s prayer cited Psalm 2, a messianic hymn written by King David. Psalm 2 describes the rebellion of the nations and the coming of Christ to establish his eternal reign. David may have written these words during a conspiracy against Israel by leaders of some of the surrounding nations. Chosen and anointed by God, David knew that God would fulfill his promise to bring the Messiah into the world through his bloodline (2 Samuel 7:16; 1 Chronicles 17:11-12). This psalm is also cited in other places in the New Testament (see 13:33; Hebrews 1:5-6; 5:5; Revelation 2:26-27; 12:5; 19:15) because of its prophetic description of Jesus, the Messiah. The believers saw the Jewish leaders’ opposition to Jesus (and to them, his appointed representatives) as fulfilling this ancient prophecy.

4:27 In fulfillment of the prophecy in Psalm 2, kings and rulers had gathered against the Messiah. Herod Antipas ruled over the territory of Galilee. Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor over Judea who had bowed to pressure from the mob of Gentiles and the people of Israel in Jerusalem. All of these had conspired against Jesus, God's anointed.

4:28 While it seemed that Satan had gotten the upper hand when the Son of God was crucified on the cross, in reality everything occurred according to God's eternal will and plan. The believers declared that God is the sovereign Lord of all events; he rules history to fulfill his purpose. What his will determines, his power carries out. No army, government, or council can stand in God's way.

4:29-30 The apostles prayed not for divine vengeance but that God would hear the threats that had been leveled against them. The believers did not pray that God would remove the threats, take away the possibility of persecution, or even protect them. Instead, they prayed that God would give the believers, his servants, great boldness in their preaching. They also asked for displays of power to confirm their message. These believers were not afraid to ask God for great power and wonders in order that his name would be glorified.

4:31 God's answer of the apostles' prayer was both swift and powerful. When the building shook, the believers realized that God had not only heard their prayer, but he also was pleased with it. The believers received a fresh filling with the Holy Spirit, which renewed their courage to go out and preach God's message with boldness, just as they had requested (4:29).

THE BELIEVERS SHARE THEIR POSSESSIONS / 4:32-37

The final verses of chapter 4 provide a glimpse into the inner workings of the early church. The first-century Christians enjoyed a sense of closeness and unity that caused the world to sit up and take notice. It's one thing to talk of loving others; it's quite another to sell one's valuable possessions and give the proceeds to those less fortunate. Yet that kind of generosity was common in the early church. And that kind of selflessness is the essence of true fellowship.

4:32 In summarizing the daily activities of the early church, Luke noted the believers' unselfishness. Surely the church's spiritual unity (all the believers were of one heart and mind) prompted this material generosity. No one was required to contribute to the needs of others; this “communal purse” was voluntary. Yet the believers willingly shared everything they had, not holding tightly to possessions.

Differences of opinion are inevitable among human personalities and can actually be helpful if handled well. But spiritual unity is essential—loyalty, commitment, and love for God and his word. Without spiritual unity, the church could not survive. The early church was able to share possessions and property as a result of the unity brought by the Holy Spirit working in and through the believers’ lives. This way of living is different from communism because the sharing was voluntary, didn’t involve all private property but only as much as was needed, and was not a membership requirement in order to be a part of the church. The spiritual unity and generosity of these early believers attracted others to them. This organizational structure is not a biblical command, but it offers vital principles for us to follow.

4:33 Ignoring the threats of the council (4:18), the apostles gave powerful witness. God worked powerfully among them (see 6:8) to empower their witness and to meet their material needs. Jesus had told his disciples, “Your love for one another will prove to the world that you are my disciples” (John 13:35). As the outside world saw the believers’ generosity with one another, their care for the needy, and their powerful witness, they were drawn to the Lord Jesus.

4:34-35 So widespread was the generosity of the Jerusalem believers that there was no poverty among them. Lavish gifts from the sale of land or houses were brought to the apostles for distribution to others in need. Such gifts were exceptional expressions of social concern for those in need. These good times, however, would not last. A famine (see the prophecy of Agabus in 11:28) would eventually result in the Jerusalem church becoming dependent on the gifts of believers in Asia (see Romans 15:25-28; Galatians 2:10).

4:36-37 Barnabas (Joseph) is introduced here because he gave money from the sale of a field to the apostles to give to those in need. Barnabas would prove to be a respected and important leader in the life of the early church. He was a Levite by birth (a member of the Jewish tribe that carried out Temple duties) but a resident of Cyprus. This may explain why he was a landowner (Levites were forbidden to own land in Israel—see Numbers 18:20-24 and Deuteronomy 10:9; 18:1-2). Barnabas would later travel with Paul on Paul’s first missionary journey (13:4). John Mark (author of the Gospel of Mark) was his cousin. “Barnabas” means Son of Encouragement, and it would prove, over and over, to be most appropriate.

ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA / 5:1-11

Acts 5:1–8:3 tells of internal and external problems facing the early church. Inside, there were dishonesty (5:1-11) and administrative headaches (6:1-7); outside, the church was being pressured by persecution. Ananias and Sapphira, a married couple in the Jerusalem church, concocted a plan whereby they hoped to give a little to God but get credit for a lot. Their scheme was dishonest, and God's judgment was swift and severe. As you ponder their story, ask yourself the question, What are my motives for serving and giving?

5:1-2 The word also ties back to 4:36-37, where Barnabas was introduced as a man who had generously given to those in need. At the inception of the church, the practice of selling one's possessions in order to give money to those in need showed the believers' willingness to help other believers. Not everyone was liquidating everything, nor was there pressure to do so (Mary, John's mother, still owned her home—12:12). This was a freewill offering, and it appears to have been practiced only here in the early Palestine church.

It seems that the positive response of the church to gifts from people like Barnabas became a source of envy for Ananias and Sapphira. They also sold some property. They could have given any amount of the selling price, but because they apparently desired the esteem that Barnabas had received, they pretended to give the full amount they had received for the field. Instead, however, they kept back part of the money.

5:3-4 Given insight by the Holy Spirit, Peter saw through Ananias's lie. Apparently involved in the new church, Ananias and Sapphira had succumbed to temptation and allowed Satan into their hearts. Their sin was lying to God and God's people—saying they gave the whole amount but holding back some for themselves and trying to make themselves appear more generous than they really were. This act was judged severely because dishonesty, greed, and covetousness are destructive in a church. All lying is bad, but when people lie to try to deceive God and other believers about their relationship with him, they destroy their testimony.

5:5-6 When Ananias realized that Peter knew all about his scheme, he fell to the floor and died. The Greek word ekpsucho literally means "to breathe one's last, to die" and usually connotes death by divine judgment (see 5:10; 12:23;

1 Corinthians 10:6; 1 John 5:16). Peter didn't kill Ananias, nor did he ask the Holy Spirit to kill him. Peter condemned the lying, and the Spirit of God executed judgment.

5:7-8 Sapphira showed up about three hours later. She didn't know what had happened to her husband. Peter's questions to Sapphira exposed her complicity in the deed. Peter gave her the opportunity to tell the truth, but she told the same lie that her husband had told. In so doing she revealed a hardness of heart that had not been touched by the grace of God.

5:9 To test God is to see how much one can get away with before God will respond or act according to his word (see Exodus 17:2; Deuteronomy 6:16; Matthew 4:7; Luke 4:12 for further passages on testing God). The entire direction of this lie by Ananias and Sapphira was wrongheaded, self-serving, church-destroying, and sinful. Ananias and Sapphira had conspired together to mock God, to lie and think they could get away with it as if God would not know. They had tried to test the Spirit of the Lord, referring to the Holy Spirit in the body of believers—specifically the apostles before whom this lie was told (John 16:8).

5:10 Like her husband, Sapphira fell to the floor and died. As she and Ananias had been joined in their “testing” of God (5:9), so they were joined in death. This is more than just a historical record of events in the early church. This serves as a warning that no one should trifle with the Holy Spirit or take lightly the importance of telling the truth.

5:11 This is the first appearance of the term church (ekklesia, meaning “assembly”) in the book of Acts. It will become the regular word for the universal church and the local church in the remainder of the book (7:38; 8:1; 9:31; 11:22; 13:1; 14:23; 15:22, 41; 16:5; 20:28). God's judgment on Ananias and Sapphira produced great fear among the believers, making them realize how seriously God regards sin in the church.

THE APOSTLES HEAL MANY / 5:12-16

Even as word spread of the sudden deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, the apostles continued to preach boldly about Jesus right in the Temple courts. Large crowds continued to gather. Miraculous healings and exorcisms gave credence to the message. Because of the power of God and the faithfulness of his people, the gospel was spreading, taking root, and bearing fruit in lives.

5:12 Solomon's Colonnade was part of the Temple complex built by King Herod the Great in an attempt to strengthen his relationship with the Jews. A colonnade is an entrance or porch supported by columns. Jesus taught and performed miracles in the Temple many times. When the believers met regularly at the Temple, they were undoubtedly in close proximity to the same religious leaders who had conspired to put Jesus to death. God granted the apostles power to perform miraculous signs and wonders. The miracles were from God, but administered through the hands of the apostles. These healings were not random acts of kindness by a benevolent God, but rather sign-miracles intended to convince Jewish onlookers of the credibility of the Christian message and movement.

5:13-14 Although many people had high regard for the apostles and the other believers, few “outsiders” dared to join them in the Temple or in their faith. The watching community respected these believers (2:47) but likely found God's direct and obvious work through them to be intimidating. Some may have been afraid to face the same kind of persecution the apostles had just faced (4:17), while others may have feared a fate similar to the one that fell on Ananias and Sapphira. In what seems like a contradiction, Luke added that more and more people believed and were brought to the Lord. Genuine seekers were still coming to faith in Christ. The thousands who joined the first day (2:41) were daily joined by more (see 2:47; 4:4; 6:1, 7; 9:31).

5:15-16 The word was beginning to spread beyond Jerusalem, drawing people from the villages around Jerusalem. In the same way that healing had “flowed” from Christ during his ministry on earth (see Mark 5:25-34), here it was Peter whose shadow simply had to fall across the sick and those possessed by evil spirits, and they would be healed. These miraculous signs confirmed the validity of the apostles' witness and connected their work to Christ's healing ministry (see Luke 4:33-37; 8:26-39).

THE APOSTLES MEET OPPOSITION / 5:17-42

Smarting from the apostles' refusal to heed their threats, and in light of the growing popularity of the Christian movement, the Jewish authorities clamped down. They arrested and jailed Peter and his colleagues. When God miraculously freed his spokesmen in the night, the apostles went straight back to the Temple and resumed their preaching!

5:17-18 The religious leaders did not listen and learn the gospel message that focused on their own Messiah; instead, they reacted to the apostles with violent jealousy. Peter and the apostles were already commanding more respect than the religious leaders had ever received. In addition, the apostles could do the most amazing miracles, a power the high priest and his fellow Sadducees lacked. (For more on the Sadducees, see commentary on 4:1.) This event was occurring only weeks after Jesus' trial and crucifixion, so the high priest would still have been Caiaphas, who had condemned Jesus to death, and the other men on the council (Sadducees and Pharisees) would also be the same. It was the jealousy of the Sadducees that drove the events of this chapter, the first being that the leaders arrested the apostles and put them in the jail.

5:19-21 The jealous religious leaders thought they could silence the apostles by throwing them into jail. But God would not allow his servants to be silenced. In a startling moment, an angel of the Lord came at night, opened the gates of the jail, and brought them out. The angel of the Lord refers to God's presence (see also 8:26; 12:7, 23; Matthew 1:20, 24; 2:13, 19; 28:2; Luke 1:11; 2:9). What made this incident even more remarkable was that the Sadducees, who had sent the apostles to jail (5:18), did not believe in angels!

The angel of the Lord gave the apostles the necessary encouragement to continue in their task despite this latest opposition. The angel's charge to the apostles was to go back out to the Temple and keep preaching. Without a moment's hesitation, the apostles did just exactly as commanded by the angel of the Lord. The Temple at daybreak was a busy place. Many people stopped there to pray and worship at sunrise. The apostles were already there, ready to tell them the Good News.

The scene that follows with the high council is filled with irony. The high priest, his officials, and all the elders of Israel must have prepared for this meeting, during which they would reprimand their prisoners. They sent for the apostles to be brought for trial. But the council would be surprised.

5:22-24 The prisoners were being called for trial, so the Temple guards went to the jail to get them. However, they returned rather dumbfounded, reporting that the door of the cell was locked, the guards were faithfully standing outside at their posts, and when they opened the cell door, no one was there! So complete was the miracle that no one could deny that God's power was behind it. Yet these leaders were perplexed about how these men had escaped from a locked cell.

5:25-26 In the middle of their deliberations, the leaders received a report that the escaped prisoners were right back where they were first arrested, doing the very thing for which they had been arrested! So the officers arrested them again, but without violence, for they were afraid the people would kill them. They did not want a riot to break out. The same concern had been expressed with respect to arresting Jesus (Matthew 21:46).

5:27-28 The apostles went peaceably with the Temple guard to appear before the council. In Caiaphas's remarks, note that he would not even mention the name of the one in whose authority the apostles were teaching; instead, he reminded them that they had been ordered never again to teach in this man's name. He was also angry that the apostles blamed the religious leaders for Jesus' death. The Jewish leaders wanted the apostles to stop teaching in Christ's name and to stop accusing them of culpability in Christ's death. Both problems would surface again quite clearly in the words of Peter, recorded in the next four verses.

5:29 With this comment Peter stated the primary necessity of obeying God first and foremost. These words are almost identical to his earlier ones in 4:19-20. The New Testament makes it clear that believers are to obey governmental authority (Romans 13:1-7 and 1 Peter 2:13-17), but not when the authority requires believers to sin. It would have been sinful for these apostles to obey the leaders' mandate not to speak when they had been clearly commanded by God himself to speak (5:20). God is the highest authority and rules in the highest court anywhere. Our first obedience is always to him. In that case, they had to obey God rather than human authority.

5:30 When Peter, the Galilean fisherman turned preacher, spoke to this group of religious leaders, he identified their common heritage with the phrase the God of our ancestors. These words tied the miracles these leaders had been hearing about to the Old Testament miracles, with which they were thoroughly familiar. The God who had parted the Red Sea and had led the Israelites to the Promised Land had also raised Jesus from the dead. Peter repeated his accusation, you killed him by crucifying him. Jesus, whose name the high priest would not even speak (5:27-28), had been killed by the Jewish leaders, but he had been raised from the dead by God himself.

5:31 Not only had God raised Jesus, he also had exalted him to his own right hand, the place of highest honor and authority. Through his death, Christ had given the people of Israel an opportunity to turn from their sins and turn to God. With these words Peter was offering salvation to the very people who had crucified the Savior. They, along with all the rest of Israel, could find forgiveness through the crucified and risen Christ.

5:32 Standing before the council, the apostles explained that they had been witnesses of these things. They had seen the risen Christ, and they had seen the exalted Christ as he had been taken into heaven. Peter's inclusion of the Holy Spirit as part of the witness points back to the Spirit's coming in power on the day of Pentecost, an event with which the present audience would have been familiar. Peter wanted them to know that this same Holy Spirit was still at work among them because the Spirit was being given by God to those who obey him. This gift of the Holy Spirit, given to those who accept Christ as their Savior, was described by Paul as "God's guarantee that he will give us everything he promised and that he has purchased us to be his own people" (Ephesians 1:14).

5:33-34 The high council listened to the apostles' words and became so furious that they decided to kill them. Except for one lone and wise voice from an unlikely source, this council surely would have gotten rid of these followers just as they had gotten rid of their leader. The previous night God had used supernatural means to free the apostles from jail; here he used a less "flashy" but just as miraculous means—a Pharisee defending the church! The Pharisees were the other major party in the high council with the Sadducees. They were the strict keepers of the law—not only God's law but hundreds of other rules they had added to God's law. They were careful about outward purity, but many had hearts full of impure motives.

Gamaliel was an unexpected ally for the apostles, although he probably did not support their teachings. He was a distinguished member of the council. He stood up to speak to the assembly, but first he ordered that the apostles be taken outside so the situation could be discussed.

5:35-37 Gamaliel's point was that revolutions come and revolutions go. It would not be wise to get embroiled in this one too deeply, for if it was like the others, it would disappear of its own accord. There is controversy over Gamaliel's references to Theudas and Judas of Galilee regarding the historical data. Josephus, the Jewish historian, mentions a "Theudos" who persuaded many to take their possessions and move with him to the Jordan River area. He posed as a second Moses who promised to lead the Jews out of Roman oppression. He was unsuccessful. The revolt to which Josephus alluded, however, was likely larger and later than the one mentioned by Gamaliel. Judas the Galilean likely had led a religious and nationalist revolt against Caesar that had been crushed by Rome. Some think his movement was continued by other insurrectionists. The Zealots were an active group at this time but did not come into full, organized force until 60–70 A.D. In both cases, when the leader was killed, his followers disbanded. If this “Christ-movement” were like these others, with Jesus dead and gone (so they thought), his followers would soon disperse and disappear.

5:38-39 Gamaliel offered sound advice. With the leader gone, this new movement would be overthrown if the apostles were acting merely on their own. If, however, this movement truly was of God, then even these religious leaders would be unwise to fight against it, because not only would they not be able to stop them (the apostles), but they would end up fighting against God. Gamaliel’s logic prevailed. He spoke these words probably not because he was a church sympathizer nor a secret follower of Christ but rather because he had confidence in the sovereign operation of God in the affairs of people.

5:40 The council accepted Gamaliel’s sound advice and decided not to put the apostles to death (5:33). But they were not going to let the apostles off easily. The council had them flogged. In a flogging, leather thongs made into whips were beaten against the bared upper body of the bound prisoner. The prisoner would be made to kneel, then the triple-strap whip would be beaten across both chest and back, with two beatings on the back for every one on the chest. This punishment would be given to people judged guilty of crimes (Deuteronomy 25:2-3). This flogging fulfilled Jesus’ words to his followers in Mark 13:9. Once again, the leaders gave the foolish order, which likely none of them even believed would be carried out, that the apostles never again speak in the name of Jesus (see 4:18).

At least one of Luke’s purposes for including this incident was to inform readers of the sad but consistent path the Jewish leadership had taken (and the nation with them) in the total rejection of Jesus as Messiah. Much more is included in the chapters that follow.

5:41 These apostles had endured tremendous pain, yet they left the council, rejoicing that God had counted them worthy to suffer dishonor for the name of Jesus—the name that the high priest would not even say (5:28), the name in which they had been forbidden to speak (5:40). Notice the attitude of the early church toward difficulty: they were imprisoned, threatened, beaten. Their response was to rejoice—not because they had all these bad things happen but because they had been “counted worthy” of disgrace from their association with Christ.

5:42 Instead of making the apostles fearful, the suffering they had endured at the hands of the Jewish leaders only made them more courageous. Every day, in the Temple and in their homes, they continued to teach and preach. These apostles wanted everyone to know that Jesus was the fulfillment of all the Old Testament prophecies—he was the promised Messiah! The threat of prison, beatings, and even death would not deter this group of witnesses from their appointed task. The heat was on, but it was only spreading the fire!

ACTS 6

SEVEN MEN CHOSEN TO SERVE / 6:1-7

From arrests at the hands of the Jews to the attempted deception within the congregation, the early days of the church seemed difficult. Yet the growth was phenomenal! Chapter 6 returns to an internal problem—some apparent discrepancies in the distribution of goods to the needy widows in the congregation. The result: complaints from those who thought they were being discriminated against and a rising tide of anger. It was a potential disaster. But the Spirit-filled apostles wisely solved the young church's problem.

6:1-2 The number of believers in Jerusalem made it necessary to organize the sharing of resources. People were being overlooked, and some were complaining. The believers who spoke Hebrew were the native Jewish Christians, “locals” who spoke Aramaic, a Semitic language. The believers who spoke Greek were the Grecian Jews from other lands who had been converted at Pentecost. They could not speak Aramaic, the native tongue of the Jews living in Israel. They were probably at least bilingual, speaking their native tongue and Greek but not Aramaic. There had developed a class distinction between the two groups, similar to racism. Though all were Christians, their backgrounds and outlooks were different.

The Greek-speaking Christians complained that their widows were being discriminated against in the daily distribution of food. There were many more widows than usual since many of the widows who came from other Greek-speaking countries had returned to Jerusalem to live out their years and be buried with their ancestors. Their money may have run out, and they needed help. Widows in general needed help since property was passed on from father to son, and the son was responsible to care for the mother. She had no wealth of her own. This “discrimination” against the Greek-speaking believers was more likely caused by the language and class barrier. So the Twelve called a meeting of all the believers. They noted that they needed to be preaching and teaching, not administering a food program. From both physical energy and time restraints, it would be impossible for them to do both. The reason was not that the apostles thought that they were “above” that job; rather, they knew that they had been called to preach and teach the word of God, and that had to be their priority.

6:3-4 Five requirements were clearly spelled out for the candidates: (1) believers

(among yourselves); (2) men (andras—a specific Greek term for males); (3) well respected; (4) full of the Holy Spirit; (5) full of wisdom—demonstrating their ability to apply God’s truth appropriately to life situations. Seven was the typical number of men used to handle public business in a Jewish town, the official council.

6:5 Seven men were chosen, though how this was done was not recorded. Stephen and Philip were likely placed first because they are the only two whose ministries will be explained later in Acts (chapters 7–8). All seven of these names are Greek, which means that the men were probably Hellenistic Jews. This would lay a good foundation for the future spread of the gospel to the Greek world.

6:6 Spiritual leadership is serious business and must not be taken lightly by the church or its leaders. In the early church, those chosen to serve would be ordained or commissioned (set apart by prayer and laying on of hands) by the apostles. Laying hands on someone, an ancient Jewish practice, was a way to set a person apart for special service (see Numbers 27:23; Deuteronomy 34:9). That the apostles laid their hands on them was a common gesture used in the commissioning of individuals to a task or office. It was also a granting of some sort of authority (see 8:17-19; 13:3; 19:6; 1 Timothy 4:14; 5:22; Hebrews 6:2). The apostles were hereby identifying themselves with the seven men and granting them a portion of their authority, at least for the task at hand.

6:7 The word of God was spreading in ever-widening circles. Jesus had told the apostles that they were to witness first in Jerusalem (1:8). In a short time, their message had infiltrated the entire city and all levels of society. Even some Jewish priests were being converted (as many as eighteen thousand priests may have been living in Jerusalem at the time)!

The work increased, and the word spread, at least in part because the apostles were dedicating more of their energies to that ministry. They could not have imagined, however, an explosion of the magnitude that lay just around the corner in the short but significant ministry of the church’s first martyr.

STEPHEN IS ARRESTED / 6:8-15

Around the world, the gospel has most often taken root in places fertilized by the blood of martyrs. Before people can give their lives for the gospel, however, they must first live their lives for the gospel. One way that God trains his servants is to place them in insignificant positions. Their desire to serve Christ translates into the reality of serving others. Stephen was an effective administrator and messenger before becoming a martyr. For faithfully discharging his duties as a believer, Stephen was arrested.

6:8 Stephen was one of the managers of food distribution in the early church (6:5). The most important prerequisite for any kind of Christian service is to be filled with God's grace and the power of the Holy Spirit. By the Spirit's power, Stephen was a wise servant (6:3), miracle worker (6:8), and evangelist (6:10). Stephen is the first non-apostle to whom miracles are ascribed, as well as the first non-apostle whose sermon is recorded, in the book of Acts. It is unknown how long Stephen's ministry continued before the events of this chapter and the next occurred, but he obviously had a powerful, visible, and influential ministry.

6:9-10 The Synagogue of Freed Slaves was probably a group of Jewish slaves and children of Jewish slaves who had been freed by Rome and had formed their own synagogue in Jerusalem. Cyrene was in northern Africa, as was Alexandria (in Egypt). Cilicia was Paul's home province, so he may be one of those mentioned here.

Besides being a man of high character as well as one who was used of God in doing great works of power (see 6:8), Stephen was also a skilled debater. Notice the combination of Stephen's wisdom and the empowering work of the Spirit (6:3-5).

6:11-12 Some men lied about Stephen, causing him to be arrested and brought before the high council (before whom the apostles had just recently appeared—4:5-7; 5:26-27). The group falsely accused Stephen of blaspheming Moses, partly because they knew that the Sadducees, who controlled the council, believed only in Moses' laws. In their view, to blaspheme Moses was a crime. The entire council is mentioned here as being roused against Stephen. The crowds were riled up as well.

6:13-14 Similar to the way that Jesus had been handled, Stephen was the victim of a lying conspiracy. When Stephen was brought before the council, the accusation against him was the same that the religious leaders had used against Jesus (Matthew 26:59-61). As it was with Jesus and here with Stephen, this was not a wholesale fabrication but rather a subtle misrepresentation of Stephen's actual words. They twisted his comments into making him say that Jesus of Nazareth will destroy the Temple and change the customs Moses handed down. Jesus did not nullify Moses' law, but rather he completely fulfilled it. The religious leaders did not see this, however, and only saw someone seeming to make changes to what Moses had spoken. To them, that was blasphemy.

6:15 After the false witnesses had finished twisting Stephen's teaching, everyone turned to Stephen for his reaction. They found his face shining as bright as an angel's (see Judges 13:6; Luke 9:28-29). Stephen's "glowing face" would certainly call to mind the experience of Moses after being with God (Exodus 34:29, 35). The avid followers of Moses among his accusers (especially the Sadducees) would have made the connection.

Stephen's glowing face, like Moses', was likely a literal reflection of God's glory, a sign of having been in God's presence. Maybe Stephen had been given a glimpse of the vision that would be more evident at the moment of his death (7:55). Maybe his change in countenance was in part because of the fullness of the Spirit, a characteristic that had marked his life and ministry. Whatever it was, the moment was at hand for the first witness of Christ to lose his life for the faith.

STEPHEN ADDRESSES THE COUNCIL / 7:1-60

This chapter records the first major speech of a non-apostle in the book—as well as the longest speech of anyone in Acts! It also records the first believer to die for his faith. Stephen—one of the seven men chosen to distribute food in the young church—was falsely accused by the Jewish religious leaders of committing blasphemy and inciting rebellion against the Temple. Then he was dragged before the Jewish authorities. In his speech to them, he spoke little in his own defense but said a great deal about Israel’s historical tendency toward missing what God was doing. Their response to Stephen was typical of the Jews’ response to every prophet throughout their history, down to and including Jesus himself: violence. This blunt and pointed sermon sent the Jewish leaders into a rage and resulted in the first martyrdom of the church.

7:1 This high priest was probably Caiaphas, the same man who had questioned and condemned Jesus (John 18:24) and had just recently interrogated the apostles (4:6-7; 5:26-28). He was high priest from 18–36 A.D. He gave Stephen a chance to speak in his defense by asking him, “Are these accusations true?” just as Caiaphas had asked Jesus, “Aren’t you going to answer these charges? What do you have to say for yourself?” (Matthew 26:62).

7:2-3 Stephen launched into a speech about Israel’s relationship with God. From Old Testament history, he showed that the Jews had constantly rejected God’s message and his prophets and that the current Jewish leaders had rejected the Messiah, God’s Son. He made three main points: (1) Israel’s history is the history of God’s acts in the world; (2) people worshiped God long before there was a Temple because God does not live in a Temple; and (3) the Jewish leaders’ rejection of Jesus was just one more example of Israel’s rebellion against and rejection of God.

Before the council, Stephen began his response to the accusations by reviewing the call of the Jewish patriarch Abraham from Mesopotamia. One of the themes of the speech is that God has been creatively and sovereignly directing his Kingdom program through many different people and in many different places. God’s revelation was not limited to the land or people of Israel.

7:4-5 At God’s call, Abraham left the land of the Chaldeans, referring to Mesopotamia, mentioned in the previous verse. The first stop on Abraham’s journey to the land of Canaan was at Haran, a large city in the upper Euphrates valley.

Even after settling in the Promised Land (curiously referred to as the land where you now live), Abraham owned no property. Only very late in his life, when he needed a place to bury Sarah, did he buy any property there (Genesis 23). Stephen referred to both the land, of which Abraham owned not even one square foot, and the promised descendants—none of whom had even been born yet, both crucial aspects of the covenant promise God had given Abraham. He had to believe the unfulfilled promises of God. He had to look ahead in faith to what God was doing, not to what seemed best or most logical.

7:6-7 Abraham's faith was tested further when he was told that his descendants would be mistreated as slaves for four hundred years. This mention of "four hundred years" is the first of a number of difficulties in this speech concerning historical numbers, sequences, and biblical quotations. For example, see the discrepancies between the numbers in Genesis 15:13, the numbers in Exodus 12:40, and Paul's reference in Galatians 3:17 as to the length of time of the Egyptian enslavement. In these issues and others, readers must remember that Stephen may have been referring to traditional reckonings by the scholars of the day (some of whom were listening to this speech) or perhaps even to popular writings of the day. Often Stephen appears not to be strictly quoting a particular passage of Scripture but alluding to the interpretations that were common to the thinking of the day.

The Hebrews did eventually come out of slavery and worship God in Israel. But God had been with them in Egypt—still revealing himself to them, still guiding them, and still blessing them. The key was God, his will, and his guidance, not the place of the blessing.

7:8 Circumcision was a sign of the promise or covenant made between God, Abraham, and the entire nation of Israel (Genesis 17:9-13). Stephen pointed out that God always had kept his side of the promise, but Israel had failed, again and again, to keep its side. Although the Jews in Stephen's day still circumcised their baby boys, they failed to obey God. The people's hearts were far from him. Their lack of faith and lack of obedience meant that they had failed to keep their part of the covenant.

Isaac was Abraham's son, born to him in his old age (see Genesis 20–28 for Isaac's story). Jacob, in turn, was one of Isaac's twin sons, born with Esau (see Genesis 25–35; 46–49 for Jacob's story). These three men formed the foundation of the nation of Israel; God is called "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob"

(see Exodus 3:16). Jacob was the father of the twelve patriarchs; this means that Jacob's twelve sons became the ancestors of each of the twelve tribes of Israel (see Genesis 49).

7:9-10 Stephen's speech moved to a brief summary of the life of Joseph. His brothers were very jealous and sold him to be a slave in Egypt. The story is recorded in Genesis 37:12-36. But God was with Joseph. Genesis 39–50 records Joseph's ups and downs in Egypt—yet he always remained faithful to God. In the end, God gave him favor before Pharaoh himself. As the following verses demonstrate, Joseph became the savior of his people.

Notice how often God is mentioned in this verse: God was with him; God gave Joseph favor; God gave Joseph unusual wisdom; God was working in an unusual way in an unusual place (outside of Israel). A wise student of history would expect God to intervene again.

7:11-13 When a famine struck, the leaders in Egypt were not caught off guard, for Pharaoh had foreseen it in a dream from God, which God had given Joseph the ability to interpret. As a result Joseph had wisely suggested that during the good years before the famine, extra grain be collected and held so that when the famine years came, there would be food for everyone (Genesis 41). Jacob sent his sons to Egypt to get food, and Joseph recognized them immediately. He did not reveal himself, however, for he wanted to find out first if their characters had improved since that day they had sold him as a slave.

It was on the brothers' second visit that Joseph revealed himself to them, having thoroughly tested them for changes in their attitudes. In what has to be one of the most emotional scenes in all of Scripture (Genesis 45), Joseph revealed himself to his brothers. This opened the door for moving the entire patriarchal band to Egypt. This was all part of God's sovereign plan to provide for Israel's needs in the famine and to move them to Egypt, as had been predicted to Abraham (Genesis 15:13).

7:14-15 Joseph had not forgotten his faith, his roots, or his beloved father, despite a change of fortune and culture! Stephen said that there were seventy-five persons who made the trek to Egypt. He must have been using the Septuagint when he made this quote or citing a Hebrew text different than the Masoretic Text, which reads "seventy" (see Genesis 46:27; Exodus 1:5). (One Dead Sea Scroll manuscript of Exodus 1:5 says "seventy-five" persons.)

7:16 There is a problem with Stephen's apparent reference to the location of Abraham's tomb. Genesis states that the tomb that Abraham had bought was located in Hebron (Genesis 49:29–50:13). Evidently, the bodies that were taken to Shechem referred to Joseph and his family and does not include Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and their wives, who were buried in Hebron.

7:17-19 The four hundred years had almost passed, and so the time drew near when God would fulfill his promise to Abraham (Genesis 15:13-15). The number of the Israelite people in Egypt greatly increased (from seventy-five to likely over 2 million—see Exodus 12:37), and they experienced great prosperity until Egyptian dynasties changed and a new king arose who knew nothing about Joseph. The reference to abandoning their newborn babies is a reminder of the events of Exodus 1:15-22; Pharaoh ordered the Hebrew midwives to kill every male newborn. The slaughter of the innocents by Herod at the birth of Jesus Christ a few short decades earlier should have been ringing a bell in the minds of Stephen's listeners.

7:20-22 During the days when the Hebrew midwives were under orders to kill Hebrew baby boys, Moses was born. God did not choose a convenient time for the child to be born; instead, he chose the worst of times. During this horrible time in Israel's history, the nation's first real "deliverer" was born. The story is told in Exodus 1–2. Moses was a great figure of the nation of Israel, greater in the estimation of many than even the founding father, Abraham. Moses was the vehicle God used for the salvation of the nation, for letting in so much of his light through the revelation on Mount Sinai, and for bringing the nation to the very edge of entrance into the Promised Land.

Again, Stephen emphasized that God was working in the nation, but through some very odd circumstances (adoption by an Egyptian princess) and in a strange location (outside the borders of geographic Israel).

7:23-25 Moses' first attempt to lead his people came when he tried to save an Israelite who was being mistreated by an Egyptian. Moses, the prince, came to the defense of his fellow Israelite and avenged him, killing the Egyptian. Apparently, Moses knew his calling and assumed his brothers would realize that God had sent him to rescue them. Unfortunately, they didn't.

This is the first of four direct references to the fact that Israel had totally missed the work of a "redeemer" sent by God (see 7:27, 35, 39). Such a pattern of behavior was replayed many times in Israel's history and was happening again in the first century, as the Jews were missing their Redeemer, Jesus.

7:26-28 The incident with the two men of Israel who were fighting presents an even more compelling case for the absurdity of Israel's initial rejection of Moses as deliverer. The two fighters questioned Moses as he interceded in their argument, "Who made you a ruler and judge over us?" The Jewish council showed the same belligerence concerning Stephen's speech, in effect saying, "What makes you think this Jesus of Nazareth should be ruler and judge over us?" The parallels between the nation's rejection of Jesus and its early rejection of Moses should have been another wake-up call.

7:29-30 Rejected by his own people and fearing for his life because he had killed an Egyptian, Moses fled the country and lived as a foreigner in the land of Midian (northwest Arabia). For forty long years, he served his father-in-law as a shepherd. Eighty years of his life were gone—it seemed that Moses had spent most of his life waiting. But the wait soon would be over. There in the desert, after what must have seemed an eternity, God spoke to him.

Stephen reminded his audience of the incredible moment when an angel appeared to Moses in the flame of a burning bush (see Exodus 3–4). God was working. God was speaking. God was about to deliver his people. There was no Temple here, no Tabernacle, and they were nowhere near Jerusalem. God had chosen to speak from a bush in the desert!

7:31-32 As Moses approached the burning bush, the voice of the Lord called out to him. The mention of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob would connect this present revelation to all that had been said and done through the patriarchs. As God had spoken to Abraham in a foreign land, as he had led Jacob and his family to a foreign land, so now in the desert of Midian, God was speaking to Moses, preparing him to lead his people to the next stage of their salvation journey. Stephen wanted his audience to remember how amazed Moses was and how unusual were the timing, place, and form of revelation that God used. It was entirely unexpected and without historical precedent in God's dealing with his people.

7:33-34 The command to remove the sandals from his feet and God's designation of the place as holy ground was significant in Stephen's argument. It reminded his audience that God can speak from wherever he wishes and that any place becomes "holy ground" when God is there. God has worked in the past and will continue to work in the future outside of the boundaries of the Holy Land or any building called holy (such as a sanctuary).

God reminded Moses that though eighty years had passed in his life and though four hundred years had passed in Israel's life in Egypt, God would intervene at this point in history and rescue them. But God would not be doing the rescue alone. He planned to send Moses back to Egypt—surely the last place that Moses wanted to go.

7:35 This verse summarizes Stephen's talk and wraps up this review of Moses' life. The man sent back to Egypt as Israel's ruler and savior was the same man they had previously rejected. The word translated "savior" conveys the idea of redemption and is used only of Moses in the New Testament. In the succeeding verses, Stephen also notes that Moses was a Prophet (7:37) and mediator (7:38). Stephen's point seems to be that even greater than Moses, the lawgiver who "saved" Israel from Egyptian bondage, was Jesus, the grace-giver who offered eternal freedom from the sin of slavery. If Moses was beloved and revered, Jesus should be to an infinitely greater degree.

7:36 So much of what God had revealed, so many of the miracles God had performed, and much of what lay behind the intricate system of sacrifices (which he would show Moses), would help God's people recognize the coming Messiah. God wanted his people to be ready to recognize and receive the ultimate Deliverer (the one who would deliver people from their sins) when he came.

The reminder of the journey back and forth through the wilderness for forty years was yet another example of Israel ignoring the command of God and rejecting his direction of them. For forty years they wandered through the wilderness, burying the entire older generation (with the exception of Moses, Joshua, and Caleb—see Numbers 14:21-45). It was Israel's stubborn, Holy Spirit-resisting (see 7:51) refusal to recognize the leading of God that got them excluded from experiencing his blessing in the land. Stephen's current generation would do well to remember their forefathers' propensity to miss what God was saying and doing.

7:37-38 The Jews originally thought this Prophet was Joshua. But Moses had been prophesying about the coming Messiah (Deuteronomy 18:15). Peter also had quoted this verse as referring to the Messiah (3:22).

Stephen used the word ekklesia (translated assembly) to describe the congregation or people of God in the wilderness. This word means "called out ones" and was used by the first-century Christians to describe their own community or "assembly." Stephen's point was that the giving of the law through Moses to the Jews was the sign of the covenant. By obedience, then, would they continue to be God's covenant people. When they disobeyed (7:39), however, they broke the covenant and forfeited their right to be the chosen people—God's congregation.

7:39 Stephen again stated what had become an obvious theme, especially from the life of Moses. The Jewish ancestors of the audience and of the speaker (our ancestors) had rejected Moses—his message, his leadership, and his claim to be speaking for God. Incredibly, they wanted to return to the slavery and idolatry of Egypt (Numbers 14:1-4).

7:40-41 The Jews' ancestors had not only rejected Joseph and Moses, but at one crucial point in their history they had also rejected God! While Moses was up on Mount Sinai receiving the Law, the children of Israel got tired of waiting. They forgot about God and decided that they needed a new leader and a new god. They asked Aaron to construct a god for them. In one sorry, sinful deed, the children of Israel blatantly, publicly, and corporately defied God. This "invisible" God and "absent" Moses were too much to bear. They wanted something they could see, even if it was the product of their own hands. Stephen's wording highlights the idiocy of it all, as he pictured them bringing sacrifices to an idol shaped like a calf. The story is told in Exodus 32.

7:42-43 The Israelites' worship of the golden calf was the beginning of a downward spiral. At times they returned to God, but far more often they were running after the gods of the evil nations surrounding them. This quote from Amos (Amos 5:25-27) supports Stephen's accusation that Israel had a history of idol worship. Molech and Rephan were planetary divinities. Molech was an Ammonite deity associated with child sacrifice, while Rephan was a god "borrowed" from Egypt. Both became popular options for Israel's idolatry as her history progressed.

The ancestors of Stephen's current audience, the audience who stood in rejection of Jesus Christ, had a history of rejecting not only God's messengers but even of turning from God himself to their own handmade gods. The cost for their idolatry had been captivity far away in Babylon. No one within the sound of Stephen's voice could have any doubt about the historical accuracy of that statement.

7:44 Suddenly, the subject switches to this intriguing section concerning the Tabernacle. Having sufficiently denied the charge against him that he had blasphemed Moses (6:11), Stephen proceeded to address the charge that he had blasphemed God. The Tabernacle was a movable worship center used by the Israelites prior to the construction of the Temple by Solomon. The detailed instructions for constructing the Tabernacle were spelled out for Moses and the people of Israel (see Exodus 25–31). The construction plans were shown to Moses by God himself. This large and mobile tent was suitable for the wilderness wanderings because it could be taken apart and moved easily from location to location. It was the place where, after the nation left Mount Sinai, Moses would meet with God (Exodus 29:42; 30:6, 36; Numbers 17:4).

7:45 When the people finally moved into the land of Canaan under Joshua's leadership, the Tabernacle was taken with them and remained with them as they settled the land and had many battles against the Gentile nations. Stephen reminded his audience that God drove the Gentiles out of the Promised Land. This temporary and mobile Tabernacle remained with the people until the time of King David, when Jerusalem was made the capital city and David began making plans for a Temple.

7:46-47 King David found favor with God and asked to build a permanent Temple. He desired this so much that he wrote about it in Psalm 132:2-5. Second Samuel 7:1-16 relates God's answer to David's request. David's son Solomon, the next king of Israel, would oversee construction of a glorious Temple to God in Jerusalem (1 Kings 5–8).

7:48-50 Only in Christ, however, would this vision of David and promise of God ever be realized. God doesn't live in Temples made by human hands. To support this, Stephen quoted from the prophet Isaiah: "Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool" (Isaiah 66:1-2a). The Temple was a building and just a building. As in Jesus' ministry, the religious leaders were more intent on scrupulously guarding the Temple building and their traditions than they were in exhibiting the virtues of justice, mercy, and faithfulness (see Matthew 23:23-24).

7:51 Stephen moved to the critical point of his speech. He had responded brilliantly to the accusations against him. All that remained was to drive the point of application home to his audience. Those who stood before him had not broken the cycle of sin that had been passed down to them by their ancestors.

7:52-54 Indeed, many of their prophets had been persecuted or killed: Uriah (Jeremiah 26:20-23), Jeremiah (Jeremiah 38:1-6), Isaiah (tradition says he was killed by King Manasseh; see 2 Kings 21:16), Amos (Amos 7:10-13), Zechariah

(not the author of the Bible book, but the son of Jehoiada the priest, 2 Chronicles 24:20-22), and Elijah (1 Kings 19:1-2). Jesus had made the same charges against the Jews (Matthew 23:37; Luke 11:47-48). Jesus had also told a parable about how the Jews had constantly rejected God's messages and had persecuted his messengers (Luke 20:9-19). See Hebrews 11:35-38 on the killing of the prophets.

Not only had the Jews killed the prophets who had predicted the coming of the Righteous One (the Messiah, Jesus Christ), but they had betrayed and murdered their Messiah. The children of Israel had rejected their deliverer, Moses, from the start to the finish of his ministry. They had deliberately disobeyed God's law, though they had received it from the hands of angels. God himself had been rejected in their ancestors' constant forays into idolatry. God's Messiah, the Righteous One, the Savior of the world, was the latest victim of their rebellion. These final words so enraged his hearers that they shook their fists in rage.

7:55-56 In contrast to their rage, Stephen was still in control, full of the Holy Spirit, the ultimate source of strength and courage (see also 6:3, 5, 8, 15). The text tells us that as the maddened crowd drew nearer, Stephen kept his gaze steadily upward. In the process he saw the glory of God, and he saw Jesus standing in the place of honor at God's right hand. Just before his death, however, Stephen saw Christ standing. In this scene, as the church experienced the first (of many) to die for faith in Christ, Luke wanted his readers to know martyrs do not die alone—as if out of the gaze of their Savior. Christ was not only present at the right hand of the Father, but he also was (at least in Stephen's case) standing to receive his faithful servant home. There can be no greater nor more honorable reception than to have the Son of Man standing at one's entrance into his presence.

Stephen saw the heavens opened. This is a very important term for the presence of God and a sign of his revelation. The heavens opened at the baptism of Jesus (Luke 3:21-22) as a sign of affirmation of Jesus' deity. It was accompanied by the voice of God and the descending of the Spirit.

7:57-58 This pictures a violent mob taking the law into their own hands. The wording of this scene—covering their ears, shouting loudly, rushing together, and dragging Stephen out of the city—leads one to the conclusion that this was a sudden, impassioned, violent (and probably illegal) action.

With dramatic style Luke gave what would seem to be a passing piece of information about the one who kept the coats while the stoning occurred: a young man named Saul. This, of course, was Paul (see 13:9), the great missionary who wrote many of the letters in the New Testament. Saul was his Hebrew name; Paul, the Greek equivalent, was used as he began his ministry to the Gentiles.

7:59-60 As they were in the process of stoning Stephen, he made two fascinating statements, both reminiscent of Christ's words on the cross. The first, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," is similar to Christ's final words in Luke 23:46 (in some manuscripts). The second is a word of forgiveness: "Lord, don't charge them with this sin!" Stephen had obviously learned from his Master some important lessons about how to live and how to die.

PERSECUTION SCATTERS THE BELIEVERS / 8:1-3

After the martyrdom of Stephen, the Jews stepped up their persecution of the followers of Christ. The man introduced as Saul (8:1) proved to be a major leader in this widespread campaign of intolerance and terror. From a human perspective, this was a dreadful turn of events; from a divine perspective, it produced a far greater good. The Christians who had been in Jerusalem were now forced to migrate to the surrounding regions of Judea and Samaria.

8:1 In the final words of Luke's record of Stephen's martyrdom, Saul was introduced subtly into the text as a young man in charge of keeping the coats of those who were stoning Stephen (7:58). The opening verse of this chapter adds the information about Saul's current attitude: he was not just there by accident or just passing by. He was one of the official witnesses at the killing of Stephen. Saul was a native of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia (modern-day south-central Turkey), and may have entered into the controversy with Stephen at the synagogue in Jerusalem where Stephen had been debating (6:9-10). Luke mentioned him only in passing here, before recording the details of his conversion in chapter 9. When we get to chapter 13, Paul's ministry will be the entire focus of the book and the main instrument for the church's outreach to the Gentile world.

Stephen's martyrdom was the impetus for an immediate increase of persecution against those who followed Christ. The persecution forced the Christians out of Jerusalem and into Judea and Samaria—thus fulfilling the second part of Jesus' command (see 1:8). Evidently, they had become somewhat comfortable sticking close to Jerusalem. All of that was instantly changed with Stephen's death and the resultant persecution.

Not every Christian left Jerusalem, for a church remained there for the balance of the New Testament era. Why the apostles stayed in Jerusalem instead of scattering with the others is a matter of speculation. Leadership of the Christian movement continued from the Jerusalem church for quite some time (see chapter 15). Eventually, the major missionary center moved north to Antioch (chapter 13 and following). Paul would regularly return to Jerusalem to report and to bring monetary support to the suffering Jerusalem saints from the Asian and European churches (16:4; 21:15-20).

8:2-3 What a contrast between this verse and the next one! Godly people came and buried Stephen with loud weeping, while Saul was going everywhere to devastate the church. Obviously the loss of a person so important, respected, and needed in the church would be a huge blow. Evidently spurred on by the Jewish council's murder of Stephen, Saul zealously went on the attack. Saul passionately tried to protect the Jewish faith (see 9:1, 13). He later described these activities thoroughly in his testimony before King Agrippa (26:9-11). Saul was dragging out both men and women and putting them in jail. Evidently, Saul had been given legal authority to carry out this persecution (see comments on 9:1-2).

PHILIP PREACHES IN SAMARIA / 8:4-25

This is the second step of the Gentile mission in Acts 1:8—"to Samaria." Philip's trip into Samaria and his ministry there reveal the marvelous truth that Jesus, the promised Jewish Messiah, was also the king and Savior of Gentiles. The message of Christ is a worldwide gospel. All nations and languages are invited and included (see Isaiah 56:3; Daniel 7:14) in the Kingdom of God.

8:4 The persecution caused the believers who had fled Jerusalem to scatter into other nations. As they went, they were preaching the Good News about Jesus. The gospel message was spreading like wildfire! Satan had attempted to defeat the young church, but all he did was encourage the spread of the gospel.

8:5 Israel had been divided into three main regions—Galilee in the north, Samaria in the middle, and Judea in the south. The city of Samaria (in the region of Samaria) had been the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel in the days of the divided kingdom, before it was conquered by Sargon of Assyria in 722 B.C. During that war, Sargon had taken many captives, leaving only the poorest people in the land and resettling it with foreigners. These foreigners had intermarried with the Jews who were left, and the mixed race became known as Samaritans. The Samaritans were considered half-breeds and religious apostates by the "pure" Jews in the southern kingdom of Judah, and the two groups hated each other. But Jesus went into Samaria (John 4), and he commanded his followers to spread the gospel there (1:8).

Philip is not the apostle Philip (John 1:43-44) but a Greek-speaking Jew; he was one of the seven men who had been chosen to help distribute food in the Jerusalem church (6:5). Philip went into Samaria and told the people there about the Messiah.

8:6-8 The effectiveness of Philip's ministry is highlighted here as crowds gathered and saw Philip perform miracles that authenticated the message. Evil spirits were cast out of people. Their screaming revealed their rage at encountering a power greater than their own. Demons are never pleased to be told to leave their human dwellings, but they have no choice but to submit to the higher authority (see Mark 9:25-26). Philip also healed. As a result of the healings and the message he brought, there was great joy in that city.

8:9-11 The balance of this chapter reports two significant experiences of Philip as he faithfully spread the gospel. The first incident involved a sorcerer named Simon. Evidently, Simon had quite a following in the region and was using his magic to draw crowds of his own. In the days of the early church, sorcerers and magicians were numerous and influential. They worked wonders, performed healings and exorcisms, and practiced astrology, but they utilized the power of Satan (Matthew 24:24; 2 Thessalonians 2:9). Simon had done so many wonders that some even thought that he was the Great One—the Power of God (in other words, the Messiah).

8:12-13 In sharp contrast to Simon and his magic is Philip and the message of Good News concerning the Kingdom of God. People believed in Jesus Christ and were baptized. Even the sorcerer himself appeared to believe and was baptized. So now the man who had previously had a large and diverse following was following Philip wherever he went, himself being amazed by the great miracles and signs that Philip, in the power of Christ, was performing. Simon may have found it easy to believe when it was exciting and everyone else was caught up in the excitement. There is some question, however, about the sincerity of his profession of faith and the genuineness of his conversion. In his conversation with Peter (see 8:18-24), the description of Simon does not have the sound of one who truly had come to faith.

8:14 Peter and John were sent to Samaria as apostolic representatives to find out whether or not the Samaritans were truly becoming believers. The Jewish Christians, even the apostles, were still unsure whether Gentiles (non-Jews) and Samaritans (half-Jews) could receive the Holy Spirit.

8:15-16 This was a crucial moment for the spread of the gospel and for the growth of the church. Peter and John had to go to Samaria to help keep this new group of believers from becoming separated from other believers. There was deep-seated hostility between Jews and Samaritans that went back centuries. The Jews looked down on the Samaritans for not being pure Jews; the Samaritans resented the Jews for their arrogance. However, Samaritans were coming to faith in Christ through Philip's preaching, and there could be no denying that they should be included among the believers. So they prayed for these new Christians to receive the Holy Spirit.

It may seem odd that the Holy Spirit had not yet come upon any of them. Many scholars believe that God chose to have a dramatic filling of his Spirit as a sign at this special moment in history—a "Samaritan Pentecost" paralleling the Pentecost that the apostles had experienced in chapter 2. Normally, the Holy Spirit enters a person's life at conversion; it is then that the Spirit baptizes, seals, and indwells that person. But this was a special event. The pouring out of the Spirit would happen again with Cornelius and his family (10:44-47), a sign that the uncircumcised Gentiles could receive salvation.

With the verification by Peter and John that the Samaritans' faith was genuine, these new believers were incorporated into the church. When the Samaritans were converted, they received the Spirit, as was essential for regeneration, but their participation in the church was needed for the full expression of the gifts of the Spirit.

8:17 These Samaritan believers received the Holy Spirit through the laying on of the apostles' hands. One of the likely reasons for the delay between water baptism and the baptism of the Spirit was to keep the Samaritan church united with the Jewish church. Because of the historical conflict between these two groups, it would be crucial to have an apostolic presence for this significant event. The presence of apostles, especially two with such a high profile—Peter and John—would give unquestionable credibility to the Samaritan spiritual movement. These two apostles, through whom the Samaritans first received the Holy Spirit, would confirm to the rest of the Jerusalem church that indeed God was doing the same thing among the Gentiles that he was doing among the Jews. This Samaritan Pentecost also demonstrated to the Jerusalem church God's expansion plans for the Gentiles and the ever-widening scope of the gospel ministry. Chapters 7–12 are a careful record of that first critical move of Christianity out of the confines of Jerusalem—and, more importantly, beyond the confines of the Jewish faith.

8:18-19 Evidently there were some visible manifestations of the power of the Holy Spirit that accompanied this laying on of hands, possibly similar to those present at Pentecost in chapter 2 (such as the violent wind and the tongues of fire). Simon was the sorcerer from 8:9-13 who had supposedly believed and been baptized. But he was more interested in miracles than in Christ. So when Simon saw that the Holy Spirit was given when the apostles placed their hands upon people's heads, he wanted to have that power as well. Simon foolishly believed that Peter and John were in the same business as he had been (sorcery and magic), so he offered money for the power.

8:20-23 Peter's stern answer was a stinging rebuke. Simon's errant thinking had led him to believe that God's gift could be bought. Simon's heart was not right before God; his behavior was called wickedness; his thinking was called evil; he was said to be full of bitterness; and, in the most sweeping of condemnations, Peter said that Simon was still, despite his supposed conversion, held captive by sin. The implication was that Simon had not genuinely come to Christ.

8:24 Simon was apparently terrified. He seemed to respond well to the rebuke, asking Peter to pray for him. It is hard to tell whether his outcry was simply a fear of terrible consequences for having insulted these powerful visitors or a genuine change in heart toward God. It may well be that Simon was a typical pseudoconvert, a make-believer, rather than a genuine one (notice that he didn't pray himself but asked Peter to pray).

8:25 Encouraged by what they had just experienced in Samaria, Peter and John made their way back to Jerusalem testifying and preaching the word of the Lord, the Good News, in many Samaritan villages. As Peter and John continued to learn God's strategy for reaching the world, the rest of the apostles would also be enlightened, and through them, so would the church back in Jerusalem.

PHILIP AND THE ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH / 8:26-40

This passage is set carefully and strategically after the initial work in Jerusalem and before the conversion of Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles (chapter 9). This is the third step of expansion to the uttermost parts of the world (1:8). The gospel of Christ was leaving a purely Jewish audience and beginning to be spread to the world. In the story of Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch, we have a wonderful picture of God's global love and his surprising plan to get the good news of Christ to those who have never heard.

8:26-28 An angel of the Lord appeared at various times in Scripture giving directions to people. In this instance, Philip was told to go south. In the sovereign strategy of God, Philip was sent to the side of the road, where he met the treasurer of Ethiopia traveling home from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Ethiopia is located in Africa, south of Egypt. The eunuch was obviously dedicated to God, because he had traveled such a long distance to worship in Jerusalem. This man may have been a Gentile convert to Judaism. That he had a copy of the book of the prophet Isaiah points to that probability. To own a scroll of the Scriptures (handwritten and thus rare) likewise indicated wealth.

8:29-30 The Holy Spirit directed Philip to go over and walk along beside the carriage. Again, Philip immediately complied. He heard the man reading from the prophet Isaiah. After observing for a moment, Philip asked: “Do you understand what you are reading?” In so doing, Philip exhibited two of the most important characteristics of an effective evangelist: The first is patience. He waited to find out where the man was in his understanding before diving in with the gospel. A second characteristic is the power of observation. Philip looked for an opportunity to engage the man at a meaningful level.

8:31-34 The court official expressed the frustration that every Bible student throughout the ages has felt from time to time: “How can I understand this passage unless someone explains it to me?” This perfect lead-in to the gospel was made even better considering the passage he was reading. As Philip was invited to join the eunuch in the chariot, he discovered which passage of Scripture the eunuch was reading—Isaiah 53. Here God continued his sovereign work. There is no better place to be reading in the Old Testament for a picture of Jesus Christ than Isaiah 53. The passage is Isaiah’s prophecy about the great suffering Servant—his rejection, his silence before his accusers, his death with wicked men, the substitutionary nature of his suffering, his burial in a rich man’s grave, and his ultimate resurrection.

8:35 Philip began with this same Scripture, added to it many others, and told the eunuch the Good News about Jesus. It is important to note that Philip began where the man was; only then did he directly and clearly take him to where he needed to go. This means he listened, thought, adapted the message to his audience, and then explained the Good News.

8:36 Whatever Philip said to the court official, it is obvious that he came to faith. Evidently included in what Philip had taught was the fact that being baptized was the next step of obedience in this newfound faith. Philip began where the Ethiopian was, but he did not stay there. Philip gave the Ethiopian the rest of the story—maybe the rest of Isaiah 53—including the coming of Christ, his substitutionary death, his resurrection, and his offer of eternal life. Most of the earlier Greek manuscripts do not include verse 37.

8:38 After commanding the carriage to stop, the official and Philip went down into the water. There Philip baptized him. The witnesses to the baptism included at least Philip and the carriage driver, though a man of such high position may have been traveling with a sizable entourage.

Commanded by Christ (Matthew 28:18-20), water baptism was an outward, visible sign of one's identification with Christ and with the Christian community. This was one of the first acts of new converts in the early church. In submitting to baptism, this official was proclaiming his faith in Christ publicly. Deeply symbolic and meaningful, baptism sends a powerful message to onlookers about one's obedience to Christ.

8:39-40 Philip was suddenly transported by the Spirit of the Lord to a different city (likely his next job site). Azotus is Ashdod, one of the ancient Philistine capitals, about twenty miles north of Gaza. This miraculous sign may be here to show the urgency of spreading the message to the Gentiles. Philip preached the Good News. Philip disappears from the Acts story at this point, but ultimately he ended up in Caesarea. The only other mention of Philip is in 21:8-9. Twenty years later, Philip was still at Caesarea with four daughters, all of whom were prophetesses.

Nothing else is recorded about the newly converted eunuch, other than this wonderful report that he went on his way rejoicing—clear evidence of the Spirit's work in this new believer's life (Galatians 5:22).

ACTS 9

SAUL'S CONVERSION / 9:1-19A

Acts 1:8 seems to be a concise outline for the entire book. Chapters 1–7 describe the gospel being preached in Jerusalem. Chapter 8 shows believers, under threat of persecution, taking the Good News of Jesus to Judea and Samaria.

Chapter 9 records a monumental event in the history of the church—the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. Saul (later known as Paul) would be God's apostle to the Gentiles (Galatians 2:8; Ephesians 3:8). He would lead the church in spreading Christianity “to the ends of the earth” (1:8). Therefore Paul, more than any other person, figures prominently in chapters 10–28.

9:1-2 Saul (later called Paul, the equivalent of “Saul” in Greek), first mentioned as a participant in the stoning of Stephen (see 7:58; 8:1), was so zealous for his Jewish beliefs that he began a persecution campaign against all who believed in Christ, all who were followers of the Way (see Paul's testimony in Philippians 3:6). This name implied “the way of the Lord” or “the way of salvation.”

Why would the Jews in Jerusalem want to persecute Christians as far away as Damascus? There are several possibilities: (1) to seize the Christians who had fled; (2) to prevent the spread of Christianity to other major cities; and (3) to keep the Christians from causing any trouble with Rome.

The letters requested by Saul would not only introduce him, but they would provide him with the high priest's authorization to seize followers of Christ and bring them back to Jerusalem. Most synagogues in Syria probably recognized this right of extradition. Not only was Saul going to pursue them, he also was going to arrest both men and women and bring them back in chains.

9:3 Damascus, a key commercial city, was located about 175 miles northeast of Jerusalem in the Roman province of Syria. Several trade routes linked Damascus to other cities throughout the Roman world. Damascus was one of the ten cities known as the Ten Towns (see Mark 5:20; 7:31). Saul may have thought that by stamping out Christianity in Damascus, he could prevent its spread to other areas.

Nearing his destination, at about noon, when the sun was at its full height (see 22:6; 26:13), Saul suddenly found himself awash in a brilliant light. Though the text does not overtly state that Saul saw Christ, that fact is implied, since seeing the resurrected Lord was a requirement of New Testament apostleship (see 1 Corinthians 9:1; 15:8). Also, the testimonies of Ananias (9:17) and Barnabas (9:27) confirm an eyewitness encounter.

9:4-5 Not only did Saul witness the brilliant glory of the Lord, but he also heard the voice of Jesus Christ. (For the rest of what Jesus said, see 22:8, 10, 17, 21; 26:15-18.) Saul thought he was pursuing heretics, but according to the voice, his actions were tantamount to attacking Jesus himself—I am Jesus, the one you are persecuting. Anyone who persecutes believers today is also guilty of persecuting Jesus (see Matthew 25:40, 45) because believers are the body of Christ on earth. This is a powerful statement about the union that exists between Christ and his church.

As he lay there in the dust, Saul must have been reeling from the realization that Jesus, the crucified founder of this detested sect, had been resurrected by God and exalted in divine glory. Saul was not serving God, as he had thought, but opposing him!

9:6 According to Paul's own testimony in 26:16-18, Christ gave him, at this moment, a brief preview of his future as an apostle to the Gentiles. Further details would come once he made his way into the city of Damascus.

9:7 Those accompanying Saul heard the sound of someone's voice and saw some kind of light (see 22:9), but they didn't understand the full significance of this encounter. They saw no one, nor had they heard the specific words spoken to Saul (26:14).

9:8-9 Saul was temporarily blinded by this revelation (an event with Old Testament precedence—see Genesis 19:11; 2 Kings 6:17-20), so his companions led him by the hand to Damascus. Saul's subsequent fast (going without food and water) was most likely motivated by shock as he tried to ponder the full significance of his experience. Typically, fasting indicated a period of mourning or repentance.

Saul certainly had a lot to think about during those three days. He realized that despite his zeal for God, his recent activity of arresting Christians had been in direct opposition to God—otherwise, he would not have received this rebuke. Suddenly, all that Saul had believed was being torn down and replaced with a new truth—the very truth that he had been seeking to extinguish. As Saul was thinking about all this, he was also praying (9:11).

9:10-12 As Saul waited for further directions, the Lord began speaking to Ananias, a Jew who had become a believer in Christ. Ananias responded to the call of God. The meeting between Saul and Ananias was divinely arranged. Straight Street was and still is one of the main thoroughfares of Damascus. Ananias was directed to the street and to the house of Judas. The Lord gave specific instructions to Ananias about where to go and for whom to look; in a separate vision, he told Saul to expect Ananias's arrival. Such divine revelation with separate individuals having similar visions would be repeated again in 10:1-23.

9:13-14 Ananias was understandably shaken by the Lord's command to go and find Saul of Tarsus. Christians wanted to stay far away from Saul. His reputation as an enemy of the church was well documented, and the intent of this particular mission to Damascus was widely known. Ananias knew that Saul had been authorized by the leading priests to arrest every believer in Damascus. Fearful of what might happen, Ananias began to protest. Despite his protests, however, Ananias was up to the task.

9:15-16 Ananias's protest was met with a divine statement that Saul was God's chosen instrument. What irony that the most zealous Jew and most anti-Gentile would be the chosen witness to take God's message to the Gentiles and to kings, as well as to the people of Israel. For the rest of his life, Saul marveled that he would be the recipient of such mercy and grace, as well as be the appointee for such a noble task. Saul, who had caused horrible suffering for so many Christians, would find that he, too, must suffer. The remainder of the book of Acts, as well as the many letters that Saul wrote, chronicle the words of this verse: Saul would find himself witnessing for Christ in front of Gentile audiences, Jewish audiences, and even kings. He also would suffer severely for his faith.

9:17-19a Ananias's actions fulfilled at least two purposes. First, he functioned almost in a prophetic role, serving as God's confirming mouthpiece in the commissioning of the great apostle. Second, his visit served as a ministry of personal encouragement. Saul must have been encouraged when he heard Ananias greet him as brother. Ananias told Saul that Jesus had sent him so that Saul could get his sight back and be filled with the Holy Spirit. Evidently, the Holy Spirit filled Saul when he received his sight and was baptized. Upon the conclusion of this experience, something like scales fell from Saul's eyes, and he regained his sight. Saul was baptized, presumably by Ananias, and he ended his three-day fast (9:9).

The change in Saul was instantaneous. In less than one week, he went from being eager to destroy the Lord's followers (9:1) to preaching about Jesus in the synagogues (9:20). The believers were understandably suspicious, but Saul's powerful and persistent preaching, coupled with efforts by the Jewish leaders to kill him (9:23), finally convinced the apostles that his conversion was genuine. According to Galatians 1:17-18, Saul spent three years in Arabia between the time of his conversion (9:3-6) and his journey to Jerusalem (9:26).

9:19b-20 Saul obeyed his new calling immediately, for immediately he began preaching about Jesus in the synagogues. Saul could do this so soon after his conversion because his experience on the road to Damascus had been unmistakable. Saul knew that Jesus was alive, Jesus was the Son of God, and Jesus was the Messiah.

9:21 The change in Saul caused his hearers to be amazed. They had expected Saul to show up and begin arresting followers of Jesus for they knew that was why he had come to Damascus in the first place. Yet here was this enemy of Christianity preaching the Christian message! Surely these Jews made this information known to their leaders back in Jerusalem (9:23).

9:22 Saul's preaching was powerful, filled with proofs that Jesus was indeed the Messiah. The word "proofs" as used here means "to put together." Essentially, what Saul was doing was taking Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah and putting them together with the facts of Jesus' life, thus proving that Jesus was the one to whom the Scriptures pointed.

9:23-25 According to Galatians 1:17-18, Saul left Damascus and traveled to Arabia, the desert region just southeast of Damascus, where he lived for three years. It is unclear whether his three-year stay occurred between verses 22 and 23 or between verses 25 and 26. Some commentators say that after a while could mean a long period of time. They suggest that when Saul returned to Damascus, the governor under Aretas ordered his arrest (2 Corinthians 11:32) in an effort to keep peace with influential Jews. The other possibility is that Saul's night escape occurred during his first stay in Damascus, just after his conversion, when the Pharisees were especially upset over his defection from their ranks. He would have fled to Arabia to spend time alone with God and to let the Jewish religious leaders cool down.

Regardless of which theory is correct, there was a period of at least three years between Saul's conversion (9:3-6) and his trip to Jerusalem (9:26). What is clear is that Saul's preaching had made such headlines that the Jewish leaders decided to kill him. But God had plans for Saul, and so he protected him. The other believers, too, convinced of Saul's transformed life, were willing to help him escape the city. They let him down in a large basket through an opening in the city wall so that he could bypass the city gate, where people were watching for him in order to murder him. In some of the ancient walled cities, houses were built right on the city walls (see Joshua 2:15). It would not have been too difficult, therefore, for one of the believers who lived in such a house to use a window in his home for Saul's escape.

9:26 After his three-year sojourn in Arabia, Saul arrived in Jerusalem only to find himself in a delicate situation. Word had come from Damascus about Saul's shocking conversion, for the Jewish leaders had already tried to kill him (9:23). But the believers were all afraid of him. This shows how terrible Saul's persecution had been. Clearly, the believers viewed this unexpected turn of events as part of a plot to infiltrate the church and do more harm.

9:27-28 Barnabas, in keeping with his nickname ("Son of Encouragement"—see 4:36), encouraged Saul by acting as his "sponsor." He vouched for the genuine transformation of Saul's life. Galatians 1:18-19 explains that Saul stayed in Jerusalem only fifteen days and that he met only with Peter and James (the brother of Jesus). Barnabas told these two apostles about Saul's experience on the Damascus road, as well as about his work in Damascus. These facts seem to have convinced the apostles of the genuineness of their former enemy's conversion. Paul began preaching boldly in the name of the Lord.

9:29-30 While in Jerusalem, Saul felt led to witness to the very same audience that had masterminded the stoning of Stephen—some Greek-speaking Jews (6:9-10). As might be expected, he encountered furious opposition. Saul was, in their eyes, a turncoat and a traitor, so they plotted to murder him. In these short sentences, we can see two characteristics of Saul, even as a new believer in Christ: he was bold, and he stirred up controversy. These would characterize Saul's ministry for the rest of his life. With the help of the believers, Saul escaped to Caesarea, where he then made his way to his hometown of Tarsus. Saul's departure helped quiet conflicts with the Jews. Galatians 1:21-24 probably refers to Saul's continued ministry both in Caesarea and Tarsus.

9:31 After Saul, the most zealous persecutor, was converted, the church enjoyed a brief time of peace. After every crisis the power of God was present, and the church grew. The gospel was spreading, and the church was growing in Judea, Galilee and Samaria. It was now time for the message of Christ to be taken to the “ends of the earth” (1:8).

Saul now disappears from the record until Acts 11:25, several years later. In the interim, Saul had some experiences that are not recorded in Acts but are referred to in 2 Corinthians 11.

PETER HEALS AENEAS AND RAISES DORCAS / 9:32-43

After describing Saul’s astounding conversion, Luke focused again on the ministry of Peter, specifically on the miraculous signs that accompanied his preaching. Capitalizing on the newfound climate of religious tolerance (the result of Saul’s conversion and departure to Tarsus), Peter began an itinerant ministry intended to strengthen and encourage believers scattered throughout Israel.

9:32 Peter, the leader of the apostles, was last mentioned in 8:25 returning from Samaria to Jerusalem with John. He came to Lydda, a predominantly Gentile community about twenty-five miles west of Jerusalem. Lydda was a fairly large town and commercial center at the intersection of highways connecting Egypt to Syria and Joppa (on the Mediterranean coast) to Jerusalem. The gospel likely came to Lydda as a direct result of the mass conversion at Pentecost (chapter 2) or from those who had fled the Jerusalem persecution (8:1).

9:33-35 Nothing more is known about Aeneas other than this fact of his miraculous healing from an eight-year crippling illness. The healing was done by Jesus Christ, and it was immediate. This miracle was not an end in itself but a confirming sign of the truth of the gospel. The phrase, the whole population, was probably not meant to be taken literally; rather, it was Luke’s way of reporting that a vast number of people turned to the Lord and were saved, including not only those in Lydda but in the whole area of Sharon, a coastal plain about ten miles wide and fifty miles long stretching north from Lydda toward Carmel.

9:36-37 The important harbor city of Joppa sits 125 feet above sea level, overlooking the Mediterranean Sea. Joppa was the town into which the cedars of Lebanon had been floated to be shipped to Jerusalem and used in the temple construction (2 Chronicles 2:16; Ezra 3:7). The prophet Jonah had left the port of Joppa on his ill-fated trip (Jonah 1:3).

It was customary to bury corpses before sundown. The believers had only prepared her for burial and laid her in an upstairs room, suggesting that they believed that she could be raised. The church had not previously experienced miracles of this nature, though such signs had occurred during the life and ministry of Christ. Perhaps word about the healing of Aeneas had reached Joppa from Lydda, because the believers dispatched two men to find and bring Peter (9:38).

9:38-39 Joppa was only about ten miles northwest of Lydda. To go and find Peter and bring him back would have taken these two men six to eight hours. Once located and presented with the need in Joppa, Peter returned with them. The text indicates the haste with which all this was accomplished. Arriving, Peter was immediately ushered to the upstairs room. There he met a group of mourning widows. Clearly, this woman's death was a major blow to the church in Joppa.

9:40-43 After getting down on his knees to pray, Peter told Tabitha to get up. Then she opened her eyes. Peter presented this back-from-the-dead saint to her overjoyed friends. As a result of this startling miracle, many citizens of Joppa believed in the Lord. Peter stayed a long time in Joppa, at the home of Simon, probably in order to teach the people more thoroughly the full implications of the gospel.

It is significant that Peter stayed with a man who was, by vocation, a leatherworker who made animal hides into leather. This occupation involved contact with dead animals, and Jewish law considered it an "unclean" job. Peter was already beginning to break down his prejudice against people who were not of his kind and customs that did not adhere to Jewish religious traditions. This would set the stage for what is reported in the next chapter.

CORNELIUS CALLS FOR PETER / 10:1-8

In the history of the early church recorded in the first nine chapters of Acts, this saving work of God's Spirit was mostly confined to the Jews. Suddenly, Acts 10 describes the Spirit's sovereign activity in a Gentile army officer stationed on the Mediterranean coast. The book of Acts continues with its steady, singular message: God is directing the expansion of his church, founded on the crucified and resurrected Christ. The conversion of Cornelius, the first Gentile convert recorded in Acts, portrays a significant step in the process of expansion. The word was spreading and the church was on the threshold of a whole new phase of Jesus' promised progress (1:8).

10:1-2 This Caesarea, sometimes called Palestinian Caesarea, was located on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, thirty-two miles north of Joppa. The largest and most important port city on the Mediterranean in Palestine, Caesarea was the capital of the Roman province of Judea. This was the first city to have Gentile Christians and a non-Jewish church.

This Roman army officer, although stationed in Caesarea, would probably have had to return soon to Rome. Thus his conversion may have helped to spread the gospel to the empire's capital city. Because of frequent outbreaks of violence, Roman soldiers had to be stationed to keep peace throughout Israel. But most Romans, hated as conquerors, did not get along well in the nation. As an army officer, Cornelius was in a difficult position. He represented Rome, but he lived in Caesarea. During Cornelius's years in Israel, he had been conquered by the God of Israel. With a reputation as a devout man, Cornelius was respected by the Jews. Cornelius's faith had hands—he was regularly involved in activities that displayed his interest in serving others.

10:3-4 The time—about three o'clock—was likely one of Cornelius's regular times of prayer. This was one of the hours of prayer at the Temple. Cornelius may have prayed faithfully for many years before this day when an angel of God came to speak to him. Later, Cornelius would describe this angel as "a man in dazzling clothes" (10:30). Even this veteran soldier was terrified. God saw Cornelius's sincere faith. His prayers and generous giving had not gone unnoticed by God. God answers the sincere prayers of those who seek him by sending the right person or the right information at the right time.

10:5-6 God told Cornelius to send for a man named Simon Peter because Peter would give him more knowledge about the God he was already seeking to please. Cornelius was directed to Joppa (thirty-two miles south of Caesarea) to find Peter.

10:7-8 Cornelius obeyed the message of the angel and sent his most trusted aides to get Peter. Three men were sent—two household servants and a devout soldier, the latter of whom is described as one of his personal attendants. Obviously, the godly character of Cornelius had made an impact on those closest to him. The word used to describe Cornelius's account of what had happened is the word from which we get the term “exegesis” (exegesamenos), meaning to “explain” clearly and in detail.

PETER VISITS CORNELIUS / 10:9-33

Even as Cornelius's messengers were on their way to get Peter, the apostle was having a divine vision of his own. In this vision, three times Peter was commanded to kill and eat a number of unclean animals. Of Jewish descent, Peter was both horrified and confused by this strange dream. The meaning of the vision slowly became clear, however, when the messengers arrived and told their story (10:17-23).

10:9-10 Like Cornelius, Peter prayed daily. Morning and evening were the common times to pray, and evidently Peter made it a habit to pray in the middle of the day as well (see Nehemiah 1:4-11; Psalm 55:17; Daniel 6:10). This significant opening of the door to the Gentiles was God-directed, but note that the two men were devout, God-dependent, regular seekers of God through prayer. It is no coincidence that Peter and Cornelius were both found praying when God revealed more of himself to them.

Peter went up to the flat roof to pray. Houses in Bible times usually had flat roofs accessed by an outside staircase. The roof would have given Peter privacy. As he prayed, he was hungry and evidently fell into a trance while he was waiting for lunch to be prepared. During this trance God spoke to him.

10:11-14 Peter saw something like a large sheet being let down to earth from heaven. The voice, obviously that of someone in authority (probably God himself), told Peter that he was free to kill and eat the animals, including reptiles and birds. According to Jewish law, these particular foods were forbidden (see Leviticus 11). Peter, always ready to voice his opinion, expressed his conviction not to eat anything forbidden by the Jewish laws. The point of this vision, as was about to be made clear, was that God was working outside of Israel, beyond Israel, and if Peter was to be a part of what God was doing, he needed to understand that nothing was unclean.

10:15-16 This educating of Peter, as with the educating of most believers, took a little repetition—three times in this case. God was revealing something that would be startling to Peter’s Jewish mind; God was basically nullifying the Jewish dietary laws and, by analogy, God was preparing Peter to meet an unclean Gentile.

10:17-20 Peter was very perplexed, and his confusion is understandable. For centuries the dietary restrictions had been in place for devout Jews. As Peter reflected over what the vision meant, his God-sent visitors arrived to provide an opportunity for Peter to apply what the voice from heaven had said. Peter was to go with them without hesitation, for they would take him to see the real meaning behind the vision of the sheet and the animals.

10:21-22 Peter was greeted by three men at the door (10:19-20) who introduced the one they represented. Cornelius’s godly character had obviously built him a good reputation. Peter was informed of the heavenly message that Cornelius had received, and he recognized it as being somehow related to his own. The openness of Cornelius to whatever message Peter would have to say was a beautiful foreshadowing of the coming Gentile openness to the message of the Cross.

10:23-24 Peter had been staying at the house of Simon the leatherworker. Peter continued to remove barriers: not only was he staying in a place that his prejudices would have previously prohibited (see commentary on 9:42-43), he went a step further by inviting Gentiles into that home to be his guests. This kind of fellowship would have been unacceptable to a strict Jew. A sheet had been let down from heaven, and Peter’s eyes were being opened.

Peter was wise to take with him some other believers from Joppa (six believers, according to 11:12). Some things, particularly changes as radical as Peter suspected were on the horizon, were better observed firsthand rather than explained secondhand. Possibly Peter knew that it was easier for him to accept this new Gentile openness to the gospel because he had been present at the “Samaritan Pentecost” (8:15-17). If God were truly doing something new, it would be best that other believers could see it as well. The eagerness and expectation of Cornelius was obvious, for he called together his relatives and close friends, probably many, considering Cornelius's reputation for kindness and piety.

10:25-27 The reaction of Cornelius to Peter's arrival was that of one who felt he was in the presence of a messenger of God. Peter's statement, "I'm a human being like you," was profound. Certainly these words would be spread throughout the Gentile world, that the great apostle had equated himself with a Roman centurion.

10:28-29 Peter acknowledged his breaking of Jewish laws to enter this Gentile home, but he continued and gave the gathered audience the benefit of God's vision of the sheet from heaven. Peter had gotten the message. The vision was not primarily about food; the dietary issues were secondary to the human ones. The vision was from God and was about people, specifically those people whom the Jews (and, as a carryover, the Jewish Christians) still considered "unclean." Without reserve, Peter stated that God had shown him that he should never think of anyone as impure.

10:30-32 Cornelius recounted his experience for the sake of Peter and his gathered guests. Luke recorded it because it is a very important vision, and in each retelling, more details were added or emphasized. This will be repeated again by Peter in the next chapter (11:4-14). Here Cornelius added to his description of the angelic messenger, saying that he had been wearing dazzling clothes. Cornelius recounted to Peter what the angel had told him to do. Surely the specifics that had been given to Cornelius about Peter's whereabouts showed how God was behind this meeting.

10:33 Cornelius stated that those present were in a holy convocation—waiting before God—and that their sole purpose was to hear the message the Lord had given Peter. Cornelius had sure, solid confidence that God was about to speak to them through Peter, and on behalf of all those gathered there, he expressed eagerness to hear what God had to say. If ever there was an ideal audience for a preacher or teacher, this was it.

THE GENTILES HEAR THE GOOD NEWS / 10:34-43

Having been sovereignly (even miraculously) guided to the home of Cornelius and having been impressed by the truth that God doesn't show partiality (10:34), Peter took the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven given him by Christ (Matthew 16:19) and, in an epoch-changing moment, opened the door of salvation to the Gentiles.

10:34-35 Peter's words—God doesn't show partiality, every nation, he accepts those who fear him—express Peter's clear understanding of the universal application of Christ's work on the cross and the subsequent universal offer of the gospel. For more on God's acceptance of all kinds of people, see Ephesians 6:9; Colossians 3:25; James 2:1, 9; 1 Peter 1:17. Because God doesn't discriminate on the basis of race, economics, or sex, neither should any believers.

10:36 Assuming that his audience had already heard much of the information about the coming of Christ and the birth of the church, Peter proceeded to tell the story of Christ's life and death in detail. This is a beautiful summary of the teaching of the apostles, and it perfectly parallels the Gospel of Mark (who probably received much of his information from Peter). This verse expresses the clear purpose of the gospel—to provide an opportunity for people to experience peace with God. The means by which that happens is through Jesus Christ, to whom Peter referred here by the powerful title, Lord of all.

10:37-38 Peter started where Mark's Gospel does—with John the Baptist. He mentioned Christ's ministry, including the good works and healing Jesus had done. Peter's audience would likely have been familiar with most of these events. The miracles and the healings were a demonstration of Jesus' power over the Devil as well as the fact that God was with him and in fact had anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power (Isaiah 61:1-3; Luke 4:16-21). The anointing of which Peter was speaking had occurred at Jesus' baptism, when the Holy Spirit, in the form of a dove, had descended upon him (Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21-22).

10:39-41 In short order, Peter stated the fact that he and others had been witnesses to the ministry of Jesus, including his crucifixion and his resurrection. Peter acknowledged that there was no general appearance of Christ to the public but rather to those who had been chosen by God. In no way should that diminish the magnitude of the miracle or the credibility of the testimony of the witnesses. The fact that they had eaten and had drunk with him should squelch any rumor that Jesus had appeared in some "phantom" form. This was solid, decisive proof of Christ's resurrection and was confirmed by one who had been there, had seen it, and had participated fully in it.

10:42 Christ came to judge (see 2 Timothy 4:1; 1 Peter 4:5). The command of the resurrected Christ was for these witnesses to preach everywhere and to testify that Jesus is ordained of God to be the judge of all. He is the one before whom ultimately all people (Jew and Gentile alike) will stand and give account. For Christ's commands to the disciples, see Acts 1:8, also Matthew 28:18-20; Mark 16:15-18; Luke 24:47-48.

10:43 Christ came to forgive sin. In contrast to the preceding verse, Peter turned to the prophets' testimony for the flip side of judgment—salvation. Jesus Christ was the long-awaited Savior who would offer forgiveness of sins to everyone who believes in him (John 3:16). Two examples of prophets testifying about Jesus and his forgiveness of sins are Isaiah (see Isaiah 52:13–53:12) and Ezekiel (see Ezekiel 36:25-26).

Note again that Peter made it clear that this message is for everyone, not just the Jews. Everyone sins. Everyone needs to be saved. Everyone needs forgiveness. All that is needed is faith.

THE GENTILES RECEIVE THE HOLY SPIRIT / 10:44-48

To confirm the Gentiles' acceptance by God and their full inclusion in his Kingdom as heirs of grace, Luke recorded these new converts' experience of the Holy Spirit. Luke recorded the original Pentecost in chapter 2. Chapter 8 told of the "Samaritan Pentecost." This event could be called the "Gentile Pentecost." The Spirit came upon all those in attendance.

10:44 Peter's sermon was interrupted by the Holy Spirit, who fell upon all who had heard the message. Unlike the Samaritan believers who had waited between belief and the baptism of the Spirit, which had come by the laying on of apostolic hands (see 8:17-18), the Spirit fell on these Gentile believers, just as he had at the first Pentecost—no laying on of hands, no praying for the Spirit to fall; God just did it!

10:45-46a The Jewish believers who had accompanied Peter (10:23) were amazed that the same phenomena of Pentecost were being demonstrated on the Gentiles. As at Pentecost, reported in chapter 2, these Gentiles experienced speaking in tongues and praising God. This was a powerful testimony to Peter and his Jewish contingency of the necessity of fully accepting Gentile believers into the body of Christ. Whatever lingering questions Peter may have had about his vision of a sheet and animals or about Cornelius's visit by an angelic messenger would have been put aside in light of this event.

10:46b-48 In this case the believers were baptized after they received the Holy Spirit, publicly declaring their allegiance to Christ and identification with the Christian community. Peter's words (received the Holy Spirit just as we did) reveal the impressiveness of what they had just seen. It was undeniable, irrefutable evidence that God had come to the Gentiles. They were now full-fledged, Spirit-indwelled members of the body of Christ. These new Spirit-baptized believers were then baptized in the name of Jesus Christ. Peter was invited by his new Christian friends to stay with them for several days, presumably for further instruction on what had just happened and what was next in this new life in Christ.

PETER EXPLAINS HIS ACTIONS / 11:1-18

Word of Peter's eating with Gentiles caused a negative reaction among the Jewish believers back in Jerusalem. The incident violated Hebrew customs and presuppositions. Following a detailed explanation of events by a persuasive and changed Peter, however, the others became convinced that God had ordered these surprising circumstances. The Jerusalem church began to accept the Gentile mission.

11:1-3 Most Jewish believers thought that God offered salvation only to the Jews because God had given his law to them (Exodus 19–20). A group in Jerusalem believed that Gentiles could be saved, but only if they followed all the Jewish laws and traditions—in essence, if they became Jews before they became Christians (this would be the topic of discussion at the Jerusalem council—chapter 15). Thus, when Peter arrived back in Jerusalem, he was criticized for entering a Gentile home and then eating a meal with Gentiles. Both practices were terribly offensive to devout Jews who feared accidentally breaking one of their strict dietary regulations.

11:4-7 Peter then repeated to his critics exactly what had happened (see comments at 10:30). Evidently, he thought the best defense against his critics would be simply to tell the story as it happened. Peter wanted this potentially hostile (already critical) audience to know that he had been praying at the time that he saw the vision.

11:8-10 Peter repeated for his audience his refusal to “kill and eat” (11:7) these animals as instructed by the Lord. He quoted the response of the voice from heaven, instructing him that when God says something is acceptable not to say it isn't. Finally, he noted the threefold repetition of this dialogue between himself and the Lord, and the pulling of the sheet back up to heaven again. This event and all the effects of it in Cornelius's life became a primary argument for the Gentile mission in the early church.

11:11-12 Peter spoke of the arrival of the three men from Caesarea. Upon the command of no one less than the Holy Spirit, Peter had accompanied them, citing the Spirit's command not to worry about their being Gentiles. He had taken six fellow believers with him to witness what was to happen and help recall it accurately. Peter understood that God was at work and deduced that something controversial (or potentially divisive) might take place. The potential for misunderstanding was evidently great enough for these men to have also accompanied Peter back to Jerusalem to report to the apostles. Jewish law only required two witnesses. Peter's having six witnesses reveals the gravity of the issue and the significance of the event.

11:13-14 In two sentences Peter summarized the experience of Cornelius, which has already been recorded twice (see 10:1-7 and 10:30-32). It would be important to the Jewish audience to hear that an angelic messenger had also appeared to the principle Gentile figure in the drama.

Peter added a significant statement that had been excluded from the other accounts of Cornelius's experience: the angel had told Cornelius that he and all his household will be saved. In other words, God's intent from the start was to bring this Gentile soldier, along with his friends and family, to Christ.

11:15-17 Peter described that crucial moment in recounting his meeting with the Gentiles when the Holy Spirit fell on them, just as he fell on the Jewish believers at the beginning, referring to Pentecost (chapter 2). The Holy Spirit had come on these Gentile believers just as he had come on the Jewish believers. There was no difference between the two "Pentecosts" other than that the Jews' experience had come first. These subsequent events, parallel to Pentecost, proved to the Jerusalem church that they must accept each new group of converts (the Samaritans, the Gentiles) because God had put his guarantee on them by repeating Pentecost.

Peter added what he had been thinking when the event had occurred, for he remembered something the risen Christ had said right before his ascension: "John baptized with water, but you will be baptized with the Holy Spirit" (1:5). Up until the event in Cornelius's house, Peter (along with the rest of the Jewish believers) must have thought that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was reserved exclusively for Jewish believers. Having witnessed the baptism of the Holy Spirit on Gentile believers, Peter realized that Jesus' words had a much broader application. Jesus had also demonstrated clearly that he and his message were for all types of people. He had preached in Samaria (John 4:1-42), in the region of the Gerasenes (populated by Greeks, Mark 5:1-20), and had even reached out to Roman citizens (Luke 7:1-10). The apostles shouldn't have been surprised that they were called to do the same.

11:18 The theological discussion stopped with the report that God had given the Holy Spirit to the Gentiles. This was a turning point for the early church. They had to accept those whom God had chosen, even Gentiles.

The response was one of praising God as the congregation remarked on the fact that God has also given the Gentiles the privilege of turning from sin and receiving eternal life. This is a remarkable example of the spiritual health of this young church. Though steeped in centuries of Jewish rules and regulations, they had seen enough of God's wonders over the past few months to know that God was moving in some new ways. Even though they had the words and example of Christ pointing them toward the Gentile world (Matthew 28:19; Acts 1:8), they had to overcome enormous inertia. The fact that they were so open to what God was doing and so responsive to Peter's leadership speaks well of the work of the Spirit in their lives.

THE CHURCH IN ANTIOCH OF SYRIA / 11:19-30

The closing verses of chapter 9 and the record in chapter 10 describe Peter's preparation for the universal dissemination of the gospel; and the opening verses of chapter 11 describe the apostles' preparation for the universal nature of the gospel, then these final verses of chapter 11 describe the preparation of the church at Antioch for the same thing. The focus of the church is shifting to the north, to this incredible missionary church in Antioch of Syria. The balance of this chapter gives a close-up view of a church that can be used mightily of God to change an entire empire and, beyond it, the world.

11:19 As Peter was dealing with this new issue of Gentiles entering the church, God was at work elsewhere. Meanwhile, the seeds of missionary work were being sown after Stephen's death, for many believing Jews were persecuted and scattered, settling in faraway cities and spreading the gospel. The Good News was being preached, but only to Jews.

There was a large Jewish population in Antioch of Syria. When persecution against Christians broke out in Jerusalem after the death of Stephen, many Christians fled there—three hundred miles north of Jerusalem. An important commercial center and the third largest city in the Roman Empire (population 500,000), the city of Antioch was located fifteen miles inland from the Mediterranean Sea on the Orontes River. Under the Roman Empire, Antioch became the capital of the province of Syria. The city was beautified by Caesars Augustus and Tiberius, with the help of Herod the Great. The city enjoyed a beautiful location and abundant water supply. But Antioch was a horribly corrupt city and was the center of worship for several pagan cults that promoted sexual immorality and other forms of evil common to pagan religions. This city would be home to the church that would be the sovereignly chosen group to fund and direct the next decade of church expansion under a new missionary, Paul.

11:20-21 Cyprus is an island off the Mediterranean coast from Antioch, and Cyrene was a city in northern Africa. Fortunately, these believers had the courage to spread the gospel of the Lord Jesus outside of the confines of Judaism. When these believers spoke, the power of the Lord was upon them, and large numbers of these Gentiles believed and turned to the Lord.

Evidently, this small beginning turned Antioch into a place where the believers aggressively preached to the Gentiles. Philip had preached in Samaria (8:5), but the Samaritans were part Jewish. Peter had preached to Cornelius, but he already worshiped God (10:2). Believers who were scattered after the outbreak of persecution in Jerusalem spread the gospel to other Jews in the lands where they had fled (11:19). Finally, the believers began actively sharing the Good News with Gentiles, with great results.

11:22-24 Word of the happenings in Antioch prompted the leaders of the Jerusalem church to send someone to investigate. Barnabas was the emissary. He was a wise choice for a number of reasons. From Cyprus, he would have had a natural national connection with the evangelists who had started the movement in Antioch. Barnabas was a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and strong in faith. His name means “Son of Encouragement” (4:36), and he lived up to it as he encouraged the believers to stay true to the Lord. The ministry of the gospel was thriving—large numbers believed.

11:25-26 Saul had been sent to his home in Tarsus for protection after his conversion caused an uproar among the Jewish religious leaders in Jerusalem (9:26-30). He stayed there for several years before Barnabas brought him back to Antioch. Evidently, the work at Antioch had grown so that it was too much for Barnabas to handle alone. Barnabas and Paul’s ministry in Antioch was marked by their teaching. Those who became believers were consistently and systematically instructed by these two teachers in the basics of their newfound faith.

The young church at Antioch was a curious mixture of Jews (who spoke Greek or Aramaic) and Gentiles. It is significant that this was the first place where the believers were called Christians (“Christ’s ones”—the ending “-ian” means “belonging to the party of”). There has been a great deal of debate about who gave them the name “Christians.” It is not likely that the believers themselves invented the name, because they had other terms for themselves like “disciples” or “saints” or “brothers.” Certainly, the Jews would never want their term “Messiah” (christos) associated with this new movement. It is likely, therefore, that the term “Christian” was invented by the non-Christian culture of Antioch. One of the earliest extrabiblical occurrences of the term comes from a remark made by Emperor Nero. Whatever the case, the believers in Christ were becoming an identifiable group, distinct from Judaism and, at least in Antioch, primarily Gentile in composition.

11:27-28 Prophets were not limited to Old Testament times (see 13:1; 15:32; 21:9). God appointed certain people to be prophets to the church, and Paul ranked “prophets” second only to apostles in his list of those gifted by the Holy Spirit (1 Corinthians 12:28). The Jews believed that prophecy had ceased during the time of the exile but would resurface as a sign of the Messiah’s coming. Peter had quoted the prophet Joel in his sermon at Pentecost: “Your sons and daughters will prophesy” (2:17). Prophets had special gifts in ministering God’s messages to his people. At times, they would foretell the future (as Agabus did here), but the gift of prophecy was also valued for its role in exhorting, encouraging, and strengthening God’s people (1 Corinthians 14:31). God spoke through prophets, inspiring them with specific messages for particular times and places.

In the early church, these prophets seem to have traveled from place to place. Agabus predicted that a great famine was coming upon the entire Roman world. Agabus later would predict Paul’s arrest in Jerusalem (see 21:10-11). What happened was actually a series of famines during the reign of Emperor Claudius (41–54 A.D.). This enigmatic pair of verses seems to introduce the reason for the Antioch church’s support of the “mother” church in Jerusalem, mentioned in 11:29-30.

11:29-30 Because there were serious food shortages during this time due to the famine, the believers in Antioch assisted the church in Jerusalem. The daughter church had grown enough to be able to help the mother church. The solid reputation for the spiritual integrity of Barnabas and Saul is affirmed by the fact that they were the ones entrusted with the money. This visit was most likely the second visit of Paul to Jerusalem, occurring in about A.D. 46. This visit corresponds to Galatians 2:1-10. His first visit was in Acts 9:26-29, and that correlates with Galatians 1:18-20.

This is the first mention of elders in the New Testament (see 15:4, 6; 16:4; 21:18). Not much is known about their role in those days, but clearly, at least part of their responsibilities included managing the church’s financial affairs.

See 1 Timothy 3:1-7 and Titus 1:5-9 for a later listing of their qualifications; see 1 Peter 5:1-4 and Acts 20:28-32 for some clues as to their responsibilities.

The chapter ends with a very healthy picture of this burgeoning, young, and mostly Gentile church. They had two high-quality teachers, Barnabas and Saul. They had a solid contingency of giving saints—donating enough money to tend to the local needs of the congregation and send something to the “mother church” at Jerusalem. The idea of a Gentile-Christian congregation sending help to a Jewish-Christian church highlights the quality of its spiritual character.

JAMES IS KILLED AND PETER IS IMPRISONED / 12:1-5

The rapid growth of the church in Jerusalem (6:1) brought fierce opposition (8:1). Persecution often accompanies progress. Unable to stop the masses from embracing this new faith, the Jews launched a direct attack upon the Christian leaders. Beyond mere threats and warnings (see 4:18-21; 5:40), this time Herod had James executed and Peter arrested.

12:1 The church was growing dramatically, but the king was increasing the persecution. This was King Herod Agrippa I, the son of Aristobulus and grandson of Herod the Great. His sister was Herodias, who had been responsible for the death of John the Baptist (see Mark 6:17-28). Herod Agrippa I was partly Jewish. The Romans had appointed him to rule over most of Palestine, including the territories of Galilee, Perea, Judea, and Samaria. He began to persecute the Christians in order to please the Jewish leaders who opposed them, hoping to solidify his position. Agrippa is mentioned in the Bible only in this chapter. He died suddenly in A.D. 44 (see 12:20-23), a fact also recorded by the historian Josephus.

The Christian movement created an unexpected opportunity for Herod to gain new favor with the Jews. Gentiles began to be accepted into the church in large numbers. Many Jews had been tolerating this new movement as a sect within Judaism, but its rapid growth alarmed them. Persecution of Christians was revived, and even the apostles were not spared.

12:2 James and John were two of the original twelve disciples who followed Jesus. They had asked Jesus for special recognition in his Kingdom (Mark 10:35-40). Jesus said that to be a part of his Kingdom would mean suffering with him. James and John did indeed suffer—Herod had James killed with a sword (John was later exiled, Revelation 1:9). These two brothers were the first and the last apostles to die.

There is a great deal to be learned here from what did not happen to James and what did happen to Peter later in this chapter. Imagine being a part of both prayer meetings. The church surely had prayed as fervently for James as they did for Peter. Peter was miraculously set free; James was executed. Was there something wrong with the way the believers prayed for James as opposed to Peter? The wrong words? Scriptures? Posture? Was there not enough faith? Did God love Peter more than James? The answer to all these questions is, of course, no, but they are the kinds of questions Christians invariably ask when faced with such a clear example of the contrasting will of God for two lives. The sovereign choices of God in the lives of these two apostles—equally loved by God, needed by the church, and missed by their friends and family—should teach believers to trust God more.

12:3-4 Herod, in the self-serving spirit of the previous Herods of the New Testament, took special delight in the positive political benefits he received from executing James. Since James’s execution pleased the Jewish leaders, Herod Agrippa then arrested Peter during the Passover. This was a strategic move since more Jews were in the city than usual, and Herod could impress the most Jews by imprisoning the most visible of the church leaders.

Peter was well guarded by four squads of four soldiers each—each squad would have guarded Peter for one-fourth of a day! Evidently, Herod knew of Peter’s previous escape (5:19-24) and wanted to be sure that such would not happen this time. Luke stressed this detail to set the scene for the mighty power of God. No one could escape under human power alone.

12:5 Herod undoubtedly was planning to execute Peter, but the believers were praying earnestly for Peter’s safety. The earnest prayer of the church significantly affected the outcome of these events. The believers are here called the church, a clearly identified entity in Jerusalem.

PETER’S MIRACULOUS ESCAPE FROM PRISON / 12:6-19

James was already dead. Peter was in prison. From a human perspective, the situation appeared terribly grim, but from a heavenly perspective, this was just another opportunity to display the infinite power of God.

12:6 Luke carefully recorded the location of the soldiers (12:4) in charge of making sure this reputed jail-breaking apostle (5:19-24) did not slip away again and leave Herod with a serious public-relations problem. Two soldiers were chained to Peter, one on either side, and others were standing guard at the prison gate. Luke again stressed the power of God over earthly rulers.

12:7-8 This same type of jailbreak had happened to the apostles before, as recorded in 5:19-24, but more detail is given here. From his sleep, Peter was roused by an angel of the Lord and was told to get up. The command was accompanied by his chains falling off his wrists. The term for “falling off” comes from a Greek word meaning to “drop away.” Neither the angel nor Peter touched the chains—they came off because God was setting Peter free.

Nothing is written about the whereabouts of the guards, who were likely not the only prison guards around. A couple of them would have been posted at every gate, every door, and at any possible escape route from the prison. The soldiers may have been dazed, asleep, or blinded from the whole event. In the end, it would be a deadly miracle for them (12:19).

12:9-10 Peter seemed dazed as he followed the angel's instructions because he thought it was a vision. Peter thought this was similar to his experience with the sheet let down from heaven, recorded in chapter 10 (the same word is used here for "vision" that was used for his vision at Joppa in 10:17). They passed two guard posts before arriving at the iron gate which led to the street. With dramatic effect, the gate mysteriously, miraculously opened (the Greek is automate—"automatically"). The angel stayed with Peter a little longer, then suddenly left Peter alone.

12:11 Peter finally realized what had happened. He realized that the Lord had saved him. He knew Herod's plans to use Peter's incarceration (and possible execution) as another way to ingratiate himself to the Jews. Peter's awareness of his life-threatening situation, particularly in light of the recent execution of James (see 12:2), made his peaceful sleep in the prison cell all the more marvelous. Peter had seen enough to trust that the Father was in control of his life.

12:12 Once he realized that he was not dreaming, Peter went directly to the home of Mary, the mother of John Mark. Mentioned here in passing, John Mark was the author of the Gospel of Mark and became an important character on the first journey of Paul (see 13:5, 13; 15:37-39).

Mary's house was large enough to accommodate a meeting of many believers. An upstairs room in her house may have been the location of Jesus' last supper with his disciples (Luke 22:8) and/or the place where the 120 earliest believers met for prayer (1:15; 2:1). Evidently Mary's home was a common place of meeting for the Jerusalem church (or part of it), at least for prayer. This particular night, with their beloved Peter in prison and the apostle James recently martyred, a large group had gathered for prayer.

12:13-15 Peter knocked and Rhoda, a servant girl, answered the door. Mary's house must have had a vestibule or hallway to the street with an outer door at the street and an inner door opening into the house. Rhoda was so excited to hear

Peter's voice that she forgot to open the door! Meanwhile, the sober, serious saints, hard at the work of praying for Peter's release, failed to realize that the answer to their prayer was standing at the door, trying to get in! They even went so far as to accuse the poor girl of being crazy. At her insistence, they speculated that maybe Peter's angel was at the door, indicating they thought that he must have been executed already.

12:16 One wonders what was going through this usually impatient apostle's mind at this point. Certainly, his absence from prison would be noticed soon. The guards would likely know exactly where to look for him. The servant girl had recognized Peter's voice, but the others, so busy praying for Peter's release, wouldn't come to the door to let the freed apostle into the house! If ever people should stop praying and do something, that was the time! As Peter continued knocking, someone finally went to the outer door and opened it. Everyone was amazed.

12:17 The pandemonium was so loud that Peter had to quiet the crowd. He recounted the story of his escape and instructed that the information be passed on to James and the other brothers. This James was Jesus' brother, who became a leader in the Jerusalem church (15:13; Galatians 1:19). The James who had been killed earlier (12:2) was John's brother and one of the original twelve disciples. Peter's instruction to inform James indicates that James may have already been recognized as one of the leaders (if not the leader) of the Jerusalem church. Perhaps through this very series of events and this statement before the gathered church, Peter was officially moving out of direct leadership of the Jerusalem believers. Possibly he sensed that this latest brush with Herod was God's sovereign shifting of him to plow another field.

In short order, likely because of his certainty that Herod's soldiers would be after him, Peter went to another place. It is unknown exactly where he went.

12:18-19 Meanwhile, back at the prison, there was a great commotion. Under Roman law, guards who allowed a prisoner to escape were subject to the same punishment the prisoner was to receive. After a thorough search for Peter, these sixteen guards were sentenced to death.

Herod's departure to Caesarea sets up the next scene. The Jews considered Jerusalem their capital, but the Romans made Caesarea their headquarters in Palestine. That was where Herod lived. (For more on Caesarea, see commentary on 10:1.)

THE DEATH OF HEROD AGRIPPA I / 12:20-25

Herod Agrippa's fate should not surprise us. The Scriptures proclaim that pride goes before a fall. By foolishly setting himself against God and refusing to give him glory, Herod guaranteed his own disastrous demise.

12:20 Tyre and Sidon, coastal cities on the Mediterranean, were free and self-governing but economically dependent on Judea. It is unknown why Herod was very angry with them, but representatives from those cities were trying to appease him, probably through a bribe. Presumably, through Blastus, they asked for peace, needing the benefit of the Galilean market for their food.

12:21-22 Herod, bedecked in his royal robes, addressed the people of Tyre and Sidon, who were trying to get a trade agreement out of him. This was A.D. 44 and may have been just before Passover, approximately one year after Peter's escape from prison. The people had already bribed Herod's personal assistant, but here they also resorted to ridiculous flattery—shouting out to the ego-driven Herod that his voice was the voice of a god, not of a man. The Greek historian Josephus also recorded this event in his Antiquities of the Jews (19.334).

12:23 While neither account (Luke's or Josephus's) described Herod Agrippa's response to the crowd, Luke explained that God acted, and he did so instantly. An angel of the Lord was God's vehicle to strike Herod with a horrible illness, described in gory detail: So he was consumed with worms and died. Some scholars suggest that the worms were intestinal roundworms, which grow ten to sixteen inches long and rob the body of nutrients while causing intense pain.

The reason for this judgment was that Herod accepted the people's worship instead of giving the glory to God. God knew what was going on in Herod's heart and refused to share his glory with any earthly potentate. Pride is a serious sin. God chose to punish Herod's pride immediately. God does not immediately punish all sin, but he will bring all to judgment (Hebrews 9:27). Those who set themselves against God are doomed to ultimate failure.

12:24 In great contrast with the verse above, Luke described quite a different scenario for the church. God's Good News was spreading rapidly. The death of James, the imprisonment of Peter, and other persecutions had not slowed the steady expansion of the church.

12:25 This verse picks up from the story in 11:27-30, where Barnabas and Saul had been sent with the famine relief funds from the church at Antioch for the believers in Jerusalem. That had been their mission. Barnabas and Saul were probably not in Jerusalem for the events of this chapter; instead, they made the trip some time after Herod's death. Luke, in his arrangement of his materials, chose to put the events of Peter and Herod at this point in the story.

Upon the completion of their mission, Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch, having picked up John Mark in the process. John Mark was also Barnabas's cousin (Colossians 4:10). His mother, Mary, often would open her home to the church (12:12), so John Mark would have been exposed to most of the great teachers and teachings of the early church. He had become a believer and had the great opportunity to travel with these two men of God.

BARNABAS AND PAUL ARE SENT OUT / 13:1-3

Luke's history of the church changes focus to the Gentile ministry and the subsequent spread of the church around the world. Beginning in chapter 13 with the Spirit's selection of Paul and Barnabas to become special missionaries, Paul replaces Peter as the central figure in the book of Acts as the church continued its Spirit-led penetration farther out into the world beyond Jerusalem.

13:1 The church at Antioch of Syria became the sending center of the mission to reach the world (the last part of Jesus' commission in 1:8). This first verse gives us an idea of its truly international makeup and of the broad spectrum of people who were being reached by the gospel.

Until this point it appeared that Barnabas and Paul had been the principle teachers in the church of Antioch (11:26). This list shows, at least, these three others who were said to have had the gifts of being prophets and teachers. Barnabas appears first on the list because he was likely the leader of the group. Simeon, because of his black skin, has caused some speculation that this was the same Simon of Cyrene who carried the cross of Christ (Mark 15:21), but that is unknown. The next name on the list is a man from Cyrene by the name of Lucius. Cyrene was in North Africa. Lucius was probably among the Cyprian and Cyrenian men who first preached the gospel to Gentiles in Antioch (see 11:20-21). The fourth individual was Manaen, a childhood companion of King Herod Antipas. Saul was a highly trained rabbinic Jew and a Roman citizen. His name closes the list of this very diverse group. The social, geographic, and racial variety of these people shows that the Spirit of God had been moving rapidly and over a broad geographic area. Not only had the Good News spread to these areas, but the Spirit of God used cosmopolitan Antioch to put together a diverse team for the next "phase" of Kingdom expansion.

13:2-3 These believers were worshiping the Lord and fasting when God sent them a special message. Just as both Peter and Cornelius received messages while praying (chapter 10), so God spoke to these believers as they were seeking him. "Fasting" means going without food for a specified period of time in order to focus on the Lord. People who are fasting can set aside the time of preparing and eating meals and use it to worship and pray. Also, their hunger pangs will remind them of their complete dependence upon God (see also 2 Chronicles 20:3; Ezra 8:23; Esther 4:16; Matthew 6:16-18).

The Spirit spoke—possibly through one of the members of this group (there were prophets among them—13:1). The Spirit told them to dedicate Barnabas and Saul for the special work God had for them. The laying on of hands was a symbolic act that indicated public recognition of calling and ability as well as the association of a particular congregation with a ministry. The roots of the practice are found in the Old Testament, where it was used to set someone aside for an office (Numbers 27:23), bless someone (Genesis 48:14), or dedicate something to God (Leviticus 1:4). The church at Antioch was identifying itself with these two men and with their mission. With that, they sent them on their way.

PAUL’S FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY / 13:4-12

Having been chosen by God to embark on what came to be called the “first missionary journey,” Paul and his entourage (Barnabas and John Mark, at the very least) set sail. The target of this evangelistic thrust was the Gentile population of Asia Minor. They followed the communication routes of the Roman Empire—this made travel easier. They first visited Barnabas’s home country. Then they visited key population and cultural centers to reach as many people as possible.

13:4 The Holy Spirit was the central force in sending Saul and Barnabas (along with John Mark—13:5) on their journey. Seleucia was a seaport of Antioch, a few miles north of the city at the mouth of the Orontes River. Cyprus, an important island in the Mediterranean, was about one hundred miles to the southwest.

13:5 Salamis, the leading city on Cyprus, was their first stop. It was located on the east coast of the island and was the seat of government. As would become his custom for years, Saul began his witness in the Jewish synagogues (Romans 1:16). Saul’s credentials as a highly trained Pharisee—a former student of Gamaliel (22:3)—would have been more than enough to prompt an invitation to speak, at least until his reputation for bringing such a radical message began to precede him.

John Mark was on the trip as their assistant. The nature of Mark’s job is not spelled out, though the word used here (hupereten) has led to speculation that he instructed the new converts and also was in charge of practical needs.

13:6-7 The missionary team traveled the length of the island from east to west (about one hundred miles), arriving at the town of Paphos, a regional center of government. There they met a Jewish sorcerer (Greek: magos—which means “magician”). Bar-Jesus is further described as a false prophet. The governor, Sergius Paulus received news of the traveling Jewish evangelists and wanted to hear what they had to say. For Paul and Barnabas, presenting the gospel to the governor was a great opportunity (see 13:12).

13:8 Trouble was brewing, however, because Bar-Jesus realized that if Sergius Paulus believed in Christ, he would no longer need a sorcerer. Apparently Bar-Jesus’ Greek name was Elymas (meaning “sorcerer” or “magician”), and he was going to do his best to stop any influence Barnabas and Saul might have on the governor.

13:9-11 At this point Luke noted that Saul was also known as Paul. The implication is that he already had both names but began to go by the latter, preferring to use his Roman name for the balance of his Gentile-oriented mission. After this, Paul is always called by his Roman name in Luke’s record.

Paul was filled with the Holy Spirit, a phrase reminiscent of the way the apostles were used earlier in Acts (see 2:4; 4:8, 31; 7:55), as well as one of the requirements for the choosing of the “seven” in chapter 6. For the first time, Paul took center stage. Evidently this was a big turning point in Paul’s leadership of the mission.

Not intimidated by his spiritual rival, Paul boldly exposed the source of his sorcery. In Aramaic the name Bar-Jesus means “son of Jesus,” so Paul played on that name to confront him (in the presence of the listening Sergius Paulus) with the accusation that Bar-Jesus was actually a son of the Devil. This is the first recorded presentation of the word of God to the Roman world, and it would be crucial that a clear distinction be made between Christianity and the perverted spiritualism so prevalent in the Empire. Paul’s rhetorical questioning of the sorcerer turned to an announcement of judgment, telling him that the Lord’s punishment was on him. Instantly Bar-Jesus was struck with blindness.

13:12 This miracle was all it took to convince Sergius Paulus. He believed. Notice also that his astonishment was not at the powerful act he had just witnessed but rather at what he learned about the Lord. Sergius Paulus is the highest ranking converted official recorded in the New Testament.

PAUL PREACHES IN ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA / 13:13-43

Leaving the city of Paphos on the island of Cyprus, Paul and his companions sailed north, arriving at Perga. For an unknown reason, John Mark abruptly left the venture at that time and returned to Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas continued inland to Antioch of Pisidia.

13:13 Having traveled Barnabas's homeland (Cyprus) from coast to coast, the party boarded a ship for the mainland. They arrived at the province of Pamphylia, landing in the port town of Perga. Why John Mark left them is never explained. Perhaps:

- he was homesick;
- he resented the change in leadership from Barnabas (his cousin) to Paul;
- he became ill (an illness that may have affected all of them—see Galatians 4:13);
- he was unable to withstand the rigors and dangers of the missionary journey;
- he may have planned to go only that far but had not communicated this to Paul and Barnabas.

Paul implicitly accused John Mark of lacking commitment, and, therefore, Paul refused to take Mark along on another journey (see 15:37-38).

John Mark's story does not end here, though. It is clear from Paul's later letters that Paul grew to respect Mark (Colossians 4:10) and that he needed him in his work (2 Timothy 4:11). Somewhere along the way, John Mark was restored completely to usefulness even in the ministry of Paul. He later wrote the Gospel that bears his name.

13:14 This is Antioch of Pisidia, not Antioch of Syria, home of the sending church where the ministry was flourishing (11:26). This Antioch, in the region of Pisidia, was a hub of good roads and trade and had a large Jewish population. It had been founded in 281 B.C. by Seleucius I, and he had named it after his father, Antiochus. It had been declared a Roman colony city and became the most important city of southern Galatia. It had a mix of Romans, Greeks, Orientals, and Phrygians.

When they went to a new city to witness for Christ, Paul and Barnabas went first to the synagogue. They would go on the Sabbath, taking advantage of the Jewish custom of inviting itinerant teachers to speak (Jesus also did this—see, for example, Luke 4:16). Paul and Barnabas did not separate themselves from the synagogues but tried to show clearly that the very Scriptures the Jews studied pointed to Jesus.

13:15 In a synagogue service, first the “Shema” would be recited (this is Deuteronomy 6:4, which Jews would repeat several times daily). Then certain prayers would be spoken, followed by a reading from the books of Moses (Genesis through Deuteronomy), a reading from the Prophets (intended to illustrate the law), and a sermon. The invitation from those in charge was to speak a word of encouragement. Such an invitation was all Paul needed.

13:16 Paul's sermon, which continues from here to 13:41, probably was included as a typical example of what Paul would say to a synagogue gathering. It shows how Paul first preached the Good News to a Jewish congregation. The opening address to the people of Israel and to the devout Gentiles who fear the God of Israel covered both groups of possible worshipers—Jews by birth and Gentile God-fearers (see remarks about Cornelius at 10:2).

13:17-18 Paul began his message by emphasizing God's covenant with Israel. This was a point of agreement because all Jews were proud to be God's chosen people. His review of Israel's history is like Stephen's lengthy review of the same in his sermon to a Jewish crowd in Jerusalem (chapter 7). This was a common form of address known as a "historical retrospect"—a sketch of the course of God's work in the nation's history. Paul would move quickly from Abraham to Moses, Samuel, and David and eventually come to Jesus (13:23).

After the implied mention of Abraham (chose our ancestors), Paul moved on to Egypt. Moses' name is not mentioned, but rather, God is pictured leading Israel out of slavery.

13:19-21 He did not name the seven nations in Canaan whose land had been given to Israel as an inheritance—these were well known to Paul's audience (see Deuteronomy 7:1 for the list). The 450 years was an inclusive figure for all the events that had occurred so far in Paul's survey—from the move to Egypt (four hundred years), the wandering in the wilderness (forty years), through the distribution of the land under Joshua (ten years). Paul summarized the period of the judges with two words, judges ruled, leading up to the time of the prophets, beginning with Samuel, who was considered the first prophet. Israel's kingdom period began with Saul (1 Samuel 9:1-2), who was the first king.

13:22 Saul, of course, had been removed from the throne because of his disobedience (see 1 Samuel 13:1-14; 15:1-25). Then David had become the new king, replacing the rejected Saul, who did not possess the same heart for God (1 Samuel 13:14).

13:23 A large jump over Old Testament history occurred here, as Paul went from King David directly to one of his descendants, Jesus. Paul described Jesus as God's promised Savior of Israel. This is the only place recorded in Acts where Paul called Jesus "Savior." Peter used the same term in 5:31.

13:24-25 John the Baptist was the last of the prophets, the one who would prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. Yet even this great prophet had not considered himself worthy to be Jesus' slave. John's whole thrust was to try to turn Israel to the Savior by preaching that people should turn from sin and turn to God and be baptized. Turning away from sin and to God means an about-face from a sinful life to a life lived for God. Baptism with water was a way of publicly showing one's commitment to turn away from sin and toward God.

13:26 With this direct address to his Jewish brothers, Paul appealed for them to come to faith in Jesus Christ—the one to whom all the prophecies of their Scriptures pointed. The salvation that Christ offers is for both Jews (sons of Abraham) and devout Gentiles (fearers of God who aligned themselves to worship in the Jewish community).

13:27 Paul joined Peter and Stephen in blaming the Jews who rejected Christ (the people in Jerusalem and their leaders) for killing Jesus. Yet this had fulfilled prophecy (see Psalm 118:22; Isaiah 53:3). The failure of the Jews to recognize him as the one the prophets had written about was made all the worse by the fact that they had sat every Sabbath and had heard the prophets' words read. They had been exposed to the prophecies but had missed the fulfillment of those prophecies (see Luke 24:46; Acts 3:18).

13:28 Although the Jewish leaders found no just cause to execute him, they still asked Pilate to have him killed. Because of the Roman occupation of the land of Israel, the Jewish leaders could not carry out the execution. So, after the Jews had condemned Jesus, they had to get permission from the Roman ruler of their province—and that was Pilate. Pilate had even pointed out to the Jewish accusers the fact that they had no grounds for execution, but he gave in to their demands (Luke 23:4, 14-15, 22).

13:29-31 Jesus' death had fulfilled all the prophecies. Oddly enough, the very Jews who had killed Jesus were the ones who would have been the most well versed in all those prophecies. In their blindness they killed Jesus because they had refused to believe that he was their Messiah—all the while fulfilling the Scriptures about the death of their Messiah! After Jesus had been crucified on the cross, he had been placed in a tomb (Luke 23:44-56). But the tomb was not the end of the story. In this note of triumph, Paul reported what most would think impossible—God raised him from the dead (Luke 24). Without the Resurrection, there would be no gospel, no salvation, no Good News to spread. But Paul, though he had not been among the apostles to witness the Resurrection, had seen the risen Christ and, thus, could testify to the truth of this statement (9:1-6). The credibility of the Resurrection had also been affirmed by witnesses who had seen the resurrected Christ over a period of many days.

13:32-33 Paul tied together all of the events that he had been recounting to that moment when he and Barnabas were standing before them as the bearers of this Good News. The promise God had made to their common ancestors had come true. After centuries of waiting, watching, and wanting, the Messiah had come. His name is Jesus. To support this statement, Paul quoted from three Old Testament texts already considered by most Jews to have been referring to the Messiah—Psalm 2:7; Isaiah 55:3; and Psalm 16:10. In these verses, Psalm 2:7 pictures God the Father as speaking to his Son. This moment had been publicly recognized (although it already was a reality) in Christ's life on the day of his baptism (Luke 3:22; 9:35).

13:34 A more direct proof for the Resurrection came from Isaiah 55:3, which promised sacred blessings. This prophecy by Isaiah was a reference back to the covenant first promised to David by Nathan the prophet in 2 Samuel 7:6-16. The eternal throne did not find fulfillment in David. But in Jesus Christ, who rose from the dead, there is an eternal King who will reign forever.

13:35-37 Psalm 16:10 also offers proof of the promised Resurrection. This argument was the same one Peter had used on the day of Pentecost (see comments at 2:27) and was a strong promise of resurrection for the Holy One of God. Judging from the popularity of its use, this psalm must have been one of the strongest cases to the Jewish audience for the necessity of the resurrection of the Messiah. The words could not have referred to David, because David died and was buried, and his body decayed—many in Paul's audience had likely been to the site of David's tomb in Jerusalem. Therefore, Paul was saying that David must have been writing prophetically of one who would come after he had died, someone whom God raised and whose body did not decay. That person was Jesus of Nazareth.

13:38-39 With his scriptural support for the Resurrection stated, Paul explained the spiritual significance of what Christ had done; then he called his audience to believe. With Christ's substitutionary death and the approval of God as demonstrated in the Resurrection (Romans 1:4; 4:25), forgiveness of sins has been made available. This proclamation included the necessity of belief and the promise of being declared right with God, something that the Jewish law could never do. The law could not make people right with God. Because God is holy, he cannot accept people by simply disregarding or ignoring their sins. Nor can he accept his own people, the Jews, merely on the basis of their relationship to Abraham or by their trying to follow the law of Moses, for the sinful human nature had to be dealt with. God did this through the sacrificial death of his Son. Because of Christ's shed blood on the cross, people no longer have to bear the penalty for their sin—death (Romans 6:23). Jesus paid it all.

13:40-41 Paul's final words were words of warning. He drew from a common theme sounded by many of the prophets—Be careful. Paul cited Habakkuk 1:5 as a representative passage in which the prophet warned Judah of its impending judgment—the exile to Babylon. In the same way that their ancestors had failed to recognize what God was doing among them, Paul's audience was about to miss what God was doing in its day.

13:42-43 After the sermon the reception must have been positive, for Paul and Barnabas were invited to return the following week. But this warm welcome would not last long. The two groups addressed twice by Paul—Jews and godly converts (see remarks at 13:16, 26)—followed them out of the synagogue. These were probably the ones who were ready to respond to the message or perhaps even already had. The simple message from these two missionaries was to urge them, “By God's grace, remain faithful.” That is, they should continue in the direction they were headed.

PAUL TURNS TO THE GENTILES / 13:44-52

Declaring boldly the death and resurrection of Christ and the forgiveness that is possible only through him (see 13:38-39), Paul and Barnabas drew huge crowds on their second Sabbath in Antioch of Pisidia. Among those gathered were a number of jealous Jewish leaders (13:45). Despite efforts by these leaders to discredit Paul and his message, the assembled Gentiles eagerly embraced the gospel. This further enraged the Jewish leaders, who were eventually able to stir up a mob that ran Paul and Barnabas out of town.

13:44-45 In one short week, the news had spread through the city of Antioch so that almost the entire city turned out to hear what Paul and Barnabas had to say. This huge and unusual turnout was likely due to a Gentile influx rather than a Jewish one, since the Jewish attendance at the synagogue probably was fairly constant. The Jewish leaders in attendance were jealous and so they slandered Paul and argued with him, although it must have been difficult taking on this brilliant rabbi in a debate.

13:46-47 In answer to this jealous and abusive response from the Jews, Paul and Barnabas explained that it was necessary for them to go first to the Jews. God planned that through the Jewish nation, all the world would come to know him (Genesis 12:3). They, of all people, should have been the most ready for the fulfillment that had come in Christ. Paul quoted Isaiah 49:6. God had made the Jew to be a light to the Gentiles. He wanted them to be the privileged announcers of salvation. But it was not to be. They rejected the Good News, thereby judging themselves unworthy of eternal life. The evangelistic thrust was thus turned to Gentiles. God had planned for Israel to be the light (Isaiah 49:6). But Israel had forsaken that task, so it was given to the church to carry out.

13:48-49 Contrast this Gentile response to that of the Jews. They were very glad and thanked the Lord for his message. In a strong statement about the sovereign hand of God, Luke wrote: and all who were appointed to eternal life became believers. The Greek verb for “appointed” is tetagmenoi from tasso, a military word meaning to “arrange” or “assign.” Various people were “assigned” to eternal life by him (the unmentioned “Appointer”). The significance, of course, is the fact that these “appointed” were Gentiles.

Thus was set the pattern that would surface again and again—the Jews reject, the Gentiles respond in great numbers, and, in turn, the Jews become belligerent and often physically violent against the Christians. But still the Lord’s message spread.

13:50 The Jews used their contacts in high places—influential religious women and the leaders of the city—to drive Paul and Barnabas out of their part of the country. Christianity was not an official religion like Judaism, and these women and men may have feared that Paul would disturb their fragile relationship with the Roman government. This was a sad moment: those so desperately in need of salvation driving from their city the bearers of the Good News—news of forgiveness, of justification before God.

13:51 Often, Jews would shake off the dust of their feet when leaving a Gentile town, on the way back to their own land. For Paul and Barnabas to do this to Jews demonstrated that Jews who reject the Good News are not truly part of Israel and are no better than pagans. It was a gesture of utter scorn and disassociation. Jesus had told his disciples to shake from their feet the dust of any town that would not accept or listen to them (Mark 6:11). This symbolized cleansing themselves from the contamination of people who did not worship God. The disciples were not to blame if the gospel was rejected, as long as they had faithfully presented it.

13:52 In contrast with the paranoid, politicking Jews working hard to rid themselves of the gospel messengers, the believers, most of whom were Gentiles, were filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit. Like the coming of the Holy Spirit in Jerusalem at Pentecost (2:3-4), in Samaria at the laying on of the apostles' hands (8:17), and in Caesarea during Peter's preaching (10:44-46), the believers here were "filled with joy"—the kind of inexplicable and overflowing joy of one freshly filled with the loving, forgiving Spirit of God.

ACTS 14

PAUL AND BARNABAS IN ICONIUM / 14:1-7

Chased out of Antioch of Pisidia (13:50), Paul and Barnabas journeyed southeast to the region of Galatia, stopping first in the city of Iconium. Again the missionaries went straight to the synagogues, where they preached the Good News with great power and saw many believe in Christ.

14:1-2 Iconium was located about sixty miles east and a bit south of Antioch of Pisidia. What happened there confirmed the fact that the mighty movement of God in Antioch was no fluke—God was working with such power that a great number of both Jews and Gentiles were coming to faith. As in Antioch, Paul and Barnabas began in the synagogue, presumably preaching upon the invitation of the leaders there. But also as in Antioch, the Jews in Iconium opposed the gospel. They spurned God's message, rousing the Gentiles and stirring up distrust against Paul and Barnabas.

14:3-4 The persecution seems to have partially been the reason that Paul and Barnabas stayed in Iconium. As had been the case everywhere they had gone, God proved their message was true by giving them power to do miraculous signs and wonders—probably healing the sick and casting out demons. In Acts, signs and wonders are key to revealing the work of salvation in Christ and to proclaiming the gospel. They authenticated the apostles' authority. Even so, a rift developed and the people of the city were divided. Some believed the rumors and sided with the Jews, while others sided with the apostles.

14:5-7 A mob of Gentiles and Jews decided to attack the apostles and stone them. Fortunately, the apostles heard of the plan and fled for their lives. The opposition did not stop their message. Paul and Barnabas went to the region of Lycaonia. The next stop was Lystra, a smaller city about twenty miles south of Iconium. Paul may have picked this smaller place in order to let the storm of opposition quiet down a bit. The events that occurred in Derbe are recorded in 14:21.

PAUL AND BARNABAS IN LYSTRA AND DERBE / 14:8-20

At Lystra, the missionaries healed a man crippled from birth. The pagan Gentiles of the area saw this miracle and concluded that Paul and Barnabas must be Greek gods. Despite an immediate rejection of this foolish notion and loud explanations to the contrary, the apostles could barely convince them. Then the fickle mob turned murderous, prodded by some angry Jews from nearby Antioch and Iconium. Together they stoned Paul, dragged him out of Lystra, and left him for dead. Then, in one of most amazing moments of New Testament history, the bloody apostle got up and went back into the city. His joyful perseverance in the face of extreme persecution is testimony to the power of the Holy Spirit in a believer's life.

14:8 In contrast to what had been mostly a preaching ministry so far (although there is a reference to signs and wonders in Iconium—14:3), the major event of Lystra involved a man with crippled feet. This verse has the identical wording used in Luke's description of the lame man healed by Peter in 3:2. The fact of his being that way from birth assures that the healing was real. The people of the area would know beyond a shadow of a doubt that this person had a lifelong physical ailment that could not be cured.

14:9-10 Paul recognized the fact that this man had faith to be healed, so he addressed the man with authority. "Stand up!" the apostle commanded, and the man started walking for the first time ever. This is a wonderful example of how God changes lives. When Paul was sensitive to the moment, when he made himself available to be used by God, and when the crippled man put his faith in the power of God, then God worked a miracle! God wants to do big things in and through his people, but they need to live with a sense of eager expectancy. To see changes in their lives, believers must trust fully in God (Matthew 13:58).

14:11-13 Evidently, the crowd that witnessed this miracle was large. The response was immediate and emotional. Concluding that these men were gods in human bodies, they went so far as to decide that Paul was Hermes and Barnabas, Zeus. According to Greek and Roman mythology, Zeus and Hermes (the Roman names were Jupiter and Mercury) had once visited this city and, according to the legend, no one offered them hospitality except an old couple. So Zeus and Hermes killed the rest of the people and rewarded the old couple.

When the citizens of Lystra saw the miracles of Paul and Barnabas, they assumed that the gods were revisiting them. Remembering the story of what had happened to the previous citizens, they immediately honored Paul and Barnabas, showering them with gifts. The matter quickly got out of hand. The priest of the temple of Zeus was in the process of bringing oxen for a sacrifice. He would not want to be caught up short with such noble visitors in town!

14:14-15 Barnabas and Paul were horrified by news of an impending sacrifice on their behalf, so they tore their clothing, a common Jewish gesture of horror or sorrow. Paul and Barnabas affirmed the fact that they were not visiting gods but merely human beings just like the residents of Lystra. They immediately took advantage of the startled, gathered, and attentive crowd to preach the Good News. These sincere, excited believers in Zeus had been ready to spend the time, money, and effort to worship a god that didn't exist. So Paul directed them to the living God, who made the heaven and the earth. The residents of Lystra needed to redirect their affection and attention from these worthless things (referring to their pantheon of gods) to the one true God.

14:16-17 Contrast this sermon to a crowd of idol-worshiping pagans with Paul's sermon in chapter 13 to the Scripture-literate Jews. This message was perfectly designed for a crowd accustomed to superstitious worship built around the various gods of nature. This is one of two speeches to Gentiles recorded in Acts (see also 17:22-31) and differs from Jewish sermons in its absence of Old Testament references. This shows Paul's creative adaptability.

God had been trying to get the people's attention. The first witness these people should have noticed was the reminders that God had made and had given abundantly to all—the rain, the good crops, food, and even joyful hearts. This general revelation was in place to encourage all observers to seek God.

14:18 The impact of the miracle of the healed man was almost too strong to counter. The worshipers of Zeus refused to be deterred from worshiping these two "miracle workers." In spite of the message of the apostles, they could scarcely restrain what appeared to be a sacrificial ceremony. It is further testimony to the character of Paul and Barnabas that such was not allowed to happen.

14:19 A small Jewish contingent in Lystra may have informed Jews from Antioch and Iconium of the presence of these "troublemakers." The healing miracle would only have deepened the jealousy and heightened the resolve to take drastic action to rid themselves of them. The Jews turned the crowds into a murderous mob. Paul was stoned and dragged out of the city, left for dead. According to Scripture records, this is the only time Paul was stoned (2 Corinthians 11:25). Nothing is said about what they did to Barnabas.

14:20 This is one of the most powerful moments in the whole book. Paul, surely bloody and bruised from the stoning he had just endured, surrounded by believers (maybe some who had just come to faith through his ministry), got up and went back into the city. This courageous messenger, who had faithfully preached the Good News and had been hounded for it at every turn, got up, dusted himself off, and went back to work. Others would have quit, but not Paul. The next day he left for the next stop on his missionary journey—the town of Derbe.

PAUL AND BARNABAS RETURN TO ANTIOCH OF SYRIA / 14:21-28

Following a successful evangelistic campaign in Derbe, the missionaries backtracked through all the cities visited on their missionary journey. The goal was to strengthen the believers and to appoint elders in the churches. Having done this, Paul and Barnabas returned to their home base in Antioch of Syria and reported to the church there. This brief passage not only demonstrates God's grace and faithfulness, it also sets the stage for the coming controversy over the presence of newly converted Gentiles in a previously all-Jewish church.

14:21-22 Paul and Barnabas once again preached the Good News, this time in Derbe. The phrase, making many disciples, shows that there was more than just an evangelistic campaign in progress. There is no mention of opposition in Derbe. Perhaps that is why they were able to get to the discipleship phase of ministry.

Having reached the easternmost part of this first journey, as incredible as it must seem, Paul and Barnabas retraced their footsteps, returning to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch of Pisidia, even to places where they had experienced rejection of the most violent sort! What a courageous pair! They went home the hard way! The purpose of this return trip was mainly to strengthen the believers and encourage them to continue in the faith. Apparently, the believers left behind in these cities were facing persecution from the sources that had attacked Paul and Barnabas, for Paul had to tell them that they must enter into the Kingdom of God through many tribulations.

14:23 To evangelism and discipleship was added organization. The apostles established healthy churches in the areas where people responded to the gospel. They appointed elders (Greek presbuteros—the first reference to such in church history) in every church. The prayer and fasting recall the way this missionary team had been commissioned (13:3) and the meticulous spiritual process by which they proceeded through every major decision. The commissioning (turning them over to the care of the Lord) probably involved laying on of hands.

14:24-25 Paul and Barnabas had faced stoning in Lystra (14:19), a violent mob of Gentiles and Jews in Iconium (14:5), and a jealous, manipulating coalition of influential Jews in Antioch of Pisidia (13:50). Yet they retraced their footsteps exactly, returning to each place they had been. It seems that they had not preached in Perga on the outward leg of the journey. The record states only that John Mark had left them there (13:13). They may have left that region quickly and gone into higher ground because of sickness that had affected them. (This may have been the cause of John Mark's departure.) On the way back, however, they did minister in Perga.

14:26 From the port city of Attalia, they sailed back to Antioch of Syria, where their journey had begun. The road-weary travelers had completed the work for which they had been sent.

14:27-28 Paul and Barnabas returned to their sending church in Antioch and called the church together to report about their trip. Even though Paul and Barnabas had been the active subjects of the story, they made it clear that the real work had been done by God, who had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles. Paul and Barnabas had witnessed it with their own eyes.

Paul and Barnabas stayed there with the believers in Antioch for a long time. This journey had probably taken the better part of a year and had aroused the interest of the Jerusalem church, who would want the apostles' report as well (see the next chapter).

Paul probably wrote his letter to the Galatians while he was staying in Antioch (A.D. 48 or 49) after completing his first missionary journey. There are several theories as to what part of Galatia Paul was addressing, but most agree that Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe were part of that region for whom the letter was intended. Galatians was probably written before the Jerusalem council (chapter 15) because, in the letter, the question of whether Gentile believers should be required to follow Jewish law was not yet resolved. The council would meet to solve that problem, as recorded in the next chapter.

THE COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM / 15:1-21

As many Gentile believers came into the church, legalistic Jews demanded that these new converts be circumcised. Fierce arguing about this issue resulted in the first church council. At Jerusalem, the apostles and elders convened to consider the relationship between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians, between Moses' law and the gospel of grace.

The council concluded, based on the Old Testament book of Amos (as expounded by James, leader of the proceedings), and in light of the experiences of both Peter and Paul, that Gentiles were accepted. Further, the council ruled that salvation depended solely on simple belief in Jesus, not on keeping the law of Moses.

15:1 These men were of a group called the Judaizers (see comments on 15:5). They came from Judea (perhaps from Jerusalem) to Antioch; they held the opinion that Gentiles could not be saved unless they kept the ancient Jewish custom of circumcision taught by Moses.

God had originally made the covenant of circumcision with Abraham (Genesis 17). This covenant was a sign of Abraham's and his descendants' obedience to God in all matters, and it signified the Jews as God's covenant people. More than any other practice, circumcision separated God's people from their pagan neighbors. Circumcision became part of the law of Moses. The problem described in this verse involves the terms under which Gentiles could be admitted into the church. These Jews from Judea were not disputing that Gentiles could be saved. They were insisting, however, that Gentiles must adhere to the laws of Moses, including the physical rite of circumcision. In effect, this was tantamount to saying that Gentiles must first become Jews before they could become Christians.

To understand the Judaizers' actions, we need to understand their mind-set. In the early days, all of the believers were Jews. In fact, the early church was viewed as a sect within Judaism. The Judaizers concluded that Christianity was not intended to bypass Judaism but to build on it. Judaism, with its centuries of history and tradition, was the prerequisite. They saw Jesus (and his message) as the final step in the long process. The Judaizers were afraid that soon there would be more Gentile than Jewish Christians. Also, they were afraid that moral standards among believers would be weakened if they did not follow Jewish laws.

15:2 This was no small difference of opinion. The Greek words for disagreeing and argued forcefully convey the idea of great strife, discord, disunion. This debate over circumcision and keeping the law was a major dispute, a serious theological and ecclesiastical crisis. If not handled wisely, the debate could have split the church. So Paul and Barnabas were sent to Jerusalem, accompanied by some local believers. They would meet with the apostles and elders in Jerusalem about this question.

15:3 On their journey to Jerusalem (a trip of about three hundred miles), Paul and Barnabas paid visits to several congregations. The church in Phoenicia was founded by believers who had fled from Jerusalem (11:19); Samaria had been evangelized by Philip (8:5). Rather than being alarmed at the news of the conversion of Gentiles, these believers expressed much joy.

15:4 The language of the text suggests a public meeting. This group welcomed Paul and Barnabas who then reported to the church that the events in question were things God had been doing through their ministry. The implication is that divine activity must indicate divine will. God surely would not be drawing the Gentiles to himself if he did not want them in his church or if they still had to fulfill other requirements before they could be saved.

15:5 These Christians had been Pharisees before their conversion (like Paul). They found themselves having compatible views with Christianity because Pharisees believed in resurrection and in a Messiah, but many were reluctant to accept anyone who did not adhere to the oral tradition of law in addition to the Scriptures (Torah). Since only God knows the human heart, it is impossible to make a blanket statement regarding the eternal “destination” of this group. Probably some were sincere believers in the resurrection of Christ and his claim to be the Messiah (though obviously confused about the relationship between law and grace). Others likely were blindly trusting in their own moralistic efforts to make them acceptable to God. Still others may have been infiltrators with evil motives. Whatever these believers’ individual status before God, the common concern of all in the Judaizer camp was that all Gentile converts be required to follow the law of Moses, especially regarding circumcision.

15:6 The exact makeup of this council is unknown. Other apostles (besides Peter, Paul, and James) may have been summoned and present. Verses 12 and 22 indicate that this discussion took place in the presence of the entire congregation. But the clear implication is that the church leaders, the apostles and church elders (and not the whole assembly), deliberated and decided this volatile issue.

15:7 The Gentile question prompted a long discussion. After lengthy interaction, Peter shared his experience of how God had used him to preach to the Gentiles. Specifically, he was referring to the incident described in chapter 10, where God had sovereignly led him to share the Good News with the Gentile Cornelius. If the Jerusalem council took place in about A.D. 50, then Peter was referring to an event that had occurred about ten years earlier.

15:8-9 Jews considered Gentiles impure and required them to undergo proselyte baptism in order to convert to Judaism. Peter made it clear that God had purified Cornelius and his family as a result of faith alone. God had made no distinction between them as Gentiles and the Jewish believers (see 10:34-48). All kinds of people have access to forgiveness and eternal life through their faith in Christ.

Peter bolstered his argument by noting God's outpouring of the Spirit. The Gentiles had received the Holy Spirit when they believed (through faith), not because they had done any works of the law (see 10:44-46; Galatians 3:2). The presence of the Spirit in them was the clearest evidence of their acceptance by God (Romans 8:9).

15:10-11 Peter warned that by making strict adherence to the law a prerequisite for salvation, the church would be guilty of questioning God's way (that is, doubting his wisdom and plan and thus arrogantly pursuing a different course of action). Furthermore, the Jewish believers would be putting an unbearable yoke on the Gentiles. The word "yoke" was a common figurative term for religious "obligations." It was the heavy wooden harness used by oxen to pull carts or plows. Here it suggests less of a religious duty and more of an onerous burden (see Matthew 23:4; 11:28-30).

If the law was a yoke that neither the Jews of that day nor their ancestors had been able to bear, however, how did having the law help them throughout their history? Paul wrote that the law had been a guide that had pointed out their sins so they could repent and return to God and right living (see Galatians 3:24-25). It was, and still is, impossible to obey the law completely. That would be a burden too hard for any human being.

In effect, Peter urged the council not to advocate a double standard. Salvation—whether for Jew or Gentile—is by the special favor of the Lord Jesus (see Ephesians 2:8-9). What the law could never do, God did through Jesus Christ (Romans 8:1-4). No one deserves to be saved, and no religious, intellectual, or moral effort can earn salvation because it comes only from God's mercy and love. To receive God's salvation, people must acknowledge that they cannot save themselves and that only God can save them. Then they must trust in Christ.

15:12 In much the same manner as Peter, Barnabas and Paul related their recent experiences in ministry among the Gentiles. What gave their presentation added authority was the report of miraculous signs and wonders God had done through them among the Gentiles. The missionaries gave full credit to God for these miracles. The clear implication is that these supernatural events signified God's endorsement and blessing of their ministry to non-Jews (see commentary on 14:3).

15:13-14 James was Jesus' half brother (Galatians 1:18-19) and the writer of the Epistle of James (perhaps already written and distributed prior to this council). James became the leader of the church in Jerusalem (12:17). We don't know how James attained that important position (Clement of Alexandria wrote that he was chosen for the office by Peter and John), but clearly he was the leader. When this controversy over Gentile believers threatened to divide the church, Barnabas and Paul met with the elders and apostles in Jerusalem and submitted their authority to James as the moderator, spokesman, and announcer of the final decision.

The phrase, God first visited, is important because it underlines the truth that God had already made clear his plan to include Gentiles in the church before Paul and Barnabas ever went on the first missionary venture. The phrase, to take from them a people for himself (previously used only of the Jews as the people of God), here describes the Gentiles. This would have been heard as a remarkable statement by James.

15:15-18 Recognizing the need to base any forthcoming decision on something more substantial than mere experience, James went to the Scriptures. He demonstrated how the conversion of Gentiles agrees with what the Old Testament prophets predicted. This was the ultimate test.

Scholars have long wondered about this passage of Acts and the Old Testament quote it contains. James's quote includes a text of Amos 9:11-12 different from the Hebrew text and even from the Septuagint (an ancient Greek translation of the Old Testament). It is not clear why James did this, but it is obvious how he understood and applied this passage to the crisis facing the early church. In God's judgment the kingdom of David had fallen and was reduced to ruins. God's covenant with David stated that one of David's descendants would always sit on his throne (2 Samuel 7:12-16). The exile of the Jews made this promise seem impossible. But God would rebuild and restore the kingdom to its promised glory. This was a promise to both Israel and Judah, not to be fulfilled by an earthly, political ruler but by the Messiah, who would renew the spiritual Kingdom and rule forever. James quoted these verses, finding this promise fulfilled in Christ's resurrection and in the presence of both Jews and Gentiles in the church. When God brings in the Gentiles, he is restoring the ruins. After the Gentiles are called together, God will renew and restore the fortunes of the new Israel. All the land that was once under David's rule will again be part of God's nation.

Even though James quoted just one prophet, Amos, he said "prophets" (plural), perhaps alluding to other written Scriptures, like Isaiah 2:2; 11:10; 25:8-9; and Zechariah 8:23. His main point was that Gentile salvation apart from the law does not in any way contradict the Old Testament Scriptures.

15:19-21 Without explicitly mentioning circumcision, James echoed Peter's argument by ruling that we (referring to the leaders in the church who were Jewish) should stop troubling the Gentiles. This was, in effect, a rejection of the circumcision requirement. But this judgment did include the stipulation that the Gentile converts should abstain from eating meat sacrificed to idols. This was a problem in the New Testament churches whereby meat was first sacrificed to idols and then sold in butcher shops (see 1 Corinthians 8:1-13; 10:18-33). They were also to abstain from sexual immorality, which was often a part of idol worship, although this probably referred to the common Gentile violation of Levitical matrimonial laws against marrying close relatives. The prohibition here was probably meant regarding prohibited marriage relationships like incest and homosexuality (see Leviticus 18:6-20). Finally, they were to abstain from consuming blood or eating the meat of strangled animals. This reflected the biblical teaching that life is in the blood. Strangling an animal would keep the blood in the circulatory system and not drained away, thus causing blood to be eaten with the meat (see Genesis 9:4; Leviticus 17:10-14).

If Gentile Christians would abstain from these practices, they would please God and get along better with their Jewish brothers and sisters in Christ. Of course, there were other actions inappropriate for believers, but the Jews were especially concerned about these. This ruling reflected the law of love (described by Paul in 1 Corinthians 8-10). There was a sense in which the Jews needed to be patient with these new Gentile believers who were not familiar with all the Old Testament laws and rituals. And there was a sense in which the Gentiles needed to be sensitive to the Jews who were there first—being careful not to offend.

THE LETTER FOR GENTILE BELIEVERS / 15:22-35

The Jerusalem council summarized in a letter its decision regarding Gentile circumcision. This letter was carried to Antioch of Syria by Judas and Silas. Paul and Barnabas accompanied these specially chosen messengers. This directive brought joy to the believers at Antioch. The Jerusalem entourage stayed for a while, strengthening the believers and teaching the word of the Lord.

15:22 The apostles did not hold a church office but a position and function based on specific gifts (see 1 Corinthians 12:28). Elders were appointed to lead and manage the local church. In this meeting, the apostles submitted to the judgment of an elder—James, Jesus' half brother.

A representative from the Jewish believers and one from the Gentile believers were appointed as delegates to go with Paul and Barnabas to deliver the council's decision to Antioch of Syria and the surrounding churches. Judas was a Jew; Silas was a Greek. Their presence together would give credence to the council's ruling. Later, Silas would accompany Paul on the second missionary journey in place of Barnabas, who would visit different cities with John Mark. Peter referred to Silas as the coauthor of 1 Peter (1 Peter 5:12), but it is not known when he joined Peter.

15:23 This letter concisely summarized the findings of the Jerusalem council. It would serve to validate the verbal report that Paul, Barnabas, Judas, and Silas would be delivering to the Gentile believers in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia.

15:24-27 In this letter, the Jerusalem church disassociated itself from those men who had troubled the Gentile converts regarding circumcision. They had received no such instructions from the apostles and had been acting without their approval. They were not to be regarded as spokesmen for the church. Rather, the men bringing the letter (Paul, Barnabas, Judas, and Silas) had been chosen as representatives of the church, with authority to speak on behalf of the elders and apostles.

15:28-29 The letter implies a clear leading of God in the decision rendered (it seemed good to the Holy Spirit). Two of the council's requirements involved issues of morality (avoiding idolatry and sexual immorality), and two involved issues of food. The dietary restrictions were because the early church often shared common meals (similar to modern-day church potluck dinners). Sometimes called “love feasts” and held in conjunction with the Lord’s Supper (see 1 Corinthians 11:17-34), these meals would bring Jews and Gentiles together. In such settings, a Gentile might horrify the Jewish Christians by eating meat that was not kosher. In this compromise agreement, legalistic Jews no longer insisted that the Gentiles had to be circumcised to be saved, and the Gentiles accepted a change in their eating habits. These decisions should not be regarded as divine ordinances but rather as stipulations for fellowship between the two parties. Their concerns were not so much theological as practical. For more discussion on these four stipulations, see comments at 15:19-20.

15:30-31 Luke painted a picture of a teachable, eager church in Antioch. Whereas the false teaching of the legalists had been burdensome and a source of great confusion, the divine wisdom behind the ruling of James and the elders resulted in a joyful, encouraged congregation. The law obligates; the gospel liberates.

The end result of the potential crisis was great joy. It’s easy to see why. First, a wise and careful approach to conflict resolution had been followed. Second, the leaders had ruled only after lengthy discussion and leading by the Spirit. Third, the members of the church had submitted to their God-appointed leadership. Churches today would be much happier and more peaceful if they followed these principles when handling conflict.

15:32-33 Judas and Silas remained in Antioch and used their prophetic gifts (see commentary on 11:27-28) encouraging and strengthening the believers’ faith. They then returned to Jerusalem. Several of the more reliable, ancient manuscripts do not contain verse 34.

15:35 The length of Paul and Barnabas’s stay in Antioch is not known. The fact, however, that many others were teaching and preaching there opened up the opportunity for Paul to attempt another missionary endeavor.

PAUL AND BARNABAS SEPARATE / 15:36-41

When the time came for a second missionary journey, Barnabas and Paul had a sharp disagreement concerning John Mark. Barnabas wanted to take this young man, his nephew, but Paul refused, citing John Mark’s desertion during the first evangelistic endeavor. This incident demonstrates the sovereignty of God as two missionary teams were formed: Paul and Silas, and Barnabas and Mark. Even though no further word is given regarding the results of Barnabas and Mark's evangelistic efforts, we see Kingdom messengers departing Antioch in two directions.

15:36 Paul wanted to take another trip, primarily to revisit the churches that had been established on the first missionary journey. Evangelism would prove to be a major component of Paul's mission, but establishing and equipping the new believers were his primary objectives (see Ephesians 4:11-12).

15:37-39 The grand plan of Paul and Barnabas to launch a follow-up campaign quickly unraveled when the topic of John Mark came up. The men disagreed over the inclusion of this young believer on another missionary trip. Paul adamantly did not want to take him along. Because he had deserted them on the first journey (13:13), Paul felt that he would be an unreliable person to have along. The debate between the old colleagues became heated—they disagreed strongly and ended up separating. Each formed his own missionary team. Barnabas took John Mark and sailed west to Cyprus. These two are not mentioned again in the book of Acts. It is important to note that the disagreement was not about theology. Both men would continue to teach the true gospel message. Through this disagreement God doubled the missionary effort.

15:40-41 Paul's second missionary journey, this time with Silas as his partner, began approximately three years after his first one ended. The two visited many of the cities covered on Paul's first journey, plus others. This journey would lay the groundwork for the church in Greece.

Silas had been involved in the Jerusalem council; he was one of the two men chosen to represent the Jerusalem church by taking the letter and decision back to Antioch (15:22). Paul, from the Antioch church, chose Silas, from the Jerusalem church, and they traveled together to many cities to spread the Good News. This teamwork demonstrated the church's unity after the decision at the Jerusalem council.

PAUL'S SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY / 16:1-5

Acts 16 records Paul and Silas embarking on what is called the second missionary journey. A few verses describe a quick trek over the cities of the first journey and a series of divine prohibitions about going in certain directions. Then Paul had a vision of a man in Macedonia calling out for help, and God's door swung wide open in a new direction.

16:1 Acts 14:6-21 describes the rough treatment Paul and Barnabas had received during their last visit to the city of Lystra. That was where Paul had been stoned (likely the only stoning of his ministry), dragged out of the city, and left for dead. Paul had already gone back to that city once (14:21), and on this second journey, he returned again. If anyone ever doubted Paul's courage or tenacity, this verse ought to change that opinion! So concerned was Paul for the believers in these cities that he risked his life to make sure they were growing in the faith.

In Lystra lived a young disciple named Timothy. He probably had become a Christian after Paul's first visit to Lystra. Timothy had already had solid Jewish training in the Scriptures from his mother (a Jewish believer) and grandmother (see 2 Timothy 1:5; 3:15). When Paul arrived on this second journey, Timothy had grown into a respected disciple of Jesus. Verses 1 and 3 mention that Timothy's father was a Greek; verse 3 explains why that mattered.

16:2-3 Timothy's excellent reputation in the church and, evidently, Paul's need for an assistant compelled Paul to invite Timothy to join them on their journey. Apparently, Timothy wanted to go, for he submitted to being circumcised before they left—clearly a mark of his commitment. Timothy was the son of a Jewish mother and Greek father. Under Jewish rabbinic law, since his mother was Jewish, Timothy was Jewish and needed to fulfill the covenant. So Paul asked Timothy to be circumcised in order to remove some of the stigma that might have hindered his effectiveness in ministering to Jewish believers. Timothy's mixed Greek/Jewish background could have created problems on their missionary journeys because many of their audiences would contain Jews who were concerned about keeping this tradition. Timothy's submission to the rite of circumcision helped to avoid that potential problem.

Paul may appear to be inconsistent here with his teaching in Galatians 2:3-5, where he refused to let Titus be circumcised. This is easily resolved when considering the difference in the circumstances of the two situations. In Galatia, circumcision was being proclaimed (heretically!) as a method of justification. Paul wanted to clarify that it was not, so he intentionally left Titus uncircumcised to make his point. Here in Lystra, early on in his evangelistic endeavors, Paul was more intent on avoiding any potential offense that might hinder the spread of the gospel (see Romans 9:32-33; 1 Peter 2:8; 1 Corinthians 1:23; 9:19-23). Although the Jerusalem council had just ruled that circumcision was not necessary for Gentiles, Paul apparently thought that Timothy's mixed religious background might hinder his effectiveness. So, because Timothy was partly Jewish, he was circumcised. This was merely for effectiveness in spreading the gospel, not as a prerequisite for salvation.

16:4-5 At least one of the new items on the agenda of this trip was explaining the decision regarding the commandments that were to be obeyed, as had been decided by the apostles and elders at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15). The Jewish/Gentile issues that had been decided at the council would likely arise again in the largely Gentile areas where Paul was traveling.

Rapid growth was important to this first part of the "Gentile" thrust of the gospel. Critics of Paul's Gentile-oriented ministry (especially the Jewish element) would be waiting greedily for an opening with which to shut Paul down or at least diminish his influence. Yet here, in the first real penetration of the gospel into the Gentile world, the church thrived in exactly the same way the mostly Jewish church had in its early days.

A CALL FROM MACEDONIA / 16:6-10

Forbidden by the Holy Spirit to go into the provinces of Asia and Bithynia, Paul and his companions were directed instead past Mysia to the city of Troas. There Paul had a divine vision instructing him to go to Macedonia. These supernatural events served to underline the sovereign guidance of God in Paul's evangelistic efforts. Sometime during the events described in this passage, Luke became part of Paul's entourage (see the pronoun "we" in 16:10).

16:6 The regions of Phrygia and Galatia included much of modern-day Turkey, yet God, for reasons known only to him, did not allow the missionaries to go into the province of Asia at that time. "Asia" referred not to the continent but rather to the Roman province that was the western part of what is today called Asia Minor. Ephesus probably would have been the leading city in this region.

16:7-8 The travelers moved on to the border of Mysia and headed for the province of Bithynia, a province just to the northeast of Asia, but again they were prohibited by God himself. The Spirit of Jesus is another name for the Holy Spirit (see Romans 8:9; Galatians 4:6; Philippians 1:19). The Holy Spirit had closed the door twice for Paul, so Paul must have wondered which geographical direction God wanted him to take in spreading the gospel. Paul and Silas went on through Mysia to the city of Troas. There, at last, God opened the door.

16:9-10 Finally God spoke. During the night, Paul had a vision in which he saw a man from Macedonia who was pleading, “Come over here and help us.” (See 9:10, 12; 10:3, 17; 18:9; 22:17 for other references of God communicating through visions.) Macedonia had been a Roman province since 146 B.C. and was located in what is today northern Greece.

The group decided to leave right away, knowing that God was calling them. In the first of many sections where this occurs, Luke unobtrusively introduced his presence on this part of the journey by the simple use of the plural pronouns we and us. The traveling group consisted at least of Paul, Silas, Timothy, and Luke. Clearly, Luke had experienced what he wrote.

LYDIA OF PHILIPPI BELIEVES IN JESUS / 16:11-15

In response to the Macedonian call, Paul and his associates immediately boarded a ship at Troas and sailed across the Aegean Sea, landing at Neapolis, the port city for Philippi (in what is now northern Greece). Acts 16 highlights the stories of three individuals who became believers through Paul’s ministry in Philippi: Lydia, the influential businesswoman (16:14), the demon-possessed slave girl (16:16-18), and the jailer (16:27-30). The gospel was affecting all strata of society, just as it does today.

16:11-12 The travelers made their way across the upper portion of the Aegean Sea from Troas to Samothrace (a small island in the Aegean), then on to Neapolis, the port city for Philippi. From Neapolis, Philippi was a ten-mile journey inland.

Philippi was a major city of the district, although it was not the capital. With mountains on every side and its port city of Neapolis on the Aegean Sea, Philippi had originally been a strategic site in the Greek Empire. Gold had been discovered at Mount Pangaeum to the west, tempting settlers from the Aegean island of Thasos to seize the area. They founded a city near the site of Philippi, naming it Krenides (meaning “spring”) for the spring-fed marshlands in the valley. When Philip II of Macedon (the father of Alexander the Great) ascended the throne of the Greek Empire, he captured the city (in about 357 B.C.), enlarged and strengthened it, and gave it his name. Philip used the yield of the gold mines to outfit his army.

In 168 B.C., the Romans conquered Macedonia. The mountain's gold was exhausted, and the city declined. On the plains surrounding the city, Augustus defeated Brutus and Cassius (assassins of Julius Caesar). In 42 B.C., Augustus gave the city the status of a Roman colony to celebrate his victory. A colony was considered a part of Rome itself. Its people were Roman citizens (a standing that carried high privilege), had the right to vote, were governed by their own senate, and had Roman laws and the Latin language. Later, the city received the right to the Law of Italy, giving it many privileges and immunities—most significantly, immunity from taxation. Philippi was also a garrison city with a Roman garrison stationed there to keep it secure. The Philippians were proud of their Roman heritage and standing. Philippi also boasted a fine school of medicine. Luke may have attended medical school in Philippi. Later, Paul would write a letter to the church he started in this city—the book of Philippians (probably from prison in Rome around A.D. 61). The letter is personal and tender, showing Paul's deep friendship with the believers there. The ministry in Philippi would be significant. The positive response to the gospel in this city, as described in the next few verses, was likely the reason for the missionary team remaining there for several days.

16:13 Inscribed on the arches outside the city of Philippi was a prohibition against bringing an unrecognized religion into the city; this may have been the reason for the prayer meeting being held outside the city, on a riverbank. Ten Jewish males were necessary in a location to establish a synagogue. It appears there was no synagogue in Philippi, forcing Paul and his companions to search for the seekers of God elsewhere. They supposed that some people met for prayer at a location by the river (the Gangites River was a mile or so west of the city), and they did find and speak with some women there who had gathered for prayer. Jews typically gathered by rivers for prayer when a local synagogue was not available.

Paul's first evangelistic contact in Macedonia was with a small group of women. Paul never allowed gender or cultural differences to keep him from preaching the gospel. He presented the gospel to these women, and Lydia, an influential merchant, believed. This opened the way for ministry in that region. In the early church, God often worked in and through women.

16:14 Lydia was a merchant of expensive purple cloth, a valuable and expensive material often worn as a sign of nobility or royalty. Lydia may have been a wealthy businesswoman. She was obviously a person of means, since she had guest rooms (16:15) and servants. Greek women of Lydia's day held elevated status and were able to conduct business and hold honorary public titles. Thyatira was a city known for its commerce, so Lydia may have brought her business to Philippi from there.

Lydia was a worshiper of God. This is similar to the almost technical description of Gentiles who were not official proselytes to Judaism but who did worship the God of Abraham (see the commentary on Cornelius at 10:2). Lydia was sincerely seeking the Lord, and the Lord was about to meet her. God was at work, for he opened her heart to respond.

16:15 After Lydia's conversion, she was baptized along with other members of her household. These same words are used to describe other conversions in Acts—Cornelius in 10:24, 44; the Philippian jailer in 16:31; and Crispus in 18:8 (see also Romans 16:10-11; 1 Corinthians 1:16). The other members of Lydia's household may have included servants as well as children. It is assumed, of course, that only those who truly had come to believe in Christ were baptized. As is commonly the case, however, the Lord may have reached whole families through the salvation of one of the members who shared the Good News with the other family members. Lydia's sincerity and the genuineness of her conversion appear in her invitation to the missionaries to use her house as their home base while in Philippi. Lydia urged the travelers to stay at her home.

PAUL AND SILAS IN PRISON / 16:16-40

While in Philippi, Paul's missionary team encountered a demon-possessed slave girl who continually attempted to disrupt their ministry. When an exasperated Paul commanded the evil spirit to come out of her, the girl lost her fortune-telling ability. This infuriated her masters, who had Paul and Silas dragged before the city authorities and thrown in prison. God used an earthquake to free his servants and bring about the salvation of the Philippian jailer and his family. The next day, after the city officials learned that they had unlawfully beaten and jailed two Roman citizens, they apologized and begged Paul and Silas to leave the city. They did so after a final visit with Lydia and the believers at her home. Despite opposition, the gospel continued to spread powerfully to all the strata of society.

16:16 Luke continued his firsthand account of the events in Philippi with the word we. Evidently, the place of prayer by the river continued as the spot where Paul and his companions would meet on a regular basis. There were likely many contacts, but Luke chose to describe only two others.

The next recorded contact by Paul came from a significantly different level of society. This verse describes the missionaries meeting a slave girl. Worse still, she was demon-possessed (see commentary on 5:15-16 for more on demon possession). Fortune-telling was common in Greek and Roman culture. People used many superstitious methods for trying to see the future—from interpreting omens in nature to communicating with the spirits of the dead. This young slave girl had an evil spirit, and she made her masters rich by interpreting signs and by fortune-telling. Her masters were exploiting her unfortunate condition for personal gain.

16:17 What the slave girl said was true, although the source of her knowledge was a demon. Paul and his companions indeed were servants of the Most High God and, in fact, were telling others how to be saved. Why did a demon announce the truth about Paul, and why did this annoy Paul? If Paul accepted the demon's words, he would appear to be linking the gospel with demon-related activities, not to mention the prophecy-for-profit approach that this girl's owners had taken. Such association would damage the message of Christ.

16:18-21 Evidently, the young girl followed them every day as they made their way from Lydia's home to the place of prayer down by the river (or wherever else they went). Finally Paul got so exasperated that he directly rebuked the demon that was abusing the girl. Using the powerful name of Jesus Christ, Paul commanded the demon to depart. This angered her masters who had been using the servant girl and her demonic powers. With cold heartlessness, they were not arguing about the young girl's cure but were infuriated that their business venture had been ruined. So they dragged Paul and Silas before the authorities at the marketplace. The charge was not that they had performed an exorcism on a slave girl, but rather that these men were Jews and were teaching the people to do things that are against Roman customs. These two government officials would be interested in keeping the peace (an important aspect of their job in a Roman colony) as well as enforcing the laws against foreign religions proselytizing Romans in a Roman colony. They were interpreting the law to say that the exorcism was proselytizing Judaism. Thus, the accusations were effective.

16:22-24 The twisting of the truth by these accusers was effective enough to motivate a mob to assemble quickly. Wanting to keep the peace, the city officials ordered Paul and Silas to be stripped and beaten with wooden rods.

Rods were wooden poles bound together and carried by these magistrates. This was not the only time that such had happened (or would happen) to Paul. He wrote in 2 Corinthians 11:25 that it happened three times—at least three up until the writing of that letter to Corinth.

After being severely beaten, Paul and Silas were thrown in prison, and Luke subtly introduced the next unsuspecting convert to Christianity—the jailer—who was ordered to make sure they didn't escape. Perhaps the stories of Christians mysteriously escaping from jail (12:3-17) or even of guards losing their lives (12:18-19) had made it as far as Philippi. Whatever the case, the jailer imposed his version of maximum security—taking them to the inner dungeon and there fastening their feet in the stocks.

“Stocks” were made of two boards joined with iron clamps, leaving holes just big enough for the ankles. The prisoner’s legs were placed across the lower board, and then the upper board was closed over them. Sometimes both wrists and ankles were placed in stocks. Paul and Silas, who had committed no crime and were peaceful men, were put in stocks designed for holding the most dangerous prisoners in absolute security.

16:25 What an incredible scene this must have been! Paul and Silas were barely into their first stop on what promised to be a wildly effective Macedonian evangelistic campaign—God had verbally called them there (16:9-10). In short order, however, they found themselves the victims of false and prejudicial charges, locked up in the depths of a Roman jail, in stocks! So what did they do? Moan? Whine? Blame God? Give up? No, their jail term was marked by only two activities: praying and singing hymns to God.

The other prisoners were listening as Paul and Silas sang and prayed. The Greek word for “listening” (epekroonto) is a strong word implying that the prisoners were listening intently. It is a reminder to all believers that the world is watching when they suffer. There is intrigue, interest, and even openness to believers’ “answers” when they respond so unnaturally—so supernaturally—to difficulties. How believers respond to their troubles can play a major role in how others will respond to the Savior.

16:26-28 The answer to the prayers of Paul and Silas came with suddenness and authority in the form of a great earthquake, shaking the foundations of the prison, bursting open doors, and breaking loose the chains of every prisoner. Guards were responsible for their prisoners and would be held accountable for their escape. The punishment was usually the same sentence that would have been the prisoner’s. Sometimes the guards were even executed (see 12:19).

Possibly in order to avoid a Roman execution or perhaps to avoid having to live with the shame of his career failure, the jailer drew his sword to kill himself.

Paul intervened, shouting, “We are all here!” Paul was not speaking of just himself and Silas but of all the prisoners. All the prisoners were still there, sitting in a wide open jail, without chains. The other prisoners had listened intently to all that had been prayed and sung (16:25). They knew that the earthquake surely had something to do with the praying and singing of the two prisoners.

16:29-32 The jailer called for lights and torches lit the prison in the middle of the night. Once inside, the jailer fell down before Paul and Silas. Then he brought them out, evidently from the inner recesses where the stocks were located. He asked the question, the most profound and important question in life, “What must I do to be saved?” The answer is “Believe.” This is not just faith for faith’s sake; it is faith with a very serious object. It is belief on the Lord Jesus. The result is that you will be saved. Paul and Silas shared the word of the Lord with the jailer’s household.

16:33-34 The jailer’s conversion, like Lydia’s, was followed by clear, demonstrated deeds reflecting the reality of the life-change that had occurred internally. The terms that same hour and immediately show that the new convert did not waste any time about changing his life or about making his public profession of allegiance to Jesus Christ through baptism. The entire household rejoiced because they all believed in God. Who in that household could ever have dreamed that one of their father’s prisoners, bound in chains, would one day bring a message that would set them all free from their sin?

16:35-36 What brought the city officials to the decision of freeing the prisoners is not stated. Maybe it was the way the officials had let the mob determine their actions. Perhaps it was the brutal nature of the punishment of two with so little evidence against them. Maybe it was the earthquake that shook some sense into the governing authorities. Whatever the case, Paul and Silas were told by the jailer, who had become a brother in Christ: “You and Silas are free to leave.”

16:37 That would not be the last word, however. Paul had often been unfairly treated, beaten, and stoned—all illegally in light of his Roman citizenship. Yet here he chose to speak up. He may have wanted to give the new young church in Philippi some breathing room from the local authorities. The word would spread that Paul and Silas had been found innocent and freed by the leaders, expressing the truth that believers should not be persecuted—especially if they were Roman citizens, as were Paul and Silas.

16:38-39 Roman citizenship had certain privileges. These Philippian authorities were alarmed because it was illegal to flog Roman citizens. In addition, every citizen had the right to a fair trial—which Paul and Silas had not been given. Roman citizens were allowed to travel throughout the Empire under Rome’s protection. They were not subject to local legislation or local legislators! No wonder the city officials were alarmed when they heard that Paul and Silas both were Roman citizens. The officials’ jobs (and lives) were in jeopardy, in the very hands of the ones they had treated so unfairly. So they personally, politely, contritely came to the jail and apologized to Paul and Silas. Then begged them to leave the city.

16:40 Paul and Silas left the prison and returned to Lydia’s home. As had been their custom everywhere they had been, they spent time meeting with the new believers and encouraged them for a while longer before they took their message to the next city.

Note that Luke returned to the third person “they” in this verse, as the first “we” section of Acts ends (see Introduction and note on 16:9-10). This may indicate that Luke stayed behind in Philippi to continue the work while Paul and Silas moved on toward Athens. The next “we” section begins at 20:5.

The book of Philippians stands as a testimony to the health of this first church in Europe. Lydia’s generosity and the jailer’s kindnesses exemplified the solid, spiritual character of the early days of the Philippian church. Who could have known what their influence would be? A few years hence, when Paul was sitting out a trial in Rome, he would write them a note and, in it, commend them for supporting him (see Philippians 1:5, 7; 4:16-19).

ACTS 17

PAUL PREACHES IN THESSALONICA / 17:1-9

Leaving Luke in Philippi, Paul, Silas, and Timothy journeyed in a southwesterly direction along the Grecian coast, eventually arriving at Thessalonica. There Paul repeated his usual procedure: go first to the synagogue and preach to the Jews and God-fearing Greeks there. The response was typical—a revival among the Greeks, a riot at the hands of the Jewish leaders!

17:1 Thessalonica was about one hundred miles from Philippi, along the Egnatian Way toward Athens. Amphipolis was about thirty miles from Philippi, and Apollonia, an additional thirty miles. No record is given of any ministry occurring in these towns, though surely the missionaries would have taken every opportunity to speak about Christ.

Thessalonica was one of the wealthiest and most influential cities in Macedonia, with a population of over 200,000. This is the first city where Paul's teachings attracted a large group of socially prominent citizens. The most important Roman highway (the Egnatian Way)—extending from Rome all the way to the Orient—went through Thessalonica. This highway, along with the city's thriving seaport, made Thessalonica one of the wealthiest and most flourishing trade centers in the Roman Empire. Recognized as a free city, Thessalonica was allowed self-rule and was exempted from most of the restrictions placed by Rome on other cities in the Empire. With its international flavor, however, came many pagan religions and cultural influences that challenged the faith of the young Christians there.

After his ministry in Thessalonica, Paul would write two letters to the Thessalonian believers (1 and 2 Thessalonians), encouraging them to remain faithful and to refuse to listen to false teachers who tried to refute their beliefs.

17:2-3 Paul spent three Sabbaths ministering to the Jews in the synagogue. This does not mean he spent only three weeks in Thessalonica. Paul probably was there for much longer (a time period that occurred between 17:4 and 17:5). He had to have been there long enough to do everything mentioned in his letter to the Thessalonians, such as work at his trade (1 Thessalonians 2:7-9), win converts, instruct new believers in the Christian life (1 Thessalonians 4:1-2), and form a strong bond of love with these believers (1 Thessalonians 2:17-20). Paul's letter to the Philippians indicates that he was in Thessalonica long enough to receive from the Philippians financial help "more than once" (Philippians 4:16).

17:4 The response at Thessalonica was typical of the response Paul had experienced from the beginning days of his missionary travels. Some who listened were persuaded, probably referring to Jews. In addition, a large number of godly Greek men also joined, as well as many important women. These were influential women in the upper class (see 16:14; 17:12).

17:5 So far, Paul's ministry was following its usual course. The gospel was preached in the synagogues with meager response from the Jews. The Gentiles, however, were responding in great numbers (both worshipers in the synagogues and others). Then, as had been the custom, the Jewish leaders became jealous and set their sights on running these "heretics" out of town or worse. They gathered some worthless fellows from the streets to form a mob and start a riot. They went to the home of Jason, an early Thessalonian convert who, like Lydia, had convinced the travelers to stay in his home.

17:6-7 The mob had not found Paul and Silas at Jason's house. Perhaps Paul and Silas had been informed and had hurried away from the dangerous crowd. So the mob grabbed Jason and some of the other believers and brought them before the city council. Their accusations, like all good lies, bore some resemblance to the truth but were presented in their worst light. Paul and Silas were not guilty of treason against Caesar just because they declared allegiance to the King of kings, for Christ's Kingdom is of an entirely different sort than Caesar's was.

17:8-9 The manipulative accusations threw the city officials and the people into turmoil. Because there was no substantive case, however, and because Jason and the other believers had done little more than house the accused, they were released after posting bail, cash for their freedom. In Paul's first letter to this church, his statement about Satan blocking a future trip (1 Thessalonians 2:18) may refer to the events described here.

PAUL AND SILAS IN BEREIA / 17:10-15

God continued to use persecution and opposition to spread the good news of forgiveness and eternal life through Jesus Christ. The uproar in Thessalonica forced Paul and Silas to journey to Berea, where they found a very teachable and receptive Greek audience. In a short time, however, hostile Jews came from Thessalonica to attack Paul's work in Berea. But this succeeded only in getting the great evangelist to Athens!

17:10-12 Paul and Silas had probably been in hiding from the riot in Thessalonica, and then went on to Berea. There they would begin again in the synagogue. Berea was about forty-five miles south of Thessalonica. The people of Berea were more open-minded than those in Thessalonica. The Greek word for “open-minded” is eugenesteroi, meaning “noble” or “generous—free from prejudice.” Instead of hurling attacks, they listened eagerly to Paul’s message. Instead of forming a mob to run the missionaries out of town, they searched the Scriptures day after day to confirm whether or not Paul and Silas were teaching the truth. Here, in contrast to so many cities before, many Jews believed, as well as prominent Greek women and many men. See 17:4 for comparison with prominent people in Thessalonica. God honored the fact that these leading men and women of the city were searching for the truth.

17:13 What began as a wonderful situation did not last, however. Though there appeared to be no trouble at all from the Berean Jews, trouble followed Paul from Thessalonica. When the Jews there heard of Paul’s ministry in Berea, they went there to stir up trouble.

17:14-15 Again, the believers rushed to protect Paul, sending him on to the coast. Fortunately, the gospel message was so identified with Paul that it caused most of the Jewish anger to be directed at him, leaving his traveling companions more freedom to build up the churches. Thus, Silas and Timothy were able to stay behind in Berea. Those who were escorting Paul took him to Athens. He instructed them to tell Silas and Timothy to hurry and join him.

PAUL PREACHES IN ATHENS / 17:16-34

Paul’s brief stay in Athens is a remarkable case study in the universality of the gospel. This chapter deals with the early stages of Paul’s second missionary journey. He and his fellow travelers worked their way down the peninsula of modern-day Greece. Luke recorded Paul’s message to the idol-worshipping academicians at Athens at length. That message revealed Paul’s God-led wisdom for dealing with those who knew very little about the true God but who felt very secure in their intellectual abilities.

17:16 What can be viewed today in Athens as wonderful works of art and architecture were, in their day, the worshipful expression of a culture steeped in godless idolatry. Athens was named after the goddess Athena, and there were temples in Athens for all the gods in the Greek pantheon. Paul was deeply troubled by all the idolatry he saw everywhere in the city. Athens, with its magnificent buildings and many gods, was a center for Greek culture, philosophy, and education. Philosophers and educated people were always ready to hear something new—thus their openness to hear Paul speak at their meeting in the Areopagus (17:18-19). Athens had been the political, educational, and philosophical center of the world in its prime, the home of men such as Plato, Socrates, Aristotle, Epicurus, Zeno. But that was four hundred years before Paul's visit. When Paul arrived, it was a small town (ten thousand or so residents), reliving the glory days and filled with intellectuals spending their days philosophizing.

17:17 Paul had a balanced and adaptive approach to his ministry in Athens. In the synagogue, he debated with the Jews and worshiping Gentiles, likely using the arguments recorded at other places in the book of Acts (for example, 13:16-41), seeking to prove to them that Jesus was the long-awaited Messiah. Between his Sabbath debates with the worshipers in the synagogues, however, Paul spoke daily in the public square (the agora, which was the central marketplace) to whomever would listen.

17:18 The Epicurean philosophers, followers of Epicurus (341–270 B.C.), believed that the chief purpose for living was pleasure and happiness. If God existed, he didn't interfere in human affairs. Epicurians are similar to modern-day materialists and hedonists. The Stoic philosophers were followers of Zeno (320–263 B.C.), who taught on a porch or patio called a stoa, hence the name "Stoics." The Stoics were pantheistic and felt that a great "purpose" was directing history. Humans' responsibility was to align themselves with that purpose through duty and self-discipline. This, quite logically, led to pride and self-sufficiency ("I am the master of my fate!").

These philosophers characterized Paul's arguments as "babbling." In the same way that a bird collects seeds, or a junk collector gathers trash, Paul was accused of collecting little pieces of knowledge that wouldn't take him anywhere. They were saying that his ideas were not as well thought through or as valid as theirs. Others of these philosophers recognized in Paul's teaching about Jesus and his resurrection that he was pushing some foreign religion.

17:19-20 Paul's dialogue in the marketplace led to an invitation to address the Council of Philosophers, also known as the Areopagus, which had been the judicial and legislative seat of government of Athens. By Paul's time, however, their responsibilities involved little more than overseeing certain areas of religion and education.

These intellectuals, ever interested in hearing new ideas, wanted to hear about this new religion that Paul was presenting. They wanted to know what it was all about. The word “know” will surface a good deal in the verses that follow. Here the descendants of the most influential thinkers in Western civilization, who had been on a centuries-long quest for knowledge, were given an opportunity to receive the ultimate knowledge about God entering the human race to redeem fallen humanity and put them in a position to know the person of Jesus Christ.

17:21 Luke parenthetically explained this predisposition of the Athenians and many who were residing there (foreigners) to spend days at a time discussing the latest ideas. Evidently, these were somewhat highbrow intellectuals, who loved to hear and discuss the latest fads in philosophy and theology. The picture is that they rarely actually did anything they discussed; they just enjoyed tossing around ideas.

17:22-23 Paul was well prepared to speak to this group. He came from Tarsus, an educational center, and had the training and knowledge to present his beliefs clearly and persuasively. Paul was a rabbi, taught by the finest scholar of his day, Gamaliel, and he had spent much of his life thinking and reasoning through the Scriptures.

Luke recorded this sermon in more detail than many of the others, likely as a sample of how Paul addressed the typical lost, intellectual Greek. Rather than arguing the Scriptures as he would with a Jewish audience, he adapted his message and backed up a step or two to speak of a Creator; then he moved toward speaking about a Savior and Judge.

Paul began his address by affirming the religious nature of his audience by explaining what he had seen in their city. He chose a starting point, a place where they could agree, rather than starting with their differences. The Athenians had built an idol to an Unknown God for fear of missing blessings or receiving punishment. The Athenian philosophers were either polytheistic (worshiped many gods) or pantheistic (believed all nature was god), so it would be natural for them to build an altar, superstitious that they might have overlooked a god. Archaeological finds have shown many such altars with the inscription, “to the unknown god(s).” Paul’s opening statement to the men of Athens was about their “unknown god.” Paul was not endorsing this god but using the inscription as a point of entry for his witness to the one true God.

17:24-27 The central body of Paul’s speech is a presentation of God as the Creator, who made the world and everything in it. This Creator doesn't live in man-made temples, even spectacular wonder-of-the-world Greek structures like the one a few hundred yards up the hill from where they sat on the Acropolis. God does not need anything from humans since he has no needs. From general characteristics of the Creator God, Paul moved to the more specific Judeo-Christian claims that God created all life and all nations from one man. This would likely rub proud Greeks the wrong way, since they believed themselves to be racially superior to all other nations (whom they called “barbarians”).

This “unknown god” is not only knowable, he is not far from any person. This contrasted to the Greek gods, which lived in seclusion and could not be approached. The need that motivated the construction of an altar “To an Unknown God” (17:23) could be realized in Christ, for he was very near and available—to be known!

17:28 To illustrate and support his point, Paul quoted first from Epimenides, a Cretan poet from 600 B.C. (whom he also quoted in Titus 1:12): In him we live and move and exist. The next quote is from Aratus (a Stoic poet from Cilicia, 315–240 B.C.) in a line from his work Phainomena: We are his offspring. Both of these statements from well-known and accepted literary sources of the day served Paul’s purpose well in arguing for the fact that the creation and sustaining of life was in the hands of the one God whom they did not know but who was very near and very knowable. The sense of humanity being God’s “offspring” means that all receive life and breath from him.

17:29-30 Paul began to wrap up his message, building this statement on all that he had presented thus far and gently correcting where the Greeks had been incorrect: And since this is true, they needed to make some changes. Their thinking had been incorrect. They should not think of God as an idol who could be constructed by human hands. God is profoundly bigger than any idol.

Also, the Athenians had to understand that although God had overlooked people’s former ignorance (not in the sense that he condoned it but rather that he had not yet judged it—see Acts 14:16; Romans 3:25), he now commanded everyone everywhere to turn from idolatry and turn to him. This was a serious and somber word to the gathered Athenians. They would do well to hear it and respond. Whatever the nature and consequences of their former failure to respond to God, it was nothing compared to ignoring what was being offered in the finished work of Christ.

17:31 Paul confronted his listeners with Jesus' resurrection and its meaning to all people—either blessing or punishment. The Greeks had no concept of judgment. Most of them preferred worshiping many gods instead of just one. And though their gods became angry from time to time, there was no real accountability in the way that Paul was presenting.

God has set a day for judging the world, however, and the judge had been selected. All judgment had been given to the one who was raised from the dead—Jesus Christ (see John 5:22)—the one Paul had been proclaiming in Athens since the day he had arrived (see 17:18).

To the Greek mind, the concept of resurrection was unbelievable and offensive, but on this issue the whole gospel hinged (1 Corinthians 15:13-14). Although Paul knew it would offend their precious philosophies, he did not hold back the truth. Paul often would change his approach to fit his audience, as he did with this one, but he never would change his basic message.

17:32 The mention of the resurrection would, of course, draw an immediate reaction from this group of intellects. Some laughed, yet there were others who seemed intrigued and asked if they could hear more about this later. The latter group may simply have been patronizing this fellow scholar and visiting lecturer. Paul's speech was not in vain, however, as the next verse shows.

17:33-34 Though the discussion had ended with a few sneers and a polite invitation to return, Paul's time had not been wasted. Some joined him and became believers, one of them even a Council member named Dionysius. Only one other convert is named, a woman named Damaris, though we are told there were others.

Although there is no record of a church being founded in Athens and Paul soon moved on to Corinth (chapter 18), his visit to Athens was not a failure. The responsibility of the messenger is to present the message, and Paul certainly did that (and did so brilliantly). The fruit was God's responsibility.

ACTS 18

PAUL MEETS PRISCILLA AND AQUILA IN CORINTH / 18:1-17

The spread of the gospel requires a team effort by individuals with different gifts. In Corinth, Paul met Priscilla and Aquila, a married couple (and fellow tentmakers) who proved to be faithful partners in the gospel (see Romans 16:3; 1 Corinthians 16:19; 2 Timothy 4:19). Paul's ministry in this decadent city was long and fruitful (18:11). Not even a concerted effort by the Jews could stop him from teaching the word.

18:1 Ancient Corinth had been destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C., but it had been rebuilt by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C. because of its strategic seaport. By Paul's day (A.D. 50), the Romans had made Corinth the capital of Achaia (present-day Greece). Only fifty miles from Athens, Corinth by this time was regarded as the most influential city of Greece. The population was about 650,000—250,000 free citizens and 400,000 slaves. Corinth was a major center of commerce. Located on a narrow strip of land near two bustling seaports, and at a busy crossroads for land travelers and traders, the city was wealthy and very materialistic. Corinth was a center of culture. Though not a university town like Athens, there was great interest in Greek philosophy and wisdom. The city was permeated with religion—at least twelve temples were located there. The most infamous of these temples was dedicated to Aphrodite, the goddess of love, and featured one thousand “sacred” prostitutes. Another temple, dedicated to Apollo, employed young men whose job was to fulfill the sexual desires of male and female worshipers. Largely due to this fact, the city was notorious for its immorality. So brazen was the unbridled licentiousness that a new Greek verb was eventually coined: to “Corinthianize” meant to practice sexual immorality. When Plato referred to a prostitute, he used the expression “Corinthian girl.”

From a human point of view, Corinth was not the type of place where one would expect to launch a thriving ministry, but Paul didn't view things from an earthly perspective. He saw Corinth as both a challenge and a great ministry opportunity. Later he would write a series of letters to the Corinthians dealing in large part with the problems of immorality. First and Second Corinthians are two of those letters.

18:2-3 Aquila and Priscilla had just been expelled from Rome by Claudius Caesar's order. Trained as tentmakers, Aquila and Priscilla had packed up the tools of their trade and had made their way to Corinth. There they met Paul, who joined them in the business of tentmaking.

Jewish boys were expected to learn trades from which they could earn their living, so Paul learned tentmaking. Tents were much in demand because they were used throughout the Empire to house soldiers. Tentmakers also made canopies and other leather goods. It is highly likely, therefore, that the Roman army was a major purchaser of Paul's tents. As a tentmaker, Paul had a transportable livelihood that he could carry with him wherever God led him. Since ancient craftsmen did not compete as merchants do today but rather formed cooperative trade guilds and often lived in close proximity, it is not surprising that Paul and Aquila worked together. Because many of the trade guilds had adopted pagan practices, two God-fearing artisans would have been delighted to work together.

Paul chose to work to support himself during his stay in Corinth. The presence of so many religious promoters in Corinth may have added an incentive for Paul to earn his own living. Paul wanted to disassociate himself from those teachers who taught only for money. As Paul lived with Priscilla and Aquila, he must have shared with them his wealth of spiritual wisdom. They likely were already believers (or else Luke, it seems, would have mentioned their conversion). Perhaps they had embraced the gospel through the ministry of the Roman natives who had been in Jerusalem at Pentecost (see 2:10). They may even have been founding members of the church of Rome.

18:4 Paul never veered from this ministry philosophy. Because of his great burden for his lost Jewish brothers (see Romans 9:2-3), Paul would go each Sabbath to the synagogue (9:20; 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:2, 10, 17; 18:19; 19:8). There he would speak to both Jews and Greeks (Gentiles who had converted to Judaism).

18:5 Upon the arrival of his colleagues, Paul was able to set aside his tentmaking and devote himself to full time preaching. Silas and Timothy must have brought with them a financial gift from the believers in Macedonia (see Philippians 4:15). They also brought a good word about the perseverance of the believers in Thessalonica (1 Thessalonians 3:6-8). Paul must have been encouraged by all these factors.

18:6 Some Jews in Paul's audience opposed and insulted Paul. That he shook the dust from his robe was a dramatic gesture separating him from even the dust found in such a rebellious synagogue. His pointed statement, "Your blood be upon your own heads!" is a reference to the Jews' own responsibility for their eventual spiritual destruction and brings to mind the sobering warning of Ezekiel 33:4. Paul was telling the Jews that he had done all he could for them. Because they continued to reject Jesus as their Messiah, he would turn his attention to the Gentiles, who would prove to be more receptive.

18:7-8 The home of Titius Justus became Paul's base of operations, and its proximity to the synagogue gave the apostle convenient and ongoing contact with both Jews and God-fearing Greeks. As the synagogue leader, Crispus would have been responsible for maintenance of the synagogue complex and the services held there. Such a position would have made him a prominent and well-to-do person in the community. Thus, his conversion (and that of his household) was a significant breakthrough for the church.

18:9-11 Apparently, the conversions of Crispus and other Corinthians (18:7-8), together with the formation of a growing "house church" right next door to the synagogue, must have provoked great controversy and opposition. But in contrast to his treatment elsewhere (see 17:5, 13), no one would harm Paul—he would not endure bodily harm during this time in Corinth. As a result of this divine word of assurance, Paul spent eighteen months in Corinth preaching and teaching. During that year and a half, Paul established a church and wrote two letters to the believers in Thessalonica (1 and 2 Thessalonians).

18:12-13 God's promise was that Paul would not be personally harmed (18:9); this guarantee did not preclude an attack on his ministry. In time, the Jews would successfully manage to have Paul charged with promoting a religion not approved by Roman law. Such behavior amounted to treason. But Paul was not encouraging obedience to a human king other than Caesar (see 17:7), nor was he speaking against the Roman Empire. Instead, he was speaking about Christ's eternal Kingdom.

This sequence of events took place when Gallio, the brother of Seneca the philosopher, was governor of Achaia (modern Greece). He had come to power in A.D. 51-52, and he enjoyed a good reputation among his people as a pleasant man.

18:14-15 This was an important judicial decision for the spread of the gospel in the Roman Empire. Judaism was a recognized religion under Roman law. As long as Christians were seen as a sect within Judaism, the court could refuse to hear cases brought against them. Gallio's decision proved to be extremely beneficial for the emerging Christian church for the next ten years. His ruling became a legal precedent used in Paul's trial in Rome. If Gallio had found Paul guilty, every governor in every province where Paul or other missionaries traveled could arrest the Christians. By not ruling against Paul, the Romans were including Christianity (as a sect of Judaism) as one of the legal religions (religio licita) of the Roman Empire. Gallio, in effect, helped spread the gospel throughout the Empire.

18:16-17 The fact that Gallio had Paul's Jewish accusers driven out of the courtroom, rather than merely sent away, reveals his irritation with what he evidently felt were petty, trumped-up charges. The gathered crowd, however, became unruly and erupted in violence. This mob may have been Greeks venting their feelings against the Jews for causing turmoil, or it may have included some Jews. If the latter is true, Sosthenes, the newly designated leader of the synagogue (after the conversion of Crispus, see 18:8) became the focal point of the mob's anger and frustration probably because he was seen as the one responsible for losing the case against Paul and leaving the synagogue worse off than before. A man named Sosthenes is mentioned in 1 Corinthians 1:1, and this may be the same man. If so, he would later become a convert and a companion of Paul.

PAUL RETURNS TO ANTIOCH OF SYRIA / 18:18-23

Leaving Corinth, Paul set sail for Syria with Priscilla and Aquila. He made a brief stop in Ephesus, leaving his faithful colleagues there, and hoping to return later. From there he continued in a southeastward direction to Caesarea, where he visited the church at Jerusalem to report on his activity. Then he traveled north to Antioch. This marked the end of Paul's second missionary journey.

18:18 Following the failure of the Jewish plot against him, Paul continued ministering in Corinth. The vow Paul took at Cenchrea (the seaport for the city of Corinth) may have been a temporary Nazirite vow, which would end with shaving the head and offering the hair as a sacrifice (Numbers 6:18). Or it could have been a personal vow of thanksgiving, offered in light of God's providential protection while in Corinth. Paul, Priscilla, and Aquila then sailed for the coast of Syria and Paul's sending church.

18:19-21 Arriving at Ephesus, the missionary team disembarked. Paul paid a quick visit to the Jewish synagogue, but Priscilla and Aquila settled in Ephesus (18:23-28). Though the Jews were receptive to Paul's message, he apparently felt a pressing need to return to Antioch. A few ancient manuscripts imply that

Paul was also eager to arrive in Jerusalem in time to celebrate the Feast of the Passover. If this is accurate, Paul probably wanted to take advantage of the evangelistic opportunities presented by such a gathering of devout Jews. He promised to return to them, “God willing” (see James 4:15).

18:22 With the five-hundred-mile voyage from Ephesus completed, Paul went to Jerusalem, then to Antioch. Having been away from Antioch of Syria for some two years, Paul had much good news to report to his fellow believers. This verse marks the end of Paul’s second missionary journey.

18:23 This verse marks the beginning of Paul’s third missionary journey, which lasted from A.D. 53 to 57. Leaving the church at Antioch, Paul headed toward Ephesus, but along the way he revisited the churches in Galatia and Phrygia. The heart of this trip was a lengthy stay (two to three years) in Ephesus. Before returning to Jerusalem, Paul also visited believers in Macedonia and Greece. As Paul set out, one of his priorities was helping the believers to grow. Such was Paul’s regular practice—to keep checking up on those he had led to Christ and the churches he had founded.

APOLLOS INSTRUCTED AT EPHESUS / 18:24-28

Left in Ephesus by Paul, Priscilla and Aquila met a gifted speaker named Apollos, who had great passion for Christ but an incomplete knowledge of the gospel. Equipping him with a more accurate message, they sent him on to Achaia, where he was used powerfully by God. This small investment in one life by the faithful Priscilla and Aquila resulted in enormous eternal dividends!

18:24 From Alexandria, the second most influential city in the Roman Empire, came a Jew named Apollos. Growing up in that Egyptian city’s university atmosphere, Apollos was highly cultured and trained in philosophy and rhetoric. As a Jew, he also knew the Scriptures well. It is not stated what prompted him to move to Ephesus.

18:25 Apollos was an eloquent and powerful speaker. He had an accurate though incomplete message. While he had knowledge of the Old Testament, he knew only about John’s baptism (referring to John the Baptist). In all likelihood, Apollos’s preaching was a more polished version of John’s message: “Turn from your sins and turn to God” (Matthew 3:2). John had focused on repentance from sin and on water baptism as an outward sign of commitment to and preparation for the Messiah’s Kingdom. Apollos was probably urging people in a more eloquent fashion to do the same. Apollos needed to get the entire picture, and then he would be a powerful witness for Christ.

18:26 The eloquent, fiery young man who was so ably interpreting and applying the Old Testament messianic Scriptures in the synagogue was quickly noticed by Priscilla and Aquila. Upon hearing Apollos preach, they immediately recognized the deficiencies in his message. Consequently, they took him aside (probably to their home) and explained the way of God more accurately, telling him about the life of Jesus, his death and resurrection, and the coming of the Holy Spirit. As Aquila and Priscilla set forth the historical facts of the gospel, Apollos must have seen many Old Testament prophecies become clear. The reports of his subsequent ministry suggest that he was filled with new energy and boldness after he received the complete gospel message.

18:27 With his more complete theology, Apollos, who had been thinking about going to Achaia, was encouraged to do so by the Christians in Ephesus. They sent along a glowing letter of introduction, asking the believers in Achaia to welcome him. He quickly became the verbal champion of the Christians in Achaia (probably Corinth), debating the opponents of the gospel in public. Read what Paul says of Apollos's impact in 1 Corinthians 4:1, 6.

18:28 Apollos proved to be a master debater. His arguments for the messiahship of Jesus were so powerful and logical that the Jews could not oppose him. His reputation spread far and wide (1 Corinthians 1:12; 3:4-6; 4:6), and Paul came to view him as a trustworthy coworker in the gospel (1 Corinthians 16:12; Titus 3:13).

PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY / 19:1-7

After the parenthetical story of Apollos, Luke continued his record of Paul's third missionary journey, begun in 18:23. Evidence from Paul's epistles suggests the great apostle launched out on his third missionary trip in an attempt to undo the damage caused among the churches by numerous opponents of the gospel. Beginning at Antioch, Paul journeyed in a northwesterly direction through Galatia and Phrygia (18:23), eventually coming to Ephesus on the west coast of Asia Minor.

19:1 Paul traveled an interior road across Asia Minor, arriving in Ephesus, a hub of sea and land transportation, ranking with Antioch in Syria and Alexandria in Egypt as one of the great cities on the Mediterranean Sea. The population of Ephesus during the first century may have reached 250,000. The temple to the Greek goddess Artemis (Diana is her Roman equivalent) was located there. The worship of Artemis was also a great financial boon to the area because it brought tourists, festivals, and trade. Upon his arrival, he promptly found a group of several believers.

Paul would stay in Ephesus for about three years. Ephesus had great wealth and power as a center for trade. It was a strategic location from which to influence all of Asia. From Ephesus he would write his first letter to the Corinthians to counter several problems that the church in Corinth was facing. Later, while imprisoned in Rome, Paul would write a letter to the Ephesian church (the book of Ephesians).

19:2 Paul's question to this group of Ephesian men underlines the truth that apart from the Holy Spirit, there is no salvation (Romans 8:9, 16; 1 Corinthians 12:13; Ephesians 1:13). The Spirit is the one who imparts life (John 3:5). Perhaps the men were unaware that the time of the Spirit's outpouring had come at last. Whatever the case, like Apollos (18:24-26), these men needed further instruction on the message and ministry of Jesus Christ.

19:3-4 John's baptism was a sign of turning from sin only (Matthew 3:2, 6, 8, 11; Mark 1:4-5; Luke 3:8), not a sign of new life in Christ. John's ministry had been preparatory. His baptism had anticipated something greater, pointing forward, toward Jesus, the fulfillment of all things. After adequate explanation, these men were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus. Given Paul's remarks in 1 Corinthians 1:14-17, it may be that an unnamed associate of Paul actually performed this ceremony. This is the only place in the New Testament where we find an instance of rebaptism.

19:6-7 When Paul laid his hands on these twelve disciples (either to greet them as brothers or as a final part of the baptism rite), the Holy Spirit came on them in a similar fashion as at Pentecost. Pentecost was the formal outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the then mostly Jewish church, and it included outward, visible signs of the Holy Spirit's presence. Similar supernatural manifestations had occurred when the Holy Spirit first had come on Gentiles (see 10:45-47). The other outpourings in the book of Acts were God's way of uniting other (mostly Gentile) believers to the church. The mark of the true church is not merely right doctrine but right actions, the true evidence of the Holy Spirit's work.

In Acts, believers received the Holy Spirit in a variety of ways. Usually the Holy Spirit would fill a person as soon as he or she professed faith in Christ. Here that filling happened later because these believers had not fully trusted in Christ as Savior. God was confirming to these believers, who did not initially know about the Holy Spirit, that they were a part of the church. The Holy Spirit's supernatural filling endorsed them as believers and showed the other members of the group that Christ was the only way.

What was the significance of the speaking in tongues among these Ephesian men? Perhaps to show that Paul had the same apostolic authority as did Peter to bestow the Spirit (see chapters 2 and 8). In any event, this is the final recorded instance of speaking in tongues in the book of Acts.

In order to interpret (and apply) the work of the Holy Spirit in Acts, believers must remember several truths. First, Acts is a book of transitions—documenting the end of the “old covenant” age of Israel and the law and the beginning of the “new covenant” age of the church and grace. Second, Acts is a history book that describes what did happen, not necessarily a doctrinal manual intended to prescribe what is supposed to happen. Third, there really is no set pattern for the reception of the Spirit in Acts. Sometimes people received the Spirit at baptism (2:38; 8:38), sometimes after baptism (8:15), and sometimes before baptism (10:47). The instances of tongues-speaking in Acts are erratic, not the general rule (see 2:4; 10:44-46; cf. 8:39; 13:52; 16:34). In Acts, Luke was primarily describing the spread of the gospel and its inclusiveness. In the epistles, the apostolic witnesses presented a more comprehensive doctrine of the Holy Spirit.

PAUL MINISTERS IN EPHESUS / 19:8-20

Paul was making good on a promise. He had paid an earlier visit to this synagogue in Ephesus at the end of his second missionary journey, while on his way back to Antioch and Jerusalem (18:19-21). Though his visit had been brief, he had found a receptive group of Jews and had pledged to return at the first opportunity. Paul's ministry in Ephesus lasted more than two years and was marked by an obvious movement of God's Spirit.

19:8-9 Given Paul's volatile history with the Jews (and his rather blunt preaching about Jesus as Messiah), it is surprising that he was able to minister at the synagogue for three months before the Jews publicly spoke against the Way (a common name for early Christianity—see 9:2; 19:23; 24:14).

Consequently, Paul moved his ministry to a nearby lecture hall (school). Such halls were used in the morning for teaching philosophy, but they were empty during the hot part of the day (about 11:00 A.M. to 4:00 P.M.). Because many people did not work during those hours, they would come to hear Paul's preaching.

19:10 Paul faithfully labored in Ephesus. His lectures were "daily" (19:9) and continued for the next two years. These were two of the most fruitful years for the expanding church. The province of Asia refers to Asia Minor or modern-day Turkey. During this time, spiritually hungry Asians must have traveled to Ephesus to hear Paul speak.

19:11-12 Paul's ministry in Ephesus was accompanied by unusual miracles—long-distance healings as well as exorcisms. The miracles had a threefold purpose: (1) to demonstrate God's ultimate power and authority (in a city where Satan had a stronghold; see 19:18-19); (2) to authenticate Paul as an apostle and a spokesman for the one true God (Mark 16:20; Romans 15:18-19; 2 Corinthians 2:12; Hebrews 2:1-4); and (3) most obviously, to demonstrate compassion and mercy to those in great need.

19:13-14 This team of Jews was making a living by claiming to heal and drive out demons. This was a common occurrence in Israel (see Luke 11:19). Often such people would recite a list of names in their incantation to be sure of including the right deity. Here they were trying to use Jesus' name in an effort to match Paul's power.

Many Ephesians engaged in exorcism and occult practices for profit (see 19:18-19). The sons of Sceva were impressed by Paul's work, obviously more powerful than their own. But they failed to see that Paul's power to drive out demons came from God's Holy Spirit, not from incantations and magic formulas. These men were calling on the name of Jesus without knowing him personally.

19:15-17 The self-proclaimed exorcists were so overpowered by one evil spirit in a man that they all were attacked and badly injured. Eventually, they fled for their lives, feeling fortunate that they had lost only their clothes. Here is a clear incident that demonstrates the truth that knowing about Jesus is not the same as knowing him. The surprising knowledge and great strength of a demon-possessed person is recorded in other places (Luke 4:33; 8:28). The report of the encounter between the sons of Sceva and the evil spirit spread quickly throughout the area. The name of the Lord Jesus came to be viewed as the most powerful name and not one to be taken lightly.

19:18-20 Ephesus was a center for black magic and other occult practices. Superstition and sorcery were commonplace. Many of the Ephesian converts had been involved in these dark arts. However, the demonstrated power of the name of Jesus over evil spirits became the impetus for a spiritual spring cleaning in the lives of many of the new believers in Ephesus. Specifically, they renounced their fascination with all occult practices. Then, taking the remnants of their pagan pasts, they brought their incantation books and burned them at a public bonfire. Making a clean break with sin was costly—the magic books alone were worth several million dollars.

THE RIOT IN EPHESUS / 19:21-41

In the great cosmic conflict for the souls of men, every intrusion of good is met by the fierce resistance of evil. Such was the case in Ephesus. A silversmith named Demetrius, who manufactured small idols of the Greek goddess Artemis, became alarmed by the mass conversion of Ephesians to Christianity. Gathering his fellow tradesmen, he convinced them that Paul and his message were a serious threat to their livelihood.

19:21-22 Wherever Paul went, he could see the influence of Rome. Paul wanted to take the message of Christ to the world's center of influence and power. Paul had already decided to depart from Ephesus before the trouble recorded in 19:23-41 broke out. But he stayed awhile longer, sending Timothy and Erastus ahead to do advance work in Macedonia.

19:23-24 Artemis was a goddess of fertility. She was represented by a carved female figure with many breasts. A large statue of Artemis (see 19:35) was in the great temple at Ephesus. That temple was one of the wonders of the ancient world. Supported by 127 pillars each six stories tall, the edifice was about four times larger than the Parthenon in Athens. The religious and commercial life of Ephesus reflected the city's worship of this pagan deity.

After a period of relative peace and steady growth for the Ephesian church, the gospel became offensive and intolerable to the city's craftsmen because it was undermining their ability to sell silver idols of Artemis. Converts to Christianity were no longer buying these products. Consequently, for economic and religious reasons, the Way (a reference to those who followed Christ) came under scrutiny, suspicion, and eventually attack. Demetrius, a prominent member of the silversmiths' guild, was the instigator of this trouble.

19:25-26 In the first century, craftsmen united with one another to form professional trade guilds. Similar to modern-day unions, these groups adhered to self-prescribed standards and practices. In this instance, Demetrius, perhaps the leader of this powerful guild, gathered not only the silversmiths who produced the miniature images of Artemis for sale at the temple but also others employed in related trades. (Archaeologists have also located images of the goddess made out of terra-cotta and gold.)

During the months that Paul had preached in Ephesus, Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen had not quarreled with his doctrine. They only became concerned when his preaching threatened their profits. Because they derived major income from making and selling silver statues of the Ephesian goddess Artemis, the craftsmen knew their livelihood would suffer if people started believing in Jesus and discarding the handmade gods.

19:27 Demetrius's strategy for stirring up a riot was to appeal to his fellow workmen's love of money and then to encourage them to hide their greed behind the mask of patriotism and religious loyalty. It would be difficult to get Ephesian citizens worked up about the slumping sales of a group of idol makers. However, it would be easy to rally the masses behind a noble campaign to defend the prestige of the goddess and her magnificent shrine.

19:28-29 The ploy of Demetrius worked perfectly. In short order, the gathered crowd boiled with anger at the Christians in their city and the subversive message of the gospel. They began to cry out, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!" As the gathering became an unruly mob, they rushed to the amphitheater, apparently to stage a large demonstration. Archaeologists have determined that this open-air auditorium, cut into the western slope of Mount Pion, could seat nearly twenty-five thousand people.

As the crowd rushed along, fueled by their fury, they managed to seize two of Paul's known traveling companions—Gaius and Aristarchus. (Aristarchus, a native of Thessalonica, would later accompany Paul on other journeys—see 20:3-4; 27:1-2; Gaius is probably not the same Gaius mentioned in Romans 16:23 or 1 Corinthians 1:14.)

19:30-31 Paul wanted to go to the theater, most likely to speak up and defend his companions but also to have the opportunity to preach to such a large crowd. But the other believers, fearing for his safety, wouldn't let Paul go. These officials of the province were the most prominent men of the province of Asia, responsible for the religious and political order of the region. Clearly, Paul's message had reached all levels of society, crossing all social barriers and giving Paul friends in high places. Out of a dual concern for both public order and the well-being of their Jewish Christian friend, these powerful authorities begged Paul not to risk his life by entering the amphitheater.

19:32 Luke's observations about many in the rioting crowd not even knowing why they were there would have brought a chuckle to his original readers, for Greek playwrights and authors commonly mocked human foibles. Irony and parody were common elements in Greek comedy. The scene in the theater was one of total confusion.

19:33-34 This Alexander may have been pushed forward by the Jews as a spokesperson to explain that the Jews were distinct from the new religion that was causing economic problems for the silversmiths. An uninformed mob might vent their anger on the Jews since they were well known for their monotheistic refusal to believe in pagan deities like Artemis. But the attempt was futile. The gathering had become anti-Jewish as well as anti-Christian. Reasoning with a hysterical mob that has whipped itself into a frenzy is impossible. They shouted down Alexander by chanting, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians," and keeping it up for two hours!

19:35-36 Into the chaos stepped the mayor of Ephesus. Perhaps fearing Roman reprisal—specifically the suspension of Ephesus's privileges as a "free" city with its own elected assembly—this respected leader somehow managed to get the attention of the angry mob. The mention of the image that fell down to the Ephesians from heaven was likely a reference to a meteorite that was regarded as divine and placed in the Ephesian temple for the purposes of veneration. The presence of this mysterious object from above was considered proof that Artemis was a great and powerful goddess. In short, the mayor's argument was that the citizenry need not (for religious reasons) fear the intrusion of Christianity and should not (for political purposes) degenerate into incivility and disorder. Law and order, he was suggesting, should prevail in this instance.

19:37-39 With the crowd quiet and under some semblance of emotional control, the mayor briefly reiterated the facts of the case involving the Christians. First, they had stolen nothing from the temple, nor had they spoken against the goddess. Given that, if this was a conflict involving economic matters, Ephesus had an adequate legal system through which personal grievances could be addressed. Consequently, the mayor urged Demetrius and the craftsmen to pursue their dispute with the Christians through legal channels.

19:40-41 The city of Ephesus was under the domination of the Roman Empire. The main responsibility of the local city leaders was simply to maintain peace and order. If they failed to control the people, Rome would remove the appointed officials from office. The entire town could also be put under martial law, taking away many civic freedoms. The mayor's straightforward reminder must have had a sobering effect on the Ephesian populace, for they dispersed.

The riot in Ephesus convinced Paul that it was time to move on. But it also showed that the law still provided some protection for Christians as they challenged the worship of the goddess Artemis in the most idolatrous religion in Asia.

ACTS 20

PAUL GOES TO MACEDONIA AND GREECE / 20:1-6

This chapter records the conclusion of Paul's third missionary journey. Paul was heading for Jerusalem, intending to arrive before Pentecost. On the way, he took time in Troas to encourage the believers, then he had a tearful farewell with the elders of the church in Ephesus.

20:1 When it was over referred to the riot in Ephesus (19:26-41). Paul then sent for the believers, presumably those he had been teaching in Ephesus for two years. After he encouraged them, he left for Macedonia to continue his ministry of encouragement.

20:2-3 Second Corinthians 2:12-13 and 7:5-7 give a few more details about this journey. Second Corinthians was written somewhere during this part of the journey. On this trip Paul likely retraced many of his steps, revisiting many of the churches he had established on his second journey (see 16–18) and arriving ultimately in Greece (specifically Corinth), where he stayed for three months. From Corinth Paul wrote the letter to the Romans. Although he had not yet been to Rome, believers had already started a church there (2:10; 18:2). Paul wrote to tell the Roman believers that he planned to visit them.

Paul's three-month stay was brought to a close in typical fashion: a Jewish plot was discovered against the apostle, causing him to decide to return through Macedonia instead of sailing back to Syria.

20:4-5 This is an unusually complete listing of those who were traveling with Paul on this section of the journey. The company provided accountability. Paul was carrying the offering from the Asian churches for the suffering church at Jerusalem (see 2 Corinthians 8–9). Paul would not want the Jerusalem church to think he handled the money by himself, without others to account for it.

These men who were traveling with Paul also represented churches that Paul had started in Asia: (1) Galatia—Gaius and Timothy; (2) Asia—Tychicus and Trophimus; (3) Macedonia—Sopater, Aristarchus, and Secundus. Having the men deliver the gifts to Jerusalem gave the gifts a personal touch and strengthened the unity of the universal church. This was also an effective way to teach the church about giving, because the men were able to report back to their churches the ways in which God was working through their giving. Paul discussed this gift in one of his letters to the Corinthian church (see

2 Corinthians 8:1-21).

20:6 The Passover was here a calendar marker, telling when all these things occurred. The use of we shows that Luke again had joined the group. The last “we” section was 16:10-40.

PAUL’S FINAL VISIT TO TROAS / 20:7-12

In Troas, the believers gathered on Sunday, and Paul preached a lengthy, late-night sermon. A young man by the name of Eutychus fell asleep and fell to his death out of the third-floor window in which he was sitting! Paul calmly restored Eutychus to life, and the church resumed its worship service.

20:7-8 The gathering of this group was on the first day of the week. This is one of the clearest New Testament references to the church meeting on Sunday rather than on Saturday, the Sabbath. Because Paul and his companions were leaving the next day, Paul had an extended teaching time, talking until midnight. Paul did not want to leave Troas until he had made the most of every minute he had with the believers.

The many flickering lamps were candles in lanterns. The combination of the heat from the candles and the gathered number of people in an upstairs room probably made the room very warm. This no doubt helped Eutychus fall asleep.

20:9-10 Paul spoke on and on, and Eutychus, likely sitting on the windowsill because of the crowd in the room, sank into a deep sleep. He fell out of the... window, three stories. Luke, the physician, confirmed the fact that Eutychus was dead. Paul went to the boy and took him into his arms. Paul addressed the concerned flock. “Don’t worry,” he said. Then, with those powerful Resurrection- reminiscent words, he added: “He’s alive!”

20:11-12 Following this amazing miracle, the meeting was resumed upstairs where they celebrated the Lord’s Supper, followed by Paul’s continuing to teach until dawn. The believers were greatly relieved (literally, “encouraged”) —a repeated feature of Paul’s ministry.

PAUL MEETS THE EPHESIAN ELDERS / 20:13-38

Traveling south to Miletus, Paul summoned the elders of the Ephesian church in order to bid them farewell. In his charge to them, Paul reviewed his ministry among them, described the Spirit’s leading him to Jerusalem, and challenged them to shepherd the church in their care. This discourse reveals Paul’s pastoral heart (20:18-20, 31, 36-37), reiterates Paul's preoccupation with preaching the Kingdom of God (20:24-25), and records the presence of a well-trained group of disciples who would be able to carry the message of Christ throughout Asia.

20:13-15 Paul traveled ahead by land to Assos, which was about twenty miles away, a much shorter distance than a ship had to travel. The rest of the party went on ahead by ship. At Assos, the party was reunited, and Luke faithfully recorded the inland passage trek of their ship—to Mitylene, then past the island of Kios and Samos, eventually arriving at Miletus. Miletus was situated at the mouth of the Maeander River on the Aegean Sea (in modern-day Turkey).

20:16 Paul had missed attending the Passover in Jerusalem, so he was especially interested in arriving on time for Pentecost, which is fifty days after Passover. He was carrying gifts for the Jerusalem believers from churches in Asia and Greece (see Romans 15:25-26; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 8:1–9:15). The Jerusalem church had been experiencing difficult times.

20:17-19 Paul wanted to meet with the elders of the church at Ephesus, so he sent word for them to come meet him at Miletus. Paul's message to the elders is an example of a typical address of Paul to the spiritual leaders of the churches he had begun. Paul described his ministry among the Ephesians, reminding the elders that they had observed his character. As wildly successful as Paul's ministry was—the miracles, decisions, baptisms, and successfully discipled believers and planted churches—he did not boast. Under his ministry there, the word of the Lord had spread widely (19:20). The glory, however, was consistently given back to the one directing it all—it was the Lord's work, not Paul's. Another characteristic of Paul's ministry to the Ephesians was the presence of tears. In other words, his work was done with passion and compassion. Paul's ministry also showed endurance. He spoke of the trials that he had endured.

20:20-21 Paul's ministry in Ephesus exuded boldness in telling the truth. The mention of homes may refer to house churches. Paul had one message for all. Both Jews and Gentiles alike were included in his mission, and both needed the central message of turning from sin and turning to God.

In this day of growing complexity, the church often falls prey to the temptation to become sophisticated and complicated, to fit into the culture. Believers must never let the message get lost in the trappings of the ministry (buildings, programs, schedules, calendars) or the ever-present busyness of church activities. The message must not be prejudiced—it's applicable to Jews and Gentiles alike. It is not optional, and it must not be overly complicated. It is just one message: turn from sin, turn to God, and believe in Jesus Christ.

20:22-23 Paul's message to the Ephesian elders shifted from a description of his past work among them to a description of the present and immediate future for him. That future would begin in Jerusalem, where Paul said he was being drawn there irresistibly by the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit told Paul that he would be imprisoned and experience suffering. Even knowing this, Paul did not shrink from fulfilling his mission. His strong character was a good example to the Ephesian elders—as well as to all Christians, many of whom would suffer for Christ.

20:24 Paul's statement of his priorities and values is a great perspective for any believer of any age. Self-preservation must be subservient to the faithful completion of the work assigned by the Lord Jesus. Paul was a single-minded person, and the most important goal of his life was telling others the Good News (Philippians 3:7-13). No wonder Paul was the greatest missionary who ever lived.

20:25-27 Paul may have been convinced that none of these men would ever see him again. It is unknown if he ever did, but at this somber moment, Paul was saying good-bye to a group, most of whom were led to Christ by him and probably all of whom had been taught by him. In a solemn declaration, Paul claimed his innocence of anyone's damnation. He was likely referring to the people of Ephesus before whom he had boldly and thoroughly proclaimed what they needed to know to be saved and to grow in Christ. All of God's purpose that had been revealed to Paul, he had taught to them.

20:28 Paul outlines the philosophy of the ministry that pastors and church leaders should follow as he charged these elders in Ephesus to beware—first for themselves and then for the church. Although Paul had likely chosen and trained most of them, the operative force behind everything had been the Holy Spirit. Those who lead God's people must beware by keeping a careful watch over themselves and the flock. The leadership (elders, pastors, deacons) would be the first line of attack from the enemy (the "wolves" mentioned in the next verse). Before the flock could be protected, the shepherds must protect themselves! These leaders were also to feed and shepherd God's flock. They were to guide, direct, protect, feed, and help the flock to grow into its full potential (see Psalm 23; Ephesians 4:11; 1 Peter 5:1-4).

20:29-30 With a vivid, colorful shepherding image, Paul forewarned the Ephesian elders of the coming attack on the flock by vicious wolves. Some would attack from outside the church. These false teachers would invade the church after the departure of Paul and, like wolves, ruthlessly attack the flock. They would bring with them their fine-sounding words, not sparing a soul who would believe and follow them.

Other attacks would come from inside the church (even some of you). Paul warned that some of their own members, in order to build a following, would distort the truth and lead away a portion of the flock to their own doom. False teachers did, in fact, hound the church at Ephesus. This is confirmed in the later books of the New Testament (1 Timothy 1:6-7, 9-20; 4:1-3; 2 Timothy 1:15; 2:17-18; 3:1-9; Revelation 2:1-7).

20:31 Paul's final warning is simply, "Watch out!" The leaders needed to remember Paul's example of wakefulness, his constant watch and care over them. Since the vicious enemy is always around (both inside and outside the church) and always looking for victims, the shepherd must never let down his guard.

Paul pointed to his own three years of shepherding of the Ephesian church as an example. The few incidents recorded in chapter 19 serve as examples of how constant and vicious the attacks could be. This is a good word for every church leader and person who seeks to live for Christ.

20:32 Paul pronounced a benediction of sorts to this group into whom he had poured so much of his life; he entrusted them to God and to the word of his grace. This was evidently a common parting phrase, as it occurs elsewhere in the book (14:23, 25; 15:40). The message had two essential characteristics: (1) it was able to build them up, and (2) it was able to give them an inheritance with all those he has set apart for himself (26:18; Ephesians 1:18; Colossians 1:12; 1 Peter 1:4). This message is the word of God, by which the believers would be built up in the faith.

20:33-35 Returning to remarks similar to those with which he opened (20:18-20), Paul reminded the elders of three more characteristics of his ministry: (1) contentment and self-restraint—he had not coveted anyone's money or fine clothing; (2) diligence—he had worked to pay his own way, and that of his companions as well; and (3) selflessness—he had been a constant example of how to help the poor by working hard, following Jesus' words concerning the advantage of giving over receiving.

These words of Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," are not recorded in the Gospels. Obviously, since not all of Jesus' words were written down (see John 21:25), this saying must have been passed on orally through the apostles. Certainly the theology of this statement is found abundantly in Christ's teachings.

20:36-38 Paul's relationship with these believers is a beautiful example of genuine Christian fellowship. He had cared for them and loved them, even wept with them in their needs. They responded with love and care for him and sorrow over his leaving. They prayed together and comforted one another.

Like Paul, all believers can build strong relationships with other believers by sharing, caring, sorrowing, rejoicing, and praying with them. And—like Paul—the best way to gather others around is by giving oneself away to them and to the gospel. It is not surprising that these men accompanied him down to the ship. They may have stood, wept, and prayed until the mast of their beloved shepherd's ship disappeared over the Aegean horizon, and only then returned to Ephesus, determined more than ever to shepherd their flock with the passion of the one who had so lovingly shown them the way.

PAUL'S JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM / 21:1-14

Upon making his way to Tyre, Paul was urged by the believers not to go to Jerusalem. Nevertheless, the apostle pressed on. At Caesarea further prophecies were given, warning Paul of certain imprisonment if he journeyed to Jerusalem. Unmoved, Paul adamantly determined to complete his mission. God's sovereignty was at work. This becomes more apparent upon viewing how this Jerusalem visit ultimately paved the way for Paul's trip to Rome!

21:1-3 Having said farewell to the Ephesian elders at Miletus, Paul continued his journey to Jerusalem. The stops along the way—Cos, Rhodes, and Patara—were a normal day's run for the smaller ship they were on. At Patara they boarded a different ship, possibly a larger vessel that could make the longer, open-sea trip to Phoenicia. Luke recorded the sighting of Cyprus in their transit of the Mediterranean—surely sparking memories for Paul of his first journey with Barnabas. How many miles and memories had passed since then, not to mention how many souls had found the Savior! The ship put in at Tyre, in Syria, its destination, giving Paul and his group a week's rest before they shipped out again.

21:4 A church had been founded in Tyre, probably soon after the dispersion of believers from Jerusalem following Stephen's martyrdom (8:1; 11:19). Paul and his traveling companions (see 20:4) found the local believers and stayed with them a week.

Certain believers who had the gift of prophecy prophesied through the Holy Spirit, warning Paul not to go to Jerusalem. Was Paul disobeying the Holy Spirit by continuing his journey to Jerusalem? More likely, the Holy Spirit warned these believers about the suffering that Paul would face in Jerusalem. They drew the conclusion that he should not go there because of that danger. This is supported by 21:12-14, where the local believers, after hearing that Paul would be turned over to the Romans, begged him to turn back. Acts 20:22 and 21:14 show that Paul determined that it was God's will for him to go to Rome, as does the fact that God directly told him that he was supposed to go to Rome (23:11). Paul said that he was "drawn irresistibly" by the Holy Spirit to go to Jerusalem (20:22). But Paul's importance to the church organizationally, and their love for him personally, compelled these believers to interpret the certainty of danger to mean he should stay safe. But, like his Savior before him, Paul “resolutely set out for Jerusalem” (Luke 9:51).

21:5-6 After the week was over, the congregation of believers, including wives and children, went down to the shore to see them off. As at Miletus (20:36-38), the farewell from Tyre was a tender time of prayer. Whenever someone says that Paul was cold or harsh (based on the stinging rebukes he passed out to churches like those in Galatia and Corinth or to individuals like Barnabas and even Peter), lead the person to passages such as these. Whether it was from the elders at Ephesus or the believers at Tyre, there was a warm, loving response to his ministry virtually everywhere he went.

21:7 Ptolemais was the only stop between Tyre and Caesarea, and there the stay was much shorter—only one day. Still, Paul and his companions greeted the believers. As with Tyre, there is no record of how or by whom the church had been planted in the area.

21:8-9 In Caesarea lived Philip, called here the Evangelist. The last record of his activities is found in 8:26-40. Philip had been one of the seven men chosen to serve the tables in the early days of the church at Jerusalem (6:5). Philip had four unmarried daughters, and they all had the gift of prophecy. From this text we learn that the gift of prophecy was given to both men and women. Several women are noted for their active participation in God’s work (2:17; Philippians 4:3). Other women who are recorded in the Bible as prophesying include Miriam (Exodus 15:20), Deborah (Judges 4:4), Huldah (2 Kings 22:14), Noadiah (Nehemiah 6:14), Isaiah’s wife (Isaiah 8:3), and Anna (Luke 2:36-38).

21:10-11 Fifteen years earlier, Agabus had predicted the famine in Jerusalem (11:27-29). He arrived at Philip’s home from Judea and gave a graphic display of what lay ahead for Paul, giving more detail as to what the previous prophecies had been warning. Agabus gave the information of Paul’s impending arrest—naming the Jewish leaders as the cause and adding that he would be turned over to the Romans.

21:12-14 Spurred along by the graphic and foreboding prophecy of Agabus, the believers in Caesarea begged Paul not to go on to Jerusalem. Even Paul’s traveling companions (we) added their voices to the crowd. Why would he go to certain imprisonment in Jerusalem? The answer was that Paul knew God wanted him to go. No one enjoys pain, but a faithful disciple wants above all else to please God. Paul was not ignoring the warnings. He was not suicidal. Paul simply disagreed with his brothers and sisters in Christ as to whether the prophesied difficulties outweighed the potential progress that could be made for the gospel. And the ultimate issue—the will of God—was the one to which Paul’s friends finally resigned themselves: “The will of the Lord be done.”

PAUL ARRIVES AT JERUSALEM / 21:15-25

At long last, Paul reached his destination—Jerusalem. He was warmly welcomed by the believers there. Aware, however, of the strong Jewish animosity toward Paul, James and the elders encouraged the apostle to participate in a public Jewish ceremony of purification at the Temple. Such an act, they felt, would quell the false rumors circulating about Paul—that he was actively undermining the Mosaic law.

21:15-17 The trip from Caesarea to Jerusalem was about sixty-five miles—a two-day journey on horseback. The home of Mnason may have been in Jerusalem or at some point along the journey there. Mnason was from Cyprus and was one of the early disciples. He may have been converted during Paul and Barnabas’s first missionary journey (13:4-12), or he may have been a convert from even earlier than that—perhaps one of the original Jerusalem disciples from the few weeks following that miraculous Pentecost (chapter 2).

Upon their arrival in Jerusalem, Paul and his friends were welcomed cordially, a testimony to the growing reputation of the apostle and gratitude for the generous gift he was bringing from the churches (see 24:17; Romans 15:25-27; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 8:13-14; 9:12-13). Paul had not forgotten the charge of the Jerusalem church from years ago to remember the poor (Galatians 2:10). The Jerusalem elders had never thought that they would be the beneficiaries of Paul’s obedience to their charge; much less had they imagined that the support would come from predominantly Gentile churches. How that must have bonded the Jewish and Gentile segments of the church!

21:18-19 James, Jesus’ brother, was the leader of the Jerusalem church (15:13-21; Galatians 1:19; 2:9). It was not only an influential church, but it had also been a horribly persecuted church (since Stephen’s day), and at this particular time, it faced famine and poverty. This was obviously an important gathering, since all the elders were present. They listened to Paul’s account of the things God had accomplished among the Gentiles through his ministry.

The “we” section ends here and will not appear again until 27:1. It is unclear whether Luke was no longer with them (an unlikely event) or whether he just changed his literary style.

21:20-22 There were great tensions in Jerusalem during this period. The ancient Jewish historian Josephus described this time period (approximately ^{A.D.} 56 or 57) as being filled with political unrest and strong Jewish nationalism. There were several uprisings by Jews against their Roman leaders—all of which had been brutally put down by Felix, the Roman procurator. This caused even more anger from the Jews and intensified their hatred for Gentiles. Paul, missionary to the Gentiles, entered the city with news of vast Gentile conversions.

The elders informed Paul of the large contingency of Jews who had believed. The problem, however, was that all of those Jews took the law of Moses very seriously (15:5), meaning that they probably would not be rejoicing in the success of Paul's ministry among the Gentiles. The Jewish Christian "zealots" had been told, through rumors, that Paul was teaching all the Jews he had contacted who lived in the Gentile world to turn their backs on the laws of Moses. Not only that, but they had heard that Paul was minimizing the rite of circumcision and allowing the Jews to stop following Jewish customs.

The Jerusalem council (chapter 15) had settled the issue of circumcision of Gentile believers. Evidently, there was a rumor that Paul had gone far beyond the council's decision, even forbidding Jews to circumcise their children. It was true that Paul was downplaying the importance of circumcision and did not require keeping the Jewish customs, but that was for the Gentiles, not for the Jews. Paul had Timothy circumcised because his mother was Jewish (see commentary on 16:2-3). Paul taught both Jews and Gentiles that salvation did not depend on keeping the law (Galatians 3:24-29; 5:1; Colossians 2:11-17). He taught Gentiles not to get circumcised (1 Corinthians 7:18-19), but there is no evidence that he taught Jews to abandon the practice.

21:23-24 The rumors about Paul, of course, were not true, but Paul willingly submitted to this Jewish custom to show that he was not working against the council's decision and that he was still Jewish in his lifestyle. (Sometimes believers must submit to authorities to avoid offending others, especially when such offense would hinder God's work.)

The Jerusalem elders suggested that Paul join four men among their number who had taken a vow. The details are unknown, but they seem to have taken the Nazirite vow (Numbers 6:13-21). Paul was to join them in the purification ceremony and pay their expenses. Often a Jew who had been in Gentile territory for a lengthy time would undergo ritual purification upon returning to his homeland. The time period for this purification was seven days. This may have been what the elders were asking Paul to do.

There seems to have been a definite lack of resolve in this decision by the Jerusalem elders as they tried to appease the Jews. A far more appropriate response by the leaders would have been to tell them that the Jerusalem council had made an authoritative decision (probably at least eight years ago by this time) and communicated it in written form. Paul agreed to abide by the ruling, and had been doing so. It seems absurd that this hardworking apostle, who had just brought to Jerusalem a generous offering from his Gentile ministry, should be asked for some of his hard-earned money to placate that group. But when asked, Paul graciously gave the money and went along with the leaders' suggestion.

Those who think Paul was wrong for going along with this request by the elders forget one of the marks of Paul's ministry: "When I am with the Jews, I become one of them so that I can bring them to Christ. When I am with those who follow the Jewish laws, I do the same, even though I am not subject to the law, so that I can bring them to Christ" (1 Corinthians 9:20). This was one of those times when it was not worth offending the Jews, so Paul wisely chose to comply.

21:25 Here, quoting almost word for word, the elders stated the past ruling of the Jerusalem council (see 15:19-21). One wonders if any of these individuals had seen a copy of Paul's letter to the Romans or the Galatians. It is not clear who this restatement of the council ruling was for—themselves, Paul, or those among them who may have been wavering. Perhaps this statement is best understood as given to assure Paul that they were not changing the ruling or adding anything to what had been decided years earlier.

PAUL IS ARRESTED / 21:26-36

Paul's attempt to placate his enemies was an utter failure. A group of Jews from Asia spotted him in the Temple and incited a crowd to seize him. Dead set in their determination to reject the message of salvation in Christ, these opponents of Paul refused to look objectively at the facts. Instead, they whipped the mob into a frenzy by making a series of false and highly inflammatory accusations against the apostle. Only the quick action of a detachment of Roman soldiers saved Paul from being beaten to death.

21:26-29 Paul's agreement to their request was a sign of his greatness. In submission to their political sensitivity, he paid for a ceremony in order to appease the religious zealots. He went through the purification ritual with the four others and proceeded to the Temple. But Paul's gracious action appeased none of his detractors. The opposition appears to have come from unbelieving

(that is, non-Christian) Jews from Asia, who recognized him in the Temple during the time of his completion of the purification ritual. These Jews, present for Pentecost, must have recognized Paul from his ministry in their area. Since they recognized Trophimus, they likely were from Ephesus and may have even been a part of the riot there (19:28-41).

These Jews roused a mob that began to shout against Paul. Contrary to their emotional accusation, Paul had not been teaching against the Jews or telling everybody to disobey the Jewish laws, nor had he spoken against the Temple. The pinnacle of this argument was the accusation that Paul had brought Gentiles into the Temple. Luke explained that the Jewish accusers had seen Paul in the city with Trophimus, whom they knew to be a Gentile. Then, without any investigation whatsoever, they assumed Paul had taken him into the Temple, reporting this as if it had actually happened (21:28)!

21:30-31 The city was thrown into an uproar, and a great riot followed. In mob-like fashion, Paul was dragged out of the Temple, and the gates were closed behind him. These were the gates between the inner court and the Court of the Gentiles. The Temple guards (Levites) shut the gates to prevent the mob from coming inside. How ironic that the final scene at the Temple in the book of Acts is the gates slamming shut to keep Paul out. Evidently, the mob probably was going to try to beat him or stone him to death. Because Jerusalem was under Roman control, an uproar in the city would quickly be investigated by Roman authorities. The commander of the Roman regiment at this time was Claudius Lysias (see 23:26).

21:32-33 Lysias called out his soldiers and officers. The quick action of Lysias and the close proximity of the garrison (the Antonia Fortress was adjacent to the Temple area) were all that saved Paul's life. The seizing of Paul by the crowd was superseded by the seizing of Paul by the Roman soldiers.

Paul actually was fortunate to be arrested and bound. Luke, ever the one for details, wrote that Paul was bound with two chains. The chains handcuffed him to a Roman soldier on each side. This would be normal treatment for a criminal. After seizing Paul, the commander asked the crowd who the chained man was and what crime he had committed.

21:34-36 The commander could not get a direct answer because the crowd could not agree on what the issues were—of course, that had not stopped them in their murderous course a few moments earlier. Because the commander couldn't find out the truth, he ordered Paul to be taken to the fortress, probably the safest place for the apostle in all Jerusalem! This was the Fortress of Antonia, built by Herod the Great to defend the Temple area. It was located northwest of the Temple and connected by stairs to the Court of the Gentiles. The fortress housed nearly one thousand soldiers.

In the process of moving their prisoner, the mob, supposedly seeing the object of their anger being safely whisked away, grew so violent that Paul had to be carried by the soldiers! The murderous mob pursued, all the while shouting, “Kill him, kill him!” These were almost identical to the words another murderous crowd had shouted to Pontius Pilate concerning Jesus of Nazareth just a few decades earlier (Luke 23:18; John 19:15).

PAUL SPEAKS TO THE CROWD / 21:37–22:23

Paul’s defense before the Jewish mob in the Temple courts is a textbook example of how to communicate to a hostile audience. He disarmed the Roman commander by speaking to him in Greek. Then he established common ground with the Jews gathered below him by speaking to them in their own language. Presenting his credentials as a devout Jew trained under the highly respected rabbi Gamaliel, Paul then described his unlikely encounter with the risen Christ on the Damascus Road. The crowd listened attentively until Paul mentioned “Gentiles.” At that word, the mob erupted in anger. Although Paul knew his statement would cause controversy, he refused to dilute the truth.

21:37-38 By speaking in Greek, Paul showed that he was a cultured, educated man and not just a common rebel starting riots in the streets. The language grabbed the commander’s attention and gave Paul protection and the opportunity to give his defense.

The historian Josephus wrote of an Egyptian who had led a revolt of thousands of Jews in Jerusalem in A.D. 54 (just three years previous). This self-proclaimed prophet had convinced his fanatical followers to accompany him to the nearby Mount of Olives. He said that, at his word, the walls of Jerusalem would collapse and this miraculous event would precipitate the destruction of the Roman Empire. Governor Felix had dispatched troops to deal with this insurrection. Hundreds of Jews were either killed or captured, and the Egyptian ringleader of this sect had disappeared into the desert. Lysias apparently assumed that Paul was this rebel, returning to make more trouble.

21:39-40 All these events took place outside the Fortress of Antonia, the Roman garrison that adjoined the Temple area on the northwest side. From the headquarters of Claudius Lysias, two flights of stairs led down into the outer court of the Temple. The staircase would prove to be an excellent platform from which Paul could talk to these people.

The commander agreed to Paul's request. The text does not tell us why. Perhaps he was convinced that Paul was not some insurrectionist or rabble-rouser. He was a Jew and a proper citizen. The commander may have thought that Paul could explain to the crowd what had happened, and hopefully they would disperse peacefully. So he agreed to let Paul speak.

Paul looked out on an enraged mob, and his heart broke. He ached for his people to understand the truth about Christ. He had been just like them—spiritually blind—and he wanted his Jewish brothers to experience this same salvation. When Paul began speaking to the assembled crowd, he addressed them in their own language, Aramaic, the common language among Palestinian Jews. He spoke in Aramaic not only to communicate in the language of his listeners but also to show that he was a devout Jew and had respect for the Jewish laws and customs.

22:1-2 With this courteous salutation, Paul began the first of five defenses recorded by Luke in the book of Acts. He commanded the mob's attention by speaking Aramaic, their own language, because many Jews of the Dispersion (that is, Hebrews who were born or reared outside of Palestine) could not speak Greek or Hebrew. The mob would have assumed that Paul, an outsider, could speak only Greek. Paul's ability to speak Aramaic gave his Jewish credentials even more weight and helped win him a hearing.

22:3 Paul began his defense with a brief personal history. The statement, I am a Jew, declared Paul's brotherhood with the crowd. Though born in Tarsus, Paul had been educated in Jerusalem. Not only that, but under Gamaliel, the most honored rabbi of that time. Gamaliel was well known and respected as an expert on religious law and as a voice for moderation (5:34). At Gamaliel's feet, Paul had learned to follow our Jewish laws and customs very carefully. The Pharisees were legendary for their rigorous keeping of the most minute details of the law (see Matthew 23). This statement by Paul was intended to refute the allegation in 21:28 that he had been telling everyone to disobey the Jewish laws.

In saying he was zealous to honor God in everything, Paul was alluding to his former prominent role in the persecution of Christians. He recognized the sincere motives behind their desire to kill him and that a few years earlier, he had shared that same well-meaning but misguided passion.

22:4-5 Having commended his Jewish audience for their zeal, Paul described how his passion for Judaism and against Christianity had been even more intense. Beyond merely accosting Christians on the Temple grounds, Paul had sought their death (see 7:54-60; 26:10). Furthermore, he had been authorized to bring Christians all the way from Damascus back to Jerusalem, in chains, to be punished. These were widely known, indisputable facts, making Paul's testimony extremely powerful.

22:6-9 Paul's conversion is recorded in chapter 9. Here Paul told the story himself, making it clear that his conversion was not an issue of defection but a matter of divine intervention! Paul had been about his business, intent on his mission (rounding up the followers of Jesus)—and apparently very content and settled in his pro-Jewish, anti-Christian state of mind. Suddenly Jesus himself intervened and spoke to Paul. Without referring to a single Old Testament prophecy or launching into a theological discourse, Paul used his personal experience to press the points that Jesus was both alive and glorified.

22:10-13 Blinded, confused, shocked, scared—Paul's mind must have been reeling as he lay in the dust. He had responded with a humble question, "What shall I do, Lord?" Paul related to his audience the physical effects of this divine revelation. He had been unable to see and had to be led into Damascus by others. There Jesus had told him that he would receive further instructions.

To give further credence to his testimony before such a zealous Jewish mob, Paul described the role Ananias had played in his conversion, mentioning Ananias's stellar reputation among the Jews of Damascus.

22:14-16 Paul reported that he had heard through the lips of this respected, devout Jew his unexpected, unsought commission. Ananias had made it clear that the supernatural events being experienced by Paul were the sovereign work of none other than the God of our ancestors. In zealously opposing Jesus and his followers, Paul had assumed that he had been serving and honoring the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses. Through the announcement of Ananias, he had learned the truth. The God of the Hebrews—far from leading Paul to fight Christianity—was selecting him to become the leading spokesman for this new faith! Paul would take his message everywhere. So Paul was baptized right then—a powerful outward sign of Paul's inward cleansing from sin and his embracing of the truth.

22:17-18 Paul continued to answer the mob's accusations. He stated, in effect, that he was not anti-Temple (see 21:28). By praying and worshiping there, he demonstrated his continued respect for the Temple—even as a follower of Jesus.

While he was praying in the Temple, Paul received a heavenly vision. The Greek word for trance is ekstasei, the same root used to describe Peter's dreamlike encounter on the rooftop in Joppa (10:10; 11:5). In this vision, Jesus appeared and warned Paul to promptly leave Jerusalem because the Jews would not accept his testimony.

In 9:29-30, Luke reported that Paul departed Jerusalem upon the advice of his Christian brothers. This apparent discrepancy is easily resolved by viewing Paul as led by both human counsel and divine revelation. The advice from worried believers probably came first, later being confirmed by that other, stronger, more irresistible voice (20:22).

22:19-20 Never one to run from controversy or trouble, Paul protested mildly. He obviously felt convinced that his conversion from a notorious persecutor of Christians into an ardent evangelist for the Way would impress his Jewish accusers. Surely, they would marvel at the change in his life. He could not and would not have done such a complete about-face without compelling reasons. Perhaps implicit in Paul's rejoinder was the thought that preaching to such a volatile audience might in some way make up for the damage he had done to the church—especially assisting in and approving of the killing of Stephen.

22:21 Paul's appeal to the Lord was unsuccessful. For Paul's own safety and for the fulfillment of God's eternal plan, Paul needed to leave Jerusalem. A plot on his life was in the works (see 9:22-23). Specifically, the Lord was commissioning Paul to take the message of salvation to the Gentiles.

22:22-23 These people had listened intently to Paul, but the word "Gentiles" brought out all their anger and exposed their pride. They were supposed to be a light to the Gentiles, telling them about the one true God, but they had renounced that mission by becoming separatist and exclusive. Did the Jews hate the Gentiles? No. Continual efforts were made by the Jews to try to convert the Gentiles. The implications of Paul's testimony and Christian gospel were clear, however. He was suggesting that the Gentiles could be saved and made right with God without first subscribing to the law and submitting to Jewish circumcision. In effect, Paul was claiming divine approval for the idea that Jews and Gentiles could have equal standing before God. This message collided head-on with the blindness, pride, and prejudice of the Jews. The results were explosive.

PAUL REVEALS HIS ROMAN CITIZENSHIP / 22:24-25

Irritated at Paul for having created such a ruckus, and eager to force some sort of confession, the Roman commander ordered the apostle flogged. Paul barely escaped this sentence by mentioning his Roman citizenship. Here is yet another instance of God's sovereign control over lives and events. Who knows how the spread of the gospel might have been hindered had Paul not been a Roman citizen?

22:24-25 The commander, who only minutes before had been impressed enough with Paul to give him the opportunity to speak to the crowd, suddenly became annoyed. Weary of the continual upheaval surrounding Paul, he ordered the apostle to be lashed with whips. He believed this examination by torture would make him confess his crime or at least an explanation about what was really going on.

Paul, ever the shrewd servant of the Lord, resorted to his civic privilege. By law, a Roman citizen could not be punished without first having a trial, nor could a Roman citizen be interrogated by beating or torture. Paul knew the law. He knew the answer to that question. It was most certainly not legal. There had been no trial, hearing, or formal charges presented.

22:26-28 Paul's question stunned and scared his captors. They had come dangerously close to violating strict Roman laws. In quizzing Paul, the commander learned that Paul was a citizen by birth (apparently his father had somehow achieved this status). The commander admitted that he had been forced to purchase his citizenship. Buying one's citizenship (actually bribing the right people in power) was a common practice and a good source of income for the Roman government. Bought citizenship was considered inferior to citizenship by birth.

22:29 Paul's revelation about himself effectively ended the proceedings. The text does not state so explicitly, but Roman laws prohibited even the fettering of Roman citizens. The commander realized how close he had come to breaking the law himself. Paul was likely freed from his chains immediately but still detained for the night at the Fortress of Antonia (for his own protection, given the volatile nature of the crowd).

PAUL BEFORE THE HIGH COUNCIL / 22:30–23:11

Having been saved from the murderous mob at the Temple the previous day, Paul was brought before the Jewish high council. When he sensed the charged atmosphere (he was slapped after uttering the first sentence of his defense!), Paul decided to focus the council's attention on something even more controversial than himself—the theological debate concerning the resurrection of the dead. Immediately, the Pharisees and Sadducees began to argue, and Paul was led back to the safety of his cell. There the Lord appeared to him in a comforting vision, assuring him that he would preach the Good News in Rome. No amount of human opposition can thwart God's plan and purposes.

22:30 In an unusual move, the Roman commander removed Paul's chains, then ordered the leading priests into session with the Jewish high council to hear Paul's case (for more on the Jewish high council, see commentary on 4:5). If Paul were found innocent there, the commander could release him. If found guilty by the Jewish court, however, then the commander would see that Paul, a Roman citizen, went before the Roman governor (and, if necessary, on to Rome).

23:1 With clear, solid eye contact, the first words Paul said to the assembled Jewish religious leaders were, “I have always lived before God in all good conscience!” Two times in Acts (here and in 24:16) and twenty-one times in his letters (see, for example, 1 Corinthians 4:4; 2 Corinthians 1:12; 1 Timothy 1:5; 2 Timothy 1:3), Paul referred to his clear conscience. He wanted his audience to know that he was committed to his spiritual and moral choices that had resulted in his trial before them. He was ready to stand before God and be accountable for his choices and actions. Inherent in Paul's statement, of course, was the challenge: were they ready?

23:2-3 Almost as soon as Paul began speaking, he was slapped on the mouth. Obviously, Paul had already offended Ananias the high priest, his accuser! Ananias became high priest in A.D. 48, and he reigned through A.D. 58 or 59. Josephus, a respected first-century historian, described Ananias as profane, greedy, and hot-tempered. He was hated by many of his Jewish contemporaries because of his pro-Roman policies.

Paul's outburst came as a result of the illegal command that Ananias had given. Ananias had violated Jewish law by assuming that Paul was guilty without a trial and by ordering his punishment (see Deuteronomy 19:15). Paul had not yet been charged with a crime, much less tried or found guilty.

Paul's use of the term whitewashed wall also recalls Jesus' similar description of the Pharisees in Matthew 23:27. This amounted to calling Ananias a hypocrite. "Whitewashed wall" may refer to the practice of whitewashing gravestones. This created a clean and positive appearance for what contained death and corruption.

23:4-5 When Paul was given the information that he did not know, that the one whom he had rebuked was the high priest, he apologized—not to the individual but to the office. It is clear that Paul was submitting to the word as he quoted the appropriate passage from Exodus 22:28, a verse that prohibits speaking evil of anyone who rules over you. Paul's ministry and his life had been marked by his obedience to God. Here he exhibited again, even in a very difficult situation, that God's word mattered.

Paul may not have recognized Ananias as the high priest because of poor eyesight. Or perhaps his words were ironic, expressing his amazement that one who would behave so badly (and illegally!) toward him could be the high priest. Most likely, Paul simply did not know who the high priest was or even that he was present at the trial. Because Paul had been in Jerusalem only sporadically for about twenty years, he may have never seen Ananias, maybe only knowing him by name or, more likely, by reputation. This meeting had been called by the Roman commander, not the council members, so the members may not have been in their official robes, which would have identified the high priest (22:30).

23:6 The Sadducees and Pharisees were two groups of religious leaders but with strikingly different beliefs. The Pharisees believed in a bodily resurrection, but the Sadducees did not. The Sadducees adhered only to Genesis through Deuteronomy, which contain no explicit teaching on resurrection. Paul's statement about his hope moved the debate away from himself and toward the religious leaders' festering controversy about the resurrection of the dead.

By identifying himself as a Pharisee and the descendant of Pharisees, Paul utilized three tactics: (1) he opened the door for inserting the Good News of the resurrected Christ, at least with the part of the council who believed in the Resurrection; (2) he got some sympathy and support from a part of the council; (3) he surfaced an ongoing controversy that would embroil the council in hopeless debate.

Paul's sudden insight that the council was a mixture of Sadducees and Pharisees is an example of the power that Jesus promised to believers (Mark 13:9-11). God will help his people when they are under fire for their faith. Like Paul, believers should always be ready to present their testimony. The Holy Spirit will give them power to speak boldly.

23:7-8 Paul's tactic worked. The council was divided. Their historic argument about resurrection, angels, and spirits came to the surface. This was the same issue over which the Sadducees had tried to trap Christ (Matthew 22:23-33), but without success. It is not likely that Paul was simply causing a distraction, though that was the result. Rather, he was utilizing this opportunity, maybe his last with his Pharisee "brothers," to tell them the truth, to introduce them to his Savior. His primary motive was to tell them the truth: "I know you believe in resurrection, and I have a resurrection that you have to investigate!"

23:9 The dispute caused a great clamor. As expected, the Pharisees came to the vigorous defense of one who spoke so positively about one of their valued positions—resurrection. Paul had, in fact, stated that resurrection was the reason that he was on trial at all (23:6)! The Pharisees alluded to another area of their differences between them and the Sadducees by speculating on the fact that a spirit or an angel may have spoken to him. They may have drawn this conclusion based on some of Paul's remarks to the crowd at the Temple court the day before (22:17-18). The Sadducees would have argued strongly that such communication was not possible because they didn't believe in the existence of spirits and angels.

23:10 Finally the disagreement became so heated that the Roman commander had to step in. Evidently, Paul was in the middle of it all and had to be removed by the Roman troops. From there he was safely brought back to the fortress. Just as had been Paul's experience for the last decade of ministry, he was once again attacked by the Jews and treated kindly by the Gentiles—locked in a Roman prison in order to protect him from the high court of the Jews!

23:11 When night came, the Lord appeared to Paul, telling him to be encouraged. He praised Paul for faithfully telling the people about me here in Jerusalem. Then he gave Paul a word of promise—you must preach the Good News in Rome. God, in essence, promised Paul safe passage to another field of ministry.

THE PLAN TO KILL PAUL / 23:12-22

The morning after God had pledged to deliver Paul safely to Rome, a group of Jews gathered to plot the murder of the apostle. Paul's nephew learned of the plot and revealed it to the Roman commander in Jerusalem.

23:12-13 The Lord himself had come to Paul in prison and essentially had promised him safe passage to Rome. Meanwhile, these zealous Jews bound themselves with an oath to neither eat nor drink until they had killed Paul. They put themselves under a solemn vow, like a curse, if they did not fulfill what they said. Paul had already been granted safe passage to Rome by God himself. Luke must have chuckled as he was writing these words, knowing that these sincere but misguided Jews (more than forty of them) would have to go without food for a long time. It would be ten years or so before Paul's death in Rome!

23:14-15 This group of over forty men announced their oath to the leading priests and other leaders. Their plan was to get the high council to have Paul returned to a meeting with them under the guise of examining his case more fully. And, exposing their contemptible character, they planned to kill him on the way. Evidently, the Jewish leaders thought this was a good idea and went along with it! To these leaders, politics and position had become more important than God. They were ready to plan another murder, just as they had done with Jesus. This also revealed the flimsiness of their case against Paul. They knew they had no case, but they so desperately wanted to get rid of him that they were willing to stoop to any means to do so. As always, however, God, not the council, was in control.

23:16-19 This is the only biblical reference to Paul's family. Some scholars believe that Paul's family disowned him when he became a Christian. Paul wrote of having suffered the loss of everything for Christ (Philippians 3:8). Paul's nephew, who is never named, was evidently able to visit Paul, even though Paul was in protective custody. Roman prisoners were often accessible to their relatives and friends who could bring them food and other amenities. How the nephew heard of the plan is not stated. Once Paul received the information, he immediately sent his nephew to the commander. Although God had told Paul that he would go to Rome, God did not explain how he would be kept safe. There is a healthy balance here of Paul trusting in God's sovereignty and yet wisely utilizing the God-sent provisions that would come his way—his Roman citizenship, the Roman soldiers, the Roman prison, and now, a piece of important information from a relative. Paul trusted God, but he kept his eyes open to see just how the Father would deliver him.

23:20-22 Paul's nephew gave a detailed report of the plot (23:12-15). The lad even knew about the oath. How he obtained the information is unknown, but there is no doubt about its accuracy. Evidently, the ambush was already in place, simply waiting for the commander's order to send the prisoner to the council chambers. The commander wisely told Paul's nephew to keep his silence on the report he had given. After this, the only member of Paul's family mentioned anywhere in the New Testament disappeared into the silence of unrecorded history.

PAUL IS SENT TO CAESAREA / 23:23-35

Guarded by an armed escort of almost five hundred Roman soldiers, Paul was transferred to Caesarea and the jurisdiction of Governor Felix. He would be safe there until it was time for him to leave for Rome. God's sovereignty is visible in both the actions of these secular authorities and in the resulting spread of the Good News.

23:23-24 There were 470 men dispatched to guard one prisoner—two hundred soldiers, two hundred spearmen, and seventy horsemen. The commander knew that the forty assassins would fight to the death, and he did not want to have to explain the assassination of a Roman citizen under his protection. The zealous desire to kill Paul on the part of the Jews in ambush was more than matched by the extent to which the Romans went to protect him.

Instead of returning Paul to the Jewish council, the commander sent him to Caesarea, sixty miles to the northwest. Jerusalem was the seat of Jewish government, but Caesarea was the Roman headquarters for the area. There the judicial process would be continued before the Roman court (Governor Felix), a process that was begun when Paul had exercised his rights as a Roman citizen (22:25).

23:25-26 Felix was the Roman governor or procurator of Judea from A.D. 52 to 59. This was the same position that Pontius Pilate had held. While the Jews had been given much freedom to govern themselves, the governor ran the army, kept the peace, and gathered the taxes.

How did Luke know what was written in the letter from Claudius Lysias? In his concern for historical accuracy, Luke used many sources to make sure that his writings were correct (see Luke 1:1-4). This letter was probably read aloud in court when Paul came before Felix to answer the Jews' accusations. Also, because Paul was a Roman citizen, a copy may have been given to him as a courtesy.

23:27-30 This letter seems to be a formal description of the events as well as the careful wording of a subordinate commander (Claudius Lysias) to his superior (Governor Felix). It must be noted that in his first sentence, the commander carefully rearranged the order of events, leaving out the fact that he had chained Paul and had been in the process of having him flogged when the information about his Roman citizenship was brought to light—a careful cover-up to protect himself (see 22:23-28).

Claudius stated that Paul was charged with nothing worthy of imprisonment or death. For the early readers of Acts, these would be encouraging precedents and may have helped them in their own struggles with the Jews or with Roman law.

23:31-32 The soldiers took Paul as far as Antipatris—more than thirty-five miles. At that distance from Jerusalem (and at that speed), the prisoner would certainly be safe from pursuers, so the soldiers had been released to return to Jerusalem, leaving Paul with the seventy horsemen to accompany him the final twenty-five miles to Caesarea. The last few miles into Antipatris provided excellent terrain for an ambush, so that was likely part of the reason that the larger contingent went so far before turning back.

23:33-35 And so Paul and his Roman escort arrived in Caesarea and were presented to Governor Felix. The governor ascertained Paul's province—Cilicia—and agreed to hear the case when his accusers arrived.

Felix was the governor (procurator) of Judea from about A.D. 52 to 59, holding the position that Pontius Pilate had held during Jesus' day. Felix had married Drusilla (24:24), a sister of Herod Agrippa II, the Agrippa mentioned in chapter 25. A man of low birth, Felix rose to power through the influence of his well-connected brother Pallas and his politically expedient marriages. He also married the granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra. The historian Tacitus, however, described Felix's career with a stinging epigram: "He exercised the power of a king with the mind of a slave." He was regarded as a poor governor. He dispensed justice arbitrarily and served his own ends. Jewish revolts increased under his administration.

Thus, the platform was set for Paul to speak before the leading rulers of the area (recorded in the next three chapters). When God has a willing person, there will be no end to the places he or she can be used, with phenomenal opportunities for effective work.

PAUL APPEARS BEFORE FELIX / 24:1-27

The next three chapters provide a look at an interesting trio of politicians—Felix, Festus, and Agrippa. All three were at the top of their profession, holding significant offices in the Roman regime that dominated their world. All three were known as intelligent, effective leaders. All three came face-to-face with the gospel of Jesus Christ through the testimony of none other than the apostle Paul. As determined from the text, all three rejected Christ. The reasons were different, but the results were the same.

24:1 The accusers arrived (24:35)—Ananias, the high priest, and the lawyer Tertullus, along with several Jewish leaders. They had traveled sixty miles to Caesarea, the Roman center of government, to bring their false accusations against Paul. Their murder plot had failed (23:12-15), but they were persisting in trying to kill him.

24:2-4 Tertullus began the religious leaders' case against Paul before the Roman governor Felix (see commentary at 23:33-35). The case, which surely is only summarized here, began with gushing flattery, which seems to have taken up almost as much time as the case itself! The flattery is even more sickening, given the historical record of Governor Felix, who is remembered as a violent and corrupt ruler and was hated by the Jews.

24:5-9 Finally, Tertullus got to the case. He made three accusations against Paul: (1) he was a troublemaker, inciting riots and rebellions; (2) he was the ringleader of an unrecognized sect, which was against Roman law; (3) he had tried to defile the Temple. The religious leaders hoped that these accusations would persuade Felix to execute Paul in order to keep the peace in Palestine.

If Felix would not prosecute Paul on the basis of his disruption of the peace, maybe he would do so if Paul were seen as a leader of a religious sect or cult that was not sanctioned by the state. This designation of Christians as Nazarenes was probably used of Jewish Christians from the earliest days of the church, but it is unknown what Felix may have known about them or what opinion he may have had. Surely Tertullus was using the term to put the church in its most controversial light.

The charge of defiling the Temple was designed to push Felix toward allowing the Jews to put Paul to death. It was one of the few offenses for which the Jews could still exact the death penalty. There seems to be a slight modification of the charge against Paul in this area (see 21:28). Originally, Paul had been charged with actually bringing a Gentile (Trophimus) into the temple area, thus desecrating it. Here the charge was modified to read that Paul “tried” to desecrate the temple—an attempted desecration rather than an actual one. Evidently the accusers knew they had no proof of the actual desecration (and maybe they did have solid proof of the exact opposite), so they had to shift their strategy to say that they had arrested him in order to prevent the desecration. When Tertullus finished his remarks, the other Jews chimed in, affirming the truthfulness of their legal counsel’s case.

Most modern versions do not include verse 7, because it is not found in the most ancient manuscripts.

24:10 The governor gave the apostle permission to speak, so Paul began his defense. Tertullus and the religious leaders seemed to have made a strong argument against Paul, but Paul would refute their accusations point by point.

Paul’s introductory remarks were much more cursory and to the point, in contrast to Tertullus’s flowing flattery. Paul simply alluded to the fact that Felix had been a judge of Jewish affairs for many years, thus making him a good person before whom to make his defense. This is likely the only accomplishment on which Paul could compliment him—that he had been around long enough and had tried enough cases involving Jewish affairs to be familiar with the nature of what was before him.

24:11-13 Paul answered the first charge (stirring up riots) by stating the easily verifiable trip he had made to Jerusalem no more than twelve days previously. The implication here was that he had not been in Jerusalem long enough to stir up trouble. Also, he stated that he had come to Jerusalem for the purpose of worship. Paul’s statement of easily provable or not provable evidence made a strong case. His accusers could not prove the things they had accused him of doing. He knew his accusers could not present a shred of evidence that he had defiled the Temple.

24:14 In this verse, Paul began to answer the second accusation—that of being a ringleader of a Nazarene sect. His answer to this accusation continues through 24:16 and provides the opening for the gospel. Paul affirmed that he followed the Way, which his accusers called a sect. “The Way” was the earliest name for the Christian church. It probably came from Isaiah 40:3, 10-11, referring to God’s people led on God’s way. It also had analogies to Matthew 7:14, “the way of salvation,” and to John 14:6, where Jesus referred to himself as “the way.”

Paul took this opportunity to tie the roots of the Christian movement to the God of the Jewish people—the God of our ancestors—and particularly to the Old Testament Scriptures. He affirmed before Felix his firm belief in the Jewish law and everything written in the books of prophecy. It would be hard to make the “heretic” or “sectarian” label stick with an argument as strong as this one. Paul was still worshiping the same God and holding to the same moral code as his accusers. He would soon get more specific.

24:15-16 Paul went straight to the issue of resurrection and judgment. He stated, first of all, his hope of a resurrection of both the righteous and the ungodly (see Daniel 12:2). This is, of course, the proclamation he had made in his case before the Jewish council that had won him support from the Pharisees and attack from the Sadducees (see 23:6-9).

Because of this resurrection of both the righteous and the wicked, Paul sought to maintain a clear conscience before God and everyone else (see comments at 23:1). Here is the strong personal testimony of one who expected to stand before his Maker and give account for his life. In stating it this way, Paul not only bore witness to the fact that he was ready to meet God but also—by implication—that all people must get ready for such a meeting of their own.

24:17 Paul finally moved to the last accusation, that he had tried to defile the Temple. Paul stated the main purpose of his Jerusalem trip—to bring money to aid his people and to offer sacrifices to God. This is the only mention, at least in the book of Acts, of the collection for the saints in Jerusalem. Paul’s letters refer to it several times (Romans 15:25-28; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 8:13-14; 9:12-13; Galatians 2:10), but, for the most part, it is left out of the Acts record.

24:18-19 As to the charge of defilement—Paul had been completing a purification ritual when he was discovered in the Temple courts. As to the charge of causing an uproar, he stated that there had been no crowd and no rioting. The problem came when some Jews from the province of Asia showed up. They, in fact, had caused the uproar, not Paul. This was a strong point in Paul’s defense, one that his accusers simply could not refute.

24:20-21 Paul suggested that Felix ask those members of the Jewish high council who were present what wrongdoing they found in him. Paul explained that he had made a controversial remark by claiming to believe in the resurrection of the dead (23:6). Paul knew it was unlikely that any of his accusers would attack that statement in Felix's presence, and they kept their silence. This, of course, gave Paul a chance to present the Resurrection again, this time before Felix and his court, as well as to those Pharisees (accusers) who had been present at Paul's meeting with the Jewish Council in Jerusalem. Thus the charges verbalized by Tertullus had been answered, and all that remained was for Felix to respond.

24:22-23 Felix had been governor for six years and was quite familiar with the Way. The Christian movement, which had involved thousands of people from the first day on (2:41, 47; 4:4), would have been a topic of conversation among the Roman leadership. Hopefully, too, the Christians' peaceful lifestyles had already proven to the Romans that Christians didn't go around starting riots. Felix's knowledge of and exoneration of the church seemed very important to Luke, and for good reason. Luke wanted the original readers of his book to have a solid record (and one of precedence) that found Christians innocent, even as they experienced ongoing persecution all over the Roman Empire. That is probably why Luke went to such lengths to record Roman court decisions from Gallio (18:14-15), Felix, Festus, and Agrippa (chapters 24–26).

Felix decided to delay the hearing until the commander, Lysias, could get there to give his testimony as to what had transpired. It is not recorded whether Lysias came to Caesarea or not. Likely he did, but as the next few verses indicate, for various political and fiscal reasons, Felix did not want to complete Paul's trial. It appears that this postponement became indefinite.

Paul was kept in custody, but, evidently, he was given a great deal of freedom by Governor Felix. Paul had a number of Christian brothers and sisters in Caesarea who loved him dearly and would readily visit him and take care of him (21:8-14). Such freedom was likely the result of Paul's being a Roman citizen against whom no crime had yet been proven.

24:24 After an unnamed period of time, Felix and his wife Drusilla sent for Paul and listened as he told them about faith in Christ Jesus. Drusilla was the daughter of Herod Agrippa I (see chapter 12) and the sister of Herod Agrippa II, making her part Jewish. At this time, she was likely only twenty years old. She had left a previous husband to marry Felix, which she did contrary to Jewish law, since Felix was a Gentile.

24:25-26 Paul's discourse with Felix and Drusilla included an interesting trio of topics—righteousness, self-control, and the judgment to come. Like Paul's remarks earlier in the trial (see 24:15-16), these three areas track with Jesus' description of the convicting work of the Holy Spirit (John 16:8) and would likewise be areas of great conviction for Felix. As stated earlier, Felix's career was marked by brutality and injustice; thus, the subject of righteousness and judgment would likely be more than a little uncomfortable. History also records that Drusilla was Felix's third wife, and he had to break up her previous marriage in order to free her for himself. Thus, a discourse on self-control would likely not have been something he would have enjoyed hearing.

Felix responded like an individual under conviction: "Go away for now." Felix was terrified. Paul confronted Felix, forcing him to deal with its full convicting message. And Felix wanted no part of it. Notice, too, another example of Felix's poor character. He frequently sent for Paul, hoping the apostle would bribe him, supposedly to buy his freedom. He talked to Paul often and, so, was regularly exposed to the truth. Felix seems to be a sorry example of one who "went to church" with regularity, listening to a personalized message from none other than the apostle Paul. Yet there is no record of Felix's ever coming to faith.

24:27 Two years went by in this way as Felix toyed with the apostle Paul. For two years this apostle to the Gentiles was out of commission, out of the pulpit, and serving as Felix's personal spiritual conversationalist.

By keeping Paul in prison, Felix could gain favor with the Jewish leaders. Eventually, Porcius Festus took over as governor of the region. He was a welcome successor. After Felix mishandled a political situation between the Jews and Greeks at Caesarea in A.D. 60, where he took unnecessarily harsh military action against the Jews, he was called back to Rome. Josephus wrote that things would have gone badly for him there, had not his brother, Pallas, interceded for him.

Festus is recorded in history as a more just ruler than Felix, although he was not on the scene very long. When Festus came into office, he inherited the imprisoned apostle and the Jewish leaders with a definite agenda.

ACTS 25:1-22

PAUL APPEARS BEFORE FESTUS / 25:1-22

When Felix was replaced by Porcius Festus, the Jews once again made their case against Paul. During this trial before the new governor, Festus, Paul, using his rights as a Roman citizen, asked for and received the promise of a hearing before Caesar. This legal decision thwarted the final action of Paul's Jewish enemies.

25:1-2 The new governor, Festus, wasted no time; after just three days on the job, he went to Jerusalem. Festus was procurator or governor of Judea A.D. 58–62. Little is known about Festus, though most of it is favorable, particularly in contrast with Felix whom he succeeded. In Jerusalem, the Jewish leaders met with him and made their accusations against Paul. God had allowed his most effective instrument for Gentile evangelism and church planting to sit in custody for two years, the apparent victim of Roman bureaucracy. But this was not God's perspective. The gospel would not be stopped simply by imprisoning Paul. Most likely, Paul was leading those around him to Christ, even in his chained condition.

25:3 Although two years had passed, the Jewish leaders still were looking for a way to kill Paul. The plot had expanded from the original forty-plus leaders (23:12-13) to all the Jewish leaders. They tried to convince Festus to transfer Paul to Jerusalem (so they could prepare an ambush). The ruthless Jews had obviously abandoned all hope of a conviction of Paul by the Romans, so they decided to take matters into their own hands. This request was likely a clever political move, and we can only imagine how these politically savvy Jewish leaders tried to explain how such a favor early on in Festus's administration would do wonders for their working relationship in the future.

25:4-5 By God's intervention, Festus decided to leave Paul in Caesarea. The trial would not be moved, so Festus informed the Jewish leadership that those in authority could return with him. In Caesarea, in his courtroom, they would be allowed to make their accusations.

25:6-7 After a few days, Festus returned to Caesarea, where on the very next day, the case of this Roman citizen, alleged troublemaker for the Jews, began again. As before, the Jewish leaders from Jerusalem gathered around and made many serious accusations they couldn't prove—probably all the same baseless accusations from two years before.

25:8 Paul succinctly denied all the charges that had just been blasted at him again. He applied his denial to the three main areas of accusation: the Jewish laws, the Temple, and the Roman government (see 21:28; 24:5-6).

25:9-11 Only about two weeks into this new procuratorship, Festus wanted to get off to a politically healthy start with the people he was governing. The Jews were known as a difficult people to govern, and many Roman political careers had been dashed at this Judean outpost (including that of Festus's immediate predecessor, Felix). It is not surprising that Festus would wish to please the Jews. Catering to what he knew they desperately wanted, he asked Paul if he would be willing to go to Jerusalem to stand trial before him (Festus) there. Festus knew that the Jews had no case against Paul, but either he wasn't willing to aggravate and enrage them further or he simply didn't know how to investigate such religious matters (see 25:20).

Whatever Festus's motive behind this offer to switch the location of the trial, it became irrelevant at Paul's next words: "I appeal to Caesar!" Every Roman citizen had the right to appeal to Caesar. This didn't mean that Caesar himself would hear the case but that the citizen's case would be tried by the highest courts in the Empire—it is much like appealing to the Supreme Court. This right of appeal to the emperor provided Roman citizens protection in capital offense trials carried out by local judges in the provinces. It was normal for a Roman judge to set up a group of advisors in a case. Festus might have proposed to have members of the council serve. Thus, there would be no fair trial in Jerusalem. Paul insisted on a court made up of a jury of all Roman citizens. He appealed to Emperor Nero, who in A.D. 60 had not yet started the persecution of Christians. To go to Rome as a prisoner was better than not to go there at all.

25:12 Festus probably felt enormous relief at having a way out of this difficult situation. Paul's request led Festus into a conference with his advisers (these were his legal experts and higher officials), giving what seems to be a quick reply: "To Caesar you shall go!"

Humanly speaking, it is probably better that it happened this way. If Festus had ruled on the case, he likely would have set Paul free—free to make his own way (without an armed escort) back to Antioch or on to Rome. The bloodthirsty group of Jewish leaders would have done their best to make sure that Paul didn't live to see another day. Instead, Paul would have an armed guard all the way to his next preaching stop. Though he would have a few more audiences with whom to share the gospel between there and Rome, few were more prestigious than the one he was about to meet.

25:13-15 King Agrippa was Herod Agrippa II, son of Herod Agrippa I, and a descendant of Herod the Great, the last of the Herod dynasty that ruled parts of Palestine from 40 B.C. to A.D. 100. Like great-grandfather, like grandfather, like father, like son—Agrippa inherited the effects of generations of powerful men with flawed personalities. Each son followed his father in weaknesses, mistakes, and missed opportunities. Each generation had a confrontation with God, and each failed to realize the importance of his decision.

At this time (A.D. 60) Agrippa II was a young man of about thirty-three. He ruled the territories northeast of Palestine, bearing the title of “king.” With power over the Temple, he controlled the Temple treasury and could appoint and remove the high priest. Bernice was his sister. When she was thirteen (A.D. 41), she had married her uncle, Herod Chalcis, who died in A.D. 48. Then she became a mistress to her brother, Agrippa II. In A.D. 63, she married King Polemon of Cilicia, but in the early 70s, she became mistress to Emperor Vespasian’s son, Titus. Here Agrippa and Bernice were making an official visit to Festus, to pay their respects.

Agrippa and Festus were anxious to cooperate in governing their neighboring territories. The relationship between the Herodian dynasty and the Roman governors had always been sticky (remember Herod Antipas and Pontius Pilate, for example, sending Jesus back and forth—Luke 23:1-12). This state visit was an extended one, giving Festus an opportunity to discuss Paul’s case with the king. Agrippa, of Jewish descent, could help clarify Paul’s case for the Roman governor.

25:16-17 Festus described the details of the case with some embellishment. He included at the outset, for example, a statement about how he quickly pointed out to the Jewish leaders that Roman law does not convict people without a trial and how the accused are given an opportunity to face their accusers and defend themselves. Festus was accurate, however, when he reported that he saw the case the very next day after the arrival of the Jewish leaders (the ones who would have Agrippa’s interest).

25:18-22 Quickly reviewing the facts, Festus explained that he had expected a different set of accusations. He did not anticipate that it would concern something about their religion and about someone called Jesus who died, but whom Paul was insisting was alive. Festus admitted that he didn’t know how to conduct an investigation. Particularly confusing seems to have been the part about the “dead man” being allegedly alive. But because Paul had appealed to the emperor, so he was kept in custody until arrangements could be made to get him to Rome.

Festus’s quick review of the facts had its desired result: Agrippa wanted to hear the man himself. Paul’s audience with Agrippa was set for the following day. It would be a golden opportunity for all those present—Festus, Agrippa, Bernice, the royal entourage, the high-ranking officials (see 25:23)—to hear more from this ex-Pharisee about the “dead man named Jesus” who he claimed had come back to life!

PAUL SPEAKS TO AGRIPPA / 25:23–26:32

King Agrippa, in Caesarea with his sister Bernice for a political visit with the new governor, Festus, became embroiled in the controversy over Paul. Festus, mindful of Agrippa's familiarity with Jewish law and practice and needing to prepare some kind of legal paperwork for Caesar, arranged a special audience with Paul. Festus found Paul's testimony absurd; Agrippa found it pointed and a bit too personal. Nevertheless, Paul took advantage of this situation to tell about his encounter with Christ and his fervent belief in the truth of the gospel.

25:23 Into the auditorium came Festus, Agrippa and Bernice, and a controversial prisoner. While they arrived with great pomp, the real royalty in the room was the prisoner, the born-again child of the King of kings.

25:24-25 Festus, as the Roman governor in charge of the court at Caesarea, opened the proceedings. Luke certainly wanted to include this concise exoneration of Christianity by an esteemed representative of the Roman Empire. Festus explained that the local Jewish leadership and those in Jerusalem were demanding Paul's death. In his judgment of the case, however, Paul had done nothing worthy of death. That would be a significant check to those who were chasing, imprisoning, and prosecuting Christians around the Roman world. Because Paul had appealed his case to the emperor, he would be sent to Rome.

25:26-27 Festus went on to explain how he was at a loss for what to write in his report to the emperor. He was required to prepare a legal brief, detailing the charges, that had to be sent along with the appeal to Emperor Nero. Explaining his reason for the gathering, Festus explained that he wanted King Agrippa to help him put into words the charges against Paul.

26:1-3 After hearing Festus's opening remarks, Agrippa ordered Paul to speak in his own defense. What follows is an excellent example of Paul's powerful oratory skills and the most complete statement of his defense. The thoroughness of the record of this speech and details like this hand motion indicate that Luke must have been present.

The accusing Jewish leaders, however, were not present, so Paul would not be responding to specific charges. The absence of a strict prosecutorial air allowed the apostle to freely express his thoughts. Paul aimed his remarks most directly at Agrippa (26:1-28), though other very important people were in the audience. Agrippa's verdict, though not a formal judicial one in Paul's case, would be important for Paul and, thus, for all of Christianity. Agrippa not only was an expert on Jewish customs and controversies, he was also a very influential government figure for Israel.

26:4-5 Paul began with his early life, which had been spent in thorough Jewish training. Paul's contemporaries, including some on the Jewish council who were attacking him, knew of his solid Jewish heritage and the fact that he had been a member of the Pharisees, the strictest sect. By saying this, Paul established that there could be no doubt about the thoroughness, seriousness, or excellence with which he pursued his Judaism. Being a Pharisee meant that Paul was already committed to the importance of the resurrection from the dead—a major tenet of the Pharisees, one that prompted their ongoing debate with the Sadducees, who did not believe in a resurrection (see 23:6-9). Of course, this issue would take on much more significance as Paul's message unfolded.

26:6-7 Paul used the rich heritage of God's promise to his and Agrippa's common ancestors as a connection to Agrippa and to the Jews (the twelve tribes of Israel). They all shared the same hope, that God would keep the promise he had made to his people, a hope that was inextricably tied up with the resurrection of the dead (see 23:6; 24:15). If any Jew—from Abraham forward—had any hope for the fulfillment of any promise that God had made, it must be tied to a belief that he would be resurrected in some form at some time, or the whole concept of God's promises would be ludicrous. That was Paul's point. The absurdity was that Paul was being attacked for holding to this hope that was shared so adamantly by his Jewish brothers.

26:8 While he was addressing the king singularly concerning their ancestral "hope" in 26:7, Paul addressed his question to the whole audience, which was mostly Gentile. He asked them why it was so incredible (literally, "unbelievable") to any of them that God can raise the dead.

Since so much of the Jewish hope was tied to a belief that God raises people to continued life beyond this one, why were the Jews arguing with Paul about resurrection? The reason, of course, was one well-documented case of a certain resurrection that had been confirmed by hundreds of eyewitnesses. This had become the lifework of those who had been closest to the scene of this resurrection. In addition, many had already given their very lives for the cause—a cause whose whole credibility rested on the veracity of the resurrection of this one whom Paul was about to name.

26:9 Paul named himself as one who theoretically believed in the resurrection of the dead as a solidly educated Pharisee but who vigorously opposed the movement that believed in the resurrection of Jesus. He not only refused to believe that Jesus of Nazareth had been resurrected, he also thought he should do everything he could to oppose the movement.

26:10-12 With the authorization of the leading priests, Paul had captured believers in Jerusalem and sent them to prison. He even went so far as to cast his vote against Christians when they were condemned to death. Much of Paul's work was done through the synagogues, where Paul found most of the Christians in the early days of the movement. This would remind Agrippa that the Christian movement had Jewish roots. In the synagogues Paul would have believers whipped in order to try to force them to curse Christ. Paul was so passionate, so violently opposed to those who knew Christ, that he hounded them in distant cities of foreign lands. He took his campaign of terror on the road, headed to Damascus.

26:13-14 About noon, Paul saw a light from heaven brighter than the sun, blazing around him and his traveling companions. The presence of this bright light from heaven is mentioned in all three accounts—in chapter 9 (the actual event), in chapter 22, and here. The voice from heaven is also central to all three accounts. The revealed word of the risen Christ to the apostle Paul is the centerpiece of the story. In Aramaic, Paul had been addressed and asked, “Why are you persecuting me?” Notice, as has been the case in every account, Jesus made it clear that Paul had not been persecuting heretics but, rather, Christ himself.

One important addition to Christ's words here is not included in either chapter 9 or 22. Paul added that Christ had said, “It is hard for you to fight against my will.” Paul's passion and his conviction were commendable, but he was not headed in the direction that God wanted him to go.

26:15-16 Upon Paul's inquiry as to the identity of the speaker, the voice answered: “I am Jesus, the one you are persecuting.” The information to follow is also unique to this particular recounting of the Damascus road experience. From his prostrate position, Paul was commissioned by Christ himself. He was to be Christ's servant (1 Corinthians 4:1) and Christ's witness (the ongoing theme of Acts predicted in Christ's words in 1:8). Paul would tell the world about not only this experience at Damascus but also about the other times that Christ would appear to him. Paul was to be the recipient of a great deal of God's "light" to both Jews and Gentiles.

26:17-18 When Jesus said, "I will protect you," inherent in this statement was the promise of danger from which Paul would need protection. The two sources of the danger would be his own people (the Jews) and the Gentiles, in whose court he stood. Christ's words of commission to Paul sound like the work predicted of the Messiah in places like Isaiah 35:5; 42:7, 16; 61:1. Paul was to turn many people from darkness to light, which he did (see 2 Corinthians 4:4; Ephesians 4:18; 5:8; Colossians 1:12-13). Paul was to be God's instrument of turning Gentiles from the power of Satan to God, inviting them to receive forgiveness for their sins, which he did (13:38; Ephesians 1:7; Colossians 1:14). Paul was also to offer Gentiles a place among God's people (Romans 8:17; Colossians 1:12). Paul took every opportunity to remind his audience that the Gentiles had an equal share in God's inheritance. This inheritance is the promise and blessing of the covenant that God made with Abraham (Ephesians 2:19; 1 Peter 1:3-4).

26:19-20 From that point, Paul had been obedient to the vision from heaven (1 Corinthians 9:1, 16). He had begun in Damascus, then gone to Jerusalem, Judea, and beyond. Ultimately, his field of endeavor, under the sovereign leadership of God, was the Gentiles. Though the locations changed and the nationalities changed, the message was the same at every stop. This message, of course, tied Paul to John the Baptist (Matthew 3:2, 8), Jesus (Matthew 4:17), and Peter (Acts 2:38). They all called for personal conversion—a change of heart and mind that showed itself in a change of direction.

26:21-23 For his simple obedience to this incredibly powerful calling, for his faithful presentation of this gospel message, Paul had been arrested. Attempts had even been made on his life. But God had been true to his promise to protect him (26:17) so that he could tell these facts to everyone, including those before whom he was standing. Then Paul summarized what he had said in front of every Jewish audience so far in his ministry: I teach nothing except what the prophets and Moses said would happen concerning the suffering Messiah and the promise of his resurrection (see 13:27-41 for a sample). This resurrection, which followed the rejection and murder of the Messiah, would serve as a beacon, a light to Jews and Gentiles alike.

26:24 Festus could not stand it anymore, and he erupted. The message of this suffering Messiah was one thing, but to actually believe that he had been killed by his own people and then had been raised from the dead as a light to the world was too much for the humanistic mind of the Roman governor. He decided that Paul must be insane.

26:25-27 Paul affirmed to the governor that he was not insane, but was instead speaking the sober truth that had the most important of implications for all those within its hearing. Paul turned to Agrippa for confirmation of what he had just presented, stating his certainty that these events were all familiar. Agrippa's responsibilities for the Temple activities at Jerusalem would surely have caused him to cross paths with the activities of the church. He would likely have been familiar with not only the Old Testament Scriptures but also the basics of Jesus' life and the start of the church in the wake of Jesus' crucifixion and claimed resurrection.

Paul's statement that this was not done in a corner is simply an idiomatic way of reminding his audience that Christianity had been a very public movement from the moment of the inception of the church on that first Pentecost, when three thousand people had been converted in the temple courts at Jerusalem in one day (chapter 2).

Next, Paul got very personal and direct with King Agrippa, asking and then answering his own question about Agrippa's knowledge of and belief in the prophets. Agrippa could provide, if he were so inclined, plenty of information to Festus on the subject of Judaism, the Messiah, Jesus, and the Way. He could corroborate what Paul had said so far and confirm that his message was not far removed from mainstream Judaistic theology. But Agrippa did not.

26:28 Paul's direct question probably embarrassed Agrippa in front of this powerful crowd. His response, in what appears to be a condescending fashion, was to shoot back. It is difficult to tell whether Agrippa's tone of voice was harsh or joking, though the desired effect was to brush Paul off.

If Agrippa were to say that he did not believe the prophets, he would have lost influence with his Jewish constituency. If he were to say that he did believe the prophets, then he would have played into the hands of Paul the evangelist, who then would say that Agrippa would have no reason not to believe in Christ. So Agrippa just retaliated quickly, reminding the apostle who was the prisoner and who was the potentate: "Do you think you can make me a Christian so quickly?" The question may have been a jab at Paul and his message, saying that he would not be as easily persuaded as Paul's other converts had been.

26:29 The passion of the apostle and the universal need of the gospel message comes through in Paul's response to Agrippa's brusque statement. Notice how Paul changed the tone of the exchange. This was not Paul the debater; this was Paul the evangelist with a tender heart for the lost souls in need of finding the Savior. Paul explained that it didn't matter to him whether Agrippa believed quickly or not; he simply prayed that Agrippa, along with the entire audience, would become just like him, except for the chains. That is, Paul wanted them to find the Messiah who had found him that day on the road to Damascus.

26:30-31 Agrippa may have been getting uncomfortable with the way the conversation had turned. Maybe he was moving toward conviction. Perhaps he had simply heard all he needed to hear to know what he thought of it all. In any case, Agrippa decided that the meeting was over.

Festus and Agrippa discussed the case and agreed that Paul was innocent. King Agrippa, a Jewish sympathizer and well versed in Jewish issues, added his legal vindication of the Christian movement. This word would be of great comfort and usefulness to believers around the Empire who were experiencing increasingly intense pressure from those who wanted to prosecute the Christian movement as being anti-Jewish and anti-Roman.

26:32 Paul's appeal to Caesar, of course, had pretty much taken the matter out of the jurisdiction of Festus and Agrippa. Paul had to go to Rome. Though he could have been set free, Paul was instead free from the murderous Jews and setting out on an all-expense-paid trip to Rome.

ACTS 27

PAUL SAILS FOR ROME / 27:1-12

At long last, Paul boarded a boat for Rome, probably in October (A.D. 59). He was accompanied, at the very least, by Luke and Aristarchus. This was too late in the fall to be on the open seas. And, sure enough, bad weather made for rough sailing. Paul sensed real danger ahead and encouraged the crew to find safe harbor for the winter. Nevertheless, the leaders of the voyage pressed on.

27:1-2 The first person plural pronoun we indicates that Luke had again joined Paul (for the first time since chapter 21). Perhaps Luke accompanied the apostle to Rome so as to serve as his personal physician. Aristarchus may have been acting as Paul's personal attendant or servant. Aristarchus was the man who had been dragged into the theater at the beginning of the riot in Ephesus (19:29; 20:4; Philemon 1:24). It is not stated whether the centurion Julius was a believer, but he took good care of Paul (see 27:3). Later, Julius would single-handedly protect Paul and the other prisoners from being executed during the shipwreck. He is one of several Roman centurions in the New Testament who are portrayed favorably (Luke 7:1-10; Luke 23:47; Acts 10:1-48).

27:3 Sidon was about seventy miles north of Caesarea, where this journey had begun. A brief stop in Sidon permitted the Christians there to provide food and supplies for Paul's needs. The Christian community there probably originated with the dispersion of believers from Jerusalem after the death of Stephen (see 11:19). The Roman officer allowed Paul to go ashore to visit with friends. Julius may have been advised by Festus to give preferential treatment to Paul.

27:4 The most direct route from Sidon to Myra would have directed the ship south and west of Cyprus (the same route Paul had traveled when he had returned from his third missionary journey). The summer and early autumn winds, blowing from the west and northwest, however, required the ship to remain close to the coast, sailing north of Cyprus between the island and the mainland.

27:5-6 Rounding the northeast peninsula of Cyprus, Paul's vessel would have once again faced the strong headwinds from the west and northwest. But by hugging the coastline and (most likely) taking advantage of the gentler night breezes, the ship was able to dock at Myra.

In this port city on the southern coast of Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey), Julius located an Egyptian ship sailing for Italy. This was a large grain ship (big enough to carry 276 passengers—see 27:37-38). Egyptian grain was a Roman staple at this time in history, and Myra was a key hub of the imperial grain service.

27:7-8 With the favorable travel period quickly coming to a close, the captain of the Alexandrian ship pushed westward in an attempt to reach Italy before winter. But the elements were already beginning to make sailing west difficult.

Cnidus, with its two harbors and ample accommodations, would have made an excellent stopping point from which to wait for favorable winds. But the weather conditions made it difficult to put in there. Thus the ship's captain chose to head south toward Crete, which is the largest island in the Aegean Sea. In better weather, captains would sail to the north of Crete. With winter fast approaching, however, the northern route was suspect. The northern coast had few suitable harbors and left ships unprotected against the often dangerous winds; therefore, Paul's ship journeyed to the eastern tip of Crete and then west along the southern coast, where harbors were more available. The small harbor at Fair Havens (probably modern-day Limeonas Kalous) did not afford much protection. Nevertheless, since the coastline just beyond Fair Havens veers sharply northward and exposes vessels to the full force of the northwesterly winds, the ship put in there to wait for the wind to shift.

27:9-10 Waiting for favorable weather at Fair Havens, the ship's anxious commanders had a decision to make: Should they stay put and find winter quarters in Fair Havens (or nearby Lasea)? Or should they push on westward in an attempt to complete their journey to Italy before winter? A guiding principle of sailing was that it was dangerous from mid-September to mid-November and disastrous from mid-November to mid-February.

Luke did not record whether or not this decision was the subject of a public discussion. Nevertheless, Paul made his prediction known to the ship's officers that to continue the trip would result in trouble and danger. Paul's warning may have been stimulated by his own experience. Prior to this voyage, he had written, in 2 Corinthians 11:25, that he had already survived three shipwrecks. Paul probably was exhibiting common sense from the weather/sailing calendar. In ancient times ships had no compasses and navigated by the stars, so Paul understood that overcast skies and strong northwesterly winds made sailing west all but impossible and very dangerous.

27:11-12 Apparently, by this time the worsening weather conditions had eliminated any remaining hopes of reaching Italy. Although the weather was not ideal for sailing, the captain and the owner of the ship didn't want to spend the winter in an exposed harbor like Fair Havens. The ship departed for Phoenix, only a few miles west along the southern coast of Crete.

THE STORM AT SEA / 27:13-26

Leaving the relative safety of Fair Havens, Paul's vessel encountered a violent storm. The crew tried valiantly to weather the storm but eventually gave up all hope of saving their lives, much less the battered ship. Paul gathered the ship's crew and encouraged them with two promises of God: (1) that he (Paul) had been guaranteed safe arrival in Rome; and (2) that everyone sailing with him would be protected from harm. One truth stands clear in the middle of this nerve-racking voyage: Life may get messy, complicated, or even frightening, but God's will cannot be thwarted!

27:13-15 Favorable winds and weather at that moment caused the captain to proceed with the journey. Had these conditions continued, the ship would have brought the passengers and crew to their destination within hours, certainly less than one day. But the air currents suddenly changed (a common occurrence in these waters), and the resulting "northeaster" coming down off the mountains of southern Crete was deadly! In describing this wind, Luke used the Greek word from which we get our English word typhoon. The opposing currents of air created a whirling motion of both clouds and sea, but then the wind began to blow steadily in one direction.

Ancient ships lacked much ability to tack (i.e., follow a charted zigzag movement so as to make optimal use of unfavorable winds). When contrary winds arose, ships were mostly at their mercy and were left to run before the gale.

27:16-17 The tiny island of Cauda (some twenty-three miles south) provided a temporary cover from the storm as the ship moved behind (south of) it. The sailors used this brief respite to tie everything down and prepare for the worst. The lifeboat they managed to hoist aboard was an important tool in ancient sailing. It was typically used for landings and to maneuver the ship for primitive attempts at tacking. No doubt it was filled with water and was on the verge of breaking loose or crashing into the mother ship; the lifeboat had to be brought on board. Anyone who has ever attempted to right an overturned canoe filled with water can appreciate the difficulty of such a task. Another emergency measure was “banding” the ship with ropes. This involved passing ropes (or chains) under the ship to hold it together. Pulled tightly in a transverse fashion, such cables would hopefully help hold the timbers against the tremendous force of stormy waves.

Even though Syrtis, on the northern coast of Africa (Libya), was some four hundred miles away, the sailors began to fear the prospect of being driven there. The legendary quicksand and shoals in the southern Mediterranean were treacherous even in normal weather—so much so that Alexandrian ships would sail northward to Asia and then west to Italy to avoid this area. To combat this possible drift, the sailors lowered the sea anchor. This had the effect of giving the ship a dragging resistance to the wind and waves. By putting the ship on a starboard tack (her right side to the wind) and by utilizing storm sails, the ship would have been able to drift slowly in a westerly direction.

27:18-20 Despite all the emergency measures taken, the ship was being battered, perhaps even beginning to take on water. Crew members began throwing the cargo overboard (the grain) to make the ship lighter. When this proved inadequate, the sailors threw out the ship’s equipment. Such actions indicate the crew’s absolute desperation. The severity of the storm obscured the sun and stars (by which sailors navigated). The ship was being driven and tossed by the winds. It probably was leaking. A bleak sense of doom and despair permeated the passengers and crew.

27:21-24 The passengers and crew probably had not eaten due to fear, busyness, depression, or seasickness. They may have been fasting, or supplies may have been depleted (and were being rationed) due to the extra length of the journey. Paul reminded the crew that, with God’s guidance, he had prophesied this very problem (27:10). Because he had been right in the past, they should listen to him now and have hope. Paul told them, “None of you will lose your lives.” For no one to die in a shipwreck would be considered a great miracle in the ancient world. Standing under dark skies on the deck of a ship that was bobbing like a cork, Paul stated the reason for his unlikely confidence. The previous night he had been visited by an angel of his God, who told him that he would get safely to Rome, along with everyone sailing with him.

27:25-26 After relating this encouraging vision to his despairing shipmates, Paul admonished them to take courage. Having faith means taking God at his word. It means relying wholeheartedly on the clear-cut promises of God. The issue isn’t whether a person has great faith but whether he or she has faith in a great God. This was true of Paul. A shipwreck would not normally be considered good. Knowing about it in advance, however, would make the experience less terrifying for the passengers and crew.

THE SHIPWRECK / 27:27-44

God had revealed to Paul that a shipwreck was inevitable (27:26). Sure enough, the ship ran aground and began to break apart just off the coast of Malta. Though the experience proved to be harrowing, all 276 people on board were able to swim safely ashore. Repeatedly during this grim experience, Paul had proclaimed his faith in God. Now, during this end of Paul's two-week-long nightmare at sea, God demonstrated his faithfulness and mercy.

27:27-28 In the two weeks that had passed since departing Fair Havens, the Alexandrian ship found itself adrift in the Sea of Adria (here a reference to the central part of the Mediterranean Sea between Italy, Crete, and the northern coast of Africa). Perhaps the sailors sensed land was near because they heard the sound of breakers in the night. Soundings were made by throwing a weighted, marked line into the water. When the lead hit the bottom, sailors could tell the depth of the water from the marks on the rope.

Calculating a conservatively estimated rate of drift of some thirty-six miles per day (given the inclement weather conditions), a ship would, in two weeks' time, be very close to what is known as St. Paul's Bay at Malta. This calculation corresponds to the recorded soundings both cited by Luke and demonstrated by modern oceanographic research.

27:29 If breakers were being heard in the distance, to continue to push toward land in the dark would have been foolhardy. Anchors acted as a kind of primitive braking device; ships had many anchors (from five to fifteen). Therefore, the crew threw out four anchors to keep the ship off the rocks and to keep the bow pointed toward the beach. They prayed for daylight so they could see where they were going.

27:30-32 In the night, a group of sailors, not convinced by Paul's earlier assurances that all aboard would be saved, tried to abandon the ship. Under the guise of going out in the ship's dinghy to drop additional anchors and stabilize the vessel, the men intended to head for shore. Somehow Paul discerned their real intentions. He may have been divinely warned or merely suspicious because of his own sailing experience. He alerted the commanding officer, Julius, and the Roman soldiers of the plot, implying that their own safety would be in jeopardy if these sailors were allowed to carry out their plan. Unlike the situation at the beginning of the voyage, Paul had the officer's attention and was functioning almost as the commander of the ship. Paul's words were followed completely, even when they went against common sense. The soldiers derailed the sailors' plan by cutting the lifeboat free. Without this smaller boat to ferry passengers to shore, everyone aboard was forced to depend on the Lord.

27:33-35 With a voice-of-experience and sense of the arduous task just ahead (making it to shore in cold, choppy waters), Paul encouraged his fellow travelers to gain strength and sustenance by eating. They had barely eaten for two weeks (due to a combination of fear, forced rationing, fasting, seasickness, and preoccupation with just surviving the storm). Again, Paul assured everyone of God's promise of safety. There, in the midst of dire circumstances, Paul presided over a traditional Jewish meal.

27:36-38 The passengers and crew were encouraged and began eating. There was no need to ration what was left or save it for later, for they knew they would soon be on land. Had they not eaten, they might not have had the strength to swim to shore. In the first instance of jettisoning (see 27:18), some of the cargo had to be kept for ballast, lest the ship become completely unmaneuverable. Now, by lightening the load even more, the ship would ride higher in the water and be able to get closer to shore before running aground.

27:39-41 The disoriented sailors had no idea where they were. The geography and topography of what is now known as St. Paul's Bay on the northeast shore of modern Malta fits this description. They prepared to run the ship ashore. The sailors cut off the anchors, thus eliminating any kind of "braking action." Before reaching land, however, the ship hit a shoal and ran aground (modern research has confirmed between St. Paul's Bay and the island of Salmonetta the existence of a shallow channel only one to three hundred yards wide). Striking this underwater barrier between the two seas, the ship could go no further. Fierce waves began to strike the exposed rear of the vessel. Already weakened from a two-week pounding on the open seas, the ship quickly began to break apart.

27:42 Roman soldiers were charged with the safekeeping and safe delivery of any prisoners in their care. The law required them to pay with their own lives if any of their prisoners escaped (see 12:19; 16:27). In the certain chaos of a shipwreck, it would be relatively easy for prisoners to slip away. The soldiers' instinctive reaction was to kill the prisoners so as to prevent this from happening.

27:43-44 Despite the potential for risk, the commanding officer was impressed enough with Paul to keep the soldiers from carrying out their plan. As the highest ranking official, he had the full authority to make this decision. Some swam; others floated ashore on pieces of the collapsing ship. The evacuation plan worked, because everyone escaped safely ashore. No prisoners are recorded as having escaped. This sequence of events preserved Paul for his later ministry in Rome and fulfilled his prophetic utterance that everyone on the ship would be saved (27:22). In the minds of both Greeks and Romans, surviving a disaster at sea was evidence of a person's innocence. The powerful sea gods were not believed to spare the guilty.

ACTS 28

PAUL ON THE ISLAND OF MALTA / 28:1-10

Detailed plots on his life, angry mobs, storms at sea, shipwrecks—all the forces of hell seemed to have been intensifying their efforts to keep Paul from reaching Rome. Now, on the island of Malta, the attack continued—Paul was bitten by a poisonous snake. Paul not only survived the snake attack unharmed, but he turned around and healed a number of sick people on the island. During the three-month stay in Malta (see 28:11), Paul was showered with hospitality. What the Devil intended for evil God turned into good.

28:1-2 In about two weeks, the storm had pushed Paul's ship some 470 miles west of Fair Havens, Crete. Only when the crew and passengers came ashore did they realize that they had reached Malta, an island 60 miles south of Sicily and 320 miles from Rome. The islanders there were of Phoenician ancestry and had given the island its name (taken from the Canaanite word for "refuge"). Malta had excellent harbors and was ideally located for trade. Many Roman soldiers retired there.

28:3-4 In cold weather, reptiles become lethargic. Lying in a bundle of twigs and brush, a snake might easily go unnoticed. Apparently, the jostling of Paul's walking, combined with the warmth of the fire, caused the poisonous snake to become roused. It struck Paul on the hand.

The Maltese people quickly tried to make sense of these events by using their pagan presuppositions. Steeped in Greek legends and stories of gods relentlessly bringing wrongdoers to justice, they concluded that Paul must have been guilty of murder. Though Paul had somehow escaped divine retribution in the shipwreck, Nemesis, the Greek goddess of retribution, must have orchestrated this additional means of punishing him.

28:5-6 To the amazement of the Maltese observers, Paul not only did not drop dead, he did not even exhibit any swelling or discomfort. God had promised safe passage to him (27:23-25), and nothing could prohibit his reaching Rome. When these superstitious pagans saw that Paul was unhurt by the poisonous snake, they did a complete about-face in their assessment of him. They had assumed that Paul was a murderer (28:4); now they decided he was a god. A similar appraisal is reported in 14:11-18 when Paul ministered at Lystra. It is reasonable to assume that Paul deflected any idolatrous comments in the same manner as he had done previously.

28:7 Apparently wealthy, this chief official, named Publius, had a large estate. Whether he invited all 276 people to his home or whether he invited only Paul (and Luke) is unclear. In view of the miracle on the beach (the snakebite), Paul's "divine" reputation, and the illness afflicting Publius's father, it is likely that Publius entertained only Paul and his immediate entourage (perhaps also Julius and the ship's owner).

28:8-10 Malta fever and dysentery is now known to be caused by microbes in goats' milk. This illness seems to have been common on the island. A person could be ill for a few months to two or three years. When Paul learned that Publius's father was suffering from this disease, he visited him, laid hands on him, and prayed over him. The man's complete healing followed. The news of this miracle spread quickly, and soon everyone with any kind of disease or ailment came to Paul to be cured.

Three months passed (see 28:11), because the shipwreck survivors had to wait for the passing of winter and arrangements to complete their journey on another vessel. When the time came to leave the island, the grateful Maltese people inundated Paul and his friends with gifts and provisions for the remainder of their trip of 320 miles to Rome.

PAUL ARRIVES AT ROME / 28:11-16

The last leg of Paul's journey to Rome was almost anticlimactic—smooth sailing, a warm reception by some Italian believers, his own private lodging (house arrest rather than imprisonment in a Roman penal facility). The stage was now set for Paul to begin ministering in the most influential city in the world.

28:11-12 Ships began sailing again between mid-February and mid-March, depending on the weather. Sailing vessels often would be named in honor of certain deities. These deities were thought to serve as protectors and would be called upon in times of trouble. The twin gods referred to the sons of Zeus, the patrons of navigation. Their constellation (Gemini) was considered by sailors to be a sign of good luck. This Alexandrian ship was also likely a grain ship. It promptly (perhaps in one day's time) arrived in Syracuse, the chief city of Sicily.

28:13-14 Rhegium is modern-day Reggio on the "toe" of Italy. Puteoli is now called Pozzuoli and is located some 150 miles south of Rome. Situated in the Bay of Naples, Puteoli was the preferred point of entry for Alexandrian wheat ships (prior to the building of larger port facilities at Portus, near Ostia, during the reign of Claudius).

At Puteoli, Paul and his colleagues found some believers and stayed with them for seven days (apparently while the ship was being unloaded or while the centurion, Julius, was conducting other official business).

28:15 The believers in Rome heard about Paul's imminent arrival, probably due to messengers sent by the believers in Puteoli. Eager to meet and greet the great apostle, an entourage headed south and intercepted Paul's party at the Forum on the Appian Way, a town about forty-three miles from Rome. A second welcoming committee of Roman believers encountered Paul at The Three Taverns, thirty-five miles south of Rome. Paul's entrance to Rome was more like a victor's triumphal entry than a prisoner's march. A "tavern" was a shop or a place that provided food and lodging for travelers. The Appian Way, a main thoroughfare to Rome from the south, featured many such inns. Paul was grateful for this warm Italian reception; he thanked God and took courage.

28:16 At last Paul arrived in Rome, the most influential city on earth. This was the fulfillment of a long-term desire (Romans 1:10-16). Paul's private lodging was a rented house (see 28:30). Though guarded around the clock (in four-hour shifts) by a soldier (perhaps members of the Praetorian—or palace—guard, see Philippians 1:13), Paul had much more freedom than a typical prisoner.

PAUL PREACHES AT ROME UNDER GUARD / 28:17-31

Paul's first act in Rome was to call together the Jewish leaders. He wanted to declare his innocence of the charges brought against him in Jerusalem. But more than this, he wanted to proclaim the gospel to his Hebrew brothers.

28:17 The decree of Claudius expelling Jews from Rome (18:2) happened eleven years previously (A.D. 49–60), so by the time of Paul's arrival, Jewish leaders were back in Rome. These Jews were likely an unofficial gathering of the leaders of various synagogues, not an official ruling body.

After three days, Paul called together the local Jewish leaders because he did not have the freedom to visit them in their synagogues. Beginning his presentation, Paul stated his innocence in the charge of violating Jewish laws or customs.

28:18-19 Paul reiterated the Romans' inability or unwillingness to execute him.

On three separate occasions, statements had been made to the effect that Paul had done nothing to deserve a death sentence (Claudias Lysias in 23:29; Festus in 25:25 and 26:31).

Paul emphasized that he had appealed to Caesar (25:11) because the Jewish leaders had adamantly and unjustly continued to pressure the authorities for a conviction. He felt he had no other recourse. And he further assured the Jews of his own motives in appealing to Caesar—not because he was trying to harm his own countrymen but solely to be declared innocent and set free.

28:20 The phrase, the hope of Israel, has been mentioned several times by Paul (see 23:6; 24:15; 26:7; 28:20). For Paul, the messianic hope meant the fulfillment of God's messianic prophecies first given to the patriarch Abraham. For all of its history, the nation looked forward to a time when God's anointed one would rule over a heavenly Kingdom. Because of his conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was that long-awaited Messiah and because of Christ's resurrection from the dead, Paul was adamant that his message and theology were consistent with Jewish hope through the ages. Paul wanted his countrymen to come to see (as he had) that this relatively new entity known as the Christian church was not a dangerous sect or departure from traditional orthodox Judaism but simply the next phase in the unfolding plan of God that had been first announced to Abraham.

28:21-22 The Jewish leaders had not heard specific allegations about Paul and his case, but they had heard a steady stream of negative comments about the Christians. There was a growing group of these people right there in Rome. The people who denounced Christianity may have been Jews who kept up with events in Israel, together with skeptical Romans, because Christians believed in one God, whereas the Romans had many gods, including Caesar. The Christians were committed to an authority higher than Caesar.

28:23-24 A meeting was arranged, and when the time for that appointment came, a large number of Roman Jews came to hear from Paul. It was an all-day affair, during which Paul used the Old Testament Scriptures to explain the gospel to the Jews. In essence, Paul reminded the Jews of the many Old Testament prophecies and references to the Messiah; then he skillfully demonstrated how Jesus, in his coming, living, dying, and rising, exactly fulfilled every divine promise and every Jewish hope. The effect of this long discourse and discussion was simply that some believed and some didn't.

28:25-27 In this interchange, Paul had the final word, and it was a strong rebuke. He compared the departing, arguing Jewish leaders to the long-ago audience of Isaiah the prophet (see Isaiah 6:9-10). Those Jews had heard the very word of God and had seen the spokesman of God, but because of stubbornness and pride, they had been unable to understand and perceive the deeper, life-changing implications of the divine revelation that was being extended to them. Rather than submitting to judgment by the truth, they had sat in judgment of truth. The great irony is that these Jews viewed themselves as religiously successful and slated for divine commendation, when in truth they were spiritually blind, deaf, and under divine condemnation!

28:28 As he had done on several prior occasions (see 13:46; 18:6; and 19:8-10), Paul announced a turning from the unresponsive, hard-hearted Jews to the receptive Gentiles. From that point on, the non-Jews would be given priority when it came to evangelical witness. At some future point, Paul apparently expected a change of heart by his countrymen (see Romans 11:25-32), but for the immediate future Paul would direct his ministry to those who were eager to embrace the truth about Christ.

Verse 29 is not included in most of the ancient manuscripts.

28:30-31 While Paul was under house arrest for the next two years, he did more than speak to the Jews. He wrote letters, commonly called his Prison Epistles, to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philippians. He also wrote personal letters, such as the one to Philemon. This ending shows the gospel going forward to Rome, as the great commission had directed. It had now reached the international capital of the Gentiles.

He welcomed all who visited him, and that list was surely long. Luke was with Paul in Rome (2 Timothy 4:11). Timothy often visited him (Philippians 1:1; Colossians 1:1; Philemon 1:1), as did Tychicus (Ephesians 6:21), Epaphroditus (Philippians 4:18), and Mark (Colossians 4:10). Paul witnessed to the whole Roman guard (Philippians 1:13) and was involved with the Roman believers.

Tradition says that Paul was released after two years of house arrest in Rome and then set off on a fourth missionary journey. Five reasons for this tradition are as follows: (1) Luke does not give us an account of his trial before Caesar—and Luke was a detailed chronicler; (2) the prosecution had two years to bring the case to trial, and time may have run out; (3) in his letter to the Philippians, written during his imprisonment in Rome, Paul implied that he would soon be released and would do further traveling; (4) events and places mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles indicate that Paul's journeys continued after those recorded in Acts 28; (5) early Christian literature talks plainly about other travels by Paul. During Paul's time of freedom, he may have continued to travel extensively, even going to Spain (see Romans 15:24, 28) and back to the churches in Greece. The books of 1 Timothy and Titus were written during this time. Later, Paul was imprisoned again, probably in Rome, where he wrote his last letter (2 Timothy).

During this first Roman imprisonment, he spoke with all boldness and no one tried to stop him. The Greek word akolutos ("without hindrance") is the last word of Acts, thus ending the book on a triumphal note. Many readers, however, have thought that the book ends too abruptly, especially in that it doesn't relate what happened to Paul. But it must be remembered that the book is not about the life of Paul but about the spread of the gospel, and that had been clearly presented by Luke. God apparently thought it was not necessary for someone to record the entire history of the early church. Now that the gospel had been preached and established at the center of trade and government, it would spread across the world.

ROMANS

INTRODUCTION

The courtroom is filled with intense drama as the lawyer for the plaintiff states the case for guilt and the lawyer for the defendant builds the case for innocence. Judge and jurors listen carefully in preparation for their verdict. Although Romans was not presented in court, this letter from Paul to the Roman believers reads like a lawyer's brief as Paul slowly and skillfully presents the case for the gospel. Paul was a scholar and a world traveler. He was a Pharisee and a Roman citizen. But most important, Paul was a follower of Jesus Christ. Because Paul had not visited Rome, he wrote this letter to introduce himself to the Roman believers and to prepare the way for his coming. And so, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he clearly outlined the Christian message. His readers would know that this Roman citizen was first a citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven, a brother in Christ.

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): Pharisee, apostle, pioneer missionary of the church.

Paul was a Jew, culturally and religiously, by birth and by choice. We know little of his early years except that he was from Tarsus, far north and west of Jerusalem, in Cilicia. When he comes onto the biblical scene at the confrontation with Stephen (Acts 7:58), we see Paul as a young Pharisee, zealous for the faith and giving his approval to Stephen's death. Later, we learn that Paul had been trained by Gamaliel, the most respected rabbi of the day (Acts 22:3). Paul was so Jewish, in fact, that he became obsessed with eliminating the young Christian sect that he viewed as heretical (Acts 8:1-3; 9:1-2).

Paul was Jewish, but he was also a Roman citizen (Acts 22:28). The mighty Roman Empire extended well beyond Italy, through Macedonia and Asia, all the way to the limits of Judea. Although all who lived in the conquered territory were under Roman domination, not everyone was a Roman citizen. That was a special privilege. A person could become a Roman citizen by birth (born to parents who were citizens) or by purchase. And with Roman citizenship came certain rights and guarantees (for example, the right to a fair trial and the right of passage).

So Paul had dual citizenship—in Israel and in Rome—and both were important to him. But Paul was a citizen of yet another nation, the Kingdom of God. As this zealous Jew, armed with authority from the high priest, had journeyed to Damascus to root out and capture Christians, he was confronted by Christ (Acts 26:12-18). From that moment on, Paul had a new Emperor, a new Commander-in-chief.

Paul's Ministry. After his conversion to Christ (Acts 9:1-19), Paul spent three years in Damascus with Ananias and the other disciples in that city (Galatians 1:18). There his ministry began (Acts 9:20-23). Paul then returned to Jerusalem, sponsored by Barnabas, who encouraged him and presented him to the apostles. But after attempts on Paul's life by his former associates, zealous Jews, he was sent by the apostles to Tarsus. (It would be fourteen years before he would return to Jerusalem—see Galatians 2:1.)

Paul remained in the northern region for about eight years, becoming established in the faith and teaching in the churches, especially in Antioch (Acts 11:25-26). The church at Antioch then commissioned Paul and Barnabas, sending them on the first missionary journey (Acts 13:2-3), to Cyprus, Pamphylia, and Galatia (Acts 13:4–14:28). This trip occurred in A.D. 46–48. At each town, first Paul would attempt to reach the Jews with the gospel; then he would reach beyond the synagogue to the Gentiles, who responded in great numbers. The response of the Gentiles further enraged the Jews and even caused the apostles and other believers to question Paul's ministry. But the issue of taking the gospel to non-Jews was somewhat resolved at the Council of Jerusalem in A.D. 50 (Acts 15).

Paul took two other missionary trips, establishing churches in Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, and other cities along the Mediterranean coast and inland. These trips occurred in A.D. 50–52 and A.D. 53–57. While on his third missionary journey, Paul became determined to return to Jerusalem to deliver the money he had collected for believers there, even though he knew that enemies were waiting for him (Acts 20:22-24).

Paul's arrival in Jerusalem was peaceful at first (Acts 21:17-19), but when he was recognized at the Temple, a violent mob seized him and tried to kill him (Acts 21:27-32). This led to his conversation with the commander and the beginning of his series of trials that eventually brought Paul to Rome in A.D. 59 (Acts 28:11-16).

Although under Roman guard in a house, Paul was able to continue his ministry while in Rome, teaching all who came to visit and listen. In addition, he was able to write the Prison Epistles: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. This arrangement lasted two years (Acts 28:17-31).

According to tradition, Paul was released after those two years. Some reasons for this tradition are as follows: (1) Luke does not give an account of Paul's trial before Caesar, and Luke was a detailed historian; (2) the prosecution had two years to bring the case to trial, and time may have run out; (3) in Paul's letter to the Philippians, written during his imprisonment in Rome, he implied that he would soon be released and would do further traveling; (4) Paul mentioned several places where he intended to take the gospel, but he never had visited those places in his first three journeys; and (5) early Christian literature talks plainly about other travels by Paul.

After his release, Paul probably left on another missionary journey, through Ephesus where he left Timothy (1 Timothy 1:3), then to Colosse (Philemon 22), and on to Macedonia. He may also have realized his goal of going to Spain (Romans 15:24, 28). Eventually he probably journeyed east and visited Crete (Titus 1:5), where he left Titus to organize and lead the church. During this time of freedom, Paul wrote 1 Timothy and Titus.

Eventually, Paul was arrested a second time and returned to Rome. This prison experience differed greatly from his first—this time Paul was isolated and lonely, awaiting execution (2 Timothy 4:9-18). However, he was able to write 2 Timothy. Paul was martyred in the spring of A.D. 68.

From beginning to end, Paul's ministry was focused on taking the good news of Christ to the world. Despite continual harassment and violent persecution, he courageously took every opportunity to tell others about the Savior, teaching, preaching, making his defense in court, and sharing one-to-one. Paul's identity and citizenship were found in Christ. He was committed to obeying God, his true Emperor, no matter what.

When Paul wrote to the church in Rome, therefore, he was writing first as a citizen of heaven. Yet Paul also was writing as a Roman citizen to people who lived at the apex of worldly power—the capital of the Roman Empire. Paul had felt the tension between those allegiances; he knew the conflicts that his readers must be facing.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from Corinth in A.D. 57.

During Paul's ministry in Corinth, he met Aquila and Priscilla, Jews who had left Rome following an order from Emperor Claudius (Acts 18:2). They were tentmakers, a trade that Paul also knew. While in Corinth, Paul stayed and worked with Aquila and Priscilla and had a tremendous effect on their spiritual growth (Acts 18:3). Later, this godly couple returned to Rome and became leaders in the church there (Romans 16:3-5).

During this journey, Paul was collecting money for the church in Jerusalem, which was poor and struggling through a devastating famine. For three years of this trip, Paul ministered in Ephesus. But after a riot (Acts 19:23-41), he left for Greece, where he stayed for three months (Acts 20:2-3) before leaving for Jerusalem with the money he had collected (Romans 15:25-26). Much of the three months was spent in Corinth. That's when Paul wrote the letter to the Romans. Note the reference to Gaius, a Corinthian believer (1 Corinthians 1:14) who was known to the believers in Rome (Romans 16:23).

Although Paul had never been to Rome, he longed to go there (Romans 1:9-13). He was planning to visit the church on his way to Spain, after delivering the money to Jerusalem (Romans 15:25-29).

AUDIENCE

Christians in Rome.

The city of Rome. Rome was the capital city of the vast and mighty Roman Empire, an empire that stretched from Britain to Arabia. Truly, all roads led to Rome. It would be natural, then, for Paul to want to visit this great city, not merely as a dutiful citizen or a curious tourist, but as a gifted evangelist who desired to reach the world for Christ.

Founded in 753 B.C., Rome was strategically located on the Tiber River at a ford that was indispensable for traveling between northern and southern Italy. In Paul's day, Rome was the largest city in the world, with a population of approximately one million. Wealthy and cosmopolitan, it was the diplomatic and trade center of the world. The Roman Empire provided stability, order, and the rule of law for the conquered countries. The Roman peace made travel safe; Roman roads made it relatively swift and easy.

There is evidence for a Jewish colony in Rome dating to the second century B.C. The colony was small until Judea was incorporated into the Roman Empire in 63 B.C., when Pompey called for the deportation of Jews to Rome. Then the Jewish population expanded. In 59 B.C., Cicero wrote that the Jews of Rome were a large, powerful, and influential group.

During the period of the Roman Republic (527–509 B.C.), the Romans adopted and “Romanized” Greek gods. Thus Zeus, the king of the gods, became Jupiter, Hera became Juno, Poseidon became Neptune, Hermes became Mercury, and Aphrodite became Venus. Emperor worship also was encouraged. This worship was enforced in varying degrees, depending on the emperor's disposition. Devout Jews had very different worship patterns and would never worship the emperor, so the Jewish community was often persecuted and was expelled from Rome several times. Aquila and Priscilla were driven from Rome by an edict from Claudius in A.D. 49. Each time, the expulsion edict would lapse and the Jews would return. This was the case with Claudius's edict.

What was it like to be a Christian in Rome? It was like being a distinct and oppressed minority. In many ways, Rome was a secular city, consumed with financial and political concerns. But Rome was also a very religious city. Its pagan religion centered around Jupiter and other gods and included many superstitions. Thus, Jews and Christians who insisted on one God were viewed as atheists because they denied the existence of all the other deities.

At first Christianity was tolerated in Rome, as a sect of Judaism. But in the last few years of Emperor Nero's reign (A.D. 54–68), he authorized hunting down, torturing, and killing Christians. In A.D. 64, a large part of Rome was destroyed by a fire, thought by many to have been ordered by the emperor himself. Nero, however, accused the Christians in the city, giving him the excuse for any number of terrible atrocities. The secular historian Tacitus wrote:

Their death was made a matter of sport; they were covered in wild beast's skins and torn to pieces by dogs; or were fastened to crosses and set on fire in order to serve as torches by night. . . . Nero had offered his gardens for the spectacle and gave an exhibition in his circus, mingling with the crowd in the guise of a charioteer or mounted on his chariot (Annals 15.44).

During these terrible persecutions, Christians were forced to choose between the emperor and Christ; those who chose Christ often died for their faith. Both Peter and Paul are thought to be victims of Nero's terror.

The church at Rome. The founders of the church at Rome are unknown. It was not started by Peter—his ministry was to Jews, and he seems to have settled in Rome just after Paul's arrival in about A.D. 60. And the church was not founded by Paul—he admits to not having been there (Romans 1:11-13; 15:23-24). Most likely, the church was begun by Jews who had been in Jerusalem for the Passover celebration and had been converted through Peter's powerful sermon and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in A.D. 30 (Acts 2:5-40). These new believers were soon joined by travelers like Aquila and Priscilla, who had heard the Good News in other places and had brought it back to Rome.

At first, of course, the Roman church was Jewish; that is, the members were Jews who had come to believe in Jesus as their Messiah. But over the subsequent twenty-seven years, many Christians from all parts of the Roman Empire had migrated to Rome, some of them Paul's own converts and many of them Gentiles. The recipients probably were a loosely knit fellowship of believers and not a highly organized church. That is, there were no ordained leaders by any title. And the Roman Christians worshiped in various homes and other meetings places, rather than in one church location (16:5, 14-16). But organized or not, this church had become large and influential—"your faith in God is becoming known throughout the world” (1:8). The membership of the church reflected Roman society; that is, it was a cosmopolitan mix of believers from a wide variety of backgrounds and walks of life.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

The main purpose for Paul writing this letter at this time was to prepare the way for his visit to Rome, to let the believers in Rome know of his plans to come, and to enlist their support for his future ministry in Spain. Paul had longed to visit Rome, and, God willing, he would be there soon (1:10-13). He knew that Rome was the most important city in the empire, with influence spreading far and wide—ministering there would be strategic.

Paul also wanted to counteract any misunderstanding of his goals and his message—there was widespread slander directed at him by some fellow Christians and many Jews (for example, see 1 Corinthians 3 and 2 Corinthians 10–12). To most Roman Christians, Paul was just a name; they had never met him and had only heard about him. So Paul took time to build his credibility and authority by carefully setting forth his theology. It’s as if Paul were saying, “Here’s who I am, and here’s what I believe.”

Another purpose for Paul’s writing was to solidify the Romans in their faith, since they had no apostolic leaders or teachers. He knew the inevitable conflicts that would arise for citizens of Christ’s Kingdom in the greatest city of the Roman Empire. This was a church without a whole Bible—they had the Hebrew Scriptures (the Old Testament), but the Gospels hadn’t been written, and the other Epistles had been sent to other churches. This letter, therefore, was the first piece of strictly Christian literature that these believers would see. So, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, Paul clearly and carefully crafted this theological masterpiece with the strong message of the sovereignty of God and justification by faith.

MESSAGE

After a brief introduction, Paul presents the facts of the gospel (1:3) and declares his allegiance to it (1:16-17). He continues by building an airtight case for the lostness of humanity and the necessity for God’s intervention (1:18–3:20). Then Paul presents the Good News: Salvation is available to all, regardless of a person’s identity, sin, or heritage. We are saved by unearned, undeserved favor from God through complete trust in Christ and his finished work. Through him we can stand before God justified, “not guilty” (3:21–5:21). With this foundation Paul moves directly into a discussion of the freedom that comes from being saved—freedom from the power of sin (6:1-23), freedom from the domination of the Law (7:1-25), freedom to become like Christ and discover God's limitless love (8:1-39).

Speaking directly to his Jewish brothers and sisters, Paul shares his concern for them and explains how they fit into God's plan (9:1–11:12). God has made the way for Jews and Gentiles to be united in the body of Christ; both groups can praise God for his wisdom and love (11:13-36).

Paul explains what it means to live in complete submission to Christ: Use spiritual gifts to serve others (12:3-8), genuinely love others (12:9-21), and be good citizens (13:1-14). Freedom must be guided by love as we build each other up in the faith, being sensitive and helpful to those who are weak (14:1–15:4). Paul stresses unity, especially between Gentiles and Jews (15:5-13). He concludes by reviewing his reasons for writing, outlining his personal plans (15:22–33), greeting his friends, and giving a few final thoughts and greetings from his traveling companions (16:1–27).

The main themes in the book of Romans include: Sin, Salvation, Spiritual Growth, Sovereignty, and Service.

Sin (1:18–3:20). Before announcing the Good News, Paul gives the bad news: The whole human race stands condemned as sinners deserving God's wrath and punishment. Since Adam's rebellion against God, our nature is to disobey him. Our sin cuts us off from God. Sin causes us to want to live our own way rather than God's way. Because God is morally perfect, just, and fair, he is right when he condemns sin. All human beings are sinners. All human beings are guilty—deserving the death penalty.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. It is easy to point judgmental fingers at others, noting their sins and almost gleefully condoning their certain punishment. In doing so, we often compare ourselves to them and thus excuse our own disobedience and shortcomings. But the terrible truth is that every person has sinned, either by rebelling against God or by ignoring his will. Compared to God's standard of perfection, we fall woefully short. Thus we stand condemned, no matter how religious we are. Regardless of our background or how hard we try to live a good moral life, we cannot earn salvation or remove our sin. Only Christ can save us.

Salvation (3:21–5:21). The Romans had a smorgasbord of gods and religious beliefs from which to choose. In our pluralistic society, which holds tolerance and open-mindedness in high regard, a popular idea is that all religions are essentially the same and equally effective. Christians, therefore, are often seen as narrow-minded and dogmatic when insisting that Christ is the only way to God. But that is what Jesus taught, and it is the truth that Paul affirms here in Romans.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Although we may lose popularity for insisting that salvation comes only through faith in Christ, we must be steadfast in our commitment to the gospel because it is the truth. And we must explain that the exclusiveness of the message is far from being closed or narrow-minded—it is Good News. After recognizing our utter lostness in our sins, we can say, “Thank God there is one way!” By believing in Jesus Christ and accepting him as Savior, men and women can enter into a wonderful new relationship with God.

Spiritual Growth (6:1–8:17). New followers of Christ must mature in their relationship with God, continually turning away from sin and obeying God. Paul explains that by God’s power, believers are freed from the cycle of sin and death and are sanctified—made holy. This means they are set apart from sin and enabled to obey and to become more like Christ (6:1–7:6). Although breaking free of sin’s grasp can be a struggle, Christians can be freed totally because of the work of Christ and through the power of the Holy Spirit (7:7-25). And when believers are growing in their relationship with Christ, the Holy Spirit frees them from the demands of the law and from fear of judgment (8:1-17).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Because we are free from sin’s control, the law’s demands, and fear of God’s punishment, we can grow in our relationship with Christ. By trusting in the Holy Spirit and allowing him to help us, we can overcome sin and temptation (8:1-2).

Sovereignty (8:18–11:36). One word that would epitomize the Roman government is power. Into this milieu, Paul sent the message of God’s sovereignty. This is a crucial truth for the Roman Christians to understand and believe, for it is at this point that the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of Rome will come into the greatest conflict. Soon believers will have to choose between allegiance to Rome and allegiance to Christ. Knowing that God reigns triumphant will make that choice much easier.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Our world is also obsessed with power—in politics, business, and relationships. Power means control, influence, security, and ease. In the face of this lust for power, Christians can feel isolated and alone. And as a powerless minority, we can feel discriminated against and persecuted. Like the Roman believers, we need to hear Paul’s message reaffirming the sovereignty of God, reminding us that our allegiance is not to the puny gods of this world and their hollow offers of power and prestige. No, we belong to the Sovereign of the universe.

Service (12:1–15:13). Paul’s final theme is service: serving God and the other members of the body of Christ, the church. Although Christians made up a small minority of the population of Rome, still they could make a difference for Christ. How? By living as “transformed” men and women (12:2). During these difficult days, with all the pressures and temptations of the surrounding society, it was important for Christians to be a unified (15:5) and loving body. If men and women truly honor Christ as Lord, it will show in their lives. They will be known for their love, in the community and in the church.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. If believers are going to make any kind of impact in this world for Christ, we must love as Christ loved, helping those in need and serving with humility and grace. This example of love must begin in our churches. Unity, encouragement, and support should be our goal, rather than the much-publicized arguments, splits, and even lawsuits. People will take seriously the claims of Christ when they see what he was done in the lives of those who bear his name—Christians.

When Paul wrote his letter to the church in Rome, he had not yet been there, but he had taken the gospel “from Jerusalem clear over into Illyricum” (15:19). He planned to visit and preach in Rome one day and hoped to continue to take the gospel farther west—even to Spain.

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-7

Paul opens his letter to these Roman believers, most of whom he had never met, by explaining who he is and what his credentials are. Almost immediately, he directs their attention to the Lord Jesus Christ. Paul knew that the resurrected Christ was the most important common denominator for him and the believers in Rome. From that common ground he introduces his plan to visit them and then plunges into one of the most detailed explanations of the Christian faith found in the Bible.

1:1 Paul had friends in Rome, as Romans 16 shows, but he had not personally visited that church. So he begins his letter by formally presenting his credentials. He first calls himself Christ's slave, meaning one who is subject to the will and wholly at the disposal of his master. Paul, in using the term, expresses his absolute devotion and subjection to Christ Jesus. For a Roman citizen to identify himself as a servant was unthinkable. Paul could have introduced himself to these Romans as a Roman citizen, but instead he chose to speak of himself only as completely dependent on and obedient to his beloved Master.

Paul then notes two important roles to characterize his life. Paul was chosen by God to be an apostle and sent out to preach his Good News. His calling occurred when he saw the Lord Jesus on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1-19). His assignment was to teach the Good News of salvation—especially “to the Gentiles” (Galatians 1:16).

The title “apostle” designated authority to set up and supervise churches and discipline them if necessary. Even more than a title of authority, apostle means one sent on a mission, like an envoy or an ambassador. Paul represents himself with the credentials and responsibilities given to him by the King of kings as an ambassador to evangelize the Gentile world.

1:2 The Good News had been promised long ago by God and was not a new religion made up by Paul or anyone else. It was rooted in God's promises in the Old Testament to his people through his prophets. The gospel that Paul preached was in perfect continuity with God's earlier words in the Scriptures to his people, Israel. Both the Jews and Gentiles in the church of Rome needed to be reminded that the gospel is an ancient message of God's plan for his creation. This was on Paul's mind and is a recurring theme throughout the letter.

Even though the church in Rome consisted mostly of Gentiles and former converts to the Jewish faith, Paul reminded them all that, in their acceptance of the gospel, they were not casting off the holy Scriptures in order to embrace Jesus as the Christ. Rather, they were discovering and responding to the outworking of God's eternal plan. The prophets in the Old Testament announced the coming fulfillment of God's grace in Christ.

1:3 After introducing the messenger (himself), the message (gospel), and the source (God), Paul turns to the subject of the message. In verses 3-5, Paul summarizes the Good News about Jesus Christ. The central focus of the gospel is Jesus, God's Son, who was both human and divine (see Luke 3:31; 2 Timothy 2:8). Jesus was born into King David's royal family line, in Bethlehem, and of David's tribe (Judah). King David was promised a kingdom without end (2 Samuel 7:12-16). In the birth of Jesus Christ, the eternal King of kings, that promise was fulfilled.

In Christ's humanity we see his identification with us and his excellence as our example. In Christ's divinity we see his worthiness to take our place in receiving the punishment for sin that is due us. We separate Christ's human and divine natures for understanding and discussion, but in fact, they cannot be separated. Jesus is and will always be the God-man, our Lord and Savior.

1:4 Jesus' entire life, from his human conception to his resurrection, was planned, promised, and fulfilled by God. His nature as God's Son was made clear when God powerfully raised him from the dead by means of the Holy Spirit. He was, is, and will always be the Son of God. Christ's resurrection unmistakably revealed that truth to the world. At the time of his resurrection, Christ was glorified and restored to his full rights and status as Son of God in power (Philippians 2:4-9).

1:5 Christians have both privilege and authority. Paul and the apostles received forgiveness (grace) as an undeserved privilege. But they also were given the authority to share the message of God's forgiveness with others. God also graciously forgives our sins when we repent and put our trust in Christ. In doing this, we are committing ourselves to begin a new life. God's call may take many forms and many directions, but he does call each believer to be an example of the changed life that Jesus Christ has begun and to spread the word.

In Paul's case, God's direction became very clear. He was to tell Gentiles everywhere what God has done for them (Acts 9:15). Paul did carry the Good News across the known world, speaking in synagogues, convincing the Gentiles, and even standing before kings. Paul understood his calling, for in Romans 11:13 he states, “God has appointed me as the apostle to the Gentiles.” Paul makes it clear that the gospel is the working out of God’s plan first revealed to the Jews. He also makes it clear that the gospel offered hope to the Gentiles.

The desired response to the gospel message was that people will believe and obey him, bringing glory to his name. Faith and obedience are inseparable. Real faith will always lead to obedience; real obedience comes from faith.

1:6-7 Having stated the scope of his ministry, Paul goes on to include the believers in Rome in God’s plan. These believers may not have been called as apostles, as Paul was, but they certainly had been called to belong to Jesus Christ, to be his very own people. Paul was reminding the Romans that the message of the gospel is larger than its messengers. Even though he had not been able to visit them personally, he was fully aware that they were among those God had intended to reach. The reality of this invitation rests on the truth that God loves people dearly. Before believers are called, they are loved.

The church in Rome was primarily made up of Gentiles (1:5-6, 13; 11:13; 15:15-16), although there were a number of Jewish Christians as well. Part of the church may have been Jews who became believers at Pentecost and returned to Rome with the Good News. Acts 2:10-11 states that among the great crowd in Jerusalem who heard Peter’s speech were “visitors from Rome (both Jews and converts to Judaism).” In addition, travelers who had heard the Good News in other places brought it back to Rome (for example, Priscilla and Aquila—Acts 18:2; Romans 16:3-5).

Grace is the unmerited favor God gives to the believers; peace refers to the peace that Christ made between us and God through his death on the cross. Only God can grant such wonderful gifts. Paul wants his readers to experience God’s grace and peace in their daily living. In these two words of greeting Paul is combining expressions from Jewish and Gentile customs. Jews wished each other peace (eirene or the Hebrew shalom); Gentiles wished each other grace (charis). Each of these common expressions gained considerable value in Christian use.

GOD’S GOOD NEWS / 1:8-17

After formally introducing himself, Paul expresses his feelings toward the Roman believers and his reasons for wanting to visit them. This would disarm objections that might be raised to his coming. Some believers in Rome might think that he was arrogant in trying to extend his influence all the way to the capital of the empire; others might think he was presumptuous in planning to teach the gospel to those who had already heard it; others might even be concerned that he lacked integrity for often expressing his desire to come to Rome but never getting there. Paul does not leave the Romans guessing—he tells them exactly why he wants to come.

1:8 Living in the Western world's political power center, Roman Christians were highly visible. Fortunately, their reputation was excellent; their strong faith was becoming known throughout the world. To have a thriving church in Rome and to have Christians living pure lives in an evil city bore strong testimony to their faith! For this Paul thanked God.

1:9 Paul was a man of prayer. Paul prayed for the Romans the same way that he prayed for the Ephesians (Ephesians 1:15-16), the Philippians (Philippians 1:3-4), the Colossians (Colossians 1:3-4), and the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians 1:2-3). We would expect Paul to pray for his own converts and the churches he helped establish, but these words show that he also prayed for those outside his immediate acquaintance and responsibility. Paul had not personally visited these believers, so he had not yet been able to prove his love for them, but he appeals to God as his witness, confirming his constant prayers for the believers in Rome.

1:10-11 Paul also prayed that he could visit these believers. For a long time, Paul had wanted to visit the empire's capital city, but he had been prevented from doing so (see also 1:13; 15:22; Acts 19:21; 23:11; 28:14-16). Here Paul expresses his continued desire to go, but only if God willed it. Having prayed so often for them, he wanted to visit them in order to minister to them. Paul proposed a trip to Rome to serve, not to be served. He fully intended that his visit would benefit the believers there.

What spiritual blessing did Paul want to share? This was not a particular empowering to do something; rather, it was an insight or teaching based on the needs that Paul would find when he got to Rome. It would help them grow strong in the Lord. This letter to them certainly worked toward that end, but Paul also hoped that the spiritual effects of his intended visit would be powerful and mutual.

1:12 Paul prayed for the chance to visit these Christians so that he could encourage them with his gift of faith and be encouraged by theirs. As God's missionary, he could help them understand the meaning of the Good News about Jesus. As God's devoted people, they could offer him fellowship and comfort. Paul makes it clear that he will not come as simply the teacher and giver—he will be open to be given to and encouraged as well. When Christians gather, everyone should give and receive. Our mutual faith gives us a common language and a common purpose for blessing one another.

1:13 As noted above, Paul had tried to come to Rome, but had been prevented. Paul's original plan was to include Rome in his missionary efforts. Although the church had been established there without his efforts, that fact did not discourage Paul from wanting to visit and work among the believers in order to see more Gentiles become believers and join the church. He had done this in many other cities, and hoped to do so in Rome. By the end of his third missionary journey, Paul had traveled through Syria, Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia. The churches that he had begun in these areas consisted mostly of Gentile believers. Paul could make statements like these without a hint of pride. He is making it clear that God directed him into ministry to the Gentiles and that the good results came from God.

1:14 Paul's obligation was to proclaim Christ's salvation to all types of people in different cultures, crossing cultural, social, racial, and economic lines. The educated and uneducated referred to the classes in Rome versus the peoples of other "uncivilized" places. No barrier would stop Paul from bringing the Good News.

1:15 Paul had already visited some of the most beautiful cities of the world—Athens, Corinth, Ephesus—yet he carried an unfulfilled desire to minister in one of the most populated, corrupt places on earth. Neither the power nor the hostility of Rome intimidated Paul. He was convinced that the Good News must be taken everywhere, specifically to the large and needy metropolitan areas of the world. Paul knew that the gospel had already gained a foothold in Rome—the believers to whom he was writing had heard and had responded. But Paul wanted to preach God's Good News more fully. This letter to the Romans is the introductory statement of all that Paul wanted these believers to understand more fully.

1:16 Verses 16 and 17 summarize the thrust of the rest of Paul's letter and give the reason behind Paul's missionary zeal. Paul was ready, even eager (1:15), to preach at Rome. And he was not ashamed of this Good News about Christ, even though the gospel was held in contempt by those who did not believe and even though those who preached it could face humiliation and suffering. Paul was not intimidated by the intellect of Greece nor the power of Rome. Paul was not ashamed, because he knew from experience that the gospel had the power to save everyone who believes and then to transform their lives. The Greek word for power (dunamis) is the source for our words dynamite and dynamic. Dynamite was not invented by Nobel until 1867, so it is obvious that Paul did not have that specific picture in mind. Instead, the inventor of the explosive took its name from the Greek. But the parallel is instructive. The Good News, as the power of God, can be like spiritual dynamite. Under certain circumstances it has a devastating, even destructive effect, demolishing world views and traditions—paving the way for new construction. Placed inside a stone-hard heart that is resistant to God, it can shatter the barrier. God’s power in the gospel is not only explosive; it also overcomes evil.

The only way to receive salvation is to believe in Christ. This offer is open to all people. The gospel is powerful because the power of God resides in it by nature. The Good News is the inherent power of God that gives salvation to all who accept it. Salvation can only happen when a person believes.

The Jews were given first invitation because they had been God’s special people for more than 2,000 years, ever since God chose Abraham and promised great blessings to his descendants (Genesis 12:1-3). God did not choose them because they deserved to be chosen (Deuteronomy 7:7-8; 9:4-6), but because he wanted to show his love and mercy to them, teach them, and prepare them to welcome his Messiah into the world. For centuries Abraham’s descendants had been learning about God by obeying his laws, keeping his sacrifices and feasts, and living according to his moral principles. Often they forgot God’s promises and requirements and had to be disciplined; but still they had a precious heritage of belief in the one true God. Of all the people on earth, the Jews should have been the most ready to welcome the Messiah and to understand his mission and message—and some of them were. The disciples and Paul were faithful Jews who recognized in Jesus God’s most precious gift to the human race (see Luke 2:25, 36-38). The Jews were given the first opportunity to receive the Messiah during his ministry on earth (John 1:11) and during the days of the early church (Acts 1:8; 3:26). Although Paul was commissioned as the apostle to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15), even he followed this pattern. Whenever Paul went to a new city, he recognized his obligation to carry the Good News to the Jews first (Acts 13:45-46; 18:25, 28).

1:17 The message of the Good News tells us how we, sinners as we are, can be made right in God’s sight. It tells how God, who is righteous, can vindicate sinful people. Righteousness is an aspect of God’s character, his standard of behavior, and a description of all that he wishes to give to us. Our righteousness begins because of God’s faithfulness to his promises; it moves on in our response of faith and is a continuing process through life. Thus it is accomplished from start to finish by faith. Faith—unconditional trust—is the appointed way of receiving God’s righteousness. Faith in what? Faith in the fact that Jesus Christ took our sins upon himself, taking the punishment we deserved, and, in exchange, making us righteous before God. By trusting in Christ, our relationship with God is made right both for now and for eternity.

To nail his point, Paul quoted from Habakkuk 2:4, “It is through faith that a righteous person has life.” Righteousness by faith was not a new idea; it is found in the writings of the prophets, with which the Jewish believers would be familiar. This expression means that Christians will live because of God’s faithfulness and because of their response of faith in God; as a result, they will have eternal life and experience fullness in life.

- Faith is personal trust in God.
- Faith is the source of the believer’s new life in Christ.
- Faith justifies us, saves us, and gives us new life and a new lifestyle.

GOD’S ANGER AT SIN / 1:18-32

The remainder of the first chapter paints a picture of the human predicament before a holy God. These verses, when they are read aloud, sound like a list of charges being read in court. All people everywhere deserve God’s condemnation for their sin. They know they are not acknowledging their creator and are deliberately disobeying his standards. The consequences have been disastrous. Sin continues to increase. Before detailing God’s way of salvation, Paul first sets out to convince people of their lost condition and their need for a Savior.

1:18 As God’s righteousness was revealed (1:17), so was his wrath. The flip side of God’s righteousness is his wrath against evil. Certain aspects of human character elicit God’s wrath. It is the response of his holiness to all wickedness and rebellion.

Why is God angry with sin? Because sinful, wicked people have pushed the truth away from themselves, substituting the truth about him with a fantasy of their own imagination (1:25). They have suppressed the truth God naturally reveals to everyone in order to believe anything that supports their own self-centered lifestyles. Once humans have abandoned God, it will not take long for the effects to be felt in their relationships with each other.

God cannot tolerate sin because his nature is morally perfect. He cannot ignore or condone such willful rebellion. He wants to remove the sin and restore the sinner, but the sinner must not distort or reject the truth. But God shows his anger from heaven against those who persist in sinning.

While we do not have many idol-worshipping religions in our neighborhoods, we do find those who suppress the truth about God. These people

- replace God with the worship of success, property, and wealth,
- demote God by elevating their own homespun philosophies, and
- ignore God by devoting themselves to family, leisure, and career—rejecting his claim on their lives.

1:19-20 The truth about God has been clearly revealed by God. The clues to God's existence and character have traditionally been called general revelation. God could have kept humans in ignorance about himself. But he chose to reveal himself, generally in nature and specifically through the Scriptures and Jesus Christ. Because God has made certain facts about himself known instinctively, people will someday have to give an account before God of why they chose to ignore his existence and his character.

But how could a loving God send anyone to hell, especially someone who has never heard the Good News of Jesus? In fact, says Paul, people have seen the earth and sky and all that God made—therefore, they can clearly see his invisible qualities. Also, everyone has an inner sense of what God requires, but they choose not to live up to it. Put another way, people's moral standards are always better than their behavior. If people suppress God's truth in order to live their own way, they have no excuse. They know the truth, and they will have to endure the consequences of ignoring it.

The paradox can't be missed—all people can “clearly see” God's “invisible qualities.” How? God created the world with natural processes, with cause and effect. In the same way that observing a painting leads a person to conclude that there is an artist, so to observe the tremendous creation is to conclude that there is a supreme Creator, one with eternal power and divinity. This is part of the truth that unsaved people are suppressing.

One look at creation in all its splendor tells people that a mighty power made this world—but not just an abstract, impersonal force; rather, a personal God (Psalm 19:1-4). Thus, creation shows both God's eternal power and his divine nature. Indeed, nature reveals a God of might, intelligence, intricate detail, order, beauty, and power; a God who controls powerful forces. God's qualities are revealed through creation (Acts 14:17), although creation's testimony has been distorted by the Fall. Adam's sin resulted in a divine curse upon the whole natural order (Genesis 3:17-19), thorns and thistles were an immediate result, and natural disasters have been common from Adam's day to ours. Nature itself is eagerly awaiting its own redemption from the effects of sin (8:19-21; Revelation 22:3).

Then why do we need missionaries if people can know about God through nature (the creation)?

- Although people know that God exists, they suppress that truth by their wickedness and thus deny him. Missionaries can point out their error.
- Although people may believe there is a God, they refuse to commit themselves to him. Missionaries can help persuade them.
- Missionaries can convince people who reject God of the dangerous consequences of their actions.
- Though nature reveals God, people need to be told about Jesus and how through him they can have a personal relationship with God.
- Missionaries are needed to help the church obey the great commission of our Lord (Matthew 28:19-20).

Knowing that God exists is not enough. People must learn that God is loving. They must understand what he did to show that love to us. They must be shown how to accept his forgiveness of their sins. (See also 10:14-15.)

1:21 People's denial of their own awareness of God is what left them without excuse. When Paul says that they knew God, he is not describing a knowledge that could save them but a knowledge that simply recognized God's existence. He was describing an awareness of God, that, if not suppressed, would be nurtured by God. But since human beings have, in fact, suppressed the truth about God, the following calamities ensued: (1) they wouldn't worship him as God; (2) they couldn't give thanks; (3) in the void, they began to think up foolish ideas of what God was like; and (4) in the end their minds became dark and confused.

When people refuse to recognize God as Creator, they will also fail to glorify or thank him for his gifts—food, clothing, shelter, even life itself. When they neglect God, they open the door to evil. To omit what is good inevitably leads to committing what is evil. Ingratitude may seem like a small thing, but it begins the downward spiral into depravity. To forget to thank God for all he is and all he has done reveals a dangerous self-centeredness. This causes futile thinking and planning, darkness, pride, blindness, and finally total departure from God that bursts into a flood of sin.

1:22 Without answers based on the reality of God, people seek heroes among those who claim to be wise and will boldly say there are no answers. Under such circumstances, it is seen as a sign of sophistication and intelligence to refuse to acknowledge God's existence. But by biblical definition, people who refuse to believe in God are utter fools (Psalm 14:1). The evidence of God's existence is so plain and clear that to ignore it is totally foolish.

To some people, statements like these by Paul appear to be intolerant of other religions and views. The objection is often voiced in a question: "Well, after all, the point is that people are naturally somewhat religious; so isn't the most important thing not what religion you follow, but that you follow some religion?" The fallacy behind the question is that it still assumes that man is at the center, not God. The emphasis is not on believing what is true but on believing. Paul was speaking in a world that was inundated with gods. He would have been horrified to think that anyone would understand him to be saying that a little religion is a good thing! To Paul, even a lot of religion was bad if it was not true.

1:23 Whether they claim it or not, people are religious beings. By their very nature, they are bound to worship and serve something beyond themselves. It may be another idea of God, a person, a thing, or even some false notion that no God exists. Anyone who rejects the Creator will end up worshiping the creature. And how foolish that they turn their backs on the glorious, ever-living God in order to worship idols—things created by humans. Because they were created by humans, they owe their existence to humans. This places people in control of their own gods.

How can intelligent people turn to idolatry? Idolatry begins when people reject what they know about God. Instead of looking to him as the Creator and sustainer of life, they see themselves as the center of the universe. They soon invent gods that are convenient projections of their own selfish plans and decrees. These gods may be wooden figures, or they may be things we desire—such as money, power, or comfort. They may even be misrepresentations of God himself—a result of making God in their image, instead of the reverse. The common denominator is this: Idolaters worship the things God made rather than God himself.

1:24 God left those who spurned him to their own desires. Without his guidance, they degenerated into ruinous moral practices. This rush into sinful patterns can be seen in societies as well as in individuals. When people and nations refuse to repent, sin takes over and draws people into a life where there is no sense of right and wrong. Without God's remedy, his righteousness, the end is destruction.

Here Paul introduces the subject of sexual impurity. He returns to it in verses 26 and 27. The context indicates that he is referring in part to cultic prostitution and the fertility cults that made use of temple prostitutes in their rites. Throughout history, paganism has shown a remarkable capacity for substituting the pursuit of sexual pleasure for the pursuit of holiness. Rejection of God is often accompanied by deification of sex or reproduction. Because people ignored their innate awareness of godly restraints, personal desire became the standard of behavior. Paul did not hesitate to point out the devastating effects of sin on the most personal aspects of human life. Without God's righteousness, wrong rules.

1:25 Just as people exchanged the glory of God for lackluster images (1:23), they also traded what they knew was the truth about God for lies. These people have completely turned their back on God and replaced him with things that they then worshiped. Although many may refuse to acknowledge God's existence, that doesn't change the truth of his existence and the fact that he will indeed be praised forever. God's worthiness to be praised is not affected by human beings' rebellion or their poor choices. God will be praised forever, though there are many who, by their deliberate exchange of truth for lies, will not be present to participate.

1:26-27 There have always been those willing to believe that human desires are self-regulating. They do not believe that any action they enjoy could possibly be wrong. When the desire for the true God is rejected, other gods are raised up. When the desire for God is rejected, shameful desires take control. When people refuse God and his standards, when they are left to themselves as their own gods, nothing can stop them from seeking to fulfill their passions. Perversions of sex became rampant. God's plan for natural sexual relationships is his ideal for his creation. It is the height of foolishness to think that any sex act is acceptable as long as "no one gets hurt."

Paul's treatment of homosexual behavior falls in the middle of two other major areas at which God shows anger (1:18). The first is sinful worship; the third is a whole list of personal and relational sins. It is important to note that Paul is using homosexual practices to indicate the extent to which sin has brought chaos into every area of life. Homosexuality (to exchange or abandon natural relations of sex) was as widespread in Paul's day as it is in ours. Many pagan practices encouraged it. God is willing to receive anyone who comes to him in faith, and Christians should love and accept others no matter what their background. But homosexual behavior is strictly forbidden in Scripture (see Leviticus 18:22). Homosexuality is considered an acceptable practice by many in our world today—even by some churches. But society does not set the standard for God's law. Many homosexuals believe that their desires are normal and that they have a right to express them. But God does not obligate nor encourage us to fulfill all of our desires (even normal ones). Desires that violate God's laws must be controlled. God offers freedom from those sins through Jesus Christ and power to control our desires through the Holy Spirit.

Sin has a penalty, and the punishment is in keeping with the offense. The exact consequences of sin are not predictable, but they are inevitable. These people cannot call themselves helpless victims; a sinful choice was made, and it carries its penalty. Unfortunately, the due penalty also has a way of spilling over into other lives. The connectedness of everything in creation makes it almost impossible to confine sinful penalties. Often a truly painful consequence is seeing how a sin we unleashed affects others.

1:28 Humans sat in judgment on God to decide whether he fit the qualifications of a God that would be to their liking; they decided he did not meet those qualifications and so refused to acknowledge him. They had the knowledge (they were not ignorant), but they did not want to use it. In our own times we have seen a belittling of God as no more than a pale extension of our wishful thinking, someone made in our image. Yet those most vocal in condemning the authoritative Christian view of God have been busy at work creating people who think of themselves as gods. Paul's discussion is not out-of-date. The same rebellion against God is alive in the human heart.

When people choose to reject God, he allows them to do so. Their minds become depraved, and they lose the ability to distinguish between right and wrong. Their evil minds lead them to do things that should never be done, indicating acts not just offensive to God, but also offensive by human standards. God does not usually stop us from making choices against his will. He lets us declare our supposed independence from him, even though he knows that in time we will become slaves to our own rebellious choices—we will lose our freedom not to sin. Does life without God look like freedom to you? Look more closely. There is no worse slavery than slavery to sin.

1:29-31 That these people's lives became full of every kind of wickedness suggests a state of being filled to the point of overflowing. Once the mind of man had become depraved (1:28), it followed that the creative power of thought was turned to the pursuit of evil. Paul listed over twenty different ways in which the mind can be focused once it has turned away from God. (For similar lists, see

1 Corinthians 6:9-10; Galatians 5:19-21; and Colossians 3:5.) The catalog of sins may not be in any particular order, but it emphasizes the extent of the evidence against humanity. Who cannot find in himself more than one among these qualities?

1:32 In the previous verses Paul pointed out several results when God abandons people to pursue their evil desires. He was convinced that each person in rebellion against God perceives the final outcome of that rebellion. But even the finality of death is ignored by many.

How are people fully aware of God's death penalty? Human beings, created in God's image, have a basic moral nature and a conscience. This truth is understood beyond religious circles. Psychologists, for example, say that the rare person who has no conscience has a serious personality disorder, one that is extremely difficult to treat. Most people instinctively know when they do wrong—but they may not care. Not only have they turned their backs on God and realized that their deeds deserve the ultimate penalty of death, they also are continuing in their sin and encouraging it in others.

The cause for the appalling condition of our world—the horrible perversions and the rampant evil—lies in people's rebellion against God. Although knowledge of God is accessible, people turn their backs on it, close their minds to it, and go their own way, worshiping whatever they choose. With this stroke, Paul places the final touches on the dismal picture of man's condition apart from God. From here, he will move on to deal with those who might use their knowledge of God as an excuse for missing his righteousness.

ROMANS 2

GOD'S JUDGMENT OF SIN / 2:1-16

Having painted in large strokes the fate of humankind apart from God, Paul abruptly switches his attention to a new audience. He shapes his next thoughts in a style used widely at that time, called the diatribe. In a diatribe, the writer verbally attacks and attempts to destroy the ideas of the opposition. The anticipated questions or objections of the opposition are expressed or noted and then answered or refuted. Paul probably did not have an individual, but a character type in mind as he began his diatribe.

2:1 The critic here is Jewish, for Paul is focusing primarily on Jews. Paul had criticized the horrible evil of the Gentiles, their sins of idolatry and homosexuality and their general lifestyle. This Jewish critic nodded in agreement and assumed that he was free from such vices. Many Jews believed that their national heritage would save them; they thought their privilege of birth ensured entrance into God's Kingdom (Matthew 3:8-9). They went to great lengths to separate themselves from "unclean" Gentiles. So when Paul finished his list of characteristics of those whom God will judge (chapter 2), Paul knew that his Jewish listeners would agree that such people are terrible and deserve to be punished. But then Paul says that the Jews have no right to pass judgment, because they are just as bad. They are not guiltless and therefore have no excuse. Their attitude freely condemned others' sins but somehow overlooked those sins in themselves (see Matthew 7:2-3).

2:2 Paul assumes that all his readers will agree with him regarding God's judgment. Human judgment is based on prejudice and partial perception; God's judgment is based on the truth—he judges on the basis of the facts about what we do. And there is no doubt that God will punish sinners.

2:3 Seven times in the first three verses, Paul used various forms of the Greek word for judgment (krima). Though human beings pass judgments, their judgments are judged by God. When we stand condemned before God, we have no higher court of appeal.

Paul ridicules the idea that a person might escape God's judgment by correctly analyzing the wrong in others. Those Jews, who were guilty of the same sins for which God would judge and condemn the Gentiles, would not escape God's judgment. All people, Jews and Gentiles, have sinned, and all stand condemned before God. Paul repeats this theme over and over.

2:4 God is kind in giving us life and its fullness to enjoy; he is tolerant and patient as he bears our ingratitude and sin. He postpones punishment in order to give people time to turn from their sin (see 2 Peter 3:15). But Paul was concerned that these Jews, overconfident in their special status with God and unwilling to repent of sin, were showing contempt for God's blessings. So Paul reminds them that God's kindness is also meant to lead them to repentance, because all people need to repent!

2:5-6 This kind of person has sat in self-righteous judgment of others for too long and has lived as described in verse 4—by showing contempt for all God has given (see also Deuteronomy 10:16 and Jeremiah 4:4). People receive blessings but stubbornly continue in sin, refusing to repent. It is difficult for self-righteous people to repent. Paul's readers who boasted of their faith yet refused to turn from their sin were storing up terrible punishment when God's wrath would be poured out upon them.

Though we do not know exactly when that will occur, we do know that no one will escape that day of judgment when God, the just judge of all the world, will judge all people according to what they have done. In the end, what matters most is not exactly when in history the day of God's wrath arrives, but that the clock is ticking. "It is destined that each person dies only once and after that comes judgment" (Hebrews 9:27). We do not know the day of the Lord, nor the day of our own death. We will treat both days with more respect if we call them "near."

God's judgment will be impartial, and it will be according to what people have done. Final judgment will be based upon character. All people will be held accountable for the truth that was available to them and what they did with it. (See also Job 34:11; Psalm 62:12; Proverbs 24:12; Jeremiah 17:10; 32:19; Matthew 16:27; 2 Corinthians 5:10; Revelation 20:12; 22:12.)

2:7 This doing what is good is a result of new life in Christ. Real faith generates good works in a believer's life. To persist in this is a characteristic of the growing and progressing Christian (see Luke 8:15; Hebrews 12:1; James 1:3). Again Paul is emphasizing God's impartial treatment of all people (Ephesians 2:8-10).

Persistence and hope in God are rewarded by meeting the goal—glory, honor, and immortality in eternal life. In the end, people will receive what they really want. If we desire to be with God, he will gladly fulfill our wish; but if our inmost desire is to keep God at arm's length, the distance will be preserved forever. Many people want it both ways: They think that eternal life might be nice as long as God doesn't interfere with their present life. But we must choose. Will we persist in wanting our own way, or in wanting God's way?

2:8 Paul still has in mind the self-confident, self-righteous person, who through his own self-seeking has actually turned away from the truth and resisted the gospel, and is following his own evil path. God's anger and wrath are promised to those who have turned from him, yet are claiming to have a special place with him. They will receive the wrath and anger that they thought would fall on others.

2:9 God's impartiality and our behavior ensure the final results. There will be trouble and calamity for those who reject God. In simple terms, Jews or Gentiles who do evil, even if they don't perceive it that way, will receive the consequences of final judgment. Just as the gospel and salvation came first for the Jew and then for the Gentile (1:16), so will judgment by God. Those self-righteous Jews who thought they were somehow protected from judgment because of their heritage will not only find that they will be judged; they will be first in line!

2:10 In contrast to verse 9, Jews or Gentiles who do good (those who fulfill the law in Christ), no matter how incomplete they may feel that goodness to be, will receive a reward. As with the consequences of evil, there may be immediate benefits of a right relationship with God, but the full measure of glory, honor, and peace is for the future. Paul's main point is that God's judgment is based on truth and results, not on who we are, where we came from, our upbringing, or our intentions. The final question will be, What did you do with what you knew?

2:11 God does not show favoritism for Jew over Gentile when it comes to judgment for sin, no matter what the Jews had come to assume or expect. This personally addresses those who adopt Israel's mind-set that religious heritage guarantees salvation. This verse answers the most common perception on how God will judge. God is usually pictured as the deity who grades on the curve. Those holding this idea almost always express the hope that they are somehow just above the passing line, but they have no way of really knowing. They blatantly hope that God will show favoritism. This verse obliterates that hope. There is no passing line. Instead, sin has created a moral chasm over which no one can leap. The gospel gives us a way to reach the other side. God offers us something far better than favoritism. He offers grace. Having Christian parents or attending the church of our ancestors does not guarantee one's salvation. Salvation is given to individuals on the basis of personal faith in Jesus Christ.

2:12 Gentiles will be judged on the basis of the knowledge available to them. They won't be condemned for failing to conform to a code of laws they knew nothing about. They will not perish because they didn't have the Jewish law; they will perish because they have sinned. The Jews will be judged by God's written law because they had been trained in it. They will be judged for sinning against the law that they knew so well. People are condemned not for what they don't know, but for what they do with what they know. Those who know God's written word and his law will be judged by them. Those who have never seen a Bible still know right from wrong; they will be judged guilty because they did not keep even the standards of their own conscience.

2:13 Those faithful Jews who attend the synagogues every Sabbath and hear God's law read over and over may consider themselves to be righteous, but just hearing is not enough, because it is not merely knowing the law that brings God's approval. Those who do good (2:10) and those who obey the law will be declared right in God's sight—this includes both Jews and Gentiles (see also Leviticus 18:5 and James 1:22-25). The obedience that Paul describes is perfect and well beyond our reach. Our being made right with God must be sought and found elsewhere. Paul effectively closes many appealing doors while he describes the only one that leads to eternal life.

2:14 Some Gentiles who did not know anything about God's written law had moral sensitivity and lived as though following it. They had the law of conscience. The knowledge of God's character was available to them, for they knew right from wrong. Their moral awareness will serve in place of the law to judge them.

Paul does not attempt to prove that people are incapable of any good. His point is that not one of us is capable of perfect goodness. At the human level, we all behave more or less in line with the standards of our society. But righteousness is not determined by what most people do, or even by what most people think might be possible for someone who tries very hard. Righteousness is God's standard, God's character. Comparisons with others are of no help when we measure ourselves before God's standard. Ultimately, whatever our background, we will be held accountable by God for our life.

2:15 All cultures and nations, no matter how different, have a common recognition that some things are right and others are wrong. Gentiles who do not know God's law have a moral sensitivity in their hearts that matches what God's law requires. A conscience is an inward monitor that lets us know when we have done wrong. What the law does for the Jew, the conscience does for the Gentile, acting as God's law written within them.

2:16 The only way to truly judge a person is to judge his or her secret life. Some actions that appear good may be wrongly motivated; other, less visible actions may be done with good intentions. In this manner, both Jews and Gentiles will be judged. In the end, God will judge. Nothing will have to be explained to God. His judgment will be perfect, based on his perfect knowledge of every action and every motive. God will judge through Jesus Christ (see John 5:27). The gospel Paul preached included the wonderful message that though judgment is inevitable, it will be conducted through Christ's mediation. For those who are trusting in Christ for their righteousness, God's judgment does not include the fear of exposure and punishment. As Paul later says joyfully, "There is no condemnation for those who belong to Christ Jesus" (8:1).

THE JEWS AND THE LAW / 2:17-29

Paul knew that among those in Rome who would vigorously agree with his first chapter, there would be legalistic Jews, proud of their heritage as God's chosen people. But their agreement with his case would surely turn to anger as they realized that they were being included in the judgment, as equal members in the fallen human race. Possessing God's law increased both privilege and responsibility. Because these Jews knew more, they were expected to do more. At first they thought they were Paul's allies, but suddenly they were confronted by him.

Those of us who have grown up in a Christian family are the religiously privileged of today. Paul's condemnation applies to us if we do not live up to what we know.

2:17 Paul pointed out that Jews had God's law, worshiped the one true God, knew right from wrong, and yet regarded themselves better than all those who didn't have the law (i.e., were not Jews). "You boast that all is well between yourself and God." The kind of knowing and boasting described here is a sham without a life that demonstrates the knowledge. Paul was bluntly asking, "If you claim to be Jewish, why don't you live up to the name?" We who claim to be Christians, do we live up to this name?

2:18 Knowing what God wants and knowing right from wrong are the result of having been taught his law. God's word is not only a record of God's will; it is also a guideline to determine what course of action is best for us. Through God's word we can be trained or instructed in how to appreciate what is good. Yet how often do we, surrounded by a wealth of spiritual resources, live no differently than our pagan neighbors! We need to put our knowledge into action.

2:19 Paul saw these people as dangerously self-confident. It was apparent from their lives that they could not back up their claims. Paul's sarcasm here parallels Jesus' words to the Pharisees, "How terrible it will be for you teachers of religious law and you Pharisees. For you cross land and sea to make one convert, and then you turn him into twice the son of hell as you yourselves are" (Matthew 23:15). A Jew would see himself as a guide for the blind, but Jesus repeatedly called them "blind guides" (Matthew 15:14; 23:16, 24). They claimed to be a beacon light, but were unwilling to recognize the light of the world (John 9:5, 39-41).

2:20 The Jews that Paul had in mind considered themselves not only separate from the Gentiles, but also capable of teaching those whom they considered ignorant in spiritual matters. These people knew they had the truth and were proud of it! But assuming the teaching role carries with it heavy responsibility, especially in spiritual training (James 3:1). Knowing what ought to be taught is only one part of being an effective teacher. Practicing what is taught is the clearest test of a teacher. If you are a teacher, can you pass this test?

2:21-23 Anyone proud of his spiritual background should take a careful look at himself. The Jews were called to be guides of the Gentiles, and salvation is of the Jews (John 4:22), but their response to God's plan for them had made them arrogant. The Jew of whom Paul was thinking possessed the law and was confident that this position allowed him to teach all those who were ignorant without the law. However, Paul's questions were designed to force the listener to realize that not all Jews could claim such superiority. Many did not understand God's law, had false confidence in it, and could not apply it readily to their daily life. Without God's Spirit and the gospel, they had neither superiority nor all the answers. Having, knowing, and reading the law are not enough.

The Jews needed to teach themselves, not others, by their law. The law is more than legalistic minimum requirements—it is a guideline for living according to God's will. It is also a reminder that we cannot please God without a proper relationship to him. The general principle is that it is much easier to tell others how to behave than to behave properly ourselves. As Jesus pointed out, even withholding what rightfully belongs to someone else is stealing (Mark 7:9-13); and looking on another person with lustful, adulterous intent is adultery (Matthew 5:27-28). Before we accuse others, we must look at ourselves and see if that same sin, in any form, exists within us. The question, do you steal from pagan temples, may be making the contrast between condemning idolatry while in private valuing them so highly that they become worth stealing. By knowing God's law and then breaking it, the Jews had given God great dishonor. The unmerited honor that God had given Jews by choosing them was being treated with unhealthy pride and outright disrespect.

Each of the questions touches on matters in the Ten Commandments. Theft, adultery, idolatry, and dishonoring God were all prohibited. His assumption is not that every reader would answer yes to each question, but that each reader would find his life spotlighted at least once.

2:24 Those who glory in God's law and brag about their relationship to him and then live in disobedience bring God into disrepute among nonbelievers. Paul quotes from Isaiah 52:5, written about Israel's exile to foreign lands. It was the Jews' rampant evil and flouting of God's law that led to the exile. They had boasted about being God's chosen people, but because of their sin, their nation was destroyed. The Gentiles despised a God who, it appeared, could not save his own people. Paul's parallel was that Jews were again resting with false confidence on their being "chosen" and their possession of God's law. Their sins were still causing Gentiles to blaspheme a God who would choose such a nation.

2:25 Circumcision was fundamental to the Jews—it symbolized the covenant between God and Abraham's descendants (Genesis 17:9-14). It was the expression of Israel's national identity and was a requirement for all Jewish men. Circumcision was a physical reminder to Jews of their national heritage and privilege. Many were confident that it sealed their position with God. But just as having the law did not make a person right before God, neither was circumcision in itself a cause for confidence. To be circumcised was worth something only if you obey God's law (see Galatians 5:3). To be circumcised and yet break God's law was no better than not being circumcised at all. What God desires is a pure and obedient heart.

Symbols require some sense of reality in order to be significant; otherwise they are empty. Signing a contract does not take the place of doing the work. In fact, signing a contract and then refusing to carry out its terms is considered a serious breach. It is worse than a failure. It is a deception.

2:26-27 Paul had already pointed out that circumcision was a valuable part of a system governed by obedience. Where there was no obedience, circumcision was of no value. By the same logic, when obedience was present, the real objective was accomplished, even though circumcision had not occurred. In other words, Gentiles who obey God's law are as good in God's sight as a law-abiding, circumcised Jew and could receive the rights and honors of being God's own people. A Gentile who kept the law would be in a position to condemn a Jew who broke it, no matter how well that Jew knew the law. The Jew who required strict observance to every letter of the law, but was not a doer of the law, was actually a transgressor of that law because he had missed the point.

We must keep in mind that Paul is dealing here with absolutes. Obedience is not a matter of degrees. James saw this clearly: "The person who keeps all of the laws except one is as guilty as the person who has broken all of God's laws" (James 2:10). The sharp division that the law creates reveals the startling nature of the gospel. The righteousness we might try to create by living up to the law, circumcised or not, leads to hopelessness. Perfect obedience is beyond us.

2:28-29 Paul is adamant: The circumcision that God wanted was not cutting the flesh, and cutting the flesh did not fulfill the law. Paul is not inventing new theology, but urging his readers to re-examine the testimony of the Old Testament Scriptures. To be one of God's children—a true Jew—was not merely to be a circumcised Jew, but to be one who loved God and followed his laws. The kind of Jews God wanted were not those people tied to a heritage, rather people whose lives were pleasing to God. It was a matter of the heart. The person whose heart is right with God because of God's Holy Spirit will be of great value to God. A Jew transformed by God's Spirit would be living up to his name, for he would be praiseworthy in God's eyes. He would fulfill what the law required but was powerless to produce.

GOD REMAINS FAITHFUL / 3:1-8

Having firmly described the shared sinful condition of humankind, Paul turns to several thoughts about the unique benefits of being Jewish. He wants to remind his Jewish brothers that their lack of faith has not hindered God's plan. Paul does not want his people to miss the significance of God's faithfulness. In spite of their failures, God still allows them to be the people of the Messiah. In fact, the Jews' lack of faith is a clear witness to the absolute need for a Savior. Neither they nor we can save ourselves. God's faithfulness is our only hope.

3:1 Paul's conversation with his Jewish critic continues into this chapter. At the end of chapter 2, Paul had clearly stated that true "Jewishness" is not a matter of heritage, but a matter of one's relationship with God, and that true circumcision is not on the body, but on the heart. The Jewish response might have well been, "Then what's the advantage of being a Jew? Is there any value in the Jewish ceremony of circumcision?" Paul gives his response.

3:2 Paul answers yes, there are advantages for those members of God's chosen nation. The Jews were entrusted with the whole revelation of God (Exodus 19–20; Deuteronomy 4:8). That great privilege alone made the Jews even more responsible to live up to God's requirements. Paul himself was a Jew, and even though he became a dynamic Christian, he did not turn his back on his heritage. In fact, he realized that the prophets, the law, and God's plan all pointed to fulfillment in Jesus Christ. Therefore, he could confidently state that being a Jew and being circumcised did have meaning, but only as part of God's total plan. The Jews were entrusted with God's words, preserving them until the coming of Christ, who was the fulfillment of the prophetic Scriptures.

3:3 While it was true that many Jews were unfaithful to God or to what they had been entrusted, that didn't change the fact of God's faithfulness. Many Jews rejected the gospel and thus failed to understand their own Scriptures. But Israel's unfaithfulness did not determine God's faithfulness. God had always been faithful to Israel, despite the nation's failings, and God would continue to be faithful to his covenant with them.

3:4 In the strongest terms he could use, Paul wanted to drive home the point that the combined self-justification of the whole world could not stand up to God's truth. If God and every person were to disagree, there still would not be any doubt about who was right. The fact that many people are unfaithful (see Psalm 116:11) by suppressing the truth (1:18), exchanging the truth for a lie (1:25), and rejecting the truth (2:8), doesn't change the deeper fact that God is true. God's purpose for Israel and his plan for all people remained unshaken.

Paul quoted from one of the profoundly confessional passages in the Old Testament (Psalm 51:4). It records the repentance of David following his confrontation with the prophet Nathan over his sin with Bathsheba. In the revelation of his sin David realized, as all of us must, that there is no denial before God. He sees even those things that we hide so well in ourselves and perhaps even come to believe never happened. Kings were used to getting their way. We tend toward the same arrogance. Before God it carries no weight at all.

3:5-6 The apologist in Paul can foresee further objections arising. He poses them in the question of this verse. He understands that people are usually more willing to rationalize than repent, and that their minds will be pondering ways to elude God's righteous judgment. Paul knows they are thinking, "If my sinfulness makes God look so good, then why should he punish me? I'm actually helping him out!" This was an attempt to make it seem unfair for God to punish sinners.

Many believe that God's wrath contradicts his loving nature. But God judges based on his own character, not on society's norm for fairness. God is not accountable to some external, vague notion of fair play. His personal moral uprightness is the standard by which he judges.

Eventually the final day of reckoning will come when God "will judge all people according to what they have done" (2:6). God must and will judge sin—he has the right to judge the world because he is God, and he is holy and just. Paul answers by reaffirming God's character. If God is not just, how is he qualified to judge the world? No person can be an exception to God's laws; that would violate God's character and disqualify him as the Judge.

3:7 This is the same question from verse 5, posed with different words. The root problem is in people's misunderstanding of God's righteousness when he is patient to both unfaithful Jews and sinful Gentiles. Jews cannot condemn Gentiles; both are in the same predicament. Both need to rely on God's righteousness in his dealings with them and then choose to trust him or face his inevitable wrath for their sins.

3:8 The gospel Paul preached was being misconstrued because he argued that obeying the law would not bring salvation. Paul, and possibly the Roman Christians, had heard this objection from Jews who were accusing him of teaching lawlessness. If Jews or Gentile Christians interpreted Paul's words that God is faithful despite people's faithlessness to mean that God's laws need not be followed, then they could reach the incorrect conclusion that the more we sin the better it is. Paul dismisses this perverse reasoning with the terse words, "Those who say such things deserve to be condemned."

ALL PEOPLE ARE SINNERS / 3:9-20

Paul applies the concept of depravity he taught in 1:18-32 to the Jews in these verses. Paul now brings to a close the lengthy introduction of the charges against humanity that he began back in 1:18. He continually maintains that everyone stands guilty before God. Every person must accept that he or she is sinful and liable for God's condemnation. Only then can they understand and receive God's wonderful gift of salvation.

3:9 To the question of whether there was any value in being a Jew, Paul had said yes (3:2). But to the question as to whether Jews are better than Gentiles, Paul answers no. The reason? Jews and Gentiles alike are under the power of sin. Both need God's grace. Gentiles have no excuse (1:20), and neither do Jews (2:1).

3:10 There can be no more argument about special privileges for the Jews, for from their own Scriptures Paul strings together a series of verses outlining universal indictment. The advantage of being a Jew does not apply to salvation. All have sinned; no one is righteous. No one can earn right standing with God.

As is the pattern throughout the New Testament, writers do not always quote word for word from the Old Testament. Their notions about making exact citations were less stringent than ours. And because writers were probably working from memory as often as they were working with a text before them, their quotations tend to be allusions more than they are direct references. At other times their quotes may have been exact to the translation they did have before them, such as the Greek version of the Old Testament.

3:11-12 The phrase no one is seeking God is from Psalm 14:2. Seeking is a way of expressing what is most important to us. This kind of seeking means training ourselves to turn to God first for help, to fill our thoughts with his desires, to take his character for our pattern, and to serve and obey him in everything. The phrase all have turned away from God; all have gone wrong is from Psalm

14:3. The failure to seek God does not leave a person immobilized; rather, it sets him or her on a course of destruction. Whatever does not include the seeking of God ends up leading people in the wrong direction.

3:13-14 From Psalm 5:9 comes the statement that their talk is foul, like the stench from an open grave. Jesus made it clear that the indications of sinfulness come from inside of us (Matthew 15:11). Up until this verse, the evidence of rebellion has been mainly evident between a person and God. Here Paul begins to point out that sinfulness corrupts human relationships too. The gift of communication becomes twisted into a weapon to deceive others.

From Psalm 10:7 comes the picture of sinful people's mouths full of cursing and bitterness. Eventually, rebellion against God shows itself by tainting the way a person speaks. Cursing and bitterness may strike us first as offensive expressions, but they are also clues about a person's inward condition.

3:15-17 Isaiah 59:7-8 states that rebellion against God leads to violence against others. The shameful milestones of history are marked with bloodstains from the atrocities committed by those who freed themselves from God. There is always talk of peace, but apart from God, there can be no real peace.

3:18 Quoting from Psalm 36:1, Paul states the bottom line condition of these people: they have no fear of God to restrain them. To fear the Lord is to recognize God for who he is: holy, almighty, righteous, pure, all-knowing, all-powerful, and all-wise. When we regard God correctly, we gain a clearer picture of ourselves: sinful, weak, frail, and needy. When we recognize who God is and who we are, we will fall at his feet in humble respect. Only then will he show us how to choose his way.

Paul's brief tour of truth ends almost full circle. He began with the fact that no one is like God (who is righteous), and he ends with the parallel truth that we lack fear of God. Some people lack this fear out of ignorance, while others, through familiarity with God, lose the sense of humble awe that ought to characterize a person's attitude before God.

3:19 The verses above quoted from the Scriptures condemn all people, but especially those under the law, the Jews. Those who read the verses above are silenced. There are no more excuses to be made, no more self-defenses uttered. No one has any excuses; everyone is liable for judgment. And if the Jews—God's special chosen people—can say nothing in their own behalf, then no one can.

In the silence filling the court, one thought is clear: guilty as charged. That accountability of guilt must be answered, even though every explanation and excuse had failed. We are held accountable to God because he is our Creator, the personal source behind the standard (law), and the faithful Judge. We owe our existence and obedience to this One.

3:20 With this all-inclusive statement, Paul closes his opening arguments that describe the state of human lostness. The purpose of the law is not to bring salvation, but to make us aware of sin.

The only way people can be made right in God's sight is for God to declare them so. No one can do it by trying to do what God's law commands, meaning keeping certain traditions, such as circumcision, in order to be identified as a Jew and so remain under God's covenant promises. These traditions have to do with identifying with God's people and maintaining one's relationship within that people. Again Paul drives the point home: being a knowledgeable, faithful, and law-keeping Jew doesn't make a person righteous. The law was not meant to become something the Jews boasted about; rather, it was given to eliminate anyone's boasting and to make all people aware of sin and their constant need for God's grace. The law only makes it painfully clear that people aren't obeying it.

CHRIST TOOK OUR PUNISHMENT / 3:21-31

Like the swelling waves of the tide, Paul's argument rolls over the predicament of the human race. After each wave of the gospel, the waters recede to reveal a new aspect or depth of the problem of sin. This wavelike approach to Paul's letter provides a number of views of the same issues, with slightly different emphases. Having stated such a strong case for our universal indictment under the law, Paul now turns to God's gracious alternative plan.

3:21 The words but now present an important shift in subject. Whereas the law was God's righteous standard, the righteousness required to live up to it was not within man's capacity. God, the measure of righteousness, had to provide a means of righteousness—of being right in his sight. The gospel is not a recent creation by God to respond to human failure. It was promised in the Scriptures long ago. Whereas the law provided a measurement of the distance between God and his creatures, this righteousness from God has been provided in a different way. There is a way to be righteous before God. It is not by obeying the law, by being "Jewish" (see 3:20), yet it has always been in the Law and the Prophets, for they pointed to it.

3:22 The way to being made right in God's sight is the way of faith in Jesus Christ to take away our sins. Trusting in Jesus Christ means putting our confidence in him to forgive our sins, to make us right with God, and to empower us to live the way he taught us. God's solution is available to all of us regardless of our background or past behavior. And this way is open to all who believe—both Jews and Gentiles.

Trusting in Jesus Christ is the only way we all can be saved. We all begin in the same place spiritually, and there is only one way. Faith in Jesus Christ doesn't mean we understand everything that Christ has done for us, but it does mean that we believe he has done everything for us!

3:23 Paul has made it clear thus far in his letter that there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles when it comes to final judgment—all have sinned. If the law measures the distance between God and his creatures, then human righteousness is our attempt to bridge that distance by our own efforts. Paul is correct—we all fall short. But what is this glorious standard that we do not reach on our own? The word glory (doxos), from which we derive the word doxology, refers to the wonderful and awe-inspiring but indescribable presence of God himself. Sin keeps us from the presence of God.

Sinning confirms our status as sinners, and sin cuts us off from our holy God. Furthermore, sin leads to death (because it disqualifies us from living with God), regardless of how great or small each sin may seem. Sins are deadly, but sinners can be forgiven. There are no distinctions: we have all sinned; we all need a savior; Jesus Christ is the Savior; through faith we can receive his salvation.

3:24 Just as there is no distinction in our fallenness, Paul writes, so there is no distinction in the source of our justification. God justifies us; he declares us not guilty for our sins. When a judge in a court of law declares the defendant “not guilty,” all the charges are removed from the person's record. Legally, it is as if the person had never been accused. When God forgives our sins, our record is wiped clean. From his perspective, it is as though we had never sinned. We do not have to anxiously work while hoping that in the end we will have been good enough to meet God's approval. Instead, those who believe in Jesus Christ and his sacrifice on the cross are freed—Christ Jesus has taken away our sins. Our righteousness before God depends entirely on him and can only be accepted as a gift from him. God in his gracious kindness assures us of our acceptance and then calls us to serve him as best we can out of sheer love for him.

3:25-26 In describing how God provided us with undeserved righteousness, Paul alludes to the sacrificial system in the Old Testament (see Leviticus 17:11). Only now, the life offered as sacrifice is not a spotless animal, but Christ. God sent Jesus to take the punishment for our sins. That punishment involved his death—he shed his blood for sinners. Because of what Jesus did on the cross, God can accept those who put their trust in Jesus.

Why did the punishment require shed blood? God had said from the beginning, “For the life of any creature is in its blood . . . It is the blood, representing life, that brings you atonement” (Leviticus 17:11). But the blood Paul mentions here is a particular blood—it is Christ’s blood. Only the sacrificial death of Christ on the cross was the effective atonement for our sins. Christ stands in our place, having paid the penalty of death for our sin, and he could satisfy God’s anger against us.

If God did not eternally punish those who sinned before Christ lived, then why did Christ die? Paul shows that, at the cross, God forgave the sin of all who believe—Old Testament believers looked forward in faith to Christ’s coming and were saved, even though they did not know Jesus’ name or the details of his earthly life. Unlike the Old Testament believers, we know about the God who loved the world so much that he gave his own Son (John 3:16). The question to answer is, Have you put your trust in him?

God is entirely fair and just, both in his inherent character, and in his dealings with sinners. Christ’s death relates to both the past and the present. God did not completely reject his people, the Jews, even though they constantly rejected him. He was not being unfairly generous; rather, he was looking forward to the time when Jesus’ death would be effective for all those who believed in God before Jesus came, as well as those who come after. The only answer to humanity’s plight—that is, death because of sin—was given by God in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This action fulfilled God’s own law and his promises to Israel. The way to receive this answer for ourselves is through faith in Jesus Christ.

3:27-28 In conclusion, Paul writes that there is no room for personal pride. There can be no boasting heritage, law, or works. God’s acquittal is not based on our good deeds. It is based on our faith. Why are we made right with God through faith?

- Faith eliminates the pride of human effort, because faith is not a deed that we do.
- Faith exalts what God has done, not what people do.
- Faith admits that we can’t keep the law or measure up to God’s standards—we need help.

- Faith is based on our relationship with God, not our performance for God.

Most religions prescribe specific duties that must be performed to make a person acceptable to God. Christianity is unique in teaching that the good works we do will not make us right with God. No amount of human achievement or progress in personal development will close the gap between God's moral perfection and our imperfect daily performance. So there can be no basis for pride. Good deeds are important, but they will not earn us eternal life. We are saved only by trusting in what God has done for us through Jesus Christ (see Ephesians 2:8-10).

3:29-30 Again, the Jews cannot claim sole propriety of God or deny that Gentiles can also receive God's saving grace. The Old Testament consistently recorded God's inclusion of the Gentiles in his plans. God had promised Abraham, "All the families of the earth will be blessed through you" (Genesis 12:3). Paul simply states the logical necessity. Because there is only one true God, then he is God of all his creation and calls both Jews and Gentiles to faith in him. The question of being right with God will not be settled according to those who have and have not been circumcised, but rather by their faith, whatever their physical lineage.

3:31 Paul envisions the Jewish critic raising a valid question: If we emphasize faith, does this mean that we can forget about the law? Paul answers, Of course not! In fact, only when we have faith do we truly fulfill the law. The law is not something that only the Jews can "do" for God; the law is for both Jews and Gentiles and can only be "done" through faith in Christ. Faith returns the law to its proper place and role in God's plan for people. Faith does not wipe out the Old Testament; rather, it makes God's dealings with the Jewish people understandable. ROMANS 4

THE FAITH OF ABRAHAM / 4:1-25

In order to show the priority of faith, Paul turns his readers' attention to the origins of the Jewish race. He invites Abraham to make a contribution to the discussion by providing proof that faith was already the sole requirement between God and his creatures long before the law was given. Paul knows that if he can make a convincing case for Abraham's justification by faith, Jews might be more open to considering the claims of the gospel. After all, if the ancestral father of the Jewish nation did not attempt to earn his way into God's favor, neither should his offspring. Paul was anxious that his fellow Jews discover what he and their father Abraham had discovered—that justification comes by faith.

4:1 Paul continues his conversation with his Jewish questioner by mentioning Abraham, the great founder of the Jewish nation. Paul wants to make it clear that Abraham is forefather to all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles.

According to Jewish tradition, Abraham had been chosen by God for his unique role in history because he was the only righteous man alive at the time. Abraham was the epitome of what it meant to be a Jew, and he was the first Jew, the father of all Jews. John the Baptist had warned that being descendants of Abraham did not settle matters with God (see Luke 3:7-9). Jesus had anticipated the broader application of Abraham's faith (John 8:39). Clearly there was more to being a child of Abraham than simply being able to trace one's genealogy back to him. Abraham, too, had experienced being saved by faith.

4:2 If Abraham was accepted by God because of his good deeds, then he would have had something to boast about. This was the traditional rationale for religious pride that Paul expects from his Jewish questioner. Many Jews saw Abraham as being made right by God because of his obedience, especially to God's command to sacrifice Isaac. They believed that he had every reason to boast in his relationship with God. As Abraham's descendants, they believed that they also had reasons for pride. But Paul knocks down that argument by saying that from God's point of view Abraham had no basis at all for pride. To underscore his point, Paul quotes directly from Genesis 15:6, "Abraham believed God, so God declared him to be righteous." Abraham's works or obedience were not credited as righteousness, but his faith was.

4:4-5 Paul illustrates the difference between faith and work by describing the process of employment. An employer does not call an employee's wages a gift; instead, the workers earn what they receive. The employer is obligated to pay for work that has been completed. The wages are the agreed-upon amount, not a gift. If a person could earn right standing with God by his or her works (doing good, obeying the law), salvation wouldn't be free; it would be God's obligation, like payment for our efforts.

In contrast to the wage earner are the sinners (the ungodly) who trust in God. These people do not work—in other words, they have come to God because of faith and have not performed any rituals or followed any laws. Yet these people are declared righteous because of their faith, not because of their work. How could God do this?

4:6-8 Paul quotes from Psalm 32 (written by King David) to develop his explanation of how God can declare an undeserving sinner as righteous. David had written of the joy of those whose disobedience is forgiven, whose sins are put out of sight. God's forgiveness of sins by his sheer grace is the same as declaring people to be righteous apart from their works. He will explain this in coming verses.

4:9-10 Does this blessing (referring to 4:6-8) refer only to the Jews, or is it for Gentiles as well? Back to Abraham who was declared righteous by God because of his faith. It was Abraham's faith, not his faithfulness to certain rituals, that made him righteous. The critical question is: Was he declared righteous only after he had been circumcised, or was it before he was circumcised? Paul uses the term "circumcised" to refer to the whole of the law, because circumcision implies a desire to live under the demands of the law.

Paul immediately answers his own question—God accepted him first, and then he was circumcised later! God called Abraham in Genesis 12, declared him righteous in Genesis 15, then introduced the circumcision ceremony in Genesis 17.

4:11-12 Abraham's circumcision sealed the righteous standing he already had with God because of his faith. God said, "This will be a sign that you and they have accepted this covenant" (Genesis 17:11). God had already accepted him and declared him to be righteous—even before he was circumcised. So, Abraham is the spiritual father of those who have faith but have not been circumcised. He is the father of those who are made right with God by faith. That makes him the father of Gentiles who have believed in Jesus Christ as Savior. But he is also the spiritual father of those who have been circumcised, meaning the Jews. But this only applies to those Jews who have the same kind of faith Abraham had before he was circumcised, faith in God, not in their own goodness.

Abraham is father of all who believe in God. He is father of uncircumcised believers because he was uncircumcised when he was considered righteous; he is the father of circumcised believers not simply because of common Jewish heritage, but because they both had faith in God.

4:13 The promise to give the whole earth to Abraham and his descendants is found in Genesis 12:2-3 and Genesis 15:5. This promise was made to Abraham many years before the requirement of circumcision, and hundreds of years before the giving of the Ten Commandments (Exodus 20). Abraham believed God's promise, even though it was also made when he was almost one hundred years old and did not yet have any children. The promise was based on his faith not his obedience to a set of laws that did not yet exist.

4:14-15 If people must obey God's law and be good enough in order to be saved, then faith is useless. That, in turn, would make God's promise also meaningless. If the law does not bring righteousness, then why does it exist? The law brings punishment. In other words, in a world where people can make real choices, the law's presence automatically includes the possibility of failure and the consequences that would follow. The law's function is to help people realize their great sinfulness and to impose penalties on those who transgress it. The only way to avoid breaking the law is to have no law to break. If no one defines right and wrong, then no one knows the difference, and no one can sin.

4:16 What God gives by grace can only be accepted by faith. The promise given to Abraham that he and his countless offspring would inherit the world (4:13) refers to his spiritual offspring, those who follow his example of faith. Abraham had pleased God through faith alone, before he had ever heard about the customs that would become so important to the Jewish people. We too are saved by faith plus nothing. That makes Abraham the father of all who believe, not just of the Jewish nation.

4:17 The promise (or covenant) that God gave Abraham said that Abraham would be the father of many nations (Genesis 17:2-4) and that the entire world would be blessed through him (Genesis 12:3). This promise was fulfilled in Jesus Christ, who was from Abraham's line. Not only was Abraham the physical father of God's chosen nation, the Jews, he was also the father of God's people today, the church. Paul points out that the promise to Abraham to be the father of many nations extends beyond Israel to all the nations of the world.

Paul switches quickly into a description of God. Abraham and Paul believe in the same God, so what is the character of the God in whom they believe? Paul answers this question because believers need to have a clear understanding of the God being trusted. Paul's words here may seem awkward to us, but they were very familiar to the Jews. God is Creator—the giver and sustainer of life. He brings the dead back to life and brings into existence what didn't exist before (see also Deuteronomy 32:39; 1 Samuel 2:6). God has demonstrated his power. We know he can do the impossible!

4:18-19 Abraham believed God's promise that he would become the father of many nations. He believed it against all hope; that is, beyond any possible natural hope, because he was too old to be a father at the age of one hundred and his wife was well past childbearing age and had never been able to have children. Yet Abraham realized that God's ability to fulfill his promises outweighed the circumstances. So, Abraham's faith did not weaken even when they, a childless couple, had been promised descendants as numerous as the stars. It was impossible, but Abraham believed in God.

4:20 Abraham never wavered in believing God's promise because he was able to take God at his word. Abraham persisted in believing; thus, his faith grew stronger. He was able to trust in God to do what seemed humanly impossible, and even to glorify God before the results were apparent.

In spite of all this, Abraham was clearly human and imperfect. He had his weaknesses (fears) and bad habits (lying under pressure). The Bible describes Abraham with all his flaws, but as a man of faith. Thus, Abraham's faith could not have been anything but simple trust in God. Yet God honored that. Abraham is a model not just for the Jews, but for all people as a person of faith who realized he was totally dependent on his Creator for all things, even life itself.

4:21 Surrounded by a society fully immersed in paganism, where gods came by the dozens and were subject to human manipulation, Abraham dared to trust a God he could not control. Abraham did not say, "Well, we'll see what happens." Instead, he was absolutely convinced that God was able to do anything he promised. Abraham's faith was in God alone. And Abraham never doubted that God would fulfill his promise.

4:22 Abraham's faith, detailed above, was exactly the kind of faith God wanted and accepted when he declared Abraham righteous (4:3). It was this “absolutely convinced” faith that Paul called for when he preached the gospel—faith that relies on nothing but God; faith in God, who gives life, sustains life, and has power to keep his promises.

4:23-24 That Abraham’s faith was credited to him as righteousness (Genesis 15:6) describes not only how Abraham became righteous, but also how all his descendants (spiritual descendants, see 4:16) can become righteous before God. He will declare us to be righteous if we believe in God, who brought Jesus our Lord back from the dead. What makes us acceptable to God is not our works, but simply exercising the kind of faith Abraham had.

Abraham had to simply trust in God. That trust was confirmed in the immediate promises Abraham witnessed God fulfill in his lifetime. But he faced death without seeing all the promises fulfilled, nor understanding how God would fulfill them. The writer of Hebrews described the quality of this faith in glowing terms: “All these faithful ones died without receiving what God had promised them, but they saw it all from a distance and welcomed the promises of God” (Hebrews 11:13). Now Paul directs his readers to the same Abrahamic faith, but clearly focused on God’s fulfillment of the great promise, the blessing of the entire world through the gift of Jesus.

4:25 Jesus died because of our sins, taking the penalty we deserved, according to God’s plan (see 3:23-26). Just as God brought life from Abraham and Sarah (even though they thought they were “dead” and unable to have children), so God raised Jesus from the dead. His resurrection made us right with God.

FAITH BRINGS JOY / 5:1-11

Paul introduces some difficult concepts in this chapter. He demonstrates the truth of the gospel in ways that stretch our thinking. To begin to understand the next four chapters, it helps to keep in mind the two-sided reality of the Christian life. On the one hand, we are complete in Christ (our acceptance with him is secure); on the other hand, we are growing in Christ (we are becoming more and more like him).

5:1 With the word therefore, Paul indicates a conclusion based on his previous argument. In chapter 4, Paul showed how sinners, both Jews and Gentiles, are justified by faith. Here he begins to describe how having been made right in God's sight by faith affects our relationship with God. First, we have peace with God because of what Jesus Christ our Lord has done for us. Having peace with God means there is no more hostility between us and God, no sin blocking our relationship with him. More than that, a new relationship has been established, so we no longer dread the outcome of judgment but live under the protection established by God.

5:2 Not only has Christ made us right with God, but he also has given us personal access to God, bringing us into this place of highest privilege where we now stand. We have been brought into a place of favor with God. Instead of being his enemies, we are his friends—in fact, his own children (John 15:15; Galatians 4:5). Mankind was created for glory, but because of sin, had fallen “short of God's glorious standard” (3:23). It is God's purpose to recreate his image, his glory, fully in us so that we can confidently and joyfully look forward to sharing God's glory. Anticipating our future with God ought to bring great joy. We stand in God's grace, and the outcome of our lives is secure in his hands. We no longer need to be haunted by thoughts of judgment; now we can reflect upon and respond to his grace.

5:3-4 Problems and trials were a normal experience for first-century Christians. On their first missionary journey, Paul and Barnabas preached in several cities, and many people became believers. But, as was always the case, there was an immediate backlash of persecution against believers. For Christians, suffering does not negate the reality of God's love, but provides the occasion to affirm and apply it. This character quality of learning to endure is not an end in itself (see 1 Peter 1:6-7). It is one step in a process. Endurance develops strength of character. The word character (dokime) includes the idea of “approved as a result of testing.” A person with this kind of character is known for his or her inward qualities rather than any outward appearances. The end result of this chain reaction is confident expectation of salvation—confidence that God is in control and will see us through. The difficulties of life are not random, meaningless, or wasted when we are trusting God.

5:5 Our expectation that God will keep his promises will never disappoint us. When our trust is in God, we are absolutely assured that he will fulfill all that he has promised—we will be resurrected to eternal life and will be with him in glory. Why? Because he has already given us the Holy Spirit to fill our hearts with his love. The Holy Spirit continues to encourage us, reminding us how dearly God loves us. He loves us and will do as he has promised. (See also John 7:38; Romans 8:35; 2 Corinthians 5:14; Titus 3:5-6.) We can have hope in God because of the nature of his love.

5:6 God’s plan, from the beginning, was to send his Son to die for us, at just the right time, referring to both the timing in history and the timing in God’s plan (see Galatians 4:4). In the face of our helplessness, God was fully in control. The events in human history did not determine the plan of salvation; the plan of salvation was designed by God to happen at just the right time. We are saved only because God took the initiative and demonstrated his incredible grace and love by sending his own Son to take the punishment we deserved.

5:7-8 The highest expression of human love is when someone gives his or her life so that another person can continue to live. People are able to understand sacrificial love, even though it is rarely practiced. This kind of sacrificial gesture is almost always dependent on a relationship that already exists between the one sacrificing (parent, sibling, spouse, fellow soldier) and the one benefited. Even so, people do not readily die for others. But God’s love stands in stark contrast to even the deepest expression of human love because God showed his great love for us by sending Christ to die for us while we were still sinners. Christ’s death is the highest manifestation of God’s love for us. While we were rebellious and despicable, Christ died for us so that we could come to God, find peace with him, and become heirs of his promises. Christ did not die so that we could be made lovable; Christ died because God already loved us and wanted to bring us close to himself.

5:9 God made us right in his sight through the blood of Christ shed on the cross (see 3:25). Because God is holy, he could not accept us by simply disregarding or ignoring our sins. Instead, those sins had to be dealt with. And God did this through the sacrificial death of his Son. Again, this justification is God's approval, given to us only on the basis of what Christ did. It is an acquittal that sets free all of us who were otherwise hopeless prisoners of sin. If Christ's blood was shed on our behalf, then his blood will certainly save us from God's judgment.

5:10-11 We were enemies because we were rebels against God. Because of Christ's death, we were restored to friendship with God by the death of his Son. Because Christ's death accomplished this, so his life—his present resurrection life—delivers us from eternal punishment and insures our salvation. Knowing all that God has accomplished should cause us to rejoice. Paul has already told his readers that they should rejoice in sharing God's glory (5:2) and in their problems (5:3). Now he exclaims that they should rejoice in God. We rejoice in God because Christ took our sins upon himself and paid the price for them with his own death, instead of punishing us with the death we deserve. Through faith in his work, we become his friends and are no longer enemies and outcasts.

ADAM AND CHRIST CONTRASTED / 5:12-21

Having linked Jews and Gentiles through Abraham to the promises of God, Paul now shows how the gospel applies to all humankind. Paul made important points by going back to Abraham; but by going back to Adam, he will draw conclusions that affect the fate of every person.

5:12 Sin came into the world through one man. Adam sinned against God causing a domino effect: sin entered the entire human race, then sin brought death. Because everyone sinned, then everyone also died (Genesis 2–3). Death is the consequence of being under the power of sin. It was not in God's original plan for human beings to die, but it was the result when sin entered the world. Inevitably, the gift of life we bequeath to our children includes with it the sting of death. All human beings have two characteristics in common: They are sinners, and they will die.

5:13-14 God's law was not given until the time of Moses, so the people who lived between Adam and Moses did not have any specific laws to obey or break. But sin that was in the world was the power or force that causes people to act independently of God. All people are under the power of sin, and all people act in rebellion against God. Sin was in the world from the beginning, but it came into sharp focus when the law was given.

Adam disobeyed an explicit commandment of God (5:12). His descendants who lived prior to the time of Moses could not break any specific laws because there were none. But they still sinned, witnessed by the fact that they all died. Adam's descendants had sinned with Adam (5:12). Death is the result of Adam's sin and ours, even if our sins don't resemble Adam's. For thousands of years, the law had not been explicitly given, and yet people died. The law was added (5:20) to help people see their sinfulness, to show them the seriousness of their offenses, and to drive them to God for mercy and pardon. This was true in Moses' day and in Paul's day, and it is still true today. Sin is a deep rupture between who we are and who we were created to be. The law points out our sin and places the responsibility for it squarely on our shoulders, but it offers no remedy.

The contrast between Adam and Christ is that Adam's one act determined the character of the world; Christ's one act determined the character of eternity. In modern terminology, we could say that Adam was a flawed prototype, but Christ was the perfect original. Just as Adam was a representative of created humanity, so is Christ the representative of the new, spiritual humanity.

5:15 God's generous gift of forgiveness through Christ (justification) has a greater but opposite effect than the trespass of Adam and its consequences. Yet in each case, the act of one affected the lives of many. Because of Adam's sin, death entered the human race, and since then all people have died (with the Bible's exceptions of Enoch and Elijah). All people will die until the end of this age. Because of Jesus Christ, however, we can trade judgment for forgiveness. We can trade our sin for Jesus' goodness. Jesus offers us the opportunity to be born into his spiritual family—the family line that begins with forgiveness and leads to eternal life. If we do nothing, we have death through Adam; but if we come to God by faith, we have life through Christ.

5:16 God passed judgment on Adam's one sin of disobedience. As a result, Adam and the entire human race received condemnation. Everyone since Adam has sinned, and yet Christ overcame those many trespasses and brought righteousness to those who accept him, even though they are guilty of many sins. The result of sin is death; the gift of God—his justifying sinners—results in reigning forever with Christ.

5:17 By capitulating to sin, Adam caused death to rule over the whole human race. Death is inescapable; it comes to every living thing. We all live close to the valley of the shadow of death. And the reign of death over creation began because of Adam's sin. However, there is a remedy. Those who receive God's wonderful, gracious gift of righteousness will live in triumph over sin and death. What a promise this is to those who love Christ! We can reign over sin's power, over death's threats, and over Satan's attacks. Eternal life is ours now and forever. Though this promise has its greatest fulfillment in the future, it also has a significant immediate impact. In Christ, death loses its sting (see 1 Corinthians 15:50-57). We are still subject to the physical suffering and death brought by sin in the world, but we are free from the eternal spiritual separation that we would experience outside of Christ. Also, in the power and protection of Jesus Christ, we can overcome temptation (see 8:17 for more on our privileged position in Christ).

5:18-19 The same statement is made in different words in these two verses. Paul emphasizes the contrasting roles of two single agents, Adam and Christ. Adam's one sin brought condemnation on the human race; this one person disobeyed God causing all people to become sinners. But Christ's one act of righteousness, done because he obeyed God, opened the way for all people to be made right in God's sight and given eternal life.

5:20 This statement is certainly not what Paul's Jewish readers expected to hear. The law was given so that all people could see how sinful they were. Paul is winding up the argument he has been carrying on through the first five chapters of his letter. The purpose of the law for his own people, the Jews, had been to make them aware of their need for salvation. Sin was present from Adam, but the giving of the law was like having a huge spotlight turned on—the sinfulness of people became all the more defined. The solution to sin was not law, but grace. No matter how much people sin, God's wonderful kindness is greater. When our awareness of sin increases, we need to ask God to help us see that his grace is always greater in its capacity to forgive than our capacity to sin.

5:21 Our age is characterized by sin and inevitable death; but the age to come will be characterized by grace, righteousness, and eternal life. It is common to call the ultimate struggle that is going on in the universe “the conflict between good and evil.” Paul was picturing here the outcome of the war between the Kingdom of grace and the kingdom of sin. Until Christ, the war appeared to be decided, because sin ruled over all people. But Christ's death and resurrection provided the decisive victory by which God's wonderful kindness rules. Under the reign of grace, a right standing is declared that will bring eternal life.

This ends the first section of Paul's letter and his explanation of the law and its relation to salvation. But the law is not set aside as old and worthless. Paul will explain, in coming chapters, the role of the law for believers.

ROMANS 6

SIN'S POWER IS BROKEN / 6:1-14

Up to this point in his letter, Paul has shown people's need for salvation, God's gift of that salvation through the death of his Son, and God's grace in forgiving the sins of all who accept him. This next section of the letter (chapters 6–8) deals with God progressively separating believers from sin and making them more like himself. The key point to realize is that all believers have a new nature and the Holy Spirit within, yet they also have the old, human nature with its capability to sin. These opposites are in constant tension, yet God promises help and victory.

6:1-2 Paul realized that his statements about God's wonderful kindness to sinners could be interpreted to suggest that people ought to keep on sinning so that God can show us more and more kindness and forgiveness. "If God loves to forgive, why not give him more to forgive?" would be their erroneous reasoning. Paul answers with an emphatic, "Of course not!" The availability of God's mercy must not become an excuse for careless living and moral laxness. The idea that someone would claim to believe the gospel while planning to continue in sin is preposterous to Paul. The point of the gospel was not to find an excuse for sin, but to give freedom from sin.

To make his answer clear, Paul introduces a new concept—believers have died to sin. How?

- In the legal sense, we died in the sight of God's judgment.
- In the conversion sense, believing in Christ is dying to sin.
- In the baptismal sense, that burial implies we have died with Christ.
- In the moral sense, sinful desires may be present, but they are mortally wounded.
- In the resurrection sense, we exchange our sinful life for Christ's resurrection life.

Paul speaks of this death as fact and concludes, therefore, that believers cannot continue to live in it.

6:3-4 Baptism is a picture of a spiritual truth. In the very early church, baptism followed a person's decision to trust in Christ (see, for example, Acts 2:41; 8:37; 9:18; 10:48), marking these first generation believers as followers of Christ, members of the Christian community. Paul assumes that these Roman believers were baptized at conversion and would vividly recall the experience. Those who believe in Christ are baptized into him and baptized into his death; in other words, they are baptized to become one with Christ Jesus. As he died, we die to our old, sinful lifestyle, and a new life begins. Immersion may have been the form of baptism—that is, new Christians were completely buried momentarily in water. They understood this form of baptism to symbolize being buried with Christ, thus the death and burial of the old way of life. Coming up out of the water symbolized resurrection to new life with Christ, as well as the promise of a future bodily resurrection—as Christ was raised from the dead, so too believers may live new lives.

If we think of our old, sinful life as dead and buried, we have a powerful motive to resist sin. We can consciously choose to treat the desires and temptations of the old nature as if they were dead. Then we can continue to enjoy our wonderful new life with Jesus (see also Galatians 3:27; Colossians 3:1-4).

6:5 United literally means, “we have become grown together.” Our baptism painlessly acts out the union that Christ painfully made real. God’s plan was that in Christ’s death, believers would also die (to sin and to rebellion against God). Dying to sin is a lifelong process. When we accept Christ and die to our old nature, we begin a life of continually dying to the enticements of the world and living to please the One to whom we belong. Also as Christ was raised, believers also will be raised from death to eternal life with God. What people do with Christ now will greatly influence what happens to them later.

6:6 The old sinful selves describe believers before they trusted Christ, people who were ruled by sin and rebellion (5:10). That old self was crucified with Christ—believers have died the same death as Christ when Christ was crucified. Why? This was the only way that sin might lose its power in people’s lives, the only way our sinful nature could be set aside so that God’s nature could live through us.

As a result, believers are no longer slaves to sin. Those who have accepted God’s gracious gift of emancipation will be able to participate fully in a new life of obedience. As slaves to sin, we are set free by Christ before we can begin to live free. The power and penalty of sin died with Christ on the cross. We are no longer slaves to our sinful nature; we can choose to live for Christ.

6:7-8 During slavery, freedom was rare except through death. Death brings about a release that cannot be reversed. In the same way, when we died with Christ we were set free from the power of sin. We are not yet sinless, but sin no longer has control over us. With our death to sin, we are free to begin our new life in Christ. This new life in Christ (this side of physical death) is already the beginning of resurrected living. Getting used to this new life requires that believers exchange old habits and patterns for new ones.

6:9 Jesus experienced physical death and rose from the dead, and he will never die again. His resurrection was a victory over death, so death no longer has any power over him. Paul concluded that dying with Christ, then, ends the power of death over us as well.

6:10 Christ died once to defeat sin, emphasizing the finality and completeness of Christ's work. When Christ groaned from the cross, "It is finished!" (John 19:30), he knew that the sacrifice was complete, once for all (see Hebrews 7:27). Unlike Christ, we will still fall into sin's traps now and then; but like Christ who now lives for the glory of God, we can focus on living for God. God's great plan was to liberate us from sin's ruling power. Thus our perspectives, attitudes, relationships, and desires will change, in light of the incredible events that have taken place on our behalf—death to sin and the ability to come to God and live for him.

6:11 If we have identified with Christ, what is true for him can be true for us. This identification starts in our minds by an act of mental reckoning or accounting. We can consider ourselves dead to sin. In other words, just as a dead body cannot respond to temptations or enticements, neither can we respond to them. Thus we are able to live for the glory of God through Christ Jesus because we have been given new life, a new lifestyle, and the sure promise of eternal life (see also Ephesians 2:5; Colossians 2:13).

6:12 If we are dead to sin, how can sin still control us? We have died to sin, but we are constantly being freed from sin. When sin is in control, people have no choice but to give in to its lustful desires because they are its slaves (6:6). Believers have died to sin, but as long as we live in our mortal bodies, we will have the compulsion to sin. But only because we have died to sin do we have the power to no longer let it control us. We are, in fact, free from our slavery. But each day we must reject our old slave ways.

6:13 While we are in our bodies, there will always be the chance that some actions will be sinful or used as a tool to distort our relationship with God or with others. Because our bodies are mortal (decaying and dying), we should not yield to sinful desires and temptations. Why yield to a decaying master? Why offer the parts of our bodies to sin, something to which we have died? Instead, Paul tells believers, give yourselves completely to God and use your whole body as a tool to do what is right. We have a choice. We have been given new life by God; thus, our bodies are to be given to him to use for promoting righteousness. We are to refuse sin and instead be wholly committed to living for God. We make these choices moment by moment.

6:14 Sin cannot and will not ever again be our master because we are no longer subject to the law. What does it mean that we are not under the law?

- We are not under the law's demands, as were the people of the Old Testament.
- We are not under curse implied by the impossible standard of the law (see Galatians 3:10-14).
- We are not under its system of requirements, the ceremonial laws that had to be meticulously kept.
- We are not under the fear of failing the just standard of the law.

If believers were still under the law, then the sin would have to be master. By itself, the law produces both the proof and the acute awareness of sin but cannot direct or motivate a person to do what is right. Instead, believers are free by God's grace because only grace can overcome sin. Only by living in that grace can we defeat the power of sin in our lives. When our lives are under the law alone, sin is our master. But when we live under grace, our master is God.

FREEDOM TO OBEY GOD / 6:15-23

Paul begins this section in almost the same way as the last one. He wants to make sure there is no misunderstanding of the nature of grace. It is not the chance to do anything we want. Rather, it is the opportunity to live the way God wants us to live. Ultimately, there are only two masters: sin and the Lord Jesus Christ. The choice is clear and required. The only rightful master is our Creator!

6:15 Paul's wording in verse 14—that seems to set the law against grace—probably surprised his readers. It would look as though Paul was replacing the law with grace, thus giving people no law and, therefore, freedom to sin. This almost repeats the question in verse 1, and Paul's response is the same: Of course not! As the argument develops, however, there is clearly a different matter at stake. In verse 1, Paul was challenging the crude assumption that sinning will give God the opportunity to exercise more grace. Here, Paul is guarding against the assumption that because sin is no longer our master, we can indulge in sin without fear of being controlled by it. Being under grace and under the mastery of Christ allows us the freedom not to sin. Any attitude that welcomes, rationalizes, or excuses sin is not grace, but slavery to sin itself.

6:16 All human beings are enslaved. While this idea clashes with our goal of independence, the fact is that we were created for interdependence. Paul is using an “illustration” (6:19) to make an important spiritual point: You are a slave to whomever or whatever you commit yourself to obey. This means that friendships, goals, employment, citizenship, membership, education, career, debt, and marriage all include aspects of slavery. We should choose our slavery wisely. When sin is our master, we have no power except to do what it bids us, with the end being death. But when we choose to obey God, the one who created us, we become slaves to obedience and will receive God’s approval.

There are only two choices and no middle ground. This is as Jesus said, “No one can serve two masters” (Matthew 6:24). To refuse to allow God to be master over your life is to choose slavery to sin. While service to sin leaves us powerless and leads to death, service to God leads to righteousness and eternal life.

6:17 Before accepting the salvation offered through Christ, all believers were slaves of sin. But now they have a new master because they have obeyed the new teaching from God, referring to the Good News of salvation (see 1 Corinthians 11:2; 2 Thessalonians 2:15; 3:6). This message abolished the slavery to sin that they had lived under, and it outlined a new way of living—under grace.

6:18 It is impossible to be neutral. Every person has a master—either righteousness or sin. A Christian is still able to sin, but he or she is no longer a slave to sin. This person belongs to God. Believers are set free from the control of their evil desires and their selfish habits, free to become enslaved to righteous living. We serve the righteous God who is in the process of transforming us to become more like him so that we can one day share in glorious resurrection to eternal life. That’s not a bad master to have!

6:19 Paul emphasizes that he is using an illustration in case any of his readers fail to understand his meaning. Anyone living in Rome knew about slaves and masters. There were more slaves than citizens in the empire. When people are slaves of impurity and lawlessness, they are held in bondage to a master who seeks their destruction. But to choose to be slaves of righteousness is very different. God does not keep us in his service against our will—rather, we desire to please him in everything we do. Then we are becoming holy, referring to the progressive goal of salvation, our growth into persons who exhibit more and more of the character of Christ in the way we live.

6:20-21 The freedom that people experience when they are slaves of sin is the antithesis of genuine freedom. It is such a distortion of the meaning of liberty that it causes people to be glad that they are not concerned with doing what is right. That is ultimately the worst kind of slavery. And the result is that people end up shamed of the things they used to do. Paul was teaching the Roman Christians that it was appropriate for them to feel ashamed of their pre-Christian actions, and Paul was encouraging them to seek the benefits of high moral living now that they served Christ.

6:22 The benefits are immeasurable for those who are slaves of God and set free from the power of sin. Faith makes us righteous in God's eyes and challenges us to realize that righteousness in practical living—doing those things that lead to holiness and eternal life. Holiness is gained as a process over our entire life wherein we become more Christlike and set apart for his service; eternal life begins at conversion and, despite the physical death we will inevitably face, continues beyond the grave.

6:23 This result of sin is not just physical death—everyone dies physically, believers and nonbelievers alike. This refers to eternal separation from God in hell. This is the wage that a person receives for his or her rebellion against God. Those in hell will find no comfort in the truth that they have been paid exactly what they earned.

But instead of wages, those who believe receive a free gift from God—eternal life. Eternal life does not mean endless life on earth, but resurrection from death to eternal glory with God. Because eternal life is a gift, we cannot earn or purchase it. It would be foolish for someone to offer to pay for a gift given out of love. To be a gift, it must be given and received freely. A more appropriate response to a loved one who offers a gift is grateful acceptance. Our salvation is a gift of God, not something of our own doing (Ephesians 2:8-9). He saved us because of his mercy, not because of any righteous acts on our part (Titus 3:5). How much more we should accept with thanksgiving the gift that God has freely given to us.

ROMANS 7

NO LONGER BOUND TO THE LAW / 7:1-6

In chapter 6, Paul explained how Christ delivered us from sin: when he died, we also “died” to sin. But while we are alive in our bodies, we must continue to deal with our sin nature and its attempts to control our thoughts and actions. To describe this tension between our old and new natures, Paul used the analogy of slavery to sin versus slavery to God. He begins chapter 7 by arguing the same point, using the analogy of marriage: Just as death breaks the marital vow, so death with Christ breaks our “marriage” to sin. We were bound to sin because we failed to keep the law. The problem is not with the law; it is within us.

7:1 Obviously, the law can only apply to a person who is still living—a dead body cannot be expected to follow any laws, nor can it make restitution for sins committed. Paul’s rhetorical question creates a chilling afterthought. Death brings an end to the authority of the law, but what remains is judgment. Death removes a person from the frying pan of the law, but then drops him or her into the fire of judgment. But if a person can get out from under the authority of the law without coming under the judgment of law, that would be good news!

7:2-3 The marriage vows bind a woman to her husband while he lives. If he dies, however, she is free from her vows to him. However, if a wife leaves her husband for another man, she is committing adultery. If this woman is widowed, she is free from that law to marry another man and does not commit adultery.

Again, Paul was developing an analogy from common living to emphasize his lesson. Having begun the theme of marriage, Paul wants his readers to remember that under normal circumstances any breaking of the marriage vows would be adultery. Having stated that fact, Paul explains its significance.

7:4 Just as death breaks the bond between a husband and wife, so a believer’s “death” (death to his old self) breaks the power of the law. The old contractual arrangement had to be completely severed before the new one could begin. This had to be as final as death. Jewish believers could not live with a dual allegiance. They could not be under the lordship of Christ and the lordship of the law. Total commitment to Christ cannot coexist with a total commitment to the law. That would be spiritual adultery. A believer belongs fully to Christ. This happens because of Christ’s death on the cross and the believer’s being united with him in his death and resurrection. The result is good fruit. Only by belonging to Christ can we do good deeds and live a life pleasing to God. This is how we serve in the new way of the Spirit (7:6). (See also Galatians 5:22-23; Philippians 1:11.)

7:5 Paul reminds his readers that the law did little more for them than fuel their evil desires, referring to the human tendency to be dominated by desire and sin (see 8:7; Galatians 3:3; 5:24). They were controlled by their old nature. The only fruit produced by a life that is under the law are sinful deeds and death. The law restrains us and teaches us God's will, but it also reveals and stimulates our sinful nature. At the same time it identifies sin, it also generates sin.

7:6 This statement anticipates the spiritual solution to the problems Paul will address in this chapter. Because we have been released from the law, we no longer have to serve in the old way by obeying the letter of the law. In other words, the law is not erased, but it is no longer to be obeyed on the superficial level of "works" (the way of obedience familiar to the Jews). Nor are we freed from all responsibility to serve. God still desires our moral obedience, but we are to serve Christ by focusing on his desires, not on a list of commands. We have been released so that we can serve in the new way, by the Spirit living within us, guiding us, and showing us how to please God. We are still called to serve, but our master is gracious, and we are no longer trapped by the cycle of effort, failure, and guilt.

GOD'S LAW REVEALS OUR SIN / 7:7-13

But where does the law fit into all this? In this section, Paul shows that the law is powerless to save sinners (7:7-14) and lawkeepers (7:15-22). Even a person with a new nature (7:23-25) experiences ongoing evidence of the law's inability to motivate him or her toward good. The sinner is condemned by the law; the lawkeeper can't live up to it; and the person with the new nature finds that his or her obedience to the law is sabotaged by the effects of the old nature. Once again, Paul declares that salvation cannot be found by obeying the law. No matter who we are, only Jesus Christ can set us free. Yet the law, because it is God's law, is not then cast aside as useless. In the next chapters, Paul grapples with the complexity of life under grace and the believer's relationship to God's law.

7:7-8 Because the law arouses evil desires (7:5) and because we have been released from the law (7:6), does that mean the law of God is evil? Paul again answers his own question, Of course not! The law itself is not evil, but it does tell us what evil is. Paul uses coveting (Exodus 20:17; Deuteronomy 5:21) as an example—I would never have known that coveting is wrong if the law had not said, “Do not covet.”

Paul deliberately chose the last commandment as an example. That particular commandment was unique among the laws in the Decalogue, and it obviously had a significant effect on Paul himself. The tenth commandment focuses entirely on our inward nature. At a superficial level, we may claim to have lived up to the first nine, but the last commandment exposes our intentions with shameful clarity. Paul claims that no sooner had he discovered that commandment than it aroused all kinds of forbidden desires within him. In telling him not to covet, the law had introduced Paul to the darkest desires. But still Paul could maintain his firm belief that God’s law itself was sinless. The bright light that revealed a world of filth was not itself evil for having done so. Without the law, sin goes unnoticed, unknown. Some sins may not even present a problem until they are prohibited.

7:9-10 Before we realize the seriousness of the law and of sin, we believe ourselves to be fine. But when we understand what the law really demands, then we also come to understand that we have broken the law, we are sinners, and we are doomed to die eternally. The commands, given to show people the way of life, instead show merely that all people have been given the death penalty.

7:11 Sin fooled people by misusing the law. It is filled with false promises and deceptions:

- Sin promises to satisfy our desires even more than the last time.
- Sin promises that our actions can be kept hidden, so no one will know.
- Sin promises that we won’t have to worry about consequences.
- Sin promises special benefits: wisdom, knowledge, and sophistication.
- Sin promises power and prestige in exchange for cooperation.

In the Garden of Eden (see Genesis 3), the serpent deceived Eve by taking her focus off the freedom she had and putting it on the one restriction God had given. Since that time we have all been rebels.

7:12 Although it gave him the death penalty, Paul could not speak against the law. The law itself is holy and right and good because it reflects the character and will of God himself, who is holy. The commandments define sin but are not sin (7:7). The purpose of the law is to teach us right from wrong, to give us guidelines, and to show sin for what it is. The law helps us live for God, but it cannot save us.

If the law causes so much difficulty, what useful purpose does it serve? (1) It is a revelation of the nature, character, and will of God. (2) Its ethical components were incorporated in Christ's teaching. (3) It teaches us about sin. (4) It demolishes self-righteousness.

7:13 Paul asks, “Did the law, which is good, cause my doom?” Again he answers his own question, Of course not! The law was given by God; it tells us what God desires of us, and it is good. It is sin, not the law, that brings death, and it is only through the law that we can see how terrible sin really is. Sin uses God's good commandments to continue to produce death in people because people cannot keep the law in their own strength. But, by using the commandments as instruments of death, sin reveals itself in all its ugliness.

STRUGGLING WITH SIN / 7:14-25

Paul's intense desire to view the law with high esteem helped fuel his next thoughts. He made every effort to clarify the tension between the holy law and the sin that uses the law for its deadly purposes. The law comes from God, has his character, and tells his will for his people. But as the majesty of the law fills Paul's mind, along with it comes the vision of his own standing before the law. Paul wants to make the point that sin does not besmirch the law. But he also realizes that he must clarify his own ongoing relationship to the law.

7:14 How can we be free from sin and yet continue to do wrong? In Christ, we are free from the penalty of sin (judgment) and the power of sin (hopelessness). But while still in the flesh, we are not free from the presence of sin (temptations) and the possibility of sin (failures). Paul never claimed that being under grace instead of under the law meant that a believer was somehow above the law. In fact, having described such a great distance between the law and sin, he realized that he was still far more acquainted with the reality of sin than the righteous standard of the law.

So, Paul writes, the trouble is not with the law but with me, because I am sold into slavery, with sin as my master. The law has an uncanny capacity for reminding us of what we once were, and of how captivating that old life can still appear. Our hope never shifts back to the law. We must daily focus on Christ.

7:15 By introducing his personal dilemma, Paul invites us to consider how well we understand our own behavior. As long as believers live in this world as men and women of flesh and blood, they will face a constant tension—the conflict between their sinful nature and their new spiritual life. Paul wrote to the Galatians, “The old sinful nature loves to do evil, which is just opposite from what the Holy Spirit wants. And the Spirit gives us desires that are opposite from what the sinful nature desires. These two forces are constantly fighting each other, and your choices are never free from this conflict” (Galatians 5:17).

Paul shares three lessons that he learned in trying to deal with his old sinful desires. (1) Knowledge of the law is not the answer (7:9). (2) Self-determination (to want to do what is right) doesn’t succeed (7:15). (3) Becoming a Christian does not stamp out all sin and temptation from a person’s life (7:22-25).

Being born again starts in a moment of faith, but becoming like Christ takes a lifetime. Paul compares Christian growth to a strenuous race or fight (1 Corinthians 9:24-27; 2 Timothy 4:7). Thus, as Paul has been emphasizing since the beginning of this letter, no one in the world is innocent; no one deserves to be saved—not the pagan who doesn’t know God’s laws, nor the Christian or Jew who knows them and tries to keep them. All of us must depend totally on the work of Christ for our salvation. We cannot earn it by our good behavior.

7:16-17 We want to obey God’s law, yet we still fail. Our failure is not the law’s fault, nor is it our own fault: It is sin inside me that makes me do these evil things. If sin did not exist, then the law would give us guidelines for living perfectly. But sin perverts everything. Paul is not abdicating responsibility for his sin; instead, he is making the point that his desires and the sin within him are in constant conflict. Sin is a power that, at times, can still win because his redemption is not yet complete.

7:18-20 In our sinful nature, there is nothing good. Paul sees this as part of being human. Although we belong to Christ and have died to sin, we still live in a sinful world and have a sinful nature that is rotten through and through. The tension continues—trying to do good and not being able to do it. Paul describes the person who knows what is good and might even desire to do it, but this person lacks the power. Believers still have a sinful nature that pulls them to do what they don’t want to do. The seeming contradiction of “I do—I don’t do” emphasizes how difficult it is to identify the sources of our sinful behaviors. Without the Holy Spirit’s help, the person is dominated by the power of sin and continues to do evil when he actually desires to do good.

7:21 The fact of life at work here is the reality that evil is within us, even when we want to do what is right. In fact, it is when we most want to do good that we become most acutely aware of our propensity not to do so. A swimmer has no idea how strong the current is until she tries to swim upstream. When she faces the current, she finds this law at work: the current is against her.

7:22-23 Believers love God's law (referring to the path of obedience to God that the entire Old Testament presents) because they long to know it and do it and thus to please God. This is one of the marks of wisdom (Psalm 1:2). The problem is that there is another law at work within. That other law is the law of sin. Sin is constantly at war because it will not give up the control over us that it lost when we came to faith in Christ. Sin fights against our mind because our mind is where we make our decisions and our moral judgments. We cannot resist our sin nature in our own power. When we try, we will be defeated.

Paul does not say that these powers are equal, but he knows they are both there. We must realize the same. One power must be resisted while relying on the other. When we fail to rely on Christ's strength for our daily strength, we in essence provide sin with more power over us. Sin's power will not have grown, but our relative weakness will make it seem that way. Sin's power is not an excuse for us to drift spiritually, or openly give in to temptation. Believers must not forget that they have already won because the Spirit within is greater than the spirit in the world (1 John 4:4).

7:24 Our bodies are mortal; they are bodies of death. As long as we live on this earth in our human bodies, we will face this conflict with sin. Our place of residence is our place of least resistance. And, as seen above, as long as we are confined to this world, we will experience a measure of struggle and defeat. But, we are not left in miserable defeat, dominated by sin—rescue will come!

7:25 The triumph is sweeter because the struggle is real. In the last few verses, we have glimpsed the struggle of a genuine believer. Now the answer is shouted in exclamation.

Many who claim to know Christ never see themselves well enough to appreciate as deeply as Paul did what they actually have in Christ. Because of Jesus Christ, we are assured of a great future. We will one day join him in eternity with a new body that is free from sin. In the meantime, however, we must realize that we remain in the sinful nature as slaves to sin. But the answer to who will set us free is in Jesus Christ our Lord. The battle ends with a shout of victory. The winners know who really won. The winners also know the war isn't over. But in the meantime, there are more lessons to learn, and there is more freedom to experience.

ROMANS 8

LIFE IN THE SPIRIT / 8:1-17

At the end of chapter 7, Paul assures all believers of having power to overcome sin and the assurance of final deliverance from this evil world. But he includes the reminder that during this lifetime, there will be constant tension because in the sinful nature, even a believer is “a slave to sin” (7:25). The question arises, So, are we to spend our entire lives defeated by sin? The answer is a resounding no! In this chapter, Paul describes the life of victory and hope that every believer has because of Christ Jesus.

8:1 We feel condemned because Satan uses past guilt and present failures to make us question what Christ has done for us. Our assurance must be focused on Christ, not our performance. No matter how we may feel, there is no condemnation for those who belong to Christ Jesus. Because we have been rescued by Christ (7:24-25), we are not condemned. To belong to Christ Jesus means to have put our faith in him, becoming a member of his body of believers. Jesus said, “I assure you, those who listen to my message and believe in God who sent me have eternal life. They will never be condemned for their sins, but they have already passed from death into life” (John 5:24).

8:2 The life-giving Spirit is the Holy Spirit, who was present at the creation of the world as one of the agents in the origin of life itself (Genesis 1:2). He is the power behind the rebirth of every Christian, and the one who helps us live the Christian life. The Holy Spirit sets us free, once and for all, from the power of sin and its natural consequence, death. How did this happen?

8:3 Freedom over sin never can be obtained by obedience to the law. The law of Moses could not save us, because of our sinful nature. But what the law can't do, God did by sending his own Son in a human body like ours, except that ours are sinful. Jesus was completely human (John 1:14), with the same desires that yield to sin, yet he never sinned (see 2 Corinthians 5:21; Hebrews 2:17-18; 4:14-16). Christ took on humanity in order to be a sacrifice for our sins. Because Christ was sinless, his death passed the “death sentence” on sin for all of us, destroying sin's control over us.

In Old Testament times, animal sacrifices were continually offered at the temple. These animals brought to the altar had two important characteristics: they were alive, and they were without flaw. The sacrifices showed the Israelites the seriousness of sin: innocent blood had to be shed before sins could be pardoned (see Leviticus 17:11). But animal blood could not really remove sin (Hebrews 10:4); and the forgiveness provided by those sacrifices, in legal terms, was more like a stay of execution than a pardon. Those animal sacrifices could only point to Jesus' sacrifice that paid the penalty for all sin. Jesus' life was identical with ours, yet unstained by sin. So he could serve as the flawless sacrifice for our sins. In him, our pardon is complete. The tables are turned so that not only is there "no condemnation for those who belong to Christ Jesus," but also the very sin that guaranteed our condemnation is itself condemned by Christ's sacrifice.

8:4 The requirement of the law is holiness (see Leviticus 11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7); but the law is powerless to make us holy because of our innate sinfulness. Only through Christ's death and the resulting freedom from sin can we no longer follow our sinful nature but instead follow the Spirit and thus fulfill the righteous requirements of the law. The Holy Spirit is the one who helps us become holy. The Holy Spirit provides the power internally to help us do what the law required of us externally.

It is the Spirit who produces "fruit" in us; only in this way can we fulfill the requirements of the law. But Paul has already made it clear that the law is powerless to save. So why do its requirements still need to be met? The law is God's law and was never meant to be cast aside. Paul makes a distinction between two kinds of obedience to the law. He speaks against the obedience to the law that stays merely at the level of the flesh (such as being circumcised because the law required it) and the obedience that depends on God's Holy Spirit. Only the latter fulfills the law. When we live according to the Spirit, we actually do meet the requirements of the law.

8:5 We will struggle constantly with sin and its temptations until the resurrection. People who decide to follow their sinful nature will be dominated by it and think about sinful things. But believers do not need to live in sin because they can now live controlled by the Holy Spirit, so they can think about things that please the Spirit. We must follow Christ daily in every area of our life, in our choices and moral decisions. Will you follow your former sinful nature or the Spirit's leading?

8:6 The mind refers to our mind-set, our goals. Choosing to let the sinful nature be in control will result in death, both spiritual and physical. Choosing to let the Holy Spirit control our minds will bring us full life on earth, eternal life, and peace with God. Elsewhere in Scripture we find the characteristics of a mind under the Spirit's control. It will be a mind directed toward truth, aware of the Spirit's presence (John 14:17). It will be a mind seeking to please the Holy Spirit (Galatians 6:8). It will be a mind active in memorizing and meditating on the words of Christ (John 14:26). It will be a mind sensitive to sin (John 16:7-11). It will be a mind eager to follow the Spirit's guidance (Galatians 5:16-22). The control of the Holy Spirit begins with voluntary commitment and submission to Christ.

8:7-8 The sinful nature cannot submit to God because it is the seat of indwelling sin and is always hostile to God. Living in sin, following one's own desires, and disregarding God boils down to hostility to him. Every person not united to Christ is thoroughly controlled by sin's power. Thus, those who are still under the control of their sinful nature can never please God because they are interested only in themselves and have cast aside the one and only power that can defeat sin. The mind directed by the sinful nature can only be devoted to its own self-gratification, which will lead to destruction.

Every human being has a sinful nature. But believers in Christ have access to the Holy Spirit. In fact, Paul says, "The Spirit of God lives in you" (8:9). Believers are still in the flesh, but because they are born again, they also have God's Spirit. The question is which will be in control.

8:9-11 In contrast to those still controlled by the sinful nature, believers are not controlled by our sinful nature when we have yielded control to the Spirit of God. To not have the Spirit of Christ means to not be a Christian. Christ's Spirit lives within our human spirits, but our fleshly bodies are still infected by sin and will die. Sin has been defeated by Christ, but sin and death still claim their hold on our mortal bodies. Yet in these bodies we are alive spiritually and can live by the Spirit's guidance. In addition, we are promised the physical resurrection of our bodies into eternal life. The Spirit of God who raised Jesus from the dead will also give life to us. So there is wonderful hope even for our prone-to-decay bodies.

8:12 Because of all that Christ has done and is going to do for us, we are under no obligation whatsoever to do what the sinful nature urges us to do. We are to refuse the drives and desires of our still attractive but crucified sinful nature, to say no to ungodliness and worldly passions. The old, sinful nature may present its demands, based upon the past, but we have no obligation to cooperate.

8:13-14 Our sinful nature shows itself through the vehicle of the body. Therefore, we must turn from following the sinful nature and its evil deeds, the practices and habitual responses of the sinful nature. This is an action to be done, a moral decision to be made—every day we are to turn away from the desires that draw us away from God. The Jews already considered themselves to be children of God because of their heritage; but Paul explains that the term has new meaning. True children of God are those who are led by the Spirit of God as evidenced in their lifestyle. Believers not only have the Spirit (8:9); they are also led by the Spirit.

8:15-16 This slavery to fear most likely refers to life under the law, obedience that was concerned for scrupulous exactness with a constant fear of failure. Paul implies that believers are not to be like slaves who cower in fear before their master. Instead, we are adopted children who can call God our Father. We can know this is true because the Holy Spirit within tells us it is so. The Holy Spirit not only adopts us as God's children, but he also assures us of our family status (see Galatians 4:6). The Spirit within changes our obedience to God from slavery to a relationship where God is both our Master and our loving Father. The Scriptures indicate that believers can expect inward confirmation of the faith by the Spirit. Our very capacity and desire to approach God as our Father is itself evidence of the Spirit's witness with our spirit that we are children of God. We are motivated by the Spirit.

8:17 The Jews were convinced that they were the Lord's inheritance, and that as such they would inherit the Promised Land. Paul explains that God's promise includes all who believe in Christ—both Jews and Gentiles. Because we are God's children, we are his heirs and will share his treasures. The Jews thought this was to be the Promised Land—instead, it is another “land,” God's Kingdom.

We are God's children only because of Christ's suffering on our behalf. As believers, therefore, if we are to share his glory, we must also share his suffering. We will enjoy our future inheritance if our relationship with Christ is genuine enough so that we will face suffering for his sake.

THE FUTURE GLORY / 8:18-30

The preceding paragraph ended with the shared connection between suffering and glory. Sharing in the glory of Christ will come only after sharing in his sufferings (8:17). For Paul, this matter of glory has cosmic proportions, for the glorious destiny of believers will signal a new day for all of creation. He wants his readers to realize that sin has imprisoned all people and the entire environment. We must wait for God's timing to be free, depending on the Spirit, who helps us in ways we can hardly describe.

8:18 In verse 17, Paul stated that believers will share in Christ's sufferings. He completes that thought with this verse, concluding that the sufferings we now face are nothing compared to the glory he will give us later. The present suffering is temporary, while the future glory is eternal. Paul had written to the Corinthians, "For our present troubles are quite small and won't last very long. Yet they produce for us an immeasurably great glory that will last forever!" (2 Corinthians 4:17). Suffering is part of the process of sharing in Christ's death; it will culminate in sharing his glory.

8:19 Human beings and the rest of creation presently face suffering, and both will be glorified in the future. When Adam sinned, God sentenced all of creation (Genesis 3:17). Since then, the world has suffered decay and pollution, largely because people have forgotten or ignored their responsibilities as stewards of the earth. The created order functions in spite of its flaws. But diseases, deformities, and suffering constantly remind us that all is not right with us or with the world. All creation is waiting eagerly for that future day when God will reveal who his children really are. This will occur at the second coming of Christ when he returns for his people. The entire universe is looking forward to the conclusion of God's plan.

8:20-21 When Adam sinned, everything on earth was subjected to God's curse; that is, to futility, change, and decay. Creation is cursed because it is unable to attain the purposes for which it was made. The perfect order in the world was marred by sin; therefore, fallen people had to live in a fallen world. Yet all creation anticipates the day when it will join God's children in glorious freedom from death and decay. Revelation 22 describes the future removal of the curse from the earth.

Adam and Eve were the first polluters of the environment when they sinned. Their act of rebellion affected the entire world. It has taken many centuries to realize the interrelatedness of this global village, but the Bible begins with that assumption. Having the same Creator links us with the rest of the created order. But as much as we do personally and corporately to clean up and care for the environment, we must realize that creation will require the same kind of transformation that we require in order to be set straight again.

8:22-23 Paul pictures the fallen creation as groaning as in the pains of childbirth. Consider earthquakes, floods, fire, drought, famine—these are surely not what creation was meant to be, but sin and evil now rule. Just as the pains of childbirth end at the birth of the child, so the groaning and pain of the creation will end at the birth of the new earth. Creation groans and longs for its release and transformation into the new heaven and new earth. We Christians also groan to be released from pain and suffering, longing for our own release from the cycle of sin and decay (8:23). We long for redemption when God will give us our full rights as his children, including the new bodies he has promised us. In this process we are not alone, for the Holy Spirit groans with us, expressing our unutterable longing to God and giving us a foretaste of future glory. But until the time of our release and redemption, we must groan, wait, and hope.

8:24-25 When we put our faith in Christ as Savior, we are saved and we can eagerly look forward to the freedom we will have at Christ's return. We already have the presence of the Holy Spirit, who is unseen, but we must eagerly wait for our new bodies, which are also unseen. Our full redemption has not yet happened; it will happen when Christ returns. That is why it is still a hope for believers. Our salvation is both present and future. It is present because the moment we believe in Jesus Christ as Savior we are saved (3:21-26; 5:1-11; 6:1-11, 22-23); our new life (eternal life) begins. But at the same time, we have not fully received all the benefits and blessings of salvation that will be ours when Christ's new Kingdom is completely established. While we can be confident of our salvation, we still look forward with hope and trust toward that complete change of body and personality that lies beyond this life.

Waiting for things patiently is a quality that must be developed in us (see Romans 5:3-4; James 1:3-4; 5:11; Revelation 13:10; 14:12). Patience is one of the Spirit's fruit borne in our lives. It includes fortitude, endurance, and the ability to bear up under pressure in order to attain a desired goal.

8:26 In the same way that our "hope" gives us fortitude, the Holy Spirit helps us in our distress. At times, our weakness is so intense that we don't even know what we should pray for, nor how we should pray. At those times, the Spirit voices our requests for us. He intercedes by appealing to the only one who can help us, God himself. We may not know the right words to say, but the Holy Spirit does. His groanings to God become effective intercession on our behalf.

The companionship of the Spirit in prayer is one of the themes of this chapter. Here, the Spirit literally "joins in to help" us, expressing for us what we can't fully express for ourselves. How should we pray?

- Utilize all the forms prayer takes: adoration, confession, petition, thanksgiving, and meditation. As we pray, we should trust the Spirit to make perfect what is imperfect.
- Listen during prayer. We should ask the Spirit to search our hearts and minds, and then we should be silent.
- Practice prayer as a habit.
- Combine prayer with other regular spiritual disciplines (see Philippians 4:4-8).
- Confess sins that the Spirit points out.

8:27 The Father knows all hearts and he knows what the Spirit is saying (see 8:26). God can look deep, past our inarticulate groanings, to understand the need we face, our hidden feelings. Even when we don't know the right words to pray, the Holy Spirit prays with and for us, always in harmony with God's own will. With God helping us pray, we don't need to be afraid to come before him.

8:28 Because the Spirit's efforts on our behalf are carried out in full agreement with God's will, everything that happens to us in this life is directed toward that goal. What happens may not itself be "good," but God will cause everything to work together for the ultimate good of his children, to meet his ultimate purpose for their maturity. The point is, God works all things for good, not "all things work out." Suffering will still bring pain, loss, and sorrow, and sin will bring shame. But under God's control, the eventual outcome will be for our good.

God works behind the scenes, ensuring that even in the middle of mistakes and tragedies, good will result for those who love him. At times this will happen quickly, often enough to help us trust the principle. But there will also be events whose results for good we will not know until eternity. Our ultimate destiny is to be like Christ. God's design is more than just an invitation; God summons us with a purpose in mind: we are to be like Christ and share his glory.

8:29-30 Believers are those people whom God knew in advance. God's foreknowledge refers to his intimate knowledge of us and our relationship with him based on his choosing us. God chose believers to reach a particular goal: to become like his Son. When all believers are conformed to Christ's likeness, the resurrected Christ will be the firstborn of a new race of humans, who are purified from sin. Because we are God's children, we are Christ's brothers and sisters.

What does it mean to be chosen? What keeps foreknowledge and predestination from being determinism? How can belief in predestination avoid leading someone to despair over the futility of any human choice? God's foreknowledge does not imply determinism—the idea that all our choices are predetermined. Since God is not limited by time as we are, he “sees” past, present, and future at the same time. Parents sometimes “know” how their children will behave before the fact. We don't conclude from these parents' foreknowledge that they made their children act that way. God's foreknowledge, insofar as we can understand it, means that God knows who will accept the offer of salvation. The plan of predestination begins when we trust Christ and comes to its conclusion when we become fully like him. Receiving an airline ticket to Chicago means we have been predestined to arrive in Chicago.

To explain foreknowledge and predestination in any way that implies that every action and choice we make has been not only preknown, but even predetermined, seems to contradict those Scriptures that declare that our choices are real, that they matter, and that there are consequences to the choices we make. What is clear is that God's purpose for human beings was not an afterthought; it was settled before the foundation of the world. Humankind is to serve and honor God. If we have trusted Christ as Savior, we can rejoice that God has always known us. His love is eternal. His wisdom and power are supreme. He will guide and protect us until we one day stand in his presence.

God's plan for the salvation of those who believe in Christ has three steps: chosen, called, and glorified. When we are finally conformed to the image of Christ, we will share his glory.

NOTHING CAN SEPARATE US FROM GOD'S LOVE / 8:31-39

Alongside the theme of glory in the Christian life is the theme of victory. We get to be on the winning side, though our contribution is almost insignificant. We are protected by a God whose love cannot be measured and from which, as Paul will eloquently explain, absolutely nothing can separate us. Paul's questions fall into three categories: (1) Will opposition from people or Satan be too great (8:31-32)? (2) Will we fail because of our tendency to sin (8:33-34)? (3) Will we be overcome by difficult times (8:35-39)?

8:31-32 Satan and those under his power are against us, but in the end, God promises the victory. How much is God for us? So much that he did not spare even his own Son but gave him up for us all. The word for “spare” is the same word for “withheld,” used in Genesis 22:12, when God said to Abraham, You have not withheld even your beloved son from me.

Our major struggle with prayer is not that God doesn't answer. What upsets us is that he seldom answers in line with our plans or schedule. At those times we may think that God is intentionally withholding something from us. But God has already given us the greatest gift of all. Remembering God's gift will help us see that God is working for our good even when we can't immediately see it. God sacrificed his Son to save us; will he now invalidate that sacrifice by refusing to help and guide believers? No, instead, he promises to give us everything else to bring us to the ultimate goal—our sanctification and glorification.

8:33-34 If God did not withhold his Son, and if God will give us everything to make us complete, will God then accuse us? Paul's emphatic answer is no! God is the one who has given us right standing with himself, and he is also the Judge who has already declared us "not guilty." So who then will condemn us? Will it be Jesus—for we surely have offended him. But no, it won't be him for he is the one who died for us. To condemn us would then make his death of no value. Jesus would not condemn those for whom he died. Instead, Jesus, who was raised to life for us is at God's side pleading for us in heaven (see also Psalm 110:1; Mark 12:35-37; Hebrews 4:14-16). The Spirit intercedes for us (8:27) and Christ intercedes for us. How much more advocacy do we need?

8:35 The next questions help seal our assurance in God. Nothing can separate us from Christ's love for us. Then Paul lists several situations we might think could come between us and God. Paul knew from experience that these could not separate believers from God—he had already experienced them (see 2 Corinthians 11:23-28). This means that the love of Christ doesn't separate us from these experiences, but that even in the most devastating of these, the love of Christ is with us.

8:36 Paul quotes from Psalm 44:22 to remind the believers that people who trust in God must expect to face persecution, even death. In that psalm, the poets made the specific point that difficulties and suffering were coming to people who had been faithful. Believers who suffer are the rule, not the exception.

8:37 No, instead of being separated from Christ through all these things (the trials and hardships mentioned in 8:35), we have overwhelming victory. This does not mean that we will be superheroes, but that our victory will be intensified by virtue of our union with Christ.

8:38-39 Yes, we are secure in Christ—Paul was convinced of this, and so should we be. Nothing can ever separate us from God's love for us (8:39). In both death and the trials of life in this evil world, we will be in God's presence. No spiritual forces, such as angels or demons, are powerful enough to undo what God has done for us. Nothing in the sphere of time itself (fears and worries) can threaten us; nothing that can happen in the present and nothing that can happen in the future, such as persecution and hardship, would cause God to leave us. No powers that exist (Satan, human governments, etc.) are more powerful than God; they can have no effect on our relationship with him. Nothing in space, from high above or in the deepest ocean, can take us away from God's love. Nothing in all creation can take us away from God's love or thwart his purposes for us.

Paul's point is simple and compelling: once in his care, it is impossible to be separated from Christ. His death for us is proof of his unconquerable love. Nothing can stop his constant presence with us. God tells us how great his love is so that we will feel totally secure in him.

ROMANS 9:1–10:4

GOD'S SELECTION OF ISRAEL / 9:1-29

The end of chapter 8 marks the conclusion of the first major section of Romans. Paul has discussed the doctrines of our being made right with God and our ultimate future. But before Paul moves on to address practical concerns of local church life (in chapters 12–15), he feels compelled to speak about God's plan for the Gentiles and the Jews, Paul's very own people.

9:1-3 The words Paul writes bear the truth—he did not lie as his conscience and the Holy Spirit confirm. Paul reveals his depth of feeling here; as the apostle to the Gentiles, with his great zeal for preaching to the Gentiles, he was probably often accused of turning his back on his own people. Though his commission to preach the gospel took him outside Jewish boundaries, Paul never lost his love for his Jewish brothers and sisters. Paul's sorrow was so intense that he was willing to be cursed and cut off from Christ if, by doing so, the Jews would be saved. For his people's sake, Paul would have borne the curse himself if it would have ensured their salvation. Of course, he knew it would be impossible for God to curse him, but his expression shows the intensity of his affection for his people.

9:4-5 Paul lists the benefits of being a Jew. They were God's chosen nation. As such, they had witnessed his glory, received his covenants and his law, worshiped him, and received his promises. The ancestors had been great people of God and Christ himself was a Jew in fulfillment of all the promises. Christ was more than just a Jew, however, he is God, who rules over everything and is worthy of eternal praise. This was where the Jews got hung up.

9:6 The Jewish nation as a whole did not respond to the gospel, even though God's gifts had made them better prepared than any other nation to receive Christ. On the surface, it might seem that God has failed to fulfill his promise to the Jews. But that is not the case: Human beings failed. Earlier in this letter, Paul clarified that not everyone born into a Jewish family is truly a Jew—that is, not all Jews are part of spiritual Israel (see 2:28-29; 11:5-6; Galatians 3:7-9). Israel's history demonstrates that God was fulfilling his promises, apart from human failures and misunderstandings. Paul illustrates this from three Old Testament events: (1) verses 7-9, the lineage passing from Abraham to Isaac, rather than Ishmael (see Genesis 16–21); (2) verses 10-16, the lineage passing from Isaac to Jacob, rather than Esau (see Genesis 25–28); (3) verses 17-18, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (see Exodus 7–12).

9:7-9 Paul's first illustration of God's sovereign choice is Abraham and his children. Just being Abraham's physical descendants did not guarantee an inheritance. The line of natural descent was not the same as the line of promise. Abraham had children by three different women (Isaac, by Sarah—see Genesis 21:1-7; Ishmael, by Hagar—see Genesis 16; and six sons by Keturah—see Genesis 25:1-4). But God made it clear that Isaac was the son through whom Abraham's descendants will be counted. God made a sovereign choice regarding who among Abraham's physical descendants would carry the line of promise, the line that would result in the Messiah. God did not choose Isaac because he was better than his half brothers; the choice was made before Isaac was even born. Instead, it was simply God's sovereign choice. Therefore, Abraham's physical descendants are not necessarily children of God. It is the children of the promise who are considered to be Abraham's children.

God's sovereignty, not people's works or character, is the basis for election. The Jews were proud of the fact that their lineage came from Isaac, whose mother was Sarah (Abraham's legitimate wife), rather than from Ishmael, whose mother was Hagar (Sarah's maidservant). Paul asserts that no one can claim to be chosen by God because of his or her heritage or good deeds. God freely chooses to save whomever he wills. The doctrine of election teaches that it is God's sovereign choice to save us by his goodness and mercy, and not by our own merit.

9:10-12 Paul's second illustration of God's sovereign choice focuses on Isaac and Rebekah's twin sons, Jacob and Esau. God chose to continue the line of blessing through the younger son, Jacob, rather than Esau (Genesis 25:23). This was quite unusual in the Hebrew culture, where the firstborn son was highly honored. In Abraham's case, Isaac and Ishmael were sons of different women—each was a firstborn, so a choice had to be made. But Isaac and Rebekah were the parents of children over whom God had a sovereign purpose. Again, this had nothing to do with either son's character, because the choice had already been made. Jacob's future conduct does not even enter into the discussion because it was unrelated to God's choice.

Was it right for God to choose Jacob, the younger, over Esau? God chose Jacob to continue the family line of the faithful because he knew that Jacob was teachable. But he did not exclude Esau from knowing and loving him. We must remember what God is like: he is sovereign; he is not arbitrary; in all things he works for our good; he is trustworthy; he will save all who believe in him. When we understand these qualities of God, we will know that his choices are good even if we don't understand all his reasons.

9:13 The words “I loved Jacob, but I rejected Esau,” refer to the nations of Israel and Edom rather than to the individual brothers (see Malachi 1:2-3). God chose Jacob to continue the family line of the faithful. God did not exclude Esau from knowing and loving him. God was not rejecting Esau's eternal salvation; he was choosing Jacob to lead the nation.

Paul answers the concern voiced in verse 6 and shows that God's word has not failed. The Jews have simply misunderstood it. They missed the truth that God's election never has anything to do with works of the law, rituals, even family or community ties. They misunderstood their own election as God's people. They settled on enjoying the benefits of God's promises, rather than fulfilling their role as emissaries for sharing God's promises with the world. While we enjoy the gracious benefits of our salvation, we must not ignore the others whom God wants to reach through us.

9:14-16 God chose Isaac over Ishmael and Jacob over Esau, not because of their character or their actions, but simply because that was his choice. “Was God being unfair?” we might ask. “Surely those Jews who are working so hard to follow all of God's laws should be chosen. Isn't it rather arbitrary of God to just choose some and reject others?”

Paul's wording of the question in Greek expects a negative answer, which he emphatically supplies: Of course not! If God gave anyone exactly what they deserved the results would be disastrous! Both Isaac and Jacob were scoundrels. God demonstrated unexpected grace when he chose these men in spite of their weaknesses and failures. God is absolutely sovereign. He had explained to Moses, “I will show mercy to anyone I choose, and I will show compassion to anyone I choose” (see Exodus 33:19). We might still be tempted to say, “Doesn't that seem a bit unfair?” But by asking such a question we are claiming a higher understanding of fairness than God himself. We must remember that God has no obligation to show mercy or compassion to any of us—not one of us deserves his slightest concern. For God to even choose anyone is evidence of his great mercy. These words of God reveal that he does show mercy and compassion, but they are by his sovereign choice.

We tend to read God's statement to Moses (which was a response to Moses' request to see God's glory) as if it were an expression of God's withholding mercy rather than a statement of his merciful generosity. In the context of this statement in Exodus, God was not justifying himself, but saying in effect, “I will have mercy on people you would not expect, and I will have compassion in ways that will surprise you, especially when I am compassionate with you!” No one can know the heart of a person in the way that God knows. No individual, court of law, or group can perfectly assess the righteousness of a person. So we must leave the choosing and judging to God.

9:17-18 For a third illustration of God’s sovereign choices, Paul recalls Pharaoh. God had purposely placed that particular Pharaoh in that particular position at that particular time in history so God’s great power would be displayed (through the miracles witnessed in Egypt and by the incredible release of the Hebrew slaves), and so God’s fame would be spread throughout the earth. God put up with Pharaoh’s fickleness and defiance for quite some time, but all for the same purposes. Pharaoh became mired in his own rebelliousness. In fact, part of God’s judgment on Egypt was the hardening of Pharaoh’s heart. Eventually, those nations who heard what God had done for his people in Egypt greatly feared the Israelites and their God (see Joshua 2:10-11; 9:9; 1 Samuel 4:8).

Again, someone might ask, “Doesn’t it seem a bit unfair that God would just use somebody to glorify himself?” But Paul answers the implicit question as before: God has mercy on whomever he chooses; and conversely, he chooses to make some people refuse to listen. God’s judgment on Pharaoh’s great sinfulness was to “harden” his heart, to confirm his disobedience so that the consequences of his rebellion would be his own punishment. “Hardening” occurs when a person has a track record of disobedience and rebellion. From the human perspective, it is difficult to know exactly at what point God confirms our own resistance as hardness. Paul’s implicit warning is to avoid attitudes that lead to hardness of heart (see 1 Corinthians 10:6; Hebrews 3:8).

Everything comes from God’s sovereign choices. Israel, as God’s chosen people, had made a grave mistake in acting with superiority over others who were not of God’s “chosen” nation. It was that pride that made them misunderstand their own Scriptures that said that God would offer salvation beyond Israel, to people from all nations.

9:19 Paul probably had countless discussions with fellow Jews about these issues. So he can anticipate their questions. If God simply chooses those on whom he will have mercy and those whom he will harden, why does God blame people for not listening? Haven’t they simply done what he made them do? Occasionally these questions are asked by those who are genuinely seeking to understand God and his ways with people. Usually, however, they are used to excuse certain behavior—"It's not my fault, God; it's your fault!" In either case, as Paul explains, the answer is the same. We ourselves are to blame because we are guilty of trying to reject or resist God.

9:20 Paul has little patience for such questions, and he supposes that God doesn't either. When it comes down to it, a mere human being cannot criticize God. He is absolutely sovereign. We are extremely privileged to have any relationship with him at all. His dealings with all the world are not to be judged by us. Quoting from Scripture, Paul illustrates the absurdity of such questions. This passage was taken from Isaiah 29:16 and/or Isaiah 45:9; in context it expresses God's response to his rebellious people.

While God welcomes our sincere questions and concerns (see for example, John the Baptist in Matthew 11:1-6, and Thomas in John 20:24-29) and patiently answers us, he will not allow sinners to question his sovereignty. The thing that was created has no right to sit in judgment on the Creator.

9:21 To further illustrate God's sovereignty, Paul compares God to a potter (a very common and necessary vocation in ancient times, since most cooking and storage was done in various types of clay pots). The potter has every right to take one large lump of clay and use part of it to make a jar for decoration and another part of it to make a garbage can. Neither item has any right to complain and ask why the potter did what he did. The lesson of the potter points to equal worth among lumps of clay, while the artist's purpose and design may differ. The proper attitude for clay is to be pliable rather than stiff, receptive rather than rebellious, and grateful for the potter's touch rather than resentful of the potter's purpose for us.

9:22 The objects of his judgment are nonbelievers, and especially, in context, Jewish nonbelievers (1:18). God has been patient with their antagonism, rebellion, blasphemy, and hatred because he is giving them time to repent (2 Peter 3:9). But those who refuse to repent are fit only for destruction. Their doom is coming. They have rebelled and refused to turn to God for salvation, and thus have taken responsibility for their own destruction. God has every right to exercise his judgment and his power. Without God's mercy and great patience, shown to us completely apart from our performance, we would have no hope at all. If God did not do this for his own purposes, we would be instantly destroyed.

9:23-24 In contrast, the objects of his mercy are believers, both Jews and Gentiles. To these he will pour out the riches of his glory. This is God's sovereign choosing when he works with "pots" prepared for destruction (9:22) or with "pots" prepared for glory. The key point to remember is that all this has been in God's plan from the beginning. When God's dealings with his creation have been summed up, there will not be a shred of doubt about his wrath, power, and glory. God did not change his plans just because his people were disobedient. Instead, God knew all that would happen to both Jews and Gentiles, and God does everything to display his great mercy.

Believers still may wonder why they would be chosen while others were rejected. Paul's point is that God is sovereign and that no one has any claim on his mercy. He prepared us in advance by his gift of salvation, and he will reveal his glory when we are finally with him for eternity. Instead of focusing on God choosing some and rejecting others, we should stand in awe at God's offer of grace to any of us. Thus, no one can demand that God explain why he does what he does. He makes all the rules. But he loves to show mercy to us—what an amazing God he is!

9:25-26 To back up the statement that God also calls the Gentiles, Paul quoted two verses from the prophet Hosea. Several hundred years before Jesus' birth, Hosea told of God's intention to bring Gentiles into his family after the Jews would reject his plan. God was not surprised by Israel's rejection. Israel thought that they alone were God's chosen because of their lineage and their laws. But God's plan never was to save only the Jews. His call was for people from all nations. Verse 25 is a quotation from Hosea 2:23, and verse 26 is from Hosea 1:10.

Hosea's situation and his children's names pictured God's attitude toward Israel—they had turned away from him and were no longer called his people or his loved ones. But God would not let this situation remain forever; one day he would call Israel back to himself. God would also turn to the Gentiles, those who are outside his chosen nation. Some day, many Gentiles would be considered God's people, his loved ones, his children. Paul saw that while God's plan had always made room for the Gentiles, with the advent of Christ, the doors to the Kingdom were opened wide. Those not known as God's people were becoming his people by God's mercy and grace, shown through Christ.

9:27-29 But the Jews (here called Israel) will not be forgotten. God's sovereign choice always includes some Jews, but his promises were not a blanket guarantee for all Israel. Isaiah prophesied that only a small number of God's original people will be saved. Paul saw this happening in every city where he preached. Even though he went first to the Jews, relatively few ever accepted the gospel message. Continuing the quote from Isaiah (Isaiah 10:23), God will punish his people for turning away from him. In the captivity and the exile, much punishment had been meted out. If God had not spared a small number of faithful believers, all of Israel would have been destroyed. But God always saved some. Having chosen Israel, God remained faithful to her. If he had not, Israel would have been wiped out as completely as Sodom and Gomorrah, the ancient cities that were completely destroyed by God for their horrible wickedness (see Genesis 19:24-29; Isaiah 1:9). Nothing was left of Sodom and Gomorrah. But God never completely destroyed his people.

Today the Gentiles are the majority in the church, but one day, many Jews too will come to their Savior. There is a final judgment to come, and God will carry it out. There is no time to delay. A few will be saved—who of God's people, the Jews, will become part of that small number? Paul explores this further in chapter 11.

ISRAEL'S UNBELIEF / 9:30–10:4

This section provides a summary in the middle of Paul's exposition on God's sovereign plan and an expanded explanation of the present position of the Jews. He realized that his teaching was creating a paradox, especially for his Jewish audience. How could it be that the acknowledged experts in righteousness would find their way to God barred, while those who were ignorant of righteousness were welcomed by God as long-lost children? Paul here contrasts the way of faith with the way of the law. Israel, following after a law of righteousness, did not attain it—while the Gentiles, not seeking righteousness by the law, found it by faith in Christ.

9:30 The gospel was preached to both Jews and Gentiles, but it was being accepted by far more Gentiles than Jews. The Gentiles did not have God's law, did not even know God, and were not even seeking him, yet they were being made right with God. Why? Because they were coming in faith.

9:31-32 In contrast to the Gentiles, the Jews tried to get right with God by keeping the law, only to fail. They had incorrectly understood righteousness in terms of works. They could not keep the law perfectly, therefore they could not keep it at all. They tried to achieve right standing with God the wrong way—by keeping the law and being good. Thus some of them became more dedicated to the law than to God. They thought that if they kept the law, God would have to accept them as his people. But God cannot be obligated by us. The Jews did not see that their Scriptures, the Old Testament, taught salvation by faith and not by human effort—the point Paul made in the first part of this letter. As a result, they stumbled over the great rock in their path—the Lord Jesus Christ (see 1 Peter 2:4-8). Jesus was not what they expected, so they missed him. In so doing they missed their only way of salvation. Jesus is a stumbling block to Jews and to all who by pride would rather have recognition for doing it on their own than for trusting Christ and his goodness.

Some people still stumble over Christ because salvation by faith doesn't make sense to them. They would rather try to work their way to God, or else they expect him simply to overlook their sins. Others stumble over Christ because his values are the opposite of the world's. Christ asks for humility, and many are unwilling to humble themselves before him. He requires obedience and many refuse to put their will at his disposal. The "rock" has caused them to stumble. They heard about Christ and misunderstood, so they tripped over the one thing that could have saved them.

9:33 Paul quotes from Isaiah 28:16. Isaiah declared God's warning of destruction to Israel by Assyria. Then he said, "I am placing a stone in Jerusalem that causes people to stumble." This stone refers to the righteous few and to Christ. Some will stumble over him, but those who put their trust in him need never fear that their trust is misplaced. When we have placed our feet on the Rock of Zion, the Lord Jesus Christ himself, we will not be disappointed.

10:1 Paul's concern for the Jewish people is genuine and heartfelt; his longing and prayer is that they might be saved (see also 9:1-3). Paul worked hard and sacrificed much to teach Jews about Jesus Christ. Because Jesus is the most complete revelation of God, no one can fully know God apart from knowing Jesus; and because God appointed Jesus to bring God and human beings together, no one can come to God by another path. The Jews, like everyone else, can find salvation only through Jesus Christ (John 14:6; Acts 4:12). Just as Paul did, we should wish that all Jews might be saved. We should pray for them and lovingly share the Good News with them. In fact, we should ask ourselves, Who do I desire to be saved, and am I regularly praying for them?

10:2 The Jews certainly had enthusiasm in their devotion to God and their practice of the law—Paul knew that from his own experience. However, it was misdirected zeal. The people Paul loved (the Jews) were so busy trying to keep the law that their zeal was actually keeping them from understanding God's way of salvation. This was exactly Paul's state of mind before Christ confronted him. He was so zealous for God and for his religion that he persecuted Christians (see Acts 9:1-2; 22:3-5; 26:4-11). His zeal was based on a misunderstanding of God's word, and so was the zeal of his fellow Jews.

10:3-4 The Israelites did not understand the extent of God's righteousness, how it would be achieved, and how it would be made available to all people (the point Paul explained in chapters 3–6). Instead, they were clinging to their own way of getting right with God by trying to keep the law. They were not creating some new kind of righteousness; rather, they wanted to achieve God's righteousness by observing the law and their rituals. Once their minds were set, they could not see God's way—that righteousness had been provided for them through faith in Jesus Christ, that the whole purpose of the law had been accomplished in him. Christ fulfills the purpose and goal of the law (Matthew 5:17) in that he perfectly exemplified all that the law requires.

SALVATION IS FOR EVERYONE / 10:5-21

Why did God give the law when he knew people couldn't keep it? According to Paul, one reason that the law was given was to show people how guilty they are (Galatians 3:19). In addition, the law was a shadow of Christ—that is, the sacrificial system educated the people so that when the true sacrifice came, they would be able to understand his work (Hebrews 10:1-4). The system of ceremonial laws was to last until the coming of Christ. The law points to Christ, the final sacrifice for sin, the reason for all those animal sacrifices.

10:5 Paul quotes freely from Moses. The first quote is from Leviticus 18:5, a section in Leviticus that gives God's instructions to the people for how they should live in the Promised Land. They were to obey the law for it would separate them from the pagan nations around them. But the statement, the law's way of making a person right with God requires obedience to all of its commands reveals the law's fatal flaw. In order to be right with God, one would have to obey the law perfectly, not sinning once—and that is impossible (see James 2:10). Righteousness that comes from the law is the ideal way of life, but it cannot be achieved well enough to merit God's acceptance. For that level of righteousness, supernatural help is needed.

10:6-8 Moses also wrote about getting right with God through faith. In verses 6-8, Paul recalls phrases from Deuteronomy 30. The book of Deuteronomy includes Moses' final speeches to Israel as they were about to enter and subdue the land that God had promised to them many years before. Moses recited the blessings they could look forward to for their obedience to God, as well as the curses they could expect if they disobeyed and turned away from him.

At the conclusion of his third address to the people, Moses explained that the people knew what they had to do to please God (Deuteronomy 30:11-14). The message was as near as their lips and heart. No one would have to go to heaven or to the place of the dead to get it so that they would know what to obey. No one has to go up to heaven to bring Christ down as though he had never been incarnated; Christ himself has already come in the flesh (John 1:14). No one has to go into the grave to bring Christ up from the dead; Christ has already been resurrected.

Just as God's message was already clear to the people of Moses' day, so it is as near as the lips and hearts of Paul's readers, including us. The words convey an immediate opportunity to respond. It is as close and available to us as it can possibly be without overruling our will. What message is that? Salvation comes from trusting Christ, and it is within easy reach.

10:9 The word is near—as near as your lips and heart (10:8; Deuteronomy 30:14). To confess means to “give verbal affirmation,”—in this case to acknowledge with your mouth that Jesus is Lord and was raised for you. When we confess that Jesus is Lord, we are acknowledging his rank or supreme place. We are pledging our obedience and worship; we are placing our life under his protection for safekeeping. We are pledging ourselves and our resources to his control for direction and service.

Anyone can say he or she believes something, but God knows each person’s heart. In this confession, it is not enough to merely utter the words; they must be declared, professed, proclaimed from the heart, expressing our full conviction. The gospel message in a nutshell is confess and believe and you will be saved. There is no reference to works or rituals.

10:10 You must first believe in your heart—that belief makes you right with God (God declares you “not guilty” for your sins). By prayer to God, you confess with your mouth your belief in God and what he has done for you. As in verses 8-9 above, belief and confession lead to salvation. To believe and to confess involve whole-person commitment. They are two parts of a single step, just as lifting the foot and then placing it back down are two movements in the one act of taking a step.

10:11 To summarize the transaction that he has just described, Paul quotes again from Isaiah 28:16, as he did at the end of chapter 9. “Anyone who believes in him will not be disappointed.” Paul is not saying that Christians will never be disillusioned or disappointed. At times people will let us down and circumstances will take a turn for the worse. Paul is saying that God will keep his side of the bargain—those who call on him will be saved. God will never fail to provide righteousness to those who believe.

10:12 The “anyone” of verse 11 includes both Jew and Gentile. God’s salvation is available to all who believe for they all have the same Lord. Every person is confronted with the need to acknowledge Jesus as Lord. Because sin is a universal condition, the remedy of justification by faith universally applies. Those who are saved will be richly blessed with God’s great riches—in this world (although not always materially, as some might hope or expect), and most certainly in the world to come.

10:13 A final quotation taken from the Hebrew Scriptures (Joel 2:32) serves well for Paul's conclusion. God's special relationship with Israel will continue, but it has been broadened to include anyone who calls on the name of the Lord. God's plans for Israel had their climax in Christ. Access to God, for all people, now comes through Jesus Christ. With this last reference, Paul neatly lays the foundation for the necessity of worldwide evangelism. Joel 2:32 is an Old Testament mandate for missions. To call on the Lord is to ask the Lord to come to you and be real to you. Those who call on Jesus as their Lord want him to be their Lord and Savior.

10:14-15 If God's salvation is for anyone who calls, how can people call on God to save them if they have not been moved to believe in him? How can they believe if they have never heard about him? There can be no call, no belief, if these people have not heard about God ("heard" means a hearing that understands the significance of the words and realizes that a response is required), and been given the offer of salvation. And how can they hear about him unless someone tells them? There can be no call, no belief, no hearing, unless there are those sent to share the Good News.

All believers are sent to announce this Good News. The process of salvation begins with the one who tells another the Good News. Like Paul and the early Christians, who spread the message of Christ despite persecution and even death, we should be eager to share this Good News of salvation to all who will listen. In the verse quoted from Isaiah 52:7, the herald is bearing good news to Judah about the end of their exile in Babylon and their return to their own land. His feet were beautiful to them, for his good news was so welcome. The message was what he brought, but it was those worn and dusty feet that brought him. Those feet were beautiful because they represented the messenger's willingness to be sent with good news. Only now the message was not just for Israel, but for the whole world.

10:16 Many Jews did not welcome the gospel of Jesus Christ—they heard it but refused to believe and submit to it. The failure of Jews to respond to God's warnings of impending judgment was true in Isaiah's day, "Lord, who has believed our message?" It was true while Jesus preached (John 12:37-41), and it was true in Paul's day. We can expect the same today. Bringing people good news does not guarantee a welcome. But having been changed by the message ourselves ought to change the way we see those who have not yet heard. We are not held responsible for how others respond, but we are expected to carry the Good News.

10:17 This statement expresses the main theme of this section. People need to hear the Good News of salvation in Christ in order to believe it (10:14). Faith does not respond in a vacuum or respond blindly. Faith is believing what one has been told about God's offer of salvation and trusting the one who has been spoken about.

10:18 Some might argue that the Jews weren't given enough chances to hear or that somehow the message should have been made clearer for them. Perhaps Isaiah's complaint ("Who has believed?" 10:16) was the fault of the messenger. But Paul emphatically responds that of course they heard. The message had been preached far and wide, first to the Jews and then to the Gentiles (see 1:16). Then Paul quotes from Psalm 19:4: "The message of God's creation has gone out to everyone, and its words to all the world." When Luke ended the book of Acts with Paul in Rome, this was probably considered a culmination of the great commission to take the gospel to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). At this time in history, the Good News had been preached to Jews and Gentiles for about twenty years, and it had spread throughout the Mediterranean areas where Jews lived. There may have been some Jews who truly had not yet heard, but to use that as an excuse for the large number of Jews who had rejected the gospel did not sit well with Paul (see also Romans 1:18-20).

As the loopholes close for the Jews, they close for everyone else, too. If the Jews are not excused for their unbelief, how can the rest of us think there might be some excuse for us? In the end, some may wish they had heard more, but God will declare that what they heard was enough. In the meantime, those of us who have heard have little excuse for our apathy in passing on the Good News!

10:19 Someone might then argue, "Okay, so the Jews heard, but perhaps they didn't really understand that God's message was salvation not by the law, but by faith, and that it was for the Gentiles too." Paul didn't like that excuse either. The Jews' knowledge of their own Scriptures should have led them to believe in Christ. He quotes again from their Scriptures to answer the argument. First, from Deuteronomy 32:21: "I will rouse your jealousy by blessing other nations. I will make you angry by blessing the foolish Gentiles." The Gentiles were not a single nation; they consisted of everyone who was not part of the Jewish nation. The Jews would be envious that God would offer salvation to the world at large and not just to his chosen people. They would be angry that the pagan peoples whom they considered to have no understanding would be accepted by God. In all of this, God's purpose would not be to reject his people, but to cause them to return to him.

10:20 The second quote is from Isaiah 65:1. The people who were not looking for God were the Gentiles. Although they had previously ignored God as simply the God of Israel and so had never sought him out, the Gentiles would recognize God as the one true God, and God would reveal himself to them.

10:21 Finally, from Isaiah 65:2, Paul explains that God had been gracious to his people, patiently holding out his arms to them and calling them, only to have them disobey and argue with him. God's invitation was spurned and his gifts were rejected.

The disobedience of Israel was judged by God's welcome to the Gentiles (even though that was in his plan all along). But he will still accept his chosen people if they will only return to him. He remains faithful to his promises to his people, even though they have been unfaithful to him. God still holds out his arms.

ROMANS 11

GOD'S MERCY ON ISRAEL / 11:1-24

In this section Paul points out that not all Jews have rejected God's message of salvation. He draws upon the experience of Elijah to show that there had always been a faithful remnant among the people. In Paul's day, there was still a remnant living by faith, under the law (11:5). After all, Paul was a Jew; so were Jesus' disciples and nearly all of the early Christian missionaries. Part of God's sovereign choice involves bringing a remnant of his people back to himself. This truth forbids any hint of anti-Semitism—God's plan still includes the Jews.

11:1 The Jewish nation had heard words of rejection before. In the depths of their sinfulness when King Manasseh ruled the northern kingdom of Israel, God said he would forsake his people because of their sin (2 Kings 21:14-15). Indeed, Jeremiah had warned the people that God had abandoned them (Jeremiah 7:29). With this question Paul expresses a deep concern—has God finally grown tired of Israel's constant disobedience and rejected them forever?

Paul responds, Of course not! One proof of this is Paul's experience. Paul had received salvation, and he was a Jew, a descendant of Abraham and a member of the tribe of Benjamin. Paul is a full-blooded Jew (who had even gone so far as to persecute Christians before he became a believer). Surely if God was going to reject someone, Paul would have been a good choice. But God, in his sovereignty, called Paul and rearranged his entire life.

11:2-3 God did not reject his people in the days of Moses, nor in the days of the prophets. And he is not rejecting them now. Regardless of Israel's unfaithfulness, God always keeps his promises. God chose Israel to be the people through whom all other nations of the world could know him. He made this promise to Abraham, their ancestor (Genesis 12:1-3). Israel didn't have to do anything to be chosen. God had given them this privilege because he wanted to, not because they deserved special treatment (Deuteronomy 9:4-6). God knew beforehand that Israel would be unfaithful; if God's faithfulness to Israel was going to be dependent on their faithfulness, God would never have chosen them in the first place. God will remain faithful to his promises to Israel, despite Israel's failure.

Paul then reminded his readers of a time when all Israel had deserted God, but God had preserved some for himself. After Elijah's stunning demonstration of God's power over Baal's prophets at Mount Carmel (and the killing of all of Baal's prophets), Elijah fled for his life from the wrath of Israel's evil Queen Jezebel who threatened to have him killed. He ran for many miles and then stopped to rest. In his terror and exhaustion, he cried out to God, "Lord, they have killed your prophets and torn down your altars. I alone am left, and now they are trying to kill me, too." "They" actually refers to the evil leadership in the northern kingdom of Israel, but Elijah was holding the entire nation responsible for the actions of many. He had concluded that he was the only person left in Israel who believed in God.

11:4 God shared some very important information with Elijah, replying that Elijah was not the only one left—God had seven thousand believers who had not turned to idol worship. That was not a large number, but it was a faithful "remnant." Notice that God reserved these faithful followers for himself—the remnant existed because of his sovereign choice.

11:5-6 Just as God had preserved a few of his people when almost the entire nation had turned to idolatry, so today, God has a few who are being saved as a result of God's kindness in choosing them. The Jewish believers in this faithful few are proof that God has not rejected his people (2 Kings 19:4, 19). These few, saved by God's kindness realize that they were not saved by good works. Jews who believe in Christ are not denying their faith or their heritage; instead, they are discovering what these were truly meant to be. If God's grace in choosing us depended on our works or obedience to the law, it would not be free and undeserved. "God saved you by his special favor when you believed. And you can't take credit for this; it is a gift from God. Salvation is not a reward for the good things we have done, so none of us can boast about it" (Ephesians 2:8-9).

11:7-10 This verse provides an excellent summary of Romans 9–11. The nation had earnestly sought the favor of God by doing works of the law (see 10:2-3). But God did not accept them. Instead, he accepted the few who had been chosen. Israel's failure was foreseen by God and, in fact, brought about by him (see 9:22-23, 33). Their being made unresponsive was confirmation of their inability to understand and their insensitivity to God's word and God's call. When God judged them, he removed their ability to see, hear, and repent; thus they would experience the consequences of their rebellion. But this is not the same as rejection; rather, it confirms their response to God. Paul illustrates this from two passages in Scripture (as follows).

Quoting from Deuteronomy 29:4 and Isaiah 29:10, their unresponsiveness was like a deep sleep. When people repeatedly refuse to listen to God's Good News, they eventually will be unable to hear and understand it. Israel's present misinterpretation of their Scriptures and refusal to accept Christ as their Messiah is a continuation of their tendency to misunderstand God's plans and purposes for them. Paul saw this happening in the Jewish congregations he visited on his missionary journeys.

Next, Paul quoted from Psalm 69:22-23 (a psalm thought to be prophetic about the suffering of the Messiah). These words of David were originally a curse directed at Israel's enemies. Paul turns the curse around and points it at the Jews! These blessings should have drawn Israel to God and thus led them to Christ; instead, they became a snare, a trap. Israel's blessings had led to pride that led them away from God. Thus, not only did they miss the Messiah when he came, but they also persecuted and killed him.

11:11 This is the tenth time in this letter that Paul has asked a question only to respond in a strong negative. No, Israel's stumbling did not cause them to fall so that God has declared the nation beyond recovery. Their blindness is not permanent (11:8); their fall is not fatal. Israel's stumbling means that salvation has come to the Gentiles. Israel's rejection of Christ was a part of God's plan all along, as essential as God's sovereign choice of Jacob over Esau (9:10-13) and his hardening of Pharaoh (9:17-18). But the salvation of the Gentiles is not the end of the story. It too has a purpose—to make the Jews jealous. The blessings offered to the Gentiles would spur Israel to end their hostility toward the gospel and ultimately bring them to faith. God desires to restore Israel to himself.

11:12 God took the riches that the Jews should have received and offered them to the Gentiles, who gladly received them. The Gentiles were enriched—those who received the gospel received great riches for eternity; and believers, in turn, have an influence for good on the rest of the world. Paul looks beyond the present to a future time when the Jews will accept the riches of salvation that God offers (see 11:26). Israel's acceptance does not mean that the riches given to the Gentiles will be taken away; rather, when the Jews are saved, the Gentiles will enjoy even greater blessings along with them.

11:13-14 We can almost sense the intensity of Paul's words as he defines his audience. If we are not Jews, we know that the next words are meant for us. Paul singles out the Gentile believers to listen carefully to what he is going to say. They (and we) are being given an opportunity to understand their role in the divine plan. Paul will explain that the salvation of the Gentiles both depends on Israel and contributes to Israel's salvation.

All of the apostles were preaching both to Jews and non-Jews, but Paul had been specially appointed by God to go to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; Galatians 2:3-10). Throughout this ministry he had been a strong (and at first lone) advocate for Gentile freedom from the Jewish law. Beyond that, Paul hoped that the Jews would want what the Gentiles had been given, and so they would be saved. Paul hopes to cause the Jews to recognize that God greatly blessed the Gentiles when they believed in the Jews' own Messiah. The Jews might then realize that those blessings are still promised to them as part of God's covenant with them, but they can only be obtained by faith in Jesus Christ. Again Paul is revealing his great desire to see his people be saved (see 9:1-3; 10:1).

11:15 Israel's rejection by God meant that God offered salvation to the rest of the world. God had always planned to include the Gentiles, even if that meant a temporary setting aside of the Jews. When the chosen people, who were designated as the vehicles of God's blessing to the world, actually blocked that message from getting through, God made sure that the message arrived anyway. When Jews come to Christ and God accepts them back, there will be great rejoicing, as if dead people had come back to life.

Though we may not grasp all the nuances of Paul extensive argument, his purpose is unmistakable. He wants to give Gentiles every reason possible to welcome their Jewish brothers and sisters in the faith with open arms. At the same time, he wants to help his Jewish brethren reciprocate that welcome. Neither group is to claim supremacy in the church. The message is: God has made room in his family for both of you, so you must get along together.

11:16 Paul believes that Israel's refusal to accept Christ is temporary and that one day the nation will be brought back to God. He explains this in an illustration. The roots, obviously, are the first part of a tree, and form the "character" of the branches. Abraham's faith was like the root of a productive tree, and the Jewish people are the tree's natural branches. As a result of God's choice and Abraham's response, the nation that descended from him was holy.

Paul extends the principle to cover the fate of his people. If the remnant of Jews who had lived by faith were called holy by God, then there is still hope for the whole, proving that God has not rejected them. If the root, the tree of justification by faith, is holy, then any branch attached to and nourished by that root will also be holy.

11:17 God did not tear down the entire tree, but some of the branches were broken off because of sin and unbelief. These branches are Jews who failed to respond in faith to God's mercy. In their place, the Gentile believers are likened to branches from a wild olive tree that have been grafted in. Grafting involves inserting a bud or shoot of one plant into a slit in the stem or trunk of another plant. The shoot shares in the nourishment from the main stem or trunk (here pictured as God's rich nourishment) and grows, receiving the same blessings that the natural branches had.

11:18 But the Gentiles, the wild olive shoots who have been grafted into the cultivated olive tree (Israel), have no grounds for bragging. The Gentile "branches" need to remember that they are just as dependent on "the root," for their survival as the Jewish branches. God has not changed his original plan; salvation stems from the promise to Abraham and God's choice of Israel. Both Jews and Gentiles share the tree's nourishment based on faith in God. For Paul, the only appropriate attitude for any "branch" is humble thankfulness. Any attitude of superiority is to be avoided, for it might indicate that grafted-in branches are candidates for the same fate as the original ones that had been broken off (see 11:21).

11:19 A Gentile believer might make this argument. It is true that it was necessary to break off some branches in the grafting process. But it would be a mistake to assume that Paul is limiting God's acceptance, as if there was only so much room on the tree for branches. The point is not so much replacement as opportunity. The idea is not that Jews were broken off so that we could take their place; but rather that they were broken off so that the Gentile opportunity for justification by faith might become clear. This is underscored by Paul's assertion that even broken off branches can be grafted back in (see 11:23).

11:20 The real reason some of the branches of the tree, some of the nation of Israel, were broken off was because of their stubborn unbelief. The Gentiles that were grafted in are only there by their faith and by God's grace. Thus they are warned, Don't think highly of yourself, but fear what could happen. Those who are arrogant cherish proud thoughts about themselves; they do not have a proper fear and respect for God. Our relationship with God is to be one of humble dependence (see 12:3).

Jesus used many of these images to explain his own role as the vine (John 15:1-8). He spoke of his Father, the Gardener who cuts off every branch that is unproductive. He also reminded the disciples that a branch cannot survive on its own, but is entirely dependent on the vine for its survival and nourishment. The branches serve their purpose in bearing fruit.

11:21 God willingly set aside Israel because of their stumbling and blindness to the Good News. The Gentiles should remember that God will set them aside as well if they became arrogant—he will not spare them either. According to the context, it is not absolutely clear whether Paul is referring to those who have fallen away from the faith or those whose faith was never real. What is clear is that he is warning Gentiles not to arrogantly think that their being grafted in is irreversible. The only way they can remain in the tree is by continuing to trust in God's grace.

11:22 God sovereignly decided to put Israel aside for a time and offer salvation through faith to all the world. This was a severe act, but it was done in judgment to those who disobeyed (9:32-33). He has been kind to the Gentiles, but Gentile believers must continue to trust in his kindness. This refers to steadfast perseverance in faith—continual and patient dependence on Christ. Steadfastness is a proof of the reality of faith. If Gentile believers do not continue in their perseverance in faith, they will be cut off, just as the natural branches were cut off because of their unbelief. This does not mean individual believers can lose their salvation and be cut off from God; rather, Paul is speaking from a generalized standpoint, picturing Gentiles as a group turning away from God as the nation of Israel had. God's sternness was demonstrated in that faith was not automatic for the chosen people; and his kindness was demonstrated in providing Gentiles with the opportunity for faith.

11:23-24 Returning to Israel, Paul says if they will turn from their unbelief, God will graft them back into the tree again. If, contrary to nature, wild olive shoots can be grafted into a cultivated olive tree, certainly the natural branches can be grafted back into root stock of the cultivated tree. We become part of God's "tree" by faith; we forfeit any potential relationship with God by unbelief. Gentiles are orphans graciously adopted into God's family. A wayward Jew who discovers the faith of Abraham is coming home.

GOD'S MERCY IS FOR EVERYONE / 11:25-36

As difficult as it may be for us to understand, God's handling of the Jews and the Gentiles is intended to expose all of us to his mercy. Paul wraps up his argument by saying that in the end there will be room for both Jews and Gentiles in the plan of God. The details of exactly how God will do all this are aptly called a mystery!

11:25 The temporary stumbling of Israel is part of what Paul calls a mystery—the word here means a truth that has been unrevealed up to this point but is now being made known. The mystery reveals, for example, that Israel’s stumbling has always been part of God’s plan. God put Israel aside for a time in order to offer salvation to the Gentiles. Paul reviews this mystery so the Gentiles will not feel proud and start bragging. Conceit would be a sign that they were ignorant of God’s master plan that included everyone (see 11:32).

Some of the Jews have hard hearts, but this is only temporary, because it will only be experienced until the complete number of Gentiles comes to Christ—that is, when all the elect of the Gentiles have come to salvation (see Acts 15:14). God knows the size of that number of Gentiles who will be grafted into God’s tree of faith. We only know that the number will be complete. As many will have come in as are going to come in.

11:26-27 This statement, all Israel will be saved, has provoked a variety of interpretations. The most widely held are as follows:

- The majority of Jews in the final generation before Christ’s return will turn to Christ for salvation.
- Paul is using the term Israel for the “spiritual” nation of Israel made up of everyone—Jew and Gentile—who has received salvation through faith in Christ. Thus all Israel (or all believers, the church) will receive God’s promised gift of salvation.
- Israel as a whole will have a role in Christ’s Kingdom. Their identity as a people won’t be discarded. God chose the nation of Israel, and he has never rejected it. He also chose the church, through Jesus Christ, and he will never reject it either. This does not mean, of course, that all Jews or all church members will be saved. It is possible to belong to a nation or to an organization without ever responding in faith. But just because some people have rejected Christ does not mean that God stops working with either Israel or the church. He continues to offer salvation freely to all.
- And so means “in this way” or “this is how,” referring to the necessity of faith in Christ.

These explanations do not exclude one another, and they all serve to underscore Paul’s clear intention: to demonstrate that God had not rejected Israel. Indeed, Paul believed the nation of Israel would be restored to God. Both Jews and Gentiles will make up the flourishing tree that stands for the Kingdom, as well the brush pile of broken branches prepared for burning that represents those who have rejected God’s gracious offer of forgiveness.

To confirm his statement, Paul quotes from Isaiah, first from 59:20-21. Jesus Christ is the Deliverer who will come from Jerusalem. For the first and only time in this letter, Paul speaks of the second coming of Christ. At that time, Christ will turn Israel from all ungodliness (see also Psalm 14:7; 53:6). God also promises to take away their sins (see also Jeremiah 31:33-34).

11:28 Paul is still speaking to the Gentiles in his audience (11:13). In order for God to bring the gospel to them, he had to set the Jews aside—as if they were his enemies for having rejected the Good News. But as far as God's choice, his election, is concerned, the Jews are still his chosen people because of his promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Because God chose those men through whom he would carry out his promises, he will keep his promises to their descendants.

11:29 The privileges and invitation given to Israel can never be withdrawn. God will not take back his gifts or withdraw his call. He will keep his promises. While God will not take back what he has offered, we are certainly able to reject it. Paul is making an application from God's characteristic faithfulness to the Jews that anyone can rely on. God will do what he promises.

11:30 The Gentiles were rebels before they knew God, but they received God's mercy and offer of salvation because of Israel's disobedience. Having received from God something that they had lacked previously, they could expect to keep on enjoying God's mercy. By the same logic, however, the Jews could also expect God to be consistent with his promises, even though they had, for a time, rejected his mercy.

11:31 From Paul's time onward, Israel has been rebellious to God because of their refusal to accept salvation in Christ. Though they began with an advantage due to God's gracious choice of them as his people, by being disobedient, the Jews had proved themselves equally needing God's mercy. And Israel will receive mercy because as soon as all the elect of the Gentiles have come (see 11:25), then God's mercy will again be directed to Israel.

In these verses, Paul shows how the Jews and the Gentiles benefit each other. Whenever God shows mercy to one group, the other shares the blessing. In God's original plan, the Jews would be the source of God's blessing to the Gentiles (see Genesis 12:3). When the Jews neglected this mission, God blessed the Gentiles anyway through the Jewish Messiah. He still maintained his love for the Jews because of his promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But someday the faithful Jews will share in God's mercy.

11:32 When Adam sinned, all humanity sinned with him (5:19). We are all sinners (3:23). When people choose to follow their own passion and desires, they are imprisoned in their disobedience. People who deliberately choose to disobey God imprison themselves. It is those who understand that they have been saying no to God who are in the best position to say yes to him. God then is willing to have mercy on all who come to him. For a beautiful picture of Jews and Gentiles experiencing rich blessings, see Isaiah 60.

11:33-35 Here Paul bursts into a song of praise as he concludes his entire treatise in chapters 1–11 on God's sovereign plan for our salvation. It is impossible for us to understand. Paul quoted from Isaiah 40:13, pointing out that God alone knows the plan. In his unsearchable wisdom he designed it. No human being was, is, or will ever be involved in giving him advice or making new suggestions. Then Paul quotes loosely from Job 41:11 to point out that God is in sovereign control. He is not in our debt, we are in his!

11:36 God is the Creator, Sustainer, and Omega of all life. Everything comes from him and is for him to use for his glory. God is almighty and all-powerful, but even more, he cares for us personally. No person or power can compare with God.

Paul began his letter with the statement that God left his imprint on the world he created, but that the human beings of that creation had chosen rebellion. In the past eleven chapters, Paul has examined God's marvelous plan for bringing the rebels home. God has chosen to "have mercy on everyone" (11:32). What more can any believer, saved by grace, say than, to him be glory evermore. Amen.

A LIVING SACRIFICE TO GOD / 12:1-21

Next, Paul moves from a doctrinal discussion to a practical discussion, for Christian doctrine translates into action. The first eleven chapters of this letter reveal God's mercy to sinners in that he sent his Son to die on the cross for our sins. The last five chapters explain our obligation to God. If the early message of the letter is the way we all can come to God through Christ, then the closing part of the letter is the way we all can live for God in Christ. In view of all God has done for us, how can we respond in a way that is pleasing to him?

12:1 And so, because of God's great compassion on both Jews and Gentiles in offering salvation through Christ, Paul urges believers to please God in their daily lives. The evil world is full of temptation and sin. Paul helps believers understand how they can live for God.

Paul had already told the Roman believers to offer themselves to God so that their whole bodies would be for his glory (6:13). Our bodies are all we have to offer—we live in our bodies. The body enfolds our emotions, our mind, our thoughts, our desires, and our plans. Thus, the body represents the total person; it is the instrument by which all our service is given to God. In order to live for God, we must give him all that we are, represented by our body. If our body is at God's disposal, he will have our free time, our pleasures, and all our behavior.

When sacrificing an animal according to God's law, a priest would kill the animal, cut it in pieces, and place it on the altar. Sacrifice was important, but even in the Old Testament God made it clear that obedience from the heart was much more important (see 1 Samuel 15:22; Psalm 40:6; Amos 5:21-24). God wants us to offer ourselves as living sacrifices—daily laying aside our own desires to follow him, putting all our energy and resources at his disposal, and trusting him to guide us (see Hebrews 13:15-16; 1 Peter 2:5). Our new life is a thank-offering to God. Offering our body as a living and holy sacrifice to be completely set apart for God and dedicated to his service.

12:2 When believers offer their entire self to God, a change will happen in their relation to the world. Christians are called to a different lifestyle than what the world offers with its behavior and customs, which are usually selfish and often corrupting (Galatians 1:4; 1 Peter 1:14). Christians are to live as citizens of a future world. There will be pressure to conform, to continue living according to the script written by the world, but believers are forbidden to give in to that pressure.

But refusing to conform to this world's values must go even deeper than the level of behavior and customs—it must go to the transforming of the way we think. Believers are to experience a complete transformation from the inside out. And the change must begin in the mind, where all thoughts and actions begin. Much of the work is done by God's Spirit in us, and the tool most frequently used is God's word. As we memorize and meditate upon God's word, our way of thinking changes. Our minds become first informed, and then conformed to the pattern of God, the pattern for which we were originally designed. When believers have had their minds transformed and are becoming more like Christ, they will know what God wants and they will want to do it for it is good, pleasing to God, and perfect for them.

12:3 Paul is here speaking as God's messenger, an apostle (see 1:5). The authority he was about to exercise was not his own by right, but was an evidence of God's grace. He warned the believers that inflated pride has no place in a believer's life (see 3:27; 11:18, 20). This is especially significant in light of Paul's teaching up to this point in his letter. The Jews are not better than the Gentiles; the Gentiles are not better than the Jews. Rather, all are dependent on God's mercy for their salvation, thus there is no room for pride. Any such pride would undermine the oneness vital to the growth of the church.

Each believer's personal appraisal ought to be honest. Neither an inflated ego nor a deflated person is free to obey. God has given each believer a measure of faith with which to serve him. This expression refers to the spiritual capacity and/or power given to each person to carry out his or her function in the church. The concept of measuring your value is described further in 12:6, where Paul uses the terminology "different gifts, according to the grace given us." It is God's discernment, not ours, that gives out the measure for service. Whatever we have in the way of natural abilities or spiritual gifts—all should be used with humility for building up the body of Christ. If we are proud, we cannot exercise our faith and gifts to benefit others. And if we consider ourselves worthless, we also withhold what God intended to deliver to others through us.

12:4-5 Replacing the national identity that had once set apart God's people, Paul gives a new picture of the identity of God's redeemed people. They are like a body. Each of us has one body, but it has many parts—eyes, ears, fingers, toes, blood vessels, muscles. And each part has a special function. Not every part of our body can see; not every part hears. But all must work together if the body is going to move and act correctly. (See also 1 Corinthians 12:12-27.) Just as our physical bodies are composed of many parts, so Christ's body is made up of many believers who all perform different work. And as our bodies cannot be taken apart, so we belong to each other. The members work together to make the body work. When it is not done, the body suffers.

We must be humble and recognize our partnership in the body of Christ. Only then can our gifts be used effectively, and only then can we appreciate others' gifts. God gives us gifts so we can build up his church. To use them effectively, we must:

- realize that all gifts and abilities come from God
- understand that not everyone has the same gifts nor all the gifts
- know who we are and what we do best
- dedicate our gifts to God's service and not to our personal success
- be willing to utilize our gifts wholeheartedly, not holding back anything from God's service.

12:6 The emphasis here is that God has given these abilities to his people. These are God's gifts to his church, and he gives faith and power as he wills. Our role is to be faithful and to seek ways to serve others with what Christ has given us.

The gifts Paul mentions in this list fall into two categories: speaking and serving. Gifts are given that God's grace may be expressed. Words speak to our hearts and minds of God's grace; acts of service show that grace in action. This list is not exhaustive; there are many gifts, most of them hidden from the public—those “behind the scenes” words and actions that serve and magnify God.

The ability to prophesy, according to the New Testament, is not always predicting the future. Often it means effectively communicating God's messages (1 Corinthians 14:1-3). These gifts are not for having, but for using. In other words, God's gifts fulfill their value as they are utilized for the benefit of others.

12:7-8 If a person has the gift of serving, then he or she should use it where and when it is needed, and use it to its best and fullest capacity. The same goes for the other gifts that Paul mentions: teaching, encouraging, sharing, leading, showing kindness. Whatever gift a believer has, he or she should faithfully use it in gratitude to God. By focusing on the application of the gifts, Paul is removing the tendency toward unhealthy self-congratulation in the discovery of gifts. If we are busy using our gifts, we will be less taken up with concerns over status and power. Genuine service controls pride.

This list of gifts is representative, not exhaustive. It would be difficult for one person to embody all these gifts. An assertive prophet usually would not make a good counselor, and a generous giver might fail as a leader. When people identify their own gifts and their unique combination of gifts (this list is far from complete), they should then discover how they can use their gifts to build up Christ's body, the church. At the same time, they should realize that one or two gifts can't do all the work of the church. Believers should be thankful for each other, thankful that others have gifts that are completely different. In the church, believers' strengths and weaknesses can balance each other. Some people's abilities compensate for other people's deficiencies. Together all believers can build Christ's church. But all these gifts will be worthless if they are used begrudgingly out of duty, or if they are exercised without love (see also 1 Corinthians 13:1-3).

12:9 The key ingredient in interpersonal relationships is love—God's love (agape). This kind of love is a self-sacrificial love, a love that cares for the well-being of others. All the gifts that are exercised in the body should be expressed in this love.

To hate what is wrong means turning toward what is good and clinging to it. This principle is practiced when we are able to detest an evil act while practicing compassion toward the one who has done it. This principle is also important regarding the exercise of spiritual gifts. Believers must always be careful that the use of their gifts does not lead them to unloving or evil motives, attitudes, or actions.

12:10 Paul's charge goes against the value of rugged individualism—the attitude of “doing it all by myself.” Believers are to show brotherly love to fellow believers, and respect all the gifted people in the church, not just those whose gifts are visible. That's the only way that the body of Christ can function effectively and make a positive impact on the unbelieving world. The Greek word for genuine affection pictures the type of loyalty and affection that family members have for one another. This kind of love allows for weaknesses and imperfections, communicates, deals with problems, affirms others, and has a strong commitment and loyalty to others. Such a bond will hold any church together no matter what problems come from without or within.

God's command for us to delight in honoring each other involves love. To honor means to give a person high value and respect. As Christians, we honor people because they have been created in God's image, because they are our brothers and sisters in Christ, and because they have a unique contribution to make to Christ's church (see also Ephesians 5:21; Philippians 2:3).

12:11 As believers who serve the Lord enthusiastically, it follows that we would never want to be lazy. Paul is not advocating activity for activity's sake. Rather, we should consistently use our spiritual gifts to serve the body. We have been called (1:6-7), challenged (12:1-2), and equipped (12:4-6) for serving the Lord. Fatigue may be part of the cycle of service, but apathy (lack of zeal) should not be part of a believer's life. Christians must fight against discouragement, depression, and negativity; they must do their utmost to keep their spiritual temperature high.

12:12 This means that we should look forward with happy anticipation to all that God is planning for us. We don't have to fear our future when it is in God's hands. Christ is the reason that we can be joyful. When we face trouble or persecution, we are to be patient, for we know God is in control (see also 5:2-5). A trademark of believers is prayer, for it is our lifeline to God. We must always be prayerful, both individually and corporately.

12:13 For believers, the challenges of the Christian life are constantly shifting between what we experience personally and what we experience because we are part of the body of Christ. Gifts, love, hope, patience, and prayer are valuable, but they do not take precedence over other believers' needs. Because we are members of Christ's body, we must help those who are in need. This was another trademark of believers, and it was often what drew nonbelievers to Christianity (see Acts 2:44-45; 4:34-37; 11:27-30).

To get into the habit of inviting guests refers to hospitality. Christian hospitality differs from social entertaining. Entertaining focuses on the host—the home must be spotless; the food must be well prepared and abundant; the host must appear relaxed and good-natured. Hospitality, in contrast, focuses on the guests. Their needs—whether for a place to stay, nourishing food, a listening ear, or acceptance—are the primary concern. Hospitality can happen in a messy home. It can happen around a dinner table where the main dish is canned soup. Believers should not hesitate to offer hospitality just because they are not wealthy enough to entertain.

12:14 Paul now broadens his perspective to the world where the believers live—in this case, the capital of the empire, Rome itself. The community of believers was a tiny segment, vulnerable to the edicts of pagan emperors and persecution by any who disagreed with them. Paul, aware of these realities, counsels believers to avoid trouble by refusing to retaliate when persecuted and to respond with good when they are treated with evil, as Jesus had instructed as well (Matthew 5:44).

12:15 Christians should be happy with others, with no hint of jealousy; and they should share the sorrow of fellow believers, offering kindness, concern, compassion, and a shoulder to cry on if needed. The believers needed to have this as they dealt with the ups and downs of daily life in their surroundings.

Following Jesus will mean that believers will pass through a kaleidoscope of experiences in life. Christianity is neither denying life's hardships, nor dulling life's excitements. Our perspective of eternity in Christ can free us to enter into the full variety of living. Both laughter and tears are appropriate before God. Each has an important place in representing our feelings. Identifying with the joys and heartaches of others is also an important way to show them our love.

12:16 In order to live in harmony with others, and especially with fellow believers, we must not act important or think we know it all. Instead, we are to enjoy the company of ordinary people. James leveled a scathing indictment on believers who were practicing favoritism and elitism in the church (James 2:1-9). People of low position are only identified as such by the world's standards. Christ thought they were worth dying for, and so we can associate with them.

12:17 The commands in verses 17-21 relate mainly to dealings with nonbelievers. When people do evil against us, we are never to pay back evil for evil, as much as we might like to (see also 1 Peter 3:9). Instead, we are to do things in such a way that everyone can see we are honorable (see 1 Peter 2:11-12). Paul's standard for behavior was not common consensus, but godliness. The point being made here is that the behavior of believers must be such that no one can rightfully make a claim of wrongdoing. To commit the same evil that was committed against us makes us indistinguishable from the original offenders.

12:18 Paul counsels believers to have as peaceful relations as possible with their unbelieving neighbors and associates. In a perfect world, all people could live peacefully together. Realistically this is impossible in our imperfect world. However, believers, as the salt of the earth, should do their part to live in peace with everyone. They certainly are not to be the cause of dissension. Believers should do their utmost to seek reconciliation.

12:19 Quoting from Deuteronomy 32:35, Paul reminds us that though we may want to avenge ourselves, we must leave that to God. Refusing to take revenge avoids grudges and feuds. God will ensure that his just vengeance will be given.

12:20 The opposite of repaying with evil and taking revenge is caring for our enemies. Believers are not simply expected to abstain from evil; rather, they are expected to actively pursue opportunities to care for an enemy's needs. God invites us to observe our enemies and at the very points of weakness, where a counterattack of revenge might be most effective, we should mercifully meet that need. This will make them ashamed of their actions toward us.

12:21 Do not give in to your desire to take revenge or retaliate with evil; instead, act in a positive way. Paul comes full circle back to his point of verse 9. To hate evil is to conquer it by doing good. When we hang on for dear life to those things that are good and to God, we will be overcoming evil. All of this will be accomplished to the degree that we allow God to create in us sincere love.

RESPECT FOR AUTHORITY / 13:1-7

Paul ends chapter 12 by exhorting his readers about their Christian lifestyle as they relate to unbelieving neighbors, employers, and others. In chapter 13, he discusses how Christians should relate to the government. Remember, Paul's immediate audience was in Rome, the capital city of the mighty Roman Empire.

13:1 Paul says that believers are to obey the government. These were wise words to this small group of believers living within the massive structure of the Roman Empire. It wouldn't take much for an imperial edict to fall on a group who might become known for causing unrest within the empire. Their quiet submission would not guarantee peace, but at least it might allow them to continue to spread the gospel freely for a time.

Paul does not recommend either of the two possible extreme responses to the presence of a hostile authority. He does not favor believers becoming like the Zealots, Jewish rebels who fought (often violently) for freedom from Rome; neither does he suggest that they withdraw to the desert to set up their own community far from the evil city. Instead, Paul explains how Christians should live within the structure. Only then would they be able to share the gospel and transform society.

Why should they do this? Because all governments have been placed in power by God. He allows all governments and leaders to function under his sovereign will. Government is ideally in place to protect and serve its citizens. When governments distort or betray this function, those who run them will answer to God. They are under God's constraint and under his final judgment (see also Psalm 2; Daniel 4:34-35).

13:2 Citizens of any government should respect their government and obey its laws. If they refuse to obey the laws of the land, they are ultimately refusing to obey God and can expect punishment. For hundreds of years, however, there have been at least three interpretations of how we are to do this.

1. Some Christians believe that the state is so corrupt that Christians should have as little to do with it as possible. Although they should be good citizens as long as they can do so without compromising their beliefs, they should not work for the government, vote in elections, or serve in the military.

2. Others believe that God has given the state authority in certain areas and the church authority in others. Christians can be loyal to both and can work for either. They should not, however, confuse the two. In this view, church and state are concerned with two totally different spheres—the spiritual and the physical—and thus complement each other but do not work together.
3. Still others believe that Christians have a responsibility to make the state better. They can do this politically, by electing Christian or other high-principled leaders. They can also do this morally, by serving as an influence for good in society. In this view, church and state ideally work together for the good of all.

None of these views advocates rebelling against or refusing to obey laws or regulations unless those laws clearly require a person to violate the moral standards revealed by God. Wherever we find ourselves, we must be responsible citizens, as well as responsible Christians.

Are there times when we should not submit to the government? Paul does not address this question here, but other passages of Scripture give guidelines and examples. The government can demand respect, obedience, taxes, and honor from its citizens inasmuch as God appoints governments to protect people. When a government demands allegiance that conflicts with a believer's loyalty to God, Christians must respond in a different way. Believers should never allow the government to force them to disobey God. Jesus and his apostles never disobeyed the government for personal reasons; when they disobeyed, they were following their higher loyalty to God (Acts 5:29). Their disobedience was not cheap; they were threatened, beaten, thrown into jail, tortured, and executed for their convictions. If we are compelled to disobey, we must be ready to accept the consequences (see 1 Peter 2:13-14; 4:15-16).

13:3-4 These verses focus on officials who are doing their duty. Society needs leadership and positive constraints in order to ensure the safety and well-being of its citizens. When these officials are just, people who are doing right have nothing to fear. Governments that serve well facilitate and encourage citizens to do right. Christians are not to use their freedom in Christ as a handy excuse for disobeying the laws of the state. Civil disobedience should come only after submission to authority has been practiced. We should be informed and willing to question the motives of those who govern us, but we should be more demanding and more suspicious of our own motives. We must be careful not to be ruled by our sinful desires. Our protest may not be spiritual but rooted in our offended pride or hatred of any authority. This response is not directed by Christ or the Holy Spirit.

Rulers are in their position only because God has placed them there (Proverbs 21:1). All earthly governments are temporary—only Christ's reign will be eternal. To rebel against them is to rebel against their God-given authority. In practice, the responsibilities and opportunities of the politically powerful and the politically powerless will differ. For believers in a hostile environment, cooperation may be the most realistic approach. Believers who have the opportunity to affect change must challenge, speak out, offer solutions, and confront the power structure.

13:5 Believers have two good reasons to submit to their government: to keep from being punished and to keep a clear conscience. Believers know in their consciences that obeying the authorities pleases God. However, a believer's conscience answers to a higher, divine authority; if ever the human authority contradicted the divine authority, a believer must be true to his conscience in following the higher authority.

True citizenship is rarely rewarded. Faithfully carrying out our small duties may not gain recognition. But Paul reminds the Romans that God notices every action. When we obey the government because it serves God, God knows our real motives.

13:6 Believers are called not only to submit to authorities, but also to support them by paying taxes (see also Matthew 22:21; Mark 12:17). Taxes pay the salaries for government workers so they can keep on doing the work God intended them to do. This was a heated topic at the time Paul wrote—he does not refer to this in any other letter. Government taxation, and abuses of taxation, were causing great unrest in the city. Christians might be thinking that they could get away with not paying the inflated taxes, but that would inevitably draw the attention of the authorities and put the believers at unnecessary risk. So Paul says to pay. In this regard Paul followed Jesus, who told Peter to pay taxes so as not to offend the governing authorities (Matthew 17:24-27). Paul is not teaching that all the authorities in Rome are God's servants in the same sense as the believers are God's servants. The powers in Rome were arbitrary and often self-serving. But they were God's servants, ultimately responsible to the one who set them in place.

13:7 Christians are not exempt from fulfilling the expectations of any government. This verse also prepares for Paul's idea of debt in the next section. We must certainly pay taxes to the government, but our obligation also extends to others to whom we may owe a debt of respect and honor.

LOVE FULFILLS GOD'S REQUIREMENTS / 13:8-14

Paul's practical directions for Christian living have a distinct pattern. Each time he focuses on a set of applications, whether it is gifts (chapter 12), government (chapter 13), or personal convictions (chapter 14), Paul always anticipates the question, Why should we do this? In this section, Paul teaches that love is an urgent requirement for believers. Love is not to be withheld for later. We must live as if this were our last day on earth. One day will be the last day—will Christ find us loving others?

13:8-10 If we owe something, we should pay the debt. But we must ask, Is Paul against home mortgages and school loans? Paul is not teaching against borrowing, except as it applies to borrowing things or money that we cannot hope to repay. Careless or deceitful debt is not acceptable behavior among believers. To this point Jesus adds the command that his followers ought to be known as willing lenders and givers (Matthew 5:42). We are to be responsible to make payments and not borrow beyond our ability to pay. One debt should never be paid in full, however. We should never finish paying our debt of love for others (see also John 13:34-35; Galatians 5:22; Ephesians 5:1-2; 1 John 3:11-24; 4:7-21).

The commandments against adultery, murder, stealing, and coveting that Paul quotes are directly from the Ten Commandments. They apply to our relationships with others (see Exodus 20:13-15, 17). Paul lists them to show that they all fit under a broader commandment: “Love your neighbor as yourself,” quoted from Leviticus 19:18. When we love others, we will not purposely harm or do evil to them, so love satisfies all of God's requirements.

Christians must obey the law of love, which supersedes both religious and civil laws. It is easy to excuse our indifference to others merely because we have no legal obligation to help them, and even to justify harming them if our actions are technically legal! But Jesus does not leave loopholes in the law of love. Whenever love demands it, we are to go beyond human legal requirements and imitate the God of love.

13:11 Paul wants believers to realize their constant need to show love, especially considering the time—Christ's return is near. New Testament passages on the return of Christ center on our responsibility to be morally prepared, spiritually alert, and diligently serving (1 Peter 4:11; James 5:8; 1 John 2:18). Believers must be vigilant, alert, and not caught unaware. Paul knows that the old sinful nature will still cause problems from time to time, but he requires believers to wake up. Remaining too long in a state of spiritual lethargy, where sin is tolerated and good works are not pursued, can lead to a spiritual coma, rendering us unresponsive to God (see Ephesians 5:14; 1 Corinthians 15:34).

The return of Christ and our ultimate and final salvation is nearer now than when we first believed. Each day that passes brings us closer to the time of Christ's return, when we will be taken to heaven to be with him forever. (See also Mark 13:13; Luke 21:28; 1 Thessalonians 5:4-11; Hebrews 9:28.) Time is running out so we need to make every minute count for right living.

13:12 The night refers to the present, evil time. The day refers to the time of Christ's return. Believers in Paul's day, as well as believers today, are living in the night, the time of darkness characterized by Satan's evil work (see 2 Corinthians 4:4; Ephesians 2:2). Believers must get rid of their evil deeds and clothe themselves with the armor of right living. As Paul explains in Ephesians 6:10-17, this armor represents all the features that make up God's gift of justification by faith (see also John 12:36; Ephesians 5:8; 1 Thessalonians 5:4, 5; 1 John 1:7; 2:10). We should depend on God's strength and use every resource that he has given us.

13:13 To put on the armor of light (13:12) means to be decent and true in everything we do, so that everyone can approve of our behavior. The world is still in darkness, but we are to behave decently, in a way that will stand up to examination. For believers, the surrounding darkness is no excuse for indecent behavior.

The wild parties and getting drunk, the adultery and immoral living, the fighting and jealousy are examples of what does not please God; actions, activities, and attitudes that belong to the darkness. These have no place in the believer's life. (See also Galatians 5:19-21.)

Some people are surprised that Paul lists fighting and jealousy with the gross and obvious sins of drunkenness and sexual immorality. Like Jesus in his Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5-7), Paul considers attitudes to be as important as actions. Just as hatred leads to murder, so jealousy leads to strife, and lust to adultery. When Christ returns, he wants to find his people clean on the inside as well as on the outside.

13:14 So how do we clothe ourselves "with the armor of right living" (13:12)? How can we "be decent and true" (13:13)? The answer: We let the Lord Jesus Christ take control of us (Ephesians 4:24; Colossians 3:10). This is deliberate, conscious acceptance of the lordship of Christ, so all our desires and actions are under his control. Letting him have control means avoiding indulging our evil desires. Sinful actions and sinful attitudes all start with a single thought. Just as in violent crimes, where premeditation is a factor, premeditation is the first step toward gratifying our desires. A temptation becomes an opportunity to plan to sin. But as harmless as imagination may seem to be, it actually impels us toward our desires. If we don't make plans, we can't carry them out.

ROMANS 14

THE DANGER OF CRITICISM / 14:1-23

Paul has already established the equality of Jewish and Gentile believers. In this chapter he continues to discuss how that equality could work out in daily living. Paul focuses on two issues: dietary restrictions and observance of special days. Next to circumcision, diet and calendar were the most sensitive issues that separated Jews from all Gentiles. Now, as Jews and Gentiles attempted to work out their distinctive character as Christians, these issues had to be resolved.

14:1 The key word is accept, which also means “receive” or “welcome.” Believers in the church in Rome came from a wide variety of backgrounds. As we’ve already seen, the major differences were between Jewish believers and Gentile believers. But there were other differences. Some believers were slaves, some were masters; some were wealthy, most were poor. In addition, they were all at different stages of spiritual maturity. Growing in the spirit is like growing physically—everyone grows at different rates as God works in each life. So the first instruction Paul gives the church is to accept, welcome, and love one another without judging or condemning—no matter how weak, immature, or unlearned someone’s faith may seem. Acceptance creates room for growth to continue; rejection stunts growth.

Who is weak in faith, and who is strong? Every believer is weak in some areas and strong in others. A person’s faith is strong in an area if he or she can survive contact with sinners without falling into their patterns. The person’s faith is weak in an area if that individual must avoid certain activities, people, or places in order to protect his or her spiritual life. Paul advises that those strong in an area should not argue with those who are weak about what they think is right or wrong. This refers not to doctrines essential to salvation, but to discussions about differences of lifestyle. Paul says we are not to quarrel about issues that are matters of opinion. Differences should not be feared or avoided, but accepted and handled with love. We shouldn’t expect everyone, even in the best church, to agree on every subject. Through sharing ideas we can come to a fuller understanding of what the Bible teaches. Our basic approach should be to accept, listen to, and respect others. Differences of opinion need not cause division. They can be a source of learning and richness in our relationships.

14:2 Believing it is all right to eat anything may refer to freedom from certain Jewish dietary restrictions. When Jews became Christians, many still would be concerned about the proper preparation of food according to their laws. Some believers were more sensitive and would eat only vegetables, most likely for fear that meat might have been improperly prepared or offered to idols.

How could Christians end up eating meat that had been offered to idols? An ancient sacrificial system was at the center of religious, social, and domestic life in the Roman world. After a sacrifice was presented to a god in a pagan temple, only part of it was burned. Often the remainder was sent to the market to be sold. Thus a Christian might easily, even unknowingly, buy such meat in the marketplace or eat it at the home of a friend. Some thought there was nothing wrong with eating meat that had been offered to idols because idols were worthless and phony. Others carefully checked the source of their meat or gave up meat altogether to avoid a guilty conscience. This problem was especially acute for Christians who had once been idol worshipers. For them, such a strong reminder of their former paganism might weaken their newfound faith (see also 1 Corinthians 8).

Paul is speaking about immature faith that has not yet developed the strength it needs to stand against external pressures. For example, if a person who once worshiped idols were to become a Christian, he might understand perfectly well that Christ saved him through faith and that idols have no real power. Still, because of his past associations, he might be badly shaken if he knowingly ate meat that had been used as part of a pagan ritual. The same would be true for a Jew whose strict observance to the law would cause him to be concerned about the preparation of the meat.

14:3 When believers differ over scruples or matters of opinion, they must not look down on or condemn each other. The Greek for look down on means “despise” (see) or “reject with contempt.” The stronger one faces the temptation to despise the weaker brother or sister. The weaker one is in danger of condemning the stronger brother or sister. Neither attitude is acceptable. Believers should not condemn each other for their different opinions, because God does not; instead, God has accepted them both.

Paul responds to both brothers in love. Both are acting according to their consciences, but their honest scruples do not need to be made into rules for the church. Our principle should be: In essentials, unity; in nonessentials, liberty; in everything, love.

14:4 Every believer will be judged by God alone (14:10); therefore, believers have no right to condemn one another. Each person is accountable to Christ, not to others (see also Matthew 7:3-5; Luke 6:37, 41-42; 1 Corinthians 4:3-5). While the church must be uncompromising in its stand against activities that are expressly forbidden by Scripture (such as adultery, homosexuality, murder, theft), it should not create additional rules and regulations and give them equal standing with God's law. Often Christians base their moral judgments on opinion, personal dislikes, or cultural bias, rather than on the Word of God. When they do this, they show that their own faith is weak, and they demonstrate that they do not think God is powerful enough to guide each of his children. When we stand before God's judgment seat (14:10), we won't be worried about what our Christian neighbor has done (see 2 Corinthians 5:10).

14:5 For Jews, this holy day would have probably been the Sabbath; for Christians, the Lord's day (Sunday). The believers had differing opinions about the sacredness of certain days. For example, if a Jew who once worshiped God on the required Jewish holy days were to become a Christian, he might well know that Christ saved him through faith, not through his keeping of the law. Still, when the feast days came, he might feel empty and unfaithful if he didn't dedicate those days to God. Other believers might not have any concern about that and might think that every day is alike—in other words, every day is holy to the Lord. (See also Colossians 2:16-17.)

The position of each is no matter to Paul, but he does add that each person should have a personal conviction about this matter through prayer and careful thought examining whether that action is what he or she believes God wants him or her to do. People must decide for themselves before God and be convinced of the rightness of their position, even if it means disagreeing with other believers. Believers can disagree on some points and can still be acceptable to God.

14:6 When it comes to differences of opinion between believers on matters of conscience, each believer should respond to the Lord, doing as his or her conscience dictates. This great principle of freedom should guide us: we are to dedicate our actions, attitudes, and habits to the Lord. Thus whether we are setting aside a day to honor God, or eating different kinds of food, or refusing to eat certain kinds of food—in all cases we must want to please the Lord. The questions that others ask us about our convictions should cause us to ask, "Am I doing this out of respect for God?"

14:7-8 We do not live in a vacuum; everything we do affects others. We need to consider our responsibility to others. We can demand freedom for ourselves, but we must also allow other believers that same freedom. If demonstrating our freedom causes us to act in an uncaring, hurtful way toward other believers, we are not yet free. Ultimately we are not our own masters. Our entire life, from beginning to end, belongs to the Lord. We live to him and die to him. Our relationship with the Lord is more important than life or death, and life and death are more important than religious observances. So all our discussions must never interfere with our relationship to Christ, who is our Lord. It is the Lord's judgment that matters. With respect to the way we treat other believers, we ought to consider the question, "Am I treating people as though they also belong to the Lord?"

14:9 Christ died to free us and to deliver us from judgment. He alone is our judge. For any believer to claim to have the authority to tell others how they should think or act in matters of opinion is to usurp the position that Christ alone holds.

14:10 Believers are not to condemn one another, because all of us will be judged by Christ. Each of us will stand personally before the judgment seat of God to give an account of our actions. This is not where God judges the eternal destiny of all people, but where believers' lives will be judged for what they have done (see also Matthew 12:36; 1 Peter 4:5).

14:11 Quoting from Isaiah 45:23, Paul explains that a time of judgment will come. Isaiah referred to the day when every knee will bow before God. It was God's original intention to bring all the people to himself through Abraham, but the Jews had discarded God's message to the Gentiles. We must never participate in rejecting those whom God has accepted. We must be convinced that we will be held responsible for our own lives before God. Each person will give an account for himself or herself (14:12; Matthew 12:36). We are to confront one another in love, concern, and truth, but not in judgment.

14:12 Each believer will have to give a personal account to God. Each of us will have enough to explain without adding condemning or mocking attitudes toward other believers. We need each other, so we simply cannot afford to be undercutting each other. If anything, we ought to be busy helping ourselves and our fellow believers so that we can give a good account of ourselves to God. In the front lines of a battle, all the soldiers on your side look good.

14:13 Believers are to not judge one another regarding their convictions on matters of opinion. Here Paul directs his words to the "strong" believers, explaining that they need to be sensitive about how their convictions affect other believers. Each believer, though free to have his or her own convictions, must also be careful that those convictions don't put an obstacle in another Christian's path. And if they do, then those freedoms must be reevaluated.

Both "strong" and "weak" Christians can cause their brothers and sisters to stumble. A stumbling block or obstacle refers to something that might cause someone to trip or fall into sin. The strong but insensitive Christian may flaunt his or her freedom, be a harmful example, and thus offend others' consciences. The scrupulous but weak Christian may try to fence others in with petty rules and regulations, thus causing dissension. Paul wants his readers to be both strong in the faith and sensitive to others' needs. Because we are all strong in certain areas and weak in others, we constantly need to monitor the effects of our behavior on others (see also 1 Corinthians 8:9).

14:14 Referring back to the issue of food (14:2-3, 6), Paul states his own conviction that no food, in and of itself, is wrong to eat. But not all believers felt the same way. At the Jerusalem council (Acts 15), for example, the Jewish church in Jerusalem asked the Gentile church in Antioch not to eat meat that had been sacrificed to idols. Paul accepted this request, not because he felt that eating such meat was wrong in itself, but because this practice would deeply offend many Jewish believers. Paul did not think the issue was worth dividing the church over; his desire was to promote unity. So, he concludes, if someone believes it is wrong, then for that person it is wrong (see also Mark 7:14-23). Paul's practice was to honor, as far as possible, the convictions of others.

Believers are called to accept one another without judging our varied opinions. However, when the situation has to be faced, how should we deal with those who disagree with us? Paul's response is that all believers should act in love so as to maintain peace in the church.

14:15-16 If one believer has no scruples about where meat comes from or how it is prepared, but flaunts his or her belief in order to cause one who is concerned to be distressed, then the stronger individual is not acting in love. The conduct of stronger believers is not to be decided by what they feel is their better insight into the Scriptures, or what they feel would "strengthen" those weaker ones. Rather, it is to be decided by love and sensitivity. The stronger believer must not let what he or she wants to do, when it is a minor matter such as whether to eat meat or not, become a stumbling block that could ruin someone for whom Christ died. If Christ gave his life for that person, surely no believer has the option to ruin him or her because of food!

Mature Christians shouldn't flaunt their freedom; otherwise, they might be condemned for doing something that is all right simply because their doing it destroyed another believer. Mature believers should be sensitive to younger converts whose faith can be destroyed by such freedom. For example, a young Christian addicted to gambling may be damaged by our freedom to play cards. Some activities may be all right in and of themselves, but not around weaker new converts.

14:17-18 After all, says Paul, if we let those little scruples become major points of contention, we have forgotten what the Kingdom of God is all about. It has nothing to do with what we eat or drink (Matthew 6:31, 33). Instead, it is living a life of goodness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit. Arguing over scruples does not contribute to that. Believers need to concern themselves with doing what is right in the essentials, maintaining harmony, and sharing God's joy, not in forcing their scruples and lifestyles on others. Those who serve Christ by doing right before God, maintaining peace among the believers, and sharing joy with others are the ones who will accomplish the acceptable service to Christ—they will please God and people.

14:19 Christian fellowship should be characterized by harmony and building each other up (see also 1 Thessalonians 5:11). False believers and immature Christians have been known to use the "weaker brother argument" to support their own opinions, prejudices, or standards. "You must live by these standards," they say, "or you will be offending the weaker brother." In truth, the person would often be offending no one but the speaker. While Paul urges us to be sensitive to those whose faith may be harmed by our actions, we should not sacrifice our liberty in Christ just to satisfy the selfish motives of those who are trying to force their opinions on us. Strong believers need not judge their own liberty by the troubled consciences of the weak. Each believer is to follow Christ.

14:20-21 Food and our feelings about it, or any scruples that are not specifically condemned in Scripture, are not worth arguing about, flaunting, or judging—these should never be allowed to tear down other believers or tear apart the church. It is wrong for one believer to insist on his or her freedom when it causes others to stumble. If it causes someone else to fall, then put it aside for the other's sake (see also 1 Corinthians 10:23-24, 31-32). Therefore, mature believers must not eat meat or drink wine or do anything else if it might cause another Christian to stumble. Truly strong believers can restrict their freedoms for the sake of others.

14:22 In those areas of disagreement, Paul counsels the believers to keep their beliefs between themselves and God. The brother or sister who believes in certain freedoms should not be trying to influence others with scruples to “loosen up.” Those bothered by some actions should not be judging or condemning those with freedom, nor should they be trying to force their scruples on the entire church. Instead all believers should seek a clear conscience before God. The believers who do so are blessed and do not condemn themselves by doing something they know is all right. This person has a good, but not insensitive, conscience.

14:23 If a believer does something that he or she has doubts about whether it is right or wrong, that action will bring condemnation. Believers ought to try to steer clear of actions forbidden by Scripture, of course, but sometimes Scripture is silent. Then we should follow our conscience. To go against a conviction will leave a person with a guilty or uneasy conscience. When God shows us that something is wrong for us, we should avoid it. But we should not look down on other Christians who exercise their freedom in those areas.

ROMANS 15

LIVING TO PLEASE OTHERS / 15:1-13

Paul continues his discussion from chapter 14 on how believers should relate to one another, especially when there are disagreements on matters of opinion. There is no question that a variety of opinions on many matters will be represented in any church—and the church in Rome was no exception. Paul uses “strong” and “weak” to describe the believers. “Strong” believers are those who understand their freedom in Christ and who are sensitive to the concerns of others. They realize that true obedience comes from the heart and conscience of each individual. “Weak” believers are those whose faith has not yet matured so as to be free of some of the rituals and traditions. “Strong” believers can function in a variety of situations and be influences for good; “weak” believers find that they need to stay away from some situations in order to maintain a clear conscience. But both are still believers, and both are still seeking to obey God.

15:1 Paul identifies himself as one of the “strong” who knows that these things (issues of food and drink) make no difference when it comes to salvation. But yet these strong believers are not to live just to please themselves. They have an obligation to be considerate of the doubts and fears of those who think these things are wrong. They may find themselves frustrated by the failings of the weak—their concerns and worries over what, to the strong, seems trivial. But the responsibility lies with the strong to maintain harmony in the church by bearing with these brothers and sisters (see Galatians 6:1-2). The stronger believers demonstrate their spiritual strength precisely at those moments when they are practicing compassion for those who are weaker. The kind of strength modeled by Christ allowed him to put up with our failings. We ought to do the same for one another.

15:2 The strong believer must never be self-centered, but must be concerned for the spiritual welfare of his neighbor—the weaker person beside him or her in the congregation. To please others is done with a goal in mind—to encourage and build up that other believer in the faith. There is a fine line to walk—the stronger person should not push the weaker one to change his or her ways before he or she is ready; neither should the stronger person pander to the scruples of that weaker one by allowing such scruples to become rules for the church. Instead, the stronger believers should bear with (15:1) and work to help the weaker believers in their faith; this will benefit the church as a whole.

15:3 Christ was the “strongest” human who ever lived—he didn’t please himself, but did God’s will. Certainly death on a cruel cross was not the path he would have chosen to please himself, but his mission was to please God (see John 4:34; 5:30; 8:29). Strength is not independence from God, but total dependence on God. Strength in the church doesn’t come from each believer being completely independent, but from mutual interdependence. Truly strong believers are those who are willing to limit their freedoms in order to care for and love their weaker brothers and sisters. Paul quotes from Psalm 69:9. This messianic psalm prophesied the Messiah’s coming into the world and what would happen to him. Christ faced reproach and insults because he did not choose to please himself; instead, he chose to do what God had called him to do. How much more should we, who are called by his name, also choose to please God rather than ourselves.

15:4 The Scriptures (here referring to the Old Testament) were written and preserved for future generations. Our scriptural knowledge affects our attitude toward the present and the future. The more we know about what God has done in years past, the greater will be our confidence in what he will do in the days ahead. We should read our Bible diligently to increase our trust that God’s will is best for us.

How does the Bible give us hope and encouragement? (1) God’s attributes and character constantly remind us in whom our hope is based (Psalm 46:1-2). (2) The biographies of saints who overcame great obstacles give us examples of what can be done with God’s help (Hebrews 11). (3) The direct exhortation of Scripture calls for endurance and speaks encouragement (James 1:2-4; Hebrews 12:1-2). (4) The prophetic statements support our hope for a wonderful future planned for us in eternity (Romans 5:1-5).

Paul admonishes strong believers not to please themselves but to please God and others. Scripture records stories of those who pleased God, those who didn’t, and those who failed but learned from their mistakes. We are to endure as Christ endured and be encouraged by the examples of other believers. This gives us hope as we wait patiently for God’s promises.

15:5-6 The patience and encouragement received from the Scriptures (15:4) have their ultimate source in God, for the Scriptures are his. Paul asks God to give the believers an attitude of harmony—Jews and Gentiles, weak and strong—as they seek to follow Christ. This prayer is strikingly similar to the one Jesus prayed with his disciples at the end of his final meal with them (John 17:22-23). Harmony is not an optional behavior for believers. They must have the attitude of Christ Jesus toward one another. Doing so would allow all believers to join together with one voice, giving praise and glory to God. This should be the ultimate purpose of each believer and of the entire church.

15:7 If our goal is to glorify God, we cannot be caught up in dissension, disagreements, or arguments, especially about trivial matters. Instead, we should accept each other just as Christ has accepted us—there is to be no one-sided acceptance. All are to accept one another and live in harmony. At one time, we all were weak. And many strong believers are still weak in some areas. Christ is our model of what acceptance means. When we realize that Christ accepted us, as unlovely and sinful and immature as we were when we came to him (see 5:6, 8, 10), then we will accept our brothers and sisters. The world sits up and takes notice when believers of widely differing backgrounds practice Christlike acceptance. In this, God will be glorified.

15:8-9 Having referred to harmony again, Paul feels compelled to remind his readers that the greatest example of harmony brings both Jews and Gentiles under the lordship of Christ. Jesus came as a servant to the Jews to show that God is true to the promises he made to their ancestors. At the same time, Christ came so the Gentiles might also give glory to God for his mercies to them. The promises, the covenants, were made to the patriarchs of the Jewish nation alone, but God, in his mercy, made them available to the Gentiles as well. God's offer of salvation to the Gentiles would cause them to glorify him for his mercy. Without God's mercy, the Gentiles could never receive his blessings and his salvation.

To offer final proof, Paul quoted four Old Testament passages, taken from the three divisions of the Old Testament—the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms. The Old Testament pictured the Gentiles as receiving blessings from God. First, Paul quotes from Psalm 18:49 and 2 Samuel 22:50. In this psalm and the parallel passage in 2 Samuel 22, David, the psalmist, praises God for delivering him from his enemies and from King Saul who was trying to kill him. He writes that he would praise God among the Gentiles, not just among his own people.

15:10 The next quote is from Deuteronomy 32:43, sometimes called “The Song of Moses,” where Moses poetically recites a brief history of Israel, reminds the people of their mistakes, warns them to avoid repetition of those mistakes, and offers the hope that comes only in trusting God. Moses calls the Gentiles to rejoice with the Jews.

15:11 In this quote from Psalm 117:1, the psalmist calls the Gentiles to praise God. It must have been startling, at times, for Jews to be reminded from their own Scriptures that the God who had chosen them was not theirs alone. Since God's unlimited love has been extended to all people, Jewish Christians should accept the Gentile Christians as full-fledged participants in God's Kingdom.

15:12 Paul quotes from the prophet Isaiah in Isaiah 11:10. The heir to David's throne refers to Christ. He will rule over the Gentiles who will place their hopes on him. Isaiah prophesied that the Gentiles would also hope in or believe in the Messiah.

In the foregoing quotations, Paul demonstrated that the Old Testament spoke of the Gentiles being included in the messianic Kingdom. Since Christ would rule over both the Jews and the Gentiles, they should accept each other as members of God's family.

15:13 Paul again prays for the believers (as in 15:5). This time Paul prays that God who gives hope will also keep them happy and full of peace as they anticipate what God has in store for them. Then, the believers can overflow with hope through the power of the Holy Spirit. It is by the power of the Holy Spirit that God accomplishes his care for his people—giving them endurance, encouragement, unity (15:5), hope, joy, and peace. Hope comes as a by-product of the Holy Spirit's work. It does not come from our own senses or experiences. This is Paul's benediction to his letter. What follows from this point are his personal plans and greetings.

PAUL'S REASON FOR WRITING / 15:14-22

Although Paul referred briefly to his reason for writing earlier in the letter, here in his closing remarks, he says more about his reasons for writing. He also explains his writing style. In these verses, we feel the heartbeat of Paul's missionary zeal.

15:14 Although Paul had never met most of the believers in Rome, he was convinced (most likely from reports he had heard of them) that they were spiritually mature. Paul knew they were doing good and living to please God, that they had a full understanding of the truth of the gospel, and were able to counsel and help guide one another. Paul was practicing the kind of encouragement that he had just asked them to use with each other.

15:15-16 Paul knew these believers were mature, but he wrote this lengthy letter on the basics of Christianity to remind them. It may have seemed bold of him to write in this manner to a church he had not founded, but he was the apostle to the Gentiles, and it was in that capacity that he wrote to them. (See also 2 Peter 1:12; 3:1-2.) He is qualified to write to them because God had allowed him the special privilege of being a special messenger from Christ Jesus to the Gentiles. Paul viewed his ministry to the Gentiles as a priestly duty. He faithfully proclaimed the gospel to the Gentiles so that they would receive the Good News, and become acceptable to God, pure and pleasing to him by the Holy Spirit. Paul's missionary work was an act of worship. He viewed the Gentile church as a fragrant sacrifice which he presented to God for his acceptance.

15:17 Paul did not glory in what he had done, but in what God had done through him. He was not proud, but he was enthusiastic. This caused him to glory in his service because of what Christ was accomplishing through him. We should reevaluate our attitudes in service and ministry. How often do we view our efforts as giving glory to God?

15:18-19 Being proud of God's work is not a sin—it is worship. Paul knew that all the glory for his ministry went to Christ alone, for it was Christ who was accomplishing the work of bringing the Gentiles to God. But Paul well understood that he was the vessel through whom God was working because the mission to the Gentiles was being accomplished by what Paul had said and done. Paul had, by the power of God's Spirit, done miracles and signs to verify the authority of his words. Because of the Holy Spirit's empowerment, Paul had taken the Good News from Jerusalem to Illyricum. Also known as Dalmatia (see 2 Timothy 4:10), Illyricum was a Roman territory on the Adriatic Sea between present-day Italy and Greece. It covered much the same territory as present-day Yugoslavia. (See the map in the Introduction.)

15:20 The reason for the extent of Paul's ministry was the driving ambition to share Christ in territories where the name of Christ has never been heard. Paul saw his mission as moving into the centers of population, starting a church, being sure it had a good foundation, then allowing it to continue the work of evangelization in its area while Paul moved on to areas uncharted by the gospel. Other preachers would have brought the gospel to some areas that Paul had not gone to; they would be involved in the follow-up and spiritual growth of the believers there. Paul did not want to move into those areas when it was more important for him to preach where people had not yet heard the Good News.

15:21 Paul quoted from part of Isaiah 52:15 to show that those who had been ignorant of God's word would respond positively to the Messiah. Isaiah predicted how surprised the Gentile nations would be when they saw the humiliation and exaltation of God's Servant, the Messiah. Paul uses this prophetic word to affirm the need for his missionary efforts to the Gentiles.

15:22 Because of his driving force to bring the gospel to people who had not yet heard, Paul had been delayed from going to Rome. He had much territory to cover in Asia Minor and around Greece, so it seems likely that he postponed his trip to Rome because there was already a strong church there.

PAUL'S TRAVEL PLANS / 15:23-33

It is quite evident that Paul was not aware that his plan to go to Rome was about to be accomplished in a way he did not foresee. His imprisonment in Jerusalem and in Caesarea and his eventual travel to Rome was completely at the expense of the Roman Empire.

15:23 At this point, Paul felt that enough local churches have been established throughout the area (not just by him, but by the other apostles and other missionaries) that these churches could complete the work of evangelization. Because he feels that his work in the regions of Jerusalem and Greece has been finished, and because of his great desire to meet the believers in Rome, he will visit them on his next trip. The fact that he knows so many of them personally is reason enough for his desire (see chapter 16). But up to this point, his pioneering missionary work has taken all his time.

15:24 The planned destination of Paul's next trip is Spain. On the way, he will stop off in Rome to fellowship with the believers there. Apparently Paul did not plan to stay long in Rome, but he hoped that the believers there would send him on his way as he continued on to Spain. This statement should dispel any concern that Paul would try to assume some sort of permanent leadership position or take advantage of the church's hospitality. Instead, he was planning to move through, to the next uncharted territory for the gospel, at the western limit of the Roman Empire.

Spain was a Roman colony, and there were Jews there. Paul wanted to take the Good News there. Also, Spain had many great minds and influential leaders in the Roman world (Lucan, Martial, Hadrian), and perhaps Paul thought Christianity would advance greatly in such an atmosphere.

15:25 Paul was indefinite about exactly when he would visit Rome because he was busy with another matter at present. Paul was on his way to Jerusalem from Corinth (from where he had most likely written this letter; he had been in that city for about three months, see Acts 20:3) with a delegation of men chosen by each church to take a gift from those churches to the Christians in Jerusalem (see Acts 24:17; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 9:13). Paul considered his delivery of this offering as an act of worship. Indeed, it was a fitting climax to his ministry in the east before he moved west.

15:26-27 Paul had collected voluntary offerings from various churches, including the ones in Greece, and would be taking that offering to the poor Christians in Jerusalem who were going through such hard times. The Gentile believers had collected an offering for the Jewish believers in Jerusalem. These Gentile churches were very glad to do this because they felt they owed a real debt to the Jewish church in Jerusalem. The Gentiles had received the gospel (spiritual blessings) originally from Jerusalem (where Christianity began), so they wanted to offer financial help to the needy poor there.

Not only that, but Paul hoped that such generosity and caring among the churches would strengthen the ties between them. The Jerusalem church, obviously made up mostly of Jews, at first had a difficult time even accepting ministry to the Gentiles (see Peter's situation in Acts 10:1–11:18). Some were still concerned about these mostly-Gentile churches. Gentile churches helping to meet the needs of the Jerusalem church was a sure way to maintain harmony among the believers and strengthen the bond of brotherhood.

This was not the first time a collection was taken to the church in Jerusalem. About ten years earlier, Paul and Barnabas brought a collection from the church in Antioch of Syria to help the Jerusalem church during a time of famine (Acts 11:30; 12:25). It seems that being Christian and being poor went together if one lived in Jerusalem. Christianity was not well accepted by the Jewish authorities, and when Jews became Christians they were often cut off from family and friends. The Jerusalem church probably had little means of support, so help from the other churches was needed and greatly appreciated.

15:28 After making sure the church in Jerusalem received the offerings from the other churches, Paul would take his anticipated trip. He was looking forward to taking the gospel to new lands west of Rome. But even the best-laid plans may not happen as we anticipate. Eventually Paul got to Rome, but it was after having his life threatened, becoming a prisoner of Rome, enduring a shipwreck, getting bitten by a poisonous snake on the island of Malta, and landing finally in Rome under arrest (see Acts 27–28)! Tradition says that Paul was released for a time, and that he used this opportunity to go to Spain to preach the Good News. This journey is not mentioned in the book of Acts.

15:29 Paul knows that when he arrives in Rome, he will come with a great blessing to share. The sense of this verse can be read in two ways: Paul will be bringing a fresh awareness of all the benefits of being united with Christ; or Paul is expecting to experience with the Romans a rich time of fellowship in Christ. The benefits of spending time with other believers, even those we do not know, are very real. From time to time, Christians should worship in unfamiliar places, just to be reminded how oneness in Christ overcomes the barrier of meeting strangers.

15:30 Paul asked his readers to pray for him, a request he made in many of his letters (Ephesians 6:19-20; Colossians 4:3-4; 1 Thessalonians 5:25; 2 Thessalonians 3:1-2; Philemon 22). Paul needed their intercessory prayer; he needed them to join him in promoting the cause of Christ. The Greek term for join me in my struggle was often used in connection with athletic events where a team had to put forth a great, concerted action. Though the Roman believers could not be physically with Paul, they could join his efforts by praying for him. This is a subtle but effective emphasis that Paul was not an independent agent. He was part of the body, and he needed the body's help.

15:31 Paul's specific prayer requests pertain to his return to Jerusalem. Paul knew of the potential danger awaiting him there (see Acts 20:22-24; 21:27ff.), so he asked them to pray for his safety. Paul was still regarded as a traitor to his faith, and some of his fellow Jews might have considered it their religious duty to get rid of him for good. He also asked the Roman Christians to pray that the Christians in the Jerusalem church would be willing to accept the donation he was bringing. He may have been fearing that the church would not want to accept the money.

15:32 If all went well in Jerusalem, Paul hoped to then visit the church in Rome, finally to be able to relax with them and be refreshed. Paul's anticipation of being with other believers puts to shame our halfhearted efforts at preparing for worship and looking forward to the time we spend with other believers. Could it be that most of the lack of vitality in church life is created by the very ones who notice its absence? If we don't mentally prepare ourselves to be with Christ and his people, how can we expect to be refreshed by those encounters?

15:33 Paul closes this section of the letter with another personal benediction for the believers. The God who gives us his peace was a Jewish benediction, and Paul offers it here to his Jewish and Gentile Christian readers. This phrase sounds as if it should signal the end of the book, but the epistle continues on for another chapter. However, this benediction pronounces the end of Paul's teaching—the last chapter is an extended salutation. His greeting at the opening of the letter was "Grace and peace to you" (1:7). Most of the letter had explained the nature and results of God's grace. It was natural, then that he close by referring also to the God of peace.

PAUL GREETES HIS FRIENDS / 16:1-16

Rome was the capital of the empire. As Jerusalem was the center of Jewish life, Rome was the world's political, religious, social, and economic center. As Paul preached in the eastern part of the empire, he went first to the key cities—Jerusalem, Antioch in Syria, Philippi, Corinth, Athens, Ephesus. Along the way he met many believers who eventually ended up in Rome. The fact that Paul knew the whereabouts of so many of his friends and coworkers gives us a glimpse into the interest this great missionary had in the people to whom he ministered and who ministered to him. This final chapter reveals a treasury of friends Paul expected to see in Rome.

16:1-2 Phoebe was known as a servant or deacon in the church in Cenchrea. Apparently she was a wealthy person who helped support Paul's ministry. Phoebe was highly regarded in the church. Furthermore, because Paul specifically says that she would be coming to Rome, it is likely that she delivered this letter from Corinth to Rome. This provides evidence that women had important roles in the early church, as well as important roles in business. Cenchrea, the town where Phoebe lived, was the eastern port of Corinth, six miles from the city center (see Acts 18:18). The church here was probably a daughter church of the one in Corinth. Paul asked that the believers receive Phoebe as one who is worthy of high honor and to help her in any way they could. Believers who traveled from one place to another could always be assured of a warm welcome and kind hospitality from other believers. How Phoebe helped Paul and others is unknown, but those she helped were obviously very grateful. Life within the body of Christ is a constant exchange of help. Those who are helped one day are given the privilege in Christ of being the helpers the next day. We need to make sure we are participating in both roles in the local church where we worship.

16:3-5a Priscilla and Aquila were a married couple who had become Paul's close friends. They, along with all other Jews, had been expelled from Rome in A.D. 49 by Emperor Claudius (Acts 18:2-3) and had moved to Corinth. There they met Paul while he was on his second missionary journey, and they invited him to live and work with them. At some point, they moved back to Rome when they were allowed to return (the Emperor Claudius died five years after issuing the edict expelling Jews from Rome, so it is possible that many returned then).

Later, they went back to Ephesus (2 Timothy 4:19). Paul was indebted to these dear friends, even explaining to the others that they risked their lives for him. What they did is no longer known, but Paul had faced plenty of danger and had heard many threats against himself. This was certainly true in Ephesus (see Acts 18:6-10; 19:28-31; 1 Corinthians 15:32). Somehow Priscilla and Aquila intervened at one time to save Paul. He was grateful that they saved his life, and the Gentile churches would also be grateful that Paul's life was spared.

A common characteristic of the early church was that the believers met in people's homes. Priscilla and Aquila had also had a church in their home in Ephesus (1 Corinthians 16:19).

16:5b Whoever Epenetus was, Paul calls him my dear friend, and he has the legacy of being the very first person to become a Christian in the province of Asia! Paul was in Asia on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:10); he had wanted to travel there during his second missionary journey but had been prevented (Acts 16:6).

16:6 Paul would not know firsthand who had worked hard among the believers in Rome, so he is probably speaking from information given him by others, possibly Priscilla and Aquila. So he sent greetings to Mary who apparently was a hard worker in the church.

16:7 Andronicus and Junia may have been a husband and wife team. Junia (or "Julia," which is the reading in certain ancient manuscripts) was a widely used female name at the time. Paul's references to them as relatives could mean that they were also Jews, possibly from the same tribe. When they were in prison with him is not known, because Paul had been imprisoned numerous times (see 2 Corinthians 11:23). Andronicus and Junia distinguished themselves among the apostles. They belonged to that larger group of apostles who had seen the risen Christ (a credential of an apostle—see Acts 1:22; 1 Corinthians 15:5-8). If Andronicus and Junia were believers before Paul was, they would have been Christians for about 25 years.

16:8-9 Ampliatus was a common Roman name at this time period, and it often showed up in the imperial household. It is possible that this man was part of Caesar's household because the gospel had reached even there (Philippians 4:22). Another common Roman name, Urbanus is greeted as a coworker—most likely another missionary for the early church. The name Stachys was not so common; some people in association with the imperial household were named Stachys.

16:10 Apelles is a typical Jewish name, common among the Jews in Rome. Aristobulus may have been related to the Herods, perhaps a brother of Herod Agrippa I. He lived in Rome as a private citizen. To greet a household would mean greeting both the family and the servants.

16:11 Herodion was probably a fellow Jew, and a relative by tribe, not family. To greet the Christians in the household of Narcissus may mean that some in Narcissus's household were not believers. This person has been identified as Tiberius Claudius Narcissus, a wealthy and powerful man during the reigns of emperors Tiberius and Claudius. But he was executed under Nero (sometime after A.D. 54). At that point, all his possessions, including slaves, would have been confiscated and become imperial property. So Paul sent his greetings to the believers among Narcissus's household who are now the property of Rome.

16:12 Tryphena and Tryphosa probably were sisters, maybe even twins because of the close relation of the names. The name Persis has appeared both among slaves and wealthy people, but never in connection with the imperial household.

16:13 Rufus is an extremely common name, but it is possible that this is the same Rufus as mentioned in Mark 15:21. If so, then this is a son of Simon of Cyrene, and thus a North African. If Rufus is the same as the one mentioned in Mark's Gospel, Paul may have met his mother in Antioch of Syria. Rufus's father, Simon, has been identified as the Simeon who was a teacher in the church there (Acts 13:1). Paul was brought to Antioch of Syria by Barnabas, where they spent a year (Acts 11:25-26). Perhaps Paul lived with them, and Rufus's mother had special concern and love for Paul—seeming like a mother to him.

16:14 Perhaps these men were leaders of other house churches. The names are common names, especially among slaves.

16:15 These people may have been other leaders and servants in various house churches.

16:16 The churches Paul was referring to would most likely be those who were joining together in delivering the offering to Jerusalem (see 15:25-27).

Taken together, the list above represents a cross-section of Roman culture, from slaves to those of high social status. The church to whom Paul was writing had all the potential for unity in Christ in spite of every possible barrier. Even this list serves as another example of the theme of Paul's letter: God's plan includes the entire world. Justification by faith is the greatest proof of the truth of the theme, but the repeated theme of this letter is the great news that the Good News is for everyone!

PAUL'S FINAL INSTRUCTIONS / 16:17-27

Jesus had told the disciples that false teachers would come (Matthew 24:11; Mark 13:22-23). Just as false prophets had contradicted the true prophets in Old Testament times (for example, see Jeremiah 23:16-40; 28:1-17), telling people only what they wanted to hear, so false teachers were twisting Christ's teachings and the words of his apostles. These teachers were belittling the significance of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. Some claimed that Jesus couldn't be God; others claimed that he couldn't have been a real man. These teachers allowed and even encouraged all kinds of wrong and immoral acts, especially sexual sin. This was a problem throughout the early church and Paul often warned the churches about it.

16:17 Paul had not yet been to Rome, but he certainly realized that the ubiquitous false teachers would make their way there. He urged believers to watch out for people who cause divisions by teaching things that are contrary to the truth. They should stay away from them. The severe problem of false teaching in some of the other churches Paul visited caused him to include this in the closing lines of his letter, for he knew it could certainly become a problem.

16:18 Teachers should be paid by the people they teach, but false teachers were attempting to make more money by distorting the truth and saying what people wanted to hear. They were more interested in serving their own personal interests, motivated by a desire to gain power and prestige. In contrast, genuine Christian teachers are motivated by sincere faith and a desire to do what is right. Both Paul and Peter condemned greedy, lying teachers (see 1 Timothy 6:5).

Paul warned the Roman believers that when they listen to teachers, they should check the content of what is said and not be fooled by smooth talk or glowing words. Many cult leaders have led Christians astray by teaching things that sound like truth but are actually falsehoods. Christians who study God's word will not be fooled, even though superficial listeners may easily be taken in. For an example of those who carefully checked God's word, see Acts 17:10-12.

16:19 Paul quickly adds that he knows the Roman believers are not naive (16:18) because their obedience to God is well known. Believers are to be wise in their understanding of what is good, that is, in what God wants them to do. On the reverse, they are to be innocent about evil.

16:20 This language echoes Genesis 3:15, wherein God declares that the serpent's head would be crushed by the seed of the woman. These false teachers, servants of Satan, would try to sow discord in the churches, but God is the God of peace. The false teachers will be destroyed when Christ establishes his peace upon his return (see Revelation 20:1-6).

16:21 Timothy was a key person in the growth of the early church, traveling with Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts 16:1-3). Later Paul wrote two letters to him (1 and 2 Timothy) as Timothy worked to strengthen the churches in Ephesus. Acts 20:4 places Timothy with Paul prior to Paul's departure to Jerusalem. These other men are fellow Jews, not family relations. These names are also mentioned in other places: Acts 13:1; 17:5-9; 20:4.

16:22 Tertius was Paul's secretary, who wrote the letter as Paul dictated it. He included his greetings.

16:23 This is most likely not the same Gaius who was from Macedonia (Acts 19:29), nor the one from Derbe (Acts 20:4), nor the one addressed in 3 John. It is probably the Gaius whom Paul baptized in Corinth (1 Corinthians 1:14). As the city treasurer, Erastus would have been a powerful and influential man. A civic official of this name is mentioned on the inscription on a marble paving-block in Corinth. The name was common enough that he need not be identified with the Erastus mentioned in other places (Acts 19:22 and 2 Timothy 4:20). Quartus is unknown other than that he is a Christian brother.

There is no verse 24 in most modern translations because it is not found in the most trusted Greek manuscripts. It is a scribal addition repeating the words of 16:20.

16:25-27 Paul had explained his gospel at length in this letter to the Romans (see 2:16). Paul's Good News was the proclamation of Jesus Christ and his plan for the Gentiles. Paul knew that the gospel and Christ himself would make these believers strong in the faith. The plan had been kept secret from the beginning of time. The prophets who wrote various books of the Old Testament were not fully aware of the meaning of their own words; but they wrote, at God's command, much about the fulfillment of the mystery—the coming of the Messiah, the salvation of the Gentiles, and the return of the Jews (see 11:25). Now, after the coming of Christ and the growth of the church, what they wrote is being understood (1:2). (See also Luke 24:44-45; 1 Peter 1:10-12.)

Paul exclaims that it is wonderful to be alive when the mystery, God's secret—his way of saving the Gentiles—is becoming known throughout the world! All the Old Testament prophecies are coming true, and God is using Paul as his instrument to tell this Good News. For that we must give God the glory forever through Jesus Christ.

INTRODUCTION

Lawsuit.

Split.

Scandal.

Tragically, contemporary headlines often trumpet bad reports from local churches. News of leaders' sexual escapades, disgruntled and disgraced members' lawsuits, unethical and irresponsible fiscal practices, and blatant heresies seems to parade weekly across television screens. Jesus had told the Twelve that his followers would be known by their love (John 13:35). Yet, today, many who claim to follow him are marked by anything but love. Instead of standing apart from the world, the church has taken the appearance of other, secular institutions and has blended in.

What would God say to these errant believers, to churches and individuals who have strayed from obeying his commands? He said it nearly 2,000 years ago through Paul to Christians in decadent Corinth, a city similar to many communities today. Paul wrote letters, now known as 1 and 2 Corinthians, urging believers to focus on Christ, forsake immorality, settle their differences, reject false teachers, unify, and love. As you read these personal and powerful epistles written first to ancient Greeks, know that the words and principles apply to this generation as well.

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): former Pharisee, apostle, pioneer missionary of the church.

Paul visited Corinth on his second missionary trip. At the time of Paul's visit, Corinth was a bustling commercial city, a center of Mediterranean trade. It is no wonder that Paul easily found work as a tentmaker (most likely working with goat's-hair cloth, a prominent trade of Paul's native region, Cilicia). In his spare time, Paul began to speak about Christ to Jews at the local synagogue, but he received a cold reception. Undaunted by opposition, Paul began teaching next to the synagogue in Titius Justus's house. This infuriated the Jews. Paul's congregation probably included many God-fearing Gentiles who used to attend the synagogue right next door. Because these Corinthian Jews hated Paul, they presented an official complaint to Gallio, the governor of Achaia. Gallio refused to hear his case, however, because he viewed the early Christians as simply another sect of Judaism. Ironically, this mistaken perception protected the infant church from being rigorously persecuted by the Romans. With his opponents defeated, Paul was free to stay in Corinth for a year and a half (around A.D. 50–52), one of Paul’s longest stays in any one city during his missionary journeys. Perhaps he envisioned Corinth as a center of evangelism for all of Greece.

The two letters to the Corinthians preserved in the Bible are evidence that Paul took special interest in the spiritual welfare of the Corinthian church. His long stay in the city made it painful for him to hear of the problems that had begun to plague the church there. Paul himself had established the church. He had endured much ridicule in order to preach the gospel. He had worked hard in order to preach free of charge. As these two letters make clear, however, the Corinthian church struggled in Paul’s absence.

Paul’s authorship of 1 Corinthians has never been seriously questioned by Bible scholars. In the very first verse of 1 Corinthians, he identifies himself as the author and Sosthenes as his secretary. This evidence, along with the Pauline emphasis on the believer’s freedom in Christ (10:23-33), is enough to convince most scholars.

For more about Paul, see the Author section in the Introduction to the book of Romans.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from Ephesus around A.D. 55.

Near the end of 1 Corinthians, Paul reported the details of his recent travel plans and revealed that he was writing from the city of Ephesus (16:8). On his third missionary journey, Paul stayed in Ephesus for three years. Ephesus, a bustling seaport town in Asia Minor (present-day Turkey), was a strategic city for the spread of the gospel message in Asia Minor. Located at the intersection of two ancient overland routes (the coastal road running north to Troas and the western route to Colosse, Laodicea, and beyond), Ephesus became a customary stopping point for ships sailing through the Aegean Sea. Thus, the city became known as the gateway to Asia. During the first century, however—the time period of Paul’s ministry—the harbor began filling up with silt. This condition caused a slight economic downturn.

The numerous visitors who came to Ephesus every month kept revenue flowing into the town. The magnificent temple to Diana (the goddess of fertility, also called Artemis) was located in Ephesus. Four times larger than the Parthenon, this marble temple was considered one of the wonders of the ancient world. People from throughout the Roman Empire came to worship Diana there.

In addition to the temple of Diana, Ephesus boasted an immense amphitheater that could seat twenty-five thousand and an equally huge stadium that hosted all types of gladiator fights. A sparkling marble street flanked by colonnades ran through the city, directing all visitors to the amphitheater. Because of its temples to pagan gods and goddesses, Ephesus was one of the great tourist capitals of the ancient world. It was no wonder that the craftsmen of that city became alarmed at the spread of Christianity among the populace (see Acts 19:21-41).

Perhaps it was because the city was such a center for tourism and trade that Paul spent three full years there—teaching the gospel in the lecture hall of Tyrannus. According to Luke, the author of Acts, this lecture hall became a gathering place for people from all over the province of Asia Minor who were interested in the Good News of Jesus Christ (see Acts 19:9-10). During this extended stay in Ephesus, Paul wrote 1 Corinthians.

AUDIENCE

The church in Corinth.

Along with Rome and Alexandria, Corinth was one of the major cities of the Roman Empire. Its prominence and wealth were derived from the extraordinary amount of shipping and commerce that passed through its harbors. The location of Corinth on a four-and-a-half-mile isthmus that connected mainland Greece and Achaia made it an ideal shipping hub. Ships were placed on wooden platforms and dragged across a stone road on the isthmus between the two ports of Corinth-Lechaëum and Cenchrea. A canal would have been ideal, but the Romans never built one. The lack of a canal, however, did not impede the ship traffic across the isthmus. It was easier and safer for a ship captain to pay the fees to have his ship dragged across the isthmus than to sail around Achaia, a two-hundred-mile journey known for its severe and unpredictable storms.

Although the Romans destroyed Corinth in 146 B.C. for taking a leadership role in a rebellion, Julius Caesar rebuilt the city in 46 B.C. The city quickly regained its former prominence, and by 27 B.C., it was named the capital of a senatorial province of Achaia. By the first century A.D., the city was the most influential commercial center in Greece. In addition to being a commercial center, Corinth was a manufacturing center for bronze, a metal used in the construction of many of the Roman amphitheaters. The prestige of Corinth was elaborately displayed at the biennial Isthmian games in that city (a series of games equivalent to the Olympic games). Paul drew upon the images of the athletes and awards in these games to illustrate the nature of the Christian life (9:24-27).

The wealth accompanying commercial success often breeds moral laxity; that certainly was the case in Corinth. Throughout the ancient world, the city was known for its moral decadence. Plato used the term “Corinthian girl” to refer to a prostitute; and Aristophanes used the verb “to act like a Corinthian” to refer to fornication. The magnificent temple of Aphrodite (the goddess of love, fertility, and beauty) stood on the mountain that overlooked Corinth as a monument to this immoral lifestyle. That temple was the center of many varieties of religious prostitution.

As a strong commercial center, Corinth drew a substantial number of people from every corner of the Roman Empire, so the city was ethnically and religiously diverse. In addition to the temple of Aphrodite, Corinth contained a temple for Asclepius, the Greek god of healing, as well as sites to venerate Issi, the Egyptian god of seafarers, and Poseidon, the Greek counterpart to Issi. There is even archeological evidence of a Jewish synagogue dating back to the third century. The diversity of the city was reflected in the makeup of the Corinthian congregation (12:13).

Corinth was the last city Paul visited on his second missionary journey (Acts 18:1-18). He stayed in Corinth for eighteen months, establishing a church there. Apollos, who had been taught the basics of the Christian faith by Aquila and Priscilla in Ephesus, visited the church at a later time, encouraging the believers (1:12).

Unfortunately, the Corinthian church not only reflected the city’s multiethnic character, but also its moral depravity. Paul’s exhortations against incest (5:1-5) and against soliciting prostitutes (6:9-20) indicate that members in the church were struggling to resist the pervasive immorality of their city. But Paul wouldn’t compromise the high standards of Christian conduct for the church in Corinth. Being surrounded by ubiquitous immorality did not make the Corinthians an exception. Instead, he called them to a pure life, set apart for God. He even compared their bodies to God’s temple (6:18-20). Even with its numerous problems, the Corinthian body of believers became a strategic church for the propagation of the gospel. Its location on the major trade routes of the Roman Empire made it a key outpost for spreading the gospel in Achaia (present-day Greece).

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

To answer some questions about church order, to identify some problems in the Corinthian church, and to teach the believers how to live for Christ in a corrupt society.

In his travels throughout the Mediterranean world, Paul had visited numerous towns and seaports, establishing small cells of committed believers in almost every place he visited. During his travels Paul had dealt with a wide variety of people—from mad mobs to subtle philosophers—and with various situations—from fierce persecution to moral laxity. Throughout all this, he showed keen interest in the spiritual welfare of every person with whom he came in contact. His letters frequently recount how he wrestled in prayer for a church or an individual (2 Corinthians 13:7; 1 Thessalonians 3:10). This genuine concern prompted Paul to write letters to his converts, instructing them in the faith, and it compelled him to visit churches again and again. Corinth was no exception.

The very first letter that Paul wrote to the Corinthian believers has been lost. First Corinthians 5:9 mentions this previous letter. Obviously, it could not have been 1 Corinthians. The exact contents of this letter are unknown; 1 Corinthians 5 implies that Paul had warned the Corinthians in that letter not to associate with so-called Christians who engaged in sexual immorality.

The problems in Corinth. Near the end of his stay in Ephesus, Paul wrote a second letter, the epistle entitled 1 Corinthians. He wrote this letter in response to a message delivered by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (16:17). Stephanas and his companions had asked Paul a series of questions, mostly concerning church order. In his long letter in response, Paul answered the questions related to Christian marriage (7:1-16), food sacrificed to idols (8:1-13), spiritual gifts (12:1-31), and the procedure for collecting money for the relief of the Jerusalem church (16:1-14). This is why 1 Corinthians is arranged topically. Instead of a theological treatise, with a central thesis and a number of arguments supporting the main point, 1 Corinthians is a practical letter addressing a variety of issues faced by the church.

In addition, Paul addressed problems that had surfaced in an unofficial report from Chloe's household in Corinth (see 1:11). According to that report, persistent problems had been plaguing the church. Specifically, members were quarreling with each other and forming cliques around various teachers—especially Paul, Peter, and Apollos (1:10-17). Corinthian believers were even suing each other (6:1) and arguing when they met to celebrate the Lord's Supper (11:17-22). Even more disturbing was the report of a case of incest in the church that had not been confronted by the church leaders (5:1). Paul responded to each of these very serious issues. In fact, 1 Corinthians seems to almost follow Chloe's report as an outline, as it answers the problems and issues raised.

The Gentile heritage. At first, many of the conflicts addressed in 1 Corinthians seem to be unrelated and disconnected. A careful analysis of all the problems and disputes, however, reveals a predominantly Gentile church. First, sexual permissiveness in the church would have been more a problem for Gentiles than for Jewish believers, who were already familiar with Old Testament restrictions on their sexual appetites (6:12-20). Second, numerous lawsuits would not have been a problem among Jewish Christians, for Jews were forbidden to use heathen courts and were expected to resolve their differences with the elders of the local synagogue (6:1-11). Only Gentile Christians would be inclined to sue each other in Roman courts. Third, Paul's extensive discussion on the wisdom of the Spirit compared to the foolishness of people confirms that his audience was primarily composed of Gentile Christians. Greek philosophers would demonstrate their so-called wisdom with lavish rhetoric. That's why Paul had to explain his reason for not presenting the gospel with "lofty words" but instead with the power of the Holy Spirit (2:1-4).

First Corinthians clearly shows that some of the philosophies of the Greek and Roman world were coloring the Corinthians' perception of their newfound faith in Jesus. This letter was written to a group of believers who were still influenced by philosophical dualism. Ever since Plato, much of Greek philosophy had been based on the belief that the spiritual and the material were completely separate spheres of human existence. According to this view, the material or physical side of human nature was inherently corrupt and doomed for destruction. By contrast, the spiritual side could gradually lose its connection to the material and ascend to God, the pure Spirit. This type of thinking was absorbed by Gnostics in the second century and probably formed the foundation of the Corinthians' denial of a bodily resurrection (see Paul's defense of Jesus' resurrection in 15:12-34).

Philosophical dualism led to two opposite extremes. Some people concluded that because the physical/material was irredeemable, what a person did in his or her body was irrelevant. Only the spirit mattered. This type of thinking justified all types of immorality. It would also explain why Paul had to emphasize to the Corinthians that their physical bodies were in fact members of Christ (6:12-20).

This dualism between body and spirit could also lead to asceticism. Some denied their physical bodies any pleasure in order to ascend to spiritual heights. This also is an emphasis in 1 Corinthians, where Paul had to confront the asceticism of some church members—those husbands and wives who were denying each other the physical joys of marriage (7:5).

Paul's relationship with the Corinthians. Tragically, Paul's passionate appeal for Christian love and holy living in 1 Corinthians fell on deaf ears. Paul must have been aware of the difficult situation that was developing in Corinth, for he sent his trusted assistant, Timothy, there (4:17; 16:10). Perhaps he hoped that Timothy would deal with some of the problems in person, explaining Paul's letter and modeling Christian love to the believers.

These efforts, however, must have been futile, for at the time that Paul wrote 2 Corinthians, about a year later, the situation had deteriorated even further. Paul had made a quick visit to Corinth, during which time some church members had challenged his authority (2 Corinthians 2:1; 12:14, 21; 13:1-4). After that trip, Paul may have written another letter to the Corinthians, a letter alluded to in 2 Corinthians 2:1-4; 7:8. In this letter, Paul sternly warned them to correct the abuses in the church. Around that time, he sent Titus to monitor the spiritual progress of the church. Finally, in his fourth letter to the Corinthians (2 Corinthians), Paul rejoiced in the good news brought to him by Titus. The Corinthians had disciplined some of their members, as Paul had instructed. Unfortunately, however, the reform was not completely sincere. Some members continued to challenge Paul's authority to instruct them in Christ's ways. So Paul wrote 2 Corinthians to encourage them to continue in their obedience and to warn those who were still opposing his authority.

The book of Acts reports that Paul finally did make it to Corinth on his third missionary journey (Acts 20:1-3). Perhaps at that time, the tear in the relationship between Paul and the Corinthians was finally mended. Not much else is known about the Corinthian church until A.D. 95. In that year, Clement of Rome wrote the Corinthians a letter urging them to stop arguing among themselves and to unite under Jesus' leadership. Clement's letter reveals that the division in the Corinthian church had persisted, despite Paul's severe warnings.

The central problem in Corinth. Why were there persistent divisions among the Corinthians? One group, associated with one teacher, wanted to achieve prominence in the church over another group, associated with another teacher. The situation had deteriorated so much that church members were boasting about their immorality. In Corinth, pride ran rampant. Even the display of spiritual gifts—teaching, preaching, and prophesying—had become an occasion for competition and a subject of boasts (12:21-30). Paul told the Corinthians to stop bragging and to love each other (12:1-11; 13:1-13). Only when they put their differences aside and united in a spirit of love would Jesus be able to use them for his holy purposes (1:2; 15:58). Today, that same lesson must be learned. Just as in Corinth, many modern churches are divided. Conflicts over personalities, agendas, and even the color of the church carpet arise from pride. One side will not give in to the other. Believers must unify around Christ and love each other.

MESSAGE

After his customary greeting (1:1-3), Paul begins by affirming the great truths of the gospel: God had given the Corinthian believers grace through Christ Jesus (1:4); God had enriched them greatly (1:5); God had given them every spiritual gift (1:7); the Lord Jesus Christ would soon return (1:7); God would give them the power to be strong and blameless (1:8); God is faithful (1:9).

But then Paul punches out the rest of the story, beginning with a discussion of the divisions among believers and a strong appeal for unity (1:10– 4:21). Next he moves swiftly to condemn a specific illicit relationship in the church (5:1-2), lawsuits between Christians (6:1-11), and sexual immorality (6:12-20). Then, Paul softens a bit as he teaches about marriage and the single life (7:1-40), the relationship between conscience and freedom in Christ (8:1–10:33), order in worship services (11:1-34), spiritual gifts (12:1–14:40), and the reality and power of the Resurrection (15:1-58). Each of these teachings, however, brings the implication of a problem. Evidently marriages were in trouble; strong and weak Christians were in conflict; worship, Communion, and spiritual gifts were being abused; and wrong doctrine was being introduced. So Paul says, “Come to your senses” (15:34).

Paul closes with a reminder of the collection for the church in Jerusalem (16:1-4), his plans to visit the Corinthians (16:5-9), and miscellaneous comments and encouragements (16:10-24).

As you read this first letter from Paul to the church at Corinth, look for yourself and your church in the text, and between the lines. If God were writing a letter specifically to you, what would be your “good news” and “bad news”? Then look again; he has something poignant to say to each one of us.

The main themes in the book of 1 Corinthians include: Loyalties, Immorality, Freedom, Worship, Body of Christ, and Resurrection.

Loyalties (1:10-31; 2:1-5; 3:1-15; 4:1-21; 9:1-27). The Corinthians were rallying around various church leaders and teachers—Peter, Paul, and Apollos. Others, in an attempt at spiritual superiority, were claiming to “follow Christ.” These loyalties led to intellectual pride and created a spirit of division in the church.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Personal loyalty to human leaders or human wisdom must never divide Christians into camps. Believers should care for each other, not compete for prominence. Christ unifies those who trust in him; he doesn’t divide believers from each other. Like Christians in Corinth, contemporary believers often cluster around popular preachers and teachers. And the result is just as divisive as in the first century. Instead of dividing over personalities, worship styles, and theological minutiae, we need to focus on Christ. He will unify us.

Give your allegiance to no one but Christ. Let him lead you.

Immorality (1:8; 5:1-13; 6:1-20; 7:1-40; 9:24-27; 10:1-13; 16:13). Paul had received a report of rampant immorality in the Corinthian church: uncorrected sexual sin and lawsuits between believers. The people were indifferent to the immorality in their community and in the church and were thinking only of themselves. This blunted the witness of the church and led to misconceptions about Christian living, especially sexual freedom and marriage. Highlighting the necessity for moral living and for bodies dedicated to serving God, Paul confronted the Corinthians with their sin and called them back to Christ-centered lives and marriages.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Although contemporary culture denigrates marriage and promotes sexual promiscuity and frivolous lawsuits, Christians must keep their focus on God and his word and never compromise with sinful ideas and practices. Believers should not blend in with society. It won't be easy to go against the flow, but you should determine to live up to God's standard of morality. Refuse to condone immoral behavior, especially among believers.

Freedom (8:1-13; 9:19-27; 10:23-33; 11:1). Paul taught freedom of choice on practices not expressly forbidden in Scripture. Some believers felt certain actions, such as buying meat taken from animals used in pagan rituals, were sinful by association. Others felt free from the law to do such actions. Paul taught that those who were stronger, who felt free to eat meat that had been offered to idols, should refrain from eating it in order to not become a stumbling block for a weaker believer. He also taught, however, that those with more sensitive consciences should not judge others and force them into a rigid "meatless" lifestyle.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Although eating meat usually is not a controversial issue among believers today, other practices divide our churches. Paul clearly teaches that we are free in Christ, yet we must not abuse our Christian freedom by being inconsiderate and insensitive to others. We must never encourage others to do wrong by anything we do. Whatever the behavior controversy in your church and community, let love be your guide. Avoid judging other believers, and be sensitive to those with more sensitive consciences.

Worship (11:2-34; 14:1-40). Paul addressed disorder in worship. People were taking the Lord's Supper without first confessing sin. And many were using it as an occasion to eat and drink to excess. In addition, there was misuse of spiritual gifts and confusion over the role of women in the church. Paul gave explicit instructions for bringing order and focus back to their worship services. These instructions center around taking God's presence seriously.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Certainly there is no greater privilege than to stand in the presence of almighty God. Thus, worship is an awesome and sacred task and should be carried out properly and in an orderly manner. Although worship styles will vary from culture to culture and church to church, all worship of God should be done in a manner worthy of his high honor. Make sure that worship in your church is Christ-centered, harmonious, useful, and that it builds up all believers.

Body of Christ (12:1-31; 13:1-13; 16:1-3). Corinthian believers were confused about their roles in the church. And, evidently, many were seeking to possess the more noteworthy, public gifts (for example, preaching, teaching, speaking in tongues). But Paul emphasized that every member and every gift is essential for the life of the body of Christ. Just as with a physical body, the church has many parts, and each part has a special role to play; thus, God has given each member of the body a unique set of spiritual gifts. Instead of minimizing one's own role and usefulness or envying the more glamorous gifts that others may possess, each member should discover and use his or her own God-given spiritual gifts. Although great diversity exists in the body, expressed in the wide range of personalities and gifts, the church finds unity in Christ. And the greatest gift of all is love.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Contemporary churches often divide over the exercise of specific spiritual gifts. Instead, believers should recognize that God gives all his children special gifts that should be used to build up and unify the church. Analyze your giftedness in light of God's word, and consult with fellow believers to discover your spiritual gifts. Don't worry if your gifts seem minor and insignificant; you have a vital role to play in the church. Use your gifts to build up the body and to glorify Christ. And above all else, reflect Christ's love.

Resurrection (15:1-58). Some people were denying that Christ had risen from the dead. Others taught that people would not physically be resurrected. Refuting these ideas, Paul proclaimed the reality of the Resurrection. In fact, Christ's resurrection assures believers that they will have new, living bodies after they die. The hope of the Resurrection gives Christians assurance and confidence to live for Christ daily.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Since we will be raised again to life after we die, our lives are not in vain. We must stay faithful to God in our morality and our service. We are to live today knowing we will spend eternity with Christ. When you stand at the graveside of a loved one, or when you struggle with your own mortality, remember the Resurrection. Because he lives, you, too, shall live and be reunited with all the other believers who have gone before you.

Paul wrote this letter to Corinth during his three-year visit in Ephesus on his third missionary journey. The two cities sat across from each other on the Aegean Sea—both were busy and important ports. Titus may have carried this letter from Ephesus to Corinth (2 Corinthians 12:18).

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-3

Through various sources, Paul had received reports of problems in the Corinthian church, including jealousy, divisiveness, sexual immorality, and failure to discipline members. Churches today also address many of the same problems. Believers can learn a great deal by seeing how Paul handled these delicate situations.

1:1 Following the style of first-century letters, Paul began his letter to the Corinthians by introducing himself as the writer: This letter is from Paul. Then he described himself as chosen by the will of God to be an apostle of Christ Jesus. God chose Paul for special work among the Gentiles (Acts 9:15). Paul was not one of the original twelve disciples (later called apostles), but the risen Christ Jesus had confronted him on the road to Damascus and had called him to preach the gospel to both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 9:3-19). The apostles' mission was to be God's representatives: They were envoys, messengers, and delegates directly under the authority of Jesus Christ. They had authority to set up and supervise churches and to discipline them if necessary (which Paul did in these two letters to the Corinthian church).

The brother named Sosthenes may have been Paul's secretary, who had written this letter as Paul had dictated it. He was probably the Jewish synagogue leader in Corinth (Acts 18:17) who had been beaten during an attack on Paul and then later became a believer. Sosthenes was well known to the members of the Corinthian church, so Paul included his familiar name in the opening of the letter.

1:2 Paul wrote this letter to the church of God in Corinth while he was visiting Ephesus during his third missionary journey (Acts 19:1–20:1). Corinth and Ephesus faced each other across the Aegean Sea. Paul knew the Corinthian church well because he had spent eighteen months in Corinth during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:1-18). While in Ephesus, he had heard about problems in Corinth (1:11). About the same time, a delegation from the Corinthian church had visited Paul to ask his advice about their conflicts (16:17). Paul's purpose for writing was to correct those problems and to answer questions that church members had asked in a previous letter (7:1). For more about the city, see the Setting section in the Introduction.

Corinth, a giant cultural melting pot with a great diversity of wealth, religions, and moral standards, had a reputation for being fiercely independent and as decadent as any city in the world. Yet out of this moral wasteland God formed a church through Paul's ministry. Paul recognized this group of believers as called by God to be his own holy people. The term "called" means designated by God. God had identified them to serve him and not to serve their own purposes. To be made holy means to be cleansed of sin, separated from the world, and belonging to God. This can only happen through salvation in Christ Jesus, for only his death on the cross could accomplish this for sinners. Jesus did this not just for the Corinthians, but for all Christians everywhere. The Corinthian church must have included a great cross section of believers—wealthy merchants, common laborers, perhaps former temple prostitutes, and middle-class families. Because of the wide diversity of people and backgrounds, Paul took great pains to stress the need for both spiritual unity and Christlike character.

1:3 Grace means God's undeserved favor, his kindness shown clearly in his free gift of salvation given in Christ. Receiving it brings peace, the peace that Christ established between believers and God through his death on the cross. Paul used "grace and peace" as a standard greeting in all of his letters. God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ makes a distinction between two of the persons in the Trinity—the Father and the Son. They are separate but equal in essence (see also 1 Thessalonians 3:11).

PAUL GIVES THANKS TO GOD / 1:4-9

The problems in the Corinthian church shaped almost every word Paul wrote in his letter. He realized that the believers were struggling with internal, as well as external, problems. They were forgetting to whom they belonged. When correcting others, draw their attention to what God has already accomplished in them and for them. The same process can guide your own reflections on the condition of your relationship with God.

1:4 In this letter, Paul would include strong words to the Corinthians, but he began on a positive note of thanksgiving. Paul affirmed their privilege of belonging to the Lord, thanking God for all the generous gifts he had given to the Corinthian believers because of their faith in Christ Jesus. Paul usually would begin his letters with a word of thanks for the believers to whom he was writing (see, for example, Romans 1:8; Philippians 1:3-7; Colossians 1:3-8).

1:5-6 God had enriched the Corinthian church. However, the Corinthians may have been putting too much emphasis on possessing the gifts of the Spirit and not enough emphasis on God, who gave those gifts to them, or on Christ, who enabled them to have those gifts. They had been enriched in their eloquence in speaking about God and in their knowledge of him. Greeks attached great importance to oratory and knowledge. God's grace had increased their ability to speak about their faith, as well as their spiritual knowledge and understanding. These facts—both seen by Paul himself and reported to him by others—served to confirm his testimony about Christ to the Corinthian believers. The changed lives of these believers validated the truth of the gospel message that had been preached to them.

1:7 The Corinthian church members had every spiritual gift they needed to live the Christian life, to witness for Christ, and to stand against the paganism and immorality of Corinth. These gifts would help the church battle sin both inside the congregation and outside in the world. These believers in Corinth lacked nothing—they had every spiritual gift—and because of this they more eagerly looked forward in faith and hope to the return of our Lord Jesus Christ. This statement refers to the second coming of Christ. The spiritual gifts God has given to believers here on earth are merely a foretaste of what is to come.

1:8 There will be an end to the eager waiting of believers (1:7), because Christ will return. Not only have the believers received gifts for building up the church and standing against sin, but Christ would also keep them strong until the day the Lord Jesus Christ returns. Because Christ has died for believers, given them spiritual gifts, and promised to return for them, Paul guaranteed these believers that God would also consider them free from all blame (see Romans 8:33-34; Ephesians 1:7-10). This guarantee was not because of their great gifts or their shining performance, but because of what Jesus Christ accomplished for them through his death and resurrection.

1:9 Believers need never doubt God's grace, his gifts, or his promise to give them eternal life because God always does just what he says. God has promised, and because he cannot lie (Titus 1:2), believers can be certain that all of his promises will come true. God himself had invited each of the Corinthian believers into friendship with his Son and that call will never be rescinded.

DIVISIONS IN THE CHURCH / 1:10-17

In this large and diverse Corinthian church, the believers were favoring different preachers. Because the whole New Testament had not yet been written, the believers depended heavily on preaching and teaching for spiritual insight into the meaning of the Old Testament. However, they had split into factions—each following their favorite preacher or leader, even though the leaders spoke the same message and apparently had no knowledge of these factions. Paul admonished the believers to remember the singular message that had brought them to faith, and to stop comparing messengers. Believers today should also focus on the truth of the message, not the style of the messenger.

1:10 Paul had founded the church in Corinth on his second missionary journey. Eighteen months after he had left, arguments and divisions had arisen, and some church members had slipped back into an immoral lifestyle. Paul wrote this letter to address the problems, to clear up confusion about right and wrong, and to remove the immorality among them. Because Paul was an apostle (1:1), he had the right to appeal by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ. Paul simply told the Corinthian believers to stop arguing over factions or divisions that had developed in the church itself, with various believers aligning themselves behind various teachers (1:12-13). Thus, Paul here was pleading with the believers to let there be real harmony and for them to be of one mind, united in thought and purpose. To be perfectly united does not mean that Paul required everyone to be exactly the same. Instead, he wanted them to set aside their arguments and focus on what truly mattered—Jesus Christ as Lord and their mission to take the light of the gospel into a dark world. The internal divisions would only cause strife and hinder the gospel, as well as make the church look ridiculous to those outside.

1:11 This woman named Chloe is unknown. Apparently, she was well-to-do, with servants (members of her household) traveling and handling the family's interests between Ephesus and Corinth. It is unknown if she was a believer, but some members of her household were. Paul was writing this letter from Ephesus, and Chloe may have lived in Ephesus with some of her servants having been to Corinth. There they would have heard about what was going on in the Corinthian church and would have reported this back to Paul. Or Chloe may have lived in Corinth; thus, when her servants had come to Ephesus, they had given Paul the details. In either case, these firsthand observers told Paul about the arguments that were going on in the Corinthian church.

1:12-13 The factions in the Corinthian church threatened to destroy it. These factious groups followed different preachers for different reasons. Some of the believers followed Paul, who had founded their church. Others chose to follow

Peter. A Jew and one of the twelve disciples of Jesus, Peter probably attracted many of the Jewish believers. A third group chose to follow Apollos, an eloquent and popular preacher who had had a dynamic ministry in Corinth (Acts 18:24; 19:1; Titus 3:13). Apollos was from Alexandria and had become distinguished for his speaking ability. Oratory and eloquence were highly valued in the culture of the day, so Apollos probably attracted the highly educated and distinguished believers in the congregation. Finally, a fourth group claimed to follow only Christ. This group may have boasted a special relationship to Christ, or they may have been positioning themselves above the fray, saying that they had chosen to follow Christ alone, not any human leader (see 2 Corinthians 10:7).

Paul asked whether Christ could be divided. This is a graphic picture of what happens when the church (the body of Christ) quarrels. Then Paul asked if he, himself, had been crucified for them. No, because only One had been crucified for the believers—indeed, only One could be crucified to pay the penalty for sins. Were the believers baptized in the name of Paul (or even of Peter or Apollos)? Again, the answer was no.

1:14-16 Paul's question about baptism in 1:13 led him to note that he had baptized very few people in Corinth. He saw this as providential and thanked God that he had baptized only Crispus (perhaps the same man mentioned in Acts 18:8), Gaius (perhaps the same man noted in Romans 16:23), and the household of Stephanas. While Paul certainly had many converts in the city, he had not baptized them all. No one could claim that Paul had been baptizing people in order to obtain their loyalty as their special leader. Clearly he was not attempting to make disciples for himself.

Believers are not baptized “into” different preachers—they are baptized into the family of believers. Baptism replaced circumcision as the initiation rite of the new order, the new covenant. Christians need only “one baptism” by which they publicly acknowledge their one faith in one Lord. Far from it being divisive, baptism is a key unifying factor in the church.

1:17 When Paul said Christ didn't send me to baptize, he was not minimizing the importance of baptism. Instead, he was pointing out that his gift was to preach the Good News (see Acts 9:15). But even preaching could be cause for division. In fact, this was already happening in Corinth, with the believers lining up behind different preachers for different reasons. Paul pointed out that neither he, nor the other apostles and preachers, spoke with clever speeches. They did not depend upon the rhetoric or philosophical arguments so admired by the Greeks. To do so would have emptied the message of its power, and it would have drawn people to the preachers rather than to the message of salvation in Christ.

THE WISDOM OF GOD / 1:18-31

The Greeks highly valued wisdom. Paul showed in the following verses, however, that there is the kind of “wisdom” that the world worships, and there is the true wisdom that comes from God alone.

1:18 Paul preached the message of the cross—Jesus Christ crucified on behalf of sinners. Such a message always has two results, for ultimately all of humanity will end up in one of these two classes. (1) The gospel message sounds foolish to those who desire worldly wisdom. “Who wants a crucified king?” they might ask. (2) But for those who are being saved, the gospel message is the very power of God. Only with such power can the gospel message redeem sinful people and transform them into God’s people.

1:19 Paul summarized Isaiah 29:14 to emphasize a point that Jesus often made: God’s way of thinking is not like the world’s way (normal human wisdom). Human wisdom and brilliant ideas refer to world-centered wisdom and intelligence. These are not wrong, but they are worthless as a means of salvation. People can spend a lifetime accumulating human wisdom and yet never learn how to have a personal relationship with God. They must come to the crucified and risen Christ to receive eternal life and the joy of a personal relationship with the Savior.

1:20 No human wisdom or intelligence can either discover or disprove God. No human reasoning can bring salvation. So all those who have lived by their own wisdom will be left with nothing. God had already made them all look foolish and showed that their “wisdom” was no more than useless nonsense. For all their learning, God would show them to be fools. Their wisdom would be “useless” because it could do nothing to provide salvation. That can come only through the cross.

1:21 In his complete sovereignty and wisdom, God decided that people would never find him through human wisdom. Instead, he chose a crucified Savior and a message of salvation preached by weak and fallible human beings to save all who believe. This looks like absurdity to the “high and mighty” of this world. Many people of Paul’s time, and many today, mocked the message of the gospel.

In their human wisdom, they wanted to reason “above and beyond” and experience more than what they felt was offered in the foolish preaching of believers. In reality, the worldly wise will not find God; those who accept the message of the cross will find him and be saved.

1:22-24 Many Jews considered the Good News of Jesus Christ to be foolish because they thought the Messiah would be a conquering king who would give them a sign from heaven. Although Jesus had performed many miracles during his ministry on earth, many Jews who observed his miracles firsthand had refused to believe (Matthew 12:38-39; 16:1-4; Mark 8:11-12; Luke 11:16; John 6:30). Jesus had not restored David’s throne in the way that they had expected. Besides, he had been executed as a criminal (Deuteronomy 21:23)—how could a criminal be the Savior? This proclamation of Christ crucified offended them.

The Greeks (also called Gentiles) did not believe in a bodily resurrection; they did not see in Jesus the powerful characteristics of their mythological gods, and they thought no reputable person would be crucified. To them, death was defeat, not victory. It did not make sense—in their own wisdom—that any god would do such a thing as come to earth to be killed. The gospel message was all nonsense.

While some Jews and Greek tripped over the message, it was a different story for those called by God to salvation—those who embraced and believed the gospel. Many people, both Jews and Gentiles, will not stumble over the message but will find that it is the mighty power of God and the wonderful wisdom of God.

1:25 This verse provides the key to Paul’s words in chapters 1–3. The message of Christ’s death for sins sounds foolish to those who don’t believe. But human plans and human strength cannot begin to compare to God. What the world sees as foolishness (Christ’s death for our sins as a display of God’s power) is God’s truth. The “foolish” people who simply accept Christ’s offer are actually the wisest of all, because they alone will live eternally with God.

1:26-27 Having shown the difference between God’s wisdom and what people of this world call wisdom, Paul urged his readers to remember that few of them had any worldly achievements when God called them. Few would have been considered wise in the world’s eyes, powerful, or wealthy. By using these three terms, Paul was pointing out that intellectual, political, and social position are not qualifications for being chosen by God. In fact, just the opposite was true. Yet they had been called by God. Clearly, God does not seek out the people whom the world admires; instead, he reveals himself to humble and searching hearts, regardless of their worldly position. But God chose what the world considers foolish to shame those who think they are wise. He chose the powerless to shame those who are powerful. Why would God not choose leaders and influential people who could make sweeping reforms and be followed by the masses? God does not choose as people choose. His sovereign choice is not based on anything that people can do or achieve.

1:28-29 God chose the foolish and the weak, things despised by the world, so that those chosen can never boast in the presence of God. God chooses those who are counted as nothing at all by the world and turns them into great people for him. People's abilities, social standing, or knowledge have nothing to do with God's choice. Skill and wisdom do not get a person into God's Kingdom—faith in Christ does—so no one can boast that his or her achievements helped him or her secure eternal life.

1:30-31 Here Paul reminded the Corinthian believers that God alone made it possible for believers to be in Christ Jesus. God is the source of believers' existence and the reason for their personal and living relationship with Christ. Because salvation is completely by God's grace, any boasting before God is sheer nonsense. If believers must boast, they must boast only of what the Lord has done. These words come from Jeremiah 9:23-24 and refer to saved people glorying in the Lord's acts on their behalf. So the redeemed people of the New Testament boast not in their salvation, but in God alone, who provided that salvation through his grace alone.

PAUL PREACHES WISDOM / 2:1-16

The Corinthians were confusing the gospel by creating artificial standards of faith. They were using wisdom as the gauge. The more wisdom someone claimed, the more spiritual that person became. Standards were determined by teachers. They were arguing and dividing over which teacher had the deepest spirituality. For Paul, the gospel—God’s wisdom—was a pool of clear water. Believers were urged to go deeper, but they would find living water no matter how deep they dove.

2:1-2 The words, when I first came to you, refer to Paul’s first visit to Corinth during his second missionary journey (A.D. 51), when he founded the church (Acts 18:1-18). As Paul had explained in chapter 1, the gospel message, by its very simplicity, appears foolish to those who think themselves wise by human standards. Paul was a brilliant scholar and could have overwhelmed his audience in Corinth with lofty words and brilliant ideas. While this may have led to a measure of intellectual assent, it may not have led them to saving faith. Faith that depends on clever arguments and bright oratory can be undermined if another logical argument or better orator comes along. Faith grounded in the power of the Holy Spirit, however, cannot be undermined. So Paul decided to concentrate only on Jesus Christ and his death on the cross. Paul shared the simple message of Jesus Christ, who had been crucified for the world’s sins, and let that simple message move into the Corinthians’ hearts by the power of the Holy Spirit (2:4).

2:3-4 Paul came to Corinth not as a powerful preacher and debater ready to take on the city but, rather, in weakness—timid and trembling. His attitude was not fearful, but utterly dependent upon God for the important task of bringing the gospel into this wicked and idolatrous city. He did not depend on using wise and persuasive speeches to change people’s hearts. That would happen only by the work of the Holy Spirit among them. The power of their conversion was not through him and his preaching but through the Holy Spirit.

2:5 Paul deliberately chose not to use the style of persuasion and oratory that so fascinated those in the Greek world. Instead, he brought a simple message that depended upon the Holy Spirit’s power for its effectiveness. Paul did not want his listeners focusing on the speech he gave, or how he presented it, or whatever other brand of human wisdom might have been used to persuade the Corinthians to believe. Instead, Paul wanted them to trust in the simple message and so trust the power of God for their salvation.

2:6-7 The Corinthians were accustomed to philosophical debate—whether engaging in it or simply listening to it. But, as Paul already noted, he did not come to them with philosophy; he came with the simple gospel message. When Paul did not entertain his listeners with philosophical debate, many probably criticized him, considering him unlearned and his message unimportant. Paul was not teaching a philosophy, however, nor was he debating speculative notions, for these never saved anyone. The kind of wisdom that belongs to this world offers nothing. Paul didn't bother with the worldly wisdom in order to impress anyone.

Instead, when he was among mature Christians, Paul did speak with words of wisdom, but this was the highest wisdom because it came from God. The “mature” Christians were not those with advanced training but those who had been enlightened by the Holy Spirit and had received salvation, as contrasted with those who had rejected it (1:21-23; 2:14). Because of the Holy Spirit's guidance, believers could grasp this secret wisdom of God, referring to God's offer of salvation to all people made available through Jesus' death on the cross. This plan was “secret” because only through God's wisdom and the insight given by his Spirit can people begin to comprehend it. Attempting to understand this plan with human wisdom and through philosophical discussions will take people nowhere. Only God, through the Holy Spirit, can reveal it (2:10).

This plan had been made before the world began. God knew the entire cycle of the creation, fall, and salvation through his Son before he made the earth and placed Adam and Eve on it. This reveals God's great plan for the human race—that despite their downfall, he would bring some to glory.

2:8 This “secret wisdom” had not been revealed to the rulers of this world (those who are impressed by worldly wisdom, 2:6). “Rulers” refers to the rulers in Palestine (the Pharisees, Sadducees, King Herod) and the Roman rulers (such as Pilate and the soldiers under his command). If these leaders had truly understood who Jesus was and the eternal consequences of rejecting him, they would never have crucified our glorious Lord. This is at the heart of Paul's irony: The very ones who were trying to kill Jesus were actually carrying out God's will. Thinking they were getting rid of a nuisance—Jesus of Nazareth—they were really crucifying the very Lord of glory, God incarnate. Jesus was misunderstood and killed by those whom the world considered wise and powerful.

2:9-10 Paul generalized an Old Testament theme, including references such as Psalm 31:20; Isaiah 52:15; 64:4; 65:17. Paul's point is that humans cannot begin to comprehend what God has prepared for those who love him. The future blessings that believers will enjoy in eternity are beyond human understanding; nevertheless, Christians believe and trust in these promises because God has revealed them. Believers have received the Holy Spirit and, thus, can understand from Scripture the wonderful future that God is preparing for them. Paul was explaining to the Corinthian believers that they had become very different from their unbelieving neighbors—essentially different because of the entrance of the Holy Spirit into their lives. The Holy Spirit, as God, reveals God to people. Human beings, through the Holy Spirit, can get some glimpses of what God has planned for his people.

Who is the Holy Spirit? God is three persons in one—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. God became a man in Jesus so that Jesus could die for our sins. Jesus rose from the dead to offer salvation to all people through spiritual renewal and rebirth. When Jesus ascended into heaven, his physical presence left the earth, but he promised to send the Holy Spirit so that his spiritual presence would still be among mankind (see Luke 24:49). The Holy Spirit first became available to the apostles on the day of the Resurrection (John 20:22) and then to more believers on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2). In the Old Testament, the Holy Spirit empowered specific individuals for specific purposes, but now all believers have the power of the Holy Spirit available to them. The statement, the Spirit searches out everything and shows us even God's deep secrets, means that only the Spirit can reveal to believers God's profound nature and wonderful plan, especially that formerly hidden mystery that is now revealed—salvation through Jesus' death and resurrection.

2:11 Paul compared the Spirit's understanding of God with a person's understanding of himself or herself. Just as a person cannot penetrate another person's thought processes, so no one can know God's thoughts except God's own Spirit. The only way to know God is to know his Holy Spirit, to have him in one's life. The only way to obtain the Holy Spirit is to accept, by faith, the sacrifice of Christ on the cross. The Holy Spirit is a distinct person, yet one in essence and function with God the Father.

2:12 The words us and we contrast the believers with nonbelievers. The rest of the verse contrasts their source of power and wisdom. Believers do not depend on worldly wisdom (the world's spirit); instead, they have received God's Spirit (Galatians 3:5). Jesus had told his disciples that God would send the Spirit after his return to heaven. When the Spirit came, believers would know the wonderful things God has freely given them. What God "freely gave" was salvation through the death of his Son. The understanding of the salvation that had been accomplished through Jesus' death would come to the believers as the Holy Spirit revealed it to them.

2:13 Paul may have had some critics in Corinth—the philosophers and orators who had been unimpressed with his message. Here Paul explained that the gospel message had not been given with words of human wisdom because no human wisdom can adequately explain God's wisdom. In order to speak the Spirit's message, believers must speak words given by the Spirit. In order to explain spiritual truths, believers must use the Spirit's words. Paul's words are authoritative because their source was the Holy Spirit. Paul was not merely giving his own personal views or his personal impression of what God had said. Under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he was writing the very thoughts and words of God. Today, all believers pass along the gospel message—trusting in God's Spirit to speak the spiritual truths.

2:14 The gospel sounded foolish to many in Corinth, just as it is scoffed at by many today. This should not come as a surprise. Non-Christians cannot fully understand God; thus they cannot grasp the concept that God's Spirit lives in believers. Just as a tone-deaf person cannot appreciate fine music fully, the person who rejects God cannot understand God's beautiful message. With the lines of communication broken, a person is not able to hear what God is saying to him or her. Paul highlighted these truths about people who aren't Christians: They can't understand these truths; the spiritual truths all sound foolish to them.

Unbelievers simply cannot comprehend Christ's work on the cross, see the beauty and compassion of God's divine plan, or desire to know God at all. All of these mysteries remain as mere foolishness to them because the ability to comprehend, love, and glory in these realities comes directly from the Holy Spirit.

2:15-16 Because believers have the Spirit, they understand these things. They are able to make right judgments—not necessarily about all matters, but certainly about spiritual matters such as salvation or God's future blessings, and they will be able to make the necessary discernments regarding them. Paul quoted from Isaiah 40:13 to show that a Christian is not subject to nonbelievers' judgments about spiritual matters because nonbelievers can't understand. For them to judge believers' faith in salvation by the cross is to judge the Lord's wisdom. Paul wondered who was ready to take human wisdom up against God's wisdom. Who among the detractors knew the mind of the Lord so as to bypass the simple message of the cross?

In contrast to those who do not have the Spirit and do not know the mind of the Lord, believers do have the mind of Christ. Believers understand fully, as did Christ himself, the significance of the cross and what it meant for mankind's salvation.

No one can completely comprehend God (Romans 11:34), but through the guidance of the Holy Spirit, believers can understand spiritual truths. Believers have insight into some of God's plans, thoughts, and actions because, with the Spirit within, they have access to the mind of Christ. Through the Holy Spirit, believers can begin to know God's thoughts, talk with him, and expect his answers to their prayers. Paul could allow his detractors in Corinth to jeer at him, for they had no right to make judgments on him or his message—because he had the mind of Christ and they did not.

1 CORINTHIANS 3

PAUL AND APOLLOS, SERVANTS OF CHRIST / 3:1-23

The Corinthians needed to mature in their spiritual lives. They were allowing themselves to be divided into factions regarding which preacher they liked better. These divisions in the church threatened the unity they would need in order to stand for the truth against false teachers and persecution.

3:1 Paul reproved the believers for their lack of maturity in the faith. Instead of growing in the faith, they had let themselves be diverted into quarrels and factions so that Paul could not even talk to them as he would to mature Christians. He had to talk to them in his letters as though they belonged to this world or as though they were infants in the Christian life. Paul was not accusing the Corinthians of being carnal (or “worldly”); he was saying that their behavior was sinful in comparison to that of the mature believers. They were indwelt by the Spirit, for they could not be Christians without the Holy Spirit (see Romans 8:9; Galatians 3:2-3). But these “infants” had not grown in the faith because they were acting like the world around them. The proof was that they quarreled like children, allowing divisions to distract them.

3:2-3 These believers in Corinth should have long since grown out of the “infant” stage and been maturing in their faith. Instead, they were still acting like “infants” (3:1), so Paul had to continue to feed them (teach them) the basics of the faith instead of being able to teach them deeper truths (Hebrews 5:12; 1 Peter 2:2). Just as babies drink only milk because they cannot eat solid food, so these “baby Christians” had to keep relearning the basics. Paul longed to teach them deeper truths, but he realized that they weren’t ready because they were still influenced by the world. Their sinful desires indicated that their mind-set was worldly, not characterized by the desires of the Spirit. Their jealousy and quarreling proved it. Instead of acting different from the world because of their salvation through Christ, they continued to act like people who don’t belong to the Lord. They were believers, but they were spiritually immature. By remaining immature and allowing that immaturity to divide them, they were wreaking havoc on the church.

3:4-5 As already mentioned in 1:12-13, the cause of the divisions and quarrels had to do with loyalty to different teachers. In 1:12, Paul also mentioned Peter; here he focused on the two men who had actually preached and taught in Corinth —himself and Apollos. The believers had split up, some being followers of Paul, others preferring Apollos. Paul was pointing out that to act that way was to act like those who are not Christians. Apollos and Paul were no more than servants of God who brought the message of salvation to the Corinthians. As mere servants of the Lord, they had pointed the people toward Christ, not toward themselves.

3:6-7 Part of the reason for the factions may have been the different jobs Paul and Apollos had done in Corinth (3:5). Paul planted the seed of the gospel message in the believers' hearts. He was a missionary pioneer, the first to bring the message of salvation, and the founder of the church in Corinth. Apollos had watered that seed, helping the believers grow stronger in the faith. Unfortunately, some of the believers in Corinth had split into factions that pledged loyalty to Paul, the “planter,” or to Apollos, the “waterer.”

Paul explained to these loyal believers that they had misplaced their loyalties. Paul and Apollos had only done what God had told them to do. In fact, compared to God's role in the process, they were unimportant, for God is the one who makes the seed grow. Paul, Apollos, Peter, and any missionary or minister of the gospel is nothing more than God's instrument. God alone brings the seed to fruition. Thus, there is no room for pride on the part of these leaders, and there is no room for divisive loyalty toward these leaders on the part of the followers.

3:8-9 While each servant has various functions, each one was a team member with the same purpose—to bring people into God's Kingdom and to see them mature in their faith. Yet, that being said, each servant is still individually responsible for his or her work—they will be rewarded individually, according to their own hard work. (For more on how God rewards our work, see 4:5. Paul will explain this comment in more detail in the following verses. For more on how God rewards believers, see 4:5; Ephesians 6:8; Colossians 3:23; Hebrews 11:6.) Paul and the other preachers and teachers of the true gospel message worked together as partners who belong to God. Their ministry belonged not to them, but to God.

3:10-11 Paul had been called by God to be an apostle and to take the gospel message to the Gentiles (see 1:1; Acts 9:15). God gave him the grace for this message, and, like an expert builder, he was doing what God had called him to do. He laid the foundation, meaning that he took the message of Jesus Christ to these people. The foundation of the church—of all believers—is Jesus Christ.

Whoever builds on that foundation must be very careful. All true believers have the gospel message as their foundation, and each one is building on that foundation. This “building” probably refers to the church, to sound teaching, and to each individual’s Christian character. Only the truth can build strong character in the believers and thus build a strong church. The foundation may be strong, but a variety of materials might be chosen in the building process, as Paul describes further.

Jesus ended his Sermon on the Mount with the same picture Paul used here (Matthew 7:24-27). Jesus compared two kinds of life: one constructed on the knowledge and application of his words; the other constructed without regard for Christ. Both houses can be built, but only one will stand up to the winds and storms of life.

3:12-13 The foundation for the building is Jesus Christ (3:11); Christians build on this foundation with a variety of materials of different quality. There is little value in attempting to find a meaning behind each of the materials Paul mentioned; most likely, he was dividing the materials into two basic classes—the valuable building materials, which were imperishable (here called gold, silver, and jewels), and the worthless building materials, which probably symbolize worldly wisdom (here called wood, hay, and straw). This time of testing that is coming at the judgment day refers to Christ’s second coming. At that time, believers will be separated from unbelievers, with believers receiving their promised reward in heaven (1 Thessalonians 5:2-9). Believers will not be judged regarding their salvation—their salvation is sure—but they will be judged to see what kind of work they have done. Everyone’s work will be put through the fire to see whether or not it keeps its value. “Fire” pictures a scorching test that will reveal the value of the “building.” Those made with gold, silver, and jewels will stand up to this test; those thrown together with wood, hay, and straw will go up in flames and be destroyed.

Christ will evaluate each person’s contribution to the life of the church, and the judgment day will reveal the sincerity of each person’s work. God will determine whether or not each person has been faithful to Jesus’ instructions. Good work will be rewarded; unfaithful or inferior work will be burned up.

3:14-15 Because the foundation is Jesus Christ, everyone who builds on that foundation will be saved. But these believers will present to God the lives that they have lived for him. Some of them will present lives of gold, silver, and jewels—lives built on the truth of the gospel and spent in sacrifice and service to God. These builders will receive a reward (see 3:8). Some will present lives that amount to no more than wood, hay, and straw, and all that they did and accomplished in this world will be burned up. These builders will be saved, but only as if they jumped out of a burning building and lost everything but their lives. They will enter heaven but will not receive the same reward as those who built well.

3:16 God's people, all believers in Jesus Christ, are the temple of God. Not only that, but the Spirit of God lives in them. While it is true that each individual is a "temple of the Holy Spirit" (6:19), Paul was teaching here about the nature of the church or Christian community. This is a common theme in the New Testament (2 Corinthians 6:16; Ephesians 2:22; Hebrews 3:6; 1 Peter 2:5).

Corinth boasted many pagan temples and shrines, but there was only one temple for God—the Corinthian Christians were it! The "Spirit of God" is the Holy Spirit, whom Jesus promised would come and live in his followers (John 14:17-20; 16:7). The Holy Spirit draws all believers together as Christ's body on earth; he provides the unity that should characterize them. Because every believer is a temple for the Holy Spirit (a dwelling place for him), the believers ought not be dividing into warring factions because that destroys the temple.

3:17 In the Old Testament, the penalty for defiling God's dwelling (whether the tabernacle or the temple) was death (Leviticus 15:31) or separation from the nation (Numbers 19:20). The penalty for bringing ruin upon God's spiritual temple—found in his people individually and in the church collectively—is no less severe. How might anyone attempt to destroy God's temple? False teaching that undermines believers' faith, rivalry that creates dissension and rips churches apart, and weak discipleship that promotes easy-believism are all problems that weaken the church. In 3:15, Paul wrote of the builder who, though he or she builds shoddily on the foundation, will yet be saved. This verse focuses on those who, already unsaved, set out to destroy those who are saved—such as the false teachers. God will destroy them because of their sin.

3:18 Thus far, most of Paul's letter has focused on the difference between the world's wisdom and God's wisdom (see 1:17–2:16). Paul admonished the believers to stop fooling themselves. If they continued to think that they were wise by this world's standards, they were fooling themselves.

Some people have used Paul's teaching here to rail against any study of philosophy or even higher learning in general. But Paul was not promoting the abandonment of reason. Paul was countering the Corinthians' use of rhetoric and debate (the "world's standards") to uphold their own divisive positions. He was warning them that God's way of thinking is infinitely more valuable, even though it may seem foolish to the world (1:27). They would need to empty themselves of their pride in human wisdom in order to be filled with God's wisdom.

3:19-20 Two Old Testament Scriptures back up Paul's statement that the wisdom of this world is foolishness to God. The first comes from Job 5:12, where God is the one who catches those who think they are wise in their own cleverness. The other reference comes from Psalm 94:11, again speaking of the worldly-wise ones, warning them that the Lord knows the thoughts of the wise—they are worthless. God knows the thoughts of everyone. What these wise people will accomplish is futile because it concerns this world alone and will pass away.

3:21-23 Therefore, the Corinthian believers ought not take pride in following a particular leader; instead, they must follow Christ Jesus alone. The phrase everything belongs to you underscores the fact that all believers have everything because they have Christ. They need not boast about following any particular leader because they would be limiting themselves. Indeed, all those leaders already belonged to them, as did everything else, because they belong to Christ, and Christ belongs to God.

The "whole world" refers to the physical world, not to the ethical system (as in 1:20). Believers have true "life" because life only has meaning when lived for Christ. While nonbelievers are victims of life, swept along by its current and wondering if there is meaning to it, believers can use life well because they understand its true purpose. Even "death" belongs to believers because it holds no terrors. Nonbelievers can only fear death. Believers, however, know that Christ has conquered death; death is the entranceway into an eternity with God. The present and the future belong to believers because they belong to the One who holds the present and the future.

Believers ought never settle for faithfulness to a human leader or human ideas; they ought never break into factions quarreling over their respective loyalties. And this should especially not occur since believers have been given everything from God's gracious hand.

1 CORINTHIANS 4

PAUL AND THE CORINTHIANS / 4:1-21

The discussion in chapter 3 regarding the status of ministers of the gospel led Paul to further explain how believers should regard their ministers. The leaders (himself, Apollos, Peter, or others) were never to be the focus of anyone's loyalty. They do not have supernatural powers, nor do they advance their own doctrines. Their authority is given and limited by the Master—Jesus Christ.

4:1-2 The believers ought not to be boasting about “their” leader (3:21). Instead, Paul wrote that he and Apollos were mere servants of Christ, doing what he told them to do—explaining God's secrets. These secrets refer to the plan of salvation (2:7). Ministers of the gospel message are merely God's servants. As servants who have been entrusted with much responsibility, they should be faithful.

4:3-4 The Corinthians battled over the preacher whom they judged to be the best, but Paul dismissed their judgment entirely. Human judgment was as worthless before God as human wisdom (2:6). Because he had been called by God to serve, Paul owed allegiance to God alone, and he looked to God alone to examine his performance. As a servant serves the master of the estate, so Paul served God. Paul did not concern himself with what any group of people thought of his teaching style or his message. Paul did not even depend on his own self-evaluation. When he did look within, Paul could honestly say that he had a clear conscience, but he was accountable to God and would be judged by God alone.

4:5 The Corinthian believers had expended much energy on making judgments concerning various leaders. Paul explained that God alone could judge the leaders because he alone knows the deepest secrets and private motives. Human beings cannot do that, so they should be careful not to jump to conclusions before the Lord returns as to whether or not someone is faithful. People can see only the outside, but God can discern a person's heart (1 Samuel 16:7).

4:6 Because the Corinthians had split into various cliques, each following its favorite preacher, Paul used their loyalties to himself and Apollos to illustrate what he was saying about God's ministers. The groups were not to boast about being tied to a particular preacher because each preacher was simply a humble servant who had suffered for the same message of salvation in Jesus Christ. No preacher of God has more status than another. If they would pay attention to the Scriptures, focusing on what God has said, they wouldn't be bragging about one leader over another. If they read and understood the Scriptures and what they say about God's sovereignty and the role of spiritual leaders, the factions would dissolve.

4:7 Paul's words about God's ministers merely illustrate the larger truth that believers ought not make judgments about one another either. Apparently, each faction that followed a different leader also placed itself above the others. But Paul asked the rhetorical questions so they could see the silliness of their prideful positions against one another. No one was better than anyone else. Everything they had, everything they accomplished, every gift they received—all came from God. No one has any right to boast about anything.

4:8 With biting sarcasm, Paul derided the rampant pride in the Corinthian church. The believers proclaimed loyalties and set themselves against one another, and many looked down even on the apostle Paul for his lack of wealth or great oratory (see 2:1-5). These believers apparently already had all they wanted. They thought they had the Kingdom's riches, and they reigned in their little groups as though they had become kings. Believing that they possessed all the great wisdom and knowledge they needed, they felt qualified to judge others. Paul marveled that they were able to accomplish all of this apart from those who had brought the gospel truth to them. With great irony, Paul explained that he wished he could be a king along with them, for apparently they had surpassed the apostle in wisdom and knowledge and had already reached full maturity.

4:9 While some of the Corinthian believers lived as though they were kings, the apostles apparently had been passed up for such honor. How odd that the apostles, who had been called to minister the gospel message across the world, were not reigning as kings but instead were like prisoners of war who had been condemned to die. For almost all of the apostles, that was in fact what happened. While these new Christians were attempting to reign, their spiritual leaders were facing an entirely different sort of life—one filled with suffering for the sake of the gospel.

4:10-13 Surely Paul's sarcasm shamed his readers. He pointed out the strangeness of their supposed wisdom, strength, and honor while God's apostles were considered as foolish, weak, and without honor. To further elaborate on the warped viewpoint of the proud Corinthian believers, Paul described the hardships that he and the other apostles continued to face in their ministry. Far from being honored for their preaching and fawned over as kings, they faced severe suffering. The world saw these men as no more than trash, because they did not meet up to worldly standards of success. Paul willingly took this abuse in order to bring the message of eternal life to any and all who would believe. Most Christians today want careers that give them comfort, money, and prestige. Very few are willing to accept work that takes away “necessary” comforts, earns little money, and/or causes people to look down on them—even if it is for the cause of the gospel.

4:14-16 Paul’s previous sarcasm had not been meant to shame these believers but to warn them because they were his beloved children in the faith. Paul portrayed a special affection for these believers—he was their spiritual father. In an attempt to unify the church, Paul appealed to his relationship with them. By “father,” Paul meant that he was the church’s founder because he had originally preached the Good News to them. Because Paul had started the church, he could be trusted to have its best interests at heart, and he had the authority to warn them of their sinful ways. Paul’s tough words were motivated by love—like the love a good father has for his children (see also 1 Thessalonians 2:11). Because the church could trust him, they could also imitate him, so he boldly explained that they could follow his example.

4:17 Timothy had accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey (see Acts 16:1-3) and was a key person in the growth of the early church. Timothy probably arrived in Corinth shortly after this letter (see 16:10)—the bearers of the letter possibly being Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (see 16:17). It is clear that Timothy was not with Paul at this letter’s writing because he is not mentioned in either the greeting or the closing. Most likely Timothy was notified by Paul to travel on to Corinth from Macedonia (Acts 19:22). Timothy’s role was to remind the Corinthians of the faith they had received. Afterward, Timothy was to return to Paul and report on the church’s progress.

4:18-19 In their eagerness to set themselves up as leaders, the false teachers had said that Paul would not be coming back to Corinth—probably pointing out weakness, fear, or some other inadequacy (see 9:1-3; 2 Corinthians 1:17; 10:10). They assumed, therefore, that they could do as they pleased. But Paul explained that he had every intention of going back to Corinth soon, if this was the Lord’s will. At that time, Paul would expose the arrogant people for who they really were. They were big talkers, but did they really have God's power? The answer would be obvious to everyone.

It is not known whether Paul ever returned to Corinth, but it is likely. In 2 Corinthians 2:1, he wrote that he decided not to make “another painful visit,” implying that he had had a previous painful confrontation with the Corinthian believers—sometime after he wrote 1 Corinthians.

4:20 Being a big talker is one thing, but living by God's power is quite another. Some people talk a lot about faith, but that's all it is—talk. They may know all the right words to say, but their lives don't reflect God's power. Paul says that the Kingdom of God is not just fancy talk, it is to be lived. A person can live only by God's power when he or she has the Holy Spirit within (see John 3:3-8; 2 Corinthians 5:17).

4:21 Paul wrote that when he came—and he would come, barring divine intervention (4:19)—he would come with his authority from God as their spiritual father. Far from being afraid or weak, he would arrive ready to deal with the situation as it was. This letter would precede him, and the Corinthian believers would have time to choose to continue in their arrogance and therefore receive punishment and scolding, or to make the necessary changes and therefore receive love and gentleness. It would be up to them.

1 CORINTHIANS 5

PAUL CONDEMNS SPIRITUAL PRIDE / 5:1-13

The pride that characterized the Corinthian church (see 4:10, 18) had so blinded the believers that they were allowing flagrant sexual immorality to take place in their fellowship. Their pride may have been such that they refused to admit this sin and deal with it, or they may have been proud that this man was one of their spiritual people, honored for his “knowledge” or “wisdom.” Paul condemned the believers for allowing this sin to go on unchallenged in their midst. Believers today can learn from this passage about how the church must deal with flagrant and unrepented sin.

5:1 A report had been delivered to Paul regarding sexual immorality going on among the believers in Corinth. The Corinthian church had been unwilling to discipline this man. Paul prefaced his pronouncement of knowledge of this situation by saying that the problem was so evil that even the pagans don’t do it—quite an indictment on these believers. Most of the believers knew about the sinful relationship already, but apparently they had been unwilling to admit it, so Paul described the sin point-blank: A man in the church was living in sin with his father’s wife. This man was having an affair, already a sinful act deserving discipline. But his sexual activity outside of marriage had taken place with his “father’s wife” (probably his stepmother). Whether the man had seduced this woman away from his father, or whether the woman was divorced or widowed is unclear. In any case, even the pagans would have shuddered at this, but the church members were trying to ignore the situation.

5:2 The problem of arrogance in the Corinthian church had spilled over to the point where they were tolerating flagrant sin. Instead of being proud of themselves, they should have been mourning in sorrow and shame. Then, they should have removed the man from the fellowship. The church must discipline flagrant sin among its members—such sins, left unchecked, can divide and paralyze a church. This “removal” of the person was not meant to be vengeful but to help bring about a cure.

Today, tolerance has become such a battle cry in the media and in political and educational circles that it has affected even the church. It is very difficult for people to discipline sin in church members because everyone is trying to be accepting of others. People say, “Who am I to judge? I have sin in my life.” So they want all sin excused, including their own. We must not let modern-day low standards determine what is true and right for the church.

5:3-5 While those in the Corinthian church had failed to do anything about this man's sin, Paul himself would tell them what had to be done. Paul had weighed the matter and had passed judgment. As an apostle and the spiritual father of this church (4:15), Paul had the authority to deal with the matter and he understood the danger to the church if the sin were to remain undisciplined. Paul told the church, in no uncertain terms to call a meeting of the whole congregation so they would witness and support the action. As they met, Paul would be there in spirit, because he carried the authority as an apostle, and the power of the Lord Jesus would also be with them as they met. The entire situation was under the mighty power of the Lord Jesus to deal with the man's spirit and to bring him to repentance.

Paul explained the discipline that should be carried out: Cast this man out of the church and into Satan's hands. This would mean excluding him from the fellowship of believers (see 1 Timothy 1:20). Without the spiritual support of Christians, this man would be left alone with his sin and Satan, and hopefully this emptiness would drive him to repentance. The church could not literally give him to Satan, for only God can consign a person to eternal judgment. It was meant to force him to see the consequences of sin by living in Satan's sphere of influence—the world apart from Christ and the church.

That his sinful nature will be destroyed meant that the exclusion from the fellowship would help the man to face his sinful, selfish nature (flesh), repent, and return to the church. Paul wanted this sinner to experience the crucifixion of his sinful nature (Romans 7:5-6; Galatians 5:24). It may take such drastic measures to deal with the sinful nature, but how much more important for the man that he face this and repent in order that he would be saved in the end. Paul hoped that this harsh disciplinary action might be of eternal benefit to the man.

Churches today need the spiritual determination to deal with sins such as these that affect the whole church. But excommunication as a form of discipline should be used rarely and carefully. It should be an action of the church body, not just one or two people. Its purpose should be redemptive and restorative, not vengeful or vindictive.

5:6-7 Paul was writing to those who wanted to ignore this church problem. They boasted, but they had no grounds to boast about their spirituality because they were allowing a horrible sin to exist in their fellowship. They had to expel this sinful man from the fellowship so that his sinning would not affect everyone. For them to stay pure did not mean that without this man they would be sinless

(Paul would address other problems in the rest of this letter). Instead, Paul understood that this kind of sin, left unchecked, would work evil in the church; thus, it needed to be disciplined by excommunication so that the believers could see the serious consequences of sin.

Indeed, they ought not forget that Christ gave his life so that people could deal with sin. By not dealing with this man's sin, they were making Christ's death of no effect. They should remember, said Paul, that Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed (see Exodus 12:15; 13:7). Continuing in sin shows disregard for Christ's sacrifice.

5:8 The words let us celebrate the festival are a figurative way of picturing what Christ is to believers. In Paul's day, the Passover was celebrated with a ceremonial search throughout one's home for yeast and then destroying the yeast before the Passover lamb was slain in the temple. Because Christ, the Passover Lamb, has already been sacrificed, all yeast (that is, all evil) should be removed from among his people. The old life (the old bread) was characterized by wickedness and evil; these have no part in Christ's church. Believers, characterized by being born again, have cleansed the evil from their lives and are like the new bread, living in purity and truth. A small piece of fermented dough eventually affects the whole loaf. Boasting, as well as immorality, hurts the whole church. Christianity is not a private lifestyle.

5:9-11 The words when I wrote to you before refer to Paul's earlier letter to the Corinthian church, often called the "lost letter" because it has not been preserved. In that letter, he had told the Corinthians not to associate with people who indulge in sexual sin. Either the Corinthians had misunderstood what Paul meant, or they had avoided his command by pointing out the impossibility of not associating with sinners in a sinful world. So Paul made it clear here that he wasn't talking about nonbelievers, for they, by nature, are involved in sexual sin, greed, swindling, and idol worship. Believers cannot disassociate themselves completely from nonbelievers—they would have to leave this world to avoid people like that. In addition, with no contact with nonbelievers, believers would not be able to carry out Christ's command to tell them about salvation (Matthew 28:18-20).

Paul meant that believers were not to associate with anyone who claims to be a Christian and yet has a sinful lifestyle. Believers must separate themselves from those who claim to be Christians yet indulge in sins explicitly forbidden in Scripture and then rationalize their actions. By rationalizing their sin, these "believers" harm others for whom Christ died, and they tarnish the image of God in their lives. The church has a responsibility to rebuke, correct, and restore those in the fellowship who claim to be believers but live like nonbelievers.

5:12-13 The difference between believers and nonbelievers lies in their relationship to Jesus Christ. The outsiders (referring to nonbelievers) are to be met where they are (even in their sinful lifestyles, 5:9-11) and offered the gospel message. Yet the believers are not responsible to judge them because God will.

In the church, however, believers need to make such judgments. The Bible consistently says not to criticize people by gossiping or making rash judgments. At the same time, however, believers are to judge and deal with those who claim to be believers but are living sinful, rebellious lives. Paul's instructions for this sinful man—remove him—come from Deuteronomy 17:7. This instruction should not be used to handle trivial matters or to take revenge; nor should it be applied to individual problems between believers. These verses are instructions for dealing with open sin in the church, with a person who claims to be a Christian and yet who sins without remorse. The church is to confront and discipline such a person in love.

1 CORINTHIANS 6

AVOIDING LAWSUITS WITH CHRISTIANS / 6:1-8

In chapter 5 Paul explains what to do with open immorality in the congregation. In chapter 6 he explains how the congregation should handle smaller problems between believers.

6:1 While there are certain cases that, by law, have to be submitted to the legal authorities, disputes between Christians should be handled by qualified Christian leaders in the church. Paul declared that disagreeing Christians should not have to file a lawsuit and ask a secular court to resolve differences among them. Why did Paul make this point? (1) If the judge and jury were not Christians, they would not likely be sensitive to Christian values. (2) The basis for going to court is often revenge; this should never be a Christian's motive. (3) Lawsuits make the church look bad, causing unbelievers to focus on church problems rather than on its purpose.

6:2 By going to pagan authorities to settle disputes, the Christians were acting beneath their dignity. They should be able to settle these disputes among themselves because someday (at the Second Coming) Christians (who are coheirs with Christ) are going to judge the world (see also 2 Timothy 2:12; Revelation 3:21; 20:4). Because of this truth, believers should not take their disputes into the world, because it would be a poor witness and would show a lack of unity in the church.

6:3 Christians will also judge angels. The use of the word “angels” without an article leaves the meaning unclear. This could mean that Paul was referring to Christians' part in judging the Devil and his demons (evil angels) at Christ's second coming (see 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 1:6; Revelation 19:19-20; 20:10). Or it could mean that the Christians will “judge angels” in the sense that they will preside over angels when they (the Christians) reign with Christ. Paul's point was that, in light of the privilege that will belong to believers in the future, they should be able to resolve ordinary disagreements here on earth.

6:4-6 Repeating his concern stated in 6:1, Paul asked why the Corinthian Christians were taking their disputes to outside judges who were not Christians. That they were not respected by the church does not mean that the believers were showing no respect. Instead, these pagan judges lived by an entirely different standard than the Christians; therefore, their judgments could not be in accordance with the spiritual laws by which the Christians lived. Surely someone in the church was wise enough to decide their disagreements. Apparently, they had been acting with great pride (4:8), yet they couldn't handle their own arguments. Instead of using the wisdom and discernment from the Holy Spirit, which was available to them as believers, they were suing each other, right in front of unbelievers. What kind of witness was this for the church? How much better for the believers to live "above" such matters, dealing with them in their own congregation with the help of respected leaders, so that nothing would hinder their witness for Christ in the world.

6:7-8 The basic problem went back to the Corinthian congregation. If they had been maturing in their faith, they would not have become so riddled with sin that the believers would actually have to bring lawsuits against one another. That these believers had to resort to lawsuits to settle disputes among them was a real defeat for them. It showed that they were still immature. Paul explained the direction in which they needed to grow—they needed to willingly accept injustice if that would mean protecting the church. Believers should never be wronged and defrauded by other believers in the first place. Mature believers would not act in that manner. If they were wronged by other believers, mature believers should be willing to "turn the other cheek" (Matthew 5:39).

AVOIDING SEXUAL SIN / 6:9-20

If the Corinthian church truly realized their high calling, they would live in a completely different manner, and they would not have the problems involving lawsuits (6:7-8). Paul seized upon this opportunity to remind the Corinthian believers that their lives must change. They should not practice such evil acts because evil people cannot inherit the Kingdom of God.

6:9-10 In these verses, Paul gives a strong proclamation about those who will not have a share in the Kingdom of God. The Christians could not call themselves followers of Jesus and allow any kind of evil to permeate their lives. They will not share in the Kingdom because these people persisted in their evil practices with no sign of remorse. Such people—if they think they are believers—need to reevaluate their lives to see if they truly believe in Christ.

Male prostitutes refers to those who practice homosexuality. Some people attempt to legitimize homosexuality as an acceptable alternative lifestyle. Even some Christians say that people have a right to choose their sexual preference. But the Bible specifically calls homosexual behavior sin (see Leviticus 18:22-29; Romans 1:18-32; 1 Timothy 1:9-11). Christians must be careful, however, to condemn only the practice, not the people. Those who commit homosexual acts are not to be feared, ridiculed, or hated. They can be forgiven, and their lives can be transformed. The church should be a haven of forgiveness and healing for repentant homosexuals without compromising its stance against homosexual behavior.

6:11 The list of sins may seem unduly long (6:9-10), but apparently Paul was being complete in listing what kinds of lives and lifestyles from which the Corinthian believers had come. Even the writings of pagan authors and historians attest to the rampant immorality in the city of Corinth. Many of the believers had come out of a lifestyle where sexual perversion was part of their “worship.” When Paul had come to Corinth, he met people with the lowest morals. Yet the power of Jesus Christ had changed them.

Paul stressed that all sin can be forgiven. When the Corinthians received Jesus Christ, their sins had been washed away. This refers to a cleansing process that had washed away their sins through the blood of Jesus (Hebrews 10:22; Revelation 7:14). They were sanctified, set apart for God (John 17:17; 1 Corinthians 1:2; 1 Thessalonians 4:3; 5:23). And they were made right, meaning that God had declared that these believers were righteous and just in his sight because of what the Lord Jesus Christ and the Spirit of our God had done for them. In this verse, the Trinity is represented—God the Father, Jesus Christ the Son, and the Holy Spirit all taking part in transforming people from their sinful lives to a new way of living in obedience to God.

6:12 The phrase “I am allowed to do anything,” appears to have been a catchphrase, as it appears twice in this verse and twice again in 10:23. Apparently, the Christians in Corinth had been using this phrase as a license to live any way they pleased. Perhaps Paul had used the statement when he preached to them about their freedom in Christ, but they had wrongly interpreted it. Paul never meant disregarding basic Christian morality and ethics. Some Christians in Corinth apparently were using this to excuse their sins, saying Christ had taken away all sin, so they had complete freedom to live as they pleased; or what they were doing was not strictly forbidden by Scripture.

Paul answered both of these excuses. While Christ has taken away sin, this does not mean everything a person might do would be good. While some actions may not be specifically forbidden in Scripture, believers should know that these actions and their results would not be beneficial to themselves or to the church. Believers should be using their Christian freedom to share the gospel and show love for others instead of looking for ways to gratify themselves. In addition, while some actions are not sinful in themselves, they are not appropriate because they can control believers' lives and lead them away from God. Believers should not do these actions because they do not want to become enslaved to anything.

Freedom is a mark of the Christian faith—freedom from sin and guilt, and freedom to use and enjoy all things that come from God. But Christians should not abuse this freedom and hurt themselves or others. Many people have misinterpreted the phrase today to mean, “I will not be mastered by any rule of ethics, law, or Bible principle,” rather than, “I will not be mastered by any besetting sin.” Christians who have been in the church for many years can easily excuse sins such as gossip, bitterness, an unforgiving spirit, lust, or withholding money from God's work. We must be on alert for those desires that can master us. What God has allowed his children to enjoy must not grow into a bad habit that controls them. For more about Christian freedom and everyday behavior, read chapter 8.

6:13 Another saying, Food is for the stomach, and the stomach is for food, had apparently been used as an illustration to explain the Corinthians' warped understanding of Christian freedom. They seemed to believe that because the physical activity of eating and digesting food had no effect on one's Christian life, neither would other merely physical activities—such as sexual sin.

Paul stated that it was true that what one eats does not affect the spiritual life. In fact, so transitory is this physical realm that one day God will do away with both stomachs and food. However, he also stated that one could not compare eating to sexual activity. Humans are a combination of material and spiritual. Just as the spirit affects the body, so too the physical body affects the spirit. People cannot commit sin with their bodies without damaging their souls because their bodies and souls are inseparably joined. While the stomach was made for food, people's bodies were not made for sexual immorality. Stomachs and food will pass away, but believers' bodies will be transformed and glorified.

The Greek word for “body” used here refers to the whole being and personality, not to the worldly flesh. These bodies were made for the Lord, and the Lord cares about our bodies. Christianity takes very seriously the realm of the physical. God created a physical world and pronounced it good. He promises a new earth where real people have transformed physical lives. At the heart of Christianity is the story of God himself taking on flesh and blood and coming to live with people, offering both physical healing and spiritual restoration.

6:14 God's care and concern for the physical bodies of his children began at Creation. Jesus was put to death, but God raised him. Likewise he will raise our bodies from the dead. That God would bring his Son back in a body shows the value that God places on his children's physical bodies.

6:15-16 This teaching about sexual immorality and prostitutes was especially important for the Corinthian church because the temple of the love-goddess Aphrodite was in Corinth. This temple employed more than a thousand prostitutes, and sex was part of the worship ritual. Paul clearly stated that Christians should have no part in sexual immorality, even if it is acceptable and popular in the surrounding culture.

His reason? Because the believers' bodies were actually parts of Christ. They obviously should never think of taking a part of Christ and joining it to a prostitute. Sex is more than a mere physical act; instead, it unites a man and a woman in such a way that they become one body as it had been planned in the beginning, quoting the Scriptures in Genesis 2:24.

Paul was not denying the beauty of sex between a married man and woman, nor was he saying that any sexual union is an exact comparison of believers' union with Christ. Paul wanted his readers to see the perversion of using their God-given bodies for such wickedness as sexual sin with a prostitute (perhaps even a temple prostitute, thus making the sexual sin a form of idol worship). These sins are not merely physical, having no effect on a person's spiritual life. They are deeply emotional and even mystical, in the case of the union created between sexual partners. This must not be taken for granted. But for the person who has sexually sinned in the past, there is forgiveness, healing, and renewal.

6:17 A person who commits sexual sin with a prostitute is "united" (joined) with him or her. By contrast, the person who is joined to the Lord becomes one spirit with him. The same verb is used both times in the Greek, describing the oneness that believers have with the Lord who is spirit (see 2 Corinthians 3:17-18).

6:18 Sexual sin is a violation of one's own body. Paul described it as a sin that affects the body like no other. As in 6:13, the word body refers not to the flesh, but to the whole being and personality. This sin has disastrous effects. But what an enticement it can be for all people, and believers are not exempt. Clearly other sins also affect the body, such as gluttony or drunkenness, but no other sin has the same effect on the memory, personality, or soul of a person as sexual sin. Paul argues that in intercourse, people are united (6:16-17). Their spirits are not involved in quite the same way in other sins. Also Paul argues that our bodies are the temple of God (6:19-20). In sexual sin, a person removes his or her body from God's control to unite with someone not in his plan. Thus, those people violate God's purpose for their bodies. Satan gladly uses sexual sin as a weapon, for he knows its power to destroy. Thus, Paul says, don't walk, but run away from sexual sin. Believers need to exercise alertness and awareness to stay away from places where temptation is strong, and they need to use strong, evasive action if they find themselves entrapped.

6:19-20 The words your body in this verse refer not to the corporate "body of Christ," but to each believer's individual, physical body. Each believer should view his or her body as a temple of the Holy Spirit, who was living in them. Jesus Christ died to pay the high price that purchased sinful people's freedom (Ephesians 1:7; 1 Peter 1:18-19). His blood provided the sacrifice that made believers acceptable to God. Because of Jesus' death and resurrection, the Holy Spirit came to indwell those who believed in him—he took up residence in their bodies. This Holy Spirit had come into them when they had believed. Believers, therefore, do not belong to themselves. God bought them, so they must honor God with their bodies. They must "honor God" by showing their gratefulness for Jesus' sacrifice by their worship, obedience, and service (see Romans 12:1-2).

1 CORINTHIANS 7

INSTRUCTION ON CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE / 7:1-40

After discussing disorder in the church, Paul moved to the list of questions that the Corinthians had sent him, including those on marriage, singleness, eating meat offered to idols, propriety in worship, orderliness in the Lord's Supper, spiritual gifts, and the resurrection. Questions that plague churches today are remarkably similar, so we can receive specific guidance in these areas from this letter.

7:1 The Corinthian believers had written to Paul, asking him several questions, or perhaps even taking issue with some of his principles, relating to the Christian life and problems in the church. Apparently this first question regarded whether people should stay married or if those previously married should remain celibate.

Christians in Corinth were surrounded by sexual temptation. The city had a reputation even among pagans for sexual immorality and religious prostitution. To this sexually saturated society, Paul was delivering these instructions on sex and marriage. The Corinthians needed special, specific instructions because of their culture's immoral standards. Some believers were teaching total sexual abstinence within marriage because of a mistaken notion that sexual relations were sinful; some were proposing separating from or divorcing spouses in order to stay pure. To the first question, Paul answered that it is good to live a celibate life. At first glance this may seem to contradict God's words in Genesis 2:18, "It is not good for the man to be alone." Paul maintained a high view of marriage (Ephesians 5:25-33), and here was simply explaining that celibacy was normal, and that it may be God's will for some to remain single. Paul's advice may have been directed at the "present crisis" referred to in 7:26; he thought it would be easier to face persecution as a single person. But, as Paul would explain later in this chapter, his words do not mean that married couples should divorce or that Christians ought not marry. For those whom God calls to celibacy (such as Paul himself), the lifestyle is in accordance with God's will for them. They should see it as a gift to be used to further God's Kingdom (7:7).

7:2 God created marriage, so it cannot be bad. Those who can remain celibate should do so, but the believers in Corinth ought not deprive themselves of being married and try to enforce celibacy. That would set them up for failure because there is so much sexual immorality. As noted above, sexual immorality was pervasive in Corinth, invading even the worship of some of their gods and goddesses. Many of the believers had come out of very immoral lifestyles. Paul advised, therefore, that those men and women not given the gift of celibacy from God should go ahead and marry. Then they would be able to fulfill their sexual desires in the God-honoring institution of marriage.

7:3 In the same way that God created marriage, he also created sex with which the human race could procreate as well as find great enjoyment. Just as with anything else that God created, however, sinful humanity can find a way to dirty it. God created sex to occur only between a man and a woman, and only within the confines of the marriage commitment. The Corinthians were surrounded by sexual temptations. Such temptations can be difficult to withstand because they appeal to the normal and natural desires that God has given to human beings.

Some people in the ancient world reacted against the extreme immorality by doing just the opposite—becoming ascetics and abstaining from sex altogether. Apparently, some married people, who saw or experienced the evil of sex wrongly used, began to believe that all sex was immoral, so they should abstain even in their marriages. While celibacy should be the rule for those who choose to remain single (7:1), Paul explained that it should not have any place in the marriage relationship. Marriage provides God's way to satisfy natural sexual desires and to strengthen the partners against temptation. Married couples have the responsibility to care for each other; therefore, husbands and wives should not deprive each other but should fulfill each other's needs and desires. The reference to the wife's right as a married woman as being equal to the man's right was revolutionary in this culture of male domination. Paul stressed equality of men and women in their rights as marriage partners to give and receive from each other.

7:4 A person's body belongs to God when that person becomes a Christian (see 6:19-20). Physically, their bodies belong to their spouses. God designed marriage so that through the union of husband and wife two become one. The sexual relationship makes two people "one flesh" (6:16; also Genesis 2:24). The unity given to the married couple through their sexual relationship makes them no longer independent beings; they have become "one flesh." So Paul said to these married believers that sex is not immoral because God created it; therefore, they should not deprive their spouse.

7:5 The only time the spouses should abstain from sexual intimacy would be if they mutually agree, for a limited time, to abstain from sex in order to devote themselves to prayer. Times of devoted prayer to God are vital for all believers; some may feel that they should do this with total focus on God and thus abstain from sex (or even food if it is a time of fasting). This is laudable, but Paul also explained that it should not be a habit. Because those married are already “one flesh,” they must maintain that union and come together again. Otherwise, they would leave themselves open for Satan’s temptations.

7:6 Most likely, this refers to all that Paul had said thus far concerning his answer to their marriage question (7:1). Marriage is desirable, and certainly needful in order to procreate under God’s guidelines, but marriage is not commanded by God. However, this suggestion could just as easily conclude his statement in 7:5—which he doesn’t want them to understand as if it were a command.

7:7 Paul made a personal note, further explaining that celibacy is acceptable, by stating that he wished everyone could get along without marrying just as he did. Paul well knew that his lifestyle—itinerant travel, difficult work, not having a permanent home, danger, often being mocked and ridiculed, sometimes being beaten and jailed, all for the sake of the gospel—was not one that he could easily adhere to with a wife and children along. Paul thanked the Lord for his gift of being able to remain celibate by doing what God wanted him to do with the freedom that a married man would not have. He wished that others could serve the Lord with such complete abandon.

Paul also realized, however, that if everyone remained unmarried, there would be no Christian children and no furthering of the Christian faith to the next generation. Thus God gives some people the gift of marriage, and they can serve God well in that capacity. To others he gives the gift of singleness so they can fulfill other roles in the furthering of his Kingdom. Because these are gifts from God, one should not try to force either one on anyone’s life.

7:8-9 Paul laid down the general principles regarding marriage in the previous verses; here he began to speak to various people’s situations specifically. First, he wrote instructions to those who aren’t married and to widows (and widowers). Paul’s single-minded focus was always on God’s Kingdom and service for it, so his advice to these believers in Corinth is couched in his concern for their ability to bear up under persecution for their faith and to serve the Lord wholeheartedly (see 7:26, 32-35). (Note that in a different place and situation, Paul counseled the younger widows to marry. See 1 Timothy 5:14.) So he suggested to those presently not bound in marriage that it would be better to stay unmarried as he himself was. However, if they found that they couldn’t control themselves, they should go ahead and marry.

The Corinthians seemed to have a problem with self-control—as suggested by the kind of sexual immorality so common in the city. The believers came out of that lifestyle, yet probably many still were struggling with their sinful natures in that area. Paul did not suggest enforced celibacy on such people. Instead, he told married people to give themselves to each other (7:3-4); he told single people to try to use their singleness as an opportunity to give all to the Lord (7:7-8). Yet, he also understood that those who struggled with self-control should not put themselves in the position of enforced celibacy, for Satan would use many temptations right there in the city to bring them down. Instead, Paul said these people should marry so as not to burn with lust. This is not a put-down of marriage as being no more than a legitimate way to release sexual pressure; instead, it is tied with the gifts of marriage and singleness that Paul had mentioned in 7:7. Those who do not have the gift of singleness, and thus have a passion that will need a proper release, ought to marry. It would be difficult to live with such a desire without having been given the grace to do so.

7:10-11 Having spoken to the unmarried people in 7:8-9, Paul here turned his attention to the married. He explained to the Corinthian believers the Christian view of divorce, given as a command from the Lord. Jesus had taught about divorce during his time on earth (see Matthew 5:31-32; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12; Luke 16:18), saying that married people were not meant to be divorced. While divorce was permitted as a concession, it was not God’s plan for married people.

Paul explained, therefore, that a wife must not leave her husband. Apparently it was possible in the Greco-Roman culture for a wife to leave her husband (in Jewish culture, divorce laws focused on the husband separating from his wife). If a woman has already separated from her husband, she should remain single or go back to her husband. She does not have the option to marry another man. In the same way, the husband must not leave his wife. Although Paul gave an exception in 7:15, the ideal remains.

7:12-13 Next, Paul turned his attention to the rest of you—the people who were married but felt “single” because their spouses were unbelievers. Undoubtedly, there were many such couples in the Corinthian church. About this particular situation, Paul said he did not have a direct command from the Lord. So he did what all believers must do when Scripture doesn’t state exactly what must be done in a particular situation—he inferred what should be done from what Scripture does say. Paul based his advice on God’s commands about marriage and applied them to the situation the Corinthians were facing.

Because of their desire to serve Christ, some people in the Corinthian church thought they ought to divorce their pagan spouses and marry Christians. But Paul affirmed the marriage commitment. God's ideal is for marriages to stay together—even when one spouse is not a believer. To leave the marriage—even for the noblest of goals in serving the Lord—would actually be to disobey God's express command regarding marriage (Mark 10:2-9). Instead, the believing spouse should try to win the other to Christ (7:16). It would be easy to rationalize leaving; however, Paul makes a strong case for staying with the unbelieving spouse and being a positive influence on the marriage. Paul, like Jesus, believed that marriage is permanent. Paul commanded this for the believers in the church whose unbelieving spouses were willing to continue living with them. He gave other advice to those whose unbelieving spouses wanted to dissolve the marriage because the husband or wife had become a Christian (see 7:15).

7:14 The reason for these couples to stay together (7:13-14) is that the Christian spouse brings holiness to the marriage. There are two views of how holiness is applied to the unbeliever. One view is that there is a moral influence on the unbeliever as the Christian spouse bears witness to Christ and lives obediently to God. The other view is that the Christian, now blessed by God, includes his or her spouse in the promised blessings of the covenant as they overflow to the unbeliever. "Holiness" does not carry the meaning of "salvation"; that is, the unbelieving husband is not "saved" through his wife's salvation. More likely, the Corinthians had heeded Paul's advice in 5:9-11 not to associate with unbelievers. They had interpreted Paul to mean that sex with an unbelieving marriage partner would defile them. Paul affirmed the opposite. When believers have sexual relations with their unbelieving spouse, the unbelievers are blessed in a certain way. The marriage and its sexual relations set up or lead into the possibility of the conversion of the unbeliever.

The blessings that flow to believers don't stop there but extend to others. Among those most likely to receive benefits from the godly influence of believers' lives are their children. God regards the marriage as "holy" by the presence of one Christian spouse. Paul calls the children of such a marriage set apart because of God's blessing on the family. The believing parent, called upon to raise his or her children in the faith, will hopefully have such an influence that the children will accept salvation for themselves.

7:15 While the believing spouse must not leave the marriage if the unbeliever wants to stay married (7:12-13), the opposite may also happen. The unbeliever may decide that, because his or her spouse has become a Christian, the marriage should be dissolved. In this case, the believer's only choices would be to deny faith in Jesus Christ in order to maintain the marriage, or maintain faith in Christ and let the marriage be dissolved. As difficult as it might be, and as much as marriage is sanctified by God, the high calling of God must not be denied for any reason. So the believer must let the unbeliever go. This may be the second exception to remarriage, along with adultery (see Matthew 5:31-32). So the Christian man or woman can allow the divorce to happen and not be disobeying God.

7:16 Another reason for believers to try not to dissolve their marriage to an unbeliever is that they can be a good influence on their spouse. The intimacy and day-to-day-ness of marriage provide ample opportunity for the Christian to be a powerful witness to his or her spouse. So powerful can it be, Paul reminded them, that the unbelieving wife or husband might be converted because of the faithful testimony of the believing wives and husbands.

7:17-19 Christ makes changes from within and calls people from all walks of life. While some changes are made in behavior and attitudes, the believers ought not make some kinds of changes. For example, they ought not change marriage partners. They need not even try to change jobs (unless the job was dishonoring to God). Instead, accept whatever situation the Lord has put you in, and continue on as you were when God first called you because God can use his faithful followers in all areas of life. This was not Paul's advice just to the church in Corinth but his rule for all the churches.

For example, the ceremony of circumcision was an important part of the Jews' relationship with God. For the Jews, circumcision was the sign of their covenant with God (Genesis 17:9-14); the Greeks, however, looked down upon it as the mark of lowly people. Some Jews, in an attempt to become more acceptable in Greek culture, could attempt to surgically reverse the marks of a circumcision. To add to the confusion, the Judaizers (a group of false teachers) were claiming that Gentiles had to be circumcised before they could become Christians. Paul pointed out that, in God's Kingdom, it makes no difference. Jewish Christians did not need to reverse their circumcisions, and Gentile Christians did not need to be circumcised (Romans 2:25, 29; Galatians 5:6). Instead, they should stay exactly as they were when they became believers; any outward change would make no difference. The inner change and desire to keep God's commandments is all that matters.

7:20-21 Paul repeated what he had said in 7:17 for emphasis and because he had said this was his rule for all the churches. The believers should continue on as they were when God called them. From religious variations in the church (between those circumcised and those uncircumcised), Paul moved on to the varied social states of the believers. The church in Corinth also included people from every station in life—many of them slaves. Therefore, if a believer was a slave when he became a Christian, he could continue as a Christian slave, doing his work as for the Lord (Ephesians 6:5-9). Of course, they also were free to seek freedom, but in the meantime, they should obey God in their position.

7:22-23 Slavery was common throughout the Roman Empire, so many of the believers in Corinth were slaves when the Lord called them. Paul said that although the Christian slaves remained enslaved to other human beings, they were free from the awful power of sin in their lives (Romans 6:18, 22). These slaves had been made free. In the same way, if a person was free when the Lord called him, he was now a slave of Christ. Because God paid a high price to bring his people to himself, he has complete authority over their lives.

7:24 This passage repeats Paul's statement of 7:17 and 7:20. God can use people from all areas of life, so whatever situation God found them in, they should stay there in their new relationship with God. They should serve God from that position, seeking to share the gospel with those who might not otherwise hear it.

7:25-26 Paul began addressing another matter about which the Corinthian church had asked. In their culture, a young woman's parents usually would make the decision about whether or not their daughter would marry. So these parents had written wondering what decisions to make regarding their unmarried daughters. Paul did not have a command from the Lord, but he would share some God-given wisdom.

Paul advised the young women to remain as they were, unmarried. He reasoned that it would be easier on them to be single than married during the present crisis. There has been discussion among scholars regarding the nature of this "crisis." Some have suggested that Paul expected the Lord's return and was referring to the certain calamities that would take place prior to the Second Coming. More likely, however, Paul foresaw the impending persecution that the Roman government would soon bring upon Christians. He gave this practical advice because being unmarried would mean less suffering and more freedom to throw one's life into the cause of Christ (7:29), even to the point of fearlessly dying for him. Paul's advice reveals his single-minded devotion to spreading the Good News. He wanted these unmarried believers to consider the times in which they were living and how well they could follow the will of God for them in their unmarried state as compared to being married.

7:27 Paul expanded his advice for everyone, both men and women, married and single. A married person should not end the marriage; an unmarried man should not get married. Paul's reasoning rested with what he had said in 7:26. It would be difficult to be a Christian in the Roman Empire in coming days. Paul was advising church members to stay focused on the Lord and on the business of sharing the gospel.

7:28 Lest he be misunderstood, Paul explained that he was not saying that it would be sinful for these young unmarried women to get married. That would be inconsistent with all of Scripture. Instead, Paul was trying to spare them the extra problems that come with marriage. Life holds plenty of difficulties—and in the first-century Roman world, one of those difficulties would be persecution of Christians. Paul wanted the believers in Corinth to be able to let go of everything in their faithfulness to God—that would be much easier without the attachment of marriage. Thus, he advised the unmarried to remain that way. If they chose to marry, however, that would not be a sin.

7:29-30 As Paul had challenged the unmarried to consider their situation in light of the call of God on their lives and their brief time on earth to accomplish it, so he challenged all the brothers and sisters to look at life and realize that the time that remains is very short. Paul probably did not have the Second Coming in mind here; rather, he probably was thinking of coming persecutions and the resulting curtailment of the believers' freedom to witness for their faith. Paul urged the believers not to regard marriage, home, or financial security as the ultimate goals of life. As much as possible, they should live unhindered by the cares of this world that might keep them from doing God's work. Married men and women, as Paul pointed out (7:33-34), must take care of earthly responsibilities—but they should make every effort to keep them modest and manageable. Paul's focus, as always, was that believers make the most of their time before Christ's return.

7:31 Believers must live detached from this world. Those who have been blessed with the things of the world should make good use of them without becoming attached to them. Material blessings can be used to further God's Kingdom. Believers who have been blessed with material wealth must always remember that they have been blessed in order to bless others. Paul did not want the believers to be “attached” to anything in this life as if that were all there is—to do so would be to forget that this world and all it contains will pass away (see also 1 John 2:8, 17).

7:32-34 Marriage is a tremendous responsibility for each of the spouses involved. For a marriage to be successful, husband and wife must work at their relationship—they will both have to be concerned about earthly responsibilities and about how to please each other. This is good and important for those who are married. Paul was simply pointing out that unmarried people can focus their energies elsewhere.

7:35 Paul gave the advice in the previous verses for their benefit, but not to place restrictions upon the believers. These were not regulations that the churches had to follow. Instead, this advice came from Paul’s heart, to help the struggling believers in Corinth to serve the Lord best. This would be helpful as they lived their Christianity in the midst of the gross immorality of Corinth and as they anticipated persecution for their faith.

7:36-37 A young man should marry if he thinks he ought to. But if he has decided firmly not to marry, he should let the young woman go. That there is no urgency means that he does not have outside pressure such as from parents or through a prior agreement. Such a man can thus make his own decision.

7:38 When Paul wrote that the person who doesn’t marry does even better, he was referring to the potential time available for service to God. The single person does not have the responsibility of caring for a spouse and raising a family. Singleness, however, does not ensure service to God—involvement in service depends on the commitment of the individual.

7:39 The Bible teaches that marriage is a lifelong contract between a man and a woman. The relationship was not to be dissolved for any reason. If the woman’s husband were to die, however, the marriage contract would be void, and she is free to marry whomever she wishes, providing that this person were a Christian so that the marriage would be acceptable to the Lord. This also applied to men whose wives had died.

There may have been some teaching in either Jewish or Greek society stating that a widowed woman could not remarry because she was bound forever to her husband, even if he had died. Paul stated clearly that this was not to be the case. But the widow or widower should still be very careful about whom he or she chooses to marry.

7:40 While the widow can remarry (7:39), that doesn't necessarily mean that she should. In fact, Paul's opinion was that it will be better for her if she doesn't marry again for the same reasons he said that the unmarried people might think about remaining single (7:25, 28, 32-34).

When Paul stated, I think I am giving you counsel from God's Spirit, there was nothing tentative in his meaning. At times he gave these believers commands from the Lord because he could bring words directly from Jesus or from the Old Testament; at other times, he gave them his "advice" or "counsel," but this still carried the weight of divine inspiration. Paul's advice came from the Holy Spirit, who gave him the words he needed to answer the Corinthian church's questions.

1 CORINTHIANS 8

FOOD SACRIFICED TO IDOLS / 8:1-13

The discussion regarding whether the Corinthian believers should eat food that had been sacrificed to idols begins here and continues through 11:1. Most likely, this first section deals with meals served in the pagan temples, and the discussion in 10:23–11:1 deals with food purchased in the marketplace and served in private homes. The Corinthians had written to Paul with questions regarding these issues, but their exact questions are unknown. The believers concluded that their knowledge of God and the fact that the idols had no power allowed them to continue to eat meals in the temple. Paul dealt with that issue in this first section.

8:1 The Corinthian believers had sent another question to Paul (see 7:1)—this one regarding food sacrificed to idols. Their question pertains to the idolatry with its sacrifices that permeated the Greek and Roman cultures of the day. (Paul also dealt with this issue in his letter to the Roman believers—see Romans 14). One might think that believers should obviously not have contact with idolatry in any form. Paul had prohibited such contact in 5:9-11, and the Jerusalem council had forbidden the Christians to eat meat offered to idols (Acts 15:29). For believers in Corinth, however, staying clear of any contact with idolatry was nearly impossible for two main reasons. First, people often ate meals in temples or in places associated with idols. This was accepted social practice for public or private gatherings. To cut oneself off from such gatherings would be like not attending weddings or other social celebrations today. So this caused much concern for the believers. At such gatherings, a sacrifice was made to the idol. When such meat was sacrificed, the priest would divide it into three portions: One would be burned up, one would be given to the priest, and one would be given to the offerer. If the priest did not use his portion, it would be sent to the marketplace. This caused the second concern for the believers. The meat, after being sacrificed to an idol and sold in the market, would then be bought and served in private homes. So the Corinthian believers wondered if the meat had been contaminated by its having been offered on a pagan altar, and, if by eating it, they would be participating in idol worship. Paul answered both of these concerns; most likely, the advice in 8:1-13 deals with temple-sponsored meals, while 10:23–11:1 deals with meat sold in the marketplace.

The words you think that everyone should agree with your perfect knowledge may refer to the wording in the Corinthians' letter to Paul. This knowledge probably refers to knowledge that there is one true God and knowledge that idols are worthless and have no power. The conclusion, then, is that believers can eat anything because God created it, so a ceremony in front of a worthless idol could do nothing to contaminate it. Since they didn't believe in idols, and God doesn't regard idols, Corinthian believers could eat with their friends without problems. Some believers understood this fact. Others, however, felt very strongly that to eat such meat would be wrong; their consciences bothered them. This must have become a divisive issue, because the question had come to Paul.

Paul took the opportunity to tell them that love builds up the church. Those who might be taking pride in their knowledge of Christ would only be “puffed up” and could end up dividing the church. In this situation, acting on knowledge alone—even accurate knowledge—without love for other believers, would harm the church.

8:2-3 Knowledge without love leads to a pride that will eventually fall under its own weight. Love without knowledge, however, can lead to sentimentalism, wherein people love everyone without regard for truth. The following verses explain that true knowledge of God leads Christians to willingly support and help weaker believers so as not to cause them to stumble—in this context by not eating food sacrificed to idols. But the principle can apply to any situation in the modern world where some believers experience freedom in certain areas where others do not.

8:4 Paul returned to the question at hand, Should we eat meat that has been sacrificed to idols? The believers in Corinth had come to believe that there is only one God and no other out of a culture that embraced many gods. The idols had no substance, authority, power, or ability to curse or bless.

8:5-6 Paul acknowledged that many people believed the so-called gods to be real. Idolatry takes away from God the worship he is due. There is one God and there is one Lord, Jesus Christ, who made everything. God is creator. He is not himself part of the cosmos but is the source of everything created. Christ is the “Lord,” a name that the Old Testament uses only in reference to God. Through Jesus Christ, God created and redeemed the world.

8:7 Basic Christian theology focuses on the fact that there is one God, who created everything, and that idols are nothing. But not all Christians realize this. They believe in the all-powerful God of the Christian faith but are not thoroughly convinced that the other gods do not exist at all. In their hearts and consciences, they have difficulty because they are accustomed to thinking of idols as being real. Therefore, when they eat meat that had been sacrificed as part of a religious ceremony, they cannot separate the meat from the ceremony. They had weak consciences. A “weak” conscience regards as wrong an act that is not wrong, or is still unclear about whether it is wrong or not. The possibility exists for new converts to fall back into old obsessions by seeing other believers exercise their freedom. Old patterns may link the activity (such as playing cards) with an old obsession (such as gambling). The Corinthians’ weak consciences could not discriminate between right and wrong regarding food offered to idols, so when they ate such meat, they violated their consciences and so believed that they were sinning against God.

8:8-9 Food is neutral—neither good nor evil, regardless of whether or not it has been sacrificed in a pagan temple to an idol. There would be nothing inherently wrong with eating such meat because food has nothing to do with one’s relationship with God. Paul said that the strong believers should not push the weak but, instead, be willing to love them. These “strong” believers (as opposed to those whom Paul described as “weak”) knew Scripture and stood strong on God’s commands and prohibitions but were free from minor, legalistic constraints. Yet, they must be careful with their freedom so that it would not cause a brother or sister with a weaker conscience to stumble. Since it really doesn’t matter what kind of food believers eat, the strong believers should live on the side of love for the sake of the weaker believers.

A “stumbling block” refers to something that might cause someone to trip or fall into sin. The strong but insensitive Christian may flaunt his or her freedom, be a harmful example, and thus offend the consciences of others. The overscrupulous but weak Christian may try to fence others in with petty rules and regulations, thus causing dissension. Paul wanted his readers to be both strong in the faith and sensitive to others’ needs. Because all believers are strong in certain areas and weak in others, they constantly need to monitor the effects of their behavior on others.

8:10 Paul offered an example of what might happen. The weak Christians (those with “weak consciences” as explained in 8:7) think that it is wrong to eat food that has been sacrificed to an idol. Strong Christians know there’s nothing wrong with eating such food, so they go to the temple of an idol and eat there. As noted in 8:1, this would not have been an uncommon occurrence, for most social and cultural events happened in the temples. When weak believers see their fellow Christians eating in the idol temple, the weak believers would be encouraged to violate their conscience by doing the same. If a weak believer does something that he or she is not sure is right or wrong, that action will bring condemnation (see also Romans 14:23).

If one believer has no scruples about where meat comes from or how it is prepared but flaunts his or her belief in order to cause one who is concerned to be distressed, then that stronger individual is not acting in love. The conduct of stronger believers is not to be decided by what they feel is their better insight into the Scriptures or what they feel would “strengthen” those weaker ones. Rather, it is to be decided by love and sensitivity. Paul was pointing out how the strong believers ought to use their freedom in public—the situation he described here was very public. If these strong believers ate meat that had been offered to idols in the privacy of their homes because they knew such meat was not tainted in any way, they could do so with liberty and without concern for the scruples of the weaker believers. Strong Christians ought to, at times, restrain their freedom for the sake of the weak, but they need not come into bondage to the consciences of weak believers.

8:11 The stronger believer must not let what he or she wants to do (when it is a minor matter such as whether to eat meat or not) become a stumbling block that could destroy a weaker brother or sister. The strong believers know they are free from concern about meat offered to idols, but that superior knowledge must not cause them to harm other believers. The Greek verb translated destroyed means “to bring about destruction.” It could also mean a “ruin” of one’s conscience if the weaker believer goes against his or her scruples. To ruin a person’s conscience would be total destruction. Therefore, strong Christians are to act in love. That other person, no matter how much the strong believer disagrees with him or her, is still someone for whom Christ died. If Christ willingly gave up his life, Christians ought to be willing to give up their freedoms occasionally so as not to harm another.

Mature Christians shouldn’t flaunt their freedom. They should be sensitive to younger converts whose faith can be destroyed by such freedom. For example, a young Christian addicted to gambling may be damaged by the strong Christian’s freedom to play cards. Some activities may be all right in and of themselves but not around weaker new converts. Weak believers ought not do anything against their consciences, but they must grow in the faith and, at the same time, not pass judgment on their stronger brothers and sisters.

8:12 Throughout this passage, Paul has been addressing stronger believers. So when he wrote and you, he was referring to these people. If they were insensitive to their weaker brothers and sisters by encouraging them to do something they believe is wrong, then they would be sinning both against Christ and against other Christians. Because all believers are temples of the Holy Spirit (6:19), no one believer has the right to sin against any other believer—to do so would be to sin against Christ himself.

8:13 Paul willingly followed his own advice, stating that if what he ate would make another Christian sin, he would never eat meat again. Strong believers can restrict their freedoms for the sake of others. In areas of disagreement, Paul counseled the believers to keep their beliefs between themselves and God. The brother or sister who believes in certain freedoms should not be trying to influence others with scruples to “loosen up.” Those bothered by some actions should not be judging or condemning those with freedom, nor should they be trying to force their scruples on the entire church. Instead, all believers should seek to have a clear conscience before God.

1 CORINTHIANS 9

PAUL GIVES UP HIS RIGHTS / 9:1-27

At the end of chapter 8, Paul said that he would gladly give up his right to eat meat if that would help a weaker believer not to stumble. What follows in this chapter is Paul's defense of his apostleship and of his freedom to exercise, or not to exercise, his rights as a believer who is free in Christ.

9:1-2 In defending his apostleship, Paul reestablished his authority for some in Corinth who doubted that they should listen to him (9:3). So Paul presented his credentials as an apostle. In Greek, these four questions are rhetorical—they expect a “yes” answer. Only a small group of believers were “apostles.” In order to have the authority of an apostle, the person had to show the following three evidences: (1) A commission directly from Jesus Christ in the sight of witnesses, or confirmed by others. To qualify as a true “apostle,” a person had to have personally seen the Lord Jesus after his resurrection. For Paul, this occurred in Acts 9:3-18 (see also 1 Corinthians 15:8). (2) Ability to perform signs, wonders, and mighty acts to confirm their message (Acts 13:9-12; 2 Corinthians 12:12). (3) Evidence of a successful ministry (Acts 18:1-17). Such credentials make the advice he gives in this letter more persuasive. Second Corinthians 10–13 defends Paul's apostleship in greater detail.

9:3-4 Earlier in this letter, Paul rebuked the Corinthians for their factions and their overly zealous loyalty to different preachers (3:1-22). Those who were not loyal to Paul apparently had been questioning his authority. It seems that they questioned Paul because he was not taking advantage of the rights accorded to apostles. Evidently in the Greco-Roman world of Paul's day, it was quite an issue how missionaries, traveling teachers, or philosophers were supported. They could charge fees, beg, work, or accept gifts by patrons. In Philippi, Paul accepted Lydia's support (Acts 16:15), but since then had abandoned that practice. Because other church leaders continued to accept patronage, the issue arose: Maybe Paul did not get support because his status as an apostle was in question. Paul was asserting his right to get support (which he had voluntarily laid aside so as not to bring the gospel under suspicion).

9:5 That the apostles had the right to bring a Christian wife along means that their wives could travel along with them, supported financially by the churches. Others in the church who were considered to be apostles had wives who had come to believe in Jesus. The Lord's brothers (referring to Jesus' physical half brothers) had not believed in Jesus at first (John 7:3-5), but after the Resurrection, they believed and attained leadership status in the church at Jerusalem (Acts 1:14). James (one of the "Lord's brothers"), for example, led the way to an agreement at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15) and wrote the book of James. Peter was a prominent apostle in the early church; his wife is not mentioned elsewhere, but the Gospels record a time when Jesus healed Peter's mother-in-law (Matthew 8:14-15; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38).

9:6-7 Barnabas had traveled with Paul during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:1–14:28). Barnabas was also considered to be an apostle (Acts 14:3-4, 14). This may mean that Paul and Barnabas were the only apostles who made it a habit to work and earn their living as they traveled to spread the gospel (4:12; Acts 18:2-3). Because these two men had refrained from taking money from the churches, some were saying that they were not apostles (see 9:3-4). They questioned whether Paul had the same authority as other apostles because they looked down on him for working with his hands. Paul asserted that he and Barnabas had the authority of apostles, even though they did not take advantage of the rights they deserved.

9:8-10 Paul's argument held the authority of Scripture. The law of Moses states, in Deuteronomy 25:4, "Do not keep an ox from eating as it treads out the grain." In ancient times, grain was often "threshed" by placing sheaves on a hard surface and then allowing oxen to drag something heavy back and forth across it. The law said that the oxen should be allowed to eat some of the grain while they worked. This law was not made to protect oxen but to illustrate a point. God's people were to care for their animals by allowing oxen to eat while they worked, but this applied to people as well. Just as farm workers who plow fields and thresh the grain expect a share of the harvest, Christian workers should be paid by those they serve.

9:11-12 Those who had planted good spiritual seed in Corinth would not have been expecting too much in wanting support from the Corinthian believers. Then, added Paul, since they were supporting others, then most certainly those who originally had brought the gospel message have an even greater right to be supported. Paul and others had not demanded support, however; they had worked to earn their own living and not be a burden to the church. Paul was not required to work this way, but he chose to put up with anything rather than put an obstacle in the way of the Good News about Christ. He put up with the hardships of “working two jobs” so that no pagan inquiring about Christianity would be put off by the financial obligation of supporting a missionary.

9:13 Paul gave two more examples of his right to receive support. It was everywhere understood that those who had sacred jobs (such as serving in the Temple or at the altar) were “working” and therefore derived their livelihood from the job. They did not have to go elsewhere. As part of their pay, priests in the Temple would receive a portion of the offerings as their food (see Numbers 18:8-24). This was true in the pagan temples, as well.

9:14 Paul’s explanation that God’s ministers should be supported by the churches came as an order from the Lord. The churches were required to honor those who preach the Good News, and those who served among the believers should be supported by those who benefit from their ministry. This command from God allowed traveling missionaries and local ministers to focus entirely on the spread of the gospel and the growth of the church, and not be concerned about making money.

9:15 The churches were commanded to support God’s ministers, and the ministers had a right to expect such support, but Paul had never used any of these rights in Corinth because he felt that doing so would hinder the spread of the gospel in that city. Paul did accept gifts from some churches, such as the Philippian church (see Philippians 4:14-19). He must have felt, however, that to take any money in Corinth would have caused some to think he was after money instead of souls! So Paul willingly set aside his rights as an apostle. Paul hastened to add that he was not writing all this in the hopes that now the Corinthians would begin to give him support. Instead, he wanted them to know that he would continue to preach without expecting support.

9:16 Paul may have “boasted” in his desire to serve the Corinthian believers freely, but he could not boast about that service. Paul was compelled to preach. This compulsion did not mean that Paul did not enjoy this duty (see Romans 1:5; 11:13; 15:15-16; Galatians 1:15-16); instead, it means that, like a slave serving a beloved master, Paul served his Lord by faithfully doing the duties God had given him (see Acts 9:15-16).

9:17 Paul perceived his call by God as a sacred trust; therefore, he felt that he could freely serve God as an apostle without expecting payment. Far from not deserving to be paid, as his detractors were saying, Paul did not feel that he deserved payment for an honored duty that he had been commanded to do. In this matter, he felt that he had no choice but to serve these believers without financial support.

9:18 Paul did receive pay in the form of satisfaction from preaching the Good News without expense to anyone. His pay came in being able to show the genuineness of his love and concern for these Corinthian believers.

9:19 Paul's goals were to glorify God and to bring people to Christ. Thus he stayed free of any philosophical position or material entanglement that might sidetrack him while he strictly disciplined himself to carry out his goals. For Paul, both freedom and discipline were important tools to be used in God's service.

9:20 Paul never compromised the doctrines of Scripture, never changed God's word in order to make it more palatable to people in any given place. He never went against God's law or his own conscience. In matters that did not violate any principle of God's word, however, Paul was willing to become one of his audience in order to bring them to Christ. Three groups are mentioned in these verses: Jews, Gentiles, and those with weak consciences.

When speaking to the Jews, Paul conformed his life to the practices of those who follow the Jewish laws, even though he himself was no longer subject to the law (because of his freedom in Christ; see Acts 16:3; 18:18; 21:20-26). If, however, Paul had gone into a Jewish synagogue to preach, all the while flouting the Jewish laws and showing no respect for their laws and customs because of his "freedom in Christ," he would have offended the very people he had come to tell about Jesus Christ. But by adapting himself to them, by conforming to their regulations and restrictions (Paul had been a Pharisee), he had gained an audience so that he might bring them to Christ. Again, Paul was careful never to violate any of God's commands in his attempts to serve his listeners. He never conceded that those regulations had to be kept in order for people to become believers, but he conformed to the laws to help the Jews come to Christ. The line was a difficult one to walk, for the book of Galatians records a time when Paul rebuked Peter for acting like a Jew among the Gentiles (see Galatians 2:11-21).

9:21 As Paul conformed himself to the Jews, he also conformed to Gentiles, who do not have the Jewish law. Paul met them on their own turf, fitting in as much as he could. This did not mean that Paul had thrown aside all restraints and was living like a pagan in hopes of winning the pagans to Christ! As he explained, he did not discard the law of God. Paul lived according to God's law and his conscience, but he did not put undue constraints on his Gentile audiences. Unlike some false teachers of the day, called Judaizers, Paul did not require the Gentiles to follow the Jewish laws in order to become believers (see Acts 15:1-21). Instead, he spoke a message that would gain their confidence and bring them to Christ (see, for example, Acts 17:1-34).

9:22-23 The oppressed refers to those with a weak conscience, a subject Paul had discussed in chapter 8. In that chapter, Paul had explained that believers who were free in Christ ought to set aside certain freedoms in the presence of another believer with a more sensitive conscience. Paul followed his own advice, saying that he shared their oppression (meaning that he had set aside his freedoms and had lived by their restraints for a time) so that he might bring them to Christ. The “weak” were already believers, but they needed to grow into a deeper knowledge of Christ and a deeper understanding of their freedom in Christ. Paul did this delicately, becoming as they were in order to gain their listening ears. He chose to find common ground with everyone (the Jews, the Gentiles, and those with weak consciences, 9:20-22) in order that some might be saved. Paul never compromised the gospel truth, God's law, or his own conscience; in other matters, however, Paul was willing to go to great lengths to meet people where they were. He had one focus: to spread the Good News. Paul's life focused on taking the gospel to an unbelieving world.

9:24-25 Paul's exhortations in the previous verses—for the believers to give up their own rights, to think of others first, to be wholehearted in their focus on bringing others to Christ—called upon the Christians to deny themselves as they looked forward to future reward. Paul compared this to a race, picturing the ancient “games.” The Olympics were already operating in Paul's time. Second in popularity only to the Olympic games, the Isthmian games were celebrated every two years at Corinth. Athletes would come from all over Greece, and the winners of the games were accorded the highest honor. To get into the games, and especially to emerge as victors, required that athletes practice strict self-control. Typically, for ten months prior to the games, the athletes-in-training denied themselves many ordinary pleasures. Each put forth his greatest effort during the contest, setting aside all else in order to win the prize.

When Paul told the believers to be like those athletes, he did not mean that the believers were all running against each other with only one actually winning. Instead, he wanted every believer to run in such a way that you will win. In other words, every believer should be putting out the kind of effort for the reward of God's Kingdom that an athlete puts out to merely win a wreath. Believers, therefore, ought to willingly practice self-control with a focus on bringing others to Christ because they are running toward an eternal prize. They have all already "won"; the prize is not dependent on how they run the race. Because they already are assured of the prize, they should live for God with as much focus and enthusiasm as did the ancient runners at the games.

9:26-27 Paul not only preached the gospel message and encouraged the believers to self-discipline and self-denial, he also practiced what he preached. He also had to live by the gospel, and he also practiced self-denial like the athletes just described. Paul did not run the race aimlessly, nor was he like a boxer who misses his punches. Instead, he kept his eyes focused on the goal, running straight for it, with purpose in every step. He did not allow himself to be sidetracked and he did not waste time becoming lazy. He kept on, disciplining and training his body. Paul pictured life as a battle. Believers must not become lazy—for Satan seeks to cause them to stumble, sin continues to buffet, and sorrow and pain are a daily reality (see Romans 7:14-25). Instead of being bound by their bodies, believers must diligently discipline themselves in their Christian lives in order to stay "in shape."

When Paul said he might be disqualified, he did not mean that he feared losing his salvation, only that he would be disqualified from receiving rewards from Christ. This passage describes the spiritual maturation process, the period of growth during believers' lives on earth when they are living "in" the world while not being "of" it. The time between a person's acceptance of Christ as Savior and his or her death is the only time when growth in Christ can occur. Paul wanted to grow diligently and receive a reward from Christ at his return. Paul did not want to be like the person who builds his or her life with shoddy materials, only to be saved "like someone escaping through a wall of flames" (3:15).

WARNINGS AGAINST IDOLATRY / 10:1–11:1

This chapter continues Paul's argument concerning the lifestyle of the believers and the need for self-discipline, as recorded in chapters 8 and 9. Some of the Corinthian believers thought that because they had professed faith, went to church, and joined in the Lord's Supper, they could then live as they pleased. But this was a false belief, as Paul would show through the example he used from Israel's history.

10:1 A perfect Old Testament example of believing the false notion that one can be saved and then live a faithless, Godless life can be seen in what happened to the Jews' ancestors in the wilderness long ago. The book of Exodus contains the record of their miraculous escape from slavery in Egypt by the intervention of God (see Exodus 1–12). God gave them a leader (Moses), set them free (through great miracles), and then guided all of them as they moved out of Egypt and headed toward the land God wanted to give them (the Promised Land). God's presence was with them in the form of a cloud by day and fire by night (Exodus 13:21-22). When they came to the Red Sea, God brought them all safely through the waters of the sea on dry ground (Exodus 14).

The emphasis in 10:1-4 is on the word all, which Paul used four or five times. Paul was making the point that all of the Israelites experienced the miracles of God's protection and guidance. Yet, later, so many turned away. Many thought that their place among God's people assured them the Promised Land. Assuming themselves secure, they refused the life of self-discipline, self-denial, and obedience to God. Because of that, many were "disqualified" from entering the Promised Land.

10:2 The Israelites were baptized in that they shared the blessing and gracious deliverance of God. By their experience of passing through the Red Sea, they were united as followers of Moses. The cloud represented God's presence and glory among them (Exodus 14:19-22), indicating his leadership and protection. The sea represented God's salvation of his people through the Red Sea as they crossed safely to escape the Egyptians. All of the Israelites experienced this "baptism." However, the common experience of this baptism did not keep most of them faithful to God in the days that followed.

10:3-4 Further miracles sustained the Israelites as they journeyed through the wilderness. God provided miraculous food in the form of “manna” that came from heaven (Exodus 16:4, 14-31). Miraculous water was obtained from a rock—a provision directly from God. Moses got water from a rock both at the beginning and at the end of Israel’s journey (Exodus 17:1-7; Numbers 20:2-13). This had given rise to a rabbinic interpretation of Numbers 21:16-18 that a well, known as Miriam’s Well and shaped like a rock, had traveled with them, providing water wherever they went. Paul referred to Christ as that rock who had actually accompanied and sustained the people, meeting their needs during their travels. The Old Testament often refers to God as a “rock” (see, for example, Genesis 49:24; Deuteronomy 32:4; 2 Samuel 22:32). Paul’s reference to Christ as the spiritual “rock” would have connected Christ with Yahweh of the Exodus, thereby indicating the deity of Christ.

10:5 God had performed great miracles for his people, but most of them rebelled against God. The word “most” is actually an understatement; of the thousands who stood at the very edge of the Promised Land, only two men (Joshua and Caleb) had faith enough in God to enter (Numbers 14:5-12, 30). Because of their lack of faith, God caused the people to turn back from the land and wander for forty years in the wilderness. God destroyed them in the wilderness by causing them to wander until they died. This was God’s punishment on them for their disobedience and rebellion.

10:6-7 Far from being irrelevant to New Testament Christians, the stories of people in the Old Testament provide a warning from which the believers can learn not to crave evil things as they did. Clearly, the Israelites’ status as God’s people and recipients of his love and provision did not mean that all of them loved and served God in return. Instead, many actually desired evil and turned away from God. The incident of pagan revelry occurred when the Israelites made a golden calf and worshiped it in the wilderness (Paul quoted Exodus 32:6). If those people who had witnessed the miracles of the escape from Egypt could so easily be tempted to turn to idolatry, then the Christians in Corinth, who were surrounded by idols, should also be on their guard.

10:8 This incident, when 23,000 Israelites died in one day is recorded in Numbers 25:1-9. The Israelites worshiped a god of Canaan, Baal of Peor, and engaged in sexual immorality with Moabite women. Because of their sin, God punished them harshly. For the believers in Corinth, the comparison would have been inescapable. Much of the idol worship there focused on ritual prostitution and sexual immorality of all kinds. God would not go lightly on those who claimed to be his but still engaged in idol worship or sexual immorality.

10:9 Paul had already affirmed that Christ, as the spiritual Rock, accompanied them in their wilderness journeys (10:4), so the Israelites' sins were indeed against Christ. This verse recalls Israel's complaining about having been brought out into the wilderness (Numbers 21:5). They were testing the Lord's patience to see what he would do, and he punished them by sending poisonous snakes among them. Many died from snakebites. Those who claim to be God's people will not test the Lord to see how much they can get away with. True believers will seek to stay near to God in order to constantly live in obedience to him (see also Hebrews 3–4).

10:10 This incident of grumbling occurred when the people complained against the leadership of Moses and Aaron—an event that actually happened several times. The phrase, God sent his angel of death to destroy them, could refer to when the Israelites grumbled at Kadesh, refusing to enter the Promised Land. God punished them with a plague (Numbers 14:2, 36-37). This could also refer to the incident recorded in Numbers 16 when a group rebelled against Moses, and God sent a plague that killed the rebels. Grumbling against God or against his leaders results in divine punishment. God does not take this sin lightly either. This was another problem that the Corinthian church was facing (3:1-9).

10:11 When the Israelites disobeyed, they received punishment. Likewise, when people who claim to be Christians sin with no repentance, no desire to change, and no concern for God's laws, they too will receive punishment.

10:12 Paul warned the Corinthian Christians that if they began to take it for granted, if they thought they were standing strong, that was the time to be most careful not to fall. The Corinthians were very sure of themselves, almost prideful. Paul said that if the Israelites fell into idolatry, so could some in the Corinthian church. No human being is ever beyond temptation. Paul warned the believers not to let down their guard.

10:13 Temptations come into every believer's life—no one is exempt. Temptation is not sinful; the sin comes when the person gives in to temptation. Believers must not be shocked or discouraged, or think that they are alone in their shortcomings. Instead, they should realize their weaknesses and turn to God to resist the temptation. Enduring temptation brings great rewards (James 1:12). But God does not leave his people to Satan's whims. Instead, God is faithful.

He will not always remove the temptation, because facing it and remaining strong can be a growing experience; however, God does promise to keep the temptation from becoming so strong that you can't stand up against it. The secret to resisting temptation is to recognize the source of the temptation and then to recognize the source of strength in temptation.

Not only that, but God also promises to show you a way out so that you will not give in to the temptation and fall into sin. It will take self-discipline to look for that “way out” even in the middle of the temptation and then to take it when it is found. The way out is seldom easy and often requires support from others. One of the God-given ways of escape from temptation is common sense. If a believer knows that he will be tempted in certain situations, then he should stay away from them. Another way out of temptation is through Christian friends. Instead of trying to deal with temptation alone, a believer can explain her dilemma to a close Christian friend and ask for support. This friend can pray, hold the person accountable, and give valuable insights and advice.

The truth is that God loves his people so much that he will protect them from unbearable temptation. And he will always give a way out. Temptation need never drive a wedge between believers and God. Instead, a believer ought to be able to say, “Thank you, God, for trusting me that much. You know I can handle this temptation. Now what do you want me to do?”

10:14-15 The Corinthian believers needed to be aware that any dabbling at the edges of their former lives of idol worship might lead them back into sin. How much wiser, instead, to flee from the worship of idols. The Corinthian believers needed to be wise enough to know that, because of past association, they should run from some temptations. It might not be wise for believers to go to feasts where meat had been offered to idols, because it could draw them back into former sins. Even if one person were strong against such temptation, he or she might be a stumbling block for a weak person—actually becoming a temptation for someone who might not be as strong against the temptation to return to idolatry (see 8:9). Because they were reasonable people, Paul trusted that they could decide if what he had to say were true.

10:16-17 Christians participate in Christ's once-for-all sacrifice when they share the cup (symbolizing Christ's blood) and eat the bread (symbolizing his body) at the Lord's Supper. Sharing in this meal signified sharing in its benefits. Since the early days of the church, believers have celebrated this special meal. Taking part in sharing the one loaf with other believers symbolized their unity in one body with Christ.

10:18 In Old Testament days, when Jews offered a sacrifice, they ate a part of that sacrifice as a way of restoring their unity with God, against whom they had sinned (Deuteronomy 12:17-18; 14:22-27). By offering the sacrifices and then eating a portion of the gift that had been offered, they were united; that is, they were fellowshiping with God, to whom they had brought their gifts.

10:19-20 Paul's advice here seems to focus on believers taking part in actual religious celebrations (not mere social functions) at an idol's temple. Because both Christian communion and the Jewish system of sacrifice provided a mystical relationship between God and the participants, then, by extension, to take part in a pagan sacrificial feast would provide a similar mystical union—not with idols (for they are nothing but wood and stone), but with the demons that the idols represent. Therefore, taking part in such a religious ceremony was not a neutral activity; it amounted to them becoming partners with demons.

10:21-22 Eating at the Lord's Table means communing with Christ and identifying with his death (10:16-17). Eating at the table of demons means identifying with Satan by worshiping or promoting pagan (or evil) activities (10:19-20). Obviously, Christians cannot do both. To do so is to rouse the Lord's jealousy. When ancient Israel turned to idols, God punished them severely (10:7-8). Because believers are not stronger than God, they should not think that they can withstand the Lord's anger for their sin of idolatry (see Deuteronomy 32:21).

10:23-24 The issue of eating meat offered to idols led Paul to three conclusions in the matter that can be applied to the broad spectrum of Christian liberties:

- While eating such meat is essentially unimportant to one's faith, and while it is allowed (not against God's law, see also 6:12), it may not necessarily be helpful to the believer. The Christian has the freedom to eat such meat because he or she knows it doesn't matter (8:6-8). Just because something is not against the law, however, doesn't mean that it is helpful.
- While believers are free to practice their freedom in Christ in matters that are allowed, some practices of freedom do not necessarily work to build up individual believers, others, or the church.
- Therefore, Christians are to use their freedoms, not for their own good, but to think of other Christians and what is best for them. As Paul had concluded at the end of chapter 8, all Christians, free in Christ, should humbly set aside their freedoms in order to win more people for the Kingdom. Nothing should ever impede a believer's witness for Christ. It is always more important to avoid unhelpful actions than to assert freedoms.

10:25-26 Regarding the specific example of meat offered to idols, Paul offered this advice. First of all, the believers should feel free to eat any meat that is sold in the marketplace. As noted in the commentary on 8:1, meat that arrived for sale in the marketplace may have been left over from a sacrifice at a pagan altar. But it was impossible to know if such meat had been part of a sacrifice. Paul told the believers simply not to ask because it didn't matter. Whatever happened to the meat in a pagan temple, the believers knew that all food was created by God and is a gift from God—the earth is the Lord's, and everything in it (quoted from Psalm 24:1). And if they didn't ask, then they wouldn't know whether it was offered to idols. Then they wouldn't have to worry about their consciences.

10:27 In the same way as suggested in 10:26, if the believers were invited to the home of an unbeliever for dinner, they could go. In the homes of unbelievers, the Christians might well be served meat that had been offered to idols. Paul's advice, as with buying meat in the market (10:25-26) is to eat whatever is offered and don't ask any questions. It would probably have been a breach of hospitality to ask about the food and then to refuse to eat it. How much better to just enjoy the host's hospitality and be a witness to his family than to raise questions of conscience and so lose that opportunity.

10:28-31 But the situation could arise that several believers are eating a meal at the home of an unbeliever. One of these believers (the someone referred to here, who was a "weaker" believer, see 8:10) warns his fellow believers that the meat they had been served had been offered to an idol. At that point, then, the stronger believers, although they know that this really makes no difference, should refrain from eating the meat out of consideration for the conscience of that weaker believer because of the clear association with temple worship. (This weaker believer feels that in eating that meat, the Christians would be sanctioning idol worship.) This is the same advice Paul gave in chapter 8.

Paul's question, "Why should my freedom be limited by what someone else thinks?" is in the context of his discussion regarding strong believers acquiescing to weaker believers in matters of conscience. The only real way to hold on to that freedom, because it is freedom, is to use or not use it freely, depending on the situation. Strong believers must not allow their freedom to be limited or condemned by weaker believers, so they should not use their freedom when that could happen. Simply because these strong believers can thank God for the food and enjoy it, no matter where it came from, they should not allow themselves to be condemned for using that freedom. It is better, said Paul, to set aside one's freedom in those situations. The bottom line is that all that believers do should be done for the glory of God. If these strong believers had to set aside their liberties in order to win others to Christ, they should do so because this would bring glory to God.

10:32-33 Paul wanted these believers to understand that the liberty God gave them was not to be used to give offense; rather, as Paul described in 8:13, his entire life focused on winning others to Christ. If need be, he would never eat any meat again if it would keep others from stumbling. In things that did not really matter, Paul tried to please everyone. Always, Paul's focus was to do what was best for others so they may be saved. Nothing, not even liberty in Christ, should cause believers to lose sight of their desire to win others to Christ.

11:1 This verse belongs at the conclusion of chapter 10, not at the beginning of chapter eleven, where it has been traditionally placed. Paul had just told the Corinthians that his goal was to seek the best for others, not himself. In this regard, Paul called upon them to follow his example. As in 4:15-16, Paul's words were not prideful. He had just spent three chapters explaining how the Corinthian believers needed to deal with the issue of eating meat that had been offered to idols. His conclusion of the matter balanced freedom in Christ with responsibility to love the "weaker" believers. All Christians should be so focused on bringing others to Christ that nothing stands in the way of that goal. Paul followed his own advice (see 8:13; 10:33) and encouraged the believers to follow his example. The reason they could do so? Because he followed Christ's example.

Christians owe much to others who have taught them and have modeled for them what they need to know about the gospel and Christian living. They should continue following the good examples of those who have invested themselves in them by investing their own lives through evangelism, service, and Christian education. They, in turn, become models worth imitating.

PROPER WORSHIP / 11:2-16

This section focuses primarily on proper attitudes and conduct in worship, not on the marriage relationship or on the role of women in the church. While Paul's specific instructions may be cultural (women covering their heads in worship), the principles behind his specific instructions are timeless—for they instruct believers to show respect for their spouse and to have reverent behavior in worship. If a believer's actions offend members and could divide the church, then the believer should change his or her ways to promote church unity. Paul told the women who were not wearing head coverings to wear them, not because it was a scriptural command, but because it kept the congregation from dividing over a petty issue that took people's focus off Christ.

11:2 Apparently, in their letter to Paul, the Corinthian believers had told him that they were following the Christian teaching that Paul had passed on to them. This teaching was what Paul had received from the other apostles of Christ or even from Christ himself through special revelation. It was truth, not anything Paul had thought up on his own (which the false teachers did); so the believers could trust and follow it.

11:3 Paul had been answering specific questions; apparently a question had arisen about head coverings in worship—see 11:10. The Corinthians may have adopted cultural patterns of male-female relationships into their worship that (as some scholars argue) had blurred the distinction between males and females. It may have been customs of dress regarding hair coverings, or perhaps it involved issues of hairstyle (short or long hair for men and women). Paul began to answer the Corinthians' question by first giving the general principle of how relationships in the church had been instituted by God: A man is responsible to Christ, a woman is responsible to her husband, and Christ is responsible to God. In the language of 11:9-12, the phrase, “a woman is responsible to her husband” focus on their relationship. Paul was not concerned, as some have argued, for the submission of women, but rather that the completeness or glory of their relationship not be diminished (see 11:7).

In the phrase “Christ is responsible to God,” Paul was not teaching that Christ was inferior to God or lesser in any way (see 8:6). Nor was he thinking that Christ was the offspring of God with regard to his eternal being. Paul was referring to the incarnation of Christ. Through Christ's coming to earth, believers receive forgiveness and are united with God and with one another (3:22-23). From this theological base, Paul will address the issue of head coverings.

11:4-5 In this section Paul's main concern is irreverence in worship. The praying and prophesying mentioned here were in the context of public worship. When a man prayed or prophesied, he was to do so without his head covered. In contrast, when a woman prayed or prophesied, she was to do so only with her head covered. We do not know conclusively what the historical situation was. A woman uncovering her head could have meant (1) that she was not wearing a veil; (2) that she was not wearing a shawl or true head covering; or (3) that her hair was loosened and hanging down.

Remember that Paul gave these instructions in response to a question that had been sent to him by the Corinthian believers. Paul explained that the men were not to cover their heads because they are "God's glory" (11:7); to do so would be to shame their head—Christ. So in worship, the men should not veil themselves because that would dishonor God. Women were allowed to pray and prophesy in public worship (a great freedom for them); Paul's only stipulation for the Corinthian women was that they should cover their heads when doing so.

While the general principle of propriety and distinctions between men and woman still stands, the cultural advice given here about head coverings need not be considered as binding to all the churches for all time. Indeed, when Paul wrote to Timothy with advice about the women in the church in Ephesus, he did not tell Timothy to make sure the women covered their heads. Instead, his advice focused on modesty in their dress (see 1 Timothy 2:9-10). The situation in Corinth may have been that women were coming to church with their heads uncovered and this was causing disruption. Although the reason for the problem is unknown, we can gather that Paul's concern was that nothing disrupt worship. So he advised the Corinthian women to cover their heads in public worship much as he advised the Christians not to eat meat offered to idols in public situations. The women were certainly free to not cover their heads just as they were free to eat meat offered to idols. Neither of these mattered regarding their salvation. However, Paul always advised that Christians show deference to others in order to promote unity.

The statement that for a woman to have her head uncovered in worship would be the same as shaving her head is cultural and, again, the reason for the statement is unknown, although 11:6 hints that a shaved head was a disgrace. Some commentators believe that a woman with a shaved head may have been a temple prostitute or the dominant mate in a lesbian couple. Such women who became Christians not only needed to grow out their hair (11:15) but also to cover their heads in worship in recognition of their relationship to God and to their Christian brothers under God.

A modern example might be a Christian woman living in an Eastern culture. While that Christian is certainly “free” to wear shorts and a T-shirt (and would not have any problem doing so in the United States), she should set aside that freedom out of respect for the culture in which she lives. She should dress modestly and cover what should be covered. She will have far more acceptance by doing that than by flaunting her freedom to dress in a certain way that would be acceptable elsewhere.

“Praying” refers, as noted above, to public prayer during worship. “Prophesying” refers not just to telling of future events as revealed to a person by God but also to public speaking about religious truths, witnessing for Christ, and bringing God’s word of encouragement to the congregation (see 14:31). Both men and women could do this in the early church. The spiritual gifts, given by the Holy Spirit, do not discriminate between men and women.

11:6 To further make the point that women should cover their heads in public worship, Paul wrote that if a woman refuses to cover her head, thus disgracing herself, then she might as well cut or shave off all of her hair because that too was shameful. Therefore, if the “uncovered” head (short or shaved hair) is a disgrace, then she ought to willingly cover her head during worship. Paul was not here referring to the woman’s hair as her covering; the covering was a sort of veil worn over the head.

11:7-9 The reason that a man should not wear anything on his head when worshipping is because he is God’s glory, made in God’s own image. Women are also made in the image of God (Genesis 1:27), but she is the glory of man. By praying and prophesying with her head uncovered, she would be dishonoring and shaming man whose glory she was supposed to be. Paul does not say what he means by using the word “glory” here. It could be that man and woman together reflect the image of God (glory) and that by uncovering her head, the woman was taking something away from the identity of the man, thus depleting his part in the reflection of God’s glory. Paul reasoned this back to the order of creation: the first woman came from man. Genesis also explains that man was not created for woman, but woman was made for man (Genesis 2:18).

11:10 Because God’s people are to glorify him, a woman should wear a covering on her head as a sign of authority. There are two basic views of this verse: (1) that the head covering represents the woman's submission to male authority; or (2) that the head covering represents the God-given authority (enablement) for a woman to function this way in the church. Most likely, Paul meant the second option. It is important to understand that while the stipulation of head covering is upheld in Corinth, the main point is that these Christian women had an equal status with men because of their union with Christ. They were free in Christ, equal before God, and able to pray and prophesy in the worship services. They were no longer to be regarded as inferior, which would have been their previous status in both Greek and Jewish cultures (see Galatians 3:27-28). The head covering was not a sign of subjection but a sign of women's willingness to be under the authority of God, just as men were under the authority of God.

The other reason for women wearing this sign of authority is because the angels are watching. It was proper for women to wear head coverings in the worship of God because the angels would be present during this worship. Hebrews 1:14 states that angels watch over believers and care for them. Because the angels observe God's people at worship, his people should be sensitive to follow God's commands in worship. The angels live to serve God; likewise God's people, who have been saved by his grace, should live in obedience to his commands.

11:11-12 Paul acknowledged women's roles in praying and prophesying, and their authority in doing so. But he reminded the Corinthians that all people relate to each other and to God. Clearly God created men and women as interdependent. Even though Adam was created before Eve, and even though Eve came from Adam, ever since then all men have been born from women. No one is completely independent. Finally, everything comes from God, who is the Source of all that exists.

11:13-15 Paul's point in these verses is that men and women are different; they were created differently. He pointed out custom, propriety, and the way culture operates. Men should live as and look like men; women should live as and look like women. Anything that blurs their God-given distinctions in the culture or ruins their ability to share their faith has to be put aside. In the culture of Corinth, it was obvious to these believers that long hair on a man was disgraceful, while short hair on a woman was equally disgraceful. No one knows the details as to why, except that this may have had to do with the looks of heathen priests and priestesses, homosexuals, or temple prostitutes.

11:16 In this statement Paul admonished the contentious ones at Corinth to behave appropriately in church meetings. Calling upon the other churches as examples of such orderliness, Paul urged anyone who might argue with him that the other churches would stand with Paul in this matter.

ORDER AT THE LORD'S SUPPER / 11:17-34

A second abuse of worship existed in the Corinthian church regarding how to celebrate the Lord's Supper. Apparently, there was a division between the rich and the poor during both the love feast and the celebration of Communion itself. This lack of unity caused the believers to lose the real meaning behind what they were remembering—the sacrifice of Jesus' body on the cross.

11:17 At the beginning of the last section (11:2), Paul commended the Corinthians for remembering what he had taught them. Concerning this next issue in his letter, however, he had no praise for them. In this situation, their meetings were doing more harm than good.

11:18-19 When people in a church develop into self-willed divisions (such as class distinctions, or the factions described in 3:4), these are destructive to the congregation. Apparently, Paul was referring to class (economic) distinctions here, because these divisions were hurting a time of fellowship that should have been drawing the believers together, not separating them.

11:20-21 The Lord's Supper was instituted by Jesus before he died (Matthew 26:26-29). Jesus and his disciples ate a meal, sang psalms, read Scripture, and prayed. Then Jesus took two traditional parts of the Passover meal, the passing of bread and the drinking of wine, and gave them new meaning as representations of his body and blood. He used the bread and wine to explain the significance of what he was about to do on the cross. The Lord's Supper was celebrated from the earliest days of the church. This celebration included a feast or fellowship meal followed by Communion. At the fellowship meal in the church in Corinth, it seems that people brought food to share, with the rich bringing more food than the poor. Instead of sharing equally among everyone, some went hungry while others got drunk. They were merely satisfying their hunger, not concerned about celebrating Communion. Paul condemned these actions and reminded the church of the real purpose of the Lord's Supper.

11:22 Some in the Corinthian church had turned the fellowship meal into a gluttonous feast where some ate too much and others got nothing. This had made a mockery of the Lord's Supper. In addition, by the rich separating themselves from the poor who could not bring as much food, the rich were humiliating those who had nothing. Obviously there was nothing for Paul to praise in this behavior. Instead, he advised the believers to eat and drink in their own homes. Then, when they came to share in the feast, no one would be ravenous, but they could, with self-control, wait for one another and eat only a little so there would be enough for everyone (11:33-34).

11:23-24 Paul had passed on to them what the Lord himself said regarding the celebration of the Lord's Supper. This probably does not mean that he had a divine, direct revelation because the tradition of the Lord's Supper had been in circulation among the churches through the teaching of the apostles ever since the church first began. Paul and the Gospel writers drew upon the same apostolic tradition.

Christians posit several different interpretations for what Christ meant when he referred to his body and his blood. Some believe that the wine and bread actually become Christ's physical blood and body (transubstantiation). Others believe that the bread and wine remain unchanged, but Christ is spiritually present with the bread and wine (consubstantiation). Still others believe that the bread and wine symbolize Christ's body and blood (symbolization). Christians generally agree, however, that participating in the Lord's Supper is an important facet of Christian worship and that Christ's presence, however they understand it, strengthens them spiritually. By eating "the body of Christ," believers receive, through faith, the power and benefits of Christ's body broken for sin and glorified forever. Because the Lord's Supper is commemorated in remembrance of the body and blood of Jesus given for the redemption of sinful people, it must never be taken lightly. Hence, Paul's instructions in the remainder of the chapter.

11:25 The cup represented the new covenant between God and people, sealed by the shedding of his blood. What is this new covenant? In the old covenant (the promise of God with his people before Christ came), people could approach God only through the priests and the sacrificial system. God would forgive people's sins if they would bring animals for the priests to sacrifice. When this sacrificial system was begun, the agreement between God and human beings was sealed with the blood of animals. The people of Israel first entered into this agreement after the Exodus from Egypt (Exodus 24). But animal blood did not in itself remove sin (only God can forgive sin), and animal sacrifices had to be repeated day by day and year after year.

Jesus' death on the cross ushered in the new covenant (or agreement) between God and humanity. This concept is key to all New Testament theology. Under this new covenant, Jesus died in the place of sinners. Unlike the blood of animals, Jesus' blood truly removed the sins of all who put their faith in him. And Jesus' sacrifice will never have to be repeated; it is good for all eternity (Hebrews 9:23-28). The new covenant completes, rather than replaces, the old covenant, fulfilling everything the old covenant looked forward to (see Jeremiah 31:31-34). Now people can personally approach God and communicate with him. Eating the bread and drinking the cup shows that God's people are remembering Christ's death for them and renewing their commitment to serve him.

11:26 The eating of the bread and drinking of the cup are to be done on a continual basis in the churches until he [Jesus] comes again. By observing this special meal, the believers are announcing the Lord's death. By partaking of the body and blood of Christ, they personally show their participation in the Christian community and their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as Savior. The periodic, solemn celebration of the Lord's Supper among believers reminds them of Christ's suffering on their behalf and of his imminent return when he will take them with him.

11:27-28 The solemn occasion of the Lord's Supper was to be celebrated carefully and entered into with spiritual readiness. When Paul said that no one should take the Lord's Supper unworthily, he was speaking to church members who were rushing into it without thinking of its meaning. Those who did so would be guilty of sinning against the body and the blood of the Lord. To treat the symbols of Christ's ultimate sacrifice irreverently is to be guilty of irreverence toward his body and blood shed on sinners' behalf. Instead of honoring Christ's sacrifice, those who ate unworthily were sharing in the guilt of those who crucified him.

The very nature of the rite calls for introspection. Therefore, Paul told the believers to examine themselves. No one should partake of the Lord's Supper who had not accepted Jesus' sacrifice on the cross for salvation. Neither should they come to the table drunk, angry with others, or with known but unrepented sin in their lives. Coming to the Lord's table "in an unworthy manner" means to come without a solemn understanding of what is being remembered, and without a repentant and humble spirit before the Lord.

11:29-30 The seriousness of the matter is revealed in these words. To take Communion unworthily, not honoring the body of Christ means coming to the Lord's table and not honoring the body of Christ sacrificed for our sins. To take the Lord's Supper—to eat the bread and drink the wine—as though it were no more than a regular meal to assuage hunger is to miss the sanctity of this special rite. Those who did so were eating and drinking God's judgment against themselves. This “judgment” was severe, one of the most severe in the New Testament. The judgment was disciplinary in nature (11:32); that is, this did not refer to eternal judgment, but it was severe enough as to cause many of the believers to be weak and sick, while some had even died. That some of the people had died may have been a special supernatural judgment on the Corinthian church. This type of disciplinary judgment highlights the seriousness of the Communion service. The Lord's Supper is not to be taken lightly; this new covenant cost Jesus his life. It is not a meaningless ritual, but a sacrament given by Christ to help strengthen believers' faith.

11:31 If the believers took time to examine themselves (11:28) before taking the Lord's Supper and so came to it with humble and repentant hearts—they would not be examined by God and judged in this way. This “judgment” refers to what Paul had just described in 11:29-30. While no one can come to the Lord's Supper “worthy” of Christ's redemptive work, all believers can come with the right attitude and the right motivation to thank and praise God for what he has done.

11:32 Paul hastened to add that the judgment of 11:29-30 was disciplinary in nature and not eternal. The judgment sent by God is meant to bring believers back to a right understanding of the Lord's Supper so they can celebrate it correctly. The discipline will draw them back so that they can worship the Lord and not be condemned with the world. The world will face eternal condemnation because it has rejected Christ.

11:33-34 To solve the problem in Corinth, Paul advised the believers, when they gathered to celebrate the Lord's Supper, to wait for each other. They should come to this meal desiring to fellowship with other believers and to prepare for the Lord's Supper to follow, not to fill up on a big dinner. If they were hungry, they should eat at home, so they would come to the fellowship meal in the right frame of mind. As Paul had already explained, to come with the wrong attitude would bring judgment upon themselves. How sad to turn a blessed time of unity and thanksgiving into a time of division and judgment. Paul did not want this to be the case in Corinth.

Apparently there were other questions that needed Paul's instructions, but these questions were not urgent enough for him to take up in this letter. He would talk with the believers about these when he arrived in Corinth.

1 CORINTHIANS 12

SPIRITUAL GIFTS / 12:1-11

Spiritual gifts had become symbols of spiritual power, causing rivalries in the church because some people thought they were more “spiritual” than others because of their gifts. This was a terrible misuse of spiritual gifts because their purpose is always to help the church function more effectively, not to divide it. We can be divisive if we insist on using our gift our own way without being sensitive to others. We must never use gifts as a means of manipulating others or promoting our own self-interest.

12:1 The Corinthians had apparently asked Paul to answer a question about the special abilities the Holy Spirit gives to each believer. Also called “spiritual gifts,” these are freely bestowed by God to enable his people to minister to the needs of the body of believers and to enable them to do extraordinary work for God. Paul did not want the believers to have misunderstandings about these gifts, but, rather, to understand and use them for God’s glory.

12:2 To contrast the work of the Holy Spirit, Paul reminded the believers of the influence of evil spirits (see 10:20-21). When they were pagans (non-Christians), they had been led astray and swept along in worshiping speechless idols. Evil spirits had done the “influencing.” Evidently, in the cult religions, evil spirits “spoke” through their followers in what was called “ecstatic” or “inspired” speech. Evil forces were at work in the world, and the Corinthians would need to understand that what they had experienced as “tongues” or “inspired speech” in their pagan religion was completely different from the “speaking in tongues” that the believers might experience through the Holy Spirit.

12:3 The way to discern whether a person was speaking from God was to listen to what he or she said about Jesus Christ. Those who proclaimed and believed that Jesus is Lord were speaking by the Spirit, for only by the Holy Spirit can a person acknowledge the lordship of Christ. Some false teachers might be able to say those words and not mean them, but the truth would eventually come out. The Holy Spirit within believers helps them to truly believe and publicly confess Jesus Christ as Lord.

12:4-6 The answers that Paul has given to the Corinthians’ questions thus far in this letter have focused on unity among believers, order in the church, and exaltation of Jesus Christ. So with the concern about spiritual gifts, Paul was concerned that the Corinthians' focus on any particular gift, such as "tongues," or ecstatic speech, would tear them apart. While the specific question is unknown, Paul clearly wanted the believers to understand that tongues had their place but should not be sought by everyone. In the broad context of spiritual gifts, the gift of tongues was just one gift. There are different kinds of spiritual gifts, different kinds of service in the church, and different ways God works in our lives. God's people receive many kinds of gifts, and no one gift is better than another. All the gifts come from one source and are to be used for one purpose—the building up of the body of Christ.

These gifts are just that—gifts. They are not earned. They are not given to believers asking for a specific one. They are not chosen by people. God alone administers the gifts among his people. God, not believers, controls the gifts. Each believer, then, is responsible to seek God's guidance in discovering his or her particular gift(s) and then discovering how best to use them for God's purposes.

12:7 Each believer has at least one spiritual gift to be used as a means of helping the entire church. Some people have interpreted this verse to imply that each person must have a gift; therefore, each believer must identify it and insist on using that gift. It may be true that every believer has a gift (12:11), but this statement was meant to counter those in Corinth who believed that every person had to speak in tongues. Such a view is wrong. What Paul stressed was the manifestation of the Spirit, the great variety and diversity of the gifts of the triune God (12:4-6), and the importance of using the gifts to help others.

12:8 To illustrate that there are a wide variety of gifts from the Holy Spirit, Paul gave a list. This list was not meant to be exhaustive; it merely illustrates many of the different kinds of spiritual gifts. The Spirit gives many gifts; the Bible contains no definitive list of all the gifts.

All believers are given wisdom from the Spirit (2:15-16), but some are given the ability to give wise advice. That this particular gift does not occur on any of the other lists of gifts has led some scholars to think that this gift was especially important (and more prominent) for the believers in the Greek city of Corinth, where the issue of "wisdom" was causing much discussion. Another person is given the gift of special knowledge. People may think they have all kinds of wisdom and knowledge, which leads to pride, but true wisdom and knowledge are found in Christ alone. But to some people the Spirit gives extraordinary knowledge. This could mean a special knowledge of spiritual realities (see 13:2, 8-12; 14:6) or knowledge given to teachers who are training others in Christian truth.

12:9 All Christians have faith because the faith that brings a person to salvation is the work of the Holy Spirit. Some people, however, have the spiritual gift of faith, which is an unusual measure of trust in the Holy Spirit's power. This kind of faith is a supernatural trust in God's miraculous power for specific situations. This gift of faith could also be manifested in believers' willingness to face persecution and martyrdom without renouncing what they believed.

The next two gifts (healing and miracles) are visual manifestations of the Spirit. The power to heal the sick had been manifested through Peter, Paul, and the other apostles (see, for example, Acts 3:6-8; 5:15-16; 9:33-34; 14:8-10). The gift of healing is given, not to the person healed, but to the person who does the healing. Some people want to say they have received the gift of healing for an illness they have, but the gifts are given to be used to benefit others.

12:10 As with the gift of healing (12:9), the Spirit will give to some an extraordinary power to perform miracles. While performing a healing would be considered a miracle, the inclusion of this gift separately from healings refers to other miraculous manifestations of the Spirit (see Galatians 3:5).

The rest of the gifts mentioned in this passage focus on verbal manifestations of the Spirit. To some people, the Spirit gives a special ability to prophecy. "Prophecy" does not just refer to predicting the future; it can also mean giving a message received from God to the community of believers. As with the gift of faith, the ability to share one's faith with power is available to everyone (see 14:1-5), but to some the Spirit gives a special measure of this gift.

Because there are many false teachers who claim to "prophecy" for God, some in the church are given the ability to know whether it is really the Spirit of God or another spirit that is speaking. While some believers have a special gift to discern what is really from God's Spirit and what is not, all believers are expected to have discernment. Since the gift mentioned here is also described in 14:29, this kind of spiritual discernment pertains specifically to oracular manifestations in Christian meetings. Paul's mention of this shows his concern for the protection of the truth in the worship service. Those given the gift of special discernment can help separate truth from error.

Opinions differ over exactly what Paul meant by unknown languages. Some believe that this refers to earthly languages that a person did not know before (the same as the gift described in Acts 2:4, 7-8). Other scholars say that this refers to an “ecstatic” language, a “heavenly” language. Most likely the second view is correct. Probably the only time that the word “tongues” refers to other earthly languages is when describing Pentecost (Acts 2:4, 7-8). The rest of the time in the New Testament, the word refers to ecstatic languages unknown to anyone—thus another is given the gift to interpret what is being said. Speaking in tongues is a legitimate gift of the Spirit. The exercise of the gift demands some guidelines (as noted in chapter 14) so that the purpose of the gift—to help the body of Christ—is not lost. Those who speak in tongues should follow the guidelines; those who do not speak in tongues ought not seek the gift as a sign of salvation or as a sign of special closeness with God, for it is neither. It is a gift of God, given only to whomever God chooses. If a person has not experienced the gift of tongues, he or she ought not seek it but seek what gifts God has given.

12:11 The Holy Spirit distributes these gifts, and they are to be used for God’s divine purpose. Because the Holy Spirit alone decides which gift each person should have, there is no place for rivalry, jealousy, or pride among believers regarding their gifts. God, through his Spirit, gives to every person in the community of believers exactly the right gifts for him or her to provide the needed services for the church and for God’s Kingdom.

Whatever the practice of different churches, believers must realize that the Holy Spirit does not submit to any view of methodology. He cannot be limited or confined to cultural or contemporary views of propriety. All believers need to be open to God’s gracious power in their lives and in their worship.

ONE BODY WITH MANY PARTS / 12:12-31

Using the analogy of the body, Paul emphasized the importance of each church member. If a seemingly insignificant part is taken away, the whole body becomes less effective. Thinking that one’s gift is more important than someone else’s is an expression of spiritual pride. Devaluing the gift offends the Giver. We should not look down on those who seem unimportant, and we should not be jealous of others who have impressive gifts. Instead, we should use the gifts we have been given and encourage others to use theirs. If we don’t, the body of believers will be less effective.

12:12 Paul followed his section describing the diversity of gifts that the Holy Spirit gives to the church by providing an analogy of a body (see also 10:17). Just as a body has many parts, so the church is made up of many people with different gifts. It seems that the Corinthians all wanted to speak in tongues or desired more spectacular manifestations of the Spirit's power. Paul explained, however, that while not everyone has the same gift, they still make up only one body—the body of Christ.

12:13 What gives believers their unity is the one Spirit—the very same Spirit who also gives their diversity through the many and varied gifts. As believers live out their diversity through the gifts, they must never forget the basic fact that unites them—they have all received the same Spirit. All believers receive the same Holy Spirit at the time of their conversion. This distinguishes them from nonbelievers and unites them with one another.

12:14-15 Having established that the church, the worldwide community of believers, is indeed one body—the body of Christ—Paul went on to show the necessary diversity in that body. For a body to function, such diversity is essential. Individual members cannot separate themselves without harming the body. Just as a foot cannot decide to leave the body because it is not a hand, so a believer who does not have a particular gift cannot decide that he or she is not a part of the church. Apparently, some believers in Corinth were discouraged that they did not have a particular gift—probably one of the more spectacular gifts, such as the gift of tongues—so they believed that they could not truly be a part of the body unless they experienced that particular gift. But Paul explains, through this metaphor, that all the different gifts given by the Spirit to believers must be utilized in order for the church to function well.

12:16 As with the foot and the hand (12:15), so it is with the ear and the eye. The parts of the body should desire to perform only the functions for which they were made, not seeking other parts. Each believer should discover his or her spiritual gift and then use it to its fullest capacity for the Lord.

12:17 Every spiritual gift from the Holy Spirit is vital to the functioning of the body. Thus, the gifts are not given at whim and will not be changed according to people's preferences. If everyone wanted to be an eye, then the body might see very well, but it would not be able to hear. If the whole body were an ear, there would be no sense of smell.

12:18-20 As God created human bodies to function with their many parts working together, so the body of Christ—the church—needs all the various gifts working in harmony. The picture of a body with only one part illustrates the absurdity of a church with everyone trying to have the same gift. It would not be a body at all, and it would be unable to function. While there are many parts, there is only one body, because God ordained it that way. All believers are placed right where God wants them so that they might serve effectively together.

12:21 Not only should each individual part realize its own importance, but all the other parts should realize their interdependence as well. One part of the body can never say it doesn't need another part. Those in the church who have the more spectacular gifts should not look down on or dismiss those with other gifts because, in reality, all are needed.

12:22 The more honored members must not look down on the more humble members (12:21); in fact, those who seem weakest and least important are really the most necessary. These people may not be always visible, always up front exercising their gifts, but they are in the background. If they are using their God-given gifts, they are actually most necessary to the body. Those with the visible gifts could not function to their full capacity without the other members utilizing their gifts. The pastor in a church may be well versed and eloquent, but he will not be effective if the other members are not utilizing their gifts to greet newcomers warmly, to make sure the building is maintained and clean, to plan the worship service, to make sure equipment is working properly, to follow up on people with needs, or to pray faithfully for the ministry. The church needs the visible members, but it needs everyone. In reality, the less visible members are the most necessary ones.

12:23-26 The parts we regard as less honorable refers to the sexual parts of the body, the parts that we carefully protect from the eyes of others. The point of this verse is that appearances are deceiving; all parts of the body are necessary, even the ones that should not be seen. No one should dismiss anyone else as unimportant in the body of Christ; neither should undue prominence be given to anyone. Doing this makes for harmony among the members, so that all the members care for each other equally. The harmony Paul wanted had already been discussed in 1:10. Such harmony happens only when all the members—the weak and the strong, the flamboyant and the quiet, the up-front and the behind-the-scenes—use their gifts, appreciate one another, and share in one another's honors and suffering. As with the physical, human body, one part's suffering causes every part to suffer. When the head aches, the whole body suffers. When a thumb is hit with a hammer, the whole body knows it. Believers should share one another's burdens in order to help lighten them. There is no room for jealousy or strife when one person receives praise; instead, all should be glad.

12:27 The words all of you together refer to all believers across the world. All believers together are Christ's body. As new believers come to salvation in Jesus Christ, they join that body, receive a gift from the Holy Spirit, and are used by God. Therefore, each and every believer in the body of Christ is a separate and necessary part of that body. No believer is unimportant—each one has a gift to share in order to make the body function that much more effectively.

12:28 Having established believers' unity in their diversity, Paul went on to describe this diversity by a list (not complete) of various offices and gifts. The order of these gifts in this verse is important. The first three gifted people listed are those who proclaim the gospel and teach the truth. These are important gifts, for there would be no church without those who bring the message and teach the truth. Thus, Paul specifically ranked them as first, second, and third to show their prime importance above all the other gifts.

The apostles include the eleven men Jesus called (without Judas Iscariot), plus others who are called apostles—such as Paul himself (Romans 1:1), Matthias (Acts 1:26), Barnabas (Acts 14:14), Jesus' brother James (Galatians 1:19), Silas (1 Thessalonians 2:6), and Andronicus and Junias (Romans 16:7). It seems that the qualifications for being an apostle were to have seen the risen Christ, to have been sent out by Christ to preach the gospel, and to work on behalf of the Kingdom, building its foundation. Paul also noted “signs, wonders, and miracles” as marks of a true apostle (2 Corinthians 12:12). There were only a few apostles who brought the gospel message to the world.

God also appointed prophets to the church. These people had special gifts in ministering God's messages to his people. At times they would foretell the future (Acts 11:28; 21:9, 11), but more often they exhorted, encouraged, and strengthened God's people (Acts 15:32; 1 Corinthians 14:29). God spoke through prophets, inspiring them with specific messages for particular times and places.

While the apostles and prophets had a universal sphere of function (the church as a whole), the teachers probably served in the local churches. They needed to be trustworthy and faithful stewards of the truth of the gospel. People in that day did not have their own Bibles to read, so the teachers in the local congregations continued to teach the believers in the truth after the apostles had moved on to other cities.

The rest of this list reveals other gifts. Some of these have been noted earlier in this chapter. Some do miracles (12:10), some have the gift of healing (12:9), some help others (perhaps unusual compassion and caring), and others can get others to work together to help the church run smoothly. It is significant that Paul places last the gift of speaking in unknown languages. This was the one gift that seemed to have caused so much consternation and division in the Corinthian church (12:1-3, 10). Paul placed it as a relatively unimportant gift when compared with those who share the gospel or serve in more tangible ways.

12:29-30 These rhetorical questions demand a “no” answer. Not everyone in any church falls into one of these categories. Not everyone in the church has the same gift, nor can anyone claim to have all the gifts. Believers in the church must see themselves, not as individual plants, but as an entire garden under the cultivation of God’s Spirit. His purpose involves not simply the production of a single gift but all the gifts, each becoming ripe as it is needed. Believers should be thankful for each other, thankful that others have gifts that are completely different. In the church, believers’ strengths and weaknesses can balance each other. Some people’s abilities compensate for other people’s deficiencies. Together all believers can build Christ’s church. But all these gifts will be worthless if they are used begrudgingly, out of duty, or if they are exercised without love (see also 13:1-3).

12:31 The believers should desire the most helpful gifts. In other words, in the desire to be helpful in the body of Christ, they should seek the power of the Spirit. Too often this verse is only applied individually when the emphasis should be on the church as a body. The church ought to desire the most helpful gifts so that it can function well. It would be incorrect to interpret Paul as saying “desire the most helpful gifts” to mean “seek the gifts from the top of the list” (12:27-28). Paul had been stressing diversity of gifts and the necessity for the gifts to be interactive within the body. He could not have thereby excluded healing or tongues as lesser gifts. In addition, he could not have meant for the people to desire to be apostles—that was impossible, because only a few chosen men could claim that title.

The believers should earnestly desire gifts that benefit everyone (as opposed to an unintelligible tongue that, without interpretation, helps no one but the speaker). The Corinthians had to get their focus off of the gift of speaking in ecstatic languages; instead, they needed to see the value in all the gifts, especially those that helped others. Paul’s saying, let me tell you about something else that is better than any of them, leads into chapter 13.

1 CORINTHIANS 13

LOVE IS THE GREATEST / 13:1-13

In chapter 12, Paul gave evidence of the Corinthians' lack of love in the utilization of spiritual gifts; chapter 13 defines real love; and chapter 14 shows how love works. While spiritual gifts are important to the functioning of the body (12:12-31), they lose their value if love is not behind them.

13:1 Great faith, acts of dedication or sacrifice, miracle-working power, or the ability to speak in any language in heaven or on earth will produce very little without love. Without love, speaking in a heavenly language, although a gift of the Spirit, becomes nothing more than meaningless noise. The gift of tongues, used without love, is as valueless as pagan worship. Without love, the gifts do not build up other believers, so they are useless. Christians must not exalt gifts over character. Love is far more important. The word for "love" used here is agape. The Greeks had different words that described different kinds of love. The word agape connotes a deep, abiding, self-sacrificing love—the kind that looks out for the other person first.

13:2 The gift of prophecy was described in the commentary on 12:10 as a gift that might enable the person to see events in the future but mainly to bring God's message to the church under the direction of the Holy Spirit (see also 14:1-25; 1 Thessalonians 5:19-20). Some people have been given a special measure of this gift with the ability to know everything. Such understanding and even the ability to share it with others, however, are worth nothing without love.

The gift of faith was described in 12:9. This does not refer to saving faith, whereby people come to believe in Jesus Christ as Savior; instead, this is an unusual measure of trust in the Holy Spirit's power to do mighty works, much like Elijah received in 1 Kings 18. If a person has faith that could move mountains but does not have love, the faith is no good to anybody.

13:3 True love produces willingness to give sacrificially and to suffer. Acts of charity and self-sacrifice can be done for the sake of an ideal or with pride as a motivation. But they are of no value for the Kingdom, wrote Paul, unless they are done from the foundation of love for others.

13:4 Because love is so important among the believers, Paul described that love in more detail. How does such love look when lived out in the lives of believers?

First of all, love is patient, the opposite of being short-tempered. Patience (sometimes translated “long-suffering” or “slow to anger”) is an attribute of God (see Exodus 34:6; Numbers 14:18; Romans 2:4; 1 Peter 3:20). In many places, God’s people are called upon to be patient (see, for example, Ephesians 4:2; Colossians 3:12; 1 Thessalonians 5:14). Patience is a fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5:22). Such love bears with certain annoyances or inconveniences without complaint. It does not lose its temper when provoked. It steadily perseveres.

Love is also kind. Kindness takes the initiative in responding generously to others’ needs. The psalms and writings of the prophets say much about God’s kindness (Psalm 18:50; Isaiah 54:8; Jeremiah 9:24). Because believers have received kindness, they ought to act with kindness toward others. Such love is considerate and helpful to others. Kind love is gentle and mild, always ready to show compassion, especially to those in need.

Love is not jealous. The jealous person desires what another person has. This seems to have been a particular problem in Corinth—those with “lesser” gifts envied those with “greater” gifts. The seed of envy can lead to seething anger and hatred. Those who are too busy envying each other’s gifts are unlikely to be using their own gifts in loving service to God and others. When there is love, believers will gladly use whatever gifts they have been given to work together for the advance of God’s Kingdom. They will be glad that others have different gifts so that the entire job can get done.

Love is not boastful or proud. While some believers may have a problem with envy, those with the “greater” gifts might have a problem with boasting or pride. Again, it seems that this may have been a problem in Corinth. While some pride can be positive, this kind of pride takes credit for an undeserved gift. Gifted believers who are caught up in pride and boasting over their gifts are unable to serve. Without love, they may feel that by using their gifts, they are doing someone a favor, that others should be grateful to them, and that they are far superior.

13:5 Love is not rude. This refers to actions that are improper, impolite, discourteous, or crude. Believers who use their gifts with love will be careful to act in a manner worthy of their calling before God. They will never humiliate others. This may also have been a problem in Corinth, especially in their worship services (see 11:2-16).

Love does not demand its own way. Love looks out for others, seeks their best interests, willingly gives up its own for the sake of another. A person who wants his own way may use his gifts but not with a serving attitude or a desire to build the Kingdom. Instead, the gifts are only used if they can somehow benefit the self-seeking person. This is not God's way. Instead, because of love, the believers use their gifts to benefit others first, without "self" or selfish desires getting in the way.

Love is not irritable, meaning easily angered or touchy. Such people let things get on their nerves. One believer, in the process of exercising his or her gifts, may irritate another believer. These "easily angered" believers may not like the style or manner in which these others exercise their gifts. This is not the way of love. When believers exercise their gifts in love, they will be able to give one another some latitude to follow God as they see fit. They will not let themselves be easily provoked over disagreements, but they will be able to always respond in a loving manner.

Love keeps no record of when it has been wronged. Such people will remember every offense against them as though it were written in a book and tallied. These "wrongs" are not sins that need to be dealt with in the congregation (such as that described in chapter 5) but minor offenses or misunderstandings between believers. Those who keep record of these wrongs and personal injuries will harbor resentment against other believers. Love, however, makes allowances for people's foibles and flaws and willingly forgets when wrongs were done. This frees all believers to grow and mature in Christ and to grow in their ability to serve and use their gifts. When mistakes are made, love overlooks them and allows believers to continue to serve with the gifts God has given them. God does not keep a record of believers' wrongs (2 Corinthians 5:19).

13:6 Love is never glad about injustice but rejoices whenever the truth wins out. When believers show love, they do not show superior morality by taking pleasure in another's fall. Love does not take pleasure in any kind of injustice. Instead, love does the exact opposite. Through their relationship with Jesus Christ, believers possess the one and only truth (John 14:6). Those who love should remain untainted by evil. Instead, they ought to always seek truth, desire that truth wins out, protect the truth, and proclaim the truth whenever possible.

13:7 After explaining what love does not do (13:4b-6), Paul listed four positive attributes of love. Love never gives up, but willingly protects others. The word in Greek means "cover" or "hide by covering." This does not refer to hiding hurtful sin but to protecting someone from embarrassment, gossip, or any other such harm. When believers love one another, they refuse harmful gossip and protect one another from those who would try to inflict harm.

Love never loses faith. It is willing to think the best of others. It does not mean that believers must be gullible, trusting everyone; instead, it means that they are willing to think the best as opposed to the worst of others. Love gives the benefit of the doubt. With real love, believers can deal with conflict lovingly. When everyone willingly thinks the best of everyone else, people are freed to be honest and open.

Love is always hopeful. Believers who love look forward, not backward. They seek for growth and maturity in the church, knowing that God is working in every person.

Love endures through every circumstance. Believers who love are active and steadfast in their faith. They hold on, no matter what difficulties they face. Hardship and pain do not stop love. When believers persevere, they face suffering within the body. They face persecution. They hang on when the going gets tough. They strive to save their marriages despite disappointment, to continue to trust God despite setbacks, and to continue to serve God despite fear or sorrow. When believers truly persevere, nothing can stop them.

13:8-10 All the spiritual gifts will eventually disappear, but love will last forever. On this earth, outside of heaven, everything is imperfect. No matter how much people may know, they know only a little. No matter how much prophecy is given, it still reveals little. Not until the arrival of God's Kingdom (the end) will everything be made perfect and complete. At that time, all the special gifts of the Spirit will disappear. Because gifts are given for the building up of the body of Christ, they will no longer be needed. The body will be complete, and God's Kingdom will have arrived. Yet love will continue (13:8), because love is the very essence of God himself. "God is love," wrote John (1 John 4:8, 16). God's love caused him to reach out to undeserving humanity and send a Savior. His love saved people and will bring them into his Kingdom to be with him forever. The Kingdom rests on God's love.

13:11 The contrast between believers' spiritual understanding now, when they know only a little, and their lives in the future Kingdom, when everything will be made clear, is illustrated in human terms. A child talks, thinks, and reasons like a child. His or her understanding is incomplete. But when a child grows up, he or she matures in speech, thought, and reason, putting away childish things. So now believers know only a little, like children, but one day they will be able to put their present understanding behind them because they will understand clearly.

13:12 By way of further metaphor, believers' present spiritual understanding is like a reflection in a poor mirror. They see very poorly now; what they know is partial and incomplete. While believers' knowledge is still growing and maturing, God already knows each person completely. Instead of boasting about their spiritual gifts, the Corinthian believers should realize that these gifts were nothing compared to what they would experience in heaven.

13:13 Paul was showing that love is a spiritual reality of a different kind, like hope and faith, and not to be considered as one of the spiritual gifts. In eternity, the gifts will drop away in significance, but faith, hope, and love will endure.

Faith sometimes refers to a spiritual gift (12:9; 13:2) or to saving faith that God has forgiven sins. In this context, it refers to trust in the goodness and mercy of the Lord. Such trust will see believers through until they live face-to-face in God's presence. Believers also hope; they look forward to the arrival of God's promised Kingdom in its fullest form, knowing that God will deliver them in times of suffering.

Paul added that the greatest of these is love. How is love "the greatest"? Paul already had established that love would abide forever (13:8). Love is the greatest because it is one quality of the Christian life that will be fully active both in the present and for eternity. Believers' faith in God will be realized when they see God face-to-face—for where there is sight, faith is no longer needed. Similarly, the believers' hope will be fully realized. Love will endure forever as those in the new heaven and new earth continue to love God and his people.

1 CORINTHIANS 14

THE GIFTS OF TONGUES AND PROPHECY / 14:1-25

The previous chapter, known as the “love chapter,” is nestled purposefully into this section on tongues. As beautiful as it is standing alone, chapter 13 serves as a transition from chapter 12 (regarding the various gifts of the Spirit) to chapter 14 (focusing on the abuse of one particular gift, the gift of tongues). When spiritual gifts are properly used, they help everyone in the church. Much of the controversy over spiritual gifts today is because the gifts have been abused in some Christian circles (strikingly similar to the Corinthian problems), while at the same time they have been almost completely ignored in other Christian groups. In your church, seek balanced biblical teaching.

14:1 Having described love as the most valuable of all the gifts given by the Holy Spirit, Paul concluded here that believers should let love be their highest goal. Then, from that foundation, they should desire the special abilities the Spirit gives. To desire the gifts means literally “to pursue, strive for, seek after, aspire to.” The special abilities that Paul wanted the Corinthians to seek were those that edified the church. The gift of prophecy (see also 12:10) had not so much to do with predicting future events as it had to do with bringing some message from God under the direction of the Holy Spirit to the body of believers. This gift provides insight, warning, correction, and encouragement (see 14:3). The Corinthians were eager for gifts, especially tongues, but Paul wanted them to be eager for the gifts that edify—namely, prophecy. The Reformers (Calvin, Luther) believed that sermons are the exercise of the gift of prophecy. Other scholars say that “prophecy,” as used here by Paul, means spontaneous, Spirit-inspired messages that are orally delivered in the congregation for the edification and encouragement of the body of Christ.

14:2 The gift of prophecy should be desired more than the gift of tongues because the ability to speak in tongues does not help other people since they won’t be able to understand you. The “tongues” mentioned are not earthly languages (such as the gift described in Acts 2:4-12). Instead, this refers to an “ecstatic” or heavenly language, unknown to the speaker or to anyone else. Through this special gift, the believer talks to God but not to people; talking to God primarily involves prayer and praise. Because “tongues” is a true spiritual gift, the speaker is speaking by the power of the Spirit, but the words are mysterious.

As wonderful as this gift is, Paul wanted the Corinthian believers, in particular, to stop overemphasizing it. They needed to keep its value in perspective. Paul's goal, as always, was the unity and edification of all the believers. In light of this, Paul made several points about the gift of speaking in tongues:

- The gift of speaking in tongues is a spiritual gift from the Holy Spirit (12:28; 14:2, 39).
- Speaking in tongues is a desirable gift, but it is not a requirement of salvation or of being filled with the Spirit (12:30-31).
- The gift of tongues is less important than prophecy and teaching (14:4).
- The gift of tongues must be accompanied by some rules regarding its best use in public settings (14:26-28).

14:3-4 Although Paul himself spoke in tongues (14:18), he stressed prophecy because it benefits the whole church. In context, speaking in tongues primarily benefits the speaker. Public worship must be understandable and edifying to the whole church. The purpose of “prophecy” is helping others grow in the Lord, encouraging and comforting them, and the one who speaks a word of prophecy strengthens the entire church. Through prophecy, believers are taught more about the Lord and their faith so they can grow as a body.

The person who speaks in tongues, however, is strengthened personally in the Lord. Such personal edification is truly a blessing for the one who has received this gift, but a person who prays in a tongue for personal edification should not be doing so in public worship because, while it strengthens him or her, it does not strengthen anyone else. Paul would give some guidelines for the use of tongues in public worship later in this chapter.

14:5 Paul never wrote disparagingly of the gift of tongues, only the Corinthians' overemphasis of it. In fact, he even wished that they all had the gift of speaking in tongues, for the gift has great value for individuals in their private communication with God. But the issue at hand was that the Corinthian believers were seeking that gift above all others, when other gifts were actually more helpful to the church as a whole. Repeating his emphasis in 14:1, Paul stated that prophecy is a greater and more useful gift than speaking in tongues. The one who prophesies helps others to grow and encourages and comforts them (14:3). The one speaking in tongues realizes a wonderful relationship with the Lord but has edified no one else unless someone interprets what has been said so that the whole church can get some good out of it. (For more on interpretation, see 12:30; 14:13, 22-25.) With interpretation, therefore, the gift of tongues can edify the church. Apparently, the Corinthian believers were exhibiting the gift of tongues in public worship without interpretation, and that was helping no one.

14:6 In Corinth, the gift of tongues was being used as a barometer of spirituality. Therefore, Paul described the natural inferiority of a gift that does not edify. For example, if, on his next visit to the Corinthian church, he was talking in an unknown language, would that help the young church grow in Christ? However, revelation, knowledge, prophecy, or teaching would be helpful to them.

14:7-8 Paul argued his point with three different pictures. First, musical instruments make only noise if no one can recognize the melody. If an instrument is to make beautiful sounds that benefit the listener, the sounds must be played clearly. For example, the bugler was important in a battalion of soldiers. With different note combinations, the bugler would sound the call to wake up, to retire for the evening, or the call to battle. If the bugler doesn't sound a clear call, however, the soldiers would be left in confusion, not knowing whether or not they are being called to battle. Mere sounds are not beneficial; only sounds that make sense and are understood by the hearers are helpful.

14:9 People from many lands converged in a busy city like Corinth. The residents were certainly familiar with foreigners who could not speak their language. As mere sounds mean nothing without some sort of plan and pattern of understanding (14:7-8), so human language, when not understood, is like talking to an empty room.

14:10-12 Just because someone doesn't understand a certain language doesn't mean that the language has no meaning. But when two people who speak different languages attempt to communicate, one is not able to understand the other. Just as two foreigners cannot understand each other's language, so those speaking in tongues cannot be understood by the congregation. Thus, their speaking is not beneficial to the church.

Because the Corinthians had been so eager to have spiritual gifts, Paul admonished them to ask God for those that will be of real help to the whole church (see Ephesians 4:12). The church as a whole should strive to have the gifts that build up its members. It should support those who serve in those capacities, and it should redirect its zeal from a desire to speak in tongues to a desire to serve the Lord in the best way that will build up the church.

14:13-14 The simple conclusion to the matter is that anyone who has the gift of speaking in tongues should pray also for the gift of interpretation of what he or she says in the unknown language. Up to this point, Paul had been explaining that the gift of speaking in tongues was of no value to the congregation as a whole, only to the person who speaks to God in the unknown tongue. But if the person also has the gift of interpretation, the tongue could be used in public worship if the one praying (or someone else with the gift of interpretation) would then interpret in order to tell people plainly what has been said. That way, the entire church would be edified by this gift.

Paul intimates in 14:2 and 14:4 that the gift of speaking in tongues provides a person with glorious communion with God. Most likely, however, this communion results not from understanding what the person is saying but from drawing closer to God through the power of the Spirit. Yet the person who prays that way is not expected to be able to interpret his or her own words immediately. Paul wrote, if I pray in tongues, my spirit is praying, but I don't understand what I am saying. That is part of the mysterious beauty of this particular gift.

14:15 Paul states in 14:18 that he himself speaks in tongues, so he wrote in the first person here, including himself in this situation. His answer is that he will do both—he will pray and sing in tongues with his spirit, and he will pray and sing in words he will understand. Praying in tongues was, for Paul, a practice that edified him even if he did not understand what he was saying (see 14:13-14 commentary). Praying with the spirit (see “spiritual songs,” Ephesians 5:19) may be charismatic singing in the Spirit or singing spontaneously to previously composed songs. Paul may also have had in mind a private/public distinction. In his private prayers and singing, he could do so in tongues. In public, however, he would speak in Greek so that the congregation would understand and be edified.

14:16-17 Those with the gift of tongues could continue to speak in tongues privately, but they needed to focus more on praying and singing in their own language in corporate worship. The reason is simple. If a person were praising God in the spirit (meaning in an unknown tongue), no one could praise God along with him. If the rest of the people in the congregation have no clue what a tongues-speaker has said, how can they express agreement with it? The bottom line on the corporate use of a spiritual gift is that it should help the other people present. That is the purpose of corporate worship, and believers must be sensitive to one another in that context—keeping out anything that would interfere with spiritual growth.

14:18-19 Paul had been downplaying the value of tongues because of the Corinthian overemphasis on that particular gift, but he added that he himself had that gift. But he understood the limitations of the gift of tongues when it came to edifying the body of believers. Instead of impressing people with the gift of tongues, Paul said that he would rather speak five understandable words to instruct others than ten thousand words in an unknown language because only words that are understood can instruct. The implication is that the believers in Corinth who were gifted with tongues should do the same.

14:20 Children prefer excitement to instruction, but adults ought to know better. The Corinthians had been acting like children, enjoying the excitement that tongues offered in their assembly without realizing that they were obtaining no solid instruction from them. It is all right to be as innocent as babies when it comes to evil, but there is no place for constant immaturity in the Christian life. Believers are to be growing and maturing so that they can understand these issues for themselves and make wise decisions concerning them.

14:21 Paul's use of Scripture comes from Isaiah 28:11-12. He may have been adapting the passage or generalizing from it, since it is not an exact quote from either the Greek (Septuagint) nor the Hebrew text available at that time. Paul's point in quoting this passage was to set up his conclusion in 14:23. The people in Isaiah's time did not listen to the prophets who spoke in their language, and when people of other languages spoke to the Jews, they still did not listen. So Paul was saying that speaking in tongues will convince no one.

14:22 The Corinthians argued that speaking in tongues was supposed to be a sign to unbelievers, as it was in Acts 2. But Paul argued that after speaking in tongues, believers were supposed to explain what was said and give the credit to God. The unsaved people would then be convinced of a spiritual reality and be motivated to look further into the Christian faith. Prophecy, the teaching of God's word, will benefit the believers.

14:23 The way the Corinthians were speaking in tongues was helping no one. If everyone in the church is talking in an unknown language all at one time without interpretation, people who don't understand or unbelievers who come in will think they are crazy. They will not sound as though they are praising and praying, but rather one would think that they are all insane. This will edify no one, scare off unbelievers, and hurt the witness of the church.

14:24 Paul had already stated the value of prophesying over speaking in tongues (14:1-6). The unbelievers or people who don't understand should come into the meeting and be able to learn something. Here Paul highlighted the specific speaking that would help lead people to repent of their sins. Convicted of sin means reproved or rebuked through the probing work of the Holy Spirit, who exposes and convinces people of sin (Ephesians 5:12-13; 1 Timothy 5:20; 2 Timothy 4:2). Unbelievers would also be condemned, meaning “judged,” “held to account,” “examined.”

14:25 Having one's secret thoughts laid bare will lead both to conviction and condemnation. Obviously, the Corinthian believers would be far less convicted to have everyone speaking in tongues. They all would feel very spiritual, with no one having to face any sin. But when Spirit-inspired, intelligible words of truth are spoken, those who truly listen will find God right there among the congregation. The listeners will fall down on their knees and worship God (see Isaiah 45:14; Zechariah 8:23). And that is ultimately what the church should desire—to reach out and draw in the unbelievers, bringing them to saving faith in Jesus Christ and then helping them grow to maturity.

A CALL TO ORDERLY WORSHIP / 14:26-40

Paul reviews the guidelines for tongues and prophecy as exercised in corporate worship. He restates the importance of everyone being able to understand, of orderliness, and of edifying each participant.

14:26 This verse is not to be taken as Paul's recommendation of an order of service; his point is that various activities can happen in corporate worship. While all of this occurs, however, everything that is done must be useful to all and build them up in the Lord. Also, all believers should show love (chapter 13), and everything should edify (14:1-25).

14:27-28 Tongues can be edifying to everyone, if a few simple rules are followed. First, if tongues are spoken no more than two or three should do so, they must speak one at a time, and there must be someone who can interpret. That Paul should have to say that they should speak “one at a time” seems to be a corrective—apparently they were not doing so. Not only were the Corinthians overemphasizing this gift, but they were allowing it to dominate their church gatherings. Thus, Paul corrected this error. If those with the gift of tongues know that they do not have the gift of interpretation, and if no one else in the congregation is known to have that gift, then they should be silent. Paul was not forbidding believers from using their gift, but instructing them to pray silently, speaking to God privately. That way they would be blessed by the use of their gift, but they would not in any way hinder the assembly.

14:29 Having just explained certain regulations on the use of tongues in the assembly, Paul also placed regulations on prophetic speaking. Although this was the particular gift that Paul had recommended to the believers (14:1-5), he also realized that its use had to be regulated by love, edification, and order. Just as only two or three people should be allowed to speak in tongues (14:27-28), so only two or three should prophecy. It is unclear who the others are—they could be “others” who also have the gift but exercise it at that time, not by speaking but by evaluating what is said. Or “the others” could refer to the congregation as a whole, discussing a prophet’s words to make sure that they agreed with Scripture. People in the church should never accept the words of any person, gifted or not, without careful discernment and personal knowledge of God’s word; otherwise, false teachers could easily obtain a hearing and lead people astray.

14:30-32 In order for the worship service to continue in an orderly manner (14:40), further guidelines were needed. These words might have been directed at those who would have a tendency to dominate. One who is speaking should willingly defer to another who has received a prophecy. That a revelation would come suddenly to a person describes this gift and its use in a worship service. It, too, could get out of control if the speakers were not careful to take turns and defer to one another as the Spirit leads each to speak. As always, the worship service should be for the edification of the believers. This gift, like the gift of tongues, does not put people out of control, unable to stop their mouths. The message, given by the Spirit, is subject to the person’s spirit. He or she can control when to speak and when to defer to another. This gift could also be exercised in a controlled, appropriate, and orderly way.

14:33 The reason that the church service must be controlled and orderly is that God is not a God of disorder but of peace. In worship, everything must be done in harmony and with order. Even when the gifts of the Holy Spirit are being exercised, there is no excuse for disorder or disturbances. To contradict God’s own character in worship does not honor him. When everyone in the Christian assembly is truly in tune with the Holy Spirit, there will not be disorder, but harmony and “peace” that pleases God and encourages his people.

14:34-35 Does this mean that women should not speak in church services today? It is clear from 11:5 that women often prayed and prophesied in public worship. It is also clear in chapters 12–14 that women are given spiritual gifts and are encouraged to exercise them in the body of Christ. So what did Paul mean? It would be helpful to understand the context and the use of the word silent.

In the Greek culture, women were discouraged from saying anything in public, and they were certainly not allowed to confront or question men publicly. Apparently, some of the women who had become Christians thought that their Christian freedom gave them the right to question the men in public worship. This was causing division in the church. In addition, women of that day did not receive formal religious education as did the men.

The Greek word for “silent” used here is also used in 14:28, referring to the silence commanded on the one who desired to speak in tongues but without an interpreter present. Obviously, that did not mean that this person was never to speak in the church, only to remain silent when certain conditions were not met so that the church service would not be disrupted. The same Greek word is also used in 14:30 for the prophet who is asked to stop speaking (“be silent” in the Greek) when another has been given a revelation. Again, this obviously does not mean that the prophet was never to speak. This would negate his or her gift. Because women as well as men were gifted with tongues, interpretation, or prophecy, they would need to speak in order to exercise their gifts.

The “speaking” to which Paul referred was the inappropriate asking of questions that would disrupt the worship service or take it on a tangent. Therefore, the women should be silent during the church meetings, not because they were never to speak, but because they were not to speak out with questions that would be ineffective in edifying the entire church. If they have any questions, says Paul, let them ask their husbands at home. That they should be submissive compares with Paul’s words in 11:7-12—to keep the believers in obedience with God’s commanded lines of authority (just as the law says). There is no clear reference to an Old Testament passage. Paul may have been referring to a generally accepted interpretation of Genesis 3:16. Apparently, the women believers in Corinth, newly freed in Christ to be able to learn and take part in worship, had been raising questions that could have been answered at home without disrupting the services. In this entire chapter, Paul had been dealing with various forms of disorder and confusion taking place in the Corinthian church in particular. His words are corrective. In this instance, Paul was asking the Corinthian women not to flaunt their Christian freedom during worship. The purpose of Paul’s words was to promote unity, not to teach about the role of women in the church.

14:36 This entire chapter corrects the Corinthian believers regarding their insistence on the gift of tongues as a sign of being “filled with the Spirit” and allowing it to overtake their church services. They have been guilty of taking off on a tangent and leaving the gospel behind. So Paul asked, sarcastically, Do you think that the knowledge of God’s word begins and ends with you? The Corinthian church was out of line with what was acceptable behavior in the churches (14:33), and they needed to make some changes.

14:37-38 The authority of Paul’s words was not to be questioned. As an apostle, Paul was writing a command of the Lord, and they all should treat his words as such. Any true prophet among them would recognize this; anyone who claimed to be a prophet but did not recognize Paul’s words as authoritative was not to be recognized. The lines of authority went from “apostles” to “prophets” (12:28). Paul was an apostle, so his authority was not to be questioned. Those who claimed to be “prophets” would prove it by their acceptance of Paul’s words.

14:39-40 Paul truly loved these believers and sought to correct their errors so that they could continue to grow in the Lord and not be sidetracked by anything. They were to be eager to prophesy (14:1) because that is the more powerful tool for the edification of the believers, but they should not forbid speaking in tongues because that is a bona fide gift of the Holy Spirit. They must be sure that everything is done properly and in order—and that would happen if they followed his instructions as outlined in this chapter. Worship services should be intelligible and marked by mutual respect and proper behavior. They should be organized in a way to enhance communication but not so as to stifle the spontaneous work of the Spirit.

1 CORINTHIANS 15

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST / 15:1-11

In this final section of the letter, Paul gave a masterly defense of the resurrection of Christ and its importance to the Christian faith. The struggles in the Corinthian church made it clear to Paul that they needed to refocus their attention on the gospel. He brought his letter to a close with a vigorous proclamation of the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

15:1-2 The gospel message that he had preached to them, that they had welcomed, on which they had taken their stand was the message that had saved them. Paul wanted to remind them of that gospel, because apparently some (probably false teachers) had been distorting it. In fact, some of the Corinthians had come to believe that there would be no resurrection of the dead (15:12). Not only was the church in Corinth having problems with unity (as Paul tried to clear up in the previous chapters), it was also dealing with basic problems of theology. This, too, would tear apart the church. As an apostle who had himself seen the risen Christ (15:8), Paul took these Corinthian believers back to the basics of the message that they had welcomed and received.

15:3-4 The central theme of the gospel is given here. It is the key text for the defense of Christianity. The three points that are most important are as follows:

1. Christ died for our sins. Without the truth of this message, Christ's death was worthless, and those who believe in him are still in their sins and without hope. However, Christ as the sinless Son of God took the punishment of sin, "dying for sin" so that those who believe can have their sins removed. The phrase as the Scriptures said refers to the Old Testament prophecies regarding this event, such as Psalm 16:8-11 and Isaiah 53:5-6. Christ's death on the cross was no accident, no afterthought. It had been part of God's plan from all eternity in order to bring about the salvation of all who believe.
2. He was buried. The fact of Christ's death is revealed in the fact of his burial. Many have tried to discount the actual death of Christ, from the false teachers of Paul's day to false teachers today. But Jesus Christ did die on the cross and was buried in a tomb.
3. He was raised. Christ came back to life from being a dead person in a grave on the third day as noted in the Gospels (Friday afternoon to Sunday morning—three days in Jewish reckoning of time). This also occurred as the Scriptures said (Psalm 16:8-11; 110; Jonah 1:17).

15:5 Jesus made several appearances to various people after his resurrection. Paul first mentioned the appearance to Peter noted in Luke 24:34 (see also Mark 16:7). Peter had denied his Lord and then had wept bitterly (Mark 14:72). Jesus had also been seen by the twelve apostles. The expression “twelve apostles” was a title for the original disciples. These appearances are recorded in Mark 16:14; Luke 24:36-43; John 20:19-31.

15:6 This event is recorded nowhere else. It most likely occurred in Galilee, and the sheer number of eyewitnesses, more than five hundred, should cause doubters to stop and think before dismissing the Resurrection accounts of a few followers. All these people saw him at one time, and at the time of Paul’s writing, most of them were still alive. Paul could appeal to their testimony to back up his own.

15:7 This James is Jesus’ brother (actually, half brother), who at first did not believe that Jesus was the Messiah (John 7:5). After seeing the resurrected Christ, he became a believer (as did Jesus’ other brothers, Acts 1:14). This next mention of all the apostles must describe an event separate from that recorded in 15:5, as well as designating the James mentioned here from the two apostles of that name.

15:8 One of the credentials to be an apostle was to have been an eyewitness of Jesus Christ. Paul could call himself an apostle (1:1) because he had also seen Jesus. This event is recorded in Acts 9:3-6. Paul’s opportunity to see Jesus Christ was a special case. The other apostles saw Christ before the Resurrection; they lived and traveled with him for nearly three years. Paul was not one of the original twelve apostles, yet Christ appeared to him.

15:9 As a zealous Pharisee, Paul had been an enemy of the Christian church—even to the point of capturing and persecuting believers (see Acts 9:1-3). Here Paul reminded the Corinthian believers of the magnificent grace of God in drawing sinners out of sin and into his Kingdom. By calling himself the least of the apostles, Paul was not putting himself down (see 2 Corinthians 11:5; Galatians 2:11). Instead, he realized that although all of the apostles had been drawn from sin, Paul had actively persecuted the church of God. He fully realized the depth of the error and sin from which he had been saved, so much so that he knew he was not worthy to be called an apostle. Only God's grace had handed him such a privilege and responsibility.

15:10-11 Neither Paul nor any of the apostles could take credit for achieving the position of apostle. They had all been called to that position. Only by God's special favor was Paul saved and enabled to serve. And Paul certainly did so! He wrote of having worked harder than all the other apostles. This was not an arrogant boast because he knew that his hard work was a result of God working through him. Because of his previous position as a Pharisee (Acts 23:6; Philippians 3:5) and his previous occupation of persecuting Christians, Paul's conversion made him the object of even greater persecution than the other apostles; thus he had to work harder to preach the same message. They all brought the same message and the apostles never strayed from that message. This is what they believed, so they must not stray from the message that had brought them salvation.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD / 15:12-34

Christians attempting to share their faith are often shocked by the world's denial of the possibility of the Resurrection. The gospel remains an irritating and upsetting challenge to the commonly held views of life and death. Christians are convinced that Jesus' Resurrection did happen, and that it changed everything. The Christian faith comes from Christ's experience, not people's individual feelings or desires. The conviction of the Resurrection gives believers hope for the future.

15:12 The gospel message the Corinthians had received and believed included the basic fact of the Resurrection—a fact central to the Christian faith. But apparently some were saying there will be no resurrection of the dead. Such a belief contradicted the entire gospel message. This may have come from the Greek view that matter was evil and, therefore, no physical body would rise. The church at Corinth was in the heart of Greek culture. Thus, many believers had a difficult time believing in a bodily resurrection. Paul wrote this part of his letter to clear up this confusion about the Resurrection.

15:13-14 Paul argued that if there is no resurrection of the dead, then Jesus is still in the grave. If Jesus is still in the grave, then the apostles' preaching is useless because they preached a risen Savior. If Christ has not been raised, the believers' faith is also useless. Why believe in a dead "Savior"? If Jesus is still dead, then his sacrifice did not appease God for believers' sin, and believers have no advocate with the Father (Hebrews 7:25; 8:1). They also have no Comforter in the Holy Spirit, for he was to come when Christ returned to glory (John 16:5, 13-15). They have no hope of eternal life, if not even their Savior gained eternal life.

15:15-16 If Christ has not been raised from the dead, the apostles would all be lying about God because they had said that God raised Christ from the grave. However, if resurrection is impossible, if there is no resurrection of the dead, then Christ has not been raised. This point is repeated from 15:13 to drive home the point. The Corinthians had to understand the logical implications of the position they had chosen. To no longer believe in the physical resurrection was to throw away the entire gospel message. They could not claim to be Christians without believing in the Resurrection.

15:17 Refusing to believe that Jesus rose from the grave means that Christians are still under condemnation for their sins. If Jesus died and was never raised, then his death did nothing to accomplish justification. God's raising him from the dead showed acceptance of Christ's sacrifice. If God left Jesus in the grave, then the sacrifice was not accepted and no one has received cleansing from sin. The condemnation for sin is death (Romans 6:23). To still be under condemnation means that all people will be given the ultimate penalty for their sins.

15:18-19 Christians carry with them, even through persecution and death, the promise of eternal life with God. Yet if Christ was never raised from the dead, and if there is no hope of resurrection, then all who have died believing in Christ have perished! Paul pointed out the silliness of the argument—if we have hope in Christ only for this life, we are the most miserable people in the world. If the only promise of the Christian faith applies to this life, then why believe in it? Why believe in a faith that brought—in this culture and even still in many places in the world—persecution, sorrow, death, ostracism, separation? Without the resurrection, there would be no hope for final judgment and justice or hope for a final dwelling place with God. If the end is the same for everyone, why not live like the pagans in sensual pleasure (15:32)?

15:20 However, the above argument is moot because the fact is that Christ has been raised from the dead. The hypothetical “if” statements in the previous verses concede to the certain facts of history. Christians may indeed face difficulty, but the fact of the Resurrection changes everything. Because Christ was raised from the dead, he has become the first of a great harvest of those who will be raised to life again. Christ was the first to be raised to never die again. He is the forerunner for those who believe in him, the proof of their eventual resurrection to eternal life.

15:21-22 Death came into the world as a consequence of the sin of one man, Adam (Genesis 3:17-19). Adam sinned against God and brought alienation from God and death to all humanity. All human beings are related to Adam and have two characteristics in common: they are sinners; and they will die. Adam's sin brought condemnation and death to all; Christ's sinless sacrifice and resurrection brought resurrection from the dead to all who are related to Christ through accepting his sacrifice on their behalf. Those who believe in him will be given new life.

15:23 Paul wanted to clarify, however, that there is an order to this resurrection. It had not already happened, as perhaps some of the false teachers were claiming. Rather, Christ was raised first. The "harvest" will be taken in when Christ comes back at his second coming. At that time, his people, those who believed in him as Savior, will be raised from death to eternal life.

15:24-25 At the time of Christ's second coming, the end will come, and the resurrected Christ will conquer all evil, including death. (See Revelation 20:14 for words about the final destruction of death.) At Christ's resurrection, Christ began the destruction of Satan and all his dominion. At the resurrection of the dead, all Satan's power will be broken. Christ must reign because God has ordained it so; what God has said cannot be changed. Christ will reign as the ultimate ruler, having put all his enemies beneath his feet. This phrase is used in the Old Testament to refer to total conquest (see Psalm 110:1). Because the resurrection of Christ is an accomplished fact and because the promise of the resurrection is a future fact, the promise of Christ's ultimate and final reign can be trusted as fact and anticipated by every believer.

15:26 Death is every living being's enemy, the common fate of all humanity. Death is the last enemy that always wins. But Christ will destroy death! At the Cross and through the Resurrection, Christ has already defeated death. Yet people still die. For those who believe in Christ, however, death is merely a doorway into eternal life.

15:27 As noted in 15:24-25, the one ultimately in charge is God the Father. This verse sounds very much like Psalm 8:6, “God has given him authority over all things.” God gave the Son supreme authority over everything, except God himself.

15:28 When the Son has toppled all evil powers and when God has placed everything under the Son’s feet, the Son will present himself to God. “God” here refers to “God the Father.” No one can take God’s place, not even the Son. This must happen so that God will be utterly supreme over everything everywhere. Some have used this verse to attempt to prove the inferiority of Christ (that he was not equal with God). But this verse is not about the person, nature, or being of God (his essence) as it relates to Christ. Instead, this verse is speaking of the work or mission of Christ, whereby he willingly obeyed the Father by subjecting the government of the world first to himself, then symbolically and willingly placing it under God’s control. In these words, Paul was not attempting to take the three persons of the Trinity and decide their relative importance. Their essential nature is always one and the same; however, the authority rests through the work each has accomplished. God sent the Son; the Son will finish the work and then will turn redeemed humanity back over to God.

15:29 To further emphasize his point about the fact of the resurrection, Paul returned to his conditional “if” clauses. If the dead will not be raised, then what point is there in people being baptized for those who are dead? Apparently, some believers had been baptized on behalf of others who had died unbaptized. Nothing more is known about this practice, but it obviously affirms a belief in resurrection. Corinthian believers may have been practicing a sort of vicarious baptism for the sake of believers who had died before being baptized. The “dead” certainly referred to those who had come to faith, not to unbelievers who had died, or Paul would have condemned the practice. Paul was not promoting baptism for the dead; he was continuing to illustrate his argument that the resurrection is a reality. Paul’s apparent lack of concern over this situation probably means that the practice was basically harmless. Paul could have written disapprovingly of this practice, but pointing out the glaring inconsistency of their rejecting the afterlife while baptizing for the dead was sufficient. Paul had deeper theological issues to straighten out—at this point, the fact of the resurrection. If there is a resurrection, then all believers will be raised (and all who truly believed will be saved whether they have been baptized or not). If there is no resurrection, however, as some had contended, then why bother with this ritual?

15:30-31 If there is no resurrection, why should the apostles risk their lives, facing death for the sake of the gospel message. Why would any sane person do this for the sake of a gospel that only ends in death, just like anything else? This constant danger is as certain as Paul's pride in what Christ had done for the Corinthians. Despite all that Paul had to correct and rebuke in them, he genuinely loved the Corinthian believers and boasted of their faith.

15:32 The human enemies that Paul had faced in Ephesus had been as vicious as wild beasts (see Acts 19). If there will be no resurrection from the dead, then what value was there in standing up for his faith against those in Ephesus who wanted to kill him (Acts 19:31)? Why bother standing for anything at all? If there is nothing more to look forward to than simply to one day die and return to dust, then why deny oneself? Instead, it would make far more sense for everyone to feast and get drunk (see also Isaiah 22:13). Life with no meaning leaves one with the need to simply indulge oneself and get all one can for enjoyment here and now.

15:33 Those who denied the resurrection could not possibly be true believers, for this entire chapter explains why the resurrection is central to the Christian faith. Paul told the Corinthian believers not to be fooled by those who denied the resurrection. The quote is from a proverb in a comedy by the Greek playwright Menander, titled Thais; it was used by Paul to make a point to his Greek audience. The bit of worldly wisdom, “bad company corrupts good character,” means that keeping company with those who deny the resurrection will corrupt true believers and hurt the testimony of the church.

15:34 Paul's final words about this issue were simply that the Corinthians should come to their senses. To deny the resurrection amounted to sinning, for it denied the truth of the claims of Christ and the promises of God. It was to their shame that some among them did not even know God. To not understand and believe the doctrine of the resurrection meant to not understand anything about God, for the doctrine is central to all that God has done for sinful humanity.

THE RESURRECTION BODY / 15:35-58

Our present bodies have been wonderfully designed for life in this world, but they are perishable and prone to decay. In a sense, each person lives as a prototype of his or her final body version. Our resurrection bodies will be transformed versions of our present bodies. Our spiritual bodies will not be weak, will never get sick, and will never die. The very possibilities inspire anticipation, excitement, and praise to the God who can do all things!

15:35-37 Paul had already argued for the truth of the resurrection. Those who might still be skeptical may have further questions about this resurrection, so Paul asked two such questions himself in order to answer them: (1) How will the dead be raised? (2) What kind of bodies will they have? To Paul, these were foolish questions. The answers should have been obvious from nature itself. Paul compared the resurrection of believers' bodies with the growth in a garden. A seed placed into the ground doesn't grow into a plant unless it dies first. The plant that grows looks very different from the seed because God gives it a new "body." New bodies will not be obtained until the earthly bodies have died. And those new bodies will be different from the present bodies.

15:38-39 There are different kinds of bodies—for people, animals, fish, birds. Paul was preparing the foundation for his point that bodies before the resurrection can be different from bodies after the resurrection.

15:40-41 Furthermore, the heavenly bodies (the sun, moon, and stars) differ greatly from earthly bodies. Each kind of body has its own kind of substance created and controlled by God. Each is appropriate to its sphere of existence, and each has its own kind of glory or radiance. God made many different types of bodies; certainly he can arrange and govern the existence of the resurrection body.

15:42-44 Like a seed that is sown and then grows into a glorious new plant, it is the same way for the resurrection of the dead. Believers' present physical bodies will be different from their resurrection bodies. First, earthly bodies die and decay, but resurrected bodies will never die. Death eventually takes everyone. Those raised with Christ, however, will have bodies that will live forever. Physical bodies disappoint us, but resurrection bodies will be full of glory. Physical bodies are weak but resurrection bodies will be full of power. Physical bodies are natural and human, but resurrected bodies will be spiritual.

The "natural" body is suited to life in the present world; however, such a body is not fit for the world to come. That future world, where Christ will reign in his Kingdom, will require a "spiritual" body. Paul did not mean that this will be "spiritual" as opposed to physical or material, for that would contradict all that Paul has just written about resurrected bodies. Believers will not become "spirits." Instead, "spiritual" refers to a body that suits a new, spiritual life.

15:45 Paul quoted the Scriptures to point out the difference between these two kinds of bodies. Genesis 2:7 speaks of the first man, Adam, becoming a living person. Adam was made from the dust of the ground and given the breath of life from God. Every human being since that time shares the same characteristics. However, the last Adam, Christ, is a life-giving Spirit. Just as Adam was the first of the human race, so Christ is the first of those who will be raised from the dead to eternal life.

15:46-47 People have natural life first; that is, they are born into this earth and live here. Only from there do they then obtain spiritual life. Paul may have been contradicting a particular false teaching by this statement. He illustrated this point by continuing that Adam, the first man, was made from the dust of the earth, while Christ, the second man, came from heaven. Christ came as a human baby with a body like all other humans, but he did not originate from the dust of the earth as had Adam. He “came from heaven.”

15:48-49 Because all humanity is bound up with Adam, so every human being has an earthly body just like Adam’s. Earthly bodies are fitted for life on this earth, yet they have the characteristics of being limited by death, disease, and weakness (15:42-44). Believers can know with certainty, however, that their heavenly bodies will be just like Christ’s—imperishable, eternal, glorious, and filled with power (15:42-44). At this time, all are like Adam; one day, all believers will be like Christ (Philippians 3:21; 1 John 3:2).

15:50 The resurrected bodies have to be different from these present, physical bodies because flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. These bodies cannot go into God’s eternal Kingdom because these present bodies were not made to live forever—otherwise they would. So God has prepared new bodies that will live forever. The resurrection is a fact; new bodies ready for life in eternity is also a fact.

15:51-52 With great emphasis Paul passed on to these Corinthians a secret—knowledge given to him by divine revelation from Christ. The phrase not all of us will die means that some Christians will still be alive at the time of Christ’s return. They will not have to die before they get their new resurrection bodies. (For further discussion of these new bodies, see 2 Corinthians 5:1-10.) Instead, they will all be transformed, immediately (see 1 Thessalonians 4:13-18). A trumpet blast will usher in the new heaven and earth. Christ will return, the dead will be raised out of the graves with transformed bodies. Those still alive will be transformed, also receiving their new bodies. This change will happen instantly for all Christians, whether they are dead or alive. All will be made ready to go with Christ.

15:53 Because “flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God” (15:50), and because Christians are promised eternal life in God’s Kingdom, then their present perishable earthly bodies must be transformed into heavenly bodies that will never die. Each person will still be recognizable, will still be the person God created him or her to be, but each will be made perfect with a body that will be able to live forever in the Kingdom.

15:54-55 The ultimate enemy of every human body is death. For those who have no hope in Christ, death is the end of everything. Christians have been given an entirely different perspective. For believers, death is not the end; it is merely a doorway into eternal life. Most Christians will experience death; some who are alive at the time of Christ’s return will not themselves face death but will have known plenty who did. But when our perishable earthly bodies have been transformed into heavenly bodies that will never die, then the final victory over death will have been accomplished. Death was defeated at the resurrection of Christ, but total victory over death will not be accomplished until human beings—made from the dust of the earth, just like Adam—are given bodies that defy death. When this happens, the Scriptures will come true. Paul quoted from Isaiah 25:8 and Hosea 13:14—God’s promises that one day death itself will no longer carry victory or sting because death will be no more (Revelation 21–22).

15:56-57 If it were not for sin, then there would be no sting that results in death. If it were not for the law, then sin would have no power. But the law declares sin, and the wages of sin is death (see Romans 6:23; 7:7-20). Because the law set standards that cannot be reached, all people are condemned as sinners. For those who have not had their sins pardoned at the cross of Christ, death is not a passage to eternal life but an enemy with a terrible “sting.” It is not annihilation or nothingness, it is the doorway to judgment. But those who have come to Christ as Savior have been given victory over sin and death.

15:58 Because of these promises—of future resurrection, of living eternally in the Kingdom, of preparation for that Kingdom with new bodies that will be fashioned by God himself—believers have motivation and responsibilities for life now lived in their perishable bodies. The time on earth is valuable—we have much work to do for the Kingdom. Others must be invited to join; believers must be taught to grow in the Lord. Nothing done for the Lord is ever useless. So believers should be strong in their faith, not wavering or doubting; they should be steady, not listening to the whims of false teachers; and always enthusiastic about the Lord's work, serving him to the utmost, knowing that great reward awaits.

1 CORINTHIANS 16

THE COLLECTION FOR JERUSALEM / 16:1-4

Paul had just said that no good deed is ever in vain (15:58). In this chapter, he mentions some practical deeds that have value for all Christians. The Corinthians had been asked to join with Christians in other areas to support the church in Jerusalem. Paul could hardly have found a more practical example of the unity of the body of Christ (12:12-13) than in his desire that all the churches give to help a suffering body of believers.

16:1 The words now about indicate that this was another topic about which the Corinthians had asked (see also 7:1; 8:1; 12:1). Paul must have spoken or written to them earlier about this, so that they knew they would be giving and to whom. Their questions apparently focused on how to go about collecting the money for the Christians in Jerusalem.

The Christians in Jerusalem were suffering from poverty. While the reason is unknown, it may have had to do with a famine, such as the one mentioned in Acts 11:28-29 when the believers in Antioch had sent help to the church in Jerusalem. That collection had been carried by Paul himself and Barnabas (Acts 11:30). Apparently, the Jerusalem church was still suffering, so Paul continued to collect money from other churches to send to Jerusalem (see Romans 15:25-31; 2 Corinthians 8:4; 9:1-15). Paul advised the Corinthian believers to follow the same procedures that he had given to the churches in Galatia. This collection was a widespread effort involving many of the churches.

16:2 The first procedure that the Corinthian believers should implement right away was to ask each person (or family) to put aside some amount of money. This was to be done on every Lord's Day. Some have suggested that this offering was to be kept at home, but Paul's mention of setting it aside on Sunday (the day when the believers met together for worship—see Acts 20:7) probably means that the believers were to bring the amount that had been set aside that week and place it in a special offering at church. That offering, in turn, would be held until Paul's arrival. Paul stipulated that everyone must give (each of you); no one was exempt. But he did not stipulate how much everyone should give; instead, each should give in relation to what he or she had earned. By implementing this plan, the money would be ready and waiting whenever Paul arrived (which at this point was still an uncertain date), and they would not have to try to collect it all at once.

16:3-4 To further distance himself from the offering, Paul suggested that the Corinthian church choose their own messengers to deliver the gift to Jerusalem. These men are listed in Acts 20:4. Paul would write letters of recommendation for those messengers, so that when they arrived at the Jerusalem church their mission would be heralded by Paul himself and the church could readily welcome them. Paul might end up traveling with them if it seemed appropriate.

PAUL'S FINAL INSTRUCTIONS / 16:5-18

As the Corinthians awaited Paul's next visit, they were directed to be on their guard against spiritual dangers, stand firm in the faith, behave courageously, be strong, and do everything with kindness and in love. This list could be called a Christian's job description. Today, as believers await the return of Christ, they should follow the same instructions.

16:5-7 Paul was writing this letter near the end of his three-year ministry in Ephesus. It may have been tempting for Paul to take the next ship across the Aegean Sea from Ephesus to Corinth in order to deal with the problems and squelch those who said he was avoiding them (4:18); however, Paul explained that he would indeed visit with them after passing through Macedonia (see Acts 20:1-2). In the meantime, he would send Timothy (4:17; 16:10) and Titus (2 Corinthians 7:13). But when he did arrive, he would stay with them for a time, perhaps even spending the entire winter there. These were not the words of a man afraid to deal with the problems in Corinth. He would stay awhile if the Lord permitted it. Paul made plans, but he always knew that at any moment God could intervene and make changes. Paul would go wherever God sent him (16:6).

16:8-9 Paul was writing from Ephesus and wanted to stay there until Pentecost. That meant that Paul was planning to stay well into the spring in Ephesus, travel through the summer in Macedonia (16:5), and then spend the winter in Corinth (16:6). Paul wanted to go to Corinth, but he had pressing work in Ephesus and knew that he needed to be there to take advantage of a wide-open door for a great work there. Oddly enough, Paul also wanted to stay in Ephesus because of many who were opposing him. Who these were is unknown, although Acts 19 gives a clear picture of the opposition he faced in Ephesus. Paul was not afraid of the opposition; instead, because God had opened the door, Paul would stay to complete the ministry God had given.

16:10-11 As Paul was writing, Timothy (and another believer named Erastus) were traveling ahead of him through Macedonia (Acts 19:22). Paul expected Timothy to also arrive ahead of him at Corinth (4:17). Paul respected Timothy and had worked closely with him (Acts 16:1-3; Philippians 2:22; 1 Timothy 1:2). Although Timothy was young, Paul encouraged the Corinthian church to welcome him because he was doing the Lord's work. With all the problems that had been brewing in the Corinthian church, Paul wanted to make sure that young Timothy would be treated with respect. Paul stated that Timothy should be accepted by the churches in the same way that they would accept Paul himself. After Timothy stayed among the Corinthians for a while, they should send him back to Paul along with the other brothers. The identity of these men is unknown, although one of them may have been Erastus, who had been sent along with Timothy on this particular trip (Acts 19:22). Paul knew of the tensions in the church and had sent Timothy to remind the church of his instructions in case any animosity toward him would spill over to Timothy. Paul did not want Timothy to be mistreated.

16:12 Another question posed by the Corinthians had to do with Apollos. Perhaps they wondered about Apollos and wanted him to come and visit. He had preached in Corinth, was doing evangelistic work in Greece (Acts 18:24-28). He was not willing to go to Corinth right away, but he would do so when he had the chance. Perhaps Apollos's reluctance had to do with the factions in the Corinthian church (1:12; 3:4-5) and a desire not to make the problem any worse. Paul could "send" Timothy, but he could only urge Apollos, who apparently worked independently of Paul although preaching the same message (3:5-6; 4:1).

16:13-14 Paul's final words to the church in Corinth sum up what he has written in this letter.

- They were to be on guard, constantly watchful for spiritual enemies that might slip in and threaten to destroy them, whether it be divisions (1:10-17; 11:18), pride (3:18-21), sin (5:1-8), disorder (14:40), or erroneous theology (15:12).
- They needed to stand true to what they believed—the gospel that had brought them salvation (15:1-2).
- They had to be courageous so that they could stand against false teachers, deal with sin in the congregation, and straighten out the problems that Paul had addressed in this letter.
- They should be strong with the strength given by the Holy Spirit.
- They should do everything with love (13:1-13), because without love, they would be no more than prideful noisemakers.

16:15-16 Stephanas and his household were mentioned in 1:16 as people whom Paul had baptized. Paul held them up as an example of Christian living. Exactly what they were doing is unknown, but Paul made it clear that they were spending their lives in service to other Christians. These people were examples to the rest of the believers in Corinth, exhibiting practical Christian faith.

16:17-18 Stephanas himself had come to Ephesus to see Paul, along with two other men, Fortunatus and Achaicus, who are mentioned only here. These men may have delivered the letter that contained all the questions that Paul had been answering (see 7:1). These words give a glimpse into Paul's genuine joy at being able to commune with other believers. These men were a wonderful encouragement to Paul as representatives of the larger congregation. Paul wanted them to be treated with proper honor as well. They had taken time to serve the church by finding Paul and getting the answers to questions so that the church could deal with some difficulties. These men's concern for the church in Corinth was honorable indeed.

PAUL'S FINAL GREETINGS / 16:19-24

As Paul had traveled across the Roman Empire, he started churches in many cities. Although far apart geographically, the churches were united in their relationship to Jesus Christ, and Paul emphasized this unity each time he would send greetings from one church to another.

16:19 The phrase the churches here in the province of Asia would have referred to the Roman province of Asia located in what is now part of Turkey. There were churches in Ephesus (Ephesians 1:1), Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Colossians 1:2; 4:13, 16).

Paul also sent greetings from Aquila and Priscilla. The church in Corinth would have known this married couple, for they had lived in Corinth. Both were tentmakers (or leatherworkers) whom Paul had met during his stay in Corinth (Acts 18:1-3). Aquila and Priscilla had followed Paul to Ephesus and had lived there with him, helping to teach others about Jesus. They even risked their lives for Paul, although the exact event is unknown (Romans 16:3-5). The great preacher Apollos, whom so many of the Corinthian believers admired, had been taught the Christian faith by this couple (Acts 18:26). Apparently, Aquila and Priscilla had opened their home for church meetings.

16:20 Finally, Paul sent greetings from all the other believers. To greet each other in Christian love was encouraged by Paul to help break down the divisions in this church.

16:21 Usually Paul would dictate his letters to a scribe, and often he would end with a short note in his own handwriting (see also Galatians 6:11; Colossians 4:18; 2 Thessalonians 3:17; Philemon 1:19). This is similar to adding a handwritten postscript (PS) to a typewritten letter. It assured the recipients that false teachers were not writing letters in Paul's name (as apparently had been a problem—see 2 Thessalonians 2:2; 3:17). It also gave the letters a personal touch.

16:22 Paul had addressed many problems in this letter, hoping to help the believers straighten out their attitudes and actions and then to bring them back in line with the truth. Some of the problems existed because of pretenders in the church, people who did not love the Lord. Paul's final word for such people is that they be cursed. The word means to be placed under God's wrath (see also commentary on 12:3). These words were written in Paul's own handwriting (16:21), adding emphasis to these serious words toward any who would attempt to hurt the church of God.

As always, Paul's focus was on the coming Kingdom, so he added the Aramaic word maranatha (translated for modern readers as "Our Lord, come!"). Paul never wanted believers to forget that this was what they were looking forward to and working toward.

16:23-24 As Paul began this letter (1:3), so he ended it. Paul's final prayer was for the grace of the Lord Jesus to remain with them. Paul often ended his letters this way, asking his readers to continue to experience God's undeserved kindness and love every day of their lives and then to pass along that grace to others.

Although this had been a difficult letter to write, with many issues to be handled and sins to be corrected, Paul closed by reaffirming his love for these believers in Christ Jesus. Through Christ alone they had all been saved from the darkness and brought into the light; through him alone they had been joined together in his service. Paul loved these believers, cared for them, prayed for them, and longed to see them.

2 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

Educational background, personal experience, completed projects, satisfied customers, special qualifications—people list a variety of credentials to prove their competency and reliability. Credentials are important. Before hiring a plumber or entrusting your life to a surgeon, you want to make sure the crucial person is well qualified. Not to do so would be foolish or irresponsible. But credentials can seem superfluous, especially in a close relationship. You probably wouldn't ask a friend for proof of his reliability, nor would you ask a relative for references. You know the person well, and that's good enough.

It comes as a surprise, then, to find Paul presenting his credentials to the believers at Corinth. He had lived among them, had led many of them to Christ, and had established the church in that important Greek city. But false teachers had infiltrated the church and were trying to undermine his authority. They questioned his apostleship and veracity, especially considering the harsh words of his previous correspondence.

So Paul reiterated his qualifications, refuting phony preachers (2:17), false teachers (3:1), and false apostles (11:5, 13) in the process. This was awkward for Paul, but it was necessary to regain the Corinthians. Paul cared for the church, and he knew it was vital that they follow his Spirit-led instructions.

Second Corinthians reveals the heart of a concerned pastor. Paul had heard of the Corinthians' problems. They had even sent him a delegation with questions about church order. With concern similar to a father who is sending his son to college for the first time, Paul wrote a long letter that he hoped would put the Corinthian church on track. He had invested so much of himself into them that he couldn't bear to see the church disintegrate over petty matters and lax discipline.

As you read 2 Corinthians, consider what you would say to counteract the lies of false teachers today, using the power and authority of this inspired letter and the rest of God's word.

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): Pharisee, apostle, pioneer missionary of the church.

Second Corinthians is, for the most part, an autobiographical letter. In it, Paul described to the Corinthians the details of his recent missionary trip. The letter includes intriguing specifics about Paul's life, such as the time he faced his imminent death in Asia Minor (1:8-10) and his irritating “thorn in the flesh” (12:7). These explicit details substantiate the fact that Paul wrote 2 Corinthians, for no other person could provide such an intimate portrait. Furthermore, in 2 Corinthians, Paul made the concept of God’s grace central (God’s grace in Paul’s preaching—1:12; God’s grace to the Corinthians—9:8, 14; God’s grace in Paul’s weakness—12:9) as he did in his other well-known letters (see, for example, Galatians 1:6). For these reasons, no one has effectively challenged Paul’s authorship of 2 Corinthians.

Although Paul’s authorship has gone unchallenged, scholars have debated whether 2 Corinthians is actually one letter. Because of the fluctuations in tone and word choice, some Bible commentators have asserted that 2 Corinthians is actually two, three, or even four letters placed together by an editor. In their zeal to divide 2 Corinthians, these scholars have overlooked the overall consistency of the letter. As just mentioned, grace remains a central theme of the letter. Furthermore, there is a focus throughout on Paul’s authority to preach the gospel (for example, 1:3-23; 2:14-17; 10:1-18) and his sufferings for the cause of Christ (for example, 6:3-13; 11:16-33). The obvious changes in tone in 2 Corinthians can be explained without suggesting that the book is actually a series of letters. For instance, a change in tone could reflect a lengthy pause in Paul’s writing, at which time he received additional information on the state of the Corinthian church.

Second Corinthians can be viewed as a single, unified letter written by Paul to a troubled and divided church. The church at Corinth needed both encouragement to continue doing what was right and exhortation to discipline those who were still misleading people in the congregation. Second Corinthians is a passionate letter from a pastor who was extremely concerned about his congregation. Paul rejoiced in the triumphs of his congregation, but he expressed sorrow over the problems that persistently plagued them.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from Macedonia around A.D. 55–57.

In this letter, Paul repeatedly stated that he was writing from Macedonia (7:5; 8:1; 9:2). The exact city is unknown, but the subscriptions on some manuscripts of 2 Corinthians read “written from Philippi.” (The subscriptions were comments inserted at the conclusion of ancient letters.) There is no way to verify whether Paul was actually at Philippi, however; and this location has been questioned by a number of scholars.

What is known for certain is that Paul was in Macedonia. This region—along with Corinth in Greece—was evangelized on Paul’s second missionary trip. Congregations were established in Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens. On his third missionary journey, Paul stayed in Ephesus for over two years. During that time he wrote 1 Corinthians. After the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:21-41), Paul traveled through Asia Minor and into Macedonia, encouraging the congregations he had established on his second missionary journey. In Macedonia, Paul experienced severe persecution, the type of hardship the churches in that region were already experiencing (see 2 Thessalonians 1:3-12 for Paul’s earlier encouragement of a Macedonian church to stand firm in the faith in the face of persecution). In Macedonia, however, Paul’s thoughts were not only on the horrible conditions there (see 1:8-9; 7:5) but on the spiritual battles the Christians at Corinth were fighting. Titus, Paul’s assistant, was supposed to meet him in Troas with the news from Corinth. Somewhere in Macedonia, they got together. There Titus delivered a mixed report. The church in Corinth had obeyed Paul’s earlier directives to discipline some of its members, but at the same time some were questioning his authority (by delaying his visit, 1:12-24, and by not confronting them in person, 10:1).

Thus, in Macedonia—in the middle of troubles and difficulties—Paul wrote this letter to the divided congregation at Corinth. He praised the believers for their obedience, but he also reasserted his authority to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. Paul warned them that he was on his way to Corinth. Then he sent Titus ahead with the letter to prepare the congregation for his visit (8:16; 13:1-3). When Paul finally did make it to Corinth, he stayed in that region for three months (see Acts 20:1-3).

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

To affirm Paul’s ministry, defend his authority as an apostle, and refute the false teachers in Corinth.

Every letter has a context. A mother in her letter to a daughter may allude to the girlfriend they were discussing in the previous letter. The same is true for letters preserved in the Bible. Second Corinthians is no exception. To understand 2 Corinthians, it is useful to understand the long and complicated relationship between Paul and Corinth, a relationship that has taken some time for scholars to unravel. In fact, some of the details surrounding Paul’s painful visit (2:1) and his severe letter to the Corinthians (2:1-4; 7:8) are still debated by scholars. It is possible, however, to sketch an outline of Paul's difficult relationship with the Corinthians.

1. Evangelizing Corinth. On Paul's second missionary journey, Paul traveled into what is known today as Greece. After a cold reception by the philosophers and thinkers who gathered in Athens, Paul went on to Corinth (Acts 18). Initially, Paul worked with Aquila and Priscilla as a tentmaker. But eventually he received enough financial support from Macedonian Christians to preach the gospel full-time. After being rejected by many of the Jews, Paul focused his missionary work on the Gentiles and stayed with the Gentile God-fearer Titius Justus. In a vision one night, God encouraged Paul to keep on preaching in Corinth (Acts 18:9-11), so he stayed for a year and a half (A.D. 50–52).

2. Paul's stay at Ephesus. Around A.D. 52, Paul left Corinth to report back to his home church in Antioch and the elders in Jerusalem (Acts 18:18-22). On his next missionary journey, Paul made his headquarters at Ephesus, at the lecture hall of Tyrannus (Acts 19:8-10). There, he preached for a little over two years. Evidently, he sent many of his students to the surrounding region, for Luke reported in Acts "that people throughout the province of Asia—both Jews and Greeks—heard the Lord's message" (Acts 19:10). It was at Ephesus that Paul wrote several letters to the Corinthians.

3. The first letter to the Corinthians. Around this time, Paul wrote his first letter to the Corinthians. This is the letter to which Paul alluded in 1 Corinthians 5:9. Evidently the letter warned the Corinthians not to associate with those who called themselves Christians and yet persistently participated in sexual immorality (1 Corinthians 5:9-13). Although some scholars consider 6:14–7:1 to be a fragment of that letter, most believe that this letter was not preserved.

4. The second letter to the Corinthians. Toward the end of his stay at Ephesus (around A.D. 54–55), Paul wrote his second letter to the Corinthians, known today as 2 Corinthians. Earlier Paul had received a letter from the Corinthian church delivered by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1 Corinthians 16:17). This letter had been filled with questions about church order. In 2 Corinthians, Paul answered these questions. The questions involved Christian marriage (2 Corinthians 7:1), food sacrificed to idols (2 Corinthians 8:1), spiritual gifts (2 Corinthians 12:1), and the collection of money for the relief of Christians in Jerusalem (2 Corinthians 16:1). In addition to these questions, Paul addressed a number of concerns arising from the unofficial report from Chloe's household. In particular, he was concerned with the reports of incest (2 Corinthians 5:1), lawsuits between members of the church (2 Corinthians 6:1), and drunkenness, gluttony, and arguments at the Lord's Supper (1 Corinthians 11:17-22).

5. Paul's painful visit. Shortly after sending 1 Corinthians, Paul most likely visited Corinth himself. The situation with the church concerned him so much that he traveled there to rectify the problems that had emerged. According to what can be gathered from 2 Corinthians, Paul's authority was challenged by a particular church member (perhaps leading others) during this visit. In response, Paul warned the church to discipline its immoral members before he had to do it himself (see 2:1; 12:14, 21; 13:1-4).

6. The severe letter to the Corinthians. After this painful visit, Paul wrote a "severe letter" to the Corinthians, evidently encouraging the Corinthians to discipline their errant member and/or members (see 2:1-4; 7:8). Most Bible commentators consider this letter to be Paul's third letter to the Corinthians, which is now lost. It has become generally accepted that 1 Corinthians was not the "severe letter," primarily because 1 Corinthians as a whole does not reflect the extreme sorrow that Paul described as being behind his severe letter.

7. The fourth letter to Corinthians. In A.D. 55, Paul left Ephesus for an evangelism trip to Troas (Acts 20:1-6). Evidently, he was supposed to meet Titus there in order to receive a report on the Corinthian church. Although there were some promising opportunities to share the gospel in Troas, Paul went on to Macedonia to find Titus because of his concern about the spiritual condition of the Corinthians (2:12-13). He met Titus somewhere in Macedonia and heard the good news that the Corinthians had disciplined the offender just as Paul had instructed (2:5-11; 7:2-16). Titus gave Paul a report that was, on the whole, encouraging (2:14; 7:5-7). However, other problems were surfacing in Corinth. Many were grumbling about Paul—the fickleness of his travel plans (1:12–2:4) and whether he truly possessed the authority of an apostle (3:1-18).

Paul wrote his fourth letter, 2 Corinthians, to encourage the Corinthians in their obedience (7:8-15), to defend his own authority (10:1-18), and to refute the false teachers that were still among them (11:1-15). In this letter, he revealed his earnest concern for the Corinthians. False teachers were trying to steal them away from Christ's teaching and from Paul himself. With a passion unmatched in any of his other letters, Paul revealed his entire life to the Corinthians. Even though he was reluctant to do so, he paraded his suffering for the cause of Christ as his official credential as Christ's ambassador to them (6:3-13). Would the Corinthians open their hearts to him, the person who had told them about Christ in the beginning? That was Paul's fervent plea (6:13). If they didn't remedy the problems in their church, Paul warned that he would come to do so himself (13:1-10). But his wish was to build them up in Christ instead.

MESSAGE

MESSAGE

Second Corinthians begins with Paul reminding his readers of (1) his relationship to them—Paul had always been honest and straightforward with them (1:12-14), (2) his itinerary—he was planning to visit them again (1:15–2:3), and (3) his previous letter (2:4-11). Paul then moves directly to the subject of false teachers (2:17), and he reviews his ministry among the Corinthians to demonstrate the validity of his message and to urge them not to turn away from the truth (3:1–7:16). Paul then turns to the issue of collecting money for the poor Christians in Jerusalem. He tells them how others have given, and he urges them to show their love in a tangible way (8:1–9:15). Paul then gives a strong defense of his authority as a genuine apostle while pointing out the deceptive influence of the false apostles (10:1–13:10).

The main themes in the book of 2 Corinthians include: Trials, Church Discipline, Hope, Giving, and Sound Doctrine.

Trials (1:3-11; 2:1-11; 6:1-13; 12:1-10). Paul experienced great suffering, persecution, and opposition in his ministry. He even struggled with a personal weakness—a “thorn in the flesh.” Through it all, Paul affirmed God’s faithfulness. Despite the pain, he trusted in his loving Father and stayed true to his call.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. God is faithful. His strength is sufficient for any trial. When trials come, they keep us from pride and teach us dependence on God. He comforts us so we can comfort others. When persecuted or pressured, it is easy to lose heart or to doubt. When struggling with pain, it is easy to question God’s goodness. Like Paul, however, we must focus on God’s faithfulness and love and then persevere. Regardless of what you are going through, God is with you. Keep focused on him and his love.

Church discipline (2:1-17; 5:11-21; 7:2-16; 10:1-18; 11:1-33; 12:1-21; 13:1-4). Paul defended his role in church discipline. And because of mounting opposition to his leadership, Paul presented his credentials as an apostle of Christ. Neither immorality nor false teaching could be ignored, so Paul hit the issues head-on. The church was to be neither lax nor too severe in administering discipline. The church was to restore the corrected person when he or she repented.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. The goal of all discipline in the church should be correction, not vengeance. For churches to be effective, they must confront and solve problems, not ignore them. In everything, we must act in love. We must also beware of those who would rationalize sinful behavior or unjustly criticize spiritual leaders. We must clearly present God’s word, live by it personally, and hold the church to it corporately. If you are a church leader, don’t neglect church discipline, but do so with care. Also, submit yourself to the discipline of your church.

Hope (3:7-18; 4:1-18; 5:1-10). To encourage the Corinthians as they faced trials, Paul reminded them that they would receive new bodies in heaven. This would be a great victory in contrast to their present suffering. This world is not the final home of the believer. What a profound and life-changing truth.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. To know we will receive new bodies offers us hope. No matter what adversity we face, we can keep going. Our faithful service will result in triumph. We must also resist becoming too tied to this world and its values. Hope can be found only in Christ. That's our salvation and our message. Find your hope in Christ. In him and him alone is life.

Giving (8:1-24; 9:1-15). Paul organized a collection of funds for the poor in the Jerusalem church. Many of the Asian churches gave money. Paul explained and defended his beliefs about giving. And Paul was not shy about asking for money, as he urged the Corinthians to give generously and follow through on their previous commitment.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. God's work should be supported by his people. In addition, believers should take the lead in helping the needy, feeding the hungry, and curing the sick. Like the Corinthians, we should follow through on our financial commitments. Our giving should be generous, sacrificial, according to a plan, and based on need. Our generosity not only helps those in need but enables them to thank God. Give generously to support your local church and God's work all over the world. And look for ways to reach out to needy folks in your community.

Sound Doctrine (6:14-18; 7:1; 13:5-14). False teachers were challenging Paul's ministry and authority as an apostle. So Paul listed his credentials and asserted his authority in order to preserve correct Christian doctrine. His sincerity, his love for Christ, and his concern for the people were his defense.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. We should share Paul's concern for correct teaching in our churches. But in so doing, we must share his motivation—love for Christ and people. For us, sound doctrine begins with a study of the Bible, God's word.

2 CORINTHIANS 1:1–2:4

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-2

This letter was probably one of the more difficult letters for Paul to write. Although Paul wanted to rejoice with the Corinthians in their spiritual growth, he didn't shrink from asserting his authority and disciplining those who needed it.

1:1 It was appropriate for Paul to mention his apostleship here, for his authority is a major theme of this letter. A group of false apostles (11:13) had infiltrated the Corinthian church. This distressed Paul greatly because he had founded the church himself on his second missionary journey. To gain a foothold in Corinth, these false apostles had systematically discredited Paul's missionary work. Paul wrote 2 Corinthians to defend his apostolic authority and to refute the false teachers and their accusations.

An apostle was “sent forth” by Christ Jesus with the mission to make disciples in his name (Matthew 28:18-20). The disciples—the Twelve who followed Jesus during his earthly ministry, learning from him and witnessing his miracles—became the apostles. Yet Paul was also included among the apostles because he had been appointed by God to preach the Good News to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15). This call gave Paul the authority to establish churches throughout the known Mediterranean world and to teach the believers who gathered in these churches. Paul's apostleship was confirmed by the apostles in Jerusalem (Acts 9:28), and his message was confirmed at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:1-21).

Timothy was Paul's assistant. He had grown up in Lystra, a city in the province of Galatia. Paul had visited Galatia on his first missionary journey (Acts 14:8-21). During that trip, he most likely met Timothy's mother, Eunice, and his grandmother, Lois (2 Timothy 1:5). On his second visit to Lystra, Paul asked young Timothy to travel with him (Acts 16:1-5).

In 1 Corinthians, Paul not only informed the Corinthians that Timothy would come to them, he also endorsed Timothy's message (1 Corinthians 4:17). It becomes clear in 2 Corinthians that the Corinthian church—or some group within the church—had rejected Paul's authority, so some scholars have suggested that Timothy was the one who was rejected. It is significant, therefore, that Paul mentions Timothy at the outset of his letter as a brother in Christ—a person on an equal level, instead of a subordinate. Paul may have done this to bolster Timothy's authority among the Corinthians.

Paul founded the church in Corinth around ^{A.D.} 50 on his second missionary journey. The core of this church was a group of Gentiles who would gather at Titius Justus's house to hear Paul preach. For more information on the city and church in Corinth, see the Audience section in the Introduction. Paul addressed this letter not only to the Corinthian church, but also to all the Christians throughout Greece because he viewed Corinth as the center of Christianity for that province. Paul would make it clear to every Christian in that region what his stance was with respect to the controversial issues in the Corinthian church. Furthermore, Paul wrote this letter with general spiritual principles in mind. Paul's passionate defense of his apostolic authority (10:1-18) and his eloquent comparisons of the new covenant to the old covenant (2:12-3:18) could benefit all Christians.

1:2 This was the standard greeting Paul used in his letters, and a Christian adaptation of the common letter-writing practice of his day. Grace is God's undeserved favor. God's graciousness is preeminently shown by the fact that he sent his own Son, Jesus Christ, to die on the cross. The Greek word for peace is based on the common Hebrew greeting shalom meaning well-being, wholeness, and inner tranquillity. For Paul, Christ's death on the cross was the only event that restored true peace.

By identifying God and the Lord Jesus Christ together, Paul was asserting that both the Father and the Son had granted these wonderful gifts of grace and peace. Paul was pointing to Jesus as a full person in the Godhead.

GOD OFFERS COMFORT TO ALL / 1:3-11

Paul would typically begin a letter by thanking God for the believers to whom he was writing. In 1 Corinthians, Paul praised God for giving the Corinthians spiritual gifts of eloquence and knowledge. But in 2 Corinthians, Paul had no praise for the Corinthians. In its place, however, he did not blame them; rather, he tried to encourage them.

1:3 All praise was owed only to the God who had sent Jesus to die on the cross for our salvation. Paul used the Greek word for Lord, which means "master" or "owner," with the name Jesus, to express Jesus' complete authority over believers. Christ, on the other hand, was the Greek word for "Messiah." Thus Paul was identifying Jesus as both his Master and the promised Messiah of the Old Testament. God was the Father of Jesus in the sense that Jesus had come from God the Father, not that Jesus had been created by God the Father.

Paul had dramatically experienced God's mercy in his recent travels through Asia. God alone is the source. This sentence was probably recited by the believers in their churches. That God comforts people means he encourages them. The word does not imply that God rescues his people from every discomfort but that he gives them the tools, the necessary training, and the essential guidance to endure the problems of this life.

1:4 Paul had an extremely difficult letter to write to the Corinthians. Although they had not necessarily been hard-pressed by external persecution, the Corinthian church had gone through a lot of internal dissension. God would comfort the Corinthians through these difficult times. When the troubles passed and the Corinthians emerged faithful, then they would be able to comfort others who needed the same comfort. Trials are never easy. But it is through trials that God can shape and mold our character. Often, it is only through trials that we can learn about God's loving care for us.

1:5 Paul expected to suffer, just as Christ had suffered on this earth, enduring the ultimate humiliation—a criminal's death on a cross (John 19:19-37). Jesus had warned his disciples that they could expect the same (John 15:20). His warning was an apt one, for the early church experienced strong opposition and persecution. It was clear to Paul that God doesn't protect his people from suffering. According to Paul, suffering—especially trials and discomfort associated with the advancement of Christ's Kingdom—is God's way of allowing Christians to become more like Jesus (Philippians 1:29; 3:10). Peter agreed with Paul: Christians should rejoice when they suffer, for in their own suffering they will in some small way experience what it meant for Jesus to suffer for their sins (1 Peter 4:12-13). In the midst of difficulties, Christians can be confident that God is present. He knows their pain, and would show his people with his comfort through Christ. Such comfort will help believers persevere through any hardship.

1:6 This letter relates Paul's own suffering for the cause of the gospel in order to remind the Corinthians of their unity with Paul as a fellow Christian. Paul and his fellow travelers had been weighed down with troubles, but this resulted in the Corinthians' benefit and salvation. Because Paul and his fellow travelers had been comforted by God, they could be an encouragement to the Corinthians. This life will bring suffering and trials, but Christians should encourage the suffering person. And when the sufferer perseveres, that person will gain renewed insight, which will enable that person to encourage others who experience similar difficult situations. Then those people can patiently endure the same things.

1:7 Paul knew the Corinthian church was struggling and suffering, but his confident hope was that their struggles were for the cause of the gospel, just as he was struggling for the advancement of the gospel in Asia Minor. Their steadfastness to the gospel of truth and their perseverance through difficulties would enable them to share God's comfort—a reward that was worth the agonizing struggle.

1:8-9 Next, Paul moved from the general principle—that God encourages Christians in their trials—to his particular situation. He didn't explain to the Corinthians the details about what happened to him in Asia, only that it involved fearing for his life. Commentators have suggested a number of different scenarios: (1) Paul was afflicted with a serious illness, perhaps loosely connected to his “thorn in the flesh” (see 12:1-10). (2) Paul was imprisoned in Ephesus, an event to which Paul might have been alluding when he wrote of fighting “wild beasts in Ephesus” (see 1 Corinthians 15:23-31). (3) Paul had feared for his life during the riot instigated by the Ephesian silversmiths (see Acts 19:31).

Of course, Paul's trials stemming from the Ephesian riot is the most documented of the three possibilities. This very well could have been the life-threatening situation to which Paul was referring, but this is not certain. Paul and his companions thought they would never live through it for they were crushed and completely overwhelmed. Their despair was real and so deep that they expected to die. No person could save them. Paul's only hope was in God. Through their despair, they learned not to rely on anyone but on God who can raise the dead. God's power to raise from the dead was a doctrine some of the Corinthians were doubting (see Paul's extended explanation of the doctrine of the resurrection in 1 Corinthians 15:1-56). In 2 Corinthians, Paul repeatedly emphasized the temporary nature of human existence (4:16; 5:1) in order to highlight the importance of the Christian hope in eternal life. Without a confident hope in the resurrection, the Christian faith would be useless (see 1 Corinthians 15:14).

Paul wrote that any amount of suffering is worth enduring, for suffering makes God's people realize that God is the only One on whom they can rely. If suffering in your life produces nothing more than a fervent dependence on God and a renewed prayer life, then in God's eyes the suffering may have been well worth the pain.

1:10 God, who holds the ultimate power between life and death, had rescued him. His prayer was answered. The same God who raised Jesus Christ from the dead delivered Paul and his companions from mortal danger. God had not only protected them from death, but he had also given them the courage to trust that he would continue to deliver them in the future. Just like Paul, we should recount the times God has rescued and delivered us in the past.

1:11 Paul showed an untiring belief in the effectiveness of intercessory prayer. Often he would ask churches to pray for him (see Romans 15:30-32; Ephesians 6:18-20). Here Paul thanked the Corinthians for praying for them. Reports of the suffering of Paul and his companions had driven the Corinthians to prayer. In response to their prayers, God had delivered them and, no doubt, would rescue them yet. Past deliverance gave Paul the opportunity, in turn, to write a letter to share the news, which would strengthen the Corinthians to face any difficulties they might encounter. This type of reciprocity was what Paul was trying to illustrate with his recent trial. There is no such thing as a self-reliant Christian. The whole church is inextricably joined together in its spiritual growth toward God. Because God had delivered him, Paul could encourage the Corinthians to give thanks to God because their prayers for the safety of Paul and his companions had been answered. The Corinthians' praise would inspire many others and teach them of God's faithfulness.

PAUL'S CHANGE OF PLANS / 1:12-2:4

After praising God for the comfort the Lord had shown him in his most recent trials, Paul started to explain his most recent travel plans to the Corinthians. In 1 Corinthians, Paul had told the Corinthians that he would visit them after traveling through Macedonia (see 1 Corinthians 16:5-7). Since that time, he had altered his travel plans. He planned to visit Corinth twice, stopping there first before traveling through Macedonia and then again on his way back east (see 1:15-16). Paul made the first of these two visits. But since this visit was extremely "painful," Paul decided not to return to Corinth immediately. Instead, he most likely went straight to Ephesus from Macedonia. There, he wrote a letter to address the difficult issues that the Corinthian church had to handle (see 2:3).

1:12 With confidence and a clear conscience, Paul could say that he and his companions had been honest and sincere. Paul did not want to bring reproach on the gospel with his behavior. For this reason, he was extremely careful. Paul tried to be completely sincere, and he tried to act in a way that was beyond criticism. In this way, he would draw attention to the truthfulness of his message instead of to his own behavior. In addition to his conduct, Paul pointed to the reason for his good behavior and the source of his teaching: It did not come from earthly wisdom, but from God's grace. Paul had already delineated the difference between human wisdom and God's wisdom in 1 Corinthians. Although most people look either for eloquent speeches or awe-inspiring signs to authenticate the truth of a message, God chooses to use foolish and weak messengers to shame the wise with his powerful message of truth (1 Corinthians 1:18–2:14). Paul wasn't relying on his own wisdom and knowledge when he visited Corinth with the truth of the gospel. Instead, he was relying on God's enabling power—something that should have been clear to all the Corinthians.

1:13-14 Apparently, the Corinthians were questioning Paul's sincerity. Some in the church were claiming that he wrote one thing and then said another (see 10:9-10). Here Paul defended his sincerity, especially his honesty in his previous letters. If the Corinthians were not convinced of his genuine intentions, Paul could only hope—that is, confidently expect—that his sincere intentions would be revealed when our Lord Jesus comes back again. On that day, Paul expected that his actions and words would be shown for what they were: blameless and true. Indeed, the genuineness of the Corinthians' faith would be a matter of great joy for Paul on that day. They would be able to be proud of having had Paul as their teacher, and he would then be proud having had them as his converts.

1:15-16 Paul had based his travel plans on his confidence that the Corinthians were taking pride in him, just as he was in them (see 1:14). He had made a quick, unscheduled visit to Corinth. But when he had arrived, he had found quite a different atmosphere at that church. At least a portion of its members had rejected him and repudiated his authority. Paul would later call this a “painful visit”—one that caused a breach in the Corinthians' intimate relationship with him (see 2:1). This “painful visit” was quick because Paul had to hurry on to visit the churches in Macedonia. But while he was in Corinth, he had promised to visit the Corinthians on the way back.

Paul changed his travel plans, however. Instead of visiting Corinth on the way back through Macedonia and Achaia (present-day Greece), Paul most likely sailed directly to Ephesus. Paul had made his original plans thinking that the church had solved most of its problems. When the time came for Paul's scheduled trip to Corinth, however, the crisis had not been fully resolved (although progress was being made in some areas; see 7:11-16). So Paul wrote a letter instead (2:3-4; 7:8). He believed that another visit would only make matters worse. The fact that Paul first made an unscheduled visit and then canceled his second scheduled visit to Corinth gave his opponents another reason to criticize him.

1:17 Paul's change of plans had given his accusers at Corinth reasons to complain about his conduct—and even to criticize his authority. By criticizing him for his erratic travel plans, Paul's opponents were implying that he couldn't be trusted. If Paul couldn't be trusted, then how could they believe his message?

The allegation that Paul was no different than the people of the world meant that he was no more reliable than anyone else. A worldly person governed by pure self-interest and selfish desires would say yes when it was convenient, but then renege on that promise when some other better opportunity afforded itself. Paul's opponents at Corinth had used Paul's own sharp distinction between the world and the Spirit against him. They had labeled his actions as being motivated by the world's standards. This accusation was in direct contradiction to Paul's own claim in 1 Corinthians that his preaching was not from himself or any other human authority but from the Spirit of God (see 1 Corinthians 2:4). Labeling his actions as coming from worldly reasoning was a direct assault on Paul's spiritual authority. These serious accusations circulating in Corinth were the reason why Paul had to write 2 Corinthians. In essence, this letter is a passionate defense of Paul's apostolic authority and the truth of his message.

1:18-19 Instead of immediately answering his opponents' criticisms of his behavior, Paul addressed the fundamental problem at Corinth: The believers in Corinth were questioning the veracity of Paul's message to them. Paul clearly saw what was at stake. Questioning the motives and honesty of the messenger would eventually lead to questioning the truth of the message. Instead of defending himself, Paul reminded the Corinthians of God's faithfulness. He does not waver between yes and no. All of God's promises concerning the Messiah, or the Savior of Israel, were fulfilled in Christ. Thus he is the divine Yes. Jesus is the embodiment of God's faithfulness. If Jesus had proved himself faithful, then Jesus' appointed messengers—Paul, Timothy, and Silas—would certainly be faithful and trustworthy. Paul had shown his faithfulness as a messenger of Christ by not wavering in his preaching. The fact that Paul consistently preached Christ—as he had with them—meant he would be trustworthy in the smaller things—such as travel plans.

1:20 This verse reiterates Paul's point: all of God's promises have been fulfilled in Christ. His earthly ministry is an example of God's faithfulness to his people. God had promised he would provide a Savior, and he did. Christ obediently and faithfully said “yes” to God and his great promises.

The Hebrew word Amen conveys a firm agreement with what has been said. The Israelites used this word to express their agreement to God’s law and its blessings and curses (see Deuteronomy 27:15). In this verse Paul explained why Christians use the word. It is the way Christians acknowledge that Jesus has fulfilled all of God’s promises. Jesus is the great “Amen” (Revelation 3:14) because he has been faithful to God. When Christians say “Amen,” they are joining Jesus in saying “Yes” to God. By doing this, Christians everywhere bring glory to God. They give God the proper respect and honor that he deserves. With this type of reasoning, Paul made it clear that his own integrity stood on Christ’s integrity because his message was consistently Christ’s gospel.

1:21-22 In these two verses, Paul described how he, his coworkers—Timothy and Silas—and the Corinthians themselves were all tied together. They had all received the Holy Spirit, an indication they all belonged to God through Christ.

These verses use four key terms to describe how God made them all part of his family. The first, stand firm, is derived from legal terminology. In the first-century Mediterranean world, this was a technical word for a legal guarantee that would confirm a sale as valid. Paul used the word to express that it is God himself who guarantees the salvation of those who believe in Jesus. Having the guarantee or confirmation of God Almighty would be the best security a person could ask for—especially since the Lord God had already proven his faithfulness to his promises in the life of Jesus Christ.

The second refers to all the believers being commissioned (literally, “anointed”). In the Old Testament, prophets, priests, and kings were anointed to signify their commission to be representatives of God to the Israelites (see Exodus 28:41; 1 Samuel 15:1; 1 Kings 19:16). The Holy Spirit comes upon believers making them God’s representatives to the world.

Third, God identifies his people by placing the Holy Spirit in believers’ hearts. God himself has given us his mark of ownership when he gave his Spirit to live in us (see Paul’s use of this word in Ephesians 1:13; 4:30).

Finally, Paul described the Spirit as the first installment of everything God will give us. This “installment” is like a down payment that a buyer will give a seller to declare the intent of paying the full amount. God gives his Spirit to his children as a down payment. It is only a foretaste of the glorious joy they will experience in heaven—the full payment that God has promised.

With these four key terms, Paul reiterates again and again to whom he, along with the Corinthians, belongs. These four assurances are the basis for a believer’s certainty that he or she is saved and will live with God forever in heaven. It is the Spirit of God, not a Christian's works, that guarantees a believer's salvation.

1:23 This verse has a common legal expression, I call upon God as my witness, that was used to summon a witness to a trial. In other words, Paul was subpoenaing God. Since no other person could testify to his motives, Paul was appealing to God as a witness that Paul was telling the truth. Paul saw his whole life—including his innermost thoughts—as an open book to God.

In this case, Paul wanted to make it clear that his decision to cancel his second visit to Corinth had been made out of consideration for the spiritual welfare of the Corinthians. He hadn't made the decision for selfish reasons, as his opponents had claimed (1:17). His motive had been to spare the Corinthians the sorrow that another visit would produce. Apparently, Paul wanted to give the Corinthians time to resolve some of the problems that had surfaced on his last visit.

1:24 This verse protects Paul from any misunderstanding with the Corinthians by explaining what he meant by "sparing them a severe rebuke" in his previous statement. Paul wasn't acting as a judge or governor over the Corinthians' faith in Christ. Paul couldn't give them their faith—that is, their confident belief in God and in Jesus, their Savior—much less control it. Their faith was a gift from God (Romans 12:3; Ephesians 2:8), not subject to anyone's control except God's. In this respect, the Corinthians were subject to no one except the ultimate Judge (Romans 14:1-4). As a result of this gift of faith, the Corinthians were to be full of joy and stand firm. Paul wasn't their taskmaster. Instead, he was a fellow worker, pointing out how they could experience the joy God wanted to give them. This is a potent image for any spiritual leader—from a pastor to a Sunday school teacher. A spiritual leader should be less of a master and more of a friend—a person who works along with others and gives them joy.

2:1-2 From the two letters that have been preserved—1 and 2 Corinthians—we know that the Corinthians not only had problems with incest (1 Corinthians 5:1-2) and adultery (1 Corinthians 6:9), but they were also troubled by incessant arguing (1 Corinthians 1:10), disruptions during the worship service (1 Corinthians 11:17-22), and even lawsuits between believers (1 Corinthians 6:1-8). Moreover, a group of false teachers were preoccupied with criticizing Paul's actions and authority (11:1-11). Apparently, on Paul's last visit, a member of the Corinthian church had publicly challenged Paul (2:5). Paul issued a severe warning to those who were persistently sinning in the church (13:2). On his last visit, apparently the problems had not been dealt with, and their time together had been painful. Paul decided not to visit the Corinthians again because he didn't want to cause unnecessary sorrow. He had already rebuked the church on his last visit (13:2). He wanted to give them more instruction on how to correct some of the abuses in the church (see Paul's description of his letter in 2:3-4), but he also wanted to give them some time to resolve the issues amongst themselves, for their faith would ultimately stand on God—not on Paul or his efforts to reform them (see 1:24). Appropriately, Paul gave the Corinthians some time to work out what putting their faith in action meant.

2:3 The identity of Paul's last letter has been a subject of much scholarly debate. Traditionally, the letter Paul referred to here was considered 1 Corinthians. Proponents of this theory identified the sinner who Paul forgave in the next passage (2:5-11) with the incestuous man of 1 Corinthians 5:1-5.

However, it has become generally accepted that 1 Corinthians is not the "last letter," primarily because 1 Corinthians as a whole does not reflect the extreme sorrow described by Paul in these following verses. Furthermore, the details described in the next passage (2:5-11) do not seem to fit the situation with the incestuous man of 1 Corinthians 5:1-5 but instead someone who had personally offended Paul on his last trip to Corinth (see 2:5). For these reasons, many Bible commentators consider the letter referred to in this verse to be lost. Apparently, Paul wrote this severe letter to the Corinthians soon after his "painful visit" with them. In this lost letter, he had exhorted the Corinthians to discipline their errant members—specifically, the ones who were publicly opposing his authority (see 2 Corinthians 2:1-4; 7:8). God, according to his sovereign plan, preserved all of Paul's letters he wanted to include in the Bible—God's inspired Word. According to his plan, this letter was not preserved for later generations to read and study.

This verse reiterates that Paul's own joy depended on the spiritual condition of the Corinthians. The first part of 2 Corinthians emphasizes the interdependence of Paul and the Corinthians—the community of faith that existed between them (see 1:11-14). Paul's own spiritual success was intimately connected with the Corinthians' spiritual success. This verse (2:3) again emphasizes that the Corinthians provided part of Paul's motivation. In fact, their strong faith and their happiness was one of the reasons he could courageously face the trials of an evangelist (see 7:4).

2:4 Paul passionately expressed how he felt when he wrote that letter. Although he was sorry that his letter would hurt the Corinthians, he had sent it anyway. In

7:8-12, Paul explains his reasons in more detail. His severe reprimand in this letter was aimed at securing a change of heart in the Corinthian believers. He knew it would cause much sorrow, but he was hoping that it would lead to repentance. That is why Paul claimed here that his motive was love. Sometimes the most loving action a person can do for a fellow Christian is to confront him or her with the truth. The truth often hurts. Confronting a person in the wrong with the truth, however, can be the best thing a friend can do.

2 CORINTHIANS 2:5-11

FORGIVENESS FOR THE SINNER / 2:5-11

After explaining in general terms why he had delayed his visit to Corinth (see 1:12–2:4), Paul addressed the specific confrontation that most likely had led to his decision to cancel his visit. Paul doesn't name the offender who had caused the trouble the last time he was in Corinth, but he does instruct the church on how to handle this man. It was essential that the church act quickly to forgive and restore this man, while he was still repentant. Church discipline should always seek the restoration of the offender. Two mistakes in church discipline should be avoided—being too lenient by not correcting mistakes and being too harsh by not forgiving the sinner. There is a time to confront and a time to comfort.

2:5 These verses emphasize that the reason Paul was concerned about this man's offense was not to correct an injury Paul had suffered. The man had hurt the entire church far more than he had offended Paul. Most likely, the offender's actions had amounted to a direct attack on Paul's apostolic authority. The teachings of the "false apostles," who had infiltrated the Corinthian church and had started discrediting Paul's authority, might have inspired this man to challenge Paul's authority in public (see Paul's censure of these "false apostles" in 11:1-15). Paul would perceive this not only as an attack on his authority but also an insult to the entire church, which had been founded on the gospel message that Paul had delivered to them.

Paul's concern in all of this was to assure the Corinthians that he wasn't trying to defend himself. This wasn't a personal vendetta; instead, it touched on the foundations of the Christian faith. The distinction expressed in this verse should be made in churches today. Personal agendas or preferences should not block the clear proclamation of the gospel. But when an issue touches on the authority of Jesus or the truth of the gospel, that issue must be taken seriously, for it affects the life of the entire church. We, too, need to muster the courage to pass judgment on quarrelsome, selfish ambition in our churches, just as Paul did in the first century (see Philippians 2:3; James 3:14).

2:6 Apparently, the majority of the Corinthians had realized that tolerating this man and the sin he encouraged would ruin the congregation. They couldn't function as the holy people of God with such a rebel among them. It is not clear what action the Corinthian church took against this offender. The main point is that most of the believers in the church were united in judgment against this man. This united front showed the man the seriousness of his sin and, no doubt, helped lead him to repentance.

2:7-8 Evidently, the reproof that the Corinthians had meted out was sufficient. The offender had realized the seriousness of his actions. Paul was extremely concerned that the Corinthians forgive and comfort the offender at the appropriate time so he would not become so discouraged that he couldn't recover. Paul's image here was of the disciplined person drowning in sadness. Paul wasn't concerned for his own vindication in this distressing incident but instead for the offender's spiritual welfare. Then the believers should show that they still love him.

Knowing the appropriate time to rebuke and the appropriate time to forgive is the key to compassionate church discipline. This type of discernment is crucial for a church plagued with problems, as the Corinthian church was. Christians in positions of authority must consistently check their motives when it comes to church discipline. They must ask: Am I keeping the spiritual welfare of my church members—especially that of the offender—in mind?

2:9 Paul reiterated his reason for writing the severe letter to the Corinthians. First of all, he hoped the letter would rectify the troublesome situation before he arrived (see 2:3). When he visited them, he wanted to encourage them in their faith instead of correcting them. Second, he wanted to find out how far they would go in obeying him.

Later in 2 Corinthians, Paul unequivocally will assert his authority as an apostle to punish disobedience. He had been empowered by Christ with apostolic authority (10:4-6). But Paul's authority didn't involve commanding obedience to himself but, instead, to Christ and the gospel. When Paul defended his apostolic authority to the Corinthians, he was careful to explain that he possessed the authority to build up the church, not to tear it down (see 10:8; 13:10).

The good news was that the Corinthians were obedient to the gospel. Titus's report from Corinth revealed that they had listened to Paul's rebuke and had obeyed his instructions. Their complete obedience in these matters caused Paul to rejoice (7:13-16).

2:10-11 The word for forgive is derived from the Greek word for "grace." For Paul, forgiveness was the central point of the gospel. It is only through God's grace—that is, his undeserved favor—that anyone is saved at all (Ephesians 2:5, 8). So the Corinthians' forgiveness of the offender among them was fundamentally based on Christ's forgiveness of them (Ephesians 4:32; Colossians 3:13).

This verse downplays Paul's own part in the entire incident. Since the offense was primarily directed against Paul (see 2:5), he should have been the first to pronounce forgiveness. Instead, he emphasized that it was the Corinthians who should forgive. He would merely agree with their verdict. In this way, he was reiterating the point that the offense had been against the entire church, not merely himself (see note at 2:5). In downplaying his own authority in this situation, Paul was pointing to the ultimate authority: Christ himself. It was before Christ that the church would forgive the offender, and it was before Christ that Paul—hundreds of miles away—would forgive the same offender. In this way, Satan would not outsmart them.

Paul spoke of Satan more in his letters to the Corinthians than in any other of his New Testament letters. He saw the telltale signs of a demonic attack on the church at Corinth. Second Corinthians unambiguously identifies the “false apostles” in the Corinthian church with the clever deceptions of Satan (see 11:14). Moreover, Paul identifies Satan as the one who was tempting some in the church into sexual immorality (see 1 Corinthians 5:1-5; 6:12-20) and others to participate in the idolatrous feasts of their pagan neighbors (see 1 Corinthians 10:18-22).

This passage identifies another one of Satan's evil schemes. In their zeal to purge sin from the church, the Corinthians could punish the offender without keeping in mind the purpose of discipline: to inspire repentance and promote reconciliation to God. Under Satan's influence, the offender's sorrow could easily be turned into resentment (see 2:7) instead of repentance. Paul pleaded with the Corinthians to guard against such a tragic outcome.

2 CORINTHIANS 2:12–3:18

MINISTERS OF THE NEW COVENANT / 2:12–3:6

Paul spent the first two chapters of 2 Corinthians chronicling his ministry. He had suffered severe affliction in Asia (1:8-10). Criticism of his integrity plagued him in Corinth (1:17-20). The situation was so bad that some person had publicly confronted Paul during a visit. In response, with sorrow and tears, Paul had to write a stern letter of warning (2:1-4). Then, because he was plagued with concern over Titus's welfare and the status of the Corinthian church, Paul had to pass over a definite opportunity to preach the gospel in Troas (2:12-13). Most missionaries would hesitate to write such a report to their supporters. Opposition, conflict, and distress faced Paul at every turn. Paul interrupted this sad tale with a burst of heartfelt praise. One of the clear emphases of 2 Corinthians is God's ability to transform suffering and weakness into victory for the gospel.

2:12 Troas was a large seaport on the Aegean Sea, ten miles away from the well-known, ancient city of Troy. It was near the straits of Dardanelles, which led to the Black Sea. Paul had visited this bustling seaport on his second missionary journey. He most likely had met Luke, the author of Luke and Acts, at that time. In this city, Paul had a vision of a Macedonian man asking him to share the gospel with him. Paul took this as a sign from God and immediately went to Philippi, a prominent town in Macedonia (see Acts 16:9-10). But Paul is not referring to this visit to Troas in this letter. Paul wrote 2 Corinthians on his third missionary journey, not his second. Apparently, while Paul was traveling through Asia Minor on his third missionary journey, the Lord gave him tremendous opportunities to preach the gospel.

2:13 This is the first time that Paul mentioned Titus's role in the complex relationship between Paul and the Corinthians. As it becomes clear in this letter, Titus played a crucial role in reconciling Paul and the Corinthians (see also 7:6, 13-14; 8:6, 16-17, 23; 12:18). Titus was a Greek convert whom Paul greatly loved and whole-heartedly trusted (Galatians 2:3). For more information on Titus, see the Introduction to the book of Titus.

Paul had already sent Timothy to Corinth, where, apparently, Timothy had run into some difficulties. So after being personally and publicly challenged during his visit to Corinth, Paul had sent Titus with his severe letter. Apparently, Titus had the courage and resolve to go to this rebellious church with a letter from Paul commanding them to correct the abuses in their church. Paul was anxiously awaiting word on how his stern letter had affected the troublesome situation in Corinth. This was the same letter that he had cried over (2:4), so it was natural that he couldn't rest until Titus arrived back with a report from Corinth. Uncharacteristically, Paul abandoned an opportunity for evangelism at Troas because he was so troubled about the situation in Corinth. Apparently, Paul had made some arrangements to meet Titus in Troas. But when Paul couldn't find him there, he went on to Macedonia to find him.

2:14 In a Roman triumphal procession, a Roman general would drive his captives and the spoils of war before him down the main thoroughfare of Rome. He would be greeted by the loud cheers of Roman citizens, and a cloud of incense would be burned for the gods as they paraded to the temple of Jupiter. To the Romans, the aroma was the sweet smell of victory. To the captives in the parade, it was the smell of abject slavery and perhaps even death.

Though it is clear that this verse alludes to this Roman practice, the exact nature of Paul's analogy has been widely disputed. It is unclear whether Paul was implying that Christians are victorious partners with Christ or whether he was implying that they are God's willing captives. Some commentators insist that leads us along in Christ's triumphal procession means that Christians are like the Roman soldiers being led by the victorious general. These commentators point to the context of the passage. Paul was emphasizing God's power to triumph over Paul's weaknesses. The triumph was God's and the gospel's. Other commentators insist that this means "to lead someone as a captive in a procession." As such, Paul was comparing himself and all Christians to the captives in a Roman triumphal procession. He, along with all Christians, were former enemies of God. Hence, when Christians become believers, God takes them as captured enemies. In the final analysis, the general meaning seems to be that Christ will eventually triumph over all evil. No opponent, setback, or weakness can stop Christ's victory. It has already been accomplished on the cross. The triumphal procession of Christ is on its way.

2:15-16 These verses expand the analogy of the Roman processional incense, burned to the god Jupiter. But Paul's Jewish readers, steeped in Old Testament language, would immediately recognize Paul's language as being similar to Leviticus 23:18, where the burnt offerings are said to be an aroma pleasing to the Lord.

Unlike these settings, where physical smells were presented to God (or in the Roman case, to Jupiter), Paul told the Corinthians that the holy lives of Christians are a fragrance presented by Christ to God. In addition to being something that pleases God, a holy life dedicated to God brings glory to him. Through Christians (those being saved), the precious aroma of God's grace is spread throughout the world. When Christians preach the gospel message, however, it is good news to some (life-giving perfume), but to those who are perishing, it is the fearful smell of death and doom. Those who are being drawn by the Spirit immediately recognize the life-giving power of the message. Those who stubbornly refuse to believe, however, smell something foul—the judgment of death that awaits them.

The answer to the rhetorical question posed here, “Who is adequate for such a task as this?” is not entirely clear. The implied answer may be that no one is competent for the task. God was the One who commissioned Paul (Acts 9:1-22) and empowered him to be an ambassador to the Gentiles (Galatians 2:7; Ephesians 3:8); he made Paul competent for the enormous task of preaching the gospel (3:5; 1 Corinthians 15:10).

2:17 In reality, no one is competent to preach the gospel message. God did not need anyone's professional services. No one could claim to be qualified for the task of handling God's truth. Paul saw these high-priced preachers as mere hucksters preaching to make money. It is obvious from 1 Corinthians that Paul did not object to preachers earning a living wage for their work in sharing the gospel. He had gone to great lengths to defend the right of preachers to ask for money in 1 Corinthians 9:3-10. On the other hand, Paul himself passed up that right. He strove to present the gospel free of charge in order to show his sincerity.

3:1 Just as people use résumés today to introduce themselves to a prospective employer, in Paul's day traveling preachers and evangelists introduced themselves with letters of recommendation from various churches. Paul had written letters of recommendation on behalf of Phoebe (Romans 16:1-2) and Timothy (1 Corinthians 16:10-11). These letters helped Paul's trusted companions and friends find a welcome in various churches.

Apparently, some false teachers had started using letters of recommendation to gain a speaking platform in the Corinthian church (see 11:13-15). These traveling hucksters of the Word of God, as Paul called them (2:17), had come to Corinth with these letters—perhaps authentic, perhaps forged—and were asking the Corinthians to recommend them to other churches. The letters gained for them hospitality from members of other churches, an opportunity to speak, and even reimbursement.

Apparently, some of these false teachers had begun to criticize Paul's authority by subtly asking if he had presented any letters of recommendation. Justifiably, Paul was annoyed that he would have to explain his apostolic credentials to the church he had founded.

3:2-3 In a clear and forceful way, Paul stated that he did not need any letters. The changed lives of the believers to whom he and his companions had preached were recommendation enough. Any discipleship program should be judged by the quality of those who have been discipled. With the statement, your lives are a letter written in our hearts, Paul might have been trying to express his own participation in the lives of the Corinthians (a theme of this letter, see 1:6-7, 11; 2:5-6). As an evangelist to them, Paul was inextricably intertwined with them. Their success was his; their sorrows were also his. In this way, their lives of faith were etched in his heart and the hearts of his coworkers, Silas and Timothy. Just as the lives of the Corinthians were an open book to all, the intimate connection between the Corinthians and their founder, Paul, was manifest to all. So anything that the Corinthians did would also reflect on Paul and his ministry, and vice versa.

If the Corinthians were Paul's letter of recommendation, then this letter was from Christ himself. In contrast to the false teachers at Corinth, Paul's ministry was authorized by Jesus. Paul's letter of recommendation had been written by Christ himself. This "letter" of Christ had been delivered by Paul and his coworkers; they were messengers for God and his glorious Good News of salvation. It was written not with pen and ink, but with the Spirit of the living God on the hearts and lives of those who believed. The Holy Spirit, who was working in the Corinthians' hearts and was a guarantee of the Corinthians' glorious inheritance in heaven, affirmed the authenticity of Paul's message.

Next, Paul compared this letter from Christ written on the Corinthians' hearts to the Ten Commandments written by the finger of God on stone. Paul's point is clear: The signs of the Spirit's work in a person's life are superior to any kind of writing, whether it was a church's recommendation or the law of God etched on stone (see Exodus 31:18). The imagery of writing on human hearts comes from the prophet Ezekiel. This Old Testament prophet had predicted that one day God himself would remove Israel's heart of stone and replace it with a heart of flesh, a heart that would follow God's decrees because God himself had written his law on it (Jeremiah 31:33; Ezekiel 36:26-27). Paul was declaring to the Corinthians that the day Ezekiel had predicted had come. The Holy Spirit was writing God's law on their hearts and changing them on the inside.

3:4-5 Paul did not want to have anything to do with vain boasting (see 3:1; 5:12; 10:18). Yet he expressed his confidence and assurance (see 1:15; 5:6, 8) in his own ministry, not because of his own eloquence or sophistication, but because God through Christ had commissioned Paul as an apostle on the Damascus road (see Acts 9:15-19).

Paul had asked who was competent (or adequate) for the task of preaching the Good News (2:16). In this verse, Paul answered his own question: Only those who are called by God will have power and success. This might have been a slight snub to Paul's opponents in Corinth. They had boasted of their wisdom (see 1 Corinthians 2:1), their eloquence (11:6), their superior Jewish ancestry (11:12), and, as it has become clear in this passage, their letters of recommendation. In contrast, Paul refused to boast in himself. Instead, he boasted in Christ's strength, which had become evident through his weaknesses (11:30) and the trials he had endured for the cause of Christ (11:16-27; see also Ephesians 3:7-8; 1 Thessalonians 2:4; 1 Timothy 1:12, 14).

3:6 God had enabled Paul and his companions to represent the new covenant. This is one of the two times that Paul used the Greek words for "new covenant." The other reference to the new covenant is Paul's quote of Jesus' words concerning the "cup of the new covenant" (1 Corinthians 11:25). Most likely, Paul was using the terminology of Jeremiah 31:31-33 in this passage. The prophet Jeremiah spoke of a new covenant when God would write his law on his people's hearts (see 3:2).

This verse ends with a short adage—the old way ends in death; in the new way, the Holy Spirit gives life. "The old way" refers to the Old Testament Scriptures, the summary of the law of Moses. Paul's letter to the Romans shows that Paul unequivocally denied that following the law can achieve salvation. Instead, the law only makes people conscious of their sin, the sin that ultimately leads to death (Romans 2:29; 3:19-20; 6:23; 7:6). Trying to be saved by keeping Old Testament laws will end in death. Only by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ can a person receive eternal life through the Holy Spirit. No one but Jesus has ever fulfilled the law perfectly; thus, the whole world is condemned to death. Under the new way, eternal life comes from the Holy Spirit. The Spirit gives new life to all who believe in Christ.

THE GLORY OF THE NEW COVENANT / 3:7-18

Paul recalled the stone tablets on which God had written the old covenant. He identified the law, although lethal, as nonetheless glorious because it is God's provision and proof of his intervention in the life of his people. But that which was summarized on stone is nowhere near as glorious as what is yet to come. The Spirit creates a new life in us. He is the Holy Spirit who was present at the creation of the world as one of the agents in the origin of life itself (Genesis 1:2). He is the power behind the rebirth of every Christian and the one who helps us live the Christian life.

3:7-8 Paul used the story of the giving of the Ten Commandments to illustrate the difference between his ministry and the ministry of Moses. The story can be found in Exodus 34:29-35. After receiving the Ten Commandments written by God himself, Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the tablets. Although Moses did not realize it, his face shone with the glory of God. When Moses returned to the Israelite camp, the people saw his radiant face and were afraid to approach him. Moses called the people to gather around him so he could tell them all that God had commanded them to do, so he put a veil over his face. Whenever Moses would enter the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle to be in the Lord's presence, he would take the veil off his face to speak with God. Then, he would stand before the people with his face uncovered and tell them what God had commanded. After he finished speaking, Moses would once again slip the veil over his face.

Paul seized Moses' habit of putting a veil over his face and then taking it off as a symbol of the difference between the old and new covenants. The old system of law etched in stone brought condemnation because it pointed out sin and its tragic consequence: death. In contrast, the new covenant brings life through the Holy Spirit. This was more glorious—literally, reflecting more of the brilliance of God—than the law. To make his point even more forceful, Paul described the glory of Moses' face as a fading glory. The Old Testament passage does not record this fact. It seems that Paul interpreted Moses' action of covering his face with a veil as an effort on Moses' part to divert attention from the fading brilliance of his own face in order to focus the people's attention on the law. Paul saw this fading glory as another sign of the temporary nature of the old covenant.

3:9-11 The old covenant could give only condemnation, but the new covenant can make people right with God. Paul's letter to the Romans explains in detail how the old covenant brings condemnation. The law carries a verdict of guilty because it points out sin in people's lives (Romans 3:19-20; 5:12-13). No one is righteous before God (Romans 3:10). But God mercifully gives his own righteousness to those who believe in his Son (Romans 5:17). This way, all those who believe in Jesus are declared right with God (Romans 3:20-22). This sentence, therefore, sums up the difference between the old covenant and the new covenant Paul had preached to the Corinthians: The old, by pointing out sin, brings God's judgment; but the new, through Jesus' innocent life and death, brings God's righteousness to the believer.

The old covenant was glorious. Not only did Moses' face shine, but thunder, lightning, earthquakes, dense clouds, blazing fire, and a deafening trumpet blast accompanied its inauguration at Mount Sinai (Exodus 19:16-20). But that was not glorious at all compared with the overwhelming glory of the new covenant. The new ministry of the Spirit is even more glorious. The changed hearts and lives of believers is an even more miraculous work of God than lightning, thunder, and earthquakes. In fact, this greater glory was eclipsing the glory of the old covenant. Just as the bright light of the sun makes a flashlight useless, so the surpassing glory of the new covenant renders the lesser glory useless. The old covenant was temporary, had been set aside, and was being superseded by the new covenant, which remains forever.

3:12-13 From his discussion on the superiority of the new covenant over the old, Paul concluded that the new inspires believers to be very bold. The Greek word translated "boldness" is the word that the Greeks used to speak of the right to free speech. Here Paul used this word to indicate the public nature of his ministry. He would boldly preach the mysteries of salvation. Paul's boldness was an outgrowth of his confidence in the new covenant—the glorious, permanent ministry of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers. This type of confidence in the faithfulness of God inspired Paul to publicly proclaim the Good News of salvation. Paul could act with greater confidence than the spiritual giant Moses, for Paul had been given an eternal message to proclaim to all nations. Paul did not need to worry about its glory fading away.

3:14-16 Paul's common practice when he first went to a city was to preach to the Jews who would gather in the local synagogue (as he did in Corinth, see Acts 18:1-4). But the Jews rejected his message of salvation (Acts 18:6-7). At times, Jews even pursued Paul to other cities to try to silence him (see Acts 14:1, 19). Paul most frequently found welcome with the God-fearing Gentiles (Acts 17:4).

In his letter to the Romans, Paul focused on why the Jews had rejected Jesus, to whom all of the Scriptures (the Old Testament) pointed. Jesus was Israel's Messiah, the person who fulfilled God's promises to Israel. The Jews, if anyone, should be rejoicing. Instead, their minds were hardened to what was occurring (see Romans 9–11, especially 10:1-3). It was as if a veil were covering their minds so that they could not understand the truth. But by believing in Christ, the veil is miraculously lifted. Just as Christ had opened Paul's spiritual eyes to the truth about Jesus, the Holy Spirit would also open believers' eyes to how Jesus fulfilled the Scriptures. Moses and his veil illustrate the fading of the old system and the veiling of the Jews' minds by their pride, hardness of heart, and refusal to repent. The veil kept many Jews from understanding the references to Christ in the Scriptures they heard every week.

Whenever anyone turns to the Lord and becomes a Christian, Christ removes the veil, giving that person not only understanding of the true meaning of the Scriptures but also eternal life and freedom from trying to be saved by keeping laws. Christ saves the person not only from sin but from the ignorance that his or her sin has created.

3:17-18 Next, Paul introduced another reason why the new covenant is better than the old: It is a ministry of freedom. Christ's death on the cross bought freedom for anyone who believes (1 Corinthians 6:20). He frees us from sin and the condemnation that results from trying to obey the law (Romans 8:1-4; Galatians 3:21-24). He frees us from the fear of death, the penalty for our sins (Romans 5:17-18). Jesus even frees us from the evil powers of the age (Galatians 1:4). Christ frees believers from the same mental veil that covered many of the Jews to whom Paul was preaching (3:14).

When we trust Christ to save us, Jesus removes that heavy burden of trying to please him. His light dispels our ignorance, giving us a clear understanding of the gospel. By trusting Christ, we are loved, accepted, forgiven, and freed to live for him.

Just as Moses took off his veil when he went into the Lord's presence, so too all Christians can behold God's glory with that veil removed. Unlike the Jews, who had to rely on priests to mediate between them and God, Christians through Christ's saving work on the cross have direct access to the Father (Ephesians 2:18). Thus, under the new covenant, all believers can be mirrors that brightly reflect the glory of the Lord. In contrast, under the old covenant only Moses had access to the Lord's presence and thus could reflect his glory. But now all Christians can be like Moses. Thus, when Christians, who are given access to the Father through Christ's work, look at God's glory, they begin to reflect his holy character in their lives, becoming more and more like him. As a result of this encounter with God, they are forever changed. The Holy Spirit works through believers' lives, step by step, helping them come closer to God's perfect way of living. It occurs little by little as the Holy Spirit points out more areas of our lives that need to be submitted to God's will; and we, then, freely submit to God. The Holy Spirit works through the preaching of God's word, the reading of Scripture, our prayer life, and the wise guidance of other mature believers to lead believers on God's wonderful path of righteousness.

2 CORINTHIANS 4

TREASURE IN PERISHABLE CONTAINERS / 4:1-18

Paul was under attack at Corinth. His authority and honesty were being questioned. Charges of duplicity were circulating in the church. Paul was facing a church in revolt. How did Paul handle opposition? At every step, he deflected criticisms of his abilities. He simply refused to defend himself. He even submitted to his opponents a list of his weaknesses and the trials he had endured. Why did Paul do this? He knew that this list would focus the Corinthians on what was important: God's glorious plan of salvation.

4:1 In the last chapter, Paul painted an appealing picture of what it means to be a Christian minister. This chapter comes down to reality. What does all this mean for everyday life? Why would Paul keep going—even in the face of trials and suffering?

First of all, because God gave Paul and his companions their wonderful ministry, they would never give up. The Greek for this phrase can mean anything from not becoming discouraged to not acting like a coward. In other words, the glorious plan of God gave Paul hope and courage to face his day with great confidence in God (see 3:4, 12; 5:6-8).

4:2 This verse contrasts the way Paul preached with the methods of some of the traveling preachers who had come to Corinth. These preachers had sought a platform on which to speak and ask for money (2:17). Paul categorically denied using any dubious techniques in his preaching. He and his fellow evangelists had rejected all shameful and underhanded methods. This expression denotes methods, motives, and actions that are shrouded in secrecy because they are intrinsically scandalous. The implication is that some of the preachers who had visited Corinth had greedy motives. Paul could perceive their hidden motives because of the havoc and confusion these men were causing in Corinth. One of the telltale signs of the impure motives of these preachers was the way they handled God's word. Instead of a straightforward presentation of the truths of the gospel, they used tricks to captivate their audience. In so doing, they would distort the word of God.

Paul had rejected such deceptive and cunning ways when he preached to the Corinthians. He had "walked" by faith instead of placing his trust in the ingenious, deceptive ways of the world (see 5:7). In other words, Paul always reminded himself of the spiritual realities that were behind his ministry. When he preached the truths of God's word, he reminded himself that he was preaching it before God. He stood in the presence of God. The Lord God, the One who knows all secrets, could look into Paul's heart and discern his motives. Because God was always watching him, Paul was careful to preach for the right reasons. He consciously submitted his motivations to God's scrutiny, so that no shameful act or motive could disqualify him as a minister. Paul opened up his entire life and honestly told the Corinthians the truth. He hid nothing.

4:3-4 Although the Good News Paul preached was a clear presentation of salvation, he admitted that the gospel would be veiled, or obscure, to some. He explained that there are two types of people—those who will receive eternal life and those who don't believe. Paul's description here of the way Satan has blinded the minds of unbelievers is reminiscent of his conversion experience on the Damascus road. Although Paul could see perfectly well, he had been blinded to spiritual truth. Naively and zealously, he had persecuted the Christians, vowing to destroy them in any way possible. Unknowingly, Paul had been an instrument of Satan. In one magnificent moment, however, Christ had broken through Satan's deception and had revealed the truth to Paul. A glorious vision of Christ finally had opened Paul's eyes to the truth. Appropriately, Paul had been physically blinded for a while (Acts 9:1-18).

Instead of being blinded by Satan like unbelievers are, believers recognize that Jesus is the exact likeness of God (see also Colossians 1:15). God the Father as spirit is invisible (1 Timothy 6:16). God's Son, however, is God's visible expression. Jesus not only reflects the Father, but, as God, he reveals God to us (John 1:18; 14:9; Hebrews 1:1-2). Christ's glory expresses divine glory.

4:5 The focus of Paul's preaching was on Christ Jesus and not himself. Since his own authority was under attack, Paul could have written that he was their God-appointed leader and teacher (as he did in 1 Timothy 2:7). Instead, Paul emphasized that he and his fellow evangelists were the Corinthians' servants. Paul was not trying to exercise arbitrary authority over their faith (1:24). On the contrary, Paul was merely serving them as Christ's appointed messenger, faithfully delivering the truths of the gospel to them.

4:6 Paul returned to the image of light and darkness, which he had introduced in 4:4. The image symbolizes the stark difference between good and evil, between God and Satan. This imagery came from the Creation story itself (Genesis 1:2-5). Just as God had brought order out of the chaos of darkness by ordering, "Let there be light in the darkness," so God was piercing the chaos of evil with the light of his truth. The light of Christ exposes falsehood and evil for what it is: a perversion of the good (Ephesians 5:13-14). Those who believe in Jesus become children of the light. They live in the light, allowing it to judge all of their actions (see Ephesians 5:8; 1 Thessalonians 5:5).

This passage emphasizes that this light is the brightness of the glory of God that is seen in the face of Jesus Christ. The light of Christ illumines a believer's understanding. Only those who allow their minds to be clouded by Satan's dark deceptions think the message is obscure. God illumines the minds of believers so that they know with certainty that in Jesus' face they see the glory of God. The implication is that those who look for God's glory only in the old covenant, in the face of Moses, are being deceived by Satan (compare with 3:15-17).

4:7 People keep treasures in safety deposit boxes and vaults. But God places his precious treasure—the message that frees people from sin—in perishable containers; that is, in human beings. The message of freedom that God had entrusted to them would last much longer than their frail bodies. Why would God do this? Because he delights in empowering the weak in order to confound the strong. The Lord loves to answer the prayers of the needy and bring down those who take pride in themselves (see Luke 1:51-55; Jeremiah 20:13). God works through the weak and powerless so that it is clear that the power comes from God alone (1 Corinthians 2:3-4).

4:8-9 Paul recounted how weak he, as a human being, really was. He freely admitted he had been crushed and perplexed. Few teachers would admit to being perplexed because they might lose the respect of their audience. Then he added the words, God never abandons us. The Lord did not abandon Paul to his own inadequacies. God had saved Paul from being crushed and broken by his responsibilities and from reaching utter despair.

The next two entries speak of external opposition: Paul had been hunted down and knocked down. Paul had received most of his opposition from Jews. They had persecuted him, even following him to different cities to malign him (see Acts 14:19). Through it all, God never abandoned him.

4:10-12 Jesus himself was Paul's model. Although Jesus had all the glories of heaven—all of its power and privilege—he gave it all up to suffer humiliation, insults, and finally death (see Philippians 2:5-11). Paul saw his own sufferings for the cause of Christ as sharing in the death of Jesus. Of course, Jesus' suffering was of a qualitatively different nature. Jesus died on the cross to save believers from their sins. Yet Jesus had warned his followers they could also expect suffering and hardship (John 15:20-21). The suffering of Jesus' followers would be merely an extension of Jesus' own suffering. So Paul lived under constant danger of death for Jesus' sake so that people would see the life of Jesus.

Paul lived in the face of death, but he knew that something greater than life on this earth was working through him. His sufferings and death would never spell the end for the life-giving message of the gospel. In fact, God was working so that Paul's suffering would result in eternal life for those who believe in Jesus. This passage reminded the Corinthians that Paul's sufferings, which the Corinthians were presently ashamed of, had brought the message of eternal life to them in the first place. Paul had courageously endured the insults of the Jews in order to deliver the gospel to them—the message that would result in their eternal salvation (Acts 18:6).

4:13-14 In this passage, Paul identified himself with the writer of Psalm 116. Paul, like the psalmist, had experienced fear of death (Psalm 116:3). In the midst of troubles and in the face of death, Paul, like the psalmist, had cried out to God (Psalm 116:4). The psalmist believed that God would answer his prayers (Psalm 116:1), so he vowed to pray as long as he had breath (Psalm 116:2). His prayers were not the only expression of his faith in God; he also promised to thank and praise God, telling others of what God had done for him (see Psalm 116:14, 17-18). In this psalm, Paul saw an extraordinary expression of faith, which he endeavored to imitate. The psalmist had refused to let his circumstances dictate to him what he should believe.

Although Paul was experiencing the sufferings and death of Christ on this earth (4:10-12), he believed in God. Although Paul was facing suffering, he wasn't discouraged, because he knew that Jesus would return. At that time, Paul and the Corinthian believers would celebrate their Savior in his presence because God would also raise them with Jesus. The believers in Corinth had been struggling with the doctrine of the Resurrection, so Paul had written much to explain why the Resurrection is a central doctrine of the Christian faith. With his sights always set on the glories of God's Kingdom, Paul didn't have any reason to be ashamed (Romans 1:16; see also Hebrews 12:2). Instead, he boldly and confidently could preach the gospel and tell others of what God had done for him (4:1).

4:15 All of the trials and difficulties he had endured were for their benefit. As more people heard of and accepted God's grace—that is, God's gift of salvation —more people would join the grand celebration before God. Thanksgiving would begin to overflow toward God. This would benefit the Corinthian Christians, for—through their prayers—they also had participated in Paul’s work of spreading the gospel (see 1:11). Ultimately, God would be glorified through all this. All praise and glory would be solely his, for he is the One who sacrificed his own Son for the benefit of all who believe.

4:16 Paul and his colleagues would never give up because they knew the great power behind their message (3:16-18). Even though the things of this life—their bodies—were deteriorating, moving daily toward death, their spirits, in contrast, were being renewed every day. The hardships of Paul’s ministry were real and were having their effect. Paul, however, did not gripe or complain about how much he was giving up in order to preach the gospel. Instead, he knew that every trouble, hardship, and difficulty endured for Christ’s sake was making him spiritually new. This occurred day by day, trouble by trouble. Paul saw every difficulty as an opportunity to mature in the faith.

4:17-18 Paul knew that the hardships he endured were really quite small and wouldn’t last very long in comparison to how long he would enjoy God’s presence—the immeasurably great glory that will last forever. What really matters—what is eternal and permanent—cannot be seen, touched, or measured. Only with the eyes of faith can people look forward to what they have not yet seen. Only with eyes of faith can they begin to understand, with God’s help, the eternal significance of their actions. A believer’s hope is not in this world. A Christian’s hope is not in the power and wealth that can be accumulated on earth. Instead, a Christian’s hope is in Christ—someone who cannot be seen at the present moment (Romans 8:24; Hebrews 11:1). Nevertheless, Jesus Christ and his significance to every person’s life is real enough. That is why Paul encouraged the Corinthians to live by faith and not by sight (5:7). The Corinthians were to take their eyes off of this world—for the troubles will soon be over. Instead, they should fix their eyes on the Almighty, the One who possessed all power, for he will bring joys to come that will last forever.

NEW BODIES / 5:1-10

As a Christian evangelist in the first century, Paul was insulted, ridiculed, and taunted. For the cause of the gospel, he faced angry mobs, irate local officials, and conceited philosophers. He spent many anxious nights in prayer and long hours working to support himself and studying the Scriptures. He received no applause, no reward, no appreciation. Why did he do this? Paul answered this question for the Corinthians. He measured all of his troubles in the light of eternity. Paul knew that he would experience infinite happiness and unending joy in the next life. This confident hope was Paul's motivation to never stop preaching the truth to all who would listen.

5:1 In the middle of discussing his own sufferings for the gospel, Paul once again broached the subject of the resurrection. His confident hope that he would be given an eternal body by God inspired him to consider his present troubles as nothing, in light of the heavenly glory he would enjoy forever and ever (see 4:17-18). Paul compared his present earthly body to a tent, a temporary structure designed to be dismantled (see also 2 Peter 1:13-15). When this earthly tent is taken down—a reference to physical death—believers will be given a home in heaven, made by God himself. The contrast is clear. Our earthly bodies are like temporary, flimsy tents, while our eternal bodies will be permanent buildings. In the same way, earthly troubles are temporary, while the glory and joy of heaven are eternal (compare with 4:17-18).

5:2-3 Paul was loaded down and weary with all sorts of troubles in this world (see 1:8; 4:8, 16-17), but his troubles inspired him to long for the day when he would receive his heavenly body like new clothing. This image depicts the glorious truth that the earthly bodies of Christians will be transformed into eternal, heavenly bodies. The believers in Corinth probably had been influenced by the Greek idea that death would free the soul from the prison of the body. This idea was probably the reason some Corinthians had begun to deny a bodily resurrection in the first place (1 Corinthians 15:12). This verse clearly repudiates the idea that believers will become spirits without bodies. Instead, believers' earthly bodies would be transformed into new heavenly bodies.

5:4 This verse adds another image to this list of images about the heavenly body. While we groan and sigh in our present bodies, we don't look forward to a time of having no bodies at all. As Jesus' own resurrection body shows, believers will have bodies that to some degree correspond with their own physical bodies. Their bodies will be redeemed (Romans 8:24). Through Christ's saving work, their resurrected bodies will be better than they can imagine. We will slip into these new bodies and will have everlasting life.

5:5 Paul's yearning for his heavenly body was not a desperate hope. God had determined long ago that believers in his Son would inherit eternal glory. This picks up the idea expressed in 4:17 that the Lord God had planned not only to justify believers through his Son's sacrificial death, but he also had planned to glorify them with heavenly bodies.

Part of God's wonderful plan to save those who believe in his Son includes the Holy Spirit as proof of his and their eternal destiny with God the Father. The Spirit is a guarantee that he will one day pay up in full. Paul envisioned Christ, on one glorious day, coming to complete the process that had already begun, with the help of the Holy Spirit, within the Corinthians' lives (see 4:16; see also Romans 8:23; Ephesians 1:13-14). Through his death, Jesus will not only save believers, he will also clothe them in heavenly glory so that they can celebrate their salvation in God's presence (Romans 8:30; 9:23). The Holy Spirit within believers is a trustworthy guarantee that God will give Christians everlasting bodies at the resurrection (1:22). Christians have eternity within them now!

5:6-7 Paul was not afraid to die because he was confident of spending eternity with Christ. In fact, being in these earthly bodies only means that believers are not yet at home with the Lord. Of course, facing the unknown may cause anxiety, and leaving loved ones hurts deeply. But because Christians believe in Jesus, they can share Paul's hope and confidence of eternal life with Christ. Because of that confidence, believers live by believing and not by seeing. Christians believe there is a greater spiritual reality that determines how they will live in eternity. To base life on what can be seen—the realities of this world—would be foolish indeed. This world will pass away, but the truth of God's word will never pass away (Matthew 24:35; 2 Peter 3:10).

5:8 This verse straightforwardly asserts that to be away from these bodies means being at home with the Lord. Paul also wrote in his letter to the Philippians that departing from this life means to "be with Christ" (Philippians 1:23). These passages have been the subject of much debate over the exact state of believers at death—what theologians call the "intermediate state" between being at home in the body (5:6) and at home with the Lord.

There are four main views of the “intermediate state”:

1. Soul sleep—This view is held by Seventh-Day Adventists and Jehovah’s Witnesses. They believe that the soul rests in unconsciousness or oblivion until the resurrection. They base this view on verses where death is referred to as “sleep.” Some have modified this view to say that believers are “with Christ,” but not in a conscious state. However, Scripture teaches the believer’s immediate presence with the Lord at death (Luke 23:43; Acts 7:56, 59).
2. Purgatory—This is the Roman Catholic view that at death those who have died in their sins and rejected Christ go to Hades for eternal punishment; those who died in a perfect state of grace go directly to heaven. Those who are not spiritually perfect go to purgatory for a refining process and purification of sin. This view has developed largely from church theologians and church councils rather than the Bible itself, although 1 Corinthians 3:15 has been used by Catholics to justify this view.
3. Immediate resurrection—This view states that at death there is an immediate separation from the earthly body and an immediate reclothing or reconstituting of the resurrection body. Proponents teach that in 1 Corinthians 15 and 1 Thessalonians 4, Paul believed in the resurrection of the body at the Second Coming and fully believed that believers would see it in their lifetime. After Paul’s brush with death and the reality that he might die before Christ returns, Paul explained what would be the case for those who died in the interval. Romans 8:19 and Colossians 3:4 are used to argue that believers are already resurrected but will be “revealed” or glorified at the Second Coming.
4. Incomplete resurrection—This view is the most commonly accepted view of Paul’s words in the New Testament. There is a conscious, personal existence for the believer after death. At death, a believer goes to a place and condition of blessedness. The time interval between the believer’s death and the full resurrection of the body will be imperceptible to the Christian. No anxiety or discomfort will mar this condition. Most do not believe this will be a bodiless existence because of Paul’s teaching (5:3-4). However, it is true that the body will not be in its complete and final form because Paul points to a future resurrection as a specific event (Philippians 3:20-21; 1 Thessalonians 4:16-17), as does Jesus (John 5:25-29). At death we will assume a different expression or condition of the bodily self; then, at the Second Coming, this will be exchanged or reconstituted as the resurrection body.

In the final analysis, Christians can only affirm exactly what the Bible says: When a believer dies, he or she will be with Jesus (see also Philippians 1:23). Believers will not float in a limbo state. Instead, they will have a personal encounter with the Savior. Then, when Jesus returns in all his glory, all believers will be given heavenly bodies that will be perfect and will last forever (see 1 Corinthians 15:51-54; 1 Thessalonians 4:16-18). A believer's life in eternity will involve some type of bodily existence. We have the example of our Lord's resurrected body as he appeared on earth. The Spirit imparted to believers in this life not only guarantees that they will be resurrected to eternal glory but also begins that transformation within believers' souls (see 4:16; 5:5).

Although this verse, along with others, has provoked much speculation, Paul's point is abundantly clear: A believer's destination—his or her eternal home with Jesus—should inspire confidence and courage in the face of life's difficulties. Although Christians may moan under the strain of persecution, their problems should never push them to despair. Like a woman in labor, believers endure the pain and suffering joyfully, because they know it is temporary and will lead to something much better: a perfect and eternal home.

5:9-10 Knowing that when you die you will be with Jesus should inspire you to live to please your Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ always. Just as you live for Christ's sake on this earth, you will continue to live for him in heaven. The transformation that the Holy Spirit is working within you now will finally be completed: You will become like Jesus (Romans 8:29-30). Eternal life is a free gift given on the basis of God's grace (Ephesians 2:8-9), but Christians' lives will still be judged by Christ. Salvation is never obtained by works (Romans 4:4-5), and this judgment before Christ will not determine believers' eternal destiny. Instead, at this judgment, Christ will reward Christians for how they have lived on earth. God's gracious gift of salvation does not free Christians from the requirement of faithful obedience to Christ. All Christians must give an account for how they have lived in this body.

Throughout 2 Corinthians, Paul tells the Corinthians how he had been careful about his speech and behavior among them because he knew Jesus was hearing what he had said and was judging it (1:14; 2:10, 17; 3:18; 4:2, 14). This passage warns the Corinthians that their speech and behavior will also be judged, and they would receive whatever they deserved for the good or evil they had done in their bodies. This is a sober reminder to all Christians that we must evaluate all we do from God's perspective. The fact that we, as Christians, will meet Jesus should inspire both joy and a holy fear—joy that we will finally be with our Savior and fear that Jesus will hold us accountable for our actions.

WE ARE GOD'S AMBASSADORS / 5:11–6:2

After reminding the Corinthians that everyone will appear before Christ's judgment seat, Paul explained that he had evaluated his own motives and actions in light of this sobering fact. He knew—and reminded himself of the fact—that God saw his motivations. His life was an open book to God. Paul didn't have to prove to God that he was sincere, for God already knew it. Paul hoped that the Corinthians, also, would understand that his actions were motivated by a healthy respect for God—not by greed or any other sinful motivation.

5:11 Paul had a solemn fear of the Lord. Many skip over fear as a motivation for serving God and instead emphasize how love should motivate Christians (see 5:14). But many forget that fear isn't fundamentally bad. Fear keeps people from jumping out of airplanes without a parachute. Fear of God means having a proper respect for his perfect nature and great power. For those who have persisted in evil and rebellious ways, contemplating God should inspire dread. Their ways have been condemned by God, and their path leads to death (see 2:14-16). Believers who contemplate God should be filled with reverential awe, standing in wonder and amazement at his greatness. Knowing God's perfection and that he will judge everyone's actions should spur Christians to work hard to persuade others to know God. This Paul did, with all sincerity.

5:12 In this letter, Paul has been extremely cautious about bragging about himself to the Corinthians. Several times he has explicitly denied doing any such thing (see 3:1; 10:18). Paul knew that in the process of patting himself on the back, he could easily fall into the trap of doing just what the false preachers were doing: bragging about their own spirituality and their own accomplishments.

Paul's Corinthian critics were more concerned about getting ahead in this world (see 2:17). They were preaching the gospel for money and popularity. They were bragging about having a spectacular ministry: eloquent speeches (11:5; 1 Corinthians 2:1), formal letters of recommendation (3:1), and impressive presentations (see 10:10-11). In contrast, Paul and his companions were preaching out of a sincere heart before God with concern for eternity and to please the ultimate Judge, God himself. The Corinthians had been dazzled by these magnificent and impressive shows. They had been captivated by their astonishing rhetoric. Subtly, they had given up striving to find God's perspective.

5:13 Exactly what Paul meant by being crazy is not entirely clear. Perhaps the Corinthians had begun to think that Paul had a mental problem. He welcomed all kinds of trials, difficulties, and sufferings and even listed them (see 4:7-9). Later, Festus would call Paul mad because of his unquenchable zeal to preach the gospel (see Acts 26:22-24). Paul had already warned the Corinthians in 1 Corinthians that the gospel and its messengers would appear foolish to the wise of this world (1 Corinthians 2:7-16). If this was the idea that Paul was trying to express, then he was saying that he was acting like a fool because of his zeal for God and the gospel. Although Paul didn't clarify his meaning, his point is abundantly clear. Paul's actions were not motivated by self-interest or a quest for power. Everything he did—whether crazy or in right mind—was to bring glory to God and to benefit the Corinthian believers.

5:14-15 Everything that Paul and his companions did was to honor God. Not only did fear of God motivate them (see 5:11), but Christ's love controlled their actions. Out of his great love, Jesus had given up his life for their sakes. He had not acted out of his own self-interest, selfishly holding on to the glory of heaven that he already possessed (Philippians 2:6). Instead, Jesus had willingly died for everyone. Those who believe that also believe that they have died to the old life. They should be willing to abandon their old, selfish ways in order to live a new life for Christ (Romans 6:6-14; Galatians 2:20; Colossians 2:20). Like Paul, we should no longer live to please ourselves. We should die to ourselves and live for Christ, who is alive today and interceding with God on our behalf (Romans 6:22).

5:16-17 At one time, Paul had evaluated Jesus by what the world thought about him. As an educated Jew, Paul was looking forward to the Messiah. But the Jews of his time were looking for a political Messiah, a powerful person who would free them from Roman rule. Instead, Jesus had died, even suffering the Romans' most cruel punishment: crucifixion. According to human standards, Jesus was merely a human being, an insignificant man who died like a criminal. But that changed at Paul's encounter with the risen Christ on the Damascus road (Acts 9:1-15). In the same way, believers are changed when they meet Christ. Christians are new people. The Holy Spirit gives them new life, and they are not the same anymore. Christians are not reformed, rehabilitated, or reeducated—they are recreated. At conversion, believers are not merely turning over a new leaf; they are beginning a new life under a new Master. The old life of sin and death has gone; the selfish, sinful human nature has been dealt a death blow (see Galatians 5:16-21, 24). Old ways of thinking, old distinctions, have been abolished. In its place, a new life has begun.

5:18-19 This newness of life is not of any human doing. God himself has begun the work. Only God can allow people to approach him. Only God can satisfy his own righteous demands. Only God can save. God is the Author and Finisher of salvation (see Hebrews 12:2). God brought his people back to himself through what Christ did. When they trust in Christ, believers are no longer God's enemies. Through Christ's self-sacrificial work on the cross, God has made believers part of his family. Jesus died in our place so that we might enjoy fellowship with God (1 Corinthians 15:3). Because believers have been reconciled to God, we have been given the task of reconciling people to him. Since Paul experienced reconciliation through Christ, it became his mission to preach that message. Just in case the Corinthians had forgotten the heart of Paul's message to them, he repeated it to them: God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, no longer counting people's sins against them. God, through Christ's death on the cross, was bringing back all people—Jews and Greeks alike—who had fallen (Romans 5:10; Ephesians 2:14-17). Although we were enemies of God, Christ reached out to us, saving us from certain destruction. He even washed us in order that we might approach God with clean hearts (Colossians 1:21-22). That is indeed a wonderful message.

5:20-21 Ambassadors are official representatives of one country to another. Paul described himself and his coworkers as Christ's ambassadors, representatives of Christ to the world (5:19). God was using them to speak to the Corinthians the message that they be reconciled to God—accept God's free gift of reconciliation. Paul did not announce this message halfheartedly. He implored—even urged and pleaded—everyone who would listen to him to accept God's free gift of salvation. It was extremely urgent, for it would change their eternal destiny.

And it was a gift that had an expensive price tag. For God made Christ, who never sinned, to be the offering for our sin, so that we could be made right with God through Christ. Christ bore the consequences of, or punishment for, our sins. God made Jesus, who was completely innocent and perfect, identify himself with sin so he could take it away.

In life, rarely will anyone claim perfection. Sin is a part of life, so much so that many people simply expect to encounter dishonesty, self-centeredness, and greed in other people. If they don't, they are surprised. That is why many people in Jesus' day expressed surprise at Jesus' life. They could not find anything wrong with him (see Pilate's words in Luke 23:4-22, the centurion's words in Luke 23:41-48, and God's testimony in Matthew 3:17; 17:5). The disciples, Jesus' closest friends and followers, did not find any evil in his actions (see Peter's testimony in 1 Peter 2:22 and John's testimony in 1 John 3:5). Jesus never knew what it meant to sin: He always followed God's ways. Yet Jesus bore the consequences of believers' sin for their sakes. Since Jesus, who was perfect and innocent, took on the penalty of sin, death itself, Jesus can make those who believe in him right with God. His perfect righteousness can cover our corrupt and imperfect lives. When people trust in Christ, they make an exchange—their sin for his righteousness. Believers' sin was placed on Jesus at his crucifixion. His righteousness is given to believers at their conversion. This is what Christians mean by Christ's atonement for sin.

6:1-2 Paul and his fellow partners with God in sharing the salvation message begged the Corinthians not to reject it. They should take God's grace seriously and live up to the gospel's demands. Paul was imploring the Corinthians, who had already accepted Jesus, to live up to their profession of faith (see 5:14).

The prophet Isaiah predicted a time of God's own choosing when he would save his people: God would release them from bondage and clear a path for them to return to their land and restore their fortunes (see Isaiah 49:8-12, 23-26). God would do all this so that the whole world would know that he was Israel's Savior and Redeemer (Isaiah 49:26). The Hebrews who had heard Isaiah's message long ago would have understood this as a prediction that God would one day bring the Israelites back out of their exile in Babylon. This did occur (see Ezra 1).

Paul, however, understood Isaiah's prediction as also being fulfilled in his day. God had sent Jesus to the earth. It was the day of salvation. So Paul, being God's messenger just as Isaiah was, echoed Isaiah's message with even more urgency. Paul announced that what Isaiah was looking forward to had occurred. God offers salvation to all people. Many people put off making a decision to receive God's salvation, thinking that there will be a better time—but they could easily miss their opportunity altogether. Today is the day of salvation. There is no time like the present to receive God's forgiveness.

2 CORINTHIANS 6:3–7:1

PAUL'S HARDSHIPS / 6:3-13

Paul had demonstrated his willingness to suffer all kinds of hardships—beatings, imprisonments, poverty, and even insults—for Jesus. He had a single-hearted commitment to Christ. This extraordinary commitment, demonstrated by the sufferings he had endured, was proof of his apostolic authority. Instead of submitting a list of successes and accomplishments, Paul submitted a list of difficult situations that he had endured for Christ.

6:3-5 Paul knew that unbelievers and believers alike were watching his life. God had entrusted Paul with the message of truth; he, in turn, had to live up to God's ways. That is why he was careful to be straightforward, honest, and upright (see 1:12). Any wrongdoing—or anything that was perceived to be wrong—might distract from the gospel message (4:2; 1 Corinthians 1:17). Paul did not want anyone to be hindered from finding the Lord or to give people cause to find fault with their ministry. The last thing he wanted to do was bring ridicule on God's glorious plan of salvation. So in everything he and his fellow workers did, they tried to show that they were true ministers of God. The Corinthians, however, had begun to doubt Paul's credentials and, more importantly, his authority over them (see 12:11). So Paul listed the different situations in which he had served God. Similar to his weaknesses in 4:8-10, this list includes troubles, hardships, and calamities that most preachers would not catalog for their audiences.

For preaching Christ, Paul had been beaten. In 11:23-25, Paul recalls that he had been whipped five times by the Jews. He also had been beaten with rods by the civil authorities on three separate occasions. Luke recorded in the book of Acts that Paul and Silas suffered this punishment at Philippi (see Acts 16:23-24).

Paul had been put in jail in Philippi (Acts 16:23). In almost every city, Paul had faced angry mobs, usually stirred up by resentful Jews. In Pisidian Antioch, Jews stirred the high-ranking men and women of the city to expel him from that city (Acts 13:49-52). In Iconium, the citizens plotted to stone Paul to death (Acts 14:5-6). In Lystra, an angry mob did stone him, and, miraculously, he survived it and went to the next town to preach the Good News (Acts 14:19). At Philippi, a mob seized Paul and Silas and had them imprisoned (Acts 16:19-24). At Thessalonica, a crowd looking for Paul surrounded Jason's house (Acts 17:5). At Ephesus, an enraged mob of silversmiths seized Paul's traveling companions (Acts 19:23-41). Even during Paul's ministry among the Corinthians, the Jews of Corinth seized Paul and brought him before the governor (see Acts 18:12-17). Everywhere Paul preached the gospel, he was met with incensed mobs. He expected opposition, but he also expected Jesus to see him through those difficult situations (see 1:3-7).

After listing some of the involuntary hardships he faced, Paul mentioned the hardships he had endured voluntarily in order to further the cause of the gospel. Paul not only dutifully faced all kinds of opposition for Christ, he also made personal sacrifices so that he could continue to announce the Good News. Paul had worked to exhaustion so as not to become a burden to the people he was preaching to, especially the Corinthians (see 11:9). In Thessalonica, he worked night and day; perhaps this caused some of those sleepless nights Paul endured (1 Thessalonians 2:9; 3:8). Perhaps some of those voluntary sleepless nights were not spent in physical labor but in prayer for all the churches. Moreover, Paul had gone without food. He may have done this in order to not be a financial burden for the people to whom he was ministering (see 11:7-10).

6:6 In the middle of his list of the difficult situations he faced for the cause of Christ, Paul listed five character traits of an effective minister of the gospel.

First, he and his coworkers had acted in purity. To be pure means to be free of any contamination. Paul's actions (1 Timothy 5:22) and thoughts (Philippians 4:8) were pure. Paul may have had in mind a phony preacher's motivations—such as greed and self-interest—which were contaminating the messages of many preachers who had visited Corinth (see Paul's description of these traveling preachers in 4:2).

Second, he and his coworkers had understanding of the gospel message. Christ had revealed to Paul the mysteries of salvation (Ephesians 3:6). Paul understood the gospel and knew he had to communicate it clearly (1:12).

Third, they had patience. Paul had learned patience through all of these difficult situations. In the end, however, any patience he had was from the Holy Spirit, for in Galatians Paul explicitly stated that “the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control” (Galatians 5:22-23). The Holy Spirit empowered all of their efforts.

Fourth, they treated others with kindness. Through the Spirit's power, Paul had learned to consider others' needs above his own. Realizing how much God had done for him, Paul sought to show that same type of mercy to others.

Finally, they had sincere love. The self-sacrificial love that Jesus had shown to the Corinthians when he died for them on the cross (see Romans 5:5) was the type of love Paul attempted to emulate in his ministry.

6:7 Although they had encountered all kinds of opposition when they preached the Good News, Paul and the others continued to faithfully preach the truth. Although traveling preachers were deceiving the Corinthians with a false gospel (see 4:2; 11:4), they had God's power working in them to continue to bring that truth. Even more, they had righteousness as a weapon with which they could attack and defend themselves. A Roman soldier would arm himself with a full-length shield in his left hand and a spear in his right hand. No Roman soldier was fully prepared for battle without both weapons: his shield on his left and his spear on his right. Ephesians 6:10-18 lists, along with righteousness, the other spiritual weapons. They consist of the gospel message itself, the truth of God's word, and faith. In order to resist the Devil, Christians need to not only immerse themselves in the truths of God's word and the gospel itself, they need to put their faith into action. The righteousness God gives Christians through faith in Christ should be evident in the way they live. Then Christians will be able to withstand Satan's attacks.

6:8-10 A pastor's job is to confront people with the truths of the gospel. But sometimes this responsibility is neglected because a pastor is more concerned about being liked. The traveling preachers in Corinth were like this. They had told the Corinthians what they wanted to hear.

Instead of worrying about the reaction of his audience, Paul focused on whom he was serving: God (6:4). He would serve God whether he was honored or despised, whether he was slandered or praised. No flattery or insult would distract Paul from preaching the Good News.

This passage contrasts how God evaluated Paul's ministry with how his critics saw it. God's evaluation mattered most to Paul, for he had his sights set on eternity, not on the temporary conditions of the present (see 5:1-10). The paradox was that though Paul and his coworkers were completely honest, they were still being accused as impostors. They had renounced all deceptive means to communicate the holy message of God (see 4:2). They used no tricks or games. Instead, Paul preached the truth with a genuine frankness and with the power of God himself (see 1 Corinthians 2:4).

Paul's preaching and actions were well known, but he was treated as unknown. Some considered his message as foolishness (see Acts 17:18-21, 32-33; 18:14-17; 1 Corinthians 2:6-10). Second Corinthians began with an explanation of how Paul had faced death in Asia Minor (present-day Turkey; see 1:8). But he was still alive. Paul had been beaten on numerous occasions for preaching the gospel (see 6:5; 11:23-24). In the first century, often people would die of a beating at the hands of the authorities. The Jews used whips with metal pieces, which would tear into the flesh. The Roman authorities beat offenders with rods. Both beatings could be severe enough to kill a person.

In addition to hardships, Paul's ministry involved mental anguish. Paul had agonized over the Corinthians' spiritual welfare, as well as the welfare of other churches. He had spent night and day in prayer, committing these churches and their congregations to the Lord (see Romans 10:1; Philippians 1:9; 1 Thessalonians 3:10; 2 Thessalonians 1:11). Although the hearts of him and his coworkers would ache over the churches, they were filled with joy because they knew what their spiritual struggles would accomplish. Being poor was another hardship. Through his deprivation, however, Paul had learned to be content with what God had given him (Philippians 4:12) for Paul knew that he already possessed everything—that is, the riches of a Kingdom that would last forever (see Matthew 6:19-21).

6:11-13 Paul had been completely straightforward with the Corinthians. His transparent honesty is mentioned at numerous places in this letter (1:12-13, 23-24; 2:17; 4:1-2; 5:11). But critics at Corinth were accusing Paul of some sort of deception. Paul hoped that the very fact that he was cataloging his own weaknesses and sufferings before the Corinthians would testify to his openness. Paul had revealed his true feelings for the Corinthian believers—he and his coworkers had no lack of love. The Corinthians, however, were withholding their love from them. As Paul would explain in this letter, any harsh words he had for the Corinthians came from his deep love for them (see 7:8-13). He wanted them to grow in the faith. Paul hoped his sincerity in this letter—the way he opened up his life to the Corinthians' examination—would prompt them to also open their hearts to him.

As founder of the church, Paul had fatherly affections for the Corinthians. He had spent hours agonizing over the believers' spiritual welfare (11:28) and had worked hard for them. But like rebellious children, the Corinthians had returned Paul's concern with a cold heart. Although Paul could have commanded and disciplined them, he merely pleaded with them. He wanted to give them a chance to reform their ways (see Paul's attitude in 2:1-4; 13:5).

THE TEMPLE OF THE LIVING GOD / 6:14–7:1

The unique Greek writing style of this section indicates that Paul most likely was quoting an early Christian sermon, perhaps even a Jewish sermon. He had already exhorted the Corinthians to be reconciled to God (5:20-21; 6:1-2) and was pleading with them to open their hearts to him as God's messenger (6:11-12). In this short sermon quote, Paul was reminding the Corinthians what reconciliation to God means. If they were to open their hearts to him as God's messenger (6:13), they had to separate themselves from the wickedness of unbelievers. Their pagan neighbors would only tempt them to reject God's word and God's ways.

6:14-15 After passionately appealing to the Corinthians to open their hearts to him, Paul exhorted them, “Don’t team up with those who are unbelievers.” He urged them not to form binding relationships with nonbelievers because this might weaken their Christian commitment, integrity, or standards.

Earlier, Paul had explained that not associating with unbelievers did not mean isolation from nonbelievers (see 1 Corinthians 5:9-10). The Corinthians were even to remain with their unbelieving spouses (1 Corinthians 7:12-13). In order to witness to their neighbors, believers were to adopt some of the customs of the people to whom they were witnessing (1 Corinthians 9:2).

So what did it mean to avoid “teaming up”? The picture is of teaming up two animals, such as an ox and a mule, to plow a field. However, because the plow would be pulled unevenly or the weight being carried would be spilled, it wouldn't work out (see Deuteronomy 22:10). In the same way, a believer and an unbeliever are categorically different. Teaming up with unbelievers would lead to disaster. The Corinthian church was having a difficult time separating themselves from the immoral practices of their unbelieving neighbors. Paul was telling the Corinthians to avoid any situation that would compromise their faith or their Christian morals. Why? Because goodness cannot partner with wickedness; light cannot live with darkness; Christ and the Devil cannot live in harmony. Therefore, how can a believer be a partner with an unbeliever? While this verse applies to all partnerships and alliances, marriage certainly comes under this teaching.

6:16-18 As building blocks of God's temple, each individual had to maintain a holy life, set apart to God. There was no room for any mixed loyalties. No compromise or agreement had been made between the true God and idols.

Several Old Testament quotes illustrate how the church at Corinth was a fulfillment of God's promises long ago. When God brought the Israelites out of Egyptian bondage, he made them his holy people. He had them construct a tabernacle, where his glorious presence would reside in its inner sanctuary. In this sense, God would live in them—even walk among them. He wasn't going to be a far-off God, who watched the Israelites from a distance. The Israelites were his people, and he would be their God (see Leviticus 26:11-12).

The prophet Ezekiel also prophesied of a time when God would live among his people forever (see Ezekiel 37:26-28). By quoting this passage, Paul was saying that Ezekiel's prophecy was being fulfilled in the Corinthian church. Jesus, a descendant of David and the Son of God himself, had defeated Satan. He had begun his reign as the King of a heavenly Kingdom. As believers, the Corinthians were part of this spiritual Kingdom. Jesus, as God in human form, had literally shown people what God was like (Matthew 1:23; John 1:14). In a real sense, God had lived among his people. After Jesus' resurrection and ascension, God sent his Holy Spirit to the believers who had gathered in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost. From that day to the present, every believer has God living within his or her spirit (Romans 8:9; 1 Corinthians 6:19; 2 Timothy 1:14).

After telling the Corinthians not to partner with unbelievers, Paul quickly gave them a positive command. Instead of partnering with unbelievers, they were to separate from anything that was sinful. To emphasize his point, Paul strung together several Old Testament quotes. He loosely quoted Isaiah 52:11. Originally this was a command for the exiles to come out of Babylon and to abandon any object associated with pagan worship. In this passage, Paul interpreted this command as also a command to Christians to separate themselves from the immorality of the pagan peoples around them.

Paul continued his comparison of the Corinthian Christians with the returning Israelite exiles. The phrase "I will welcome you" is an adaptation of Ezekiel's prophecy that God would gather all of Israel's exiles together (see Ezekiel 20:34). Finally, Paul adapted God's promise to be the Father of David's Son (see 2 Samuel 7:14; see also Hebrews 1:5, where the author interpreted this verse as a prophecy about Jesus) to also refer to believers. Christians would become the sons and daughters of God (see Isaiah 43:6 where Isaiah prophesied of a time when God would gather all his sons and daughters together). Through Christ's death, believers have become part of God's loving family (see Galatians 4:1-7).

7:1 Because God has given these promises: to live with his people (6:16), to welcome them as his people (6:17), and to act like a loving Father toward them (6:18), Christians are to cleanse themselves of everything that can defile. The Corinthians were to have nothing to do with paganism. They were to make a clean break with their past and give themselves to God alone. Work toward complete purity means "becoming mature" or "becoming complete." Thus, Paul wasn't suggesting that the Corinthians could become sinless in this life. Instead, he was prodding the Corinthians to work at maturing in their faith. God had provided them with all the resources they needed, and Christ's Spirit would empower them to become Christlike (see Romans 8:2).

Paul exhorted the Corinthians to pursue purity out of fear of God. “Fear” means to keep respect or awe for God. He is the almighty Creator. Obeying God’s commands and pursuing spiritual maturity are the best ways to show respect for God.

2 CORINTHIANS 7:2-16

PAUL'S JOY AT THE CHURCH'S REPENTANCE / 7:2-16

Paul here resumed his story about his recent travel plans (7:5). Concerned about the accusations against his authority and his ministry circulating in Corinth, Paul spent these chapters (2:14–7:4) explaining and defending his ministry to the Corinthians. He ended this extended defense by appealing to the Corinthians to not only reconcile themselves to God but also to reconcile themselves to himself as God's messenger (see 6:13 and 7:2). So this (7:3) was a logical place to resume a description of his latest travels (from 2:13), for Titus had told Paul of the Corinthians' steps at reconciling themselves to Paul. The joy of meeting Titus had been accompanied by an even greater joy: Paul had been delighted to hear that the Corinthians were sorry about the distressing incident that occurred on his last visit and that they longed for him to visit them again (see 7:7). This was not only a reunion between Titus and Paul, but also a spiritual reunion between Paul and the Corinthians.

7:2-3 This repeats Paul's plea in 6:13 for them to open their hearts to Paul and his coworkers. This appeal logically follows Paul's exhortation to the Corinthians to separate themselves from relationships with unbelievers that would compromise their loyalty to Christ (see 6:14–7:1). This appeal is coupled with three denials. Most likely, Paul was responding to accusations that the Corinthians had been repeating. Not one person among the Corinthians had been wronged, led astray, or taken advantage of. All three words are translations of Greek words that were commonly used for deceitful and exploitative financial dealings. Paul's critics may have been criticizing the collection for the Jerusalem church (see 8:1-7). The end of this letter contains a strong defense against this charge—that is, the charge of financially exploiting the believers (12:13, 17-18).

Paul had spent considerable time defending his ministry (see the previous verse and 1:23; 3:1-6; 4:1-2, 8-10; 5:6-10; 6:3-13). The believers at Corinth may even have thought that Paul was abandoning them or dismissing them as genuine Christians. Here Paul assured the Corinthians that this was not his intent. On the contrary, Paul considered himself so intimately connected to the Corinthians that not even death could separate them. In Christ, he would live with the Corinthians and even die with them.

7:4 Like a loving father, Paul had boasted to Titus of the Corinthians and hoped to boast about them before Jesus (see 1:14; 7:14). Paul possessed the highest confidence in them, and that hope had been realized by Titus's recent report (see 7:14). Moreover, even though Paul had recently faced many troubles, knowing that the Corinthians were maturing in the faith had encouraged him and made him happy.

7:5-7 Here Paul resumed the story that he left off in 2:13 of how he had forsaken some exciting evangelistic opportunities in Troas in order to look for Titus in Macedonia. He knew that Titus had visited Corinth and would have some news of how the Corinthians were progressing in their faith. So like a father who was anxious to hear news of his children, Paul had hurried ahead to find out how the Corinthians were doing.

On leaving Troas, Paul continued to face conflict. Paul's first visit to Macedonia had been a tumultuous one, and it appears that this one was also. On his first visit, a group of Jews from Thessalonica had followed him all over the province of Macedonia, opposing his teaching (see Acts 17:13). Perhaps it was those determined opponents in Thessalonica who harassed Paul on this journey. Paul's letters to the Thessalonians reveal that the church was enduring much persecution (see 1 Thessalonians 1:6-8; 2 Thessalonians 1:4). Paul was also beset by fear. He had already told the Corinthians that he was concerned about Titus's and the Corinthians' welfare (see 2:13). But God had encouraged him at the right time with the arrival of Titus. Being reunited with a fellow laborer in Christ brought Paul joy.

But more than that, the news he brought from Corinth was cause for joy. Titus had been sent on a difficult mission. He had to deliver a stern letter from Paul that exhorted the Corinthians to right some wrongs. No one knew—especially Paul, who was greatly concerned about the whole matter (see 2:13)—how the Corinthians would react. Titus brought word that the Corinthians had welcomed him and his unpleasant message. He had been welcomed as an emissary of Paul.

Moreover, the Corinthians had given Titus encouragement; as a result, Titus could encourage Paul. According to Titus's report, the Corinthians were truly sorry about the incident and wanted to reaffirm their commitment to Paul and let him know of their love for him. They were even looking forward to Paul's next visit. Naturally, such a report would encourage any leader. After a rocky period between Paul and the Corinthians, the church was correcting some of the problems that had arisen in their congregation. They were ready for Paul to visit them.

7:8-9 Paul's previous letter to the Corinthians was the one he had cried over because he had to censure them (see 2:1-4 for a discussion of this letter). It has become generally accepted that 1 Corinthians was not the letter to which Paul was here alluding, primarily because 1 Corinthians as a whole does not reflect the extreme sorrow described by Paul here and in 2:4. In this letter, he had exhorted the Corinthians to discipline their members who persisted in error—specifically, the one who had publicly opposed Paul’s authority (see 2:1-4; 7:8; 13:1-4). At first, Paul was sorry that he had sent that letter. He had written it with a great amount of anguish (see 2:4), knowing that his tone and his message would be painful to the Corinthian believers. But Titus’s report that they were still anxiously awaiting his visit and had reaffirmed their loyalty to him had caused Paul to change his mind. The letter had produced its desired effect. Although harsh, it had produced a change of heart in the Corinthians, the repentance that God desired.

The repentance Paul wanted was not merely anguish over the acrimonious situation or a regret that it had ever happened. Godly repentance implies a reorientation of the entire person away from sins and toward God’s ways. It is a “turning around.” The type of remorse that compels a person to change his or her direction is what God wants—not “sorrow” that paralyzes or becomes resentful. To Paul’s great joy, the disciplinary letter had not harmed the church.

7:10 Many people are sorry only for the effects of their sins or for being caught. In the original Greek, sorrow without repentance literally means “the sorrow of the world.” When people do not channel their grief over their behavior into life-changing actions, it is unproductive grief. It leads to self-pity. But godly sorrow is practical and action-oriented. When a person realizes what he or she has done wrong, that person should not only regret the error but also turn back to God. Only God can empower people to change their ways. Only God can save people from the way sin imprisons them and paralyzes them. Only God can help us turn away from sin and seek salvation.

Compare the stories of Peter and Judas. Both handled the events surrounding Jesus’ death in a wrong way. Judas brazenly betrayed Jesus with a kiss (Mark 14:43-46). Peter denied knowing Jesus three different times (John 18:15-27). Both were overcome with grief over their actions (Matthew 26:75; 27:3). Although Peter was distraught, he had the humility and the courage to admit his failure, reform his behavior, and rededicate his life to Jesus’ cause (see John 21:15-19). In contrast, Judas let his remorse eat at his soul. Eventually overcome by guilt, he committed suicide. Judas wasn’t able to learn from his sin and repent. He didn’t submit his sins to Christ and beg to be forgiven. He was too proud to cry out for salvation, so his stubbornness led to death.

7:11 Titus's encouraging report from Corinth gave Paul the evidence that the Corinthians had responded appropriately to his stern letter—with godly sorrow. That sorrow produced earnestness and a concern to clear themselves. Titus had explained the Corinthians' reaction to Paul's letter step-by-step; and Paul listed those steps here, approving each one. The letter had inspired appropriate indignation, or displeasure, about what had been happening among them. It had also caused alarm. Perhaps the Corinthians were fearful of God's divine judgment or Paul's discipline. Their intense longing and great zeal to restore their damaged relationship with Paul had led them to take prompt action to punish the wrongdoer. Paul praised them in glowing terms. Their zeal to make things right was exactly the kind of behavior God's holy people should exhibit.

7:12-13 Paul's primary purpose was to save the deteriorating relationship between himself and the Corinthians; and according to the previous verse, the letter had done just that. Although the Corinthians knew who did the wrong and who was wronged, Paul discreetly didn't mention names because more than likely his letter would be circulated in all the churches of southern Greece. Since Paul was instructing the Corinthians to restore this man to Christian fellowship, Paul didn't want his name to be unnecessarily despised. What was more important to Paul than exactly who the offender was and what he had done was the furtherance of the cause of the gospel in Corinth. Paul reminded the Corinthians that their relationship to him wasn't trivial. Everything he did would benefit them in some way; their prayers and actions would, in turn, encourage him in his task of preaching the gospel (see 1:6-7, 11; 7:4). They were so interdependent because everything each of them did was in the sight of God—in fact, in his presence (2:10, 17; 3:4; 4:14). They were all part of God's family.

The Corinthians' appropriate reaction to Paul's disciplinary letter had encouraged Paul. In addition, he was encouraged by the way Titus had been welcomed. Even though the church in Corinth was in turmoil, Titus had taken on the challenge of delivering the disagreeable news to the Corinthians. No one—not even Paul—knew how the Corinthians would respond. Yet Titus was pleasantly surprised. The Corinthians welcomed him and his message.

7:14-16 Even though the Corinthians had caused Paul so much pain and grief (see 2:4; 8:16; 11:28), Paul still was proud of his spiritual children. He refused to focus on their weaknesses and failures; instead, he praised their strengths (see how he praised the Corinthians at 8:7; 1 Corinthians 14:12). Paul was glad that his boasting about them to Titus had proved true. Their treatment of him had, in turn, moved Titus to care for them more than ever. Paul's confidence had not been misplaced.

2 CORINTHIANS 8

A CALL TO GENEROUS GIVING / 8:1-15

About a year before the writing of 2 Corinthians, the believers in Corinth had started collecting money for the poor in Jerusalem (see 8:10). First Corinthians instructed the Corinthians to set aside money every week for the offering (see 1 Corinthians 16:1-4). But that collection had floundered (see 8:10-11). It appears that greedy, traveling preachers (2:17) had suggested that Paul had invented the collection to extort money from the congregation. They asserted this, even though Paul had taken no money from the Corinthians to support his own ministry (7:2; 11:7-9; 12:14-17). He had supported himself as a tentmaker when he was in Corinth (Acts 18:1-4). These traveling preachers may have very well wanted to divert the money to themselves (2:17). In any case, one of the purposes of 2 Corinthians was to encourage the Corinthians (in a diplomatic way) to finish the collection they had started a year ago (8:10-11; 9:1-3).

8:1 Paul's great tact with the Corinthians should be noted. Although Paul planned to ask the Corinthians to collect money for the impoverished Jerusalem Christians, he first presented them with an illustration of admirable generosity: the giving of the churches in Macedonia.

8:2 Paul had founded the Macedonian churches on his second missionary journey. Although Jesus had called Paul and his fellow evangelists to Macedonia, they had experienced opposition to the preaching of the gospel at every turn (see Acts 16:6-10). From Paul's letters to the Thessalonians and to the Philippians, it appears that this persecution did not subside after Paul's initial visit. In spite of their trouble and hard times, the Macedonian Christians had grown in their Christian faith, endeavoring to imitate Jesus in every situation (see Philippians 1:29-30; 1 Thessalonians 1:6; 2:1-2, 14). And despite their deep poverty, they still gave generously. They were filled with wonderful joy because they possessed the message of salvation (see 1 Thessalonians 1:6) and had faith in God (see Philippians 1:25-26). Their joy overflowed in rich generosity. They considered their monetary gifts to the Jerusalem Christians as a small token of their appreciation to God for their eternal salvation.

8:3-4 Paul continued to praise the Macedonians for their attitude about giving. Apparently, the Macedonians had calculated how much they could give and then tried to exceed that amount. Their giving was far more than what Paul expected.

In fact, Paul had been reluctant to ask for money for the Jerusalem Christians. It was the Macedonians who, of their own free will, had begged to be a part of the privilege of sharing in this gift.

8:5 The Macedonians' giving was not motivated by a desire for praise from Paul or others. Their generosity was fundamentally motivated by their desire to serve the Lord. They first dedicated themselves to God and expressed the desire to follow whatever directions God might give them. They gave because they knew they were God's. Everything they had—even their very souls—were God's. Knowing this, they devoted themselves to serving Jesus and his Kingdom in any way they could.

8:6 Titus would return to Corinth and encourage the believers to complete their share in this ministry of giving—in other words, to finish the collection efforts there. On a previous visit, Titus had encouraged the Corinthians to continue collecting sums of money every week for the Jerusalem church as Paul had instructed (1 Corinthians 16:1-4). Apparently, the Corinthians' giving had dwindled.

8:7-8 The Corinthian church had a great amount of spiritual gifts—they excelled in faith, gifted speakers, knowledge, and love. Paul placed giving alongside other gifts, asking that the Corinthians excel in that ministry as well. Giving is a natural response of Christian love. Paul did not order the Corinthians to give; he encouraged them to prove the sincerity of their love for Christ. When you love someone, you want to help that person. You want to give your time, your attention, and your possessions to enrich that person. If you refuse to help, your love is not as sincere as you say it is.

8:9 The Corinthian church—a wealthy church—had pledged a great deal of money, but they had not yet given any of it. Paul was concerned that they might never get around to giving what they had promised, so he gave them two models of generous giving. Paul had given them the first model: the poor Macedonian Christians who had enthusiastically given beyond what they could afford. Then in this verse, Paul gave another model: Jesus himself. Although the Macedonians had shown a great amount of generosity, their sacrifice couldn't compare with Jesus' giving of himself. Jesus' action was the ultimate model for the Corinthians.

Jesus became poor for the Corinthians' sakes by generously giving up his rights as God and becoming human. He even voluntarily surrendered himself to death on a cross—the most cruel and humiliating death known at that time. Yet by doing so, he made all who believe in him rich. Christians have not only been saved through his self-sacrificial actions, they have also been accepted into God’s family (5:8, 18). That means that they have a glorious, eternal inheritance in heaven (4:18; 5:1).

8:10-11 Paul was careful not to command the Corinthians (8:8), but he strongly suggested that they finish what they had started a year before. This passage appeals to the Corinthians’ competitive spirit (see also 8:1-2, 6-8). They had been the first in two ways: They were the first to suggest this collection, and they were the first to contribute substantially to the fund. Now they should carry this project through to completion. He challenged the Corinthians to give whatever they could according to what they had. Four principles of giving emerge in the following verses:

1. Your willingness to give cheerfully is more important than the amount you give (8:12; 9:5).
2. You should strive to fulfill your financial commitments (see also 9:5).
3. If you give to others in need, they will, in turn, help you when you are in need (8:14).
4. You should give as a response to Christ, not for anything you can get out of it (8:9; 9:13).

How you give reflects your devotion to Christ. Don’t rush into a commitment to give. Evaluate your finances so that you will be able to keep your promise.

8:12 Paul wasn’t concerned about the total amount the Corinthians would raise, but he wanted them to be eager in giving. When he spoke of the Macedonians’ giving, he did not tell the Corinthians how much the Macedonians had given but how they had given: with great joy out of their devotion to Christ (8:2-5). Paul was more concerned about the Corinthians’ attitude than whether he reached a certain goal in his fund-raising.

Although what the Corinthians possessed was a gift from God in the first place (1 Corinthians 4:7), Paul asked them to give of what they had, not what they didn’t have. Sacrificial giving must be responsible.

8:13-14 Paul wanted the Corinthians to give generously but not to the extent that those who depended on the givers (their families, for example) must suffer from having too little. Give until it hurts, but don’t give so that it hurts your family or relatives who need your financial support.

The Jerusalem Christians had been poor for some time. About a decade before this collection, the believers in Antioch had sent Paul and Barnabas with some monetary relief for the church at Jerusalem. Palestine had been hit with a severe famine, and apparently the believers in Jerusalem were in great need (see Acts 11:27-30). Most likely, the Jerusalem Christians remained extremely poor because of their social ostracism. Apparently, the Christians in and around Jerusalem had limited ways to support themselves—even a decade later. Paul considered the poverty of the Jerusalem Christians as an opportunity for Gentile believers. They could dispel any doubts about the genuineness of their faith by demonstrating it through giving generously to the Jerusalem church—the church that had sacrificed in the beginning to send evangelists throughout the Roman world (see Paul’s explanation of the collection in Romans 15:25-27). Paul hoped their generosity would smooth over some of the hesitancy of some Jewish Christians to accept Gentiles into the church.

In the end, the giving and the receiving of money would tie the entire church together. Each would be dependent on the other. Just as the Gentiles had been dependent on the Jewish Christians for the wonderful message of salvation, the Jews would be dependent on the Gentiles for financial support. In this way, everyone’s needs will be met. Paul appealed to the principle of equality. Each church should provide for other churches as the need arose. Each church should help the others out of the resources God had given it. If one church was wealthy, it could meet the others’ needs. When conditions reversed, the formerly poor church might be able to return the favor.

8:15 Paul quoted Exodus 16:18 to illustrate how everyone’s needs would be met. In the wilderness, the Israelites could not find enough food to feed all of their number. So God provided food from heaven: manna. These thin, white flakes appeared on the ground every morning. God told the Israelites to gather as much as they needed for the day. Some gathered more than others, but each had enough for the day. Those who were greedy tried to store the manna for the next day. They didn’t trust God for what they needed. Their lack of trust was rewarded with a smelly, maggot-ridden mess (see Exodus 16:19).

Although God didn’t supply the first-century Christians’ needs the same way, Paul saw the same principles at work. God would provide everyone with what they needed. Although some had more and others had less, everyone’s needs would be met in the end. God wanted the wealthy to give out of their surplus so that the needy could have enough. It wasn’t a matter of exact equality; instead, it was a matter of fairness or justice.

TITUS AND HIS COMPANIONS / 8:16-24

The rest of chapter 8 is, in essence, a letter of recommendation for Titus and two anonymous “brothers.” Titus was an official representative of Paul, while the “brothers” were representatives of churches that had contributed to the Jerusalem fund (see 8:18, 22).

8:16-17 Paul first commended Titus to the Corinthians. He had already emphasized how encouraged Titus was after his initial visit with them (see 7:13-15). The Corinthians had welcomed Titus, had respected his message to them, and had even provided for his needs (see 7:7, 15). When Paul asked Titus to visit Corinth again, he welcomed Paul’s request. Titus had been eager to go and see them. He had the same enthusiasm Paul did in wanting to spur the Corinthians to excel in giving (see 8:7).

8:18-19 Paul took some steps to guard the integrity of the Jerusalem collection. A brother had been appointed by the churches to ensure that the money would be given to its intended recipients. Paul didn’t want any allegations of financial impropriety. This brother would function as a representative for the churches to ensure that the money of the Jerusalem collection would be handled properly. Paul did not want anyone to accuse him of mishandling this gift for the Jerusalem Christians, for that would defeat his entire purpose. The gift was to promote unity in the early church, not division.

8:20-21 Paul didn’t want anyone to be suspicious of his handling of the money. Therefore, he was careful that his actions were not only honorable before the Lord, who saw all things, but also before people, who look on the appearance of things (see Proverbs 3:4). In order to finish the collection without any suspicion, Paul continued to refrain from collecting the money himself. Instead, he sent someone whom the Corinthians respected and trusted: Titus. Accompanying Titus were two other representatives from the churches who contributed to the fund to oversee how the money was handled.

8:22 Paul recommended the third brother to the Corinthians in these verses. Although Paul didn’t mention this person’s name, he made it clear that the man had proven himself. This man’s zeal for Christ had been thoroughly tested and he had passed these tests. Besides, this man had evidently heard about the Corinthians from Paul and Titus, and he possessed the same confidence that Paul had in them (see 7:13-16).

8:23 The last two verses of this chapter summarize Paul’s recommendation of Titus and his two traveling companions. He called Titus his partner to emphasize Titus's authority among the Corinthians. Titus was Paul's official representative to the Corinthians to collect the money for the relief of the Jerusalem Christians (8:6). The two representatives of the churches who accompanied Titus were also recommended by Paul to the Corinthians (the complete list of representatives is given in Acts 20:4). The Greek for "representatives" is apostoloi—literally, apostles. In the Gospels, this Greek word is only used for the Twelve. Paul in his letters, however, used the term for any representative of a church commissioned for some special task.

8:24 Paul told the Corinthians to shower their Christian love on these fellow believers, just as they had welcomed Titus before (see 7:7, 13). These men were representing the other churches; therefore, the Corinthians should conduct themselves in an appropriate way, for their conduct would be broadcast to other churches by these representatives. Paul wanted the believers to prove that his boasting about them was justified.

2 CORINTHIANS 9

THE COLLECTION FOR CHRISTIANS IN JERUSALEM / 9:1-15

This passage reminds the Corinthians of their initial enthusiasm for the Jerusalem collection, their delight that God could use them to help other believers. Their enthusiasm was contagious. The Macedonians had heard of their eagerness and had also eagerly responded to the appeal for money. As Paul was preparing to collect the last of the contributions, however, the Corinthians' enthusiasm had waned. The collection had ground to a halt. Paul was worried that when he came to Corinth the Corinthians would give grudgingly. God wants cheerful givers and enthusiastic team players (9:7). He can do without selfish and disgruntled givers.

9:1-2 Paul was not sending Titus and his representatives to Corinth (8:16-24) in order to explain the collection and how it would benefit the Jerusalem Christians. A year before, they were one of the first to begin helping. In fact, Paul had been boasting to the Christians in Macedonia about the Corinthians' enthusiasm that had incited others to give. Paul was, in effect, prodding the Corinthians to rekindle their initial enthusiasm for giving. Paul wasn't naive about human behavior. The start and end of a marathon are much more thrilling than the miles in between. It takes stubborn determination and perseverance to keep on running.

9:3 Paul didn't want his boasts about the Corinthians to be proven wrong. That was why Paul decided to send Titus with two other brothers. In several months, Paul would return to Jerusalem with the money (see Acts 20:1-5, 22-24; 24:17); therefore, the final contribution had to be ready when he came to Corinth (9:4). Titus's job was to inspire the Corinthians to diligently set aside money as Paul had instructed them in his earlier letter (see 1 Corinthians 16:1-4). The representatives who accompanied Titus, on the other hand, were to ensure that all the money was collected. In sharp contrast to the false teachers who had infiltrated the Corinthian church, no underhanded methods would be used (2:17). Respected and trustworthy representatives from the churches would witness the entire process (see 8:20).

9:4 Paul had told the Macedonians how the Corinthians had eagerly wanted to give from the beginning (about a year ago). But since then, much had changed. Paul was taking precautions just in case the Corinthians were to challenge his apostolic authority on this visit (see 13:1-4). These Macedonian Christians would act as witnesses to how Paul had handled any confrontation that might occur. Paul was giving the Corinthians plenty of warning about his coming. In this passage, he skillfully warned the Corinthians of how he would be humiliated if the Corinthians were unprepared for his visit. On the surface, Paul was speaking about the Jerusalem collection, but he certainly may have been warning the Corinthians of his other concerns. Paul was hoping that the Macedonians would not find the Corinthian church in spiritual disorder. That would be even more embarrassing. The end of this letter will state it more bluntly, where Paul would sternly warn the Corinthians to prepare themselves for his visit by examining their hearts before God.

9:5 Paul wanted this money to be a willing gift, not one given under pressure by trying to pull it together in a short time period. Otherwise, his appearance at Corinth would be associated with frenzied collection efforts. If the money was raised in a short time, it might give the appearance of some type of scam. Paul wanted the Corinthians to remember that they were giving to God. This required some advance planning. Titus and the two traveling brothers would go to Corinth before Paul's visit to make sure the gift was ready. Proper preparation would ensure that the people gave cheerfully.

9:6 The people of this time were intimately familiar with the principles of an agricultural economy. Planting, weeding, and harvesting were common, everyday tasks. Keeping more seeds in storage might appear to be wise, a way to ensure against future disasters. But the farmer who scattered his seed meagerly inevitably would have a small harvest. A farmer who refused to risk his grain on the next year's harvest would lose. This piece of agricultural wisdom contains a profound truth about Christian giving (see Proverbs 11:24-26; 22:8-9 for similar sayings). Like the foolish farmer, he who plants only a few seeds—who refuses to trust God with their future financial security—will inevitably lose out on God's rich blessings. He who sows generously will get a generous crop. The eternal harvest will exceed their expectations.

9:7 Each Corinthian believer was to make up his own mind as to how much would be given to this collection. It wasn't to be an impulsive decision but a deliberate one. They were to assess their own ability to give and plan accordingly. Paul didn't want to use urgent appeals or pressure tactics to coerce the Corinthians to give. Even though he was the one appealing for the money, he was careful to give the Corinthians enough time to think and to pray about how much God wanted them to give. Paul didn't want anyone giving reluctantly or in response to pressure. Paul knew that God weighs the heart and not the amount of money; he looks at the giver and not the gift. One who gives cheerfully out of a sincere gratitude for what God has done, is the type of giver God cherishes. God multiplies those gifts beyond measure (9:11).

9:8 The biggest obstacle that people have to overcome in order to give is worry. What if I will not have enough money next year for my retirement? What if some emergency comes up? What if I lose my job? These verses reassure the Corinthians that God is able to generously provide all their needs. The purpose of God's overwhelming blessing is always to equip his people to have plenty left over to share with others. This text doesn't imply that Christian giving is a contract with God, where the one who gives gets. Instead, it says that God will provide whatever a Christian needs to do good. Thus, in the end, a Christian's good works will bring praise and glory to God.

9:9 Just as a farmer has to scatter the seed on the ground in order to reap an abundant harvest, so Christians must give generously to the poor in order to reap God's blessing. Paul already made it clear that God's blessing does not always include an increase of riches. All of God's gifts, both spiritual and material, are intended to help a Christian do good works (9:8). This quote from Psalm 112:9 demonstrates this truth. Although the psalmist does speak of material blessings for the righteous person in that psalm (Psalm 112:3), Paul quotes a line that emphasizes the spiritual benefits of generosity to the poor. Those who are blessed by God with financial resources should give generously to help those with less. These good deeds will never be forgotten. Those who receive this person's gifts will remember the generosity for a long time, but, more importantly, God will never forget the person's benevolence.

9:10 God gives both the seed and the bread, both the surplus to invest and the resources to support one's family every day. The resources that God gives Christians are not to be hoarded, foolishly devoured, or thrown away. God gives gifts to his people for their own use and for investing back into God's work. Instead of squandering these gifts, Christians need to cultivate them in order to produce more good works (9:8).

God does not limit himself to merely giving more resources—in other words, more seed. He blesses what you sow. He showers the seed with gentle rain. He gives the seed that is sown everything it needs to grow into a healthy, thriving plant. Although the seed is small, it has great potential if it has the right conditions to grow. In the same way, God blesses believers' feeble efforts at generosity so that they produce a great harvest. This harvest does not consist of personal wealth and riches. It is a harvest of generosity. God will take inadequate efforts at good works and increase them so that they bless many people. All a person has to do is give.

9:11-12 Giving generously to those in need causes two good things to happen. First, through those gifts given to those who need them, God meets their needs (here, specifically, the needs of the Christians in Jerusalem). Second, the recipients of these generous gifts will joyfully express their thanksgiving to God. Their celebration over these gifts will lead to heartfelt praise to God, for they will know that it is God who enables the giver to give in the first place.

9:13 In addition to the normal advantages that come through Christian giving (see 9:11-12), Paul hoped that the Jerusalem collection would have extra benefits: He hoped that through this gift from Gentile Christians, Jewish and Gentile believers would be drawn closer together in Christian fellowship. Paul viewed the collection for the destitute Jerusalem believers as concrete evidence that the Gentile believers were obedient to the Good News of Christ. One of the directives of the Jerusalem council was that Gentile Christians shouldn't forget the poor (see Galatians 2:10). The Gentiles' generous gift to the Jerusalem poor would prove that they were obeying this directive. Paul never viewed the Jerusalem collection as a rite of initiation for the Gentiles. He was always perfectly clear that salvation came only through faith in Jesus (Galatians 3:26). Giving back to God, however, is one of many signs that a person's faith is authentic (see also James 2:14-18).

9:14 The collection for the Jerusalem believers would not only demonstrate the sincerity of the Corinthians' faith, it would also tie the Christian community of faith closer together. Jewish Christians would view the monetary gift as an indication of God's wonderful grace working in the Corinthians' lives. This generous gift might be the one thing that would prompt these Jews to start praying for the Corinthian believers for the first time. Just as the Corinthians' prayers for Paul made them partners with him in sharing the gospel (1:11), so these prayers of Jewish Christians would make them partners with Gentile believers. Through this, the entire community of faith—Jewish and Gentile Christians—would be built up in love.

9:15 Paul ended his appeal for giving with fervent praise to God. The source of all this—the ability to give, the desire to give, even the reconciliation that would occur between Jewish and Gentile believers—was solely from God’s hands. God is the ultimate Giver. He gave a gift too wonderful for words—the gift of his Son. God’s extraordinary gift of salvation should motivate you to give generously to others. Spend time meditating on how much God has given you. Then evaluate your generosity in light of God’s generosity to you.

2 CORINTHIANS 10

PAUL DEFENDS HIS AUTHORITY / 10:1-18

Clearly, chapter 10 introduces a drastic change of tone in 2 Corinthians: from conciliatory to severe. In the first nine chapters, Paul was careful to congratulate the Corinthians for their obedience to his latest directives (2:5-11; 7:2-15). The last four chapters, however, warn the Corinthians in no uncertain terms to reform their ways (10:6, 11; 13:2, 5). The first half of the letter uses diplomatic language (see 3:1; 5:12), while the second half contains scathing sarcasm (11:7-8, 19).

10:1 Although most of the Corinthian congregation sided with Paul (as is evident from 7:8-16), a persistent minority continued to slander him. The group impugned Paul's integrity by pointing out that he was bold in his letters but timid in person—in other words, reluctant to exercise any authority when he visited them. Paul's critics saw this as duplicity and an indication that Paul truly didn't possess the spiritual authority he claimed. Chapters 10 through 13 are Paul's direct response to his critics in Corinth.

This harsh section of 2 Corinthians (chapter 10 through 13) begins with kind and gentle words. Paul had the authority to command, yet he consciously refused to exercise his authority in an overbearing manner. Instead, he pled with them. Christ was Paul's model in the approach he took here. Although Jesus possessed complete heavenly authority, he came to this earth as a servant (Philippians 2:5-11). Instead of commanding obedience and respect, Jesus simply asks for people to believe in him. Following Christ's example, the apostle Paul, who possessed full authority from Jesus (2:17; 5:19), merely pleaded with the Corinthians. In this way, Paul was showing them Christ's gentleness and kindness. The Greek word for "gentleness" has the idea of "forbearance"—like that of a benevolent judge being lenient on the guilty. "Kindness" speaks of friendliness and cheerfulness. In other words, Paul wasn't going to act like a harsh and overbearing judge.

10:2 Here Paul explained why he was writing this letter. He was hoping and praying that when he came, everything would be in order in the church (see 13:7). He wanted to give the Corinthians enough time to deal with the difficulties in their church on their own. This verse also clearly identifies Paul's critics: those who think we act from purely human motives. Apparently, Paul's opponents in Corinth were accusing him of making decisions and preaching according to worldly standards instead of God's holy standards. In the first chapter of 2 Corinthians, Paul had already defended his recent travel plans from just such an accusation (see 1:17).

10:3 Of course, Paul was human, thus susceptible to all kinds of difficulties, oversights, and weaknesses. Yet he said that he and his fellow workers did not wage war with human plans and methods. Paul equated the Christian life to a war. This war isn't against "flesh and blood, but against the . . . authorities of the unseen world" (Ephesians 6:12). The Christian life is a spiritual battle against spiritual forces aligned against Christ. Fighting this spiritual battle with weapons of the world—with physical strength, worldly strategies, and material wealth—would be foolish. A spiritual battle requires spiritual weapons that can only come from God.

10:4-5 According to Paul's letter to the Ephesians, God's mighty weapons are faith, truth, righteousness, the gospel message, and the word of God. The Holy Spirit equips Christians for the struggle, providing the weapons they need (see 6:6; Ephesians 6:10-20). Worldly weapons—wealth, fame, and political might—may wield some power on this earth, but they are useless in spiritual battles. The Devil's strongholds included every proud argument that keeps people from knowing God and rebellious ideas. The world of ideas is the real battleground for God and the Devil. Many complex theories and philosophies try to block people from knowing the truth about God and worshiping him. These false philosophies that divert glory from God and hide the truth are the Devil's strongholds. In Corinth, where advances in Greek philosophy were held in high esteem, the believers were tempted to evaluate the gospel with the various tools of Greek philosophy. In an earlier letter, Paul had already told the Corinthians that the gospel would appear as foolishness to those who saw the world through the lenses of secular Greek philosophy (see 1 Corinthians 1:22). Just as an army would attack a fortress, so Christians must take apart and defeat these false and evil arguments.

10:6 Paul wouldn't hesitate on his next visit to use those spiritual weapons entrusted to him to punish those who remained disobedient. But notice how Paul attached a condition to his exercising of his authority. He would not do so until the rest of the Corinthian believers recommitted themselves to be obedient to the gospel. According to Titus's recent report, the majority of the Corinthians had already done this. They had been filled with godly sorrow about the recent problems in their church and had made the necessary steps toward reconciling themselves to Paul (see 7:7-13). From the way Paul carefully defended his ministry in this letter (see 1:12-18; 3:1-5; 5:11-17), it is clear that there was still a rebellious minority in the church (see 2:17). At the end of this letter, Paul promised to deal sternly with this minority on his next visit.

10:7 Paul encouraged the Corinthians to adjust their perspective. They had been making their decisions on the basis of appearance. They were listening intently to the false teachers who were boasting of their own authority (10:12-13), their perfect Hebrew heritage (11:21-22), and their visionary experiences (12:11-12). All of their loud boasts and extravagant displays of power had dazzled the Corinthians so much that they had become blind to the simplicity of the gospel message that Paul had preached to them in the first place (1 Corinthians 2:1-3). While these teachers would proudly declare that they belonged to Christ, the Corinthians had to remember that so did Paul and his companions. Paul challenged those who were doubting his authority to consider carefully the evidence for Paul's own relationship to Jesus: First, the undeniably changed lives of people who believed in the message he preached (3:1-5); second, the integrity with which he faithfully presented the gospel message (4:1-5); third, the hardships he had endured for the cause of Christ (6:3-10; 11:23-29); and finally, the fact that Christ himself had commissioned him to be an apostle to the Gentiles (1:21-22; 5:20-21; 6:1-2; 10:8; 12:2-4).

10:8 Although Paul's opponents had portrayed him as weak and powerless, Paul reminded the Corinthians that he did possess God-given authority (see 1:21-22; 5:20-21). False teachers were encouraging the believers to ignore Paul, but he maintained that what he had written in his letters was to be taken seriously. Paul possessed the authority from the Lord to exhort the Corinthians. Although he would not boast in himself or compare himself to other preachers, he would boast in the Lord and in the authority that Jesus had given him to preach the gospel that saves (see 10:12-13, 17-18; see also 1 Corinthians 1:31). Unlike the false teachers who had come to Corinth, Paul knew the limits of his authority (compare with 10:13-14). He wasn't given the authorization to tear down the church. Paul's mission was constructive, not destructive. Thus he would not sit by and allow his work in Corinth to be destroyed.

10:9 Apparently, Paul's critics at Corinth had attacked Paul's letters as not only being hard to understand (see Paul's defense of the straightforwardness of his letters in 1:13) but also written to frighten them. Paul's last letter to the Corinthians had been harsh. Paul had even cried over it (2:3-4). The letter was necessary, however, because Paul had to work through some troublesome situations in the church.

10:10 Greece was known for its eloquent and persuasive orators. Corinth, a prominent Greek city at this time, was filled with trained speakers. Apparently, some of the Corinthian believers (perhaps encouraged by the false teachers among them) were judging Paul's speaking ability. He had already admitted to the Corinthians that he had consciously avoided dependence on rhetoric or human philosophy when he had presented the gospel of salvation to them (see 1 Corinthians 2:1-3). He wanted the message to speak for itself, unencumbered by such distractions.

10:11 In the past, Paul had refrained from disciplining members of the Corinthian church in person. He had warned them to stop sinning (see 13:2) on several occasions and had written letters encouraging them to discipline persistent sinners (see 1 Corinthians 5:1-5). Paul had used these indirect methods to encourage the leaders of the Corinthian church to take charge of the situation and discipline their own members. Paul even had promised to go along with the judgments they made (see 1 Corinthians 1:5; see also 2:6-10). Because his more accommodating approach wasn't working with the Corinthians, however, Paul assured them that on his next visit he would be demanding and forceful (13:3-4), punishing those who had not taken his warnings to heart earlier (13:1-2).

10:12 Here Paul went on the offensive. Although his critics had dared to tell everyone how important they are, Paul would not dare compare himself with them or anyone else. Any ability he possessed was a gift from God; therefore, God deserved the full credit for it. Yet Paul's opponents in Corinth didn't shrink from measuring and comparing themselves with each other. Because the Corinthians tended to focus on appearances (see 5:12, 16; 10:7), they had been successfully duped by the false teachers' slick presentation (11:4, 19-20). Meanwhile, Paul, who appropriately refrained from any boasting, was accused by the Corinthians of being "unimpressive" (10:10). Although the Corinthians claimed to be wise, they didn't recognize that the pretentious boasts of Paul's opponents was foolishness (10:17-18). Because of the power these false teachers were consolidating in the congregation, Paul was finally forced to spell it out: These teachers were foolish, loud-mouthed braggarts!

10:13 Because the Corinthians had listened to these false teachers, they were forcing Paul to boast in order to silence his critics (see 11:1-12:13). Here Paul explained the grounds on which he was boasting. To boast in himself and in his own accomplishments would have been entirely inappropriate. Only God deserved honor, for he had given Paul his abilities. What could Paul boast about? Paul could only boast in God and in the tasks God had assigned him. Paul regarded his assignment at Corinth as within his proper boundaries.

10:14 Paul and his companions had been the first to travel all the way to Corinth with the Good News of Christ. He was the founder of the Corinthian church, and as such could claim authority over the congregation. That should have been obvious to the believers in Corinth. Paul had welcomed in the past any teacher of the truth, such as Apollos, to build on the foundation he had laid (see 1 Corinthians 3:5-13). In the final analysis, however, the Corinthians had only one founder: Paul himself (see 1 Corinthians 4:14-16). If anyone could claim authority over the Corinthian congregation, he could. Ironically, it was his authority that was being called into question.

10:15-16 Paul refused to claim credit for the work someone else had done, as the false teachers were doing with the Corinthians (the fruit of Paul's hard labor among them). Unlike the traveling preachers who had come to live off the Corinthian congregation (see 2:17), Paul envisioned his evangelistic ministry as expanding into unevangelized regions. He would never plan on invading regions that had already been evangelized by some other teacher. In order to do this, however, the Corinthians' faith had to increase. As they matured in the faith, his work would be greatly enlarged. Paul might have been implying that as the Corinthians matured in their faith, he could spend less time guiding them in their Christian walk. As mature Christians, they would not only be less dependent on Paul to solve their congregation's problems, but they would also start supporting Paul as he launched evangelistic missions beyond them into completely unevangelized areas. From Paul's letter to the Romans, we know that Paul's vision included reaching Spain with the Good News (see Romans 15:24).

10:17-18 The following chapters list some of Paul's ministerial credentials and accomplishments. Paul was extremely cautious about boasting about himself; first of all, so that he might not rob the honor that God deserved (11:30-31), and second so that he might not be misunderstood as praising himself (see 5:12-13; 10:13; 11:16-18). The situation in Corinth, however, had forced Paul to set aside his scruples about boasting in order to save the Corinthian church from ruin. By touting his credentials—the credentials the Corinthians should have recognized in the first place—Paul hoped to discredit the false teachers who had infiltrated the church (11:12).

Paul paraphrased Jeremiah 9:24 in order to emphasize to the Corinthians that he knew he was treading on shaky ground. The Old Testament passage was especially relevant because it was an indictment against false teachers who took pride in their wisdom and their speaking abilities. Only those who seek after God and make it a priority to know and love him are commended by God. Only those who bring honor and praise to God, instead of themselves, are those people in whom God delights; and, in the end, only God's approval counts. In light of eternity, it really doesn't matter how other people judge us.

2 CORINTHIANS 11

PAUL AND THE FALSE APOSTLES / 11:1-15

Because the Corinthians were easily impressed by résumés (11:21-23), articulate and persuasive speakers (11:6), and shows of spiritual power (12:12), they had been duped by a group of false teachers. By consistently criticizing and accusing Paul, this group of upstart teachers had undermined Paul's authority in Corinth. Paul felt obligated to respond to their criticisms, point by point (11:21). He had founded the church and had the responsibility to keep the church on the right course (1 Corinthians 4:15).

11:1 Paul asked the Corinthian believers to be patient and bear with him as he spoke of his apostolic credentials. He felt foolish repeating his credentials because it was through his evangelistic efforts that he had founded the Corinthian church. There shouldn't be any reason for the Corinthians to question him; he was their father in the Christian faith (see 1 Corinthians 4:15). But because the Corinthians had been mesmerized by the rhetoric of these false teachers, dazzled by their claims to ecstatic spiritual experiences, and duped by their logic, Paul was forced to talk like a fool, to remind them of what he had done for the cause of Christ. It was against his principles to do this, for all honor, glory, and even boasts belonged to God (see 10:17). Yet Paul was in a dilemma. If he didn't speak up, the false teachers in Corinth might continue to lead the Corinthian believers astray. Paul had hoped that the believers would discern the emptiness of these false teachers' boasts, but they had not. As a spokesman for the truth, therefore, Paul couldn't stay silent; he had to speak up. In this case, speaking up for the truth meant defending his own credentials. If his own ministry was discredited, the gospel he preached would also be discredited.

11:2 Paul was anxious that the Corinthian church's love should be reserved for Christ alone, just as a chaste virgin saves her love for her groom. In the first century, an engagement was a serious commitment, similar to a contract. If the bride wasn't a virgin on the wedding day, it was considered a breach of the engagement contract. Ensuring the bride's purity and virginity until the wedding day was partially her father's responsibility.

Paul had already described himself as the Corinthians' spiritual father (see 1 Corinthians 4:15). This passage depicts his concern for the Corinthians as a father's concern for the purity of his daughter. Paul had already promised the Corinthians to one husband, Christ. He was anticipating that wonderful day when he would present them proudly to Jesus. That day when Christ returns will be like a great wedding feast, an image that Jesus himself had used for his second coming (see Matthew 25:1-11). To guarantee that he would not be embarrassed at Christ's return, Paul took the necessary steps to discourage the Corinthians not to stray from their pure devotion to Christ (11:3). Thus, the jealousy that motivated Paul was a godly jealousy for the Corinthians: that they might wholeheartedly follow Christ, their Savior (11:3-4).

11:3 This passage compares the serpent's temptation to the temptation of the false teachers' enticing message. The Corinthians had begun their Christian walk with a sincere and pure devotion to Christ. But false teachers were luring Corinthian believers away from the truth. Paul didn't want the believers' pure and simple devotion to Christ to be corrupted. Sin begins with thoughts. The serpent first tried to convince Eve that God's law was not the best for her, that the advantages of disobeying God outweighed the advantage of obeying him. The serpent's deception was primarily directed against what Eve thought about God and his instructions (Genesis 3:1-6). Satan knew that once the mind was convinced, actions would soon follow. Eve was persuaded by Satan's lies and subsequently reached out to pluck the forbidden fruit. In the same way, the false teachers were Satan's servants, deceiving the Corinthians to abandon their wholehearted devotion to Christ (see 11:14-15).

11:4 The false teachers who had come to Corinth had distorted the truth about Jesus and ended up preaching a different Jesus, a different Spirit than the Holy Spirit, and a different kind of gospel than God's way of salvation. Because of the sparse amount of evidence in 2 Corinthians, the exact form of the false teachers' erroneous teaching cannot be known. But whether it was a heresy dealing with the Jewish law or a heresy dealing with Greek wisdom and knowledge (see 1 Corinthians 1:21-25), clearly the teaching was different than what Paul preached. The false teachers were distracting the Corinthians from the grace of God, the only thing that could save them (see Paul's emphasis on grace in 1:12; 6:1; 9:8; 12:9). These false teachers' rhetoric, reasoning, and boasts were drawing attention to themselves instead of pointing the Corinthians to God.

11:5-6 Paul, a brilliant thinker, was not trained in Greek rhetoric. He probably wasn't a spellbinding speaker. Although Paul's preaching ministry was effective (see Acts 17), he had not been trained in the Greek schools of oratory and speechmaking, as the false teachers evidently had been. In fact, Paul avoided fine-sounding arguments and lofty ideas in order to preach the simple gospel message (see 1 Corinthians 1:17). Some of the Corinthians had begun to think that Paul's plain speaking style indicated a simple-mindedness. Despite what his accusers (the super-apostles) said, Paul knew what he was talking about, for it was the message of salvation.

11:7 The Corinthians evaluated a speaker by how much money he demanded from his audience. A good speaker would charge a large sum; a fair speaker would be cheaper; a poor speaker would speak for free. Since Paul hadn't asked for money when he preached in Corinth, some were accusing him of being an amateur speaker.

The reason why Paul hadn't asked for support when he first came to Corinth was because he thought he would be misunderstood. Many teachers traveled the Roman Empire hoping to make a good profit from their own speaking abilities (2:17), and Paul thought that he might appear like one of them. Instead of asking for a fee, as a professional speaker would do, Paul supported himself by manual labor, working as a tentmaker with Priscilla and Aquila (see Acts 18:1-3). Prominent Greeks considered manual labor as beneath them. The sophisticated teachers at Corinth attacked Paul for doing this, trying to discredit his ministry by drawing attention to this fact. So Paul asked how he had done wrong to the believers by preaching God's Good News without expecting anything in return.

11:8-9 Paul's language in these verses evokes a military metaphor. The Greek word for robbed is a military term that depicts how a first-century soldier would "strip bare" his enemies. Thus, Paul was saying that in order to serve the Corinthians he had, in effect, plundered the churches in Macedonia for his wages. Why did Paul accept support from the Macedonian Christians and refuse it from the Corinthians? Part of the answer to this question is that the Macedonians were giving cheerfully (8:1-5), while the Corinthians were using their money to gain influence and power. So there would be no question about his motivations, Paul would continue to refuse compensation. The Macedonians weren't questioning his authority, but the Corinthians were.

11:10-11 Paul knew that the fact he hadn't taken any money from the Corinthians was the strongest rebuttal to the false teachers, for their whole purpose in preaching was to gather a following who would support them (see 2:17). More than likely, they were the ones who had slowed the collection for the Jerusalem Christians in order to divert the funds to themselves. Paul hoped that his consistent integrity with money would be one of the indicators that he was a preacher of the truth, while his opponents were greedy peddlers of falsehoods (2:17). Why did Paul refuse support? Why did he boast in his own integrity? Why did he oppose the false teachers? It was because of his deep love for the Corinthians. As the founder of the church of Corinth, Paul was concerned for the Corinthians' spiritual welfare. He was jealous for their spiritual purity (1:6, 23; 2:10).

11:12 In order to set the record straight, Paul wouldn't stop boasting that he had preached the gospel free of charge (see 6:10; 7:2; 11:27; 12:16-18; 1 Corinthians 9:3-18). Eventually, the Corinthians would wake up to the fact that these false teachers, unlike Paul, were more interested in the money of the Corinthians than in their spiritual welfare. Although Paul was being forced to boast foolishly about his own ministry, it was his consistent honesty and integrity—the way he had conducted himself around the Corinthians—that would silence his critics and answer their charges against him. They weren't willing to suffer, as Jesus had, to present the gospel free of charge.

11:13 Paul reserved some of the harshest language for those who were boasting about their ministry among the Corinthians: They were false apostles. One of the first signs that a teacher is false is that that teacher tries to discredit true Christian teachers and preachers. A second sign is self-serving methods. The teachers at Corinth were boasting of their own credentials, comparing themselves to Paul (3:1; 10:12). Their methods (their loud boasts) should have been a clue that these teachers were not looking out for the Corinthians' spiritual welfare but instead for their own financial welfare. A third sign that these teachers were false and deceitful is that their methods were causing division and conflict in the church. The final sign that these were false teachers is the message they preached. A careful analysis would have revealed that it was "different" from the true gospel that Paul, Silas, Timothy, and Apollos had preached (11:4-5).

The Corinthian believers should have tested the teachers to see whether they believed Jesus is the Son of God (1 John 4:1-2). The Corinthians had failed to do this and had even let these teachers wreak havoc in their congregation. Paul was disappointed with the Corinthians' lack of discernment (11:4, 19-20).

11:14 Paul wasn't amazed that false teachers were disguising themselves as preachers of God, for Satan himself had deceived God's people in similar ways. Nothing could be more deceitful than Satan, the prince of darkness (Ephesians 6:12; Colossians 1:13), disguising himself as an angel of light. In the same way, false teachers, claiming to represent the truth, are extremely deceptive.

11:15 The false apostles were servants of Satan. Their actions betrayed them. Instead of bringing glory to God, they were boasting in their own achievements (10:17-18). Instead of preaching in response to God's call (compare 2:17 with 4:1-2, 5; 5:20), they were preaching for money. Instead of guarding the spiritual welfare of their followers, they were consolidating power over their followers (compare 1:23-24; 10:8; 11:21 with 11:18-20). Instead of preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ clearly (11:6-7), they were preaching a twisted gospel of another Jesus (11:4). In the end, their fraud would be exposed for what it was and they would receive the punishment their wicked deeds deserved.

PAUL'S MANY TRIALS / 11:16-33

If the greedy teachers of Corinth questioned Paul's authority, he questioned their devotion to Christ. They were enjoying the luxuries of one of the most prominent cities in the Roman Empire, while Paul, as he noted in this passage, was enduring all kinds of hardships to preach the gospel to those who hadn't heard it. These teachers had been careful to collect correct references, respected credentials, and impeccable recommendations; but they, unlike Paul, had failed to offer their entire lives in service to Christ, wherever that brought them. Paul's long list of hardships he had endured couldn't be matched by any of the teachers who were criticizing him.

11:16-18 Clearly, Paul was extremely reluctant to boast. But faced with the persistent faultfinding of his critics, Paul felt compelled to list his accomplishments for the Corinthians. He wasn't primarily concerned with his own reputation but, instead, with the spiritual welfare of the Corinthian believers. If his critics' attacks went unanswered, the believers might turn away from Christ (11:3-4, 12). Paul had to speak up in order to quiet the gossip and slander circulating in the Corinthian church. Even though Paul knew he had to defend himself, he was extremely careful. He cautiously explained to the Corinthians that he was going to act like a fool in order to silence those false teachers.

11:19 With biting sarcasm, Paul reprimanded the Corinthians for putting up with these arrogant false teachers. They thought they were being wise when they welcomed itinerant teachers and listened to their new ideas. If these teachers were godly, like Apollos, Paul applauded this generous hospitality. The most recent teachers, however, were introducing a different gospel and were discrediting Paul in the process (11:4). Apparently, the Corinthians enjoyed listening to fools.

11:20 The Corinthians continued to listen to the false teachers even when it became clear that they were trying to enslave the Corinthians. Paul went on to explain the nature of this enslavement, with four evocative images of exploitation.

Take everything is a translation of a Greek verb commonly used to describe how animals devour their prey. Take advantage is from a Greek verb used to describe how a hunter catches animals with a trap or a bait. The imagery of a hunter and prey suggests that the false teachers' primary sin was their motives. They were traveling preachers looking for a gullible group of people to support them. They were literally preying on the Corinthians, trying to exploit the relationship for all that it was worth. Ironically, the Corinthians thought they were wise by welcoming these teachers when, in reality, these itinerant teachers were making the Corinthians into slaves. With arrogant boasts, they paraded their credentials and achievements. Put on airs is literally "to lift up" high. They were slapping the Corinthians in the face by their actions.

11:21 Paul was probably quoting what his critics said about him when he wrote that he was not strong enough to take advantage of the Corinthians, to take their money, and to physically discipline them. Even though Paul would refrain from doing that, he was going to dare to boast, just as his opponents did. Once again, Paul issued a disclaimer. He felt foolish talking as he did, listing his accomplishments.

11:22 These statements address the charges Paul's opponents had leveled against him point by point. First of all, these traveling preachers from Judea were bragging about being Hebrews and Israelites—God's chosen people. Paul had been born in Tarsus; and thus, in his opponents' eyes, he had a questionable heritage. Paul was one of the descendants of Abraham through the tribe of Benjamin. He had been circumcised eight days after he was born—a physical sign of his Israelite heritage. He had been trained by one of the most respected Pharisees of that day, Gamaliel. As a Pharisee, he had spent hours poring over the Hebrew Bible and had been scrupulously careful to observe Jewish law (Philippians 3:4-6). No one could question Paul's credentials as a Jew and as an expert in the Hebrew Scriptures.

11:23 Although Paul had conceded to his opponents their Jewish heritage, he would not agree with them that they served Christ. To prove his point, Paul listed all the trials he suffered for Christ. Could his opponents, who boasted in achievements, accomplishments, and credentials, produce an even more extensive list of suffering and persecution endured for Christ's name? Were they willing to follow Jesus' way of the cross, his life of suffering? Were they willing to take up their crosses daily for Christ (Matthew 10:38)? Paul had suffered the hardship of imprisonment, including being whipped (Acts 16:22-24). He had faced death on a number of occasions (see Acts 14:19, when Paul was stoned by a crowd). Since this letter was written during Paul's third missionary journey (Acts 18:23–21:17), his trials weren't over. He would experience further difficulties and humiliations for the cause of Christ (see Acts 21:30-33; 22:24-30). Paul was sacrificing his life for the gospel, something the false teachers would never do.

11:24 According to the Jewish law, forty lashes was the maximum number the Jews could prescribe (Deuteronomy 25:3). The rabbis, however, would only allow thirty-nine, so that if the flogger miscounted he wouldn't accidentally sin by administering more than forty. These beatings were carried out in the synagogues and were for either moral or religious offenses. The lashes were made of several straps of leather, sometimes with bone or metal tied to the ends to inflict more pain. In Paul's case, the punishment would have been for preaching the gospel, what Jews commonly considered blasphemy. He faced this five different times. None of these beatings are recorded in Acts, but the adamant opposition of the Jews to the gospel message is recorded (Acts 13:45, 50; 14:2; 18:6, 12).

11:25 Only the Romans could administer beatings with rods. Yet Paul was beaten with rods at Philippi (Acts 16:22). Apparently, government officials had beaten him on two other occasions (these weren't recorded in the book of Acts, however). At Lystra, Paul had survived being stoned (Acts 14:8-20). Sea travel was not as safe as it is today. Paul had been shipwrecked three times, and he would face another accident on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27). By this time, Paul had probably made at least eight or nine voyages; thus, given the danger of first-century sea travel, he could have certainly experienced that many disasters at sea. The fact that Paul survived twenty-four hours adrift at sea would have been considered miraculous in the first century, a sign of God's hand on his life.

11:26 The sea did not present the only danger Paul faced on the many weary miles he had traveled as he took the gospel all over the Mediterranean world.

Robbers were a constant problem in the ancient world. In addition, Paul's own people, the Jews, were trying to orchestrate his downfall. When Paul first visited Corinth, the Jews had dragged him before the governor of Achaia in order to stop him from preaching (Acts 18:12-17). The Gentiles also had opposed Paul in Philippi and in Ephesus (Acts 16:19-24; 19:23-31). Paul's list of dangers climaxes in men who claim to be Christians but are not. His point is abundantly clear. Since he had bravely faced all sorts of dangers for Christ, he certainly would have enough courage to face those false teachers who were discrediting his authority and his name in Corinth. On past visits, Paul had not been as aggressive with those who opposed him (10:1). He was planning to confront his critics on his next visit (13:1-5).

11:27 In order to place his ministry beyond reproach, Paul had supported himself by working at a manual trade. Working two jobs had caused weariness and pain and sleepless nights. Because of the low wages of itinerant laborers and the hardships of first-century travel, Paul was often hungry, thirsty, and cold. But Paul had endured all these hardships cheerfully to preach the gospel, to tell men and women all over the Roman Empire that Jesus could save them from their sins.

11:28 Every day Paul thought about the spiritual health of the churches he had founded. There were so many pitfalls and traps into which a young congregation could fall. Persecution could force the church to compromise its theology; quarreling and inner strife could distract the church from its purpose; false teachers could deceive a church. Paul was concerned that the churches wouldn't persevere in the faith. One indication of his burden was his dedication and persistence in praying for them.

11:29 If Paul heard of any individual who was weak in the faith, he sympathized with that person. He encouraged stronger believers to help weaker ones (1 Thessalonians 5:14). If any individual was led astray from the faith, Paul would burn with anger at the ones who had caused it.

11:30 Although the Corinthians had forced Paul to defend his own integrity and his apostolic authority, this letter focuses on how weak Paul was. Paul paraded his sufferings, trials, and weaknesses before his opponents. He didn't boast in his accomplishments, as they did; thereby, he defused some of their criticisms. The only way Paul could show his authority was to point out how God had worked through his weaknesses. These were the telltale signs of God's work in his life.

11:31 Paul had already called on God as a witness to his truthfulness three other times in this letter: when he asserted his integrity in his recent travel plans (1:18), when he denied taking any money from the Corinthians (11:10), and when he asserted his genuine love for them (11:11).

11:32-33 Most likely, the Roman Emperor Caligula (A.D. 37–41) had given King Aretas IV, the king of the Nabateans from 9 B.C. to A.D. 40, the authority to appoint a governor to oversee the Nabatean population in Damascus. The Jews in Damascus had been able to enlist this governor to help them try to catch Paul (see Acts 9:22-25). The way the passage builds up to this story indicates that Paul saw this as a seminal event. Paul had come to Damascus with his head held high. The high priest had given him the authority to arrest Christians in that city. After his conversion, Paul was forced to sneak out of the city under the cover of darkness. He couldn't even walk through the city gates, much less command the authority and respect of the city elders (compare Acts 9:1-2 with 9:23-25).

Although Christ had predicted that Paul would suffer much for him (Acts 9:15-16), this was probably the first time Paul had realized to what extent he would have to suffer. Hunted as a common criminal, he couldn't stand up to his accusers and defend himself with integrity. Instead, he had to run away. For Paul, fleeing would have been considered a coward's reaction. This was probably one of the weakest moments he had experienced in his life, and admitting this to his opponents in Corinth would have been extremely difficult for him to write.

2 CORINTHIANS 12

PAUL'S VISION AND HIS THORN IN THE FLESH / 12:1-10

God had granted Paul a vision of the highest heaven. Paul had heard words that couldn't be repeated and had seen sights that couldn't be recounted. But because of this experience, God had given him a "thorn"—a weakness that continually reminded him of his utter dependence on God. Paul had experienced what others would never experience in this life. Instead of being able to boast about it, Paul had to suffer because of it.

12:1 Paul felt compelled to move to the next category about which his opponents had been boasting: visions and revelations. It is clear from the frequency of disclaimers about boasting in this section (11:30; 12:1, 5-6, 9-11) that Paul thought of bragging about revelations as the height of folly. A revelation by definition was purely God's work. Yet apparently, Paul's critics were boasting in revelations. In effect, they were saying that they had been judged worthy of these revelations. Only a fool boasts in something that is so clearly the work of God.

12:2 Although Paul didn't give many details about this ecstatic experience, he did write that he was caught up into the third heaven. In Paul's day, the notion of multiple heavens—from three to seven heavens—was common. Scholars who have systematically analyzed the use of the words "heaven" and "heavens" in the Old and New Testament believe that the Scriptures use the word "heaven" to refer to three separate places. The first heaven is the earth's atmosphere (see Acts 1:9-10); the second heaven is the entire universe, which contains all the stars (see Genesis 1:14). The third heaven, beyond these two heavens, is where God himself lives (1 Peter 3:22). This is the "heaven of heavens" (Nehemiah 9:6; Psalm 68:33). Whether or not Paul had this three-fold division of the heavens in mind, it is clear that he considered the third heaven as the highest heaven. Paul saw his revelation as an extraordinary and unique revelation (12:7).

It was fourteen years ago that Paul experienced this revelation. Although Luke records a number of visions and trances Paul received (Acts 9:3-7; 16:9; 22:17-21), including the one Paul experienced while visiting Corinth (Acts 18:9-10), none of those visions fit the description here. Paul described this revelation as such a rapturous experience that he heard words he could not repeat (12:4). The fact that Paul couldn't express what he heard might explain the silence about this revelation in the book of Acts.

Fourteen years before the writing of 2 Corinthians would be around ^{A.D.} 40, close to the beginning of Paul's ministry. Paul may have experienced this revelation when he was in Arabia (see Galatians 1:17; 2:2), or when he was in Antioch (Acts 13:1-3), or when he was stoned outside of Lystra and assumed dead (Acts 14:19-20).

12:3-4 In two sentences, Paul repeated that he had actually been transported to heaven, though he didn't know how—whether his body had been there or just his spirit. Jesus also had used the word paradise as a synonym for heaven (Luke 23:43). Then, in Revelation 2:7, Jesus promised the tree of life, the one in paradise, to all those who overcome. Given the extraordinary nature of this revelation (12:4), this is a surprisingly brief description of it. All Paul revealed was that he had been transported to heaven and had heard some things so astounding that they cannot be told. What Paul saw and heard in heaven was meant for his own edification. Most likely, God was strengthening and encouraging him for the extraordinary trials and suffering he would have to face in order to preach the Good News (see Acts 9:15-16). Paul mentioned it here only to invalidate the claims of his opponents in Corinth.

The emphasis here is instructive. Although accounts of revelations and visions typically focus on what a person has seen, Paul highlighted what he had heard. For Paul, listening to God and responding to his word was extremely important (see Romans 10:14, 17; Galatians 3:5; Ephesians 1:13).

12:5-7 Paul sensed he was on shaky ground when he started referring to a revelation that he couldn't describe. He didn't want anyone to mistakenly think that he was boasting about himself in this revelation. Therefore, he once again issued a disclaimer that he wasn't boasting in himself. Paul turned attention away from his vision and to his weaknesses. In fact, to keep him from getting puffed up about the extraordinary privilege of the visions he had seen, Paul was given a thorn in his flesh. The exact nature of this is not known, because he never reveals it. Because the Greek word for "flesh" can refer either to one's physical body or one's carnal self, there have been numerous conjectures concerning what the "thorn in the flesh" was.

The Greek word for "thorn" can also mean "stake." The word is used in the Greek Old Testament for Israel's neighbors who had become a temptation and a snare to the Israelites (Numbers 33:55). Some interpret Paul's use of the word here as a veiled reference to people who opposed the gospel—whether the false teachers who were deceiving the Corinthians or the Jews who were actively opposing his preaching.

Others argue that this type of external opposition wouldn't have humbled Paul, as he clearly stated the thorn did. According to these commentators, the thorn had to be some type of temptation of the flesh. Medieval commentators usually suggested a sexual temptation, while commentators of the Reformation suggested a spiritual temptation. In any case, this sort of explanation suggests that Paul would have viewed this temptation as a hindrance to the gospel and would have been humbled by his weakness.

Another set of commentators insist that the thorn in the flesh is a reference to a physical weakness, not to a persistent temptation. The earliest commentators on 2 Corinthians suggested that this ailment could have been severe headaches. These interpreters viewed the thorn in the flesh as a description of symptoms. In other words, "it feels like a bar going through my head." Some doctors think Paul may have had recurrent malarial fever, a disease that includes migraine headaches.

Many commentators, however, continue to insist that the thorn in the flesh is simply a general metaphor for Paul's physical weaknesses (especially in his eyes), and not a description of the symptoms. Some see hints in Paul's letter to the Galatians of a type of eye disease that impaired his vision (Galatians 4:14-15). Whatever the thorn was, it is clear that it was a chronic and debilitating problem, which at times kept Paul from working and attending to his ministerial responsibilities.

Yet this passage in 2 Corinthians does not focus on the exact problem Paul faced—he purposely didn't explain the nature of the problem in detail. The important point was why the thorn was given to him. Jesus had given Paul plenty to boast about. But to keep Paul from getting arrogant about the wonderful revelations from God he had received, God had allowed Satan to torment him with some hardship or temptation. This thorn continually reminded Paul of his dependence on God and steered him away from pride, arrogance, and self-sufficiency. In this way, God would use Satan's evil designs for good, just as he had with Joseph and his brothers (Genesis 50:19-20).

Paul had to explain the reason for his thorn, because the Corinthians valued success instead of failure, power instead of weakness. Those who are so often dazzled by success need to learn the same lesson. Christ loves to work through weakness (1 Corinthians 1:26-29).

12:8 Because this thorn was a hindrance to his ministry, Paul saw it as caused by Satan (12:7). Appropriately, Paul responded to these demonic-inspired attacks with prayer, the chief weapon of the Christian against evil (Luke 22:40; Ephesians 6:12, 18). Paul prayed three different times for the thorn's removal so he could be free to preach the Good News and build up others in the faith. In his wisdom, however, the Lord did not remove the problem (see 12:9). Sometimes he denies requests so that his people will depend on his abundant grace.

12:9 Jesus' answer to Paul's prayer is the theme of 2 Corinthians: Christ's gracious favor is what empowered Paul's ministry, despite his own inadequacies and failures. Although Paul's request wasn't granted, Jesus assured him that he would continue to work through Paul in his weakness. In fact, Christ's power worked best there. So in response, Paul accepted that Jesus, in his divine wisdom, knew what was best for him. Paul would not boast in being healed, but he would boast about his weaknesses, for it was through his weaknesses that Christ could powerfully work through him.

12:10 Although Christ did not remove Paul's affliction, he promised to demonstrate his power in Paul's weaknesses. Knowing this, Paul saw insults, hardships, persecutions, and calamities in a different light. When he had no options left, he would be forced to run to Jesus. Paul's utter dependence on Christ came into clear light. Christ's clear manifestation of his power in Paul's weakness would become a source of inspiration and a reason to praise and glorify Jesus. Truly when Paul was weak was really when he was strong.

The fact that Christ's power is displayed in weak people should give believers courage. Instead of relying on their own energy, effort, or talent, they should turn to Christ for wisdom and strength. Weakness not only helps a person develop Christian character; it also deepens that person's worship, because admitting weakness affirms Christ's inexhaustible strength.

PAUL'S CONCERN FOR THE CORINTHIANS / 12:11-21

Toward the end of 2 Corinthians, Paul begins to sound like a father who is profoundly disappointed in his children. Paul was disappointed that the Corinthians hadn't defended him when others had maligned his reputation (12:11-12). He was disappointed that they were questioning his motives (12:16-18). He was disappointed that they hadn't shown him the same kind of love he had showered on them (12:15). Paul was planning to visit Corinth, but he was clearly apprehensive about it. Would he find all kinds of disorders, just as if the Corinthians were his children running wild? Would he find them arguing and fighting (12:20)? Paul hoped that everything would be in order; then he could congratulate the Corinthians instead of disciplining them.

12:11 The Corinthians should have been writing commendations for their founder when malicious rumors about him had begun to circulate. After all, Paul was their spiritual father (1 Corinthians 4:15; 9:1; 11:2-4). The very existence of the gathering of believers, whose lives had been changed by the Holy Spirit, was evidence of Paul's faithfulness to the truth (3:1-5). Instead, Paul had to act like a fool, boasting about himself in order to deal with the issues at hand. Paul made it clear that he definitely wasn't the least of those who called themselves super-apostles, for they weren't the true apostles of Christ but false apostles sent by Satan (see 11:13-14). Paul never thought he would have to defend himself against these conniving preachers, but the Corinthians had forced him to do so.

12:12 When Paul was in Corinth, he had acted according to his calling as an apostle of Christ. He had been careful to be completely honest in all his dealings so that no one could impugn his name (1:12). He had faithfully preached the gospel (5:11, 19-21; 1 Corinthians 1:23; 9:16-18), and his preaching in Corinth had been accompanied by signs and wonders and miracles. Through these signs, the Spirit of God had clearly demonstrated to the Corinthians Paul's apostolic authority and the truthfulness of the gospel message he preached (Romans 15:17-19; 1 Corinthians 2:4).

12:13 The only practice Paul refrained from doing that these "super-apostles" did and that he did at the other churches was charging money for his teaching. Building on the Greek notion that manual labor was beneath teachers and preachers, these false teachers had asserted that one of the signs of an apostle was demanding payment for his services (2:17). The fact that Paul had spent long hours sewing tents together disqualified him as an apostle in the eyes of these false teachers. Paul hadn't taken advantage of this right because he didn't want to owe anything to any one person. He wanted the freedom to preach the gospel to everyone—no matter if they were Jew or Greek, slave or free (1 Corinthians 9:19-23). So he sarcastically asked that he be forgiven for this wrong.

12:14-15 Paul had founded the church in Corinth on his first visit there (Acts 18:1). He had subsequently made a short and painful visit. That second visit was when he had warned those who were persistent in sinning to repent of their sin (2:1; 13:2). After this visit, he had abandoned plans for another visit and had instead written a stern letter, warning the Corinthian congregation that it was the church's responsibility to punish the wrongdoer (2:1-4; 7:8-13). Now he was planning to visit them a third time.

Paul explained that, as on his previous visits, he didn't want to be paid or fed. The Corinthian church was too divided; accusations might result from him accepting any money. Paul didn't want what they had anyway; he wanted their allegiance and friendship. Paul had been their spiritual parent. As a parent naturally loves his or her child, so Paul loved the Corinthians, desiring to supply food for them, in the form of spiritual food. Yet it seemed that the more he loved them, the less they loved him.

12:16-18 But still, it seemed Paul couldn't win. While some would admit that Paul had never been a financial burden to them, they then decided that he must have gotten money in some other sneaky way. Finally, Paul asked the Corinthians a legitimate question: How could he trick them out of their money? Had one of his coworkers taken advantage of them. Had Titus? Of course, they both knew that the answer was no. If they had found nothing wrong with Titus's conduct, how could they find anything wrong with Paul, whom Titus was representing? Titus had learned what steps to take from Paul. How could Paul's own steps be any different? This appeal would have been even more persuasive because Titus himself was delivering the epistle known as 2 Corinthians. His impeccable behavior among them would be a continual rebuttal to the gossip of those who were discrediting Paul.

12:19 Paul was worried that the Corinthians might get the impression that he was trying defend his own reputation. Here Paul corrected this impression, if it existed. It wasn't before the Corinthians that Paul was speaking, it was before God himself. Paul was confident that he would pass God's judgment because God knew that all that he had done was for the Corinthians' benefit. Paul's chief concern was for the Corinthians, that they become firmly grounded in the faith. Paul knew that God himself could see his motives, that everything he did was out of love for the Corinthians (11:11) and concern for their spiritual welfare (11:2-3).

12:20 On his last visit to Corinth, Paul had warned those who were persisting in sin to repent of their ways (13:2). Paul was still apprehensive that the church might not be ready for his visit. He was concerned that the Corinthians might not have taken the appropriate steps to rid their church of sin. He worried that the Corinthians might still be quarreling (in Greek, the word can mean "strife" or "contention"; the word is also used in the list of sins in Romans 1:29; 13:13). In his earlier letter, Paul had already warned the Corinthians of dividing into factions and competing for power in the church (see 1 Corinthians 1:10-13; 3:3).

One of the key problems in the church was the Corinthians' jealousy of each other (1 Corinthians 3:3-5). Instead of concentrating on what they could each do for God, they were enviously eyeing one another, coveting the abilities and resources God had given their fellow brothers and sisters in Christ (see also Romans 13:13). These evil attitudes were resulting in outbursts of anger in the church. Evidently, tempers were short because of the division and jealousy in the Corinthian church. Instead of growing into a supportive community of faith (1 Corinthians 12:12-13), the Corinthians were dividing into factions and fighting each other. In the process, they were tearing down the church, the very temple of God (1 Corinthians 3:16-17).

Also, it was the Corinthians' selfishness (literally, in the Greek, their "selfish ambition"; see also Galatians 5:20) that was also causing problems in the church. In 1 Corinthians 4:6-7, Paul had described how they were boasting in themselves, and he had already warned them to focus their energies on preserving Christ's honor—not their own reputation.

These disputes were not one-time affairs. They were ongoing quarrels, where church members on each side began backstabbing each other. The Greek word used by Paul here literally means "evil speech" or "slander" (see Romans 1:30 and James 4:11 for more on slander). In this way, the Corinthians were impugning the reputation of their fellow brothers and sisters in Christ (1 Corinthians 5:11; 6:10).

Not only were they slandering each other, but they did so in secret. They continued to maliciously gossip about each other—and also, presumably, Paul (see 1 Corinthians 5:11; 6:10). The Greek word for "gossip" is literally "whisperer" (see Paul's use of the word in Romans 1:29).

Instead of building each other up in the Christian faith (1 Corinthians 12:7), the Corinthians were simply growing conceited (see 1 Corinthians 4:6; 8:1). The Greek word Paul used for conceit means "inflated." The Corinthians had become inflated with pride (see Paul's similar description in 1 Corinthians 8:1). Finally, Paul warned the Corinthians of disorderly behavior, just as he had done in 1 Corinthians (6:1-8; 11:20-22, 33-34; 14:32-33, 40). Paul was speaking about any behavior that disrupted worship services or contributed to the disunity of the church.

12:21 Paul had already told the Corinthians that he was concerned that he might be humiliated when he came to Corinth. Some Macedonian Christians were accompanying him. If Paul found the church in disorder and the Corinthians refusing to participate in the Jerusalem collection, then Paul would be humiliated in the presence of the devout Christians from Macedonia (see 9:3-5). Paul hinted here that finding the Corinthian congregation in disorder would mean more than his own humiliation. He would also have to grieve over those who stubbornly refused to repent of their sins.

The sins Paul listed here are sexual sins (as compared to sins relating to pride in 12:20). The Greek for impurity means “unclean,” referring to uncleanness before God. The Greek for sexual immorality is porneia (the word is the root for the English word “pornographic”), referring to illicit sexual intercourse and is commonly translated “fornication.” Finally, the Greek for eagerness for lustful pleasure means “excess” or “absence of restraint.” The word connotes shameful conduct, the type of sexual deviance that occurred at religious orgies in Corinth.

Paul was afraid that his directions had not been heeded. The fact that he would have to grieve over those who hadn’t repented of their sexual sins implied that Paul was going to carry out the discipline he had told the Corinthians to impose. On his visit, he would have to remove these people from fellowship. He didn’t want to discipline them, for it would cause him great sorrow.

2 CORINTHIANS 13

PAUL'S FINAL ADVICE / 13:1-10

True Christian love sometimes demands confrontation. Paul had spent most of the letter taking the time to address the Corinthians' concerns and their accusations (1:12-14, 17, 23; 4:1-2; 5:11-13; 6:11-12; 12:16-18). But at the end of this letter—in this last chapter—Paul didn't hesitate to warn the Corinthians sternly that everything they did was before God, the great Judge. If they wouldn't take his advice, he encouraged them to examine themselves. Did they measure up? Were they living as if Christ was living in them?

13:1-2 This would be Paul's third time he would visit (see also 12:14). Paul quoted Deuteronomy 19:15 as a stern legal summons to the Corinthians. Throughout 2 Corinthians, he had explained and defended his actions (see 2:1-4; 11:22-31). Finally here, at the end of his letter, Paul stopped defending himself and directly confronted the Corinthians. He wasn't coming to them in a "timid" manner, as he had done before (10:1). He wouldn't merely issue warnings. Instead, he would exercise his apostolic authority in full measure.

The exact reason why Paul quoted Deuteronomy 19:15 has been the subject of some debate among commentators. During his ministry, Jesus had endorsed the Old Testament principle that all accusations had to be established on the testimony of two or three witnesses (Matthew 18:15-17). By quoting this law, Paul may have been implying that this time he would be coming to the Corinthians as a judge. He would settle their disputes and quarrels, but everything had to be done in a proper order: All disputes would have to be presented to him with two or three witnesses.

Other commentators suggest that Paul was quoting Deuteronomy 19:15 because he considered his third visit as the final witness against the Corinthians. He had visited them on two separate occasions and had warned them at least two times—during his last visit and also in this letter, 2 Corinthians. He had taken the appropriate steps before disciplining them. He had warned them enough times and had waited long enough for repentance. His next visit would be the third one, the time he would not spare the sinners.

In the final analysis, Paul may have been quoting Deuteronomy 19:15 to indicate both ideas, that he had already given them three warnings and that they could bring disputes before him with three witnesses. Jesus' teaching in Matthew 18:15-17 supports both interpretations. Jesus had instructed his disciples to confront a fellow Christian with three warnings—one in private, one with two other witnesses, and one in front of the church (Matthew 18:15-17). There were to be not only three different witnesses before anyone could pass judgment on a believer but also three separate occasions when the believer was to be warned of his or her sin.

13:3 Some of the Corinthians had been asking for proof that Paul was truly speaking on behalf of Christ, that he was truly an apostle. Paul directly challenged the Corinthians. If they were looking for proof and mighty power, then they would most assuredly experience Christ's power on his next visit. Jesus' power among them, however, would not be the type of power the Corinthians were expecting. He wouldn't present spectacular wonders through Paul so that the Corinthians could sit back, watch, and judge them. When Christ came in mighty power, he wouldn't be coming to prove himself to the Corinthians but instead to judge the false teachers among them.

13:4 Paul's consistent message to the Corinthians was that Christ died on the cross (1 Corinthians 1:23), a message of Christ's weakness. Paul reminded the Corinthians that the mighty power of God had been demonstrated through weakness, not through power (12:9). Christ's own life was testimony of this fact. Through Christ's weakness, God worked in a powerful way. Through Christ's death on the cross, God provided salvation for all those who believe (John 3:16-18).

Just as God had demonstrated his power through Christ's weakness, he was doing the same in Paul's life. It was through hardships, persecutions, and even a stoning that God had shown his power. The power that God gave Paul was the strength to serve the church.

13:5 The Corinthians had insisted on testing Paul, the one who had introduced them to the gospel of salvation in the first place. Now that Paul had withstood their investigation, he asked the Corinthians to examine themselves, to test whether their faith was genuine. If they couldn't find evidence of Jesus Christ among them, then they would fail the test.

13:6 Paul had founded the Corinthian church. Although it was completely absurd for the Corinthian church to question their own founder, they were doing just that! Here Paul tactfully reminded the Corinthians that their Christian faith was a result of his ministry, and they had to recognize that he had passed the test and was approved by God.

13:7-8 Paul was a man of prayer. He was deeply concerned about the spiritual growth of the Christian church (11:28), so he spent his nights and days praying about those who had accepted Christ as a result of his ministry. Although the Corinthians had caused him much trouble and grief (2:4), Paul had never stopped praying for them. He prayed that God might give them the wisdom and the power to do what was right. He wasn't praying for their success, so that, in turn, he would appear successful. His prayer was for the Corinthians' success, even if it meant that people might consider him to have failed. Just as Christ was willing to suffer insults and die on a cross in order to serve all of humanity, Paul was willing to become a failure in order to serve the Corinthians and the truth of the gospel (13:4).

13:9 Just as parents will make great sacrifices for their children's welfare, so Paul didn't hesitate to make sacrifices for the Corinthians. Paul wanted the Corinthians to grow in the faith and to become strong Christians and be restored to maturity. If he had to exhaust himself, deplete his own resources, and appear weak, he would do so for their sakes (see also 1:6; 12:14-15).

13:10 Just as a concerned parent would warn an out-of-control child before the child gets hurt or severely punished, so Paul was warning the Corinthians before it was too late. Paul didn't want to deal harshly with them, but he would be forced to take drastic measures if certain ones persisted in sin (13:2-3). Paul was hoping that this letter would prepare the Corinthians for his visit. He wanted to be able to use his authority to build them up, not discipline them.

PAUL'S FINAL GREETINGS / 13:11-13

Paul typically would end his letters with a short list of exhortations (see Colossians 4:2-6; 1 Thessalonians 5:12-22). In 2 Corinthians, he did the same.

13:11 He wanted these believers to be able to rejoice. Then he said they must change their ways. Foremost in Paul's mind was that the church leaders of the Corinthian congregation would take charge by disciplining the unrepentant (13:2), silencing the false teachers in their congregation (11:13), and restoring the repentant to church fellowship (2:7). Paul knew that the disruption the false teachers had caused in the Corinthian church would create disunity—they needed instead to encourage each other. They should seek opportunities to build each other up in the faith (1 Corinthians 1:10; 12:7, 12-14). With his brief commands to live in harmony and peace, this verse sums up Paul's exhortations in his earlier letter for the Corinthians to unite as one congregation under the God of love and peace (see 1 Corinthians 12:27). They were to put their disputes aside and join together under Christ's leadership to advance his heavenly Kingdom.

13:12 Paul encouraged the Corinthians to greet each other in Christian love. By alluding to the greetings of all the Christians, Paul was reminding the Corinthians that other congregations throughout the Roman Empire were trying, along with the Corinthians, to be unified under Christ. There were congregations across the eastern Mediterranean that shared the same faith and the Spirit that the Corinthians had. Although these believers were miles apart, all Christians were united through the Holy Spirit under Jesus Christ's authority.

13:13 Paul's final blessing on the Corinthians invokes all three members of the Trinity—God the Father, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit. Although the term "Trinity" is not explicitly used in the Bible, verses such as this one show that early Christians believed that there were three persons in the Godhead (see Matthew 3:17; 28:19; Luke 1:35).

With this final Trinitarian benediction, Paul was giving the Corinthians a model from the Godhead of how to be unified in love. Through the Spirit's empowering, they, too, could begin to imitate in their congregation the grace, love, and fellowship that the Godhead already enjoyed. It was by Paul's commitment to the Corinthians—through good times and bad, through rejection and acceptance—that Paul hoped to bring the Corinthians back into the full enjoyment of Christ and Christian unity.

GALATIANS

INTRODUCTION

Slavery comes in many forms. Historically, slaves were men and women forced to serve their conquerors or captors. But there are other ways to become enslaved. Some men and women, trapped by destructive habits, struggle under the control of drugs or alcohol. Others, trapped in destructive relationships, struggle to live with an abusive spouse or parent. Still others, trapped in dead-end jobs or systems, struggle to extricate themselves from financial and emotional strangleholds. And all who do not live in Christ are slaves to sin.

Yet all slaves share a common dream—to be free!

As a world traveler, Paul had seen and known many slaves—men and women subjugated by powerful governments, powerful leaders, and powerful personalities. In fact, Paul himself had been a slave to religious zealotry and legalism. But Paul also knew what it meant to be free, to know true liberty in Christ. And since meeting his Liberator on the road to Damascus, Paul had spent his life spreading the news of that freedom.

Having seen both sides, nothing bothered Paul more than seeing people return to bondage. That's what he learned about his friends in Galatia: Men and women, who had found freedom in Christ, were being pressured and persuaded to return to the slavery of religious rules and regulations. Paul's response was quick and strong—don't desert Christ (1:6), don't be foolish (3:1), don't be cursed (3:10), don't be a prisoner (3:23), and don't be a slave (4:8); instead, be free (4:7), be free (4:31), be free (5:1), BE FREE (5:13)!

Paul's letter to the Galatians is called the charter of Christian freedom. In it Paul proclaims the reality of believers' liberty in Christ—freedom from the law and the power of sin, and freedom to serve the living Lord.

Are you trapped in sin? You can be a child of God through faith in Christ Jesus, an heir to the promise, and free (3:26-29). Are you trapped in legalism, trying to earn favor with God by doing good and being good? Don't be burdened again by a yoke of slavery—stand firm and free in Christ (5:1). Are you unsure how to channel the energy from your newfound liberty? Use your freedom to serve others with love (5:13).

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): Pharisee, apostle, teacher, church planter, evangelist.

The very first line of this letter names Paul as the author (1:1). He is also mentioned in 5:2, “I, Paul, tell you this . . .” In addition to this internal evidence, Paul’s authorship of Galatians is affirmed by many early church fathers, including Clement of Rome, Irenaeus, and Tertullian. Paul’s authorship of Galatians has been widely accepted by virtually all biblical scholars, including Bible critics. Galatians traditionally has been recognized as the standard for measuring other documents’ claims to Pauline authorship.

Paul’s intense desire to tell others about Christ led him to make three extensive missionary journeys. The first began in A.D. 46, when he and Barnabas were commissioned by the church at Antioch and sent to Cyprus, Pamphylia, and Galatia (Acts 13:4–14:28). At each town, they first would try to reach Jews with the gospel; then they would reach beyond the synagogue to the Gentiles, who responded in great numbers. During this time, they established several churches in Galatian cities, including Lystra, Derbe, Iconium, and Antioch of Pisidia.

Evidently, upon returning from the first missionary journey, Paul heard of the influence of certain Judaizers on the Galatian converts. Judaizers were Jewish Christians who believed strongly that converts to Christ must keep Jewish laws and follow Jewish rites and rituals, especially circumcision and dietary laws. In other words, they were teaching that Gentiles had to become “Jewish” in order to become Christian. Judaizers acknowledged Jesus as Messiah but still looked for salvation through the works of the law. These teachers were undermining Paul’s authority and the message he preached. So Paul wrote to vindicate his apostleship, to refute the Judaizers, and to build the Galatian believers in their faith.

For more about Paul, see the Author section in the Introduction to the book of Romans.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from Antioch in A.D. 49.

Dating Paul’s letter to the Galatians depends for the most part on the question of its destination. Galatia covered a large area that extended almost from the coast of the Black Sea to the coast of the Mediterranean, through the mountains and plains of central Turkey. In Paul’s day, the word Galatia could be understood in two different ways. Geographically, it could refer to the northern territory inhabited by Celtic tribes. If Paul had visited this area, it would have been on his second or third missionary journeys. Thus, the letter to the Galatians would have been written around A.D. 57–58.

But Galatia could also be interpreted politically, referring to the Roman province in the south, which included Lycaonia, Isauria, and parts of Phrygia and Pisidia. Paul's Galatian letter would have been addressed to churches in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch in the southern part of Galatia. These churches were founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13:3–14:26). The letter was most likely written to the believers in this area. The main reason for that conclusion is that the issue addressed at length in this book (how Gentiles become believers) was officially resolved at a council held in Jerusalem (see Acts 15). Because Paul does not appeal to that council decision (made in A.D. 50), then the letter was probably written prior to that, but after the first missionary journey. Therefore the date of A.D. 49 is most probable.

AUDIENCE

The churches in southern Galatia founded on Paul's first missionary journey.

The Galatian people were Gauls who had migrated to that area from western Europe. In fact, the term Galatia is derived from Gaul ("Gaul-atia").

Paul first visited South Galatia, the Roman province, during his first missionary journey. In Antioch of Pisidia, Paul and Barnabas went to the synagogue where they presented Jesus as the Christ (Acts 13:13-41). At first, they were warmly received, but then many jealous Jews began to speak against them. So Paul and Barnabas announced that they would take God's word to the Gentiles (Acts 13:42-47). "When the Gentiles heard this, they were very glad and thanked the Lord for his message; and all who were appointed to eternal life became believers" (Acts 13:48). The gospel spread rapidly throughout the area, but the Jews were able to have Paul and Barnabas expelled from the city (Acts 13:49-52).

Next, they traveled to Iconium, where they again spoke in the Jewish synagogue and had a very positive response. Soon opposition arose again, but this time Paul and Barnabas were able to stay in the city for a while, speaking boldly for the Lord (Acts 14:1-3). Their message divided Iconium, however, and upon learning about a plot to stone them, they left the city and traveled to Lystra (Acts 14:4-7).

In Lystra they encountered a man who had been crippled from birth. When God healed the man through Paul, the crowd thought that Paul and Barnabas were gods and began to honor them as such (Acts 14:8-13). Paul and Barnabas tried to convince the people that they were only human, but many still tried to worship them (Acts 14:14-18). Eventually, some Jews from Antioch and Iconium turned the crowd against Paul and Barnabas. In fact, they stoned Paul and left him for dead outside the city (Acts 14:19). "But as the believers stood around him, he got up and went back into the city" (Acts 14:20). The mention of "believers" implies that many in that area had responded to the gospel message and had trusted Christ as Savior.

In Derbe, Paul and Barnabas had a very good response and encountered little opposition to their message. After ministering there, they retraced their steps through Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, strengthening and encouraging the new believers in those cities and appointing elders in each church (Acts 14:21-23).

From the way the Galatians responded to Paul and Barnabas, it is clear that they were easily swayed. On one hand, they were warmhearted and generous (Acts 13:42-43, 48; 14:11-18; Galatians 4:15); on the other, they were fickle and quickly misled (Acts 13:50; 14:4-5, 19; Galatians 1:6). On the positive side, the Galatians were ready to listen and respond, able and willing to work hard for their religion, and very sincere. But they were easily impressed and influenced because they were not rooted in faith and grace. No wonder Paul could call them “foolish” (3:1).

It’s easy to judge the Galatians for their fickle ways, wanting to worship Paul and Barnabas as gods and then suddenly turning and trying to kill them, committing themselves to Christ but then being deceived by the Judaizers. Yet many in churches today act similarly. Eager, at first, to learn about Christ and God’s word, they soon tire of Bible study and personal application and are swept along by the latest religious fad. Instead of becoming rooted in the faith, they remain shallow and are easy victims of modern false teachers. Don’t be fooled by those who claim to be authorities or by new ideas that sound good; stay true to God’s word, focus on Christ, and deepen and strengthen your faith.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

After finishing their very successful missionary journey on which they had seen hundreds come to faith in Christ and had established several new churches in Asia and in the Roman province of Galatia, Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch (in Syria). Upon their return, however, they found that some false teachers, called Judaizers had gone to the new believers in Galatia and taught that the legalistic commands in Scripture were linked to salvation, and made the covenant restrictions more important than the cross. They were promoting circumcision and food laws. In short, these Judaizers were teaching that in order for Gentiles to be saved, they first had to become Jews.

Evidently, Paul also learned that Judaizers had been spreading their false teachings in Galatia and that many of the believers there had been influenced. In fact, these doctrinal debates were splitting the churches apart (5:25; 6:1, 3) and causing believers to become discouraged (6:9). To enhance their own authority as Bible teachers and spiritual leaders, these Judaizers had undermined and minimized the authority of Paul, representing him as an inferior teacher and apostle.

When Paul heard this news, he wrote immediately to the Galatian believers, denouncing the Judaizers and their false teachings and emphasizing his credentials as an apostle (1:1, 11-24), teaching and ministering with the blessing of the apostles in Jerusalem (2:1-10). Next, he had to show that both Jews and Gentiles come into a right relationship with God the same way—through faith, not works (3:1-14, 26-29). In fact, all legalistic versions of the gospel are perversions of it (5:2-6, 11-12); salvation is by grace through faith in Christ alone. Nothing needs to be added; in fact, nothing can be added. Believers are free, not bound to the law.

In addition to refuting the Judaizers and emphasizing the truth of salvation by faith alone, Paul also sought to show that with Christian freedom comes responsibility. In other words, believers should use their freedom in Christ to love and serve each other and to obey Christ by living under the control of the Holy Spirit and not giving way to the sinful nature (5:13-14; 6:22-23).

Even today, many Christians swing to either of those extremes: legalism or libertinism. That is, some, like the Judaizers of the first century, seek to find God's approval through doing good works—church attendance, Bible reading, “full-time” Christian service, tithes—and refraining from bad activities. They judge others who fail to meet their behavioral standards or their particular interpretation of devotion or dedication. In so doing, they become slaves to the law. Others, however, go to the other extreme, emphasizing their freedom and easily rationalizing self-indulgence and lack of commitment to the church. But Paul's message to us is the same as to the Galatians: “You are free from the law; salvation is by faith alone. But that means you are free to serve Christ. Don't leave the slavery of the law only to become slaves of sin!”

MESSAGE

After a brief introduction (1:1-5), Paul addresses those who were accepting the Judaizers' perverted gospel (1:6-9). He summarizes the controversy, including his personal confrontation with Peter and other church leaders (1:10–2:16). He then demonstrates that salvation is by faith alone by alluding to his conversion (2:17-21), appealing to his readers' own experience of the gospel (3:1-5), and showing how the Old Testament teaches about grace (3:6-20). Next, he explains the purpose of God's laws and the relationship between law, God's promises, and Christ (3:21–4:31).

Having laid the foundation, Paul builds his case for Christian liberty. We are saved by faith, not by keeping Moses' law (5:1-12); our freedom means that we are free to love and serve one another, not to do wrong (5:13-26); and Christians should share each other's troubles and be kind to each other (6:1-10). In 6:11-18, Paul takes the pen into his own hand and shares his final thoughts.

The main themes in the book of Galatians include: the Law, Faith, Freedom, Sinful Nature, and Holy Spirit.

The Law (1:6-8; 2:15-21; 3:1-25; 5:2-6; 6:12-16). A group of teachers had traveled from Jerusalem to Galatia and were insisting that non-Jewish believers must obey Jewish laws and traditions. They taught that a person was saved by following the law of Moses (with emphasis on circumcision for males, the sign of the covenant), in addition to faith in Christ. In other words, Gentiles had to first become Jews in order to become Christians. Some Galatians had been convinced by these teachings, and many had become confused. Paul opposed the false teachers (Judaizers) by showing that the law is powerless to save anyone. Only God's grace through personal faith in Christ makes people right with God.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. No one can be saved by keeping the Old Testament laws, even all the Ten Commandments. The law served as a guide to point out people's need to be forgiven, as a straightedge to show people how crooked they are. Even the most loving, generous, kind, and moral person falls short of God's standard. But Christ fulfilled all of the obligations of the law for us. We must turn to him, and him alone, to be saved. Don't be fooled by those who suggest that performance of certain works or religious rituals are necessary to obtain eternal life. Only Christ can make a person right with God!

Faith (2:15-21; 3:6-18, 23-29). If people cannot be saved by keeping the Jewish laws or by living good, moral lives, how can they be saved? Paul answered this question by reminding the Galatians of Abraham's faith and pointing them again to Christ. Salvation is a gift from God, made available to human beings through Christ's death on the cross. Individuals receive God's salvation by faith—trusting in Christ—not by anything else. Becoming a Christian is in no way based on a person's initiative, wise choice, or good character. A person can become right with God only by believing in Christ. This common faith in Christ unites all believers, everywhere—Jews, Gentiles, men, women, slaves, and those who are free; all are true descendants of Abraham and children of God.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. A person's acceptance with God comes only by believing in Christ. We must never add to or twist this truth. We are saved by faith, not by the good that we do. And we must never exclude anyone because of sex, race, or social standing from the Good News of Christ. All can come through faith. What or whom are you trusting for salvation? Have you placed your whole trust and confidence in Christ? He alone can forgive you and bring you into a relationship with God.

Freedom (4:1-31; 5:1, 13-15). In answering the Judaizers, Paul emphasized the believers' freedom in Christ. Christians were neither under the authority of Jerusalem nor under the jurisdiction of Jewish laws and traditions. Faith in Christ brings true freedom from sin and from legalism—the futile attempt to be right with God by keeping the law. Paul also emphasized that the freedom in Christ must not be abused or flaunted. Believers' freedom must be used to serve one another in love and to submit to the Holy Spirit's control. So we have this paradox: Believers are freed from sin in order to be slaves of Christ.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. When a person trusts Christ as Savior, he or she becomes a new person, forgiven, empowered, free from the bondage of sin. Yet this freedom is a privilege, with responsibility. Christians are not free to disobey Christ or practice immorality; they are free to serve the risen Christ. Before trusting Christ you were a slave to sin, but now you are forgiven and free from sin's power and penalty. Use your freedom to love and serve, not to do wrong.

Sinful Nature (5:13, 16-21; 6:7-8). The tendency of human beings to sin is inherited from Adam. This sinful nature continues to trouble believers and cooperates with the world and Satan to stifle their effectiveness. The sinful nature affects the body and also the mind.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Our sinful nature opposes the Spirit and becomes more active when we try to live by the Spirit, hindering our relationship with God. The sinful nature is not limited to sensual desires and often is more dangerous as pride or apathy. There is a constant battle between our sinful nature and the Holy Spirit in us. But we can overcome the flesh by recognizing its presence and yielding our lives to God's Spirit. Don't be surprised or discouraged by how easily you are influenced by the sinful nature. Then yield to the control of the Holy Spirit daily, moment by moment.

Holy Spirit (5:16-26; 6:1-10). People become children of God, regenerated, through the work of the Holy Spirit. He brings new life, and even the faith to believe in Christ is his gift. Then, after conversion, the Holy Spirit continues to live in believers, instructing, guiding, leading, and giving power. Paul told the Galatians that if they would submit to the Holy Spirit's direction, he would produce love, joy, peace, and many other wonderful changes in them.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. When a Christian allows the Holy Spirit to work, the Spirit produces his fruit in him or her. Just as becoming a Christian was a work of God in us through faith, so too is living the Christian life and the process of spiritual growth. The secret is in submitting to his leadership, trusting him to guide us, and then, by faith, following his guidance. Do you live by the Spirit? Instead of submitting again to the desires of your sinful nature, daily submit to the Holy Spirit. He will produce heavenly by-products in your life, transforming you into the person God wants you to be.

OUTLINE OF GALATIANS

I. Authenticity of the Gospel (1:1–2:21)

II. Superiority of the Gospel (3:1–4:31)

III. Freedom of the Gospel (5:1–6:18)

Paul visited several cities in Galatia on each of his three missionary journeys. As widely as he traveled, Paul may well have considered the Galatian churches to have been his home town neighbors. Raised in Tarsus, just southeast of the Galatian province, the apostle probably knew the area well. Tarsus had a well-known port and was situated on a main east/west overland route through Asia Minor. A heavily used pass through the Taurus mountains was located just north of the city.

On his first journey, Paul went through Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, and then retraced his steps. On his second journey, he went by land from Antioch in Syria through the four cities in Galatia. On his third journey, he also went through those cities on the main route to Ephesus.

GALATIANS 1

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-5

The year was probably A.D. 49. Paul and Barnabas had just completed their first missionary journey (Acts 13:2–14:28). Following a brief stay on the island of Cyprus, they had visited Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, cities in the Roman province of Galatia (present-day Turkey). In their travels they had met with both wholehearted response and deep-seated resistance.

Shortly after their return to Antioch, some Jewish Christians arrived from Judea. These Judeans claimed that the Antioch church and its missionaries were diluting Christianity to make it more appealing to Gentiles, and they challenged Paul's authority as an apostle. Some of Paul's accusers went to the Galatian churches and insisted that the Gentile converts had to be circumcised and follow all the Jewish laws and customs in order to be saved. According to these people (called Judaizers), Gentiles had to first become Jews in order to become Christians. This caused much confusion in the churches that Paul and Barnabas had planted in Galatia.

In response to this threat, Paul wrote this letter to the Galatian churches. In it, he explained that following the Old Testament laws or the Jewish laws would not bring salvation. A person is saved only by grace through faith. Most likely, Paul wrote this letter shortly before the meeting of the Jerusalem council in A.D. 50, which settled the law-versus-grace controversy (Acts 15).

1:1 First-century letters often began by introducing the writer, although this “writer” often dictated his letters to a scribe. Paul used a secretary for most, if not all, of his letters (see Romans 16:22), usually writing the last few lines in his own hand to authenticate his message (6:11).

Paul was called to be an apostle by Jesus Christ and God the Father. Paul was not one of the original twelve disciples (later called apostles), but Jesus had specially called him on the road to Damascus to preach the gospel to Jews and Gentiles (Acts 9:3-19). The apostles' mission was to be God's representatives; they were envoys, messengers, and delegates who were directly under the authority of Jesus Christ. They had authority to set up and supervise churches and discipline them if necessary. Paul presented his credentials as an apostle at the beginning of this letter because his authority was being undermined in the churches in Galatia.

No human had appointed Paul; Jesus Christ, the one who had been raised from the dead, had spoken to Paul (Acts 9:4-5). Paul explained his apostleship in these words, not to separate himself from the original Twelve, but to show that his apostleship rested on the same basis as theirs. If the believers in Galatia questioned Paul's apostleship, then they also should question the apostleship of Peter, John, James, and all the others—and such questioning would be absurd. All the apostles were called by Jesus Christ and God the Father, and they answered to God as their final authority.

1:2 Paul's fellow Christians in Antioch joined him in sending greetings to the Galatian believers. These coworkers in Antioch were a sizable group, including Barnabas, Titus, Timothy, and some of the men listed in Acts 13:1 (see also Acts 19:29; 20:4).

This letter is an example of Paul writing to a region or group of churches. In Paul's time, Galatia was the Roman province located in the center section of present-day Turkey. Much of the region was on a large and fertile plateau; many people had moved to the region because of its favorable agriculture. During his missionary journeys, Paul planned to visit regions with large population centers in order to reach as many people as possible and to plant churches in those centers. This letter was to be circulated among the churches planted by Paul and Barnabas during the first missionary journey—in Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium.

1:3 Paul used grace and peace in all his salutations, wishing his readers the benefits of both. "Grace" was the Greek greeting, as "peace" was the Jewish greeting. Jointly used in the context of the gospel, these two words gained great depth. The word grace reminded Paul's readers of God's kindness in offering salvation to undeserving people. Peace reminded the readers of Christ's offer of peace to his disciples as they lived out their faith in an evil world (John 14:27). Christian letters not only expressed the wish for peace, but identified the source of peace. If "grace" summarizes God's gift to us, then "peace" summarizes the personal results of that gift (see John 14:27; 16:33).

True peace comes only from a right relationship with God because peace comes from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ. As in verse 1, the connecting of "God" and "Jesus" reveals their oneness (John 10:30). God is called "Father," a name Jesus taught his disciples to use in the Lord's Prayer (Matthew 6:9). Jesus Christ is identified as "Lord," a title given to him after his resurrection and ascension that reveals him as worthy of worship (see John 20:28; Acts 2:36; Philippians 2:9).

1:4 Jesus died for our sins, not his own, for he was sinless. Jesus' sacrifice was ultimate, voluntary, and substitutionary. This is called "substitutionary atonement.” Christ died for our sins, in our place, so we would not have to suffer the punishment we deserve (see 1 Peter 2:24). This was not an accident; it occurred just as God our Father planned. God made a way of salvation—the ultimate sacrifice of sending his only Son to die on the cross, taking the penalty for humanity’s sins. People can only be saved through Christ.

The result of Jesus’ gift of himself was to rescue us from this evil world. This rescue or deliverance does not remove believers from the world (at least not yet); instead, it gives us the blessings of our future eternity with Christ and offers us his guidance and presence as we serve him in this evil world. Indeed, if all the early believers had been rescued out of the evil age in which they lived, there would have been no hope for us. To use Jesus’ expression, though we are still “in” the world, we are no longer “of” the world (see John 17:15-18).

1:5 Thoughts of God’s love, mercy, and guidance, and Christ’s ultimate sacrifice on our behalf evoke words of praise and thanks. Does the glory of God lead you to give such praise? Glory belongs to God alone. Even if God had not done so much for us, he would still be the only one deserving glory from his creation. As believers, we will be able to glorify our God through all the ages of eternity because of the promise of eternal life with him.

With a decisive Amen (“Let it be so,” “Let it come to pass”), Paul closed his introduction to this letter. In these first five verses, Paul touched on what would be the intent of his letter: his authority as an apostle, and the fact that salvation is not by works but by grace through faith in Christ alone.

THERE IS ONLY ONE GOOD NEWS / 1:6-10

Paul was amazed at how easily the believers in the Galatian churches had given up the Good News of the gospel of Christ for the “bad news” that the false teachers had brought them. Paul’s concern was not over alternative viewpoints of interpretation; he was warning Galatian Christians about turning from the truth to lies, from what was right to what was wrong.

1:6-7 Paul immediately expressed shock at the Galatians’ behavior. He found it difficult to comprehend that the believers were turning away so soon from God. They had been called, but they were throwing aside that privilege in order to try to earn their salvation. Paul was shocked that someone would insist on attempting to pay for a free (and priceless) gift! Those who turned to this different way would no longer be Christians. This different way only pretended to be the Good News, but it was not the Good News at all. The false teachers, Judaizers, were teaching that to be saved, Gentile believers had to follow Jewish laws and customs, especially the rite of circumcision. Faith in Christ was not enough. They may have included in their teachings the need for faith in Christ for salvation, but they taught that additional requirements had to be met before true salvation could occur. This twisted and changed the truth, and it infuriated Paul. Whether or not the Judaizers were sincere, their teaching fooled these new churches and had to be countered. They were loading down people with the requirements of the “law” instead of encouraging them to live by grace in joyful obedience to Christ.

Jesus Christ has made the gift of salvation available to all people. Faith in Christ is the only requirement for salvation. Beware of people who say that we need more than simple faith in Christ to be saved. When people set up additional requirements for salvation, they deny the power of Christ’s death on the cross (see 3:1-5).

1:8-9 Paul denounced the Judaizers’ perversion of the gospel of Christ. Using strong language to deal with this life-or-death issue, Paul said that God’s curse should fall on anyone, even himself, who preaches any other message than the one originally brought to them. In fact, even if an angel comes from heaven and preaches any other message, that angel should be forever cursed. (This passage strongly refutes the claim by Mormons regarding the source of Joseph Smith’s teaching, that the angel Moroni appeared to him.) If the truth is changed, the teacher is false, regardless of his or her qualifications, accomplishments, or experience. Paul has already noted that there is no other gospel (1:7), thus any other message would be false. The gospel teaching must not be changed, for the truth of the gospel never changes. Paul’s repeated use of the condemnation of God’s curse conveys the most severe penalties imaginable for distorting the truth of the gospel. Paul and Barnabas preached; the Galatians accepted. That decisive experience did not need to be added to by certain actions required by the false teachers. The acceptance of the message alone had accomplished their salvation.

1:10 Undoubtedly the Judaizers had accused Paul of compromise, saying that he taught freedom from the Jewish law to the Gentiles in order to be a people pleaser and thus win as many converts as possible. But Paul explained that his purpose was always to please God.

Paul’s use of the word still offers a glimpse into his inner self and his past life as a Pharisee. Paul understood that by living a strict, law-abiding, judgmental, and appearance-focused life of a Pharisee, his goal had really been to please people. Religious and pious people may receive mountains of praise for their supposed character and good works. Christians are rarely accorded such praise. Thus if Paul were trying to please people, he would not be Christ's servant. As there is no compromise with the truth, there is no compromise for the Christian with "this evil world" (1:4). The life of serving Christ does not put people in the limelight, offer great material rewards, or promise worldly security. Thus, if Paul wanted to please people, he could have chosen many other routes or stayed a Jewish Pharisee.

Much of church growth philosophy centers on a "market" approach, discovering what people want and need. For a culture that treats God and the Bible as irrelevant, this approach may be the only way to break through barriers. But we must have our motives clearly understood. If our desire is to please people, our packaging of the gospel may take priority over the content. If our purpose is evangelism, then reaching people through felt needs can be legitimate. We must not forget that our allegiance to Christ comes first. We must never water down his authority in the life of a believer in order to bring him or her into a church.

PAUL'S MESSAGE COMES FROM CHRIST / 1:11-24

Having pointed to the uniqueness of the gospel in the last paragraph, here Paul turned his attention to his authority as an apostle. Why should the Galatians have listened to Paul instead of the Judaizers? Paul answered this implicit question by furnishing his credentials: His message was received directly from Christ (1:12); he had been an exemplary Jew (1:13-14); he had had a special conversion experience (1:15-16; see also Acts 9:1-9); he had been confirmed and accepted in his ministry by the other apostles (1:18-19; 2:1-9). Paul also presented his credentials to the Corinthian and Philippian churches (2 Corinthians 11-12; Philippians 3:4-9).

1:11 In verse 1, Paul had introduced himself as appointed by God. As Paul launched into a repudiation of those who would refuse to recognize his authority as an apostle, he began at the beginning. Paul wanted the Galatian believers to be assured that he was an apostle—called separately from the Twelve and received as an equal by the Twelve.

The Good News that Paul preached was the true gospel, not any false gospel, as he had discussed in verses 6-9. The gospel Paul taught was not based on mere human reasoning or logic—that is, it was not a belief or doctrine handed down to him through Jewish tradition.

1:12 The Judaizers, refusing to acknowledge Paul as an apostle, most likely claimed that Paul owed his salvation and gospel knowledge to Peter and James in Jerusalem and that he had to turn to them for approval and support of his teaching. But, as Paul would point out, he had become a believer before he ever met these leaders in the Christian church. Nor was Paul taught the gospel. As a young man, Paul had sat at the feet of Gamaliel, learning by rote and repetition the Hebrew Law and Scriptures. But that was not the gospel, nor could it give salvation.

Instead, the message Paul preached came by direct revelation from Jesus Christ himself. We do not know the extent or manner of this revelation. Paul could be referring to his vision of Christ on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:3-6), to the time after Ananias returned Paul's sight (Acts 9:17-19), to the three years spent in Arabia (Galatians 1:17-18), or to his ongoing contact with Christ in his ministry (Acts 9:19-22; 22:17-18). Paul was probably referring to something more than his Damascus road experience.

Paul didn't say it, but he implied at this point: "How can anyone doubt my authority? How can anyone doubt the divinely revealed truth about Jesus Christ?"

1:13-14 To further support his apostolic claim, Paul showed how radically Christ had transformed him from a persecutor of the church to an apostle of the church. When he followed the Jewish religion, he was one of the most religious Jews of his day. He scrupulously kept the law and also violently persecuted the Christians, seeking to get rid of them. So adamant was he for upholding the traditions of his faith, so convinced was he that Christianity was a false religion deviating from Judaism, that he wanted to see it annihilated (see Acts 7:57-8:1; 9:1-2; 26:9-11). He called himself one of the most religious Jews of his age, working hard to follow all the old traditions of the Jewish religion. Before his conversion, Paul had been even more zealous for those traditions than the Judaizers themselves could ever claim to be! Paul's intense study under one of the most respected teachers of his day helped to establish his credentials. Paul wrote about himself, "I was circumcised when I was eight days old, having been born into a pure-blooded Jewish family that is a branch of the tribe of Benjamin. So I am a real Jew if there ever was one! What's more, I was a member of the Pharisees, who demand the strictest obedience to the Jewish law" (Philippians 3:5, see also Acts 22:3-13; 26:4-18). Paul had been sincere in his zeal, but wrong. Militant Judaism was in Paul's past—it was his "previous" way of life. When he met Jesus Christ, his life changed. He then directed all his energies toward building up the Christian church.

1:15 What changed Paul's life from persecutor of the church to preacher of the faith? The little phrase, but . . . God, reveals what happened. God got hold of Paul's life. Paul's conversion happened only because it pleased God. And God used every part of Paul's life, even prior to his conversion, to prepare Paul for the ministry.

God had chosen Paul even before he was born. God's designs on Paul's life clearly began before his birth. Similarly, Jeremiah was divinely informed that God had called him even before he was born to do special work (Jeremiah 1:5). Paul's expression recalls the profound awe described by the psalmist in Psalm 139 in recognizing the scope of God's awareness of us. The context indicates that Paul was humbled by God's grace in calling him to be an apostle rather than proud about any personal qualifications that made him noticeable to God. The fact that God would accomplish his work through any of us ought to inspire deep humility.

The understanding that Paul and all believers are chosen before birth by God is referred to as the doctrine of election. This was a key part of Paul's theology (see, for example, Romans 8:29-30; 9:11-29; Ephesians 1:4-5). In the Bible, election refers to God's choice of an individual or group for a specific purpose or destiny. God's sovereignty, not people's works or character, is the basis for election.

Election—being “chosen” before we're born—is like receiving an invitation for a wonderful banquet. But the invitation comes to us unearned and unmerited. No friendship, political pull, or effort makes it necessary that we be on the invitation list. The guest list is purely the host's choice. After all, it is his banquet. The invitation comes with the traditional RSVP. God's gracious invitation does require our response and attendance. Only those who respond to God's call receive the gift of salvation; it is “by invitation only.” It comes to us completely undeserved so that we might have no basis for pride. When we understand God's sovereignty as well as his mercy, we respond with humility and gratitude that God would be merciful to even us.

Believers still may wonder why or how they could be chosen while others might be rejected. God is sovereign and, in reality, no one has any claim on his mercy. It is completely undeserved. He prepared us in advance by his gift of salvation, and he will reveal his glory when we are finally with him for eternity. Instead of focusing on God choosing some and rejecting others, we should stand in awe at God's offer of grace to any of us. Thus, no one can demand that God explain why he does what he does. He makes all the rules, but he loves to show his mercy to us. What an amazing God he is! What may seem to us to be an inconsistency on God's part actually reveals our own inability to see as God sees.

1:16 When God called Paul on the road to Damascus, Paul accepted the gracious invitation of salvation. Part of that call was that God revealed his Son to Paul. When Paul heard the voice of the resurrected and living Jesus Christ (Acts 9:4-6), this confirmed the fact of the Resurrection. In his appearance to Paul, God revealed who Jesus really was—the Jews’ promised Messiah, the Savior. The revelation of Jesus carried with it the command to go with the message to others. The little phrase so that carries great weight. Paul was saved “so that” he could serve God.

Paul understood exactly what that service was to be: proclaim the Good News about Jesus to the Gentiles (see Acts 9:15-16). Gentiles were non-Jews, whether in nationality or in religion. In Paul’s day, Jews thought of all Gentiles as heathens. Jews avoided Gentiles, believing that contact with Gentiles brought spiritual corruption. Although Gentiles could become Jews in religion by undergoing circumcision and by following Jewish laws and customs (they were called “proselytes”), they were never fully accepted.

Many Jewish Christians had difficulty understanding that the gospel enabled both Jews and Gentiles to have equal standing before God. But God planned to save both Jews and Gentiles. He had revealed this plan through Old Testament prophets (see, for example, Genesis 12:3; Isaiah 42:6; 66:19), and he had fulfilled it through Jesus Christ. Paul was called to proclaim this message to the Gentiles (see also Acts 13:46-47; 26:20; Romans 11:13; 15:16; Ephesians 3:8; 1 Timothy 2:7).

Paul’s personal encounter with Jesus was so compelling that no further confirmation was required. Paul did not rush out to consult with anyone else about doctrine, theology, the Old Testament Scriptures, or the specifics of the gospel message. Repeating the thought from verse 12, Paul emphasized that his authority did not come secondhand. The Judaizers were attacking Paul’s authority by saying he could be no more than a student of the apostles. But Paul never even spoke to any of the apostles about the gospel until three years after his conversion. His understanding of the gospel message had come from God himself.

1:17 The twelve apostles were apostles before Paul became an apostle, but beyond that, there was no difference between them. When he finally did go to Jerusalem to meet with the church leaders, he went as an equal. The other apostles recognized him as such.

Although the book of Acts doesn’t seem to allow time for this retreat into Arabia, here Paul explained that he went away for three years (1:18) in order to spend time alone with God. This was vital for the newly converted Jewish Pharisee and persecutor of Christianity. Paul was converted; he needed time to rethink his former position against Christianity in light of the truth of the gospel that had been revealed to him. During this interim, Paul probably studied the Scriptures, prayed, and thought about the meaning of Christ's crucifixion and resurrection in relation to the Old Testament that he knew so well. God revealed to Paul the meaning of the gospel, and from Paul's time of study, we today have the New Testament letters that focus on explaining God's plan (especially the doctrinal book of Romans). Paul's point in explaining this itinerary was to show that he formed his theology, not from consulting with any other believers, but alone, with God's guidance. After his time in Arabia, Paul later returned to the city of Damascus.

Although the sequence of events making up this part of Paul's life appears clear, fitting it into the chronology of the book of Acts presents some challenges. Luke did not mention a three-year time period similar to Paul's account. The primary accounts covering this time period are Acts 9:1-31 and Galatians 1:13-24. The following presents a suggested chronology:

- On his way to Damascus to imprison Christians, Saul was confronted by Christ and converted.
- Journeying on into Damascus, Paul waited until he was contacted by Ananias, who prayed for his healing and arranged for his baptism.
- Paul began preaching about Jesus in the synagogues of Damascus (Acts 9:20). He left clear evidence of his conversion before he went into Arabia.
- Paul retreated into Arabia (Galatians 1:17). This retreat into solitude consolidated and integrated the central change in his life with the rest of his experience and training.
- Three years pass. During that time, Paul left Damascus twice: first to spend time alone in Arabia, second to avoid plotters against his life and visit Jerusalem. Paul's escape from Damascus fits better at the end of the three-year time period than shortly after his conversion. The Pharisees were probably upset by Paul's desertion from their ranks and the effect that he had on their numbers within the city after a while.

1:18 Paul's visit to Jerusalem was his first as a Christian. This was where the church began, and this was where some of the apostles lived and worked, specifically Peter, whom Paul went to see. Paul explained that he wanted to visit with Peter; he did not get instruction from Peter nor was he commissioned by Peter. While Paul does not mention the reason for the brevity of the visit (fifteen days), we are told by Luke that the opposition had plans in motion to kill Paul. Perhaps because of concerns for his life, as well as for the ongoing safety of believers in Jerusalem, Paul was given safe conduct by the believers to Caesarea, where he set out toward his home in Tarsus (see Acts 9:30).

1:19-20 To further repudiate the Judaizers' claim that Paul needed the twelve apostles' instruction and approval, Paul pointed out that during his time in Jerusalem, the only other apostle he met was James. Paul's intention to meet with Peter implies a self-perception of equality with the apostle who was acknowledged as the leader among Jesus' disciples. Paul planned an apostolic summit with Peter. But there was no general apostolic meeting to confirm Paul, no official gathering to approve this new convert and missionary. Instead, Paul talked only with Peter and James, the Lord's brother. This was not James the apostle (one of the Twelve) whom Herod put to death (see Acts 12:2); it was James, Jesus' younger half-brother. During Jesus' ministry on earth, James did not believe that Jesus was the Messiah. But after the Resurrection, Jesus appeared personally to James (1 Corinthians 15:7), and James believed. He became the leader of the Jerusalem church. Interestingly, James is here called an apostle although he, like Paul, also was not one of the original Twelve. Assuring his readers before God of the truth of his words, Paul made clear that any assumption on anyone's part that he was taught and/or commissioned by the twelve apostles was absurd.

1:21 Paul's arrival in Jerusalem had caused real problems. His preaching stirred up a hornet's nest of opposition. Paul's life was in danger. Many of the believers were hesitant to accept his roadside conversion. His presence may have also caused added persecution for other believers. Those who did accept Paul were committed to keeping him alive. So Paul was urged to leave after only fifteen days. His departure eventually took him to his hometown of Tarsus in Cilicia (see Acts 9:30; 22:3). On his way, while in the provinces of Syria and Cilicia, Paul most likely continued preaching the gospel. These small details serve to emphasize Paul's claim of direct authority from Jesus, apart from the equal authority of those in Jerusalem. In the remote areas Paul mentioned, he had no opportunity to receive instruction from the apostles or have his ministry overseen by them. Thus, he was not part of the Judean authority structure.

1:22 Although Paul was known to the Christians in Jerusalem at this time, because of both his personal visit and his brief ministry there, the churches in Judea, outside the city limits of Jerusalem, didn't know Paul personally. Judea was the name of the Roman district where the city of Jerusalem was. There were identifiable groups of believers meeting in towns throughout Judea.

1:23 Paul was unknown to the churches in Judea, yet they recognized the message he preached and glorified God because of it (1:24). Paul was making the point that his authority and ministry were recognized by people who had never even seen him, yet the Galatians had met him, listened to him, and believed his message, only to turn around and doubt him! The Judean Christians heard what people were saying (perhaps as the Galatians had, 1:13): The one who used to persecute believers was now preaching the very faith he tried to destroy.

1:24 The Jewish Christians in Judea were rejoicing and glorifying God because of Paul—his conversion, his message, his ministry. How ironic that the Judean Christians had given Paul full status and recognition without ever seeing or hearing him, but the Galatian Christians, who had no reason to doubt Paul or his message, were beginning to join the Judaizers and thus to undermine Paul. They needed to cast aside their doubts, get back to the truth, and get on with what God wanted them to do.

THE APOSTLES ACCEPT PAUL / 2:1-10

To defend himself against the Judaizers' charges, the apostle pointed to his fourteen years of independent ministry between his first two visits to Jerusalem following his conversion. He functioned directly under Jesus' authority during that time, not under the official body at Jerusalem. He helped the Galatians understand the complex relationship existing between himself and the apostles in Jerusalem. So when Paul wrote about his visit to the mother church, he showed both his independence from the other apostles' authority and his respect for them. Paul gave four significant aspects of his visit that established his credentials: (1) the companions on his journey; (2) the content of his message; (3) the confirmation of his ministry; and (4) his commission to come to Jerusalem.

2:1 Paul continued the itinerary from 1:21 and explained that he went to the regions of Syria and Cilicia; afterward he went back to Jerusalem. The book of Acts records five visits to Jerusalem by Paul: (1) the visit to get acquainted with Peter (around A.D. 35, Acts 9:26-30; Galatians 1:18-20); (2) the visit to deliver a gift to the Jerusalem church for famine relief (around A.D. 44, Acts 11:27-30); (3) the visit to attend the Jerusalem council (around A.D. 49 / 50, Acts 15:1-30); (4) the visit at the end of the second missionary journey (around A.D. 52, Acts 18:22); and (5) the visit that resulted in his being imprisoned and sent to Rome (around A.D. 57, Acts 21:15–23:35).

The visit to Jerusalem mentioned here is most likely the second visit, when he delivered the famine relief gift to the Jerusalem church. It would not be the third visit, because Paul spends time in this letter dealing with questions that the Jerusalem council ultimately settled, so the council could not yet have taken place.

The fourteen years are probably dated, not from the last mention in his itinerary (that is, from his time in Syria and Cilicia), but rather from his conversion. The first and fourteenth years were partial years. Like history itself, Paul tended to divide and orient his life around the time “before Christ” and “after Christ.” Paul was converted around A.D. 32, dating this visit at A.D. 44/45. Paul was pointing out that he had been preaching to the Gentiles for a long time, and thus had a specific message that could be discussed with the church leaders in Jerusalem. Following this visit, Paul then took the first missionary journey (Acts 13:1–14:28), wrote this letter to the Galatians in response to the troubling news of spiritual desertion by the new believers, and later attended the Jerusalem council that settled many of the issues discussed in this letter to the Galatians.

According to the book of Acts, Barnabas recognized Paul's sincerity as a truly converted former persecutor and introduced Paul to the apostles. Many believers, even the apostles themselves, may have feared that Paul simply was acting in some extravagant ruse in order to find out and capture more Christians. But Barnabas was not afraid (Acts 9:27). His name means "Son of Encouragement," and Paul knew firsthand about Barnabas's kind encouragement. Barnabas accompanied Paul on the famine relief visit to Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30) and traveled with him on the first missionary journey, during which Galatia was evangelized (Acts 13:2-3). Thus, Barnabas was well known to the Galatian Christians to whom Paul was writing.

Titus, a Greek, was one of Paul's most trusted and dependable coworkers. Paul called him "a true child in the faith" (Titus 1:4), so he was probably one of Paul's converts. This trip to Jerusalem with Paul became the first of many journeys for Titus, who would later become a true right-hand man to Paul. Exactly why Paul brought Titus along to Jerusalem is unclear. Possibly because Titus was a pure Gentile convert, he was presented as a "test case" to the church leaders (2:3-5).

2:2 God told Paul, through a revelation, to confer with the church leaders in Jerusalem so they would understand the message he had been preaching to the Gentiles. Paul's point here was that his visit to Jerusalem was not because the apostles had summoned him or because he had felt a need to talk to the apostles about his ministry among the Gentiles.

This revelation may have been to Paul personally, or it may have come through someone else. It is probable that Paul was referring to the prophecy made by Agabus, who had predicted that a severe famine was coming (Acts 11:28), for we are told that this prophecy led to Paul and Barnabas being sent to Jerusalem and Paul using that God-given opportunity to then talk to the church leaders.

Remember that one reason Paul wrote this letter was to combat the false teaching of the Judaizers who were trying to undermine Paul's authority as an apostle. Paul did not go to Jerusalem at the call of the apostles, and he did not go to get approval for the gospel he preached. Instead, Paul went to set his message before them to make sure they did not disagree (which was really the only response they could have). Paul didn't need approval because the gospel had been revealed to him by God himself. The essence of the gospel Paul preached to both Jews and Gentiles was that God's salvation is offered to all people regardless of race, sex, nationality, wealth, social standing, educational level, or anything else. All types of people can be forgiven by trusting in Christ (see Romans 10:8-13; Galatians 3:28).

The language Paul used here may seem harsh or even boastful, but it preserves an important distinction. Paul believed and taught the principle of mutual submission among believers (Ephesians 5:21). But the truth does not submit. Paul voluntarily came before the leaders in Jerusalem and calmly presented to them the message he was preaching. He was maintaining accountability and solidarity with other Christian leaders, without for a moment assuming that what Christ had given him was open to their approval. Paul discussed the gospel he was preaching among the Gentiles in a private meeting with the leaders of the church—probably James, Peter, and John (2:9).

The meeting in privacy was not, as the Judaizers hoped to claim, for the purpose of correcting Paul's message. Instead, Paul met privately to make sure they were all in agreement, or his ministry would have been useless. If the apostles incorrectly disagreed with him and agreed with the Judaizers (that to be Christians, people first had to become Jews and follow all the laws and customs—especially regarding circumcision), this would have caused severe damage to the work that Paul had already done for years among the Gentiles and hurt future missionary efforts. Paul realized the momentous importance of the decision that needed to be made regarding the relationship of Gentiles and Jews on the common meeting ground of Christianity. Paul had no doubts about the message Christ had given him, but he appeared before the other apostles as an equal expecting their wholehearted support.

2:3 Paul's message preached among the Gentiles was tested in the treatment of the young Greek convert whom Paul brought along to Jerusalem—Titus. Paul's message to the Gentiles was that God accepted anyone who believes, regardless of race or religious background. Titus's presence gave the entire church an opportunity to practice what they intended to preach. The gospel clearly applied to Titus without requiring his circumcision. The development was a major loss for the Judaizers (the "false Christians," 2:4), for it showed that the Jerusalem church had accepted Paul's policy.

Circumcision was a big issue for the Jews because the custom dated back to the days of Abraham and their birth as a nation. More than any other practice, circumcision separated God's people from their pagan neighbors. In Abraham's day, this was essential for developing the pure worship of the one true God. Whether the Judaizers were intentionally trying to undermine Christianity with this requirement, or whether they sincerely believed that as an outgrowth of Judaism, Christianity should fulfill Jewish requirements, they were wrong.

The apostles did not demand that Titus be circumcised, though he was a Gentile. They agreed with Paul that circumcision was an unnecessary rite for Gentile converts. Several years later, Paul did circumcise Timothy, another Greek Christian (Acts 16:3). Unlike Titus, however, Timothy was half Jewish. Paul did not deny Jews the right to be circumcised; he was simply saying that Gentiles should not be asked to become Jews before becoming Christians.

2:4 Here Paul called the Judaizers so-called Christians . . . false ones. They were most likely from the party of the Pharisees (Acts 15:5), the strictest religious leaders of Judaism. Some of these Judaizers came to spy on the believers. These people somehow were planted into the Christians' ranks. If they got into the private meeting Paul had with the church leaders, someone of power may have been behind the controversy. The Pharisees would have been most interested in observing what was going on in the Christian camp, especially regarding freedom from Jewish regulations. Indeed, their very existence involved detailed obedience to Jewish law and traditions—and making sure everyone else did the same. The philosophy of the Judaizers was something like, "If you can't beat them or join them, then try to change them by absorbing them." The status quo of Judaism, which Jesus repeatedly confronted during his ministry, did not give up easily. Those still committed to that system wanted to force the believers to follow all the Jewish regulations, to make them slaves under the religious legal system. Circumcision, with its inherent significance (see 2:3 above), was a good first step. Obviously, they did not see themselves as trying to enslave anyone, but Paul understood that this was the ultimate end of required obedience to all the Jewish laws and traditions.

2:5 The truth of the Good News was at stake. Paul sought to protect the truth that the gospel is for all people who can accept it by faith alone. Paul was convinced that circumcision, a rite he himself had undergone, was not part of the essential truth of the gospel. Paul fought to protect that gospel for you, specifically referring to the Galatian Christians to whom he wrote. But it also applies to any believer today who has not come out of a Jewish background. We have received salvation without having to ascribe to a whole set of Jewish laws because Paul had the foresight and wisdom to fight for protection of the gospel of grace regarding this issue.

2:6 Paul's wording here was not meant disrespectfully toward the apostles and church leaders. Paul was walking a fine line between asserting his independence from the apostles, and yet his unity with them. Paul was not in awe of the apostles; who they were made no difference to him in that sense. Paul wanted to make it clear that both his gospel and his apostleship were of supernatural origin. Because God has no favorites between him and the recognized apostles, then neither should anyone else (see also Ephesians 6:9). The apostles had nothing to add to what Paul was preaching—they did not correct Paul’s message or try to add anything to it (such as the need for circumcision). Instead, they accepted Paul as an equal and accepted his message to the Gentiles as “gospel truth.”

2:7-8 What the apostles saw was most likely the convincing success that God had given to Paul’s ministry of preaching the Good News to the Gentiles. This is compared to Peter who had been having a dynamic ministry of preaching to the Jews. Peter also had had contact with Gentiles (see Acts 10), probably a key point in the approval of Paul and Barnabas’s ministry. Peter’s encounter with Cornelius had demonstrated God’s acceptance of the Gentiles. This prepared Peter to accept the legitimacy of Paul’s special call. Peter and Paul represented God’s ongoing covenant with all of humanity under the saving grace made possible by Jesus. Each of them had valid ministries, ordained and authorized by Christ, because the same God was working through both men.

Both Paul and Peter preached the same gospel. Though their audiences were vastly different, the message did not, could not, and would not ever change. The gospel that remains unchanged today is that salvation is by God’s grace alone for anyone who believes.

2:9 The men mentioned were James, half brother of Jesus and leader of the Jerusalem church, and two of Jesus’ original disciples and part of his inner circle of three—Peter and John. These three noted leaders accepted Paul and Barnabas as their coworkers—giving their blessing and encouragement in their ministry among the Gentiles. These pillars of the church had recognized the gift God had given to Paul. There was evidence of God’s saving grace in Paul’s own life and the results flowing from his ministry among the Gentiles. Paul was a walking, talking advertisement for the gospel. So Paul and Barnabas were encouraged to keep preaching to the Gentiles, while the apostles in Jerusalem and Judea would continue their work with the Jews. This referred to each group’s main focus; it was not exclusive. The apostles ministered to many Gentiles; Paul and his team always spoke to Jews, as well. Yet always their message was the same: the gospel of salvation.

2:10 Although the ministry and message of Paul and Barnabas had been accepted, the entire issue had not been handled because the Judaizers had not been silenced. It would take the council of Jerusalem (Acts 15) to block the efforts to bring the gospel back under the law. In the meantime, much effort would be required to promote unity at the grass roots level between Jewish and Gentile Christians. The apostles realized that one immediate and practical way to bridge this possible gap would be to remember to help the poor.

Paul assured them that he had been eager to do that. Paul never forgot this understanding. He continued to be eager to help the poor believers in Jerusalem. On his missionary journeys (especially the third journey), Paul gathered funds to help the poor Jewish believers in Jerusalem (see Acts 24:17; Romans 15:25-28; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 8-9).

PAUL CONFRONTS PETER / 2:11-21

With the speed of a remote control switch, the scene changed as Paul began to explain another time when his authority as an apostle had been confirmed. The setting switched from Jerusalem (2:1-10) to Antioch, a Gentile city familiar to the Galatians (2:11-21). In Antioch, Paul had faced another conflict over his authority. At that time, however, he openly opposed the actions of the apostle Peter himself.

Peter had arrived in Antioch and had been warmly welcomed by the church. He, Paul, Barnabas, and the rest of the leadership fellowshiped, taught, and ate together regularly. Then a delegation arrived from Jerusalem, and almost immediately Peter's treatment of the Gentile Christians changed. He kept his distance from them. Others, including Barnabas, followed Peter's example. But Paul leaped into the breach with a ringing confrontation.

2:11 This Antioch was in Syria (as distinguished from Antioch in Pisidia). Antioch was a major trade center in the ancient world. Heavily populated by Greeks, it eventually became a strong Christian center. In Antioch the believers were first called Christians (Acts 11:26). Antioch in Syria became the headquarters for the Gentile church and was Paul's base of operations.

When Peter made this trip to Antioch is uncertain; there is no reference to it in the book of Acts. It may have occurred soon after Paul, Barnabas, and Titus had returned to Antioch from Jerusalem after delivering the famine relief. Perhaps Peter wanted to see for himself the ministry taking place in Antioch. During this visit, Paul had to oppose Peter publicly. Peter's actions were very wrong, and Paul, an apostle with the right to speak with authority, had to confront Peter. The event involved an emotional, face-to-face showdown. Peter was caught in a glaring inconsistency that might have gone tragically unresolved if not for Paul's boldness. He always focused on the purity of the gospel truth; whenever it was threatened, Paul acted.

2:12 When Peter arrived in Antioch, he saw that Jewish and Gentile Christians enjoyed fellowship at mealtimes without concern over Jewish dietary laws. His setting aside long-established taboos against Jews sharing board and room with Gentiles showed nothing less than his acceptance of freedom in Christ. Peter accepted these practices; he himself had received a vision from God about food laws and Gentiles in the new world of the gospel. Indeed, Peter had been the first to receive the understanding about God's acceptance of the Gentiles, and he was the first to preach to Gentiles. Peter understood from this vision that he should not look upon the Gentiles as inferior people whom God would not redeem. After Peter had this vision, a Gentile Roman officer named Cornelius asked him to come and share the gospel message with him and his household. Peter did so, without the hesitation he would have felt before the vision, and Cornelius and his household became believers.

Thus, when Peter arrived in Antioch, he already knew that God had broken down the barriers between Jews and Gentiles, and he understood the true meaning of Christian freedom. So he gladly ate with the Gentile Christians. The imperfect tense of the verb indicates that this was not one occasion but a repeated pattern, meaning that Peter joined with the other Jews in eating with their Gentile brothers and sisters in Christ on a regular basis. This pattern undoubtedly went beyond sharing common meals and included taking the Lord's Supper together.

But all that was before some Jewish friends of James came. These men were the legalists and most likely not sent by James. The wording here means they came "from James's group," that is, from the Jerusalem church. James, as leader of the Jerusalem church, had a vast range of people to deal with, and these men were part of the legalistic group of his church. Among the entourage from Jerusalem, there must have been certain men who frowned on fraternizing with Gentiles. These may have been rigid and legalistic Jewish Christians, but they were probably associated with the same "false Christians" who had disrupted Paul's visit to Jerusalem.

Though this group probably tried to trade on James's authority, he later firmly denied sending them. In the letter sent back to the Gentile Christians in Antioch after the Jerusalem council, James wrote, "We understand that some men from here have troubled you and upset you with their teaching, but they had no such instructions from us" (Acts 15:24).

Apparently, the mere appearance of this group caught Peter by surprise. When these legalists arrived, they may have expressed shock at Peter's conduct. Peter surely knew these men, as they came from the Jerusalem church, and he was influenced by their presence to the point that he wouldn't eat with the Gentiles anymore.

Why was this action "very wrong" (2:11)? By his actions, Peter was implying that there really was a difference between Jewish and Gentile believers—a difference that could not be bridged. The notion that the body of Christ had to be divided between Jews and Gentiles was nothing other than heresy. Peter was being hypocritical. Perhaps he was motivated by the desire to keep peace between the legalists and the law-free gospel group. Peter's error was that he gave in because he was afraid of what these legalists would say. Peter must have known that he had gone against God's revelation. By the very nature of Peter's stature as an apostle, his actions confused and hurt other believers—thus Paul's strong face-to-face opposition to Peter's actions.

2:13 As Peter acted on his fear, the other Jews, meaning those not already committed to the policy of separation, went along with his hypocrisy. They, too, gradually stopped joining with the Gentiles in eating and fellowshiping. These other Jewish Christians were the Jewish believers who lived in Antioch and were members of the church there. In that setting, they were most likely in the minority.

Paul mentioned Barnabas separately, probably because Paul was especially surprised that Barnabas would be so influenced. Barnabas was Paul's traveling companion; together they preached the gospel to the Gentiles, proclaiming Jews' and Gentiles' oneness with Christ. Barnabas was not from the Jerusalem church and would not have had the personal and relational stake in this that Peter had. Yet, like Peter, Barnabas was human, and for some unknown reason he followed Peter's example.

Paul boldly pointed out the hypocrisy. A hypocrite says one thing but does another. Peter, Barnabas, and the Jewish believers knew that God accepted everyone equally, that salvation was available to all, that there should be no separation in the body of Christ. Yet their actions implied just the opposite. If Paul had opted for peace and allowed these actions to go unrebuked, the Christian church would have divided into two distinct groups going their separate ways. But this was not God's plan, nor was it consistent with "the truth of the Good News," as Paul would explain in the next verse.

2:14 This was the crux of the matter—they (Peter, Barnabas, and the Jewish believers in Antioch) were not following the truth of the Good News. This truth was that Jesus Christ had died and had risen again to offer salvation to all people—Jews and Gentiles alike. Both groups are equally acceptable to God; thus, they must be equally acceptable to each other. Jewish believers separating themselves implied that they were superior because of their race, traditions, or law keeping. The Good News clearly shows, however, that people do not become accepted by God for anything they do.

Paul did not oppose Peter in order to elevate himself. Paul recounted this story in this letter to the Galatians to show that he was a full apostle and could speak authoritatively, even in opposition to another apostle if the truth of the gospel were at stake. This was not a secondary issue blown out of proportion. The confrontation fit the crisis.

Paul spoke to Peter publicly in front of all the others—that is, in front of the Jewish believers, the Gentile believers, the legalists, and Barnabas. Those who want to attribute other motives to Paul might ask why he didn't go to Peter privately. Wouldn't that have been more "peace loving"? more "Christian"? But Peter's actions had started a domino effect; and, because of his authority as an apostle, his actions had confused the believers. A private solution to this problem was not an option. Peter's action was public, with public consequences; the rebuke had to be public. As a leader of the Jerusalem church, Peter was setting public policy.

Paul recorded his exact words here. Obviously, everyone knew Peter's Jewish background; Paul's wording indicates they also knew that Peter had set aside Jewish rituals and ceremonial laws (especially the food laws that made fellowship between Jews and Gentiles almost impossible) because of his freedom in Christ, thus living like a Gentile and not like a Jew. Certainly the visions Peter had seen and his experience with Cornelius had cured him of any prejudice against Gentiles (see Acts 10).

But how could Paul say that Peter was trying to make these Gentiles obey the Jewish laws? By siding with the Judaizers who were visiting Antioch, Peter was playing into their hands, appearing as if he agreed with them and actually supported their insistence that Gentiles should follow Jewish customs. By separating himself from the Gentiles, Peter was supporting the Judaizers' claim that Jews still were better than Gentiles.

Alongside the theological problems that Peter's actions caused, a practical question must have surfaced. While Peter's change in policy about having meals with Gentiles was harmful, the change in the policy for the Lord's Supper must have been disastrous. If this group was divided over the sharing of common meals, it is inconceivable that they would be able to assemble together for the Lord's Supper. Without Paul's immediate and forceful intervention, the church in Antioch might have been crippled and destroyed.

2:15 Both Paul and Peter were Jews by birth, as were, obviously, all the Jewish Christians. Yet being Jews by birth was not enough for salvation. Paul's phrase, "sinners" like the Gentiles, was said ironically because this was the scornful name Jews applied to Gentiles. Peter's actions had conveyed some sort of "holier than thou" attitude in line with the teaching that Gentiles were still "sinners" unless they became Jewish. But both Peter and Paul knew better.

2:16 All people stand as condemned sinners before God: God-fearing, law-keeping Jews, and "Gentile sinners" alike. But all are made right with God, not by doing what the law commands, but by faith in Jesus Christ. This is the doctrine of "justification." God justifies people despite their guilt, pardons them, and then makes them his children and heirs. The law to which he was referring could mean Jewish Scripture, plus the laws added by the Pharisees. If people could be saved by obeying the law, then Christ did not have to die. But the reality is, no one will ever be saved by obeying the law.

2:17 In this verse, Paul responds to one objection that might be raised by his opponents. They might say, What if we seek to be made right with God through faith in Christ and then find out that we are still sinners? Has Christ led us into sin? How could Paul claim that justification by faith is effective when Christians still sin? To say that the law doesn't matter is to say that standards and morality don't matter. This leaves the door open for people to become believers and then live any way they choose.

But Paul's reply is vehement: Of course not! Sin does not result because people are justified; Christ is not responsible for promoting sin. Obviously, those who have been justified—Christians—can and do sin, for that, unfortunately, is part of our human nature (Paul details his own struggle with sin in Romans 7). But the sin led to the need for justification, not the other way around. The Judaizers saw Christianity as an excuse to get out from under Jewish law. But Paul (and the Jewish Christians who had experienced justification) knew that while offering freedom from the restrictive law, justification by faith demanded lifestyle and behavioral changes. When God truly gets hold of a life, nothing can remain the same. Grace does not abolish the law with its standards and morality; rather, it moves it from an external standard impossible to keep to an inner motivation for living a pure and God-honoring life.

2:18 Justification by faith tore down the Pharisees’ “merit system” with all its laws and good deeds that attempted to rack up points with God. To rebuild that, to be justified by faith and then return to that legal system as a basis for one’s relationship with God, would erroneously imply that Christ’s death was not sufficient. Paul saw the situation in Antioch with Peter as a clear illustration of the unnecessary burden that some wanted to place on Gentile believers. Peter, through his act of pulling away from the Gentile fellowship, was giving law a place of authority that it no longer held.

Justified people will sin, but they are moving onward and upward. The real sinner is the one who is justified and then returns to the law. Ironically, that person is actually guilty. People under the law are more precisely described as lawbreakers than as law-keepers! The law cannot give salvation because no one can keep it perfectly. The best the law can do is prove our sinfulness and how much we need the Savior and his gracious offer of justification by faith.

2:19 The law itself could not save because no one can keep its perfect standards. The law thus cannot earn God’s approval; instead, it offers only failure and death. So what is its usefulness? The law was a necessary instrument to show people the ultimate futility of trying to live up to God’s standard on their own. But that very hopelessness created by the law can have a positive impact if it leads a person to the true hope, Christ himself. Christ took upon himself that death penalty—the death we deserved for being lawbreakers. When Paul understood that the law was completely incapable of giving salvation, and when he embraced the one who could give salvation, he knew he could never go back to the law. Paul felt this so intensely that he expressed it in terms of death, I died to the law. The perfect tense of the verbs indicates something that happened in the past but influences the present. Paul “died to the law” by being crucified with Christ. Christ completely fulfilled the law (past tense); this act influenced Paul in the present (who, as an imperfect human, could not keep the law). Yet because of Christ’s death, the law no longer had a hold on either of them. The cross of Christ shows that although the law had to be kept, it was fulfilled by a perfect human. Christ paid sin’s penalty for imperfect humans. Being crucified with Christ refers to the conversion experience, a once-for-all transaction that has ongoing results.

Paul knew he had to die to the law before he could live for God. There can be no middle ground. It makes no sense to accept salvation by faith and then work for it, just as it makes no sense to accept a gift and then offer the giver money for it. We must deny that our own efforts can accomplish anything in order to be able to humbly accept the gift that Christ offers. By identifying with Christ, we can experience freedom from the law that he procured for us by dying on our behalf.

2:20 Paul claimed he had been “crucified,” but he was still alive. Paul had died with Christ, but it was his “old self” that had died: I myself no longer live. The self-centered, Jewish Pharisee, Christian-persecuting, law-abiding, violent, and evil Paul “no longer” lived. That person’s sinful life had been crucified with Christ on the cross. This is the “I” of the flesh (see 5:13-24), of sinful human desires, of works and pride. Paul was released, not only from the tyranny of the Mosaic law, but also from the tyranny of self.

Instead, Paul was a “new person” (2 Corinthians 5:17) because, he explained, Christ lives in me. In other words, Paul had turned over his life to Christ. Each of the phrases is a crucial aspect of the sequence of salvation: We relinquish our old life and turn to Christ for his life. The self-centered self now becomes the Christ-centered self. It is as if Paul was saying, “My old life, my old goals and plans, even old relationships were nailed to the cross with Christ. Now I have a new life because Christ came in and filled the empty spaces all those old pursuits could not fill. Now he lives in me and is the focus of my life.” To accomplish this, there must be a radical cleansing of our old selfish nature. But there must also be a turning to the empowering of Christ. Just as in repentance we turn away from sin and toward Christ, we must turn from the self in the flesh to the self hidden in Christ.

Paul no longer focused his life on trying to please God by obeying laws; instead, with Christ in him, I live my life in this earthly body by trusting in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. Believers live in their bodies that are prone to sin while they remain on earth. But with Christ in charge, they are new creations, living life by faith. This faith is an attitude, a lifestyle.

2:21 Paul’s message of salvation by faith (without works of the law) did not treat the grace of God as meaningless. Instead, that is exactly what the Judaizers’ teaching did—they “set aside” or “nullified” God’s grace. For if we could be saved by keeping the law, then the logical conclusion is that there was no need for Christ to die. However, it was because no one could obey God’s law perfectly that Christ came to both obey it, fulfill its penalty, and then set it aside as a means to salvation. That was the ultimate picture of God’s love and grace for sinful humanity. The basis of Christianity is God’s grace and Christ’s death for sin. Without these there is no faith, no gospel, and no hope of salvation.

GALATIANS 3:1–4:7

THE LAW AND FAITH IN CHRIST / 3:1-14

With the heartfelt words affirming his personal commitment to the Galatians, Paul spoke of his ministry with his Galatian friends. He remembered how clearly he had shared the message and how openly they had responded. Since they had been launched so beautifully in the Christian faith, how could they have run aground so quickly? Paul was convinced that those who influenced the Galatians acted like friendly harbor pilots. They promised to guide the Galatians' faith by adding to their understanding of Christ an "essential component" of the law. But, instead, these pilots put the Galatian ship of faith in great danger.

Paul was adamant in his response to all of this. Whatever role the law might play in a believer's life, it did not add to or improve the salvation provided freely in Christ. To be acceptable to God, we must be justified by faith in Jesus Christ alone. The point needed to be hammered home, and Paul did this repeatedly in this letter.

3:1 In 1:11 Paul had called the believers in Galatia "friends"; in this verse, he used a much more impersonal Galatians to address his converts. He preceded it with a strong adjective reprimanding their behavior—they were foolish. The Greek word does not mean that they were mentally deficient; rather, it suggests the behavior of people who are intelligent yet are not using that intelligence to perceive the truth (the same Greek word is used in Luke 24:25; Romans 1:14; 1 Timothy 6:9; and Titus 3:3). The Galatians had shifted from believing in the death and resurrection of Christ for salvation to believing that they must obey the law in order to be fully saved. Such illogical thinking implied that "Christ died for nothing" (2:21).

Paul sarcastically thought that perhaps a magician had cast an evil spell on them. The Galatian believers had become fascinated by the false teachers' arguments, almost as though they had been hypnotized. How else could this nonsense be explained? He was questioning, not their intelligence, but their lack of discernment. They were being fooled by arguments that they should have been able to refute.

Paul's preaching of Christ crucified was so clear and vivid, it was almost as if they had seen it with their own eyes, as if Paul had shown them a signboard with a picture of Christ dying on the cross. By turning their eyes from the Cross to the law, they were confusing the very simple facts of salvation.

3:2 To rectify the Galatians' confused thinking, Paul returned to the basics. Four simple questions in the following verses will reveal their foolishness.

Paul's first question was most basic, for it focused on how their Christian life had begun. The Galatians' shift to following the law for salvation was completely contrary to their initial experience of the Christian faith at Paul's preaching. So he asked, "Did you receive the Holy Spirit by keeping the law?" The Galatians had accepted the gospel and had received the Holy Spirit (see also 4:6). Did this happen because they obeyed the law or because they believed the gospel Paul preached to them? The Galatian believers, mostly Gentile in background, didn't even have or know the law, so the answer was painfully obvious. Their salvation began by faith. Law keeping had nothing to do with it.

Paul mentioned as an indisputable fact that the Holy Spirit came upon the Galatian believers only after they had believed the message Paul had told them about Christ. The apostle could point to their reception of the Spirit at the time of their conversion as proof that God had accepted them—based solely on their acceptance of the gospel message. God's Spirit had been within them long before the Judaizers had entered the scene.

3:3 The Galatians had started their Christian lives in the Spirit, so why would they now try to become perfect by their own human effort? Paul highlighted how completely inconsistent it was to receive a gift and then try to earn it. But Paul had heard that those in Galatia were attempting just that—trading freedom in Christ for slavery to tradition.

3:4 Paul's next question asked the Galatians to apply their past experience to their immediate situation. The words, you have suffered so much for the Good News, probably included actual suffering at the hands of nonbelievers.

Paul and Barnabas certainly had faced great suffering as they preached in the region of Galatia on the first missionary journey (see Acts 13:45-50; 14:2-33). It may be that the new believers in each of these cities had been treated the same. "Are you now going to just throw it all away?" In other words, "If you were willing to suffer so much for your newfound faith at the hands of the Jews, why would you now turn back to obeying the Jewish laws?" This too was foolish. Even as he said it, he was unwilling to believe it, for he added: "Surely it was not in vain, was it?" Paul did not feel it was hopeless to try to bring the Galatians back to true faith.

3:5 Paul had yet another rhetorical question. "Does God give you the Holy Spirit and work miracles among you because you obey the law of Moses?”

The similar question in verse 2 is in the past tense, reminding the Galatians of their initial response of salvation and what happened because of that response. This verse, however, is in the present tense, focusing on what God continued to do for the Galatians. He “gives” his Spirit and “works” miracles among them every day. Was this happening because the Galatians were carefully observing the Jewish law or because they believed in Christ and proclaimed that opportunity to others? Again, the answer was painfully obvious. God’s continual blessings come just as salvation came—through belief in the message they heard about Christ, not through law keeping.

3:6 The previous questions pointed to the Galatians’ experience; then Paul turned to an example from Scripture to support his teaching of salvation by faith alone. For the Jews, there could hardly be a more important and influential person than Abraham, the father of their nation. But how did the Galatian Gentiles know about Abraham? It could be that the Galatian converts had heard about Abraham from the Gentile converts to Judaism in the church (there were many Jews in southern Galatia). Another possibility is that the Judaizers were hammering away at the need for Gentiles to become “children of Abraham” (3:7) through circumcision (see notes on 2:3). The Judaizers would focus on passages like Genesis 17:1-14 (where God gave Abraham the covenant of circumcision) to teach that only those who were circumcised and kept Jewish laws would be acceptable to God. Thus, the Gentile believers knew Abraham’s name.

The covenant of circumcision was given to Abraham (Genesis 17), but after the words quoted in this verse from Genesis 15:6, where Abraham believed God, so God declared him righteous because of his faith. Abraham, the founder of the Jewish nation, was considered righteous, not by works, but because he “believed God.”

To be “declared righteous” means accepted by God. Abraham did not have Moses’ law, nor did he have the cross of Christ, the gospel, or salvation as offered in the New Testament. But he was God’s servant, acceptable to God and considered righteous because he believed what he knew of God.

3:7 The Judaizers had argued that to be a Christian a person had to first become a Jew, a descendant of Abraham, and subsequently obey the Jewish laws. Jews, including these Judaizers, were extremely proud of their lineage traced back to Abraham. At the heart of Jewish salvation theology was the concept of being “children of Abraham.” The Jews believed that they were automatically the people of God because of their heritage. But from Abraham's own example, Paul showed that the real children of Abraham are all those who put their faith in God, those who believe in Christ and the salvation he offers. As Abraham was saved by faith, so each person is saved by faith. As Abraham was declared righteous because of his faith in God, so both Jews and Gentiles who believe are declared righteous because of their faith in Christ. Belief is the first and only step to salvation.

3:8 Although Paul had made his point, he added a further devastating application of the Scriptures against the Judaizers' false teaching: not only are Gentiles and Jews saved by faith, but it was God who planned from the beginning to accept the Gentiles on the basis of their faith.

God had promised this Good News to Abraham. God's promise that all nations will be blessed through Abraham encompassed God's plan for the ages. All nations would be blessed through Abraham because his descendant, Jesus, would bring salvation to all who believe. The blessing promised to Abraham was intended, from the beginning, to be given by God to all nations, not just to the Jews. This blessing, both to Abraham and to the nations, was promised by God before any laws or works were given or required. Thus, God would justify the Gentiles, not by works of the law, not by circumcision, but by faith. Salvation is the ultimate blessing, a gift simply to be believed and received. All believers in every age and from every nation share Abraham's blessing.

3:9 Faith did not begin in the New Testament; rather, it has been the key requirement for all believers from the beginning. God's relationship with his children has always been based on faith. Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation, exemplified faith in God, even though his faith faltered at times. Abraham clearly stands out among those before and after him who lived by faith. All who put their faith in Christ and in the salvation we have been so graciously offered, share the same blessing Abraham received because of his faith. While it is true that "all nations" would be blessed, there is a qualifier—only the people in those nations who put their faith in Christ would receive the blessing of salvation.

3:10 Having shown that justification by faith is true according to the Scriptures, Paul here made the opposite point, that justification by the law is false according to the Scriptures—in fact, according to the law itself. Paul quoted Deuteronomy 27:26 to prove that, contrary to what the Judaizers claimed, obeying the law cannot justify and save—it can only condemn. Cursed is everyone who does not observe and obey all these commands that are written in God’s Book of the Law. They are cursed because no one can obey the law perfectly and because breaking even one commandment brings a person under condemnation. Trying to achieve salvation through obedience to the law is a no-win situation. The law demands perfection—an impossibility for sinful humans.

The law cannot save; neither can it reverse the condemnation (Romans 3:20-24). But Christ took the curse of the law entirely upon himself when he hung on the cross (Deuteronomy 21:23). He did this so we wouldn’t have to bear our own punishment. The only condition is that we accept Christ’s death on our behalf by faith as the means to be saved (Colossians 1:20-23).

3:11 Trying to be right with God by keeping the law doesn’t work. The law could not save, but faith could. Paul pointed to Habakkuk’s declaration in Habakkuk 2:4, “It is through faith that a righteous person has life.” A righteous person is not one who keeps the law, but one who is in a right relationship with God. This expression means Christians will have life because of God’s faithfulness and because of their response of faith in God; as a result, they will have eternal life and experience fullness of life.

3:12 When we have faith, we do not need the law. Quoting again from the law (Leviticus 18:5), Paul supported his statement, “If you wish to find life by obeying the law, you must obey all of its commands.” The law itself says that only perfect obedience can gain approval from God—one can “live” by the law only by obeying it completely, without fail. The problem is, no one can do that—it is humanly impossible.

3:13 Because the law sets forth requirements that are impossible to fulfill, it serves as a curse. But there is hope because Christ has rescued us. How did Christ take upon himself the curse for our wrongdoing? Paul answered the question by yet another Old Testament quotation, “Cursed is everyone who is hung on a tree” (Deuteronomy 21:23). To be hanged on a tree signified to the Jews that a person had been cursed. Christ willingly allowed himself to become cursed for all humanity, and thus endured the Crucifixion. At the cross, the curse of the law was transferred from sinful humanity to the sinless Son of God. Christ took on himself the penalty for sin.

3:14 The blessing refers to justification by faith (as discussed in 3:8-9), to be offered to Gentiles as well as to Abraham’s descendants, the Jews. Through trust in Christ's redemption on the cross, God's promise to Abraham (see 3:8) could be made a reality to all who believe.

Then we Christians (Jews and Gentiles together), having been justified through faith, will receive the promised Holy Spirit through faith. If all persons are eligible to benefit from Christ, then the Holy Spirit, God's deposit, must also be available to all (see Ephesians 1:13-14).

The Holy Spirit was present at the creation of the world as one of the agents in the origin of life. He is the power behind the rebirth of every Christian and the one who helps us live the Christian life. The Holy Spirit sets us free, once and for all, from sin and its natural consequences. The Holy Spirit provides the power to help us do what the law requires of us externally. The Holy Spirit directs the entire course of our lives. He will guide our actions, daily behavior, and moral direction. Choosing to follow the Spirit's leading brings us full life on earth, eternal life, and peace with God. The Holy Spirit lives in us, taking control of our sinful human desires. Romans 8:14-15 says that we have received the Spirit of sonship. The true sons of God are not those of Jewish birth but those who are led by the Spirit of God as evidenced in their lifestyles. Romans 8:16 says, "His Holy Spirit speaks to us deep in our hearts and tells us that we are God's children." The Holy Spirit strengthens us and sustains us through times of trial. These wonderful benefits of the Holy Spirit come to believers by faith, not by keeping the law.

THE LAW AND GOD'S PROMISES / 3:15-23

Paul turned to an illustration from the Galatians' daily experience to help them understand the principles of law and grace. He found parallels in the making and executing of human agreements to the way that God deals with us. In 3:15-18 he used the Judaizers' own arguments against them. They had argued that Moses' law was a fuller and more complete expression of the covenant given to Abraham. Paul reversed their train of thought and showed that God's promise to Abraham was a promise made prior to Moses.

3:15 Paul anticipated a question the Judaizers might raise at this point, and summarily answered it. While the Judaizers might go so far as to agree with Paul that Abraham was justified by his faith, they would then add that the coming of the law changed the basis for gaining salvation. Paul wanted to clarify that nothing would change the promise that God made to Abraham.

Paul turned to an example from daily life. People know that in an irrevocable agreement, no one can set aside or amend any part of it. If that is the case with human contracts, how much more is it true of divine contracts?

God's promises always stand, no matter what changes occur. He always keeps his promises. Paul's point was not that God couldn't change his covenant with us, but that God didn't ever change the covenant established between himself and us, as illustrated by his specific dealings with Abraham. God's divine promise was made to Abraham long before the giving of the law to Moses. As such, it was a binding agreement not to be changed or annulled.

3:16 This verse would probably make more sense in the flow of the text if it appeared in parentheses. If the promise was meant for Abraham and his many descendants alone (to all his "children"), then it might appear that the promises had already been fulfilled, and that the law had come as a new phase in God's dealing with his people. But the promises had been given to his child—that is, Abraham's most famous descendant, Christ, who came many years after both Abraham and the law. The law has an important function, but salvation by grace through faith was God's promise from the beginning of time.

The Jews had always believed that God's promises would be fulfilled in a single person, the Messiah. God's promise remained intact even though Abraham himself only had one descendant through Sarah. Further, the promises were not fulfilled prior to the giving of the law, nor by the giving of the law. Instead, they were fulfilled when Christ came. Christ alone fulfilled the messianic aspects of God's covenant and showed that God's promises are in effect for all time.

Many claimed to be rightful heirs to God's promises to Abraham by their being his offspring, but Paul pointed out the only true, rightful heir was Jesus. The covenant that God shared with Abraham had been reaffirmed many times, but only Christ fulfilled the Abrahamic covenant as the unique child. The Jews certainly enjoyed many privileges and responsibilities as part of the Abrahamic covenant, but blessing the nations was the Messiah's role. The promises to Abraham go just to Christ. (They don't reside in the Jewish people.) In and through Christ they go to individual believers. Christ is our hope of blessing.

3:17 Moses received the law and gave it to God's people 430 years later. While there is debate about the exact period of these 430 years, the point is not the number of years, but rather that the law came "later" than God's promise to Abraham. For four centuries God had been blessing Abraham and his descendants on the basis of their faith, not by Moses' law, for it did not yet exist. When the law was given, it did not cancel God's agreement with Abraham; otherwise God would be breaking his promise. The giving of the law itself was an integral part of God following through on his covenant. God had preserved his people in Egypt and had overseen their Exodus. Then, through Moses, God had provided the law as a written standard of his own legitimate expectations of those in covenant with him.

The law neither replaced nor improved the covenant of promise (by faith through grace). As Paul would later develop (see 3:23-25), the law's main function is to demonstrate how crucial the covenant of faith is in allowing people any hope at all. As a paragraph in God's gracious covenant, law provides guidance; but taken alone the law becomes a grinding foe, constantly pointing to our shortcomings. In other words, the Judaizers were wrong. The promise of justification by faith is still in effect; the law does not set that aside or annul it.

3:18 There is yet another reason why salvation cannot be through law, or through faith plus law. The words law and promise are opposites in nature. Like oil and water, they cannot be combined. Inheritance here refers to believers' enjoyment of what they receive through the promise: salvation, eternal life, and removal of the curse. Thus, if our salvation and enjoyment of God's gifts depend on obeying the law, then they cannot depend on a promise, for it cannot be both ways. People do not need to work to attain what has been promised to them.

Instead, God gave it to Abraham as a promise. God gave the promise because he loved Abraham, not because Abraham deserved it. God "gave" the promise—the verb implies something that is both free (or unearned) and permanent. That way of salvation was still in effect in Paul's day, as well as in our own. God in his grace gives us salvation by our faith alone. He grants graciously and generously, not reluctantly; in love and compassion, not in judgment; abundantly and without reservation.

3:19 In the previous verses, Paul made four distinct observations about the law: (1) The law could not give the Holy Spirit (3:1-5); (2) the law could not give righteousness (3:6-9); (3) the law could not justify, it could only condemn (3:10-12); and (4) the law could not change the fact that righteousness always comes by faith in God's promises (3:15-18). Paul's opponents, and especially the Judaizers, could still be expected to raise the question, Why was the law given? Paul's arguments could sound as though he believed the law had no purpose whatsoever and that he was actually opposed to it. So Paul explained the true purpose behind God's giving of the law and its place in the plan of salvation.

The law had two functions. First, it had a negative function: It was given to show people how guilty they are (meaning that God had given the law to punish sin). Second, it had a strong positive function: The law reveals the nature and will of God and shows people how to live; it guarded and protected people until they could believe in Christ (see 3:23).

The little word until indicates that the law was meant as a temporary measure, and certainly not as the permanent and final means of salvation. The law was in place until the coming of the child to whom God's promise was made. When Jesus Christ came, the law was finally fulfilled (see Matthew 5:17-20).

God's promise to Abraham dealt with Abraham's faith; the law focuses on actions. The covenant with Abraham shows that faith is the only way to be saved; the law shows how to obey God in grateful response. Faith does not annul the law; but the more we know God, the more we will see how sinful we are. Then we will be driven to depend on Christ alone for our salvation.

To show the inherent inferiority of the law, Paul explained that while God personally gave the promises to Abraham; the law, however, was given to angels to give to Moses, who was the mediator between God and the people. This was not a new idea made up by Paul; it was already a Jewish belief. Although it is not mentioned in Exodus, Jews believed that the Ten Commandments had been given to Moses by angels (see Acts 7:53; Hebrews 2:2).

3:20 To have a mediator obviously means that two people are involved in the agreement. A mediator works between two or more parties to aid in communication, effect an agreement, or settle a dispute. Moses, implied in 3:19, was the mediator who communicated between God and Israel. God (through angels) mediated the law to Moses, who then gave it to the people. The law could be compared to a contract, which is valid only as long as both sides keep their sides of the agreement. While God kept his, the people of Israel could not keep theirs.

However, God acted on his own when he made his promise to Abraham. There was no mediator. The promises were given and would be kept by God, regardless of the actions of people. Thus, the promise is superior to the law because the promise is from God alone, meant for eternity, and would not be broken. The law and its mediator, Moses, were temporary, preparatory arrangements designed to confirm the truth of God's ultimate desire to relate directly with his creatures. Paul did not put down Moses, but showed the primacy of Christ's way of faith over the law.

3:21 Paul raised another question that might have been troubling his listeners: Is there a conflict between God's law and God's promises? The Judaizers might have even concluded that Paul was inferring that the law was evil. Paul answered with an emphatic, Absolutely not! Both the promises and the law were given by God; both are important, but for different reasons. God offered eternal life through the promises. Paul's use of the phrase, new life, refers to spiritual life as illustrated by such other passages as John 6:63; Romans 8:11; 1 Corinthians 15:22, 36; and 2 Corinthians 3:6. The law's purpose was never to give that kind of life (as explained in 3:19 above). If a law could have been given that people could obey perfectly, then the law would have given life and we could have been made right with God by obeying it. The law is not evil; it is very good. But not for salvation.

3:22 Sin affects all of humanity without discrimination; we are all prisoners of sin. By Scriptures, Paul may have had in mind Deuteronomy 27:26 or the series of verses that he later quoted in Romans 3:10-18, which describe the universal sinfulness of mankind (Psalms 5:9; 10:7; 14:1-3; 36:1; 140:3; and Isaiah 59:7-8). Or he may have been thinking of the Pentateuch as the biblical context of the law itself, filled with the record of unrelenting rebelliousness against God. What must be understood, however, is that the Scriptures speak with one voice when describing the human condition—we are sinners. Through Scripture we discovered that we could not earn a right relationship with God by our good works because our works were not good enough—they were always tainted by sin. But just like a dot of light shining into a dark prison cell, a ray of hope shone for us. The law showed us our hopelessness on our own, caused us to look elsewhere for hope, and directed us to the Savior, Jesus Christ. We missed the promises by trying to keep the law, but we found that the only way to receive God's promise is to believe in Jesus Christ.

3:23 Faith, as spoken of in the Scriptures, does not refer to some innate human power that, when used to its greatest capacity, gives us merit with God no matter what the actual content or object of that faith. The central point of the gospel is in whom our faith is placed—that is, in Christ. Abraham was justified by his faith and, along with other Old Testament believers, had to trust in God's grace without knowing much of God's plan; but their faith was in the coming Savior.

Until people could put their faith in that Savior, the law kept them in a kind of protective custody. In a sense, it kept people out of trouble, kept them away from the evil into which their natures might otherwise have led, until faith in Christ would be revealed. That faith then sets people free from the law but leads into the desire to obey God wholeheartedly out of love for him.

GOD'S CHILDREN THROUGH FAITH / 3:24–4:7

While maintaining that the law was useful, Paul pointed out what a severe taskmaster it could be for those who failed to learn about grace received through faith. At this point in the letter, he shifted from a legal to a familial point of view. Once we have gained a right relationship with God, our dealings with people will be entirely different.

3:24 In Greek culture, a guardian and teacher was a slave who had the important responsibility for the children in a family. A wealthy family might have one guardian for each child. This slave strictly disciplined the child, conducted the child to and from school, cared for the child, taught the child manners, and gave the child moral training. The guardian's role was temporary—he or she was responsible for the child until the child reached adult age (probably age sixteen).

The picture of the law serving as a guardian and teacher shows that the law was a temporary measure meant to lead us until Christ came. This leading was meant in the sense of the law watching over us until we could receive our “adulthood,” our full relationship with the Father, through Christ's coming.

What was the ultimate purpose of the law? Paul repeated it in the last phrase, that through faith in Christ, we are made right with God. The law had its usefulness in pointing out the wrong and providing constant reproof. The law, through imprisonment and discipline, taught us (though negatively) that justification with God really is through faith alone.

3:25 Once the child came of age, he or she no longer needed the services of the guardian. Since Christ arrived, offering salvation by faith alone, people no longer need the supervision of the law. The law teaches the need for salvation; God's grace offers that salvation. However, the Old Testament still applies today. In it God has revealed his nature, his will for humanity, his moral laws, and his guidelines for living. The law still serves as a demanding instructor to those who have not yet believed. But we cannot be saved by keeping that law; now that faith in Christ has come, we must trust in Christ.

As Paul will immediately demonstrate, the arrival of faith was not a static experience. Faith had its most basic work in our being “crucified with Christ,” but it immediately pursues its ongoing task: “I live my life in this earthly body by trusting in the Son of God” (2:20). This living by faith will be the theme of much of the remainder of this letter.

3:26 The change to you shows Paul's return to focusing on the Galatian believers. They did not need to be children under the care of the guardian (the law); instead, they were all children of God. They received this status through faith in Christ Jesus. Those who are truly God’s children have been justified by faith in Christ and receive a new relationship with God—that of adopted children.

What does it mean to be children of God? As he did in most of his letters, Paul was moving from the initial section of teaching passages to the application of what he had been developing. Here the first application is unmistakable: Our relationship with each other has its common principle in how we are related to God. We are children of the same family if we have the same heavenly Father. From this point, Paul will first develop applications regarding how we should see ourselves and others. Later in the letter he will discuss how we should treat each other.

3:27 The reference to baptism here does not mean that Paul was replacing the rite of circumcision with baptism. Baptism does not save anyone any more than circumcision does. If Paul was referring to water baptism, he was recognizing the fact that, in the early church, new converts usually were baptized (see Acts 2:41; 8:36-38; 9:18; 10:47-48; and 16:33 for some examples of new converts being baptized). Baptism demonstrated their faith—people “believed and were baptized”—not the other way around. It also demonstrated identification with the body of believers, the Christian church.

Paul may have been referring to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. When a person believes, the Holy Spirit comes to dwell within. Jesus promised this (John 14:16-17). The Holy Spirit also supernaturally makes us a part of the body of Christ (1 Corinthians 12:12-13).

Most likely, Paul referred to the theology behind water baptism expressed as an early form of liturgy. Paul restated for emphasis his claim to the Galatians that they were children of God. The purpose of baptism ultimately confirms the connection between us and Christ. We are united with Christ in baptism. The context certainly implies an active, informed faith whose object is Jesus Christ. Our faith rests, not on any form of baptism, but in Christ.

Being united with Christ leads to our ongoing experience of being made like Christ. By becoming Christians and being baptized, the Galatian believers were becoming spiritually grown up and ready to take on the privileges and responsibilities of the more mature. The person who is being made like him is a “new” person, with a new lifestyle and new aspirations.

3:28 In the first part of this verse, discrimination and barriers are eliminated. In the second part, unity is established. If all believers are being made like Christ, if all believers have professed faith and joined the body of Christ, then this unity sets aside all other superficial distinctions. While it is true that in the body of Christ, Jews, Gentiles, slaves, free people, men, and women do still have individual identities, Paul exalts their unity—you are one in Christ Jesus. All labels become secondary among those who share Jesus in common.

Some Jewish males would greet each new day by praying, “Lord, I thank you that I am not a Gentile, a slave, or a woman.” The prejudice toward all three categories was real and strong. As discussed throughout this letter to the Galatians, a Jew who believes in Christ is no different from a Gentile who believes. Unity in Christ transcends racial distinctions. Next is the barrier of social status. A slave and a free person must treat each other like brothers and sisters in the body of Christ. To take it even further, when it comes to faith and God’s promises, there really is no gender distinction. Both male and female alike are acceptable in the body of Christ. Our equal standing in Christ gives us equal access not only to salvation but to the full gifts of the Spirit and to all avenues of service.

The barriers broken down in this verse may not seem so radical to our day, but they were astounding in ancient Roman culture. This made Christianity unique and attractive—it valued each individual, yet it provided a unified body. All believers are one in Christ Jesus. All are equally valuable to God. Differences arise in gifts, in function, in abilities, but all are one in Christ (Ephesians 2:15).

3:29 Becoming God’s children (3:26) and one in Christ (3:28) means that those who belong to Christ . . . are the true children of Abraham. Jews believed that they were automatically God’s people because they were Abraham’s descendants. Paul concluded that Abraham’s spiritual children are not the Jews, nor are they those who have been circumcised. Abraham’s children are those who respond to God in faith as Abraham had done. The only difference is that our response is to Christ as Savior. Because we have responded, we are heirs. In other words, all the promises God gave to Abraham belong to us. By responding to Christ in faith, we have followed in the ancient way of Abraham, one of the early ones justified by faith. He trusted God, and so do we. But to us has been added the opportunity to appreciate what price Christ paid to ensure our share in the promise.

4:1 To further illustrate the spiritual immaturity of those who insist on remaining under the law, Paul used an example from Roman law and custom. In ancient times, the “coming of age” of a son carried tremendous significance. This did not occur at a specific age (such as twelve or thirteen), as it did among Jews and Greeks; rather, the “coming of age” was determined by the father. In Rome this event was usually marked on March 17 by a family celebration known as the Liberalia. During this event, the father formally acknowledged his son and heir. The son received a new “grown-up” toga and entered into adult responsibilities.

Paul pointed out, however, that while the young children and heirs are still minors (not yet of age), they are not much better off than slaves until they grow up. Although they are the future owners of an estate and a fortune, while they are young, they have no claim to it nor any right to make decisions regarding it. In the eyes of the Roman law, the young heirs were no different than slaves. Paul’s application of the illustration reveals that when we were under the law, we were no better off than slaves.

4:2 In this analogy Paul focused on the legal rights and status of the children. These guardians are different from the ones described in 3:24—these are more like trustees. But Paul’s meaning was the same. The law performed its function of “keeping us out of trouble” and disciplining us during our “immaturity” until God offered us “maturity” through our acceptance of salvation by grace. Paul’s words imply that the time of this “coming of age” differed for every child. In Rome, the father set the time for his son’s coming of age and adulthood. So too, God set the time for terminating our guardianship under the law and making us his children and heirs by faith. The date was the time of Christ’s coming into the world.

Faith, then, initiates the believer into maturity and full rights. Paul was dumbfounded that the Galatians would choose to revert to slavery when Christ had given them freedom. They were behaving like children who had inherited an estate but still insisted on remaining in a dependent, servile role.

4:3 Paul alluded to slavery in order to show that before Christ came and died for sins, people were slaves to the spiritual powers of this world, in bondage to whatever law or religion they chose to follow. Thinking they could be saved by their deeds, they became enslaved to trying—and failing—to follow even the basics.

The phrase, “spiritual powers of this world,” has been translated several ways. Most likely, Paul was referring to these “powers” as the elementary stages of religious practice, whether under the law of the Jewish religion, or the rites and rituals in any heathen religion (see also 4:9 and Colossians 2:20). In other words, the statement referred to any religious experience prior to accepting Christ as Savior. Paul was pointing out that trying to reach God through any religion or any worldly plan brings failure. The “powers” of the world (whether religious or moral) suggest that a solution is needed, but do not offer that solution. Paul compared religious rituals to slavery because they force a standard that people can never achieve. But, with the proclamation of the gospel, grace in Christ replaced those worldly religious practices.

4:4 Everyone was enslaved under the “spiritual powers of this world,” but . . . That little word offered hope to humanity. God’s intervention into human history changed the world.

When the right time came, God sent his Son to earth. Why did Jesus come when he did? The “why” may be unanswerable, except that God knew it was the right time. Several factors present in the Roman Empire certainly aided the quick spread of the message of the gospel. The Greek civilization provided a language that had spread across much of the known world as the main language for all people. The Romans had brought peace throughout their empire and built a system of roads that made land travel quicker and safer than ever before. The Jews were expectant, eagerly awaiting their Messiah. Messianic fervor was at its height. Into this world came Jesus.

Just as a Roman father would set the date for his son to reach maturity and attain freedom from his guardians (4:2), so God had set the date when he would send his Son to free people from the law, to become his children (see 4:5). Guided by a sovereign God, historical events worked in harmony to prepare for the predecided moment of Jesus’ arrival on earth (see also Psalm 102:13; Mark 1:15; and Ephesians 1:10).

Jesus was born of a woman—he was God yet also human (Genesis 3:15; Luke 1:26-38; John 1:1, 14). Paul balanced his amazing claims about Jesus’ divine nature with his reminder of Jesus’ human character. Jesus was a human and subject to the law; thus he was voluntarily subject to the structured universe that he had created (John 1:3-5) and that had been marred by human rebellion. More significantly, Jesus lived as a Jew, subject to God’s revealed law. In keeping with this, Jesus was both circumcised and presented at the Temple (Luke 2:21-32). Yet while no other human being has been able to perfectly fulfill God’s law, Jesus kept it completely (Matthew 5:17; Hebrews 4:15). Thus, Jesus could be the perfect sacrifice because, although fully human, he never sinned. His death bought freedom for us who were enslaved to sin, offering us redemption and adoption into God’s family.

4:5 Jesus was himself born “subject to the law” (4:4) so that by his living and dying he could accomplish two purposes: (1) to buy freedom for us who were slaves to the law, and (2) to allow those “freed” people to be adopted as his very own children. Through his life, Jesus demonstrated his unique eligibility to buy our freedom. Through his death, Jesus paid the price to release us from slavery to sin. When Christ redeemed those who were slaves to the law, he did not redeem the Jews alone. His death set people free from bondage to any law or religious system (see 4:3)—offering, instead, salvation by faith alone. But because the law was God’s clearest revelation of his justice, being born under the law and keeping it perfectly proved that Jesus was the perfect sacrifice. He took upon himself the curse the law required in order to set believers free of that curse.

In these verses, Paul continued to respond to the foolishness of the Galatians. If Christ had fulfilled the law, taking upon himself the curse of the law, and had freed people from the law, why would the Galatians try to keep requirements already fulfilled by Christ? The question appears again plainly in 4:9. Meanwhile, Paul was building a case that would make the question entirely rhetorical.

Redemption had an ongoing purpose—so that he could adopt these believers as his children. Until Christ bought us (that is, paid the ultimate price by taking the penalty for our sins), we could never have been acceptable to God. Even our good works or religious rituals could bring us no closer to a relationship with him. But Christ gave freedom from the slavery people faced before and brought them into a new relationship with God the Father. Believers’ new position in Christ goes beyond mere acceptance by God. So close is that relationship that Paul called it “adoption.” In Roman culture, a wealthy, childless man could take a slave youth and make that slave his child and heir. The adopted person was no longer a slave. He became a full heir to his new family, guaranteed all legal rights to his father’s property. He was not a second-class son; he was equal to all other sons, biological or adopted, in his father’s family. That person’s origin or past was no longer a factor in his legal standing. Likewise, when a person becomes a Christian, he or she leaves the slavery of trying to please God through works and gains all the privileges and responsibilities of a child in God’s family.

4:6 This verse and the next are central in the apostle’s entire argument. Focusing again on the Galatians, Paul added, you Gentiles have become his children, part of God’s family. Despite their doubts and confusion at that time, God still regarded the Galatian believers as his children. How did Paul know this? How could the Galatian believers claim this? Because God has sent the Spirit of his Son into their hearts. The Spirit cannot be earned or obtained, as if he were the result or reward of some system of works or discipline. Instead, God sends the Holy Spirit as a gift. Having the Spirit of Christ meant that they belonged to Christ.

A person cannot have a personal relationship with laws or rituals. But believers have an intimate relationship with God: they can call God their dear Father. As God's adopted children, we can approach him with love and trust. As God's adopted children, we share with Jesus all rights to God's resources. As God's heirs, we can claim what he has provided for us—our full identity as his children.

4:7 To conclude his argument from this analogy, Paul explained briefly that each Galatian believer was no longer a slave to any law or religious ritual or even to Satan. Instead, each person had entered into God's family, being adopted as God's own child. Belonging to God as his child also means that everything he has belongs to the child, for God has promised the inheritance of eternal life and his riches and blessings to all his children. We need no further preparation. No system can fill in or stand in for Christ. Being a child and being an heir are inseparable realities in God's family.

GALATIANS 4:8-31

PAUL'S CONCERN FOR THE GALATIANS / 4:8-20

What do Christians mean when they claim to “know God”? As strange as the concept may sound to modern ears, the Scriptures speak confidently of our ability to know God intimately. Paul turned to the Galatians’ seeming denial of their relationship with God. Though they had met God, their present course of action (living by the law) amounted to a sad betrayal of God’s grace.

4:8 As in 3:23 and 4:1, Paul reiterated the former enslaved condition of the Galatians to the so-called gods that do not even exist. Before they came to know the one true God, the Galatians believed in other gods (such as Zeus and Hermes—read about Paul’s experience in Lystra, a city in Galatia, in Acts 14:8-18). These “beings” had no divine power. These “gods” could also refer to the principles and pursuits of life that so easily change from being possessions to possessing us. The people’s ignorance of God made them slaves of something less than God. There is only one God; to worship anything else means false worship and slavery to sin. As Paul explained in 4:1-7, anyone who has not discovered freedom in Christ remains a slave. In this verse, Paul was simply restating the preconversion predicament of the Galatians.

4:9 The Galatian believers had been enslaved, but then Paul introduced them to God. They found God (although, as Paul points out, it was God who found them). Paul was astonished that after getting to know God personally, the Galatians would go back again and become slaves once more to the weak and useless spiritual powers of this world. Who, after tasting freedom, would return to slavery? Why, after meeting God, would the Galatians become slaves once more? Was that what they truly wanted?

4:10 As an example of this law keeping the Galatians had been attempting, Paul pointed out their observance of special holidays. The days referred to keeping the Jewish Sabbaths or other specified dates in the Jewish calendar. The observance of months would be the new moon celebrations of the Jews. Seasons would refer to the festivals that lasted several days. For the Jews this could be the three main feasts: Unleavened Bread, Pentecost, and Shelters. Years of celebration for the Jews were the Year of Jubilee and Sabbath years.

Paul did not condemn the celebration of the Jewish events—for he himself kept the Sabbaths and still traveled to Jerusalem for certain festivals (see also Colossians 2:16). He would have condemned the Gentile Galatians celebrating the Jewish holidays in order to somehow receive more merit before God or fulfill some legal duty in doing so. The God-honoring festivals were not bad in themselves; but when used as a way to earn salvation or “score points” with God, they became nothing more than slavery.

4:11 If the Galatians continued in their law-centered approach to Christianity, setting aside God’s grace in order to obey codes, customs, and rituals, then Paul feared that all his hard work among them and his suffering on their behalf (see 3:4 explanation) would be worth nothing. Paul was not saying that the Galatians would lose their salvation but that their very turning away from the truth would render them unfruitful and their faith “dead,” as if Paul had never visited them at all.

4:12 Paul had become like the Gentiles (specifically these Galatians) in the sense that he was free from the law, as they had been before they ever knew about the law. They had accepted the gospel; here Paul asked that they simply remain in freedom. He was convinced that they would realize in an instant the folly of what was being offered to them if they would only reflect on the change that had actually occurred in their lives when they had trusted Christ.

Paul reminisced about how the Galatians had received him on his first visit to them (see Acts 13–14). They did not mistreat him, even receiving him in his physical weakness. Paul had depended on them in ways that were as important as their own dependence on the gospel that he had delivered to them.

4:13 Many attempts have been made to identify the illness to which Paul referred here. Some commentators suggest that Paul’s illness was some sort of an eye disorder (inferred from the reference to eyes in 4:15). Others think that Paul may have contracted some form of malaria on the coast after landing in Perga in Pamphylia (see Acts 13:13). Or he may have had epilepsy, so he and his traveling companions had headed for the highlands where Paul could recuperate. Still others point to the physical abuse and beating Paul had received in Lystra and the resulting care of the believers as his wounds had healed (Acts 14:19). Whether this sickness was the same as Paul’s “thorn in the flesh” referred to in 2 Corinthians 12:7 is also unknown. Whatever the illness, it did not completely incapacitate Paul, for while in Galatia, he had brought the Good News of Christ to the Galatians.

While it would be interesting to identify this illness, we can know for certain from Paul’s words that he remembered the illness as the cause of his encounter with the Galatians. Their relationship with each other had not begun with Paul as a confident herald of the gospel but rather as a weak person in need of help. Paul had depended on the Galatians before they had come to depend on his message and his Lord.

4:14 The Galatians could have refused Paul any reception because his sickness was revolting to them. Apparently his need had been a genuine imposition; perhaps Paul's resulting appearance had made him difficult to look at, or his weakness had made him an extra burden on those who cared for him. The trial may simply have been the temptation to treat him with contempt or scorn because of his illness. To the Galatians' credit, they welcomed the ill Paul with open arms, ready to care for him and to listen to his words. Paul compared their reception to how they might have received an angel from God or even Christ Jesus himself. The Galatians had respected Paul very highly, although they had never met him before.

4:15 The Galatians had received Paul with open arms and joyfully received the message he had preached among them. So Paul asked, "Where is that joyful spirit?" The Galatians loved and respected Paul greatly. Paul knew they would have given him their eyes if they could have. This may be a reference specifying Paul's particular illness, or it may be a figure of speech meaning that the Galatians would have given their most precious possessions to Paul out of love and respect for him.

4:16 But Paul was now being treated like an enemy. Why? The only possible reason would be that the Galatians didn't want to hear the truth. The Galatians needed to realize that they were in real danger of believing a lie rather than the truth of the gospel.

4:17 While Paul had spoken only the truth from pure motives (to bring the Galatians to salvation), the Judaizers had less than honorable motives. The false teachers were claiming to be religious authorities and experts in Judaism and Christianity, but they had selfish motives. They were anxious to win people's favor, but their only desire was to win the people over to their side—and at the same time alienate the people from Paul, and thus from Christ. Once the Galatians became committed to the false teachers, the roles would be reversed and the Galatians would be forced to pay attention to and even provide money and lodging for them. They would be in bondage to the false teachers and all their wrong teachings.

4:18 Paul acknowledged that eagerness helps, especially when a leader cannot be with them but can depend on their faithfulness. But eagerness needs the right goal or object. Paul worried that his Galatian friends were becoming eager over the lie that human moral and ethical efforts can satisfy God's perfect standard. The false teachers were eager to win over the Galatians in order that the Galatians would be eager to support them.

4:19 While the false teachers simply sought a larger following, Paul saw these believers as his dear children. Obviously his motives differed from those of the false teachers, for he loved the Galatians dearly, as a mother loves her children. Paul compared the labor pains of childbirth to the pain he felt at their turning from the faith.

Paul's concern would continue until Christ would be fully developed in their lives. Paul wanted each of his children to reach spiritual maturity in the faith. They would do so by having the likeness of Christ portrayed in their lives. "Fully developed in your lives" refers to a mother carrying an embryo until it is developed enough to be born. Having Christ becoming fully developed in their lives emphasizes the personal changes necessary to become like Jesus.

4:20 As with any confusion or misunderstanding, face-to-face talk accomplishes more than written correspondence. Paul could not pick up and dash off to Galatia. If he could go, he might change his tone but not his message or his expectations—those would always remain the same, for they were true and correct. Paul wrote this one-sided letter because he didn't know what else to do.

ABRAHAM'S TWO CHILDREN / 4:21-31

The final paragraph of Galatians 4 records an extended allegory. Hagar and Sarah, Abraham's wives-in-conflict, illustrate the conflict between law and grace. The Judaizers, indeed all Jews, took great pride in their descent from godly Abraham. However, as John the Baptist and Jesus pointed out, merely being descended from Abraham was not enough to secure salvation (see Matthew 3:9; John 8:37-44). Paul made the same point in this section, though from a slightly different angle.

4:21 Under the influence of the false teachers (the Judaizers), the Galatians wanted to live under the law. Paul wanted to turn them back to accepting salvation by grace alone. He confronted them directly by saying, "Do you know what the law really says?" The Galatian believers, most of them not from a Jewish background and thus with little more than an elementary understanding of the Jewish law, may have answered an indignant “yes.” Hopefully they would have halted long enough to realize the impossible standards under which they were placing themselves.

4:22 Paul turned to an argument from the Jewish Scripture and the life of Abraham, father of the Jewish nation (see also 3:6-29), to illustrate his point. The story, originally recorded in Genesis 16 and 21:1-21, was summarized by Paul as a fundamental spiritual lesson demonstrated by Abraham, his two sons, and his two wives. In ancient times, a mother’s status affected the status of her children. Paul reminded his readers that Abraham had two types of sons—one born of a slave-wife and one born of his freeborn wife. Paul wanted the Galatians to consider which type of descendant these Judaizers were more like and then decide which they themselves desired to be like.

4:23 Besides the contrast in the status of the mothers, the two boys were different in another important way. Abraham’s son by the slave woman was born in a human attempt to bring about the fulfillment of God’s promise of descendants for Abraham. Ishmael’s birth was engineered by Abraham and Sarah to “make the promise come true” by their own plans and efforts, rather than waiting on God’s timing.

However, Abraham’s son by the freeborn wife was born as God’s own fulfillment of his promise. When Abraham was ninety-nine years old and Sarah was ninety years old (Genesis 17:1, 17), God appeared to Abraham and promised Isaac’s birth (Genesis 17:15-16, 19).

4:24 By using this illustration, Paul was showing that what happened to Sarah and Hagar pictures the relationship between God and mankind. Though perhaps difficult for us to follow, this was a common type of argument in Paul’s day. Paul was pointing to a great spiritual truth illustrated by this story, namely, the superiority of Christianity over Judaism.

The two women, Hagar and Sarah, represent God’s two covenants. The two well-known covenants were made with Abraham and with Moses. The one covenant with Moses had begun at Mount Sinai with the giving of the law (see Exodus 19:20). Hagar was a slave-wife (Genesis 16:1); thus, her children would be slaves, for a child’s status equaled the status of his or her mother.

Although both sons had the same father, their mothers were different and their descendants became two different races—Ishmael, the Ishmaelites (Genesis 21:18; Psalm 83:1-6); Isaac, the Jews (Genesis 22:16-18). The Jews proudly considered themselves children of God’s covenant. However, Paul refuted the claim, reminding them of the “two covenants” and explaining that because of their behavior, the Jews were actually children of the covenant with Moses, the covenant of the law. The Judaizers claimed superiority for their point of view by claiming that the blessings of the covenant came to descendants of Abraham through Isaac. Gentile Christians could be “adopted” into Abraham’s covenant group by accepting circumcision. Paul contradicted the Judaizers by showing that those who promote the law for salvation or sanctification demonstrate the characteristics of slavery to the law. Paul claimed that they were products of the Sinai covenant, not Abraham’s covenant. Trying to win salvation by obeying the law leads to slavery, and as the Jews persisted in this pattern, they showed themselves to be enslaved to their law. Although the Jews had descended from Abraham and Isaac, as they tried to piously obey their laws, they were actually slaves to it. As slaves, they were more like Ishmael than Isaac.

4:25-26 Not only do the women and their children represent two covenants (4:24), they also represent two Jerusalems. Hagar represents the old covenant given at Mount Sinai. She also represents the present city of Jerusalem, which was enslaved to Rome and, as the center of the Jewish religious and legal system, was filled with people in slavery to the Jewish law.

Sarah, on the other hand, represents the heavenly Jerusalem, the promise of faith and freedom. Sarah was mother of the promised miracle-child, Isaac, and corresponds to the covenant of Abraham (inferred in 4:24). This covenant promised a future “new covenant” that would begin at the death of Jesus Christ on the cross. Paul used the concept she is our mother to show that faith, not adherence to the law, is the source of our salvation. Paul was offering the Galatians the opportunity to claim that they were descendants of Abraham through faith, and that they possessed citizenship in the spiritual Jerusalem. For Gentiles to be included in this way would be as miraculous as the birth of Isaac.

4:27 Paul quoted from Isaiah’s prophecy (Isaiah 54:1). Isaiah’s words had comforted the Jewish exiles in Babylon. To be childless in ancient days meant great shame and disgrace for a woman. Israel had been unfruitful, like a childless woman, but God would give great blessings and would change their mourning into rejoicing.

Paul applied the comparison of former-versus-later blessings, prophesied by Isaiah, to his Hagar/Sarah analogy. Sarah, who had been barren, was blessed with Isaac. Her child was a gracious gift, not the result of work. Because God had promised to bless Abraham and his descendants, she ultimately would have more children than all the other women (the Christian church grew rapidly and is still growing). While the Jews knew (or should have known) from their own Scriptures that Gentiles would turn to God, two changes astounded them: (1) The Gentiles did not have to become Jews first; and (2) so many Gentiles would become believers that they would outnumber Jewish believers.

4:28 The Galatians who had become Christians under Paul's ministry, fit into the analogy as children of the promise, just like Isaac. Just as Isaac's birth was a miracle of God, so Christianity, offering people the opportunity to be born again, is a miracle of God (John 3:3). Just as Isaac's mother was free, so Isaac was free, and so Christianity offers true freedom because it depends not on our actions but on God's unchangeable promises to us. Paul hammered home his point to the Galatian believers: "As children of the promise, you never need to be enslaved to the Jewish laws. You are like Isaac!"

4:29 Paul reminded his readers of the story in Genesis 21. Abraham had held a feast on the day Isaac was weaned. Isaac was probably about two years old; thus, Ishmael would have been a teenager. Ishmael had teased his younger half brother—Paul called this persecution. Paul explained that the persecution of the older brother on the younger was continuing to play itself out in the later animosity between the nations that had descended from them (Israel and Edom, Psalm 83:1-6), and on into the persecution of those who want people to keep the law (the Jews) toward those who are born of the Holy Spirit and thus are freed from the law.

4:30 The first question is: What happened when Ishmael persecuted Isaac at this feast? As Scripture says in Genesis 21:9-10, Sarah saw this happen, went to Abraham, and demanded that Hagar and Ishmael be sent away.

The second question refers to the application: So what happens to Ishmael (the Jews) and Isaac (Christians) today? Judaism and Christianity could not coexist as paths to the same goal any more than Ishmael and Isaac could share Abraham's inheritance. Perhaps most ironic was Paul's bold clarification of this old story. The Jews had long held that this verse described God's rejection of the Gentiles. But Paul turned the tables: "You had it wrong. Jews and Gentiles are included together in God's inheritance when they become believers, or 'Isaacs.' Those who reject grace lose their share in the inheritance, whether unbelieving Jews or unrepentant Gentiles. Those are the 'Ishmaels.'" Those in slavery to the law will not share the family inheritance with those who have experienced freedom in Christ and salvation by faith alone.

4:31 Paul tied up his allegory, and indeed all the points he proved with it, with the simple word, so. He repeated that we (that is, all believers of all time) are children of the free woman, acceptable to God because of our faith. That freedom must be treasured because of the price paid for it.

GALATIANS 5

FREEDOM IN CHRIST / 5:1-15

Paul's application of the Genesis account of Sarah and Hagar exposed the real danger facing the Galatians—they were on the brink of losing their freedom in Christ. Paul expressed dismay at the report that though the Galatians had been growing in their faith, they were being influenced by those trying to destroy God's work of grace in them. In this paragraph, Paul had two objectives: (1) exposing what would actually happen if the Galatians returned to the slavery of the law, and (2) confronting the Judaizers with the fruitlessness of their system.

5:1 We have freedom from slavery to our sinful desires and to the Jewish law. But the freedom came at great price. In order for us to enjoy ultimate freedom, someone had to set us free, and that someone was Christ Jesus (John 8:32, 36). Because Christ has really set us free, we should stay free. Christ has set us free from legalistic formulas, from God's judgment upon sin, from all man-made rules, and from the subjective experiences of fear and guilt. We are to live it out, practice it, and rejoice in it! To turn back to the law and try to earn what Christ has already given mocks his sacrifice.

5:2 Paul gave a serious warning, and he didn't want any of his hearers to miss it. If the Galatian believers were to follow the Judaizers' teaching, counting on circumcision to make them right with God (the tense of the verb reveals that the Galatians had not yet taken the step, but were considering it), then Christ would not be able to help them. How could this be? What could be the harm in circumcision?

Obviously, only men could be circumcised, but more than circumcision was at stake (see 5:6). Paul was confronting the Galatians because they were trying to fulfill the Jewish law. Insistence on circumcision had become the most prominent feature of the Judaizers' thinking. They taught that the gospel needed the Jewish law system to make it perfect. But God's way was different—salvation through Christ by grace alone. We can't mix and match works and grace. God has an exclusive arrangement. The Galatians were about to be circumcised as a requirement to "complete" their salvation. But Paul explained that by that very act they would be saying that Christ's sacrifice by his death had not been enough to save them.

5:3 Choosing circumcision would cause them to lose the value of the free gift of salvation given through Christ. It also would have another devastating effect. Choosing circumcision would mean choosing law keeping (legalism). To choose law keeping meant that one must obey all of the regulations in the whole law of Moses.

Paul might well have repeated his question from 4:21. Did the Galatians have any idea what their choice to obey all the Jewish laws would entail? Chances are, the Judaizers had not spelled that out—yet. They may have told the Galatians about some of the food laws (2:12) and about the festivals and holy days (4:10). But to any Jew, circumcision was the first act of obedience to a law that would, from then on, rule every detail of his life. Did the Galatians understand that “the person who keeps all of the laws except one is as guilty as the person who has broken all of God’s laws” (James 2:10, see also Deuteronomy 27:26)? By becoming circumcised, the Galatians were submitting themselves to an entire system—one that doomed them to failure.

5:4 Those who try to make themselves right with God by keeping the law are, in fact, cut off from Christ. God allows no middle ground—it is Christ or law, not both. Anyone deciding to be justified by law has fallen away from God’s grace. Christ cannot save those who persist in saving themselves. Paul’s words should not be taken out of context to mean that salvation can be lost. Grace did not mean salvation, but refers to the means of salvation. To decide on legalism as the way of salvation is to “fall away” from grace. It’s like throwing away the life preserver when lost at sea.

5:5 In this short verse Paul gave his doctrine of justification by faith: we (all believers, even the wavering Galatians) who live by the Spirit (not through anything we can do or have done, and not through the law) eagerly wait to receive (we don’t work for righteousness; we wait for God to grow his righteousness in us) everything promised to us (a certain event that has not yet occurred) who are right with God (Christian perfection that God helps us reach in our lives and then grants completely in glory) through faith (in Christ and his faithfulness, and not in works or even the strength of our believing).

The words “faith” and “Spirit” provide the keys to this verse, for these words separate the Judaizers’ approach to God from the Christian approach to God. The Judaizers’ emphasis on circumcision showed that they were trying to gain salvation “in the flesh.” But Paul pointed out that Christian faith comes “by the Spirit.” The Judaizers’ emphasis on the law contrasted sharply with Christianity’s emphasis on faith. Christianity’s basic doctrine showed the Judaizers to be wrong—dead wrong.

5:6 If Paul clearly told the Gentile Galatian believers not to be circumcised, what would he say to the Jews, who were already circumcised? Paul made the point that it makes no difference to God whether we are circumcised or not circumcised (see also 3:28; 6:15; Colossians 3:11). Paul’s conviction rested on the importance of all it means to place our faith in Christ Jesus. Each aspect of salvation and every component of the life we live after conversion are rooted in Christ.

So what does matter? Paul didn’t hesitate: What is important is faith expressing itself in love. To the faith discussed in chapter 4, Paul added the clarification that it must be faith expressed in love. We are saved by faith alone; but for these Galatian believers who seemed to want so desperately to work, Paul was saying, “OK, work, but don’t try to earn your salvation. Instead, let your salvation by faith result in loving and kind works done to serve others.” Genuine faith in Christ is expressed in love for others.

5:7 The Galatian believers had accepted the gospel of salvation and were living out their faith—they were getting along so well. But despite their good start, someone had interfered, holding them back from following the truth. Although Paul asked who had done this, he already knew the answer. Paul knew that the problem was the Judaizers. Paul warned the Galatians that the Judaizers, instead of helping them along, were actually hindering their faith. Instead of opening up new truths to the Galatians, they kept the Galatians from following the truth. The Judaizers represented the interests of Satan. They wanted to keep the Galatians enslaved to the law and derail the new believers.

5:8 The Galatians needed to realize that it was not God who was holding them back, for he had called them to freedom in the first place. God had called the Galatians (1:6), but he had called them to salvation by his grace, not by their works (see also Romans 9:11; 1 Thessalonians 2:12; 5:24).

5:9 Yeast is put into bread to make it rise, and it takes only a little to affect the whole batch of dough. Jesus used yeast as an example of how a small amount of evil can affect a large group of people (see Matthew 16:5-12). Even one wrong person among the Galatian believers could infect all the others, putting the entire Galatian church at risk.

5:10 In spite of his obvious concern over the Galatian believers and the dangerous situation they faced, Paul believed that they would come to their senses. His confidence was based on trusting the Lord to bring them back to the faith they knew to be true.

Paul also was confident that the person who had been troubling and confusing the Galatian believers would receive due punishment. While Paul knew that the troublemakers were a group of Judaizers, he singled out the leader of this group, whom he probably did not know (see 5:7). Paul suspected that this man carried a certain amount of weight as a leader. Whoever it is does not so much stress Paul's ignorance of this person's identity as the worthlessness in Paul's eyes of any status he might carry. "Whoever he may be, however high in leadership or however revered by the Jews, this man is teaching wrong doctrine," Paul was saying. And by the same token, no matter what this leader's position, he would pay the penalty for his wrong teaching.

5:11 Paul asked a personal question; apparently he was reminded of an accusation against him. If Paul were preaching that people needed to be circumcised in order to be saved, then why were the Judaizers still persecuting him? He would be preaching the same message they preached! But the fact that he was still being persecuted was proof that he was still preaching salvation through the cross of Christ alone.

Why was Paul persecuted for this message? To human nature, and especially to Jews brought up to love and revere their law, the concept of needing someone else's death in order to be saved was offensive. The very thought of describing the Messiah as an executed convict disgusted them. But the impact of Christ's cross on their pride was the greatest stumbling block. As Paul described to the Corinthians, "When we preach that Christ was crucified, the Jews are offended, and the Gentiles say it's all nonsense" (1 Corinthians 1:23). Paul had witnessed the rejection of the gospel by both Gentiles and Jews, each for different reasons.

5:12 Paul's words here, though very harsh, were not meant in jest. He wanted to make another point regarding circumcision. Those troublemakers referred again to the false teachers, the Judaizers, who were preaching that the believers needed to be circumcised. In effect, Paul said that if the false teachers were so concerned about zeal for the law, maybe they shouldn't stop at circumcision but go the whole way and mutilate themselves. According to their own logic, wouldn't this make them even holier? The comparison to pagan rituals was probably not lost on the Galatians. Pagan priests of the prominent cult of the goddess Cybele in Asia were eunuchs, castrated as a part of a sacred ritual. By making this statement, Paul placed circumcision as no better than the pagan rituals of cutting parts of the body.

5:13 When Paul ministered among the Galatians, he did not give his converts a new set of rules to obey (as the Judaizers had done), for that would have made them slaves to the law. Instead, the Galatians were called to live in freedom. Paul was the messenger, but they “were called” by God himself, the author of the gospel.

Some of Paul’s critics may have condemned his preaching of Christian freedom, saying that it would lead to people living without restraint or guidelines. Paul had an immediate and forceful answer, explaining that freedom was not to be used to satisfy the sinful nature (see also 5:16-17, 19, 24). Satan and the flesh use our freedom from law as an opportunity to enflame our desires. Sinful human desires lead to the problems mentioned in 5:26 (conceit, provoking one another, and envy) and to the lack of mutual help described in 6:1-10. When we indulge the sinful nature, we open the door to these kinds of behaviors and attitudes (see 1 Peter 2:16; 2 Peter 2:8-10; Jude 4). The demands of our human nature present a constant threat to our real freedom in Christ. We need his ongoing help to keep our “flesh” under control.

Christian freedom is freedom to serve one another in love. Love for other believers flows outward from what God has done in each believer’s heart. The Greek word for love (agape) refers to selfless, self-giving love. Christian freedom does not leave believers wandering through life without laws, rules, restraints, or guidelines. Instead, they freely live according to God’s standards and glorify God through loving service to others.

5:14 In fact, Christian servanthood ultimately does what slavery to the law cannot do—it fulfills the law! Quoting from Leviticus 19:18 (from the law), Paul explained that the whole law can be summed up in this one command: “Love your neighbor as yourself.” Jesus made this same point (Matthew 22:35-39; Luke 10:25-28). In fact, the entire law is fulfilled as the Christian community acts in love toward one another through the power of the Holy Spirit.

Paul made it clear through this letter (and others) that the law cannot save anyone. But he did not cast aside the law as worthless. Believers must still be concerned with it; otherwise Paul would not have made this statement. No one could ever completely fulfill the law; but if someone could, the Christians (not the Judaizers) would most resemble that person because of their love for one another.

5:15 Paul used the present tense in these verbs, indicating that these problems were occurring as he wrote. Such conflict threatened to tear the church apart. The verbs increase in intensity—biting, devouring, and ultimately, destroying one another. The source of the conflict went back to the false teachers and the confusion they were causing among the believers (5:10). The presence of the conflict supports the theory that factions were developing in the church—some people going with the law-centered teachers, some staying with Paul and the gospel, and some deciding to pursue their every sinful whim based on the “freedom” they had in Christ. Such continued confusion would ruin their faith, their testimony, and ultimately the church itself. While some differences of opinion would be natural, the Galatians had gone beyond that. They disagreed on foundational issues. Like piranhas, they were destroying one another.

LIVING BY THE SPIRIT’S POWER / 5:16-26

Paul turned to the personal, spiritual lives of the Galatians. He had warned them not to follow the teaching of the Judaizers. Here he warned them about following their own wishes and desires. Slavery was a threat from the outside influence of the false teachers, but it was an equal threat from the inside desires of the sinful nature. Paul wanted them to replace self-indulgence with loving service to others.

In this section, Paul explained that the secret to loving our neighbor as ourselves is by living in the Spirit and not giving in to our sinful human desires. He contrasted the characteristics of a life motivated by the sinful nature and a life motivated by the Spirit.

5:16 The word so ties in with verses 13-15. The strategy for removing the divisiveness that marred the Galatian church was to live according to the new life given to them by the Holy Spirit. God sent the Holy Spirit to be with and within his followers after Christ had returned to heaven (see John 14–16).

The phrase conveys the meaning of the literal translation “by the Spirit keep on walking.” Walking means “living” in this context, and it emphasizes the moment-by-moment contact with and guidance by the Holy Spirit for daily decisions and activities. Living “according to the Spirit” should be a daily, continuous action by Christians. He is always present, but we must be in touch with him and stay open to his guidance and correction.

The result? You won’t be doing what your sinful nature craves. When we become believers, our sinful nature still exists. But God asks us to place our sinful nature under the control of the Holy Spirit so that he can transform it. This is a supernatural process. We must never underestimate the power of our sinful nature, and we must never attempt to fight it in our own strength. Satan is a crafty tempter, and we have a limitless ability to make excuses. Instead of trying to overcome sin by our own willpower, we must take advantage of the tremendous power of Christ. God provides for victory over our sinful nature—he sends the Holy Spirit to live in us and give us power. But our ability to restrain the desires of the sinful nature depends on how much we’re willing to “live according to” the Holy Spirit. For each believer, this daily process requires moment-by-moment decisions.

5:17 While believers live in this world, they face constant tension between their old sinful nature and what the Holy Spirit wants. We must not infer from Paul’s words that our personality has two selves, nor that we have two equal and opposite forces struggling to gain control. In Christ and in the Holy Spirit, we have a victorious new resurrection life. The Holy Spirit in us guarantees our future total redemption and change. Though we have new life in Christ, we still have a mind and body prone to rebel and enticed by sinful desires. We must resist those desires.

We often experience resistance when we follow the Spirit’s leading. Satan serves as a persistent teacher of rebellion, and humanity has had centuries of practice. Whatever path we choose, we will hear the whispers of opposition—our choices are never free from this conflict. Whenever we set out to do what the Holy Spirit instructs, we can expect our sinful nature to flare up in opposition. When we decide to share the gospel, our sinful human nature will make us feel foolish. When we decide to commit ourselves to some service, evil desires hinder us, trying to thwart the leading of the Spirit. Conversely, each time we follow our sinful human nature, we will receive (through our consciences, God’s word, or even other believers) reminders not to follow those sinful desires. True believers realize the deadly power of sin. No longer their master, sin now attacks like a powerful enemy. These two forces within are constantly fighting each other. Sinful desires still pop up, like guerrilla forces, attacking us when we least expect it.

5:18 Freedom from the law does not imply freedom to do whatever we please (5:13). Neither do we live in the Spirit in some sort of “middle ground.” Instead, we live on another plane altogether—we have truth as opposed to falsehood; we have grace as opposed to works; we act out of love as opposed to being subject to the law; we are supervised by the Spirit as opposed to being supervised by the law.

5:19-21 Paul contrasted the desires of the sinful nature and the works of the Spirit-filled life in 5:19-21 and 5:22-23. Paul’s list of sins falls into four categories. These particular sins were especially prevalent in the pagan world, and the Galatians would have readily understood them. With few exceptions, we recognize these sins as present in our own time as well.

In the first category three sexual sins are mentioned:

- Sexual immorality—Any form of illicit sexual relationship. The term serves to spotlight forbidden sexual behavior between people or indirect participation as an audience.
- Impure thoughts—Moral uncleanness. Perhaps no sexual act has taken place, but the person exhibits a crudeness or insensitivity in sexual matters that offends others. An example today would be the excessive use of sexual humor (or what is supposed to be humor) where people make statements with a sexual double meaning.
- Eagerness for lustful pleasure—Open and excessive indulgence in sexual sins. The person has no sense of shame or restraint. This is the outworking of sexual immorality and impurity.

The next two sins are religious sins particular to pagan culture:

- Idolatry—Worship of pagan idols. A person creates substitutes for God and then treats them as if they were God. This person is giving in to sinful human desires.
- Participation in demonic activities—Involvement with the powers of evil, at times using potions and poisons. With idolatry, a person acts in a submissive role in relation to evil; with demonic activity, the person is an active agent who serves the powers of evil.

The next eight sins pertain to conduct toward people (interpersonal relations) that has been motivated by sinful desires. It's sad to note, but many of these social sins are often seen in our churches today:

- Hostility—A condition of fixed enmity between groups. This may be real, unresolved conflict whose cause has been forgotten but which has yielded a harvest of bitterness.
- Quarreling—Competition, rivalry, bitter conflict—the seeds and the natural fruit of hatred.
- Jealousy—A feeling of resentment that someone else has what another feels he or she deserves.
- Outbursts of anger—Selfish anger. The plural form conveys the meaning of continual and uncontrolled behavior.
- Selfish ambition—The approach to life and work that tries to get ahead at other people's expense. Not only might this refer to what we call "workaholism," it also implies a mercenary, aggressive attitude toward others in the pursuit of one's goals.

- Divisions—Strong disagreements or quarrels. The situation that can quickly develop between people when a disagreeable attitude prevails.
- The feeling that everyone is wrong except those in your own little group—Dissension created among people because of divisions. This describes the tendency to look for allies in conflict. The almost spontaneous generation of cliques demonstrates this characteristic of sinful human desires.
- Envy—A desire to possess something awarded to or achieved by another. Or even the twisted logic that cries "Unfair!" about another's circumstances and expresses the wish, "If I can't have that, they shouldn't get it either!"

Finally Paul lists two sins, common to pagan cultures, that are often connected with the rituals of idol worship:

- Drunkenness—Excessive use of wine and strong drink.
- Wild parties—Drunken, carousing "parties," often filled with sexual promiscuity, were associated with festivals of some pagan gods. The feasts in honor of Bacchus were particularly infamous for their immorality.
- And other kinds of sin—Paul added an "etc." to show that the list was by no means complete.

Anyone living that sort of life refers to the lifestyle of people who habitually exhibit these characteristics. This does not mean that believers who lapse into any of these sins will lose their salvation and their inheritance. But people who habitually exhibit these characteristics reveal themselves to be enslaved to sinful human nature. They are not children of God; thus, they cannot have any part in the inheritance in the Kingdom of God. People who have accepted Christ and have the Holy Spirit within them will manifest that new life by making a clean break with such sins as listed above.

5:22-23 Paul's introduction of the word fruit is filled with meaning. By it Paul conveyed the meaning of a full harvest of virtues. Fruit is a by-product; it takes time to grow and requires care and cultivation. The Spirit produces the fruit; our job is to get in tune with the Spirit. Believers exhibit the fruit of the Spirit, not because they work at it, but simply because the Holy Spirit controls their lives. The fruit of the Spirit separates Christians from a godless, evil world, reveals a power within them, and helps them become more Christlike in their daily lives. In contrast to the list it follows, Paul did not describe these characteristics as obvious. The previous ones reside in us; the following ones come as a result of the Spirit's presence.

Again, the characteristics fall into categories. The first three are inward and can come from God alone:

- Love—Love as shown by Jesus, whose love is self-sacrificing and unchanging, and as demonstrated by God who sent his Son for sinners (Romans 5:5). Love forms the foundation for all the other fruit listed. Elsewhere, Paul breaks love itself down into various components (see 1 Corinthians 13), so that “love” turns out to bear little resemblance to the emotional meaning so often given to the word.
- Joy—An inner rejoicing that abides despite outer circumstances. This characteristic has little to do with happiness and can exist in times of unhappiness. It is a deep and nourishing satisfaction that continues even when a life situation seems empty and unsatisfying. The relationship with God through Christ remains even in the deserts and valleys of living.
- Peace—An inner quietness and trust in God's sovereignty and justice, even in the face of adverse circumstances. This is a profound agreement with the truth that God, not we, remains in charge of the universe.

The next three concern each believer's relationships with others:

- Patience—Patiently putting up with people who continually irritate us. The Holy Spirit's work in us increases our endurance.
- Kindness—Acting charitably, benevolently toward others, as God did toward us. Kindness takes the initiative in responding to other people's needs.
- Goodness—Reaching out to do good to others, even if they don't deserve it. Goodness does not react to evil but absorbs the offense and responds with positive action.

The last three present more general character traits that ought to guide a believer's life:

- Faithfulness—Reliable, trustworthy.
- Gentleness—Humble, considerate of others, submissive to God and his word. Even when anger is the appropriate response, as when Jesus cleared the Temple, gentleness keeps the expression of anger headed in the right direction. Gentleness applies even force in the correct way.
- Self-control—Mastery over sinful human desires and their lack of restraint.

Ironically, our sinful desires, which promise self-fulfillment and power, inevitably lead us to slavery. When we surrender to the Holy Spirit, initially we feel as though we have lost control, but he leads us to the exercise of self-control that would be impossible in our own strength.

God gave the law to make people aware of their sin and to restrain evil. But no one would make a law against these fruit (virtues), for they are neither sinful nor evil. Indeed, a society where all people acted thus would need very few laws at all. Because God who sent the law also sent the Spirit, the by-products of the Spirit-filled life harmonize perfectly with the intent of God's law. A person who exhibits the fruit of the Spirit fulfills the law far better than a person who observes the rituals but has little love in his or her heart.

5:24 Paul made it clear that the sinful nature and the Holy Spirit oppose each other. Believers, while receiving the Holy Spirit, also have sinful desires within. So how do believers gain the victory? The answers lie in these last three verses.

Those who belong to Christ Jesus (believers) have victory over the sinful desires to the degree that they have crucified the passions and desires of their sinful nature. Believers know that this does not mean our sinful nature really dies—life would be so much easier if it did! Instead, our sinful human nature continues to persuade and seduce us. Like a real crucifixion, the death of our sinful human desires is slow and painful . . . and lifelong. In many ways, our sinful human desires may need to be “recrucified” daily. But the picture conveyed by this “crucifixion of the sinful nature” shows us that God has broken the power of sin at work in our body. That remains a fact even when it may not feel that way to us. We need no longer live under sin's power or control. God does not take us out of the world or make us robots; we will still experience the temptation to sin, and sometimes we will sin. Before we were saved, we were slaves to our sinful desires, but now we can freely choose to live for Christ (see also Colossians 2:11; 3:9).

But what happens when we sin? Christ's death made forgiveness available to us. As believers continue to repent of sin, they will always receive God's forgiveness—all because of Christ's death on the cross on our behalf. We can experience victory over our sinful human desires because we are united with Christ in his death, having “crucified” that sinful nature. Our evil desires, our bondage to sin, and our love of sin have been nailed to his cross. Now, united by faith with him, we have unbroken fellowship with God and freedom from sin's hold on us. Our conduct and attitudes change, and the fruit of the Spirit grows within us because of what Christ did for us.

5:25 Because it is the Holy Spirit who gives new life, believers ought to follow the Holy Spirit's leading in every part of their lives. Apart from the working of the Holy Spirit, a person cannot please God. When the Holy Spirit leads, believers must follow. Since believers have been made alive by the Holy Spirit, he ought to direct the course of their lives. Unless we actively pursue contact with the Holy Spirit and obey his leading, we will be unable to resist the passions and desires of our flesh.

5:26 This verse seems like a last-minute addition to a section that could have easily ended with verse 25. Paul probably focused on particular problems in Galatia. He explained that if they would “follow the Holy Spirit's leading,” step-by-step, they could solve any attitude problems in the church. Perhaps even living by the Spirit might be used by some as an occasion for pride.

The apostle mentioned three particular problems. They are the opposite of serving, and they remain three prevalent sins in the church today. (1) Some were being conceited; they had an excessively favorable opinion of their own ability or importance. It could be that those who had not fallen prey to the Judaizers were acting this way, or those who had followed the Judaizers were acting conceited because they believed they were “more spiritual.” In any case, conceit causes problems where it flourishes. (2) Paul did not want them to irritate one another; they were causing annoyance and anger, the opposites of the virtues the Holy Spirit desired. Some people can't resist starting verbal fights in church. (3) Finally, they were jealous of one another; they wanted to have what others had earned or achieved, whether recognition, status, money, or even spirituality. This also could do nothing more than divide the believers and ruin the church's unity in Christ. Don't give in to envy.

Pride makes us perpetually vulnerable to temptation. When Satan can't stop our spiritual growth, his tactic immediately changes to using pride. As soon as we notice progress, we should expect pride to set in. This will especially be true if we measure our growth against the progress others are making. Growth should be cause not for pride but for humility and thanksgiving because it comes from God.

GALATIANS 6

WE REAP WHAT WE SOW / 6:1-10

The flow of thought from chapter 5 to chapter 6 reminds us that the original letter that Paul wrote had no breaks. In the last verses assigned to chapter 5, Paul had already begun to urge the Galatians to express the “fruit of the Spirit” in their relationships. In 5:25-26, Paul offered practical counsel for living “by the Spirit: keeping in step with the Spirit on the one hand while avoiding pride and envy on the other. In this section, Paul spelled out in practical terms what a “life in the Spirit” should look like.

6:1 Paul addressed the problem of individual sin by explaining corporate (group) responsibility. A Christian may sin alone, but because he or she participates in the body of Christ, his or her sin affects the whole. Our reaction to other Christians’ sins ought not to be how we can rid the church of these sinners. Rather, we should help our brothers and sisters who are fellow members of the body of Christ.

The phrase, if a Christian is overcome by some sin, pictures a believer being trapped or caught by sin. No church, indeed no believer, is completely free of sin, for sinful human desires still exist in believers (as Paul explained in 5:16-18). We must not report every sin or point out each person’s failings. While Paul didn’t explain the word sin, he focused on the type of sin that entraps a person, refusing to let him or her go and causing damage to his or her faith.

The believers may have wondered how the church should deal with members who have fallen into sin. Should the sin be overlooked in the name of love? Should the sin be exposed to everyone? If not, who needs to know, and what should they do about it? Paul did not recommend ignoring unrepented sin because, no matter how well hidden, sin will eventually cause problems in the church. Neither did Paul recommend a public humiliation of the sinner, for that would not achieve the objective of restoring the person to the fellowship. Paul recommended action, but he gave advice as to who should act and how the action should be taken.

First, action should be taken only by those who are godly. Who are these people? Paul was referring to men and women who walk in the Spirit in the sense that Paul had explained at the end of chapter 5. Only those mature in the faith (see also Hebrews 5:13-14) and mature enough to handle this situation properly should deal with it. In other words, the new, immature believers should not deal with the delicate subject of sin (and sinners) in the church. In addition, mature believers should discern when to confront sin (see Matthew 18:15-20). Every person's fault need not be dragged into the light for all to see, but persistent sin that destroys the person and hurts the fellowship must be resolved.

Next, Paul clarified what the spiritually mature should do for the one caught in sin: gently and humbly help that person back onto the right path. When leaders confront a person caught in sin, they should avoid humiliating, punishing, or using the person as a public example. Instead, the leaders' purpose should be to restore the person to the fellowship of believers (see 2 Timothy 2:24-26). Mature believers should help get the person on the right track, encourage repentance and accountability, offer assistance if needed, and warmly accept the repentant person back into the church. All church discipline aims at this goal.

The church has a duty to help erring believers, but each individual believer must take responsibility for dealing with sin and temptation. In situations such as the apostle was describing, those who restore a fallen one could face two temptations: (1) They might be tempted to have spiritual pride, or (2) they might fall into the same temptation faced by the one they are trying to correct.

6:2 As used in this verse, troubles and problems refer to the heavy or oppressive burdens that a believer cannot carry alone. It could be financial burdens; it could be burdens of temptation. We must help share the loads that others find too heavy to carry alone. However, we must not regard this load as a burden, but a joy. Like people hiking a trail, we not only shoulder our own backpacks, but we help out with other people's loads when the trail gets too steep, they get too tired, or their feet get blistered—whenever they need assistance.

To share one another's troubles also obeys the law of Christ. How so? As Paul had explained in 5:14, "For the whole law can be summed up in a this one command, 'Love your neighbor as yourself.'" Jesus told his disciples on the night before his crucifixion, "I am giving you a new commandment: Love each other" (John 13:34, see also John 15:12). The law of Christ is his "new commandment" summed up when we show love for others. In a sense Paul was saying, "If you insist on carrying burdens, don't carry the burden of the law; instead, in love, carry one another's burdens. Then you not only help one another out and build unity among yourselves, you also fulfill the law of Christ!"

6:3 However, some believers either would refuse to follow Paul's command to help share one another's troubles or would do so in order to be noticed and receive praise. Both motives come from conceit. Those people may have regarded themselves as too important to dirty themselves with others' problems and failings. Paul was anxious to warn the Galatians not to tolerate any form of spiritual superiority, no matter how cleverly disguised. Paul explained that these people's lack of love for others revealed both their worthlessness to the body of Christ and also their bankrupt spiritual state. This person may think he is important, but he is really a nobody. The true "somebodies" in the church produce the Holy Spirit's fruit in their lives, and these people won't even be concerned about their status. They will be busy helping others.

6:4-5 While some people may be conceited regarding their burden bearing, others may feel as though they can't "share troubles" as well as others. Some might be afraid of grief or pain; some others might get tongue-tied in trying to offer encouragement; others may be so shy as to be unable to approach needy people. Conversely, some may have experienced others who, under the pretense of helping, exploit the vulnerability of a person in trouble or violate a trust that was placed in them regarding very personal matters. Both our abilities and motives need healthy, ongoing examination.

Here Paul offered the solution. People should do what they should, and then they could enjoy the personal satisfaction of having done their work well. Each person is responsible for his or her own conduct. We should compare ourselves to God's standard, not to anyone else. Good pride is being able to say, "I have lived up to the potential God gave me." We will not be judged on the basis of how we have matched up to others, but on how we have met God's expectations for us. The danger of comparing ourselves with others is that we either come out ahead (a cause for false pride) or behind (leading to lowered self-esteem and the danger of not doing any more for others at all). Christians have different gifts and abilities, but God does not excuse us from sharing others' troubles. We are not responsible to do everything or to make the same contributions as others; we are responsible to accomplish what God has called us to do.

6:6 After describing how the Holy Spirit helps believers in their relationships with others, Paul explained how the Holy Spirit would affect their use of money. Paul's first admonition prescribed support of Christian teachers (the true teachers as opposed to the false teachers) in the Galatian churches. These teachers were serving full-time in preaching and teaching. The congregations (those who are taught the word of God) should voluntarily and generously provide for the teachers' needs. This included financial support and sharing material items and services, as well as personal encouragement. While the radical giving and sharing of the early church in Jerusalem (recorded in Acts 2:44-45) was a model, all churches were not required to follow it. Instead, Paul recommended a spirit of giving among the believers in the churches that he had founded, especially regarding their care for those who were devoting their time to ministry.

6:7 This sentence, inserted within Paul's flow of thought regarding money, gives a general principle about the attitudes of kindness, giving, and sharing. While people can deceive one another, and even themselves, about their motives and attitudes for giving, they cannot deceive God. Paul said that these believers themselves must not be misled. People can't ignore God and get away with it. What they sow, they will reap. Sow means "spread, utilize, invest." Whatever we use as key values determines the course of our life. Jesus taught the importance of investing our time and utilizing our resources wisely for the Kingdom (Matthew 6:19-21).

While believers have received God's special blessings and promises, God does not change the positive and negative of the natural law that people will reap what they sow. From farming to finances, this saying holds true (Proverbs 22:8). A farmer plants corn and grows corn; he should not expect nor desire anything else. Believers must decide what crop they want and plant accordingly, for what they get back will be directly related to what they put in, as Paul explains in the next verse.

6:8 Believers who use their lives and sow their resources to satisfy their own sinful desires will earn a harvest of decay and death. Those who live like this will not inherit the Kingdom of God (5:21). When we sow to the flesh, we bring these seeds of destruction into our life. Believers who sow their resources and invest their lives to please the Spirit have a far different harvest. They will reap everlasting life.

How do we sow "to please the Spirit"? When we use our resources to grow spiritually and to support the Lord's work so that others can enter the Kingdom and grow spiritually, we are sowing to please the Spirit. Why? Because our harvest results in spiritual growth and souls reached for the Kingdom; thus, our harvest lasts forever. This kind of stewardship of our resources can only be done through the power of the Holy Spirit. When the Holy Spirit controls a believer's life, the results are amazing. As 5:22-23 pointed out, the fruit borne in a believer is life-changing. That change will affect the believer's handling of money, use of talent, and investment of time.

6:9 While good works will never earn salvation, Paul did encourage believers to persist in doing what is good. While we do good, we should not get discouraged and give up. To continue the analogy of sowing and reaping, a farmer will have no harvest to reap if he becomes too weary to labor in the fields or if he gives up altogether. The harvest will not reap itself. Every aspect of farming, planting, maintaining, and finally the harvesting takes hard work. So, too, believers must not become discouraged and give up when they follow the Holy Spirit's guidance, grow spiritually, and do good for God's Kingdom. While it may seem at times like a losing battle, we are assured that we will reap a harvest of blessing at the appropriate time.

What kind of harvest did the apostle have in mind? A Christian will reap a harvest of present blessings: the fruit of the Spirit, well-instructed believers, restored sinners, and mutual support. But ultimately he or she will reap the harvest of eternal life in the Holy Spirit (6:8). Though the appropriate time is the time of God's own choosing, Paul was most likely referring to the time of the fulfillment of God's promises at Christ's second coming (1 Timothy 6:15).

6:10 Every time we have the opportunity to do good, we should do it. The timing for doing good is always right. The opportunity is not optional. We are to treat it as strategically placed by God in our path. Our settings may continually change, but each one will bring a fresh opportunity for helping and serving.

God calls believers to do good to everyone, believers and nonbelievers alike. The fruit of the Holy Spirit must be shared with both the Christian and the non-Christian world. Some fields may be very difficult to "work," but our purpose should be to sow goodness anyway!

If Paul still had in mind our financial responsibility, we should be willing to help others financially whenever we are able. But we should focus particularly on the needs of our Christian brothers and sisters. The Christian family extends far beyond the walls of a particular church or the limits of a particular denomination to include all true believers.

When Paul told individual believers to "do good," he spoke to their responsibility in the community as well as in the church. The church is not meant to become merely a social agency, but individual believers can work together in meeting social needs, giving time and resources as God calls and enables them. Sowing seeds of kindness to those in need expresses Christ's love and prepares hearts to receive the gospel.

PAUL'S FINAL ADVICE / 6:11-18

We can hardly imagine how Paul felt as he dictated this letter. Perhaps he took up the parchment and reread his arguments and instructions. Some time may have passed since the original dictation. The letter was complete, but Paul decided to add some final thoughts, shaping the words in large and forceful movements of the pen and praying that this letter would be used by God to get his Galatian brothers and sisters to the truth.

He left the Galatians with a strong word-picture of the cross of Jesus Christ. The decision that faced his readers was not really between two competing voices of authority; rather, the choice was between denying the Cross or finding through it the only true way of life.

6:11 Up to this point, Paul had probably dictated the letter to a scribe. Then he took the pen and closed the letter in his own handwriting. Paul did this in other letters as well, to add emphasis to his words and to validate that the letter was genuine (see 1 Corinthians 16:21; Colossians 4:18; 2 Thessalonians 3:17). Paul pointed out his large letters, perhaps because the contrast in the original letter was obvious. Paul's scribe, if trained in writing, would have written in well-formed Greek characters. Paul, a preacher and not a scribe, had a less precise writing style. Another theory is that Paul wrote in large letters due to poor eyesight (see 4:13-15). Most likely, however, Paul wrote in large letters for emphasis, as these last verses reiterate the main points of this epistle. They were his signature.

6:12 As Paul concluded the key points of his letter, he referred again to the Judaizers, the false teachers who were causing all the trouble and confusion in Galatia. Those who were trying to force the Galatian believers to be circumcised were only doing it because they didn't want to be persecuted for teaching that the cross of Christ alone can save.

The Judaizers had brought legalistic issues to the surface, but their rejection of the death of Christ ran deeper. To accept that the Cross alone can save includes accepting certain beliefs: that people are sinners under God's curse, that a personal sacrifice was required, that only the death of Christ on the cross could secure people's salvation, and that people can do nothing to obtain that salvation but to accept Christ's sacrifice on their behalf. People don't want to be told they are sinners who can do nothing but accept someone else's help. Human nature would much prefer to earn salvation, if only to be able to have pride along with the accomplishment. To preach anything else would incur persecution, as Paul would learn over and over again.

6:13 In addition to attacking the Judaizers' motives to make a good impression and escape persecution, Paul attacked them because all they wanted to do was brag about it and claim the Galatians as their disciples. In other words, they wanted to report the number of circumcisions back to their superiors. For the Judaizers to “sell” Judaism to the Christians meant selling them a worthless product. The Judaizers compelled the believers to be circumcised, as they had been, thereby bringing them under the law with them. Yet the Judaizers themselves did not and could not really keep the whole law. If the Jews themselves couldn’t keep the law, how futile it was to compel new Christians to accept circumcision that would bind them to that same law. Worse yet, the Judaizers did this for the sake of pride—personal pride, religious pride, national pride—yet pride all the same. Not a very strong base for dealing with someone’s eternal destiny!

6:14 To boast with puffed-up pride would be sinful arrogance. While the Judaizers sought to please people, escape persecution, and boast in statistics, Paul’s boasting was never of anything except the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. Paul could boast about the Cross because of what the Cross had accomplished in his life. For Paul, it was as though his interest in this world had died and vice versa. Paul had no need of the earthly and selfish motives and ambitions. His only boast was the cross (the only way of salvation) of our (that is, salvation belongs to every believer personally) Lord Jesus Christ (the only God, Savior, and Messiah).

6:15 Paul, a circumcised Jew, knew that his circumcision counted for nothing as a means to salvation. Neither was uncircumcision a detriment to salvation. Neither of these outward markings makes any difference to God regarding salvation. The cross of Christ made such distinctions valueless and put all people on equal ground. When Jews or Gentiles become believers, they are changed into new and different people. That is what counts; the only thing that matters is being born again. How do we know if we have been changed? By believing on the Lord Jesus Christ and what he accomplished on the cross, being born again by the power of the Holy Spirit, and living by his transforming power.

6:16 This sentence underlined Paul’s entire argument. This principle refers to the gospel message Paul had defended throughout this letter—that we receive salvation by grace through faith alone. Paul might have said, “To those who believe this principle”; however, he chose the words live by to emphasize the Galatians’ problem. They had initially believed, but they hadn’t “followed” or “walked” or “grown” in that belief and thus had fallen prey to false teachers.

But to those who did follow (and he hoped this would include all the Galatian believers), Paul wished mercy and peace. “Peace” was a common greeting and benediction (see, for example, Psalms 125:5 and 128:6). At the beginning of this letter, Paul had greeted the Galatians with “grace and peace” (1:3). Here he chose “mercy and peace.” These two characteristics would return in great force if the Galatians would follow through on their original commitment to Christ. The exit of the Judaizers and the renewed commitment to share each other’s troubles would yield a harvest of mercy and peace. He saved “grace” for his final phrase in the letter (6:18). These believers are the new people of God. No longer are the promises focused on the Jews alone—instead, the people of God are those who have accepted Jesus Christ as their Savior.

6:17 Paul ended his letter with a request that this trouble stop. Paul had aptly argued against the Judaizers’ teaching in this letter, ending the need for more to be said about them. He expected the Galatian Christians to return to the faith and stand up for themselves against the false teachers. He had provided the ammunition; they should use it.

The suffering he had endured for the faith should be enough to encourage these believers to remain steadfast against false teaching. Paul bore on his body the scars that showed that he belonged to Jesus. This referred, not to circumcision, but to the scars Paul received when he was persecuted for the sake of the gospel. Some of these he received while he was in Galatia (recorded in Acts 13–14; see also Philippians 3:10; Colossians 1:24).

6:18 Unlike many of Paul’s other letters, Paul included no personal greetings or remarks as he concluded this letter. Perhaps he did not want to lighten the solemnity of the letter’s contents, but wanted to close the letter in a way that would cause the Galatians to think of nothing but acting upon Paul’s words. Instead, he closed as he had begun in 1:3, wishing the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ on these believers. Grace was exactly what Paul hoped would be the result of his entire urgent letter to them—that they would return to the gospel of salvation by God’s grace alone.

EPHESIANS

INTRODUCTION

What builds a friendship? Certainly common values, ideals, and experiences help. But friendship also needs mutual appreciation and respect, vulnerability, and spending many hours together. And shared experiences bond people—especially experiences of suffering together and working together to reach a common goal.

Of all the churches planted and visited along Paul's missionary journeys, he enjoyed a very close relationship with the church at Ephesus. Paul first visited the city briefly on his way home to Jerusalem (A.D. 53), but he promised to return (Acts 18:19-21). He did, just one year later, on his third missionary journey. This time, Paul lived and ministered in the city for three years (Acts 20:31). During these stays in Ephesus, Paul developed close relationships with the believers there. Paul taught about the Holy Spirit (Acts 19:1-7), encountered opposition in the synagogue (Acts 19:8-9), and held an open forum in a lecture hall for seekers from all over the province of Asia (Acts 19:9-10). He healed the sick and cast out demons (Acts 19:11-12). Many confessed their sins and turned to Christ (Acts 19:13-20). Paul became a controversial figure, incurring the anger of many Greek businessmen and Jews. In fact, the silversmith Demetrius stirred up a riot against Paul and his traveling companions (Acts 19:23-41). Paul's enemies were as ferocious as wild beasts (1 Corinthians 15:32). No wonder Paul and the Ephesian believers were close.

As you read Ephesians, see this book as more than an important, theological document for an ancient church. It is the Holy Spirit-inspired letter to followers of Christ with whom Paul had lived and worked for three years. He was committed to them and to the churches in that area. This is a letter bathed in love.

How committed are you to those whom you have taught and led? What can you do to encourage them in their walk with Christ?

AUTHOR

Paul: apostle of Christ, courageous missionary, gifted teacher, articulate apologist, and Christian statesman.

Two major headings in this book (1:1 and 3:1) show that this epistle claims to have been written by Paul the apostle. This claim is confirmed by many church fathers, including Polycarp, Origen, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian. Most scholars throughout the history of the church have affirmed the same. For more about Paul, see the Author section in the Introduction to the book of Romans.

DATE AND SETTING

Written about A.D. 61, from Rome, during Paul's imprisonment there.

Paul had been a Christian for nearly thirty years by the time he wrote this letter. He had taken three missionary trips and had established churches all around the Mediterranean Sea. At the end of his third journey, he was arrested in Jerusalem for causing a riot with his preaching. Paul was committed to going to Rome (Acts 19:21), and God told him that he would go there and preach the gospel (Acts 23:11). So, upon his arrest, Paul appealed to Caesar and eventually did arrive in Rome, the capital of the empire (read the story in Acts 21:27–28:31). Paul probably hadn't planned on being in prison during his ministry there, but that didn't stop him from preaching and teaching.

In Rome, Paul was under house arrest—meaning that he was not really in a prison but probably under guard in a minimum security situation while awaiting trial. There was no threat of his trying to escape; Paul was right where he wanted to be. People from all over the empire made their way to Rome. Though a prisoner, Paul was free to have visitors and to write letters (see Acts 28:16ff.). Those who heard the gospel could take it, for Paul, to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). While under house arrest, Paul preached to Jews and Gentiles alike, witnessing to the whole Roman guard (Philippians 1:13) and helping Roman believers grow in their faith. He also wrote four letters that are commonly called his Prison Epistles: Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon. Timothy often visited Paul (Philippians 1:1; Colossians 1:1; Philemon 1), as did Tychicus (Ephesians 6:21), Epaphroditus (Philippians 4:18), and Mark (Colossians 4:10).

Tychicus and Onesimus were sent by Paul to Colosse. Tychicus carried the two epistles to the two churches respectively (Ephesians 6:22; Colossians 4:7)—Ephesians as an encyclical and Colossians as a specific letter. Onesimus carried a letter of recommendation from Paul to Philemon, his former master, residing at Colosse. The date was probably about four years after Paul's parting with the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20), about A.D. 61. From 6:19-20 it is plain that although he was a prisoner, Paul had some degree of freedom in preaching. This agrees with Acts 28:23, 30-31. Paul's house arrest began in A.D. 60 or 61 and lasted two whole years (Acts 28:30) at least, and perhaps longer.

AUDIENCE

The churches in Ephesus and the surrounding area.

The city. Outside of Rome, Ephesus was the most important city that Paul visited. Located at the intersection of two ancient, major overland routes (the coastal road running north to Troas and the western route to Colosse, Laodicea, and beyond) at the western edge of Asia Minor (now Turkey), with easy access to the Aegean Sea, Ephesus had become a political, commercial, and religious center. It had been one of the main routes either by sea or by land from Rome to the east. Ephesus had a harbor on the Cayster River, which emptied into the Aegean Sea, so the city, at one time, was known as “the Landing Place,” and the citizens were proud of its role as a port city and a gateway to Asia. By the first century, however, the harbor was nearly filled with silt, thus causing some economic decline.

A strong source of income for Ephesus was the great temple of Artemis (Diana), the fertility goddess. Four times larger than the Parthenon, this shrine, considered one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, was revered throughout Asia and the world (Acts 19:27). The temple stood outside the city walls and faced east. Built completely of marble, it was 324 feet long and 164 feet wide and took 220 years to erect. The image of the goddess stood, surrounded by curtains, in the center of the temple.

In addition to the temple, Ephesus had an immense amphitheater (see Acts 19:27-29) that could seat more than twenty-five thousand spectators. The city was positioned between two mountainous ridges. The eastern ridge formed the foundation for this theater, as it had been cut out of the mountainside. Nearby stood the stadium, or race course, where fights between wild animals or between men and animals were held. A great marble street, the main street of Ephesus, ran northwest from the theater to the harbor. The street was flanked on both sides by an elaborate colonnade.

The city’s commercial life and prosperity came to depend on the many thousands of tourists and worshipers visiting the temple, theater, and stadium annually. No wonder the populace became alarmed, and then enraged, when told that Paul’s teachings would undermine the worship of Artemis and thus endanger their livelihood and the city’s economy (Acts 19:23-41).

The church. As was his custom, Paul began his ministry in Ephesus among Jews, in the synagogue (Acts 19:8). When the Jewish leaders refused to listen, Paul left and taught in a rented lecture hall (Acts 19:9-10). During the next two years, many Jews and Greeks came to hear the gospel and believed (Acts 19:11, 17). At the writing of this letter, the church consisted mostly of Gentiles (2:11-19; 3:1).

The church at Ephesus flourished and became a strong spiritual community. Apollos had taught there and had been instructed by Priscilla and Aquila (Acts 18:24-28). Paul left the Ephesian church under the care of competent elders (Acts 20:17), and later, he commissioned Timothy to minister there (1 Timothy 1:3). Scholars believe that the apostle John wrote his letters and his Gospel from Ephesus (A.D. 85–90). After John’s exile on Patmos, he returned to Ephesus for his final years (A.D. 100). Irenaeus (A.D. 120–202) wrote, “Afterwards, John, the disciple of the Lord, who also had leaned upon his breast, did himself publish a gospel during his residence at Ephesus in Asia.”

In addition to having hosted these great spiritual leaders, the church in Ephesus is mentioned in the book of Revelation. God commends the believers, but also warns them” (Revelation 2:2-5). Certainly this was a remarkable church.

The recipients. Most likely, this letter was addressed to several churches in the district around Ephesus—namely, the Roman province of Asia (commonly known as Asia Minor). The letter was not really intended to be only for the church at Ephesus. Most modern scholars are convinced that it was an encyclical (circular letter) meant for many churches in Asia, including Ephesus. It is possible that this letter was the one mentioned by Paul in Colossians 4:15-16, wherein Paul encourages the church in Colosse to exchange letters with the church in Laodicea—exhorting the church in Colosse to read the letter from Laodicea. This doesn’t mean that this epistle was written by the Laodiceans or that it was written from Laodicea, just that it was circulating among the churches in Asia Minor and would naturally come to Colosse after Laodicea. The two cities are just a few miles apart.

This situation helps us understand why Paul’s message in this letter is both intimate and global. Intimate—because of his close association with the Ephesians. Global—because the truths he wanted to communicate were for all the churches. And this is why Ephesians has had such an appeal to all believers throughout the church age. Next to Paul’s letter to the Romans, this is the one epistle that could also be called a treatise rather than an occasional letter. Ephesians presents the grand picture of God’s eternal purpose for the Christian church.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

To strengthen the believers in their Christian faith by explaining the nature and purpose of the church, the body of Christ.

Paul felt keenly responsible for the spiritual health of the churches that he had planted. His deep concern led him to revisit many of those churches on subsequent travels, and it certainly motivated him to write letters and to send other teachers and leaders after him. In Paul’s parting words to the Ephesian elders, he urged them to be on guard for false teachers (Acts 20:28-31). Paul knew that young believers, like little lambs, would be easy prey for false teachers and egotistical preachers who could devastate the flock. So Paul wrote to strengthen and mature his Christian brothers and sisters in their faith by explaining the purpose and power of the church—helping them see the big picture—and by calling believers to sound doctrine and holy living.

The Epistle to the Ephesians can be considered Paul's treatise on the universal church, the body of Christ. Thus, unencumbered with local problems, his description soars high above any mundane affairs and takes us into heaven, where we are presented with a heavenly view of the church as it fits into God's eternal plan.

Paul wanted his readers to see God's eternal purpose for the church. With such a high calling and privilege, believers, as individuals and as a local group, should settle for nothing less. In addition, Paul claimed to have received a revelation about the church that had never before been known—that the church would be comprised of both Jewish and Gentile believers, sharing equal status in the body as coheirs, comembers of the body, and joint partakers. He wrote about this revelation so that all the believers could understand the secret plan (see 3:1-9).

Today, many Christians take their faith and their church for granted. Thus, they become critical of fellow believers, the worship services, and church leaders, and often they become susceptible to wrong doctrines. As you read Ephesians, examine your attitudes in light of Paul's description of the church, the body of Christ. And consider how you might encourage and strengthen fellow believers and spiritual leaders.

MESSAGE

After a warm greeting (1:1-2), Paul affirms the nature of the church—the glorious fact that believers in Christ have been showered with God's kindness (1:3-8), chosen for greatness (1:9-12), marked with the Holy Spirit (1:13, 14), filled with the Spirit's power (1:15-23), freed from sin's curse and bondage (2:1-10), and brought near to God (2:11-18). As part of God's "house," we stand with the prophets, apostles, Jews, Gentiles, and Christ himself (2:19–3:13). Then, as though overcome with emotion by remembering all that God has done, Paul challenges the Ephesians to live close to Christ, and he breaks into spontaneous praise (3:14-21).

Paul then turns his attention to the implications of being in the body of Christ, the church. Believers should have unity in their commitment to Christ and their use of spiritual gifts (4:1-16). They should have the highest moral standards (4:17–6:9). For the individual, this means rejecting pagan practices (4:17–5:20), and for the family, this means mutual submission and love (5:21–6:9).

Paul then reminds them that the church is in a constant battle with the forces of darkness and that they should use every spiritual weapon at their disposal (6:10-17). He concludes by asking for their prayers, commissioning Tychicus, and giving a benediction (6:18-24).

The main themes in the book of Ephesians include: God's Purpose, Christ the Center, the Living Church, the New Family, and Christian Conduct.

God's Purpose (1:3-14, 18-23; 2:6-10). According to God's eternal and loving plan, he directs, carries out, and sustains our salvation. God chose believers before the world began (1:4-5). Everything happens according to God's eternal purpose (1:11). Using his Son as the model and prototype, God decided to make more sons just like his beloved Son. This decision emanated from a deep desire in the heart of God to have many children who would be like his beloved Son. In love, he predestined many people to participate in this "sonship"—not by their own merits but by virtue of being in the Son (1:4-5).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Knowing that we have been chosen before Creation to receive God's salvation and eternal life and to be his very own children should energize our gratitude and boost our self-esteem. Think of it—we have been chosen by God! Knowing of God's plan and work should not fill us with pride, however, for his choice of us was totally by grace. We had no credentials, characteristics, or good works that could earn his favor. Instead, the proper response is thanksgiving and humility. The reality of God's perfect plan should also motivate us to trust him in every area of life, with his purpose becoming our mission. How have you responded to God's sovereign plan? Have you committed yourself to fulfilling God's purpose?

Christ the Center (1:19-23; 2:19-22; 3:10-11, 20-21; 4:7-16). Christ is exalted as the central meaning of the universe and the focus of history (1:20-23). He is the head of the body, the church (2:19-22; 4:15-16). He is the Creator and Sustainer of all creation (1:22-23). Ephesians presents the church as God's masterpiece (2:10), his most splendid work of art. God did not create with clay or canvas and paint. No, everything was created in Christ. God's Son is the substance of this masterpiece. And everything in God's new creation was created for Christ—he is the recipient of God's masterpiece.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Because Christ is central to everything, he must be central in us—our highest value and the focus of our lives. In our high-tech, materialistic, relationship-driven, and sex-oriented society, many idols and values compete for our devotion. It becomes easy to be enticed and drawn away or to have our lives cluttered by trivial pursuits. But Christ must be at the center, receiving our total devotion and ordering our priorities. Keep your focus on him and place all your interests, relationships, desires, possessions, and goals under his control. What competes with Christ for your attention? What can you do to keep him at the center of your life?

The Living Church (1:2-23; 2:1-22; 4:4-6, 11-16). Ephesians includes a masterful and profound description of the church. The church, under Christ's control, is a living body, a family, a dwelling. And God gives believers, by his Holy Spirit, spiritual gifts—special abilities to build the church. The church is Christ's body to carry out the work he began on earth. He is the head of his body, directing it and motivating it to complete his ministry on earth (1:22-23). As such, the church is the continuation of Christ's incarnation—in the sense that Christ, through another human body, still lives and works on earth among human beings in a tangible, palpable way. But it takes all the members of the body working together in harmony to fulfill the designs and desires of the head (4:4-6, 15-16). This is why there are so many appeals in this epistle for unity and collective maturity. The body must match the head so that Christ can be fully expressed!

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Paul's presentation of the church reached its pinnacle in this epistle. The church he pictured with words was the church in ideal perfection, the church as seen from heaven—but not yet manifested on earth in fullness. As part of Christ's body, we believers must live in vital union with him. Our conduct must be consistent with this living relationship. People in the world should be able to see Christ by looking at Christians, seeing their values, lifestyles, and loving acts of service.

What do people know about Jesus by watching how you relate to other Christians? In what ways can you use your God-given abilities to equip believers for service? Fulfill your role in the living church.

The New Family (1:5; 2:11-19; 3:1-6; 4:1-6; 5:21-33). Because God through Christ paid the penalty for our sin and forgave us, we have been reconciled—brought near to him. We are a new society, a new family. Being united with Christ means that we are to treat one another as family members. God's many sons and daughters compose his divine family (3:14-15). They are his inheritance and his glory (1:11, in the Greek; 2:19), for he has invested everything into them. He gave them his Son and created them anew in his Son. In the final days, when the time comes for God to display his glory to the whole universe (both visible and invisible), he will make a grand spectacle of all his children who, through transformation, will bear the image of Jesus Christ. God will be glorified, not just through Jesus Christ, but also through the church (3:10). His family is also his household and dwelling place. Those among whom he lives are also those in whom he lives (2:20-22).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. As a believer in Christ, you have a place where you are accepted and welcomed, where you belong—the church. You also have the responsibility to accept and welcome other believers, regardless of race, sex, occupation, nationality, ability, physical characteristics, social status, or personality type. And if you have a conflict with another believer, you should resolve the conflict as quickly as possible, maintaining unity and harmony. How well do you relate to the other members of your Christian family? What can you do to help unify your church?

Christian Conduct (2:1-10; 3:14-19; 4:1-3, 17-32; 5:1-33; 6:1-18). Ephesians encourages all Christians to wise, dynamic Christian living, for with privileges goes family responsibility. As a new community, we are to live by Christ's new standards. God provides his Holy Spirit to enable us to live his way. The Holy Spirit, as the third person in the Trinity, is often described as God in action. When God moves and acts, he does so in and through the Spirit. Believers are called upon to live in the Spirit, to worship in the Spirit, to please the Spirit, and to maintain unity by the Spirit (4:3, 30; 5:9, 18-19). The church should display the full activity of the life-giving Spirit, or it is nothing more than a dead corpse.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Christians are under attack today as at no other time in history. Satan is working within the church to cause conflict and to divide, and he is moving against individuals, especially spiritual leaders, to prompt them to engage in self-centered sin. So we need all of our spiritual armor to win our spiritual battles. In addition to the armor, God gives us power through his Spirit. To utilize the Spirit's power, we must lay aside our evil desires and draw upon the power of his new life. Are you ready for the battle? Do you know how to dress in your spiritual armor? Have you submitted your will to Christ?

OUTLINE OF EPHESIANS

I. Unity in Christ (1:1–3:21)

II. Unity in the Body of Christ (4:1–6:24)

Ephesus was a strategic city, ranking in importance with Alexandria in Egypt and Antioch of Syria as a port. It lay on the most western edge of Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey), the most important port on the Aegean Sea on the main route from Rome to the east.

EPHESIANS 1

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-2

Paul wrote to the believers in Ephesus and the surrounding churches to give them in-depth teaching about how to nurture and maintain the unity of the church. He wanted to put this important information in written form because he was in prison for preaching the gospel and could not visit the churches himself. Paul apparently received reports that the Ephesian church held up well against false teachers. However, perhaps the love, care, and unity Paul had called for were lacking. Thus, this letter speaks much of love and unity and the outworkings of these in relationships in the home and in the church. Paul knew that such teaching was needed not only in Ephesus but in every church—again pointing to the probable circular nature of this letter. Indeed Paul’s words applied in Ephesus and in all the Asian churches—and they apply to our churches today.

1:1 Paul was a Jew from the tribe of Benjamin. He was raised as a strict Pharisee (Philippians 3:5), grew up in Tarsus, and was educated under a well-known teacher, Gamaliel (Acts 22:3). However, he was also a Roman citizen, a fact that he used to great advantage at times (Acts 22:27-29). Out of this diverse background, God formed and called a valuable servant, using every aspect of Paul’s upbringing to further the gospel. He was not one of the original twelve disciples (later called apostles), but the risen Christ Jesus confronted him on the road to Damascus and called him to be an apostle (Acts 9:3-19). The apostles’ mission was to be God’s representatives: They were envoys, messengers, delegates, directly under the authority of Christ Jesus. They had authority to set up and supervise churches and to discipline them if necessary, which Paul did on all three of his missionary journeys and after his release from this first imprisonment in Rome. God chose Paul for special work, saying that Paul would be his “chosen instrument to take my message to the Gentiles and to kings, as well as to the people of Israel” (Acts 9:15). Paul did not seek this apostleship; instead, God had chosen him.

Paul wrote this letter to the Ephesian believers—God’s holy people in Ephesus, the faithful followers of Christ Jesus. The words “in Ephesus” are not present in the three earliest manuscripts. Therefore, this was very likely a circular letter, meaning the name of each local church would be filled in as the letter circulated from church to church. Ephesus, the leading church in the region of Asia Minor, was probably the first destination for this epistle. Paul mentioned no particular problems or local situations, and he offered no personal greetings as he might have done if this letter were intended for the Ephesian church alone. (For more about Ephesus, see the Audience section in the Introduction.)

Clearly, Paul had a deep love for the church in Ephesus. His last words to the Ephesian elders focused on two items: (1) warning them about false teachers (Acts 20:29-31), and (2) exhorting them to show love and care toward one another (Acts 20:35).

1:2 Grace means God's undeserved favor. It is through God's kindness alone that anyone can become acceptable to God. Peace refers to the peace that Christ established between believers and God through his death on the cross. True peace is available only in Christ (John 14:27).

Paul used "grace and peace" as a standard greeting in all of his letters. He wanted his readers to experience God's grace and peace in their daily living. Only God our Father and Jesus Christ our Lord can grant such wonderful gifts. By mentioning Jesus Christ along with God, Paul was pointing to Jesus as a full person of the Godhead. He recognized Jesus' deity and lordship over all of creation. Both God the Father and Jesus Christ the Lord are coequal in providing the resources of grace and peace.

SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS / 1:3-14

Here begins a lengthy passage that praises God for what he has done for us in Jesus Christ. Paul, writing in Greek, wrote one long sentence from 1:3 to 1:14 (which is not reflected in English). It forms the longest sentence ever found in ancient Greek. In this sentence, Paul introduced most of the themes he develops in this epistle. This complex sentence is very difficult to analyze. Paul heaped praise upon praise, one thought leading into another, which then would remind him of another. This section forms a blessing, in Hebrew called a berakah, frequently used in Jewish liturgy. It is a eulogy for God and for all the blessings he gives his people.

1:3 Paul first praised God, saying that all believers praise God. God alone is worthy of praise and worship. He is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Because believers belong to Christ, God has blessed us. The verb "blessed" occurs hundreds of times in the Old Testament, revealing that God enjoys blessing his people. Here Paul used the past tense ("has blessed"), indicating that this prospering of believers had already occurred—even from eternity past. God has blessed us by allowing us to receive the benefits of Christ's redemption (1:7) and resurrection (1:19-20). God blessed us through Christ's death on the cross on our behalf.

Because by faith we belong to Christ, we have every spiritual blessing—that is, every benefit of knowing God and everything we need to grow spiritually. These are spiritual blessings, not material ones. Because God has already blessed believers, we need not ask for these blessings but simply accept them and apply them to our lives. Because we have an intimate relationship with Christ, we can enjoy these blessings now and will enjoy them for eternity.

The phrase heavenly realms occurs five times in this letter (1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12) and refers to the sphere beyond the material world—the place of spiritual activity where the ultimate conflict between good and evil takes place. This conflict continues but has already been won by Christ’s death and resurrection. This is the realm in which the spiritual blessings were secured for us and then given to us. Our blessings come from heaven, where Christ now lives (1:20), and Christ’s gift of the Holy Spirit, the source of all spiritual blessings, came as a result of his ascension to heaven (4:8). Paul was making the point that these blessings are spiritual and not material; thus, they are eternal and not temporal.

1:4 That God chose us forms the basis of the doctrine of election—defined as God’s choice of an individual or group for a specific purpose or destiny. The doctrine of election teaches that we are saved only because of God’s grace and mercy; as believers we are not saved by our own merit. It focuses on God’s purpose or will (1:5, 9, 11), not on ours. God does not save us because we deserve it but because he graciously and freely gives salvation. We did not influence God’s decision to save us; he saved us according to his plan. Thus, we may not take credit for our salvation or take pride in our wise choice.

The doctrine of election runs through the Bible, beginning with God’s choosing Abraham’s descendants as his special people. Although the Jews were chosen as special recipients and emissaries of God’s grace, their opportunity to participate in that plan arrived with the coming of Christ, their promised Messiah. But many didn’t recognize Christ and so rejected him. God’s “chosen” and elected people are now Christians, the body of Christ, the church—all who believe on, accept, and receive Jesus Christ as Messiah, Savior, and Lord. Jesus himself called his followers “the chosen ones” (see Matthew 24:22, 24, 31; Mark 13:20, 22, 27).

God chose his people before he made the world. The mystery of salvation originated in the timeless mind of God (2 Thessalonians 2:13; 2 Timothy 1:9). Before God created anything, his plan was in place to give eternal salvation to those who would believe on his Son. Before God created people, he knew sin would occur, he knew a penalty would have to be paid, and he knew that he himself (in his Son) would pay it.

Election is in Christ because of his sacrifice on our behalf. We have blessings and election only because of what Christ has done for us. Election is done for a specific purpose—that we would be holy and without fault in his eyes. What God began in eternity past will be completed in eternity future. God’s purpose in choosing us was that we would live changed lives during our remaining time on earth. To be “holy” means to be set apart for God in order to reflect his nature. God chose us, and when we belong to him through Jesus Christ, God looks at us as though we had never sinned. Our appropriate responses are love, worship, and service—in thankfulness for his wonderful grace. We must never take our privileged status as a license for sin.

1:5 In his infinite love, God chose to adopt us as his own children. People were created to have fellowship with God (Genesis 1:26), but because of their sin, they forfeited that fellowship. Through Jesus’ sacrifice, God brought us back into his family and made us heirs along with Jesus (Romans 8:17). God did not do this as an emergency measure after sin engulfed creation; instead, this has been his unchanging plan from the beginning. Under Roman law, adopted children had the same rights and privileges as biological children. Even if they had been slaves, adopted children became full heirs in their new family. Paul used this term to show the strength and permanence of believers’ relationship to God. This adoption occurs through Jesus Christ, for only his sacrifice on our behalf enables us to receive what God intended for us.

1:6 God’s goal in the election of believers was that they would praise him. Therefore, the ultimate purpose of believers’ lives is to praise God because of his wonderful kindness. Without it, we would have no hope, and our lives would be nothing more than a few years on earth. Instead, we have purpose for living and hope of eternal life. His kindness was poured out on us. It was a free gift, not something we could earn or deserve. God’s favor to us is realized by our union with his dearly loved Son. We could say that God’s love for his only Son motivated him to have many more sons—each of whom would be like his Son (Romans 8:28-30) by being in his Son and by being conformed to his image.

1:7 All people are enslaved to sin, but God, so rich in kindness, purchased our freedom through the blood of his Son. Jesus paid the price to redeem us, to buy our freedom from sin. The purchase price was his blood. To speak of Jesus’ blood was an important first-century way of speaking of Christ’s death. Our freedom was costly—Jesus paid the price with his life. Through his death, Jesus released us from slavery and our sins are forgiven. When we believe, an exchange takes place. We give Christ our sins, and he gives us freedom and forgiveness. Our sin was poured into Christ at his crucifixion. His righteousness was poured into us at our conversion. God's forgiveness means that he no longer even remembers believers' past sins. We are completely forgiven. Jesus became the final and ultimate sacrifice for sin. Instead of an unblemished lamb slain on the altar, the perfect Lamb of God was slain on the cross, a sinless sacrifice so that our sins could be forgiven once and for all.

1:8 God's kindness is showered on believers. When God gives, he gives abundantly and extravagantly. In the phrase with all wisdom and understanding, the word "wisdom" is the ability to see life from God's perspective. Proverbs 9:10 teaches that the fear (respect and honor) of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. The word "understanding" could also be translated "insight," referring to the ability to discern the right action to take in any given situation. Wisdom and understanding are given to believers for them to know God's will.

1:9 Paul had been praising God's wonderful kindness in 1:7-8. Thoughts of kindness led Paul to praise God for the entire plan of salvation. God had purposed to offer salvation to humanity "before he made the world" (1:4). How this would happen had not been revealed (made clear, understood) until the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

What God "revealed" was his plan to bring people (both Jews and Gentiles) back into fellowship with himself through their faith in Christ and then to keep them with him for all eternity. Paul called this the secret plan which was centered on Christ. The word "secret" has two meanings in Hellenistic Greek. One meaning referred to something known to only a select few. The word described heathen religions or "mystery religions" with their secret rites and practices. As used in the Septuagint (a Greek version of the Jewish Old Testament writings), a second meaning of the word describes what God reveals (as in Daniel 2:19). The Jews used the word to describe some secret plan that God would reveal at the end of the age. In the New Testament, the word refers to a truth formerly hidden but now made known to people—in this case, to us, meaning all believers. As with our being chosen (1:4), so the revelation of the secret plan of salvation is according to God's good pleasure.

1:10 The Greek word oikonomia (translated bring everything together) refers to the management of a household or estate. In this context, it refers to large-scale management, as in administration or economy. In God's timing, God brings everything together under the authority of Christ. With his first coming, Christ completed part of this mystery, but there are promises yet to be fulfilled. The mystery of salvation does not end with a person's acceptance of Jesus Christ—God promises a glorious future in a glorious Kingdom (see Revelation 21–22). This time is unknown to everyone but God.

God is planning a universal reconciliation—all of creation will be reinstated to its rightful owner and creator. Just as Christ administered God's plan of redemption by carrying it out as a human on this earth, so he will ultimately be in charge of everything in heaven and on earth. All of creation (spiritual and material) will be brought back under one head.

Sin holds people in bondage. That fact is clearly established throughout Paul's letters. Sin has also caused all creation to fall from the perfect state in which God created it. The world physically decays and experiences conflict so that it cannot fulfill its intended purpose. One day God will liberate and transform all creation. Until then, it waits in eager expectation for the right time. Christ provided the means for this restoration. When the time arrives, all of creation (meaning every created thing and being) will be as God created it to be—perfect, eternal, and fulfilling its intended function to praise God.

This verse does not teach that God will eventually save everyone, although many would like to believe this. The doctrine of Universalism, as this belief is called, seems to make God a little easier to understand and a little less harsh on sinners. In the end, every knee will bow, but for some, it will be too late. Christ will bring those elected and saved, and all creation with them, to be united under him in this glorious Kingdom. Those who have refused to believe (whether Jews or Gentiles) will face the consequences of their unbelief (Matthew 25:31-46).

1:11 Up until this verse, Paul was speaking to Jews and Gentiles alike. In 2:11, Paul made a distinction between the backgrounds of the Jewish believers and Gentile believers. In verses 11-14, however, he identified the two separate groups with the pronouns he used. The wording in these verses includes both the first person (we, our) and the second person (you). The word "we" refers specifically to Jewish believers (Paul being one of them). While it is true that believing Jews and Gentiles alike will receive God's blessings, the Jews were called first (Romans 1:16); they were chosen. Christ will be the Head of all things (1:10), including a body of believers made up of Jews ("we") and Gentiles ("you," 1:13).

The Jews were chosen from the beginning and had received an inheritance from God that would ultimately be accomplished in Jesus Christ (born into the nation of Israel) and finalized at the end of time. God chose the Jews to be the people through whom the rest of the world could find salvation. But this did not mean that the entire Jewish nation would be saved; only those who receive Jesus Christ as their Messiah and Savior will receive God's blessings (see Romans 9–11). When God offered salvation to the Gentiles, he did not exclude the Jews. God's Kingdom will include all Jews and Gentiles who have accepted the offer of salvation. Both Jews and Gentiles will also make up the group that does not believe and so receives God's punishment. The inclusion of Jewish believers in salvation was the plan of God, for all things happen just as he decided long ago. In the same way that God planned for Israel to be the elect nation, he planned for the spiritual Israelites, the believers in Christ, to be an eternal gift to himself. As a refrain carried through from 1:5 and 1:9, Paul repeated that everything is under God's sovereign control. The words reinforce the certainty of these events. Because God controls everything, he will carry out his plan according to his purpose and will, bringing it to completion in his time.

1:12 The word we refers to Jewish believers—those who recognized their promised Messiah. The Jews were the first to trust in Christ. This could mean that ages before the arrival of Christ, the Jews had set their hope on their coming Messiah (see Acts 28:20), or it could mean that the Jews were the first to believe in Christ because the gospel was preached first to them (see, for example, John 1:11; 8:30; Acts 1:8; 3:26; 13:45-46).

1:13 Because the word “we” in 1:12 most likely refers to Jews, the words you also refer to Gentile believers who were identified as Christ's own along with the Jewish believers. The believers, both Jews and Gentiles, heard the truth (see also Colossians 1:5; 2 Timothy 2:15; James 1:18), also called the Good News. These people believed and were given the Holy Spirit. God marks his people as his own through the presence of the Holy Spirit in their lives. The Holy Spirit fills us with a sense of God's love (Romans 5:5), assures us that God has adopted us as his children (Romans 8:15-16), and helps us to manifest our Christlikeness. The Spirit is a once-and-for-all identification that gives us continued assurance that we are God's children, entitled to his riches and goodness, now as well as in eternity.

The Holy Spirit had been promised in the Old Testament (Isaiah 32:15; 44:3; Joel 2:28;) and was promised by Jesus to his disciples (John 14:16-17, 25-26; 15:26; 16:7-15; Acts 1:4-5; 2:38-39). After Christ returned to heaven, he would be spiritually present everywhere through the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit came so that God would be within his followers after Christ returned to heaven. At Pentecost (Acts 2) the Holy Spirit came upon all who believed in Jesus. Believers received the Holy Spirit when they received Jesus Christ. The transformation that the Holy Spirit makes in a believer's life (as described in Galatians 5:22-23) undeniably marks God's presence in and ownership of that life.

1:14 The word guarantee was used in ancient times to describe a down payment, promising that the buyer would complete the transaction and pay the full amount. The guarantee was binding. In the same way, the Holy Spirit is God's guarantee that he will give us everything he promised. He is the first payment of all the treasures that will be ours because he has purchased us to be his own people. The presence of the Holy Spirit in us demonstrates the genuineness of our faith, proves that we are God's children, and secures eternal life for us. His power works in us to transform us now, and what we experience now is a taste of the total change we will experience in eternity.

As a final ringing note echoing 1:6 (praising God) and 1:12 (praising Jesus Christ), Paul declared that the Holy Spirit's presence in believers is one more reason for us to praise our glorious God.

PAUL'S PRAYER FOR SPIRITUAL WISDOM / 1:15-23

As verses 3-14 are one long sentence in the Greek, so are verses 15-23. As verses 3-14 are an extended eulogy, verses 15-23 are an extended thanksgiving. Verses 15-16 are the thanksgiving proper; verses 17-19 are an intercessory prayer; verses 20-23 are a confession of praise for God's power.

1:15-17 After describing the glorious blessings given to believers (1:3-14), thoughts of the great promises of God led Paul to give praise and to pray for the church—the people chosen to receive those blessings. The phrase ever since I first heard of your strong faith in the Lord Jesus could mean that Paul had heard a good report of the Ephesians' growth in the faith. It could also be a way of including the believers in the surrounding churches. Paul knew the Ephesian church well but not all the surrounding churches. Yet he may have heard a positive report of all the churches in the area, and thus he could thank God for their faith and remember them in his prayers.

Paul never stopped thanking God for these believers. That Paul prayed for them constantly demonstrates personal attention. Paul was truly a prayer warrior—remembering the churches in his personal prayers: for example, the Romans (Romans 1:9), the Philippians (Philippians 1:3-4), the Colossians (Colossians 1:3-4), and the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians 1:2-3). Paul kept asking on behalf of these believers that God would give them spiritual wisdom and understanding. The Holy Spirit gives “wisdom” (see also 1:8)—the ability to see life from God’s perspective, to have discernment. He also gives “understanding,” which refers to enlightened understanding in their knowledge of God and the mysteries of divine truth. (See 1 Corinthians 2:14, 16 and Colossians 1:9.)

1:18 For the Jew, the heart was the core of personality, the total inner person, the center of thought and moral judgment. The imagery of hearts flooded with light pictures an ability to see the reality of our wonderful future. Believers look forward to a glorious inheritance (Colossians 1:5) as well as blessings in this present world (1:19; Colossians 1:27) because of an action by God in the past (those he called).

1:19-21 Paul prayed that the believers would begin to understand the incredible greatness of God’s power on behalf of those who believe him. Because of his power, believers know that:

- God is on their side, ready to help them meet each and every obstacle
- God’s power is never stagnant or out of commission—it is always actively working on their behalf
- God is always fighting against the forces of evil on believers’ behalf
- no human strength or spiritual power from the evil world (not even Satan himself) can deter or change God’s inherent power.

Only God’s power can change weak human beings into strong believers who are willing to sacrifice everything for the God who loves them. After impressively describing the completeness of God’s power, Paul pointed out three instances of God’s power: (1) he raised Christ from the dead, (2) he seated Christ in the place of honor in the heavenly realms, and (3) he is far above any ruler or authority. Christ has no equal and no rival. He is supreme over all other beings. These words ought to encourage believers, because the higher the honor of Christ, the Head, the higher the honor of his people.

1:22-23 Paul probably had a psalm in mind as he wrote these words. This alludes to Psalm 8:6, a kingly messianic psalm describing sovereign power and enthronement. Christ is the obvious application for the verse. Just as the psalm writer described people as having dominion on earth, so Paul described Christ as having authority over all of creation—all things (1 Corinthians 15:20-28). The church receives the benefit of his universal headship because the church is his body. Paul used the analogy elsewhere when he wrote about the interrelationships of believers in the church (Romans 12:4-5; 1 Corinthians 12:22-27; Colossians 1:18-19). This passage focuses on Christ as the head of that body, the church (see also 4:4, 12, 16; 5:30). The church is not a building (or all the church buildings on earth)—it includes all believers in a living, growing, moving, working organism deriving existence and power from Christ. The church obeys Christ's commands to carry out his work in the world.

All believers, as part of Christ's body, are filled by Christ who fills everything everywhere with his presence. Christ fills all things with himself and with his blessings, bringing all believers to the state of obedience and praise for which God created them (as in 1:10; 4:10, 13, 16). The church is being filled with and by Christ, who fills all things totally. Thus, Christ, who is the fullness of God (Colossians 1:19), finds full expression in the church.

By Christ's resurrection and exaltation, he is head over all things for the church. Christ fills the church and then uses the gifts he bestows to fulfill his mission—revealing himself to the world and drawing people to himself by that witness. The image of the body shows the church's unity. Each member is involved with all the others as they go about doing Christ's work on earth. We should not attempt to work, serve, or worship on our own. We need the entire body.

EPHESIANS 2

MADE ALIVE WITH CHRIST / 2:1-10

The style of using lengthy sentences continues from chapter 1 into this chapter, in which verses 1-7 are one sentence in the Greek. To help understand the first seven verses, note that the subject of that Greek sentence is “God” (2:4) and that there are three main verbs: (1) “gave us life” (2:5), (2) “raised us from the dead” (2:6), and (3) “seated with” (2:6). The object of each of these verbs is “us,” referring to believers. God has made us alive, raised us up, and seated us with Christ.

2:1 This verse is a continuation of 1:19-23, which speaks of the resurrection power imparted to Christ’s body, the church. These believers once were dead and doomed before they met Christ. This refers not only to eventual physical death or to the sinners’ ultimate eternal state; it also refers to a very real “death” in this life. People who are spiritually dead have no communication with God. These people are physically alive, but their sins have rendered them spiritually unresponsive, alienated from God, and thus incapable of experiencing the full life that God could give them.

2:2-3 Sin reveals spiritual death but is acted out by people who are physically alive. Before the believers came to Christ, they used to live in their sins. They could not and did not follow God. Paul described three marks of unbelievers:

1. They lived like the rest of the world, referring to the world’s accepted, but immoral, lifestyles and godless motives. People who live like the world that is full of sin cannot also follow Jesus (Romans 12:2; Galatians 1:4).
2. They obeyed Satan. The passage focuses on Satan’s reality as an evil power with a certain amount of control in the world. The Bible pictures Satan as ruling an evil spiritual kingdom—the demons and those who are against Christ. He is the mighty prince of the power of the air referring to the space around the earth, and thus, this is Satan’s sphere of influence. Though Satan’s influence is great among unbelievers, his power is limited because he is a defeated enemy. He cannot separate believers from the love of God. Satan is also called the spirit at work in the hearts of those who refuse to obey God. People who have not surrendered to God or decided to obey are energized by the power of evil. The force of the evil spirit is seen in those who actively disobey God both in faith and action (2 Thessalonians

1:8). These people live in constant rebellion and opposition to God.

3. They followed the passions and desires of their evil nature. All of us (Jews and Gentiles alike) were at one time separated from God because of disobedience, born with an evil nature. That nature puts us under God's anger. When we become believers, our sinful nature still exists. But when we submit our lives to the Holy Spirit, he transforms us and our sinful natures. This is a supernatural process. We must never underestimate the power of our sinful nature, and we must never attempt to subdue it in our own strength. God provides for victory over sin—he sends the Holy Spirit to live in us and give us power. But our ability to restrain the desires of the sinful nature depends on how much we're willing to depend on God and his mercy (2:4-5).

2:4-5 The first three verses of this chapter present a hopeless humanity—trapped in sin, under Satan's power, unable to save itself. Then follow the small but glorious words but God. Behind those two words lies a cosmic plan so huge in scope and so vast in love that the human mind cannot fully comprehend it—all we can do is humbly receive it. Instead of leaving sinful humanity to live worthless and hopeless lives ending only in death, God acted on behalf of humanity because he is so rich in mercy. As God is rich in kindness (1:7), so he is rich in mercy. The word “rich” indicates the bountiful nature of God's mercy—beyond our comprehension, an inexhaustible storehouse. What is “mercy”? It is an attribute of God, sometimes called “lovingkindness” or “compassion.” This word describes the outworking of God's love toward people and is shown in his lovingkindness toward them even though they do not deserve it (Psalm 51:1; Jeremiah 9:24; Hosea 2:19; Jonah 4:2).

God also acted on behalf of humanity because he loved us so very much. The Greek word for love, agape, is used. It means the selfless love that seeks the best for others. While God could have simply destroyed all people because of their sin, he chose instead to show mercy and love. While we once were dead because of our sins (2:1), God gave us life when he raised Christ from the dead. That we have been given life means that we are “saved” (this phrase is repeated in 2:8 and elaborated on there). When Christ rose from the dead, so did all the members of his body by virtue of God's uniting them with Christ. The only way spiritually dead people can have a relationship with God is to be made alive. And God is the only person who can accomplish that, which he did through his Son, Jesus Christ. Christ defeated sin and death through his death and resurrection, thus offering spiritual life to those dead in sins.

The verb form have been saved refers to a past event (accomplished by Christ because of God's special favor) with present and ongoing results. Believers have already passed from death to life. Salvation is not something to be waited for but something that has already been delivered.

2:6 In addition to being given life (2:5), believers are also raised from the dead. Christ was raised from death and left the tomb—an act accomplished by God's power alone. Believers have also been “raised.” In addition to assurance of physical resurrection and glorification at the end of the age, believers participate in a new “resurrection” life from the moment they believe (see Colossians 2:12).

Finally, believers are seated with him in the heavenly realms. Christ has taken his seat at the right hand of the Father, indicating his finished work and his victory over sin. Christ has been exalted by God's great power (1:20). Christians have tended to see this seating with Christ as a future event, based on Jesus' words in Matthew 19:28 and Luke 22:30 as well as other verses that point to our future reign with Christ (such as 2 Timothy 2:12; Revelation 20:4; 22:5). Yet Ephesians teaches that we are seated with Christ now. We share with Christ in his victory now. This view of our present status should help us face our work and trials with greater hope! Believers, as heirs of the Kingdom along with Christ, are spiritually exalted from the moment of salvation. We have a new citizenship—in heaven, no longer just on earth: The power that raised and exalted Christ also raised and exalted his people because we are one with him. That same power works daily in believers, helping us live and work for God during our time in the world.

2:7 Here is the final and definitive reason for God's action on behalf of humanity, his reason for making us alive, raising us, and seating us along with his Son in the heavenly realms. God wants quite simply to point to us as examples of the incredible wealth of his favor and kindness. The Greek word for “point to” comes from legal terminology. God closes the case by presenting the astounding evidence of his church, his people. The church could only exist by God's love; the fact of its existence, the fact that people have been offered salvation, reveals the abundance of God's favor and kindness (see also 1:7; 2:4). Again, this was accomplished only through Christ Jesus. Without Christ's sacrifice, there would be no hope for a relationship with God.

2:8 Our salvation comes from God's special favor alone. It was appropriated when people believed. However, lest anyone should think that belief is a necessary work that must be performed in order to receive salvation, Paul added that people can't take credit for believing, for it too is a gift from God. Paul is firm that absolutely nothing is of our own doing—not salvation, not grace, not even the faith exercised to receive salvation. Instead, everything is the gift of God. Salvation does not come from our self-reliance or individualism but from God’s initiative. It is a gift to be thankfully accepted (see Romans 3:24-28; 1 Corinthians 1:29-31; Galatians 2:16).

2:9 We can’t take credit for our salvation (2:8), and it is not a reward for the good things we have done. In other words, people can do nothing to earn salvation, and a person’s faith itself also is not to be considered a “work” or grounds that anyone should boast.

People find it difficult to accept something so free, so willingly given, so available to anyone. We want to feel as though we did something, that we somehow earned our salvation by our merit. That was how the Judaizers (false teachers who said Christians had to obey all the Jewish laws) regarded their laws and why they tried to impose them on the Gentiles—there had to be a certain amount of law keeping and goodness on people’s part in order for them to receive salvation. But Paul’s words are unmistakable—if salvation is by God’s grace and is accepted through faith, then it is “not a reward.” If salvation could be earned by good works, then people would, by nature, “boast” about their good works, compare the goodness of their works to others’ good works, and do good only to boast about it. Then, what would be “good enough” for salvation? But no one could ever be good enough to please a holy God. He casts aside all human effort and pride by offering salvation for free to all people by simple acceptance. People are given salvation on the grounds of God’s grace alone.

2:10 But wait, there’s more. We are God’s masterpiece. Salvation is something only God can do—it is his powerful, creative work in us. People are re-created into new people, and those new people form a new creation—the church.

The verb created is used only of God—for only God can truly create. As he created the universe from nothing, so he creates new, alive, spiritual beings from the old, dead, sinful creatures we were (2 Corinthians 5:17). Then God forms believers into a unified body, his church (see 2:15; 4:24; Colossians 3:10). In Christ Jesus emphasizes the source of this creation, as in 2:6-7—Christ has provided it.

People become Christians through God’s undeserved favor (his grace), not as the result of any efforts, abilities, intelligent choices, personal characteristics, or acts of service. Out of gratitude for this free gift, however, believers will seek to do good things—to help and serve others with kindness, love, and gentleness. While no action or work we do can help us obtain salvation, God’s intention is that our salvation will result in acts of service. We are saved not merely for our own benefit but to serve Christ and build up the church (4:12). This solves the so-called conflict between faith and works. Works do not produce salvation but are the evidence of salvation (see James 1:22; 2:14-26).

The Greek word translated do means “to walk about in.” We move ahead in this life of grace doing the good works that God planned for us long ago. The new life that God gives cannot help but express itself in good works. This does not necessarily mean that God has set up all the specific good works each person will do—although there would be no point arguing against the possibility of our omniscient God doing just that. Just as God planned salvation in Jesus Christ before the foundation of the world, so he planned that believers should do good to others (see 1 Timothy 6:18; Titus 2:7; 1 Peter 2:12).

ONENESS AND PEACE IN CHRIST / 2:11-18

Christ Jesus set individuals free from sin and death by making them alive through faith in him (2:1-10), but there is more to the story. Jesus saved individuals of all races and backgrounds in order to bring them into unity as his body, his church. There existed a huge gulf between Jews and Gentiles (non-Jews). God was going to bring these two distinct groups together by drawing believers in Christ from among the Jews and from among the Gentiles.

2:11 The Jews had the privilege of being God’s chosen nation to whom he had given his covenant promises (Deuteronomy 7:6). One of the signs of his covenant was circumcision. God required circumcision as a sign of obedience to him, as a sign of belonging to his covenant people because once circumcised, the man would be identified as a Jew forever, and as a symbol of “cutting off” the old life of sin, purifying one’s heart, and dedicating oneself to God. More than any other practice, circumcision separated God’s people from their Egyptian and Canaanite neighbors.

Pious Jews considered all Gentiles to be outsiders because they were uncircumcised. The Jews erred in being proud of their circumcision and believing that circumcision was sufficient to make them godly without the necessity of inner renewal; in other words, it affected only their bodies and not their hearts (see Paul’s discussion of this in Romans 2:25-29; also see Galatians 5:6). In this section in Ephesians, Paul focused on the Gentiles, calling the Gentile Christians not to forget their former condition.

2:12 Compared to the Jews, the Gentiles had five distinct disadvantages:

1. They were living apart from Christ, having had no expectation of a Messiah to save them.
2. They were excluded from God's people, Israel. Gentiles could never fully partake of the spiritual privileges promised to Israel, God's chosen people. While Gentiles could become Jews after an extensive training period, followed by circumcision and baptism, the sense of "exclusion" was never fully removed. Gentiles could never truly be citizens of Israel.
3. They did not know the promises God had made to Israel. For Paul, the covenant promises were the basis for Israel's distinctive. The Gentiles were "foreigners," meaning that they had no share or part in the promises.
4. They were without God. The Gentiles had many gods, but they were without the one true God. They lived entirely and only in this evil world. Without God, the world was all they had.
5. They were without hope. There was no hope for the Gentiles to find the one true God or to obtain anything beyond physical life in this world. The pagan philosophers' theories about life after death were at best vague and supplied no way to atone for evil committed during a person's life. They had no "divine promise" and, thus, no basis for hope.

This was a bleak description indeed. Fortunately, it does not end here, for God himself intervened.

2:13 The two little words but now reveal God's intervention from heaven to earth and the entire story of redemption. The words far and near describe the position of Gentiles and Jews in relation to God. To take those who were far away and bring them near to him could only happen because of the blood of Christ. Salvation could come only through Jesus' death. "Without the shedding of blood, there is no forgiveness of sins" (Hebrews 9:22).

2:14 Christ Jesus, through his death, destroyed the barriers that had separated Jews and Gentiles, making peace between both groups. Even more than making peace, Christ reconciled them both to God. Those who believed in him would be made into one people, Christians. Paul described the peace that Christ had made between Jews and Gentiles as breaking down the wall of hostility that used to separate them. It was no secret that hostility existed between the two groups, a cultural and religious hostility that no one could bridge—no one but God. This "dividing wall" alludes to the wall in the Jewish Temple that separated the court of the Gentiles from the Temple proper, which only Jews could enter. The Jewish historian Josephus wrote that on this wall was an inscription in Greek and Latin: “No foreigner may enter within the barricade that surrounds the sanctuary and enclosure. Anyone who is caught doing so will have himself to blame for his ensuing death” (see Acts 21:28-29). This “breaking down” refers symbolically to Christ’s reconciliation.

2:15-16 The “dividing wall” (2:14) was also pictured in the Jewish law itself, for the law was the means by which the Jews justified themselves before God and excluded the Gentiles (Deuteronomy 31:11-13; Isaiah 51:7-8). Christ himself said that he did not come to abolish the law but to fulfill it (Matthew 5:17). Christ fulfilled the Old Testament law because that law (especially the ceremonial law with its regulations for sacrifices) foreshadowed his coming. In his life on earth, he obeyed and supported the intent of the law as God’s revelation and standard for people’s behavior (see Matthew 5:21-48). Paul also supports the moral and ethical purpose of the law as valid to guide us (Romans 3:19-31; Galatians 3:24). But in his death and resurrection, Jesus annulled the law—that is, he made it ineffective. The law was annulled because of its ineffectiveness to make people right with God.

All have sinned; neither Gentiles nor Jews are capable of keeping God’s law. All need a Savior. That Savior came, died, and rose again, fulfilling and abolishing the law as the way of salvation. Jesus then opened to both Jews and Gentiles a way to God by faith in him (John 14:6). By offering salvation to all kinds of people, Christ could create one new person from the two groups. In Christ there are no longer Jews and Gentiles but a mixture of Jews and Gentiles, combined as Christians, who make up the body of which he is the Head. By doing so, Christ also could make peace between Jews and Gentiles—that is, in the church. This reconciliation could occur only by means of his death because Jesus’ death was the substitutionary sacrifice fulfilling the demands of the law, taking its punishment in our place. Not only were Jews and Gentiles reconciled to God, but they were also reconciled to each other, for Jesus’ death on the cross put to death any remaining hostility between them. There was no necessity for further hostility other than their refusal to accept Christ’s reconciliation.

Because Christ broke down the dividing wall, believing Jews and Gentiles can have unity with one another in Christ. Because of Christ’s death, believers are one (2:14); we are reconciled to one another (2:16); we have access to the Father by the Holy Spirit (2:18); we are no longer foreigners or aliens to God (2:19); we are all being built into a holy temple with Christ as our chief cornerstone (2:20-21).

2:17 Continuing the theme of 2:14-16, this peace preached by Christ includes peace with God and peace between Jews (the chosen people, those who were near) and Gentiles (those who were far away and without God, 2:12). In these words, Paul may have been alluding to Isaiah 52:7 and Isaiah 57:19. According to the sequence of the previous verses, Jesus bringing this Good News referred to (1) Jesus' coming after the resurrection to preach to the apostles directly (see Luke 24:36; John 20:19, 21, 26); and (2) Jesus' coming through the Spirit to preach to all people. The Jews were near to God because they already knew of him through the Scriptures and worshiped him in their religious ceremonies. The Gentiles were far away because they knew little or nothing about God. Because neither group could be saved by good deeds, knowledge, or sincerity, both needed to hear about the salvation available through Jesus Christ. Both Jews and Gentiles are now free to come to God through Christ.

2:18 It is only because of what Christ has done for us (through Jesus' sacrifice on the cross) that all of us (referring to believing Jews and Gentiles) may come to the Father through the same Holy Spirit. The words "may come" picture being presented to a king in his throne room. Through Christ, the believer is ushered into God's very presence (see 3:12). The One we come to see is not only the King but "the Father"—the One who has adopted us as his very own children (Romans 8:15; Galatians 4:6).

Christ provides the access to the Father by one Spirit (the Holy Spirit), who helps us when we pray (Romans 8:26-27) and who baptizes and unifies us into one body (1 Corinthians 12:13). Note the three distinct persons of the Trinity mentioned in this verse. All people can come to God through Christ by means of the Holy Spirit.

A TEMPLE FOR THE LORD / 2:19-22

All believers are citizens of God's Kingdom and members of his household. Many barriers divide us from other Christians: age, appearance, intelligence, political persuasion, economic status, race, theological perspective. One of the surest ways to stifle Christ's love is to be friendly only with those people who are similar to us. Fortunately, Christ has knocked down the barriers and has placed all believers into one family. His cross should be the focus of our unity. The Holy Spirit helps us look beyond the barriers to the unity we are called to enjoy. People can see that God is love and that Christ is Lord as we live in harmony with each other and in accordance with what God says in his Word.

2:19 The Gentiles are no longer strangers and foreigners. These words describe people who live in a country other than their own without any of the rights of citizenship in that country. The Gentiles were “outsiders” in relation to the Jews, as well as to any hope (without Christ) for a relationship with God (2:12). That was their old position. Because of Christ, however, the Gentiles became citizens with all who have been called to be God’s holy people. Jews and Gentiles who put their faith in Jesus Christ as their Savior become members of God’s family. (See Philippians 3:20; Hebrews 3:2-6.)

2:20 God’s house is built on a solid foundation—the apostles and the prophets. Paul used a common metaphor to describe Christ—the cornerstone. This alludes to Psalm 118:22 and Isaiah 8:14; 28:16 (see also Romans 9:32-33; 1 Peter 2:4-8). Paul expanded the metaphor, describing the apostles and prophets as the “foundation.” Every well-built structure with a firm foundation has a cornerstone. A cornerstone is a valued architectural piece. Stonemasons choose just the right rock. The cornerstone anchors the building and gives all the walls their line. Jesus is the cornerstone of God’s building. The “prophets” here are probably the New Testament prophets (see 3:5; 4:11) because “apostles” are listed first. These apostles and prophets received and believed in Jesus Christ as their Messiah; then they took the gospel message out to the world.

2:21 The body of believers, the church, has been joined together and continues to rise (or grow). Each part of the building, each believer, fits perfectly into the building, all the pieces being aligned with the cornerstone. The structure is not yet complete; it will not be complete until the day that Christ Jesus returns. The building’s purpose is also described: it is a holy temple for the Lord. The church becomes a holy temple because of the presence of the holy God. The word used for “temple” here refers to what was the inner sanctuary (the Most Holy Place) in the Jewish Temple. The union of God with people, and the unity of previously alienated people with one another, could only occur through Christ.

2:22 It is only through Christ that the Gentiles could be joined with Jewish believers as part of this dwelling where God lives by his Spirit. In the Old Testament, God’s “dwelling” referred either to the nation of Israel or to the Tabernacle or Temple. But in the New Testament, this dwelling is the whole body of believers, the church, made up of both Jews and Gentiles. There would not be two “churches”—one made up of Jewish believers and one of Gentile believers. Instead, there should be no barriers, no divisions, no basis for discrimination. We all belong to Christ and share fully in his blessings. He lives in us (corporately and individually) by his Spirit.

EPHESIANS 3

GOD'S SECRET PLAN REVEALED / 3:1-13

Paul had been arrested in Jerusalem and, eventually, had been imprisoned because he took a stand for the equality of Jews and Gentiles as Christians (believers in Christ). The Jewish antagonists saw Paul's teaching as radical and destructive to Temple practices. Thus, Paul was writing here that he had been imprisoned for the sake of Gentiles.

3:1 The religious leaders in Jerusalem, who had felt scandalized by Jesus' teachings and didn't believe he was the Messiah, pressured the Romans to arrest Paul because he was preaching salvation to the Gentiles. The Jews brought Paul to trial for treason and for causing rebellion among the Jews. They used Trophimus, the Ephesian Gentile convert, as a ploy to arrest Paul. Paul had appealed for his case to be heard by the emperor, and he was awaiting trial (see Acts 21:21, 28; 28:16-31). Yet Paul knew that his imprisonment was by God's will—therefore, he called himself a prisoner of Christ Jesus—not of the Jews, not of the Romans, but of Christ Jesus himself (see 1 Corinthians 4:1; Philippians 1:1; 2 Timothy 1:8).

3:2-3 Verses 2-13 are a parenthesis; he completes his thought from 3:1 in 3:14. Here Paul explained more fully his ministry to the Gentiles. Paul knew that the Ephesians and the believers in surrounding cities knew that God had given Paul this special ministry of announcing his favor to the Gentiles. God had assigned to Paul the special work of preaching the Good News to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15).

That the Gentiles could be included in God's grace is called a secret plan (Paul described this amazing new truth at length in 2:11-22). This "secret plan" was at one time hidden but now revealed (see 1:9). The plan was hidden, not because only a few could understand it, but because it was hidden until Christ came. God had revealed this secret plan to Paul in a direct communication. Paul had refused to believe in Christ and had persecuted anyone who did (Acts 9:1-2). God got hold of Paul and revealed that Jesus Christ truly was the promised Messiah of the Jews and the light to the Gentiles too. Both Jews and Gentiles would be included in the church.

3:4 When a church received a letter from Paul or one of the other apostles (such as the letters from Peter, James, and Jude), a church leader would read the letter aloud to the assembled congregation. Paul wrote to this leader and to the congregation, explaining that as he read what Paul had written, the listeners would understand what Paul knew about this plan regarding Christ. Why did Paul have such insight into this secret plan about Christ, and how could he explain it so clearly? Because it had been revealed to him by God himself!

3:5 God's method of communicating with the Israelites was to reveal his words to a chosen prophet, who would in turn teach the people. The previous generations in the time of the Old Testament prophets did not clearly understand the secret plan which has now been revealed by the Holy Spirit to his holy apostles and prophets. God's plan was hidden from previous generations, not because God wanted to keep something from his people, but because he would reveal it to everyone in his perfect timing (see also Colossians 1:25-26). God planned to have Jews and Gentiles comprise one body, the church. These "prophets" are New Testament prophets (see also 2:20; 4:11). The phrase "by the Holy Spirit" focuses on divine revelation and inspiration. The revealing of this plan to one of the "holy apostles" is recorded in Acts 10. Peter received a dream making clear to him that the gospel message was meant not for the Jews alone but also for Gentiles.

3:6 In case anyone missed his point, Paul explained exactly what that secret plan entailed. While the early prophets had written of the inclusion of Gentiles with Jews (see, for example, Isaiah 49:6; 56:6-7;), their writings were interpreted that the Gentiles could become proselytes. The extent of this inclusion and the radical change—the Jews and Gentiles having an equal share—was not even considered. No one ever knew this until God revealed it to Paul and the other New Testament apostles and prophets. This inclusion of Gentiles with Jews can happen because both have believed the Good News. Also, both are part of the same body and so are united into one unit under Christ, the Head. Finally, both enjoy together the promise of blessings through Christ Jesus. They will be fellow partakers and copartners in receiving the coming blessings promised in God's Kingdom (2 Timothy 1:1).

3:7 The unity Paul described above can only happen when the gospel message is preached and believed. This Good News refers to the message of Jesus Christ as Messiah and Savior of all who believe—whether Jews or Gentiles. Paul had been given the wonderful privilege of serving God by spreading that message. Paul did not seek this job description, nor was it given to him on the basis of earned degree or merit.

Paul explained that his servanthood was by God's special favor and mighty power. Paul had actually been working for the "other side" when God called him—Paul had rejected Jesus as the Messiah and had actively persecuted Christians. Obviously God had not called Paul on the basis of his goodness or apparent faithfulness! God made Paul a key messenger of the gospel in the early days of the church. Yet Paul realized that he could not have fulfilled this mission without God's favor and power within him.

3:8 When Paul described himself as the least deserving Christian there is, he meant that God's favor alone had saved him, the one who had hated and persecuted all who followed Jesus. Nothing in Paul merited such favor; Paul knew this and was utterly amazed at what God had done. God had chosen him and had saved him for the special joy of telling the Gentiles about the endless treasures available to them in Christ. Paul considered telling others about Christ to be like sharing "treasures." To the Gentiles, who had been excluded by the Jews from participation in God's Kingdom (2:12-13), these treasures were unfathomable.

3:9 Paul's job was to explain to everyone this plan (see 3:2). All people were to know that it pleased God at this time to make known or bring to light his secret plan (explained in 3:6). The carrying out of this explanation of the mystery occurred as Paul and the other apostles taught God's great purpose in Christ and as the church itself took root and grew. For Paul, explaining God's plan was at the core of his selection as an apostle. Paul understood that he was born at a specific time to fulfill a specific purpose—revealing this mystery that God knew the plan all along but had kept it a secret until the appropriate time. God, the Creator of all things, was at work both in the former creation and the new creation. The same God is at work, and his plan was in place before the creation of the world.

3:10 God's plan was to build a church by uniting Jews and Gentiles as believers in Jesus Christ. Through this joining of believers together in his church, God's purpose would be powerfully displayed. God would show his wisdom in all its rich variety, making it known to all the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms. "Rulers and authorities" refers to both good and evil angels. (In 1:21, the words referred to angelic powers; in 6:12, they refer to demonic powers.) All powers in the heavenlies, whether evil or good, will receive their understanding of God's great mystery from humans. God builds his church on earth from saved sinners, who, through God's grace and mercy, received their salvation through Jesus Christ's death on the cross. No angel or demon can comprehend what God has done.

3:11 God, "Creator of all things" (3:9), has always been in control of his creation. The plan of salvation, the secret plan of the church, and the revelation of his wisdom across all the realms of creation will occur according to his plan from all eternity. God's plan did not arise as an emergency measure when Adam sinned; it did not occur because God somehow lost control. God has always been in control, and his eternal purposes will always be accomplished. The central theme of this letter is God's great work of joining Jews and Gentiles together in a unified body—the church. God could only accept sinful people through a sacrifice that would cover their sins. Jesus Christ gave that sacrifice—himself—through his death on the cross.

3:12 Only because of Christ and people's faith in him can they approach the holy God. Paul described the most awesome privilege any mere human could have—to be able to come fearlessly into God's presence. Most of us would be apprehensive in the presence of a powerful ruler, but faith gives us confidence. The Greek word translated "approach" implies a formal introduction into the presence of a king. Thanks to Jesus Christ, Christians can enter directly into God's presence through prayer, assured of his glad welcome (see also Hebrews 4:16; 10:19-22).

3:13 Because of the tremendous scope of God's plan and because God gave believers access to him in freedom and confidence (3:12), Paul asked his readers to not despair because of his suffering. Paul had been imprisoned for championing the ministry of the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 21:27-36). He could truly say to these Gentile believers that his sufferings were for you, but he asked that they not be discouraged. Instead, they should feel honored and encouraged. Why should Paul's suffering make the Ephesians feel honored? If Paul had not preached the gospel, he would not be in jail—but then the Ephesians might not have heard the Good News and been converted. Just as a mother endures the pain of childbirth in order to bring new life into the world, Paul endured the pain of persecution in order to bring new believers to Christ.

Obedying Christ is never easy. He requires you to take up your cross and follow him (Matthew 16:24). That means being willing to endure pain so that God's message of salvation can reach the entire world. We should feel honored that others have suffered and sacrificed for us so that we might reap the benefit. Because he understood that the Creator God was completely in control, Paul also understood that God was working his will even through his imprisonment and suffering. In this, the Ephesian believers could “glory.”

PAUL’S PRAYER FOR SPIRITUAL EMPOWERING / 3:14-21

Paul’s prayer for the Ephesians is that they be united by the Spirit, indwelt by Christ, and filled with all the fullness of God’s love.

3:14-15 The phrase, when I think of the wisdom and scope of God’s plan, actually continues the thought begun in 3:1. Overwhelmed by the blessings given to Jews and Gentiles and the privilege of sharing this newly revealed “secret plan,” Paul exclaimed, I fall to my knees. The following words are his prayer for the Ephesians. While it was common among Jews to stand in prayer, kneeling revealed the earnestness and humble submission that Paul felt as he spoke these words (see Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36).

Paul praised God as both the Father and the Creator of everything. When his children kneel before him in prayer, they come to the God who is in complete and ultimate control. These words set the tone for the prayer that follows.

3:16 This beautiful prayer for the Ephesian believers (3:16-21) includes some of the most loved verses in the New Testament. Paul knelt before the Father (3:14); then he prayed that God would grant certain petitions made on behalf of these Christians. Paul had previously written of the immeasurable riches of God in 1:7 and 2:7; here he prayed that from his glorious, unlimited resources, God would grant his requests. Because the riches of God’s glory are without measure, Paul prayed that the answers would be given to believers without measure and beyond their comprehension.

Paul first prayed that God would grant mighty inner strength to these believers. The Greek word for “strength” is the opposite of “despair” in 3:13. We find the source of this strength in the Holy Spirit. God sent the Holy Spirit to be with and within his followers after Christ had returned to heaven. The Spirit would comfort them, guide them to know his truth, remind them of Jesus’ words, point out when they did not obey, give them the right words to say, and fill them with power to do good (John 14–16). After Pentecost (Acts 2:1-4), God made the Holy Spirit available to all who believed in Jesus. We receive the Holy Spirit when we believe in Jesus Christ as Savior. The Spirit provides power for our new lives.

3:17-18 The Greek word translated at home conveys the idea of settling down, taking up permanent residence. Christ finds his home in believers’ hearts. The “heart” in the Bible always refers to the center of a person’s emotions and will. Christ takes up permanent residence, changing a person’s “heart” and, consequently, his or her words and thoughts. Christ takes up residence in the hearts of those who trust in him. Christ’s indwelling presence and the Spirit’s strengthening power also help believers’ roots to go down deep into the soil of God’s marvelous love. In Greek, this clause connects with 3:18, suggesting that by being “rooted” we will then be able to understand the magnitude of God’s love. “Rooted” brings to mind the stable image of trees.

Paul prayed that this firm rooting of love would give all believers the power to understand the vastness of Christ’s love. Christ’s love is total, complete, eternal, and all-encompassing. It reaches every corner of our experience. This passage shows that even as we seek to grasp an understanding of Christ’s love, we will never understand it completely, for it is beyond our comprehension. It is wide—covering the breadth of our own experience and reaching out to the whole world. It is long—continuing the length of our lives and on into eternity. It is high—rising to the heights of our celebration and elation. His love is deep—reaching to the depths of discouragement, despair, and even death.

3:19 Paul prayed in 3:18 that the believers might “understand” Christ’s love. Here he prayed that they might experience it. Paul also recognized that Christ’s love is so great that people will never fully understand it. Believers cannot rationally explain Christ’s love; they can only know it by experiencing it. This knowledge requires a continuous growing experience.

As believers get to know Christ better, they will be filled with the fullness of life and power that comes from God. This “fullness” means that there is nothing lacking in our relationship to the Father. God pours his love and power into believers, making us complete for this life and readying us for the life to come. This “fullness” is fully expressed only in Christ (Colossians 2:9-10). We need not look anywhere else. The ultimate goal is for believers to become Christlike individuals, filled so totally with Christ that he is seen in us.

3:20 Our thoughts include more than we dare to ask in our prayers; our dreams exceed what we consciously desire. God answers prayer; he even answers unspoken prayers. God can act beyond our ability to ask or even imagine. Paul uses superlatives to drive home his point: God is able to do infinitely more than we would ever dare to ask or hope—more than we would dare to imagine. God is far above and beyond our finite minds. God is able because of his mighty power. To the unfathomable depths of Christ’s love is added the exceeding abundance of his power. Believers can claim Christ’s great love (3:19) and know that his power is at work within us through the Holy Spirit.

3:21 God alone deserves glory, for he alone is glorious. The word “glory” refers to the wonderful and awe-inspiring but indescribable presence of God himself. Glory is given to God in the church. The church, God’s creation, exists to glorify him. The church is the sphere of the outworking of God’s plan here on earth (3:10). The ability to give glory to God comes only in Christ Jesus, for he brought the church into existence through his sacrifice for sin and his resurrection from the dead. This glory will be made known through endless ages.

This doxology—prayer of praise to God—ends part 1 of Ephesians. Some have thought that this doxology was originally the end of this letter. More likely, Paul simply broke into spontaneous words of praise growing out of his prayer (3:14-19). In the first section, Paul described the timeless role of the church. In part 2 (chapters 4–6), he explained how church members should live in order to bring about the unity God wants. As in most of his books, Paul first laid a doctrinal foundation and then followed with practical applications of the truths he presented.

EPHESIANS 4

UNITY IN THE BODY OF CHRIST / 4:1-16

Here the focus changes from theological to practical. Paul has explained to his readers God's great mystery and plan for his church, and he has prayed an awe-inspiring prayer that they might know all of Christ's love and all of his blessings. The remainder of the letter contains Paul's plea to live out the grace and unity the believers had received through Christ. Verses 1-6 are on unity; verses 7-16 are on diversity in the church. The challenges for churches today parallel the challenges that faced first-century churches like the one in Ephesus. We must remain unified as believers, incorporating our diversity so that we can serve and glorify our Lord.

4:1 The word therefore connects this sentence to Paul's words in the previous chapters—the great plan God has revealed. Paul was imprisoned in Rome for serving the Lord (that is, his imprisonment was a result of his preaching the gospel, see Acts 21:27–22:22). Despite the chains that bound him physically and kept him from traveling, Paul continued to write, in this case urging the Ephesian believers to lead a life worthy of your calling and to remember that they had been called by God (1:4). Their “call” to salvation was accomplished through Christ's humble act of dying on the cross for our sin. It was also a “call” to service for God.

How can one live worthy of the calling? The Greek word for “worthy” refers to a balance, as on scales. Thus, believers are to live “in balance” with their calling. How they act should match what they believe. Remembering Christ's sacrifice should cause believers to live for his glory in every area of their lives. The following verses describe how to do this.

4:2 This verse lists four characteristics of a person who is “worthy of the calling.” Believers make up the church, the body of Christ. Thus, believers, by privilege of their responsibility, must be together, serve together, and worship together. The following characteristics help create and maintain smooth relationships among people.

Both the Greek and Roman cultures considered humility and gentleness to be weak character traits showing a lack of self-respect. The Old Testament, however, paved the way for a positive connotation for humility because God “lives with” the humble (Isaiah 57:15). Jesus exalted humility as a virtue (John 13:13-15). Christ expected his followers to be humble not only before God but toward one another—serving one another and not putting themselves “above” anyone else. Christ is our example; thus, we must also be humble.

Believers are also to be gentle. Humility is an attitude, and gentleness is the action derived from it. Gentle people do not attempt to grab for positions of importance or assert authority over others. Gentle people accept God’s dealings with them without arguing or resisting. Gentle people are considerate of others. If everyone in a church had the characteristics of humility and gentleness, conflicts would disappear and members would have strength and power in their service.

Patience conveys the quality of being able to handle one another’s faults and failures and refusing to avenge wrongs. No one is ever going to be perfect here on earth, so believers must be patient with each other despite their faults.

Making allowance for each other’s faults is the action side of patience, emphasizing the willingness to forgive. To show patience requires love, which ought to be the guiding principle for all of a believer’s actions, even when natural differences and clashes occur. Bearing with one another presupposes that, at times, loving others will be a burden. Believers must be willing to carry the load without expecting reward, thanks, or return.

4:3 For believers to be united is only possible when the Holy Spirit acts in believers’ lives—the Spirit originates and sustains oneness among believers. Love for each other, which the presence of the Spirit causes, makes peace possible. To bind themselves together with peace includes the idea of uniting the members into one body. This “bond” holds people together, like string or twine. Peace functions as the “binding twine” of unity. God gives it to us, producing equality and understanding.

Paul knew that maintaining unity among believers would take hard work and continual diligence. Believers face many attempts to tear apart their unity. False teachers would arise, even from within their ranks, attempting to divide the people; persecution would attempt to frighten the church and send it scattering. The believers in each of the churches in and around Ephesus would need to work diligently to maintain their unity. Churches today need the same quality of diligence.

4:4 Believers diligently maintain their unity (as described in 4:3) because Christ desires it—there is only one body and all believers have the same Spirit. The repetition of the word “one” in verses 4-6 emphasizes this unity. Regardless of all that can divide the believers—racial background, social status, and gender, to name a few—Christians belong to one body through one Holy Spirit (see also

1:13-14; 2:11-22; 3:6). In a pagan culture, people can choose from any number of cults to join and gods to worship. For Christians, however, there is only one body, unified by one Spirit.

The unity in the body of believers occurs because one Spirit indwells them. The Holy Spirit lives in all Christians and gives to the church its true oneness (2:18). Without the Spirit, the body could not exist. Christianity is not a club to join, nor is it some mystical but unreal entity. Instead, true Christianity is a spiritual relationship with Christ as well as with other believers. Through the Spirit, all believers are united in one universal body. The “one Spirit” guarantees that all believers have been called to the same glorious future—that is, to eternal life in God’s Kingdom.

4:5 This verse focuses on Christ. One Lord refers to Jesus Christ, whose lordship (headship) forms the basis of unity in the body. Christians worship one Lord. There are not many real gods from which to choose; there is only one—the Lord Jesus Christ. Believers are one body because of this one faith. This faith alone saves; this faith is the one and only “way” (John 14:6). This one faith binds all believers together.

The act of believing is manifested through the act of baptism, the symbol of being brought into the body. (Faith and baptism are similarly connected in Mark 16:16 and Colossians 2:12.) Paul’s inclusion of this one baptism reveals the great importance that baptism held for the early church. Baptism replaced circumcision as the initiation rite of the new order, the new covenant. “Baptism” refers here to baptism in water, as opposed to baptism by the Spirit, because of the word’s placement in this verse. This expression of faith through baptism brings unity to believers.

4:6 This verse focuses on God the Father. There are not many gods, as in the pagan culture; there is only one God. As the only God, he alone deserves our worship and praise. Father of all means that he is the Creator. All people were made in his image (Genesis 1:26). The sovereign God completely controls his creation. Christians understand themselves as God’s creation and as God’s “called.” God is over us all—supreme, transcendent, the ruler over all of his creation. God is in us all—actively present and pervasive in every part of his creation. God is living through us all—he himself lives within his people. Any view of God that violates either his transcendence, pervasiveness, or immanence does not paint a true picture of God. Paul did not teach pantheism (“God is in everything, so we can worship nature”) or universalism (“God is Father of all and will therefore save everyone”). Rather, he taught about the omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient God, ruling over creation and exercising his power through his followers on behalf of the church.

4:7 Although the church is one unified body, each of its members has a special gift to be used for the good and growth of all. No one is overlooked; everyone is important to building up the community. God in his wisdom did not make believers photocopies of one another. Instead, each believer has at least one special ability, given according to the generosity of Christ, to be used to accomplish the work of the Kingdom.

4:8 Psalm 68:18 pictures God as conqueror as the Ark of the Covenant was being brought up to Zion in triumph by David (2 Samuel 6; 1 Chronicles 15). It had been removed in battle. As David returns the Ark to Jerusalem, he also brings the tribute of war extracted from the captured foes. Some of the spoil was given to the Temple, and some was distributed among the warriors.

Paul used that picture to refer to Christ's ascent into heaven. The work and authority for apportioning spiritual gifts rightly belongs to the ascended Christ. Paul's development of this theme prepares readers for his thoughts in 4:11. In the psalm, the victory is over David's foes. In Paul's reference, Christ, the Son of David, is triumphant in destroying his foe Satan. In the psalm, the conqueror receives gifts and, as was the custom, distributes a portion of the spoils to his people. Paul's reference means that God began to give special gifts to people following Christ's return to heaven.

The statement he led a crowd of captives could mean: (1) He led the captured ones (as one would lead a train of vanquished foes) into their captivity, or (2) he captured the captors (that is, he reversed the captivity; he enslaved the enslavers). Both meanings imply that Christ vanquished our enemies (such as death, Satan, and sin) and captivated them. He returned in triumph to heaven (ascended to the heights) and, in turn, gave gifts to his people.

Paul used the picture from this psalm to explain how Christ conquered his enemies, returned to glory, and bestowed gifts on his church. The gifts God gave to his church (in the form of people called to special functions) are described in 4:11-12.

4:9-10 Paul reasoned that Christ's ascent implies a previous descent. The phrase lowly world represents the earth, the place where the Son came in his incarnation. The "captives" (4:8) then would be either Satan and his hosts or the saints who were taken "captive" or "called" (a reference to election).

The same Christ who came down is the one who ascended higher than all the heavens. As a result of his descent and ascent, nothing is hidden from him. All things are subject to him; no realm in heaven or earth is beyond his control. That Christ will fill the entire universe refers to his power and control over all of his creation. Christ is Lord of the whole universe—past, present, and future. He fills all things with himself as their sovereign Head, yet he fills the church, his body, with the blessings of his Spirit, grace, and gifts (see also 1:10, 23).

4:11 This expands on the thought begun in 4:7-8 regarding the gifts Christ gave. In this context, these gifts are actually people who have been called to special functions. Not all people have all the gifts, for Paul was clear to explain that some would be gifted in one area and some in another. The list given here is by no means complete (for other types of gifts, see Romans 12; 1 Corinthians 12). According to the Greek, all the people listed are direct objects of “gave,” indicating that God gave these people to the church as gifts. The offices listed here focus mainly on those who proclaim the gospel and teach the truth.

First listed are the apostles. They are the foundation for Christ’s temple (see 2:20 and 3:6). “Apostles” included the eleven men Jesus called (without Judas), plus others who are called apostles—such as Paul himself (Romans 1:1), Matthias (Acts 1:26), Barnabas (Acts 14:14), Jesus’ brother James (Galatians 1:19), Silas (1 Thessalonians 2:6), Andronicus, and Junias (Romans 16:7). It seems that the qualifications for being an apostle were to have seen the risen Christ, to have been sent out by him to preach the gospel, and to be working on behalf of the Kingdom, building its foundation (as noted in 2:20). Paul also notes “signs and wonders and miracles” as marks of a true apostle (2 Corinthians 12:12).

God also gave prophets to the church. These people, also laborers on the church’s “foundation” (2:20), had special gifts in ministering God’s messages to his people. At times they would foretell the future (Acts 11:28; 21:9, 11), but more often their job was to exhort, encourage, and strengthen God’s people (Acts 15:32; 1 Corinthians 14:29). God spoke through prophets—inspiring them with specific messages for particular times and places.

The evangelists were the traveling ministers, similar to the missionaries of today. They went to non-Christian people and proclaimed the gospel to them, often being the first to start a church in a particular area (Acts 21:8; 2 Timothy 4:5).

Next, God gave pastors and teachers. These two gifts are likely the same. While the apostles, prophets, and evangelists had a universal sphere of function (the church as a whole), the pastors and teachers probably served in the local churches. Like shepherds, they tended God’s “flock,” handling the day-to-day affairs of their congregation—administering, counseling, guiding, feeding.

4:12 These specially gifted people (4:11) were given to the church for one ultimate goal: to equip God's people. The word for “equip” means to make right, like the setting of a broken bone, or to bring to completion by training or restoring. The apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers furnish and equip the believers to do the work of the ministry, which results in building up the church. The church builds itself in the faith as the members care for one another, show love, and generally manifest the other gifts God gives (as mentioned in Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 12). Yet the church also builds itself as it reaches out to its surrounding community with the love of Christ, drawing others into the fold. God has given his church an enormous responsibility—to make disciples in every nation (Matthew 28:18-20). This involves preaching, teaching, healing, nurturing, giving, administering, building, and many other tasks. Fulfilling this command solo would be impossible. But God calls us as members of his body. No one should be a bystander, an observer.

4:13 The word until indicates that the process described in 4:12 must continue until a certain end is achieved—when all believers come to (arrive at, attain) unity in our faith. This means a unity of belief in Christ himself, and this belief relates intrinsically to our knowledge of him. The goal includes making a united effort to live out and proclaim this faith.

Unity in our knowledge refers to fuller and more complete experiential knowledge. Every believer must have a personal, intimate relationship with Jesus Christ. Paul here called him God's Son, showing that this knowledge includes an appropriate understanding of the new relationship with the Father that has been provided by the Son (Romans 8:10-17).

This unified body of believers is called to be mature and full grown, measuring up to the full stature of Christ. The focus is on we in this verse—every believer as part of the entire body. This metaphor means that the church, as Christ's body, must match the Head in growth and maturity. This does not speak of perfection (impossible in this life) but of growth—such as children growing into adults, which ties into the following advice regarding this growth.

4:14 Because believers will be mature in the faith (4:13), they will no longer be like children (or like helpless infants) who are easily led astray. People who are “children” in their faith and knowledge must grow up and mature (4:13). Otherwise, they are susceptible to false teaching. They will be unstable, rootless, without direction, and susceptible to manipulation, forever changing their minds about what they believe. Immature believers, like children, are unable to discern when they are being lied to because the lie sounds like the truth. Uncritical acceptance of new teachings will keep their minds in as much turmoil as a stormy sea. Indeed, false teaching was a major problem in the early church (see, for example, Galatians 1:6-9; 3:1-14; Colossians 2:6-23). Believers must be growing toward maturity in true faith. Only then will they be able to discern false doctrines; only then will they stay the course and reach the goal of maturity (4:13).

4:15 Believers are not to be like immature children (4:14). In their witness for Christ, they need not resort to trickery and scheming as do the false teachers (4:14). Instead, their continuous objective should be to hold to the truth in love, becoming more and more in every way like Christ. Believers should want to be like Christ, the truth (John 14:6), and be strengthened by the Holy Spirit, who guides the church, the Spirit of truth (John 16:13). Satan, by contrast, is the father of lies (John 8:44). As followers of Christ, we must be committed to the truth. This means that our words should be honest and that our actions should reflect Christ's integrity. Speaking the truth in love is not always easy, convenient, or pleasant, but it is necessary if the church is going to do Christ's work in the world.

4:16 Christ is head of this body of believers (4:15) and its source; without him there could be no body, no church. From him alone the other parts grow, so that the whole body is healthy and growing and full of love. The reference to growing refers not so much to increased size as to increased faith and spiritual strength. This increase can occur because Christ, as head, supplies all the needs of the body. The description of believers as fitted together perfectly describes the bond in Christ that holds the church together. Believers from different backgrounds, nations, and languages, who make up the whole body, are held together by a strong bond and have the goal of growing spiritually. This happens as each part does its own special work. Members of the body receive exactly what they need and are responsible to use what they have for the good of the whole. We receive gifts not for our own prestige or acclaim but to help build up other believers in the church.

LIVING AS CHILDREN OF LIGHT / 4:17-32

People should be able to see a difference between Christians and non-Christians because of the way Christians live. The section from 4:17-24 appeals to believers to leave behind the old life of sin because they are followers of Christ —which should result in a radical change in their behavior. This change is further detailed in the section from 4:25-32, which lists negative characteristics that have no place in the church and positive characteristics that will reflect Christ’s character.

Living the Christian life is a process. Although we have a new nature, we don’t automatically think all good thoughts and express all right attitudes. But if we keep listening to God, we will be changing all the time. We must trust God to change us on the inside—our character, values, attitudes, perspective, and motives.

4:17 Believers are to be maturing in their faith and using their gifts to benefit the church (4:11-16). The believers in Ephesus must live no longer as the ungodly do. He insisted that the Ephesian believers abandon what had been their former way of life, not living any longer as the other ungodly around them because they were hopelessly confused, referring to the natural tendency of human beings to employ intellectual pride, rationalizations, and excuses (Romans 1:21). Their thinking was “confused” because their lives were being wasted on worthless objects (idols), untrue teachings, and immoral behavior.

4:18 This describes the unfortunate state of the unbelievers surrounding this core of believers in the church. The unbelievers had closed minds that were full of darkness, while the believers had found the light of Christ and were given his wisdom. The unbelievers were far away from the life of God, while the believers had been made one with him through Christ. The unbelievers had shut their minds and hardened their hearts, while the believers had received access to the full knowledge of the truth and had welcomed Christ into their hearts.

4:19 These unbelievers don’t care anymore about right and wrong; they have no feeling about their degenerate condition. Such people are beyond feeling either shame for their evil or hope for anything better concerning their condition before God.

The logical next step for people who have lost all conscience is that they have given themselves over to immoral ways, filled with all kinds of impurity and greed. While these terms seem strong, we must understand the culture that surrounded the believers in and around Ephesus. The temple to the goddess Artemis (the Roman name was Diana) stood in Ephesus. Artemis was the goddess of fertility in women, animals, and nature. Her temple had a hierarchy of religious personnel, including eunuch priests, young virgins, and prostitute priestesses. One month every year was devoted to ceremonies honoring Artemis.

A carnival atmosphere that included concerts, feasts, athletic games, and plays created opportunities for immorality, drunkenness, and sensuality. To the Jews, worship at the temple of Artemis was extremely corrupt. Christians, as well, were not to take part in its practices.

4:20 In great contrast to the unbelieving Gentiles (referred to as “they” in the previous verses) stands the word you in this verse. The Ephesian believers had learned about Christ from Paul himself as well as from other teachers. To know Christ is the greatest knowledge that anyone can have. That knowledge is the truth; that knowledge opposes what the evil world teaches and applauds. Therefore, what the Ephesians and the other believers were taught should make all the difference in their lifestyles.

4:21-22 Jesus is the truth (John 14:6). This is the truth that the Ephesians heard and believed. This is the truth that brings salvation. While unbelievers live in darkness and sensuality, believers were taught a whole new manner of living, which must throw off the old evil nature and the former way of life. The “old nature” describes each person before he or she comes to know Christ. The old nature was rotten through and through, full of lust and deception (which Paul described in 4:17-19 above). Like a cancer, the evil nature spreads and destroys. The person was enslaved to sin, bound to the world, and without hope. Those who have accepted Christ are still susceptible to temptations and the evils of the sinful nature. Paul does not distinguish between two parts or two natures within a person. The old self describes those areas of rebellion against God. We must forsake this former lifestyle. To “throw off” that old nature will take conscious, daily decisions to remove anything that supports or feeds the old self’s desires.

4:23-24 We cannot get rid of the old evil nature without putting on a new nature. Believers must follow with two specific actions: (1) there must be a spiritual renewal of your thoughts and attitudes, and (2) they must display a new nature.

While we are still on this earth, we will struggle with our old way of life. Paul understood this struggle clearly (see Romans 7:14-25). In explaining these concepts, some people have wrongly given the idea that there are two selves or two equal-but-opposite poles in our life (old and new) warring against each other. This is not how the New Testament used these words. Christ sees his people as redeemed. Transformation begins in the mind and results in renewed behavior. How are believers to be renewed in their thoughts and attitudes? They must:

- be involved in activities that renew their minds (Philippians 4:8-9)
- desire to pattern themselves after God, not the world (Romans 12:2)
- study and apply God's word so that it changes their behavior from within (2 Timothy 3:15-16).

This new person is created according to the likeness of God—righteous, holy, and true. We have a right relationship with God that results in right behavior, creates an aversion to sin, and prompts us to devote ourselves to his service. These qualities are “true,” meaning they cannot be faked. This is totally opposite of the old way of living characterized by sin and corruption. Finally, the new person refers not to a split in one's personality; instead, it pictures the new direction, attitude, and mind-set away from self and toward God and his will.

4:25 The general character of the new nature will lead to specific ways of acting. Because believers in the church are righteous, holy, and true (4:24), they must put away all falsehood. This may refer to various forms of falsehood—anything that pertains to the old lifestyle and is not part of Christ's truth. They must put on the willingness to tell the truth to their neighbor. This is a quote from Zechariah 8:16. We do this because we belong to each other. Paul stressed our mutual responsibility. Because we are all members of Christ's body, our words and actions must not be destructive to the body. Lying to each other disrupts unity by creating conflicts and destroying trust. It tears down relationships and leads to open warfare in a church. Truthfulness, however, opens the door to understanding. To maintain unity, the believers must be completely truthful with one another.

4:26-27 Another characteristic of the old nature that has to be put off is bad temper, or a lifestyle characterized by anger. The words, don't sin by letting anger gain control over you, are quoted from Psalm 4:4. The Bible doesn't tell us that we shouldn't feel angry, but it points out that it is important to handle our anger properly. We must not indulge our angry feelings or let them lead to pride, hatred, or self-righteousness. Jesus Christ became angry at the merchants in the Temple, but this was righteous anger and did not lead him to sin. Believers must follow Jesus' example. We ought to reserve our anger for when we see God dishonored or people wronged. If we get angry, we must do so without sinning. To do this, we should deal with our anger before the sun goes down. According to Deuteronomy, sunset was the time by which wrongs against God and against others should be made right (Deuteronomy 24:13, 15). Anger that is allowed to smolder and burn over time can eventually burst into flame and give a mighty foothold to the Devil, causing people to sin as they become bitter and resentful. It is so much better to deal with the situation immediately; perhaps the previous admonition to lovingly speak the truth can solve the problem.

4:28 In most cases, a reference to stealing or to a thief in the New Testament concerns a bandit or a person who engages in stealing as a livelihood. Paul explained that such a person who became a believer had to “throw off” that old lifestyle and make a change, turning to honest work in order to make a living. Stealing and idleness go together; thus, Paul’s charge was not only to stop stealing but also to begin honest work. In addition, slaves were often prone to stealing from the households they served; many slaves became Christians, and Paul may have been speaking to them. All believers should work hard, do their part in the community, hold their own, and not expect anyone else to support them.

Even then, the Christian’s goal for his or her labor differs from the world’s. We work not to enrich ourselves, but so that we can give generously to others in need. Giving is at the heart of Christianity. We hold lightly to our possessions because we have our treasure in heaven (Matthew 6:19-21; Romans 12:13; 2 Corinthians 8–9).

4:29 Believers must also be careful about what they say. As part of Christ’s body, filled with his righteousness and holiness, they must not use foul or abusive language. Such speech is worthless, spreads worthlessness, and leads hearers to think about worthless matters. Not only should our speech be kept clean and truthful, but we should also speak words that are good and helpful, words of encouragement. We must be sensitive to the situation and the needs of anyone with whom we converse, and we must be wise in choosing our words, for even good words, unless used appropriately, can be destructive instead of useful. God can work through our words to help others and bring his grace to them.

4:30 That the Spirit can be caused sorrow points to the personality of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit is a person who can be saddened by the way we live. Paul has already explained that the Holy Spirit’s power within gives new life to believers. While we continue to battle with our sinful nature, we should be living for Christ each day. To refuse to do so, to constantly give in to lying, anger, stealing, and foul talk is to bring him sorrow. Paul reminded the readers that the Holy Spirit within them gives both a privilege and a responsibility. Their responsibility is to not disappoint him by the way they live; their privilege is their promised future, for through the presence of the Spirit, they have been given a guarantee that they will be saved on the day of redemption.

4:31 The sins listed in this verse picture the former way of life, the old nature (4:22). None of these attitudes and activities have any place in a believer's Holy Spirit-filled life; indeed, they foster dissension today and are the opposite of how believers should be characterized (see 4:32). In their lives and in their churches, the believers must get rid of:

- Bitterness—a spirit that refuses reconciliation.
- Rage—outbursts of anger or quick temper for selfish reasons. This could mean continual and uncontrolled behavior.
- Anger—a continuous attitude of hatred that remains bottled up within. This could refer to what is under the surface, while “rage” refers to what bursts out. Anger would destroy harmony and unity among believers.
- Harsh words—loud self-assertions of angry people determined to make their grievances known.
- Slander—destroying another person's good reputation by lying, gossiping, spreading rumors, etc. Malice often manifests itself through slander. This defamation of character destroys human relationships.
- Malicious behavior—doing evil despite the good that has been received. This word is a general term referring to an evil force that destroys relationships, and it can mean anything from trouble to wickedness. It is a deliberate attempt to harm another person. Thus, all types of malice must be destroyed.

4:32 The previous way of life must be put off (4:31) and the new life put on. Believers ought to be kind to each other. Kindness means acting charitably and benevolently toward others, as God has done toward us. Kindness takes the initiative in responding generously to others' needs. The Psalms and writings of the prophets say much about God's kindness. Because believers have received kindness, we ought to act with kindness toward others.

The word for tenderhearted is also translated “compassionate.” Compassion is genuine sensitivity and heartfelt sympathy for the needs of others. Compassion characterizes God.

Believers must also be constantly forgiving one another. In what way? Just as God through Christ has forgiven you. Though Christ has bridged the gap between us and God so that we are forgiven once and for all, we only experience God's forgiveness in personal, practical ways as we learn to forgive others from day to day. Having received forgiveness, we will pass it on to others. Those who are unwilling to forgive have not patterned their lives after Christ, who was willing to forgive even those who crucified him (Luke 23:34).

EPHESIANS 5

LIVING IN THE LIGHT / 5:1-14

In 4:17-24 Paul described, in general terms, the putting off of the old self and the putting on of the new; in 4:25-31, he described particular sins of speech and personal animosities. He continued here in 5:3-4, further describing actions that are unsuitable among the Christian community. Paul understood that this is a process. Because of our relationship with God through Christ and the power given us through the Spirit, we are to become Godlike in our characteristics and obedient disciples in our lifestyles.

5:1 Just as children imitate their parents, believers should follow God's example. His great love for us led him to sacrifice his Son so that we might live. We can do that by following his example in Christ, emulating his attributes in our lives (see 1 Peter 2:21).

5:2 How we live our lives should be characterized by our oneness with Christ. Paul explained that we are to live a life filled with love for others. Our love for others should be of the same kind that Christ showed to us—a love that goes beyond affection to self-sacrificing service. Christ loved us so much that he gave himself as a sacrifice to take away our sins. Christ gave himself in death as a sacrifice on our behalf. The sweet perfume relates to the acceptability of the sacrifice. God was not bound to accept any offering (Genesis 4:5); he did so only on the basis of the attitude of the giver. This focuses on God's pleasure with Christ's sacrifice. Because God accepted Christ's sacrifice, we who believe are acceptable to God. Because of this, our love ought to also be self-sacrificial. Jesus had told his disciples, "Love each other in the same way that I love you" (John 15:12).

5:3 Sexual immorality includes any kind of sexual perversion. Sexual immorality was tolerated in the pagan Roman society (see Romans 1:24-32), but it should not exist in the Christian community. Neither should there be any impurity. As in 4:19, "impurity" is aligned with a lifestyle bent on fulfilling every indulgence, so the focus in this verse is probably on sexual indulgence.

Greed refers to an inordinate desire for anything—wanting something so much that one sacrifices everything to get it. Again, this verse may focus on sexual immorality and indulgence—the greed to have what one should not have. Such desires are idolatrous.

These sins have no place among God's people because they have been called to be holy. God's people should exhibit his attributes. These activities are the opposite of what God desires from his people.

5:4 Obscene stories, foolish talk, and coarse jokes are so common that we begin to take them for granted. Paul cautioned, however, that improper language should have no place in a Christian's conversation because it does not reflect God's gracious presence in us. This use of language by believers sometimes stems from their desire to remain inconspicuous by sounding like the people who surround them. Principle is sacrificed to the convenience of the particular occasion.

Throughout this section, Paul told the believers not to just get rid of some types of attitudes and activities but to replace them with others. So here, impure talk is to be replaced by thankfulness to God. In this way, our words will build up and benefit others (4:29). Giving thanks brings about the real joy of the spirit that the worldly people try to achieve with their style of humor and communication. Paul did not mean that all other talk is vulgar; rather, he commanded against the foolish and vulgar talk that harms the spiritual life.

5:5 Immorality, impurity, and greed (described in 5:3) are compared to idolatry because those who consistently engage in these types of activities are idolaters. Because they have allowed their desires to run their lives, those desires are their gods. Anyone who has made anything more important than God will not inherit the Kingdom of Christ and of God. In the Greek, the words "of Christ and of God" emphasize the complete unity of the Father and the Son, consistent with the doctrine that Christ is completely God (John 10:30). Sin, no matter what its form or category, separates people from God. Unrepentance leaves people without hope and without inheritance. Only by forsaking sin, accepting Christ's sacrifice, and allowing him to be Lord of our lives can we believers obtain our inheritance in God's glorious Kingdom (1:14, 18).

5:6-7 This verse builds on 4:14. False teachers had begun infiltrating the early church, teaching that "freedom in Christ" meant freedom "from" laws and rules, freedom to live as one pleased. The false teachers taught their false doctrines, probably even trying to make evil seem less serious. The false teachers made up a doctrine that allowed for sinful lifestyles. Paul did not want the believers to be deceived by those who try to excuse sin. The believers should be on guard, for the terrible anger of God comes upon all those who disobey him. Those who thought they could continue in sin as a part of their "freedom" would discover that they were never free but were all the time enslaved to their sin. And they would face God's wrath both in the present and in the future.

Therefore, Paul told the believers not to participate in the things those people were doing. This "participating" refers to joining them in their sinful activities or in justifying sin. To do so would be to mock the sacrifice Christ made in order to take away sin.

5:8-9 There can be no clearer distinction between the new life and the old life than to compare them to light and darkness. Light and darkness cannot coexist, so a life redeemed by the blood of Christ and brought into the light of his truth must not continue in the darkness of a sinful lifestyle. Paul had already described unbelievers as "full of darkness" due to ignorance, hard-heartedness, and lack of sensitivity (4:18-19). This darkness is part of every believer's past; all Christians were once full of darkness. But when they heard the gospel message and received salvation through Jesus Christ, they became full of light from the Lord. Christians are not merely "enlightened" to God's truth; they are also filled with light and their behavior should show it, reflecting the light of his holiness and truth. The natural outcome of such a lifestyle—good and right and true are the opposites of the characteristics described in 4:25-29 and 5:3-5. In other words, believers who live in God's light are above reproach morally, spiritually, and ethically.

5:10 Every believer is responsible to find out what is pleasing to the Lord—how he or she ought to live full of the light. Thus, each person must study God's word, pray, and seek counsel in order to find out how God would have him or her act in every situation. This "finding out" naturally goes with "living out" because the knowledge must be put into practical use—doing what God calls us to do in every situation every day.

5:11 Light and darkness cannot coexist, so children of the light (5:8) must take no part in the worthless deeds of evil and darkness. Believers must separate themselves from sin, having no part of it. This does not mean that believers must be separate from unbelievers, but they must "take no part" in their sinful actions. It is important to avoid activities that result in sin, but we must go even further. Paul instructed believers to rebuke and expose these deeds because silence may be interpreted as approval. Just as the light shines into darkness and exposes what is hidden, so the light of Christ, through a believer, should shine into the darkness of sin and expose it for what it is. God needs people who will take an active and vocal stand against sin and permissiveness in all its forms (see Leviticus 19:17). Christians must lovingly speak out for what is true and right.

5:12-14 While believers should stand for the truth, they ought not get caught up in empty talk and gossip about the shameful actions of sinful people. We should not promote or dignify sin by even so much as discussing it. What the ungodly people do in secret becomes clear for how evil it is—all it takes is some light. Nothing can hide from the light piercing through darkness. Believers are the “rays” of that light. By our actions (5:8-12), we become instruments of light, exposing the dark acts of sin. Believers who shine out in a dark world will expose evil. Their mission is to invite unbelievers to renounce their life of sin and come into Christ’s light so that they, too, can step into the light.

This quotation is not a direct quote from Scripture but may have been taken from a hymn well known to the Ephesians. The hymn could have been part of a baptismal hymn that was sung by the congregation for a new convert when he or she emerged from the baptismal waters. For the new believer, coming out of spiritual death is like awaking from sleep, and coming into spiritual life is like greeting the sunshine—who is Christ. The hymn seems to have been based on Isaiah 26:19; 51:17; 52:1; and 60:1. As the prophets appealed to Israel to awaken from its state of darkness and death, so Paul was appealing to the Ephesians to stay awake, stay alert, and realize the dangerous condition into which some of them had been slipping by listening to false teachings.

LIVING BY THE SPIRIT’S POWER / 5:15-20

Because of believers’ responsibility to live in the light (5:8) and to expose evil, they must be careful how they live. Their lives must please God (5:10), and they must conduct themselves before unbelievers so as to shine with Christ and draw others to him.

5:15 Paul encouraged the believers to live not as fools but as those who are wise. In other words, they must take their knowledge of Christ and apply it to their everyday lives and be especially aware of their conduct with unbelievers. Paul wrote to the Colossians, “Live wisely among those who are not Christians” (Colossians 4:5). Wisdom has been made available to believers; they need only ask for it (1:17; James 1:5; 3:17).

5:16 The Greek phrase translated as make the most of every opportunity for doing good conveys the idea of “buying from time” or “redeeming time.” The believers should carefully use their time, making use of opportunities for doing good (see Galatians 6:10). This implies that we should not allow ourselves to be controlled by our circumstances; rather, we should make use of time as a valuable commodity or resource, as a master does with his servant. We should not read into this verse that God expects or condones workaholics. God has given us periods of both work and rest. We must never find in Scripture an excuse to neglect our physical needs or the needs of our families. Why be so concerned about using every opportunity to help draw people from darkness to light? Because these are evil days, wrote Paul. He was communicating his sense of urgency because of evil's pervasiveness.

5:17 Believers must not waste their time acting thoughtlessly. We have a job to do, and our lives must reflect our motivation and our goal—to serve our Lord, to share his gospel message, and to be ready for his Kingdom. We should not be foolish and silly but instead understand what the Lord wants us to do. We have not only intellectually comprehended God's will, as taught in his Word, but we are also continually learning and growing in our understanding as we walk with him. What is the will of the Lord? Ultimately, it is to be holy (1 Thessalonians 4:3). As his servants, we ought to do everything we can to work toward his will for us.

5:18 These words should be considered in light of the whole section (4:17–5:20) in which Paul has contrasted the “before and after” of the believers' lives. Getting drunk with wine was associated with the old way of life and its selfish desires and will ultimately end in ruin. This has no place in the lives of believers. Besides, we don't need alcohol, according to Paul, for we can let the Holy Spirit fill and control us. Paul contrasted getting drunk with wine, which produces a temporary “high,” to being filled with the Spirit, which produces lasting joy. The focus of Paul's words here is not so much the prohibition against drunkenness, for the believers probably already understood that, but his urging that they continually be filled by and live in the Spirit. When a person is drunk, everyone can tell. His or her actions make it obvious. In like manner, our lives should be so completely under the Spirit's control that our actions and words show beyond a doubt that we are filled with the presence of God's Holy Spirit.

5:19-20 Just as drunkenness is evidence of too much wine, so Spirit-filled worship should be evidence of the Holy Spirit's presence. From this exhortation came much of the style of historic corporate Christian worship that is still a part of our worship today. Believers can encourage one another and give praise to God through music. Paul mentioned psalms, such as the psalms of the Old Testament, as well as new ones written in the old style. The psalms were usually accompanied by a harp. Hymns and spiritual songs were written by the believers and could be used in praise to God. Some fragments of these hymns may exist in some of Paul's letters (see Philippians 2:5-11; Colossians 1:15-18; 1 Timothy 3:16). Although the early Christians had access to the Old Testament and freely used it, they did not yet have the New Testament or any other Christian books to study. Their stories and teachings about Christ were sometimes set to music to make them easier to memorize and pass on from person to person. Believers are to be full of the Holy Spirit when they sing. Grounded in God's word and correct doctrine, music can be an important part of Christian worship and education.

Paul encouraged the believers to sing and make music that comes from hearts that praise God. This makes a contrast between the music of Christians, sung together in praise to God, and the music of unbelievers, done purely for entertainment or self-praise. The primary focus of our singing is to give thanks to God the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.

SPIRIT-GUIDED RELATIONSHIPS: WIVES AND HUSBANDS / 5:21-33

Paul presented concepts governing household behavior. Household codes were common among Jewish and Greek communities. As Christianity spread, it aroused suspicion. Tensions grew between Christians and the rest of society. This required Christians to have high standards for their behavior. Paul outlined God's plan for Christian behavior in the home.

5:21 People often misunderstand the concept of submitting to another person. It does not mean becoming totally passive. Christ—at whose name every knee will bow (Philippians 2:10)—submitted his will to the Father, and we honor Christ by following his example. When we submit to God, we become more willing to obey his command to submit to others, that is, to subordinate our rights to theirs. In Paul's day, women, children, and slaves were to submit to the head of the family—slaves would submit until they were freed, male children until they grew up, and women and girls their whole lives. Paul emphasized the equality of all believers in Christ (Galatians 3:28), but he counseled all believers to submit to one another by choice. This kind of mutual submission preserves order and harmony.

Submission provides evidence that we have Spirit-controlled relationships, and it requires the Holy Spirit's guidance and restraint (4:2-3). In the church, the believers should be willing to learn from, serve, give to, or be corrected by others in the fellowship. Such submission can allow growth both individually and corporately as the believers seek to follow Christ. Our motive should be reverence (literally, “fear”) for Christ. We should not treat one another rightly just because it is expected or because we will be well regarded but because one day we must give account to Christ of how we have lived.

5:22-24 Submission in the church should follow from submission in the home. The home, the foundation for relationships and personal growth, must be an example of peaceful submission. In a marriage relationship, both husband and wife are called to submit. The relationships between husbands and wives are a microcosm of the larger picture of church relationships.

Paul spoke first to the wives, explaining that they were to submit voluntarily to their husbands as they would to the Lord, meaning “as is fitting to the Lord.” This does not mean that the husband is “lord” over the wife. Our concept of submission must come from that which exists between Christ and the church: Christ loves the church, and the church submits to him. We must not base it on either a feminist or chauvinist view. Christian marriage involves mutual submission, subordinating our personal desires for the good of the loved one and submitting ourselves to Christ as Lord. The wife’s submission to her husband is one way that she can demonstrate her submission to Christ. She does this voluntarily out of love for her husband and for Christ.

Paul explained that a husband is the head of his wife as Christ is the head of his body, the church. In other words, the husband is the spiritual head of the family, and his wife should acknowledge his leadership. Real spiritual leadership involves service and sacrifice. Christ as head of the church is also its Savior. Christ gave his life for the church. So, as the church submits to Christ, so the wives must submit to their husbands in everything. A wise and Christ-honoring husband will not take advantage of his leadership role, and a wise and Christ-honoring wife will not try to undermine her husband’s leadership. Either approach causes disunity and friction in marriage. For the wife, submission means willingly following her husband’s leadership in Christ. For the husband, it means putting aside his own interests in order to care for his wife. Submission is rarely a problem in homes where both partners have a strong relationship with Christ and where each is concerned for the happiness of the other.

5:25-26 Paul also had words for husbands—to love their wives. Why did Paul tell wives to “submit” and husbands to “love”? Perhaps Christian women, newly freed in Christ, found submission difficult; perhaps Christian men, used to the Roman custom of giving unlimited power to the head of the family, were not used to treating their wives with sacrificial respect and love. Of course, both husbands and wives should submit to each other (5:21) just as both should love each other. Thus, “submission” reaffirms the new covenant of equality as well as the affirmation of marriage in which the partners voluntarily and joyously submit in order to seek each other’s best.

Some Christians have thought that Paul was negative about marriage because of his counsel in 1 Corinthians 7:32-38. These verses in Ephesians, however, show a high view of marriage. Here marriage is not a practical necessity or a cure for lust but a picture of the relationship between Christ and his church! Husbands are called to love their wives with the same love Christ showed the church. That Christ gave up his life for the church indicates a sacrificial, substitutionary surrendering of himself to death. Christ sacrificed himself for the church because of his love for it. Husbands, then, should be ready to make whatever sacrifices are necessary for their wives. Marriage is a holy union, a living symbol, a precious relationship that needs tender, self-sacrificing care. How should a man love his wife? (1) He should be willing to sacrifice everything for her. (2) He should make her well-being of primary importance. (3) He should care for her as he cares for his own body. No wife needs to fear submitting to a man who treats her in this way.

Paul further explained that Christ gave himself up for the church to make her holy and clean, washed by baptism and God’s word. Christ’s death sanctifies and cleanses the church. He cleanses his people from the old ways of sin and sets them apart for his special sacred service. Baptism is a picture of the cleansing that has occurred because of Christ’s sacrificial death. Through baptism we are prepared for entrance into the church just as ancient Near Eastern brides were prepared for marriage by a ceremonial bath. It is God’s word that cleanses us (John 17:17; Titus 3:5).

How does this apply to marriage? Probably the details need not be carried too far; Paul was quoting a hymn and did not mean for each detail to correspond to the marriage relationship. But this does paint the picture of mutual sanctification and self-sacrifice. Indeed, Paul had that thought in mind when he wrote in 1 Corinthians 7:12-16 that the unbelieving partner may be drawn to God by the believing partner. Paul was telling husbands to draw their wives closer to Christ and be a part of his sanctifying process. Peter applied the same thought to wives (1 Peter 3:1-2).

5:27 Continuing from 5:26, probably as part of an early Christian hymn, this verse explains why Christ gave himself up for the church in order to make the church holy—to present her to himself as a glorious church without a spot or wrinkle or any other blemish. The “presentation” pictures a future wedding; this is like the betrothal period, which for the Jews was as binding as marriage.

The church age is the interim before the “wedding” when the church will at last be presented to Christ as his “bride” (Revelation 19:7). During this time, the church is making itself ready, as a bride would be preparing for her wedding. It was traditional for a bride to take a ritual bath just before her wedding as a symbol of her chastity. Similarly, the sacrament of baptism demonstrates the Christian’s desire that God should find him or her pure and faithful when Christ returns to claim his bride, the church. The church does not make itself holy and without fault; instead, it has already been made so through the blood of Christ.

5:28 In the same way means that there exists between the husband and the wife the same union as between Christ and the church. Following from 5:27, husbands should be as concerned for their wife’s spiritual growth and closeness to the Lord as Christ is for the church. Paul expressed this unity in physical terms, for the husband and wife become “one flesh” through marriage (Genesis 2:24; see 5:31 below, where Paul quoted this verse). So Christ and his church become “one” through spiritual union (see 4:4). As such, the church is Christ’s body: “Now you are the body of Christ, and each one of you is a part of it” (1 Corinthians 12:27). Christ gave himself for the church (5:25), so husbands ought to love their wives as they love their own bodies. The spiritual and physical union between a husband and wife is as total and complete as the union a person has with his or her own body. When a man loves his wife, he is actually loving himself for she is so much a part of him. This is a beautiful picture of the mutuality that should be a part of every marriage. This picture shattered the cultural norms of the day, in which a wife was often considered no more than “property.” No, Paul says, in fact, the relationship is so deep and intimate that the husband and wife are a single being. The husband loves his wife not as an extension of self-love but because it is advantageous both to her and to himself. The Greek word for “love” is agapao, referring to that giving love that seeks the highest good for the other. When a husband loves his wife with this kind of love, they both will benefit. A wife need not worry about submitting to a husband who treats her this way.

5:29-30 The fact that no one hates his own body refers not to self-centeredness but to self-preservation, the natural self-concern that causes people to feed and care for themselves. As a man cares for his own body, he should also do the same for his wife, who is one with him. Why? Again Paul draws on the example given by Christ, who nourishes and cares for his body, which is the church. As Christ nourishes and cares for believers, so husbands must imitate Christ in their loving concern and care for their wives. But more than just an example, Christ provides the basis for the husband's loving attention to his wife's needs. For the husband, and indeed every believer, receives this loving attention from Christ because we are his body. He cherishes and nourishes us as living parts of his body. (See John 15:1-8, where Jesus used the analogy of the vine and the branches to teach this concept.) The union of husband and wife reflects the union of the body of Christ; Christ is the life of both relationships (1:22-23; 4:12, 16).

5:31 The creation story tells of God's plan for husband and wife to be one (Genesis 2:24); Jesus also referred to this plan (Matthew 19:4-6). The union of husband and wife merges two persons in such a way that little can affect one without also affecting the other. Oneness in marriage does not mean one person's losing his or her personality in the personality of the other. Instead, it means that each person cares for the other as though caring for himself or herself, learning to anticipate the other's needs, helping the other person reach his or her potential.

5:32 The union of husband and wife, although sometimes imperfect, provides the best picture to describe the union of Christ with his church. The picture we experience in marriage is an analogy of the relationship of Christ and believers. The words in Genesis take on a more profound meaning as we contemplate Christ and his church. This is a great mystery pictures a profound hidden truth. As Paul contemplated the mutual love and loyalty, loving headship of the husband and loving submission of the wife, riches bestowed, intimacy and oneness, and self-sacrifice that should describe every marriage, he saw in these a picture of Christ and the church.

5:33 This verse returns to the commands about human marriage, summarizing the attitudes that are to be shown by both husband and wife. Here Paul addressed husbands first: each man must love his wife as he loves himself. This is the core of Christian marriage. Each wife, in turn, must respect her husband. How many marriages could be made healthy and strong if both husband and wife would fulfill these simple yet profound instructions?

EPHESIANS 6

CHILDREN AND PARENTS / 6:1-4

If our faith in Christ is real, it will usually prove itself at home, in our relationships with those who know us best. Children and parents have a responsibility to each other. The fact that Paul took the time to directly address those who were regarded by some as the “lower” and “less important” members of society (wives, children, and slaves) shows that he raised them to a level of importance and responsibility in the body of Christ. All Christians are to be responsible in their positions, living as Christ would have them live.

6:1 Continuing the theme of Christian submission, Paul turned next to children. He assumed that children would be in the congregation of believers as this letter was read. By even addressing them—a segment of society that was considered to be virtually without rights—Paul elevated them and invested them with dignity and worth unheard of in the Roman world at the time. His command to them is simple: Obey your parents. This is not an absolute command; when a parent tells a child to do something unbiblical, immoral, or unethical, the law of God supersedes the will of the parent. But aside from those extremes, children are to obey their mothers and fathers. This is the way God intends it. It’s easy to see the immediate practical benefits of this for both children and parents because parents usually really do know best.

The Greek word for “children” (tekna) refers to young children living at home (see also Colossians 3:20, where the same word is used). The word “obey” conveys a stronger demand than the submission required of wives (5:22). God requires children to obey because children need to rely on the wisdom of their parents. Jesus himself submitted to the authority of his earthly parents, despite his authority as the Messiah (Luke 2:51). All young children will, at times, disobey and test their parents’ limits. As they get older, they will understand why God wants them to obey. Obedience that recognizes parents’ authority can carry over into recognizing God’s authority. God’s plan for his people includes solid family relationships where there exists respect, obedience, submission, and love for one another. When both parents and children love God, all of them will seek to obey and please him.

6:2-3 Paul added the authority of the revealed law to the natural law described in 6:1, quoting the fifth commandment, recorded in Exodus 20:12, Honor your father and mother. Obeying and honoring are different. To obey means to do what another says to do; to honor means to respect and love. Children are to obey while under their parents' care, but they must honor their parents for life. This command ends with a promise, that of a long life, full of blessing. How is this the first commandment with a promise? It is neither the first commandment, nor the first with a promise, since the second commandment carries a promise with it. Commentators offer many explanations. Two are most helpful: (1) This is the first commandment (after the first four, which are general commandments) that deals with social involvements and codes for behavior. (2) More likely, this is the first or primary commandment for children to follow, but it holds a promise applicable to them. As children obey the command to honor their parents, they show an attitude of love and respect that they carry over into their relationship with God. Such an attitude provides a community that helps provide for and protect the aged. On the individual level, as each person cares for older people, the elderly live longer, and the younger people help pass the values down to the next generation.

6:4 Parental discipline should help children learn, not exasperate and make them angry. In Colossians 3:21, Paul gave the same advice, adding that if children are disciplined in unloving and irresponsible ways, they may become discouraged and resentful. In families of Paul's day, the father had full legal rights over his children and often ran his household with rigid control. In Jewish families, the fathers were responsible for the education of the children. Paul did not have to establish the fathers' authority; rather, his aim was to set the limits on harsh treatment. Parenting is not easy—it takes lots of patience to raise children in a loving, Christ-honoring manner. But frustration and anger should not be causes for discipline. Parents can remove the exasperating effect of their discipline by avoiding nagging, labeling, criticizing, or dominating. Don't goad your children into resenting you. Paul wrote specifically to fathers because, in that culture, fathers were the absolute head of the home, with complete control and authority. For Paul to say that they needed to treat their children as human beings and consider their feelings was revolutionary. As Christ changed the way husbands and wives related, so he changed the way parents and children related.

Parents ought not provoke their children, and neither should they abandon their responsibility to guide, correct, and discipline them. Parents still have a job to do for their children—to bring them up with the discipline and instruction approved by the Lord. The words "bring up" imply nourishing and cherishing. "Discipline" includes punishment for wrongdoing combined with persistent love (see Proverbs 13:24; 22:6, 15; 23:14), all as part of the "instruction" of a child.

SLAVES AND MASTERS / 6:5-9

Slaves played a significant part in this society as well as in most societies of that day. No ancient government ever considered abolishing slavery as it was such an instrumental part of the Mediterranean economy. There were several million slaves in the Roman Empire at this time. People could become slaves by being born to a woman who was a slave, by being made a slave as punishment for a crime, by being kidnapped from another land, and by being conquered by another nation (slave dealers would buy captured prisoners and send them to the slave markets to be sold for a profit). Sometimes, however, parents would sell their children into slavery. And some would voluntarily become slaves in order to pay a debt. Usually those with financial means owned slaves. Slave owners had absolute power over their slaves.

Because many slaves and owners had become Christians, the early church had to deal straightforwardly with the question of master/slave relations. Masters and slaves had to learn how to live together in Christian households. They were to be treated equally in the church. In Paul's day, women, children, and slaves had few rights. In the church, however, they had freedoms that society denied them.

6:5 Paul used the same word for obey here that he used in 6:1. Slaves were to obey the commands and desires of their masters; this was their duty because of the authority of the master. Paul addressed the slaves who had become Christians and needed to understand how their new faith affected their service to human masters. Paul advised the slaves to treat their earthly masters with deep respect and fear (referring to an attitude of reverence and honor, a desire to do right). These slaves had been set free from slavery to sin, but they were not freed from serving their masters. They should serve their masters in the same way they would serve Christ.

6:6 Slaves were to work hard for their masters, not only when they were being watched and hoping for a reward, but at all times. They should work not only for human approval but also to do the will of God with all their hearts. Why? Because they were slaves of Christ as well as of human masters. They should work hard to do their job well in this world, while at the same time working hard for Christ as they look forward to the next world, where all believers will serve Christ in his Kingdom. All believers, as slaves of Christ (whether slaves or free in this world), should do the will of God with all their hearts, wholeheartedly, not halfheartedly, doing their work well enough to pass God's inspection.

6:7-8 Slaves had a variety of tasks—running errands, caring for or teaching children, cleaning, preparing meals, or doing menial work. Paul gave their jobs a new dignity, telling these slaves to work as though they were working for the Lord rather than for people. Our true Master, the Lord Jesus, knows the state of our hearts and knows if we are shirking the job that we, as his slaves, have been given to do. We should also faithfully serve our earthly masters in this way. The Christian slave should obey as an expression of his or her commitment to the Lord. In the end, all people, slaves and free, will be rewarded by the Lord.

6:9 Paul also had words for the masters, for those who had become Christians needed guidance in relationships with their Christian slaves. Paul advised them to treat their slaves in the same way. In other words, the masters should have the same concern for God's will and for the slaves' well-being as the slaves were expected to show toward God and their masters.

In those days, slaves may have been conquered peoples from foreign lands or people sold into slavery to recover debts. It was difficult for a slave to rise from that social caste. Often slaves were treated as less than human, thus Paul's advice to masters, Don't threaten them. Without attempting to overturn the social structure of a worldwide empire, Paul applied Christ's inward transforming principles to the system. Paul did not advise the Christian masters to free their slaves; in fact, in some cases, setting them free might not have been the best action. Instead, Paul told the masters to remember that both the master and the slave had the same Master in heaven. Although Christians may be at different levels in earthly society, we are all equal before God. He does not have favorites; no one is more important than anyone else. Paul's letter to Philemon stresses the same point: Philemon, the master, and Onesimus, his slave, had become brothers in Christ.

THE WHOLE ARMOR OF GOD / 6:10-20

In this letter, Paul explained the need for unity in the body of believers; here he further explained the need for that unity—there will be inevitable clashes with evil, and the church must be ready to stand and fight. In the Christian life, we battle against rulers and authorities (the powerful evil forces of fallen angels headed by Satan, who is a vicious fighter, see 1 Peter 5:8). To withstand their attacks, we must depend on God's strength and use every piece of his armor. Paul was not only giving this counsel to the church, the body of Christ, but to all individuals within the church. The whole body needs to be armed. As you battle against evil, fight in the strength of the church, whose power comes from the Holy Spirit. What can your church do to be a Christian armory?

6:10 Be strong with the Lord's mighty power refers to strength derived from God, not strength we humans have to somehow obtain. The words “be strong” describe continual empowering of the Christian community. God's strength and power are part of the Kingdom blessings available to God's people. The power that raised Christ from the dead empowers God's people as they prepare for the spiritual battle they must face on this earth.

6:11 God empowers his people, but he does not send them into battle unarmed. God's people must put on all of God's armor (see also Romans 13:12). The panoplia, or full armor, means complete equipment, head-to-toe protection, both defensively and offensively. This gear was for hand-to-hand combat. This “armor of God” was mentioned in the Old Testament. Isaiah 59:17 describes God as wearing the breastplate of righteousness and the helmet of salvation. Paul wrote this letter while chained to a Roman soldier. Certainly the soldier's armor must have brought this metaphor to mind. Paul described a divine and complete “outfit” that God gives believers in order to provide all we need to stand firm against all strategies and tricks of the Devil. The Devil rules the world of darkness, the kingdom opposed to God. “Stand against” was a military term meaning to resist the enemy, hold the position, and offer no surrender. The Devil will not fight fair; he uses subtle tricks and schemes. Our ability to stand firm depends on our use of the armor.

6:12 Christians are fighting against evil—describing hand-to-hand combat. But we are not in an earthly military campaign—our battle is not against people made of flesh and blood. Instead, we battle the demons over whom Satan has control. Demons work to tempt people to sin. They were not created by Satan because God is the Creator of all. Rather, the demons are fallen angels who joined Satan in his rebellion and thus became perverted and evil. The descriptive words reveal the characteristics of these enemies as well as their sphere of operations. Rulers and authorities are cosmic powers, or demons, mentioned in 1:21. These spiritual beings have limited power. They are invisible to us, operating in the unseen world. The mighty powers refers to those spiritual powers who aspire to world control. They are evil (of the darkness) and they currently rule this world. The wicked spirits in the heavenly realms refers to the demons' dwellings, planets and stars, from which the demons control the lives of people. Paul used the names of groups of evil powers not so much to establish classes or distinguish demonic powers as to show the full extent of Satan's warfare.

Here is a host of spiritual forces arrayed against us, requiring us to use God's full armor. These are real and powerful beings, not mere fantasies. Believers must not underestimate them. The Ephesians had practiced magic and witchcraft (Acts 19:19), so they were well aware of the power of the darkness. We face a powerful army whose goal is to defeat Christ's church. When we believe in Christ, the satanic beings become our enemies, and they try every device to turn us away from him and back to sin. Although believers are assured of victory, we must engage in the struggle until Christ returns because Satan constantly battles against all who are on God's side.

6:13 Believers' response to the reality of this warfare should be to use every piece of God's armor. The armor is available, but the believer-soldier must use it. We would be neglectful to do otherwise, for the battle is real, and we are Satan's targets. Only with the armor will believers be able to be standing firm, a word describing standing against great opposition; indeed, it would be impossible to stand on our strength alone. Christian soldiers must be able to hold their ground and not flee or surrender under Satan's attacks. The time of evil refers to the hours of trial that have within themselves the seeds of the last and greatest trial. Christians must be prepared for every day's conflicts with the forces of evil.

6:14 In order to stand their ground in the heat of battle, believers need every piece of God's armor. The order of the pieces listed in the following verses is the order in which a soldier would put them on. First, fasten the sturdy belt of truth around your waist. This belt, also called a girdle, was about six inches wide. Probably made of leather, it held together the clothing underneath as well as holding the other pieces of armor in place, such as the breastplate and the sheath for the sword. It may have contained a "breechclout," an apron that protected the lower abdomen. It may have also braced the back in order to give strength. When the belt was fastened, the soldier was "on duty," ready to fight. A slackened belt meant "off duty." Christians, however, must face each day with a fastened belt, ready to fight the battle when needed. As the belt formed the foundation of the soldier's armor, the truth is the foundation of the Christian life. When the enemy, the father of lies (John 8:44), attacks with his lies, half-truths, and distortions, we believers can stand firm in the truth.

Next, the soldier must put on the body armor of God's righteousness. The body armor was a large leather, bronze, or chain-mail piece that protected the body from the neck to the thighs. Protecting the vital organs, no soldier would go into battle without his body armor. Often this had a back piece too, protecting the body from hits from behind. Righteousness provides a significant defense; it gives the evidence that we have been made right with God and that this righteousness has been given us by the Holy Spirit. Satan seeks to thwart righteous living. When the enemy, the accuser (Revelation 12:10), tries to convince us that we are not really saved, that we just keep on disappointing God, and that we're "poor excuses" for Christians, we can stand up to him because of the righteousness we have been promised through our faith in Jesus Christ.

6:15 A soldier wore special sandals or military shoes that protected his feet without slowing him down. Roman soldiers had special shoes made of soft leather with studded soles. This allowed them to march farther and faster as well as giving them facility of motion in battle—they could dig in and hold their ground when in hand-to-hand combat.

Believers also need special shoes—peace that comes from the Good News. Believers can stand firm, with peace, even in hand-to-hand combat, because they know that they are doing right and that they are on the winning side. Christians are in the battle both with the inner peace Christ has already given and the desire to produce that peace in the hearts of others. This can only happen as they share this "gospel of peace" with those who have not yet heard and accepted it. When the enemy, the deceiver (Revelation 12:9), offers false ways to peace or tries to get us to focus on our concerns and fears, we Christian soldiers can stand up to him.

6:16 The soldier needed to also carry extra protection in the form of a shield. The image was taken from the Roman shield, a large oblong or oval piece, approximately four feet high by two feet wide, made of wood and leather, often with an iron frame. Sometimes the leather would be soaked in water to help extinguish fiery arrows. The ancient "flaming arrow" or "fire dart" was made of cane with a flammable head that was lighted and then shot so as to set fire to wooden shields, cloth tents, etc. For Christians, this shield is faith—complete reliance on God. Faith means total dependence on God and willingness to do his will. It is not something we put on for a show for others. It means believing in his promises even though we don't see those promises materializing yet. When the enemy, the ruler of this world (John 12:31), sends his fiery arrows of temptation, doubt, wrath, lust, despair, vengeance, problems, and trials into our lives, we can hold up our shields and stop them. Faith gives us the strength to stand against Satan with firm courage, even when he uses his most fearsome weapons.

6:17 The helmet protected the soldier's head. Helmets were made of leather and brass, or sometimes bronze and iron—no sword could pierce a good helmet. Isaiah 59:17 describes God wearing a helmet of salvation. Believers' salvation, already accomplished, will be consummated when Christ comes to claim his own. With the assurance of salvation protecting their minds, Christians can stand against Satan's attacks. As a blow to the head often means death, so a person without hope of salvation will be easily defeated by the enemy. When the enemy, the Devil (1 Peter 5:8), seeks to devour and destroy God's people with empty or evil thoughts, trying to get us to doubt our salvation, we can trust in the protection of the helmet. Our salvation will be accomplished, for God has promised it.

Finally, the soldier takes the sword of the Spirit—the only offensive weapon mentioned. This refers to the short sword used in close combat. The sharp, short sword was one of Rome's great military innovations. The Roman army was called the "short swords" because of its use of the short swords in winning battles. The sword's double edges made it ideal for "cut and thrust" strategy. The Spirit makes the word of God effective as we speak it and receive it. The Spirit gives the word its penetrating power and sharp edge. Jesus' use of God's word in his temptation prompts our use of it against Satan (Matthew 4:4, 7, 10). With the Holy Spirit within, believers have the constant reminder of God's word to use against Satan's temptations. When the enemy, the tempter (Matthew 4:3-4; 1 Thessalonians 3:5), tries to tempt us to do evil, we have the power to send him away with the word of God. The Spirit will bring the words to mind.

6:18 This verse, although not naming another "weapon" in the believer's armor, does continue the thought of 6:17. As we take the sword of the Spirit, God's word, we must also pray at all times and on every occasion in the power of the Holy Spirit. Praying in the Spirit means that the Spirit helps us when we pray (Romans 8:26); the Spirit prays on our behalf (Romans 8:27); the Spirit makes God accessible (Ephesians 2:18); the Spirit gives us confidence when we pray (Romans 8:15-16; Galatians 4:6). He inspires and guides us when we pray. He helps us communicate with God and also brings God's response to us.

Paul was not calling prayer a weapon; instead, he was giving the how-to's for taking up the armor described in the previous verses. We must not underestimate Satan's forces. He will strike in different ways at different people; thus, we need to pray "all kinds" of prayers, allowing for all kinds of requests. Satan will attack at various times, but he will always be attacking someone. Satan will attack when we least expect it, so we need to stay alert to prayer needs when they arise. Satan will rarely let up if he thinks he can win the battle, so believers must be persistent in praying, no matter how long it takes. No believer is exempt from being Satan's target—Satan demands battle against his enemies (believers). Thus all Christians everywhere need our prayer support.

How can anyone pray at all times? Make quick, brief prayers your habitual response to every situation you meet throughout the day. Order your life around God's desires and teachings so that your very life becomes a prayer. You can make prayer your life and your life a prayer while living in a world that needs God's powerful influence.

6:19-20 After asking the believers to pray for one another in the battle, he asked them to pray also for him. Paul wrote this letter as a Roman prisoner, yet his ministry could be virtually unhindered if he continued to speak the gospel message clearly. Undiscouraged and undefeated, Paul wrote powerful letters of encouragement from prison. He did not ask the Ephesians to pray that his chains would be removed but that he would continue to boldly explain God's secret plan even as he wore his chains. The "secret plan" refers to God's plan through the ages to draw both Jews and Gentiles to himself in one body, the church (see 1:9; 3:3, 6, 9; 5:32). Indeed, it was that very message that had landed Paul in prison in the first place (see Acts 22:17–23:11). Yet he considered himself God's ambassador, a political term for a government's legal representative. Paul realized that in being taken to Rome as a prisoner, he was actually acting as an ambassador for another "nation," God's Kingdom.

FINAL GREETINGS / 6:21-24

Paul closed this letter to the Ephesians and the surrounding churches by sending greetings from Rome and the Christians there. The Roman Christians and the Ephesian Christians were brothers and sisters because of their unity in Christ. Believers today are also linked to others across cultural, economic, and social barriers. All believers are one family in Christ Jesus.

6:21-22 Tychicus is also mentioned in Acts 20:4; Colossians 4:7; 2 Timothy 4:12; and Titus 3:12. He carried this letter to the Ephesians, as well as the one to the Colossians (and probably the one to Philemon as well). Tychicus brought news about Paul to the Ephesian church, which would be very interested in hearing how Paul was doing. Paul had lived in Ephesus for three years and had become very close to the believers there (see Acts 20:17-38). Paul did not write of all those details in his letter because this letter was meant to go to several churches in the area (see the Introduction). Instead, he would allow Tychicus to give the Ephesian believers the details of how he was getting along.

Paul wanted Tychicus to encourage the believers, for it seems that they were discouraged by Paul's imprisonment (3:13). Paul wanted them to know that his imprisonment was resulting in great things for the worldwide church.

6:23 Paul closed his letter with a prayer that they would have peace (1:2; 2:14-15, 17; 4:3; 6:15). He knew they had faith, but he prayed that love would accompany it (1:4, 15; 2:4; 3:17-19; 4:2, 15-16; 5:2, 25, 28, 33). The source of peace, love, and faith is God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

6:24 As he began his letter (1:2), so he ended it. Paul's final prayer was for God's grace upon his readers, a topic he had also written about in this letter (see also 1:6; 2:5, 7-8; 3:2, 7-8; 4:7). God's grace can only be upon those who love our Lord Jesus Christ with an undying love. Such love for our Lord is a taste of the eternal life of love that is our guaranteed inheritance.

PHILIPPIANS

INTRODUCTION

Picture a baby, rested, fed, and lying in his mother's arms. Looking down with unspeakable love into those precious eyes, Mommy begins to talk to her son and gently strokes his cheek, evoking a sudden smile.

Or imagine a three-year-old playing with his father on the living room floor. With Dad's wrestling moves transformed into tickles, the little boy begins to giggle, and both end up laughing hysterically.

That's joy—contentment, security, and unbridled laughter.

But joy can also be discovered in the pain and struggles of life—at a funeral, knowing, through tears, that your loved one now lives with God; in a hospital bed, knowing that the Lord stands near; at the unemployment office, knowing that God will provide all your needs. True joy runs deep and strong, flowing from confident assurance in God's loving control. Regardless of your life's situation, you can find joy, true joy, in Christ.

Joy dominates this letter to the believers at Philippi. In fact, the concept of “rejoicing” or “joy” appears sixteen times in four chapters. The pages radiate the positive, triumphant message that because of Christ's work for us (2:6-11; 3:12), because of the Holy Spirit's work in and through us (1:6, 12-14, 18-26; 2:12-13; 4:4-7, 10-13), and because of God's plan for us (1:6, 9-10, 3:7-14, 20-21; 4:19), we can and should REJOICE!

As you read Paul's letter from prison to his beloved friends in Philippi, note all that you possess in Christ, and find your joy in him.

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): Pharisee, apostle, teacher, church planter, evangelist.

Evidence for Paul's authorship of Philippians comes from the letter itself, as the very first sentence states: “This letter is from Paul and Timothy” (1:1). Although Timothy's name also appears in the greeting, it soon becomes obvious that Paul alone is writing since he uses the first person throughout the letter. In addition, the personal references in 3:4-11 and 4:10-16 clearly apply to Paul. The early church fathers Polycarp, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and others affirmed Paul's authorship.

For more about Paul, see the Author section in the Introduction to the book of Romans.

DATE AND SETTING

SETTING

Written from prison in Rome in approximately ^{A.D.} 61.

Paul wanted to get to Rome (Acts 19:21), not only to teach and fellowship with the believers there (Romans 1:8-13), but also because Rome stood as the center of the civilized world. It was a strategic city for the spread of the gospel. To reach the Roman Empire, the gospel had to reach Rome.

In God's sovereign plan, Paul did sail to Rome, but not as a prominent citizen, missionary statesman, or even itinerant preacher. He arrived, rather, as a prisoner, in chains (Acts 28:11-16). Even as a prisoner, however, Paul was free to teach, preach, and write (Acts 28:17-31). During these years of house arrest, Paul wrote what have come to be known as the "Prison Epistles"—Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon.

It is clear that Paul was a Roman prisoner when he wrote this letter because of his words in 1:12-17. He wrote of being "in chains" (1:13, 17) and of being a witness for Christ to "all the soldiers in the palace guard" (1:13). Paul's imprisonment at that time and place fits the statement about his needs (4:17-18), allows time for the trips to and from Philippi, and makes sense of his references to the palace guard (1:13) and Caesar's palace (4:22).

All that is known of Paul's place of confinement in Rome at this time is that it was his own rented house. Thus, Paul's prison was considerably more comfortable than the environment in which he wrote 2 Timothy. In that prison, the Mamertine dungeon, Paul was suffering and chained like a criminal (2 Timothy 2:9). He had been deserted (2 Timothy 4:10, 16), he was cold (2 Timothy 4:13), and he was expecting to die (2 Timothy 4:6-7, 18). In this setting, however, although guarded constantly, Paul enjoyed great freedom to welcome visitors (Acts 28:17-30) and to preach and teach (Acts 28:31).

Paul was imprisoned in Rome for two years—approximately ^{A.D.} 60–62. He wrote Philippians in about ^{A.D.} 61. Evidently, this was the last letter written from prison because 1:21-28 seems to indicate that Paul was expecting a decision about his fate very soon.

AUDIENCE

The believers in Philippi

The Macedonian (northern Greece today) city of Philippi was named after Philip of Macedon (the father of Alexander the Great). Surrounded by mountains and close to the sea, Philippi became a strategic city in the Greek empire. In 167 ^{B.C.} it became part of the Roman Empire, but it did not achieve real importance until after 31 ^{B.C.} when Octavian defeated Antony at the battle of Actium. After that decisive battle, Philippi received a number of Italian colonists who had avored Antony and had been dispossessed of their property. The colony was then renamed Colonia Iulia Philippensis to honor Julius Caesar. Later, in 27 B.C., when Octavian was designated Augustus, the colony's name was changed again to Colonia Augusta Iulia (VICTRIX) Philippensium, equating the cause of Augustus with that of Caesar. At that time, Philippi was given the right to the Law of Italy together with many rights and privileges, including immunity from taxation. The residents of Philippi were very conscious and proud of their Roman citizenship and heritage (see Acts 16:20-21). Philippi also boasted a fine school of medicine.

Paul visited Philippi on his second missionary journey, in A.D. 51, about ten years previous to this letter. By the time of Paul's visit, Philippi had become a thriving commercial center because of its strategic location as the first city on the Egnatian Way, an important ancient highway linking the Aegean and Adriatic Seas. Travelers to Rome would cross the Adriatic and then continue up to Rome on the Appian Way. Thus, Philippi was the gateway to the East. Although thoroughly colonized by the Romans after 31 B.C., Philippi was still more Greek in culture than Roman. Luke refers to Philippi as "a major city of the district of Macedonia and a Roman colony" (Acts 16:12). Although Philippi was not the capital city of the region (subprovince of Macedonia), it certainly was a "major city." Luke's statement also reflects civic pride in his hometown.

The church at Philippi in ancient Macedonia was the first European church founded by Paul. Thus, it represents the first major penetration of the gospel into Gentile territory (see Philippians 4:14-15).

Acts 16:9-40 tells how the church began. On the second missionary journey in about A.D. 51, prevented by the Holy Spirit from preaching in Asia and in Bythynia, Paul and Silas traveled to Troas, the farthest Asian port on the Aegean Sea. While there, God spoke to Paul through a vision, telling him to take the gospel to Europe. In this vision, a Greek man begged, "Come over here and help us" (Acts 16:9). Immediately, Paul and his traveling companions set sail for Samothrace and Neapolis, continuing on to Philippi.

In every city, Paul and his party would go to the synagogue to share the gospel with the Jews. So on their first Sabbath in Philippi, Paul and Silas probably looked for a synagogue. Instead, they found a group of women who had gathered outside the city on the banks of a river. The fact that Philippi had no synagogue indicates that there were few Jews in that city. Therefore, from its inception, the church at Philippi consisted mainly of Gentiles. Acts 16:14-34 tells of two of the first converts in Philippi: Lydia, a businesswoman who may have been a Jew or a Jewish proselyte; and a Roman jailer. The response of these two provided a clear demonstration that God's Good News was for all classes, sexes, races, and nationalities.

Luke also mentions that when Lydia responded to Paul's message, so did the members of her household (Acts 16:15). The same was true for the jailer—his family responded with him (Acts 16:34). No other specific converts are mentioned in this account in Acts, but the chapter concludes with: "Paul and Silas . . . met with the believers" (Acts 16:40). The plural seems to indicate that a small but vital group of believers had been forged. Clement, Euodia, and Syntyche may have been won to Christ during this time (see 4:2-3).

When Paul and Silas departed from Philippi, they left Luke there, in his hometown, to carry on the ministry. A few years later, at the end of his third missionary trip, Paul visited Philippi prior to spending the winter in Corinth. When Paul wrote this epistle, the church in Philippi was thriving, and he felt very close to the believers there.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

To thank the Philippians for their gift and to strengthen the believers in their faith.

This is a very personal epistle. It is obvious from Paul's opening comments that he enjoyed a close friendship with the Philippian believers. During their visit to Philippi, Paul and Silas had witnessed an immediate and dramatic response to their message. And despite the fact that they were attacked and imprisoned, they had seen the church begin and then grow into a strong core of believers (Acts 16:40). During the course of Paul's ministry, the Philippian believers had continually come to his assistance through their gifts (4:15-18). At this time, nearly ten years later, the Philippians had again sent a gift to Paul to help him in his time of need (4:10, 14). Perhaps their donated funds were helping to pay for the rented house to which Paul was confined (Acts 28:30). In response to this gift and to their relationship over the years, Paul wrote to express his deep appreciation for their love, faithfulness, and generosity.

Paul also took the opportunity of this letter to deal with important issues in the church. He had heard of divisive rivalry and selfish ambition (2:3-4), so he gave strong counsel and even named names (4:2). Paul knew that the Judaizers could be a problem, so he gave clear instructions to avoid those men (3:2-3). He also warned of those who would go to the opposite extreme and live totally without the law or any personal discipline (3:17-19). None of these issues were full-blown problems that were threatening the life of the church, but Paul knew their destructive pattern. So he warned his beloved Christian brothers and sisters, encouraging and challenging them to continue to stand strong and united and to live for Christ (1:27; 4:1, 4-9).

Paul's sensitivity to the needs at Philippi stands as a great example. He didn't wait for a crisis; instead, he confronted potential problems early, before they could fester and infect the whole body. When we see a fellow believer begin to struggle or stray, we should follow Paul's example and lovingly confront that person, urging him or her to stay on track.

MESSAGE

Philippians is Paul's joy letter. The church in that Macedonian city had been a great encouragement to Paul. The Philippian believers had enjoyed a very special relationship with Paul, so he wrote them a personal expression of his love and affection. They had brought him great joy (4:1). Philippians is also a joyful book because it emphasizes the real joy of the Christian life. The concept of rejoicing or joy appears sixteen times in four chapters, and the pages radiate this positive message, culminating in the exhortation to "Always be full of joy in the Lord" (4:4).

In a life dedicated to serving Christ, Paul had faced excruciating poverty, abundant wealth, and everything in between. He even wrote this joyful letter from prison. Whatever the circumstances, Paul had learned to be content (4:11, 12), finding real joy as he focused all of his attention and energy on knowing Christ (3:8) and obeying him (3:12, 13).

The main themes in the book of Philippians include: Joy, Humility, Self-sacrifice, Unity, and Christian Living.

Joy (1:3-6, 12-26; 2:1-4, 17-18; 3:1; 4:4-13). Although Paul had suffered much for the cause of Christ and was writing this letter as a prisoner of Rome, still he was filled with joy because of what God had done for him, because of his hope in God's plan for the future, and because of the faithfulness of the Philippian believers. Paul knew that his beloved brothers and sisters in Christ would be tempted and tested, so he urged them to stay strong in their faith, to be content, and to rejoice always. Regardless of the circumstances, believers can have profound contentment, serenity, and peace. This joy comes from knowing Christ personally, depending on his strength, and trusting in his plan for our lives.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Most people are discontent and continually seeking meaning and peace. But true, lasting contentment comes only through knowing Christ. With sins forgiven, our future secure, and our lives in God's control, we can be content . . . and have joy. Yes, we can have joy, even in hardship. Joy does not come from outward circumstances but from inward strength. In addition to discontent, Paul highlights other joy-stealers: selfish ambition (1:17; 2:3), complaining and arguing (2:14), self-centeredness (2:21), hedonism (3:18-19), anxiety (4:6), and bad thoughts (4:8). What steals your joy? Rely on Christ within you to give you joy, not on what you own, who you know, or what you experience.

Humility (1:15-18; 2:5-11; 3:7-14). If anyone had the right to boast, it was Paul. Yet he continued to lay aside personal ambition and glory in order to know Christ (3:7-11) and to glorify him (3:12-14). Paul knew that Jesus had left glory to come to earth in order to live as a man and to die on the cross. Paul held up Jesus as the example to follow, urging the Philippians to humble themselves as Christ had done. Jesus showed true humility when he laid aside his rights and privileges as God to become a human being (2:5-11). He poured out his life to pay the penalty that we deserve. Laying aside self-interest is essential to being Christlike.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. As Christ's representatives, believers should live as he would. This means putting others first and renouncing personal recognition. It also means serving others and looking out for their best interests. When we give up our self-interest, we can serve the Lord with joy, love, and kindness. True humility is a by-product of seeing ourselves from Christ's perspective and recognizing that we are nothing without him. What can you do to see yourself and the world from Christ's point of view? What can you do to give your life for others?

Self-sacrifice (1:15-26; 2:4, 17, 25-30; 3:7-14; 4:14-19). Christ suffered and died so that all who believe might have eternal life. Following Christ's example, with courage and faithfulness, Paul sacrificed himself for the ministry, taking every chance to tell others God's Good News, preaching and teaching even while in prison. For Paul, living meant opportunities for serving the Lord, but dying would mean going to live with the Lord (1:20-24). So Paul lived with his goal always before him, motivating him to forget the past and press on to win the prize (3:13-14).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Reaching people for Christ, helping those in need, and changing our world will involve personal sacrifice. Christ gives us the power to do that. We must follow the example of Jesus and of godly leaders like Paul who demonstrate self-denying concern for others. What will it take—what sacrifices will you have to make—for you to be an effective witness for Christ in your neighborhood? at work? What will it take for your church to make a difference for Christ in your community?

Unity (1:15-18, 27-30; 2:1-4, 14-16; 4:2-3). In every church, in every generation, controversial issues, personality conflicts, and other divisive issues arise. The tendency toward arguments and division intensifies during hard times, when people can turn against each other. Although the church at Philippi was strong, it was not immune to these problems and, in fact, had experienced some internal conflicts. Paul encouraged the Philippians to get along, agree with one another, stop complaining, and work together.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Christians should contend against their common enemy—Satan and his work in the world—and not against each other. We need all our resources, focus, and energy for the battle. When we are unified in love, Christ works through us, and we can make a difference for him. We need to keep before us the ideals of teamwork, consideration of others, and unselfishness. What tends to break your unity with other believers? What issues threaten to divide your church? Keep your focus on Christ and his mission in the world; don't be sidetracked by petty jealousies, competition, hurt feelings, or minor irritations. Work together with your brothers and sisters in Christ to make a difference in the world.

Christian Living (1:6, 9-11, 21-29; 2:12-13; 3:12-21; 4:4-13). Paul could not stay in Philippi, teaching the new believers, encouraging them to live for Christ, and holding them accountable. When he was with the Philippians, they were careful to obey the Lord (2:12) because they were aware of Paul's powerful example and strong encouragement. But now, in his absence, they should be even more careful to live the Christian life (work out their own salvation—2:12). They could be confident that God was with them and in them, changing them from the inside out (2:13). Certainly God would complete his good work in them (1:6).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. In this day of media evangelists, celebrity Bible teachers, and articulate preachers, it can be easy to depend on others for our spiritual nourishment and motivation. Yet the Christian life always depends on the relationship an individual believer has with the Lord Jesus. Instead of relying on others for our "faith," we must depend on Christ and the Holy Spirit working within us. And instead of expecting growth to happen because we have a strong Christian environment, we must keep our focus on Christ, discipline ourselves to pray and to read the Bible, and apply God's word to our lives. On whom do you depend for your motivation to live for Christ? Where do you find your spiritual nourishment? Christian living depends on Christ living in you and you then living in obedience to him.

OUTLINE OF PHILIPPIANS

I. Joy in Suffering (1:1-30)

II. Joy in Serving (2:1-30)

III. Joy in Believing (3:1–4:1)

IV. Joy in Giving (4:2-23)

Philippi sat on the Egnatian Way, the main transportation route in Macedonia, an extension of the Appian Way, which joined the eastern empire with Italy.

PHILIPPIANS 1

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-2

As Paul wrote this letter, he was under house arrest in Rome. When the Philippian church had heard about Paul's imprisonment, they had sent Epaphroditus (who may have been one their elders) to Rome to visit and encourage him. Epaphroditus had arrived with words of affection from the church, as well as a financial contribution that would help make Paul's confinement more comfortable. Paul wanted to thank the believers for helping him during his time of need. He also wanted to tell them why he could be full of joy despite his imprisonment and upcoming trial. He wanted them to remain strong in the faith, realizing that although he was in chains for the gospel, God was still in control and the truth of the gospel remained unchanged. In this uplifting letter, Paul counseled the Philippians about humility and unity and warned them about potential problems they would face.

1:1 The undisputed author of this letter is the apostle Paul, missionary to the Gentiles, imprisoned in Rome for preaching the gospel. Paul had founded the church in Philippi, so the recipients of the letter were his dear friends and children in the faith (see Acts 16:11-40).

Paul wrote this letter from Rome. He had arrived there through a series of unusual circumstances. He had been arrested in Jerusalem by the Romans for seemingly inciting a riot. As a prisoner being unjustly tried, Paul used the opportunity to get to Rome by appealing his case to Caesar (Acts 25:12). Paul had wanted to preach the gospel in Rome, and he eventually got there—in chains, through shipwreck, and after many trials (Acts 27–28).

In Rome, Paul was under house arrest. This meant that he could receive visitors and write and receive letters. Paul had to finance his imprisonment. Acts 28:30 states that Paul had to pay for his own rented apartment in Rome; plus he had to pay for the guards as required by Rome. Although Paul's normal policy was not to accept support from the churches so that he could not be accused of having a "profit motive," he did accept a gift from the Philippians for his support in prison (see 4:10-18).

Paul had arrived in Rome around A.D. 59 and had spent two years under house arrest. The letter to the Philippians was probably written toward the end of Paul's imprisonment there, in A.D. 61.

Timothy was a frequent visitor during Paul's imprisonment in Rome (Colossians 1:1; Philemon 1) and was with Paul when he wrote this letter.

Then Timothy went as Paul's emissary to the church in Philippi (2:19). Timothy had a special interest in the Philippians (2:20), for he had traveled with Paul on his second missionary journey when the church at Philippi had begun (Acts 16:1-3, 10-12). Although he is mentioned in the salutation, Timothy is not considered a coauthor. Paul wrote in the first person throughout this letter.

Paul and Timothy had developed a special bond, like father and son (2:22). Paul had led Timothy to Christ during his first missionary journey. Timothy would become an important leader in the early church and, like Paul, eventually would be imprisoned for his faith (Hebrews 13:23).

While Paul usually used the designation "apostle" in the beginning of his letters, here he referred only to his and Timothy's role as slaves of Christ Jesus. The Philippians had been an encouragement to Paul, readily accepting his position and message. Apparently, Paul did not feel the need to mention his apostleship or to present his credentials as in some of his other letters. By the word slaves, Paul expressed his and Timothy's absolute devotion and subjection to Christ Jesus.

At the time of Paul's visit, Philippi was a thriving commercial center at the crossroads between Europe and Asia. During Paul's second missionary journey, he tried to continue his ministry northward into Bithynia and Mysia, only to be stopped by the Spirit. In Troas, the Holy Spirit led Paul to Macedonia (Acts 16:9). Thus in about A.D. 50, Paul, Silas, Timothy, and Luke crossed the Aegean Sea from Troas and landed at Neapolis, the port of Philippi (Acts 16:11-40). For more about Philippi, see the Audience section in the Introduction.

While Paul greeted all of God's people, meaning the entire church, he singled out the church's leadership for greetings as well. Elders were in charge of the church, overseeing it—watching over, nourishing, and protecting the spiritual lives of the believers. The sheer number of churches meant that neither Paul himself, his companions, nor all the apostles could administer the day-to-day workings of each church. So Paul wisely set up groups of leaders, allowing church members to govern themselves with guidance from the apostles. The qualifications and duties of the elders are explained in detail in 1 Timothy 3:1-7 and Titus 1:5-9.

Deacons were selected to handle the church's external concerns. Some scholars think that the office of deacon first arose in response to a need in the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:1-6). These men functioned as deacons because they were responsible for specific administrative details of the church. The qualifications and duties of deacons are spelled out in 1 Timothy 3:8-13.

1:2 Paul used grace and peace as a standard greeting in all his letters. Grace is God's undeserved favor—his lovingkindness shown to sinners whereby he saves them and gives them strength to live for him; peace refers to the peace that Christ made between sinners and God through his death on the cross. Peace also refers to that inner assurance and tranquility that God places in the heart, producing confidence and contentment in Christ. Only God can grant such wonderful gifts. Paul wanted his readers to experience God's grace and peace in their daily living.

The phrase God our Father focuses on the family relationship among all believers as God's children. By using the phrase Lord Jesus Christ, Paul was pointing to Jesus as a full person of the Godhead and he was recognizing Jesus' full deity. God the Father and Christ the Lord are coequal in providing the resources of grace and peace.

PAUL'S THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER / 1:3-11

Following the convention of first-century letter writing, Paul extended his greeting by expressing thanksgiving and saying a prayer for the believers. Paul's words in this section are tender and sincere; he was genuinely thankful for the Philippians' gifts and partnership in the gospel, and he was confident that they would continue in the faith. Paul's prayer for this church gives us an example for a prayer we can pray for our church and for believers around the world.

1:3 Every time Paul thought about the Philippians, he gave thanks to God for them. The Philippian church had brought Paul much joy and little pain. Some of the churches had developed severe problems, and Paul's letters had focused on dealing with the problems. Paul's letter to the Philippians, while mentioning some concerns and giving some advice, could be considered a beautiful thank-you note for their unwavering support.

Paul probably visited Philippi on three separate occasions: (1) on the second missionary journey, when the gospel was planted (Acts 16:12); (2) on his journey from Ephesus through Macedonia on his way to Greece, where he stayed for three months; and (3) on his way back to Jerusalem (Acts 20:6). While the length of time of each stay is uncertain, his time with the Philippians had cemented a strong relationship.

1:4-5 The words, I always pray for you, are in the present tense, meaning that Paul was praying for them continually. Paul planted churches and then kept those churches in prayer as he continued in his ministry. When Paul prayed for the Philippians, he thanked God for them, and he prayed with a heart full of joy. This is the first of many times that Paul used the word "joy" in this letter.

Coming from an itinerant preacher imprisoned for his faith, joy would be the last attitude one would expect. Paul had joy despite his imprisonment and the uncertain decision on his case. True joy rises above the rolling waves of circumstance; true joy keeps us on an even keel no matter how happy or sad we might feel. One reason for Paul's joy was that the Philippians had been his partners in spreading the Good News through their generous contribution to Paul's ministry.

1:6 The verb tense indicates that Paul had been sure from the first, and he was still sure to that very day, of God's continued work to transform the lives of the Philippian believers. The good work refers to God's salvation and continued perfecting of the believers. God who began a good work of redemption will continue his work until it is finally finished when believers meet Christ Jesus face to face when he comes back again. Paul was describing the process of Christian growth and maturity that begins when people accept Jesus. Nothing in this life or after death can stop God's good work in us (Romans 8:28-39). Despite any persecution the church in Philippi might face, Paul was confident that God would continue his good work in them.

1:7 Paul knew that his feeling of confidence in the Philippians was right because of his personal relationship with them and knowledge of their sincere faith in Christ. These believers held a special place in Paul's heart (see also 1:8; 4:1). All the believers shared the blessings of God (see 1:2). As Paul sat imprisoned in Rome, he knew that the Philippians suffered as well because of their deep concern and love for him. Paul knew that the church was constantly praying on his behalf. The Philippians also shared in defending the truth and telling others the Good News through their support of Paul's ministry across the world both when he was in prison and when he was out.

1:8 Paul, separated by his imprisonment from his dear friends in Philippi and uncertain of whether he would see them again during his life on earth, experienced intense longing for fellowship with them. He called God as his witness to the truth of his statement; Paul's love for the Philippians was so strong that it was deeper than human emotion; it was the tender compassion of Christ Jesus himself.

1:9 While Paul's travels were hindered by his imprisonment, his prayers were not. Paul prayed that their love for God and for each other will overflow more and more. But Paul wasn't talking about gushing sentimental or emotional affection. He was praying that their love would overflow, first in the knowledge of God and his ways, and then in their understanding. The church in Philippi was experiencing several problems in its fellowship, such as pride and fault finding (see 2:1-18 and 3:10–4:1). Before giving any admonition, Paul tactfully revealed that he was praying that the believers would have understanding in their words and actions.

1:10 The Philippians should have both knowledge and understanding so that, in their Christian lives and in their dealings with one another, they would understand what really matters. They should have the ability to differentiate between right and wrong, good and bad, healthy and dangerous, vital and trivial; but they should also have the discernment to decide between acceptable and right, good and best, and important and urgent.

Paul prayed that the Philippians would be pure. The word derives from the Greek words for “sunlight” and “judgment.” The Philippians’ transformation should be so thorough that the resulting purity could pass the toughest scrutiny—the light of God’s judgment (see 2 Corinthians 5:10).

Paul also prayed that they would be blameless. The Greek word also means “not causing others to stumble.” Believers ought to be blameless with God (keeping their relationship with him up-to-date and personal) and with people (that their behavior would not lead others into sin).

1:11 Finally, Paul prayed that the believers would be filled with the fruit of their salvation—that “fruit” being all of the character traits flowing from a right relationship with God. The phrase refers to the good things that are produced in a person’s life by Christ Jesus. There is no other way for believers to gain this fruit than through a personal relationship with Jesus Christ. Only his life through us can help us live in ways that often go against our human nature. See Galatians 5:22-23 for a listing of this fruit. Such filling and the results revealed as “fruit” in people’s lives always bring much glory and praise to God. Believers’ lives ought to glorify and praise God, for it is by his grace alone that sinful human beings can obtain righteousness.

PAUL’S JOY THAT CHRIST IS PREACHED / 1:12-19

Paul explained to the Philippians that they shouldn’t despair over his imprisonment because what had happened to him was helping to spread the gospel. Paul’s example encouraged many believers to willingly take a stand for Christ and preach the Good News regardless of the consequences. Paul himself never stopped preaching, even in his confinement. The soldiers guarding Paul heard the gospel and they learned that he was in prison not for being a criminal, but for being a Christian.

1:12 The Philippians were certainly concerned for Paul's well-being (expressed by their financial gift), but they were also concerned that Paul's imprisonment had slowed down the spread of the gospel. By the time of this writing, Paul had been in prison about two years. Paul even may have questioned God's reason for his lengthy imprisonment, for it effectively put him out of commission for further traveling and preaching. But Paul had come to understand, and he wanted the Philippians to know beyond any doubt, that everything that had happened had actually helped to spread the Good News. Although one of Christianity's most tireless missionaries had been imprisoned, God's work could not be slowed down.

1:13 Paul's long arrest had allowed him to share the gospel with the very soldiers who guarded him. As a result, all the soldiers in the palace guard (the elite troops housed in the emperor's palace) and everyone else knew that Paul was in chains only because of his belief in Christ and teaching of the Good News, not for being a criminal. Paul's example, fervent love for Christ, and manner of life, even in prison, had allowed others to see the gospel in a whole new light. The custom of the time was for a prisoner to be guarded by a soldier who would be replaced every four hours. These soldiers certainly heard Paul's words to those who visited, as well as his message spoken to them personally. Paul was confident that the message of the gospel was infiltrating the Roman army and the palace itself (see comments on 4:22).

1:14 Not only was the gospel being spread by Paul through his contacts in prison, but his efforts were being multiplied outside the prison. Paul's faith, confidence, and patience in spite of his imprisonment helped his fellow believers gain confidence. Whatever the reason for their lack of confidence before—whether they had been afraid to speak up, whether they left all the mission work to Paul because they lacked his boldness, or whether they wondered if faith in God was worth the price—they saw Paul's faith and it strengthened their own. They became more bold in telling others about Christ. With more and more believers gaining boldness in telling the gospel of Jesus Christ, more and more people heard the message and had the opportunity to accept it. This gave Paul great joy. He passed this good news on to his friends in Philippi, that they might know how God was working through his difficult situation.

1:15 Paul had been made aware that some of the brothers and sisters who had been newly emboldened to speak about Christ were doing so out of jealousy and rivalry. But others were preaching Christ with pure motives. They wanted to help others to faith and they wanted to glorify God.

This comment by Paul provides an interesting look into people's motives. All of those who preached Christ were sincere believers—they had the right doctrine and they acted upon it by sharing it with others. While the end result might be the same (people hearing the Good News), some actually had wrong motives in their preaching. Now that the great missionary Paul had been virtually silenced in prison, some of these brothers were hoping to make a name for themselves in the vacuum that Paul left. Perhaps they hoped for great notoriety, trying to turn people's eyes away from Paul and toward themselves. These people had no personal love for Paul. They even hoped that their planting churches and gaining converts would upset Paul and make his imprisonment even more frustrating.

1:16 Those who preached Christ “with pure motives” (1:15) did so because of their love for Paul. They knew Paul was in prison, not because of any criminal act, but because the Lord brought him there to defend the Good News (see 1:7). Paul had landed in prison because of his devotion to Christ and his zeal to spread the gospel. Yet his fellow believers in Rome, some of whom may have been his spiritual children, fearlessly picked up where he left off, continuing and expanding his ministry.

1:17 Those who were preaching Christ “out of jealousy and rivalry” (1:15) were doing so because of their own selfish ambition, making their motives less than pure. These preachers were not so much interested in their message as they were in their reputation. Apparently their doctrine was sound—these were not false teachers—Paul never tolerated any kind of false teaching (see 2 Corinthians 11:4; Galatians 1:6-9). The error was in motive, not in content. These self-seeking opportunists hoped that Paul would be angered at the notoriety of new and powerful preachers who took his place while he was in prison. These men did not understand Paul's sincere love for God and his single-minded focus on spreading the gospel.

1:18-19 Paul rejoiced that whether or not their motives were pure . . . the message about Christ was being preached. Some Christians serve for the wrong reasons. Paul wouldn't condone, nor does God excuse, their motives, but we should be glad if God uses their message, regardless of their motives. Paul had no concern for his own reputation or success; he had dedicated his life to glorifying God. He understood that God was being glorified even as he sat in chains; thus, Paul could rejoice.

Paul had been able to rejoice during his two years in prison, could rejoice that good results could come from preachers with bad motives, and would continue to rejoice no matter how long he would remain in prison or how long he would live. Paul knew that all that had happened (resulting in his imprisonment, see also 1:12) would end in his deliverance.

What kind of deliverance did Paul envision? While most scholars agree that Paul was quoting from Job 13:16, “This is what will save me” (some versions say, “this will be for my deliverance”), they disagree on what Paul meant. Some scholars argue that Paul was referring to his upcoming trial, believing that he would be acquitted and freed (which did happen). However, this is unlikely because of Paul’s words in the next verse that reveal his uncertainty about the outcome of his trial. Others believe that, like Job, Paul was focusing on his relationship with God—that whether he lived or died, his stand for Christ would be vindicated. Still others think Paul was referring to his apostleship in the face of the envious preachers. As Job sought to prove his integrity, so Paul was seeking to vindicate his standing, despite his chains. A final option, and most likely, is that Paul was referring to his ultimate deliverance in salvation. That is, whether or not he would be delivered by the Roman court, he would be delivered from God’s judgment.

Paul’s confidence came from two sources: human and divine. Paul knew that the Philippians’ constant prayers had sustained him. As Paul consistently prayed for the churches (1:4-5), so he petitioned their prayers on his behalf (Romans 15:30; 2 Corinthians 1:11; Colossians 4:3; 1 Thessalonians 5:25; 2 Thessalonians 3:1-2). In addition, Paul depended upon the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit, who makes Christ’s presence real in true believers. The prayers of the church and the support of the Holy Spirit sustained Paul through a difficult trial and, in the end, no matter what the outcome, Paul would ultimately be “delivered.”

PAUL’S LIFE FOR CHRIST / 1:20-26

This was not Paul’s final imprisonment in Rome, but he didn’t know that. Awaiting trial, Paul knew that he could either be released or executed; however, he trusted Christ to work it out for his deliverance. If the verdict were to go against him, Christ would be glorified in Paul’s martyrdom. If Paul was to be released, he would welcome the opportunity to continue serving the Lord. As it turned out, Paul was released from this imprisonment but arrested again two or three years later. Only faith in Christ could sustain Paul in such adversity.

1:20 The Greek word translated eager expectation pictures a person straining his neck to see what is ahead. In Romans 8:19, Paul used the same word as he described looking forward to the revelation of God's children, as God had planned from the beginning of creation. Hope and expectation are linked together. Paul looked forward to the final fulfillment. He was not concerned about the verdict of his trial, but for the testimony he would leave. Paul hoped he would never do anything that would cause him shame. He was not worried about his own humiliation, but he prayed for courage to be bold for Christ and to always honor Christ. When standing trial, Paul wanted to speak God's truth courageously and not be timid or ashamed. The words, whether I live or I die, reveal that Paul was uncertain about the outcome of his trial. He faced the possibility of execution.

1:21 To those who don't believe in God, life on earth is all there is, and so it is natural for them to strive for this world's values—money, popularity, power, pleasure, and prestige. For Paul, however, living was for Christ—Paul's life focus was to develop eternal values and to tell others about Christ, who alone could help them see life from an eternal perspective. For to me indicates Paul's firm resolve and unshaken faith. The essence of life was Christ and having a vital spiritual union with him. Everything Paul desired or attempted was inspired by his devotion for Christ.

With that attitude, dying would not be a tragedy but, instead, a realization of Paul's hope and expectation (1:20). To live would continue Paul's ministry of spreading the gospel; to die would be even better because Paul's martyrdom would glorify Christ and bring him face to face with the Savior. Paul's faithful and fearless witness even unto death would enhance the reputation of the gospel. Christ would be magnified as much in Paul's death as he had been in Paul's life.

1:22 Paul poured out his heart to his friends in Philippi. If the verdict should go for Paul and he should be released, that would mean more fruitful service for Christ—further missionary travels, more churches planted, more converts, the strengthening of fellow believers, more opportunities to serve Christ. Certainly that would be a happy result. Yet if the decision to either live or die were up to him, he wouldn't know which is better. How many of us are so dedicated to God that if the choice were given, we would choose to be in God's presence?

1:23-24 Two choices were equally compelling: (1) the desire to die and be with Christ himself and (2) the desire to stay alive and so continue his fellowship with and service to the believers. While Paul lived in intimate communion with Christ during his (Paul's) service on earth, being with Christ in heaven would be even closer and more intimate than any human could imagine. These words reveal Paul's understanding of death—believers being immediately present with the Lord (2 Corinthians 5:2-8). Paul had no question that death would be far better because in death he would reach his ultimate goal (to be with Christ) and finally have eternal fellowship in God's presence.

Paul was prepared and ready to die at any moment for his faith, and he actually looked forward to death because of the certainty of being with the Lord forever. But he knew that his personal desires had to be subordinated to God's will. Paul felt that his ministry on earth was not yet complete and that he needed to live to help the churches grow and solidify. Paul placed his fellow believers' needs above his own desires.

1:25 This verse seems to reveal a new confidence. At times, Paul felt that death was certain (1:20; 2:17). At times, he was convinced that God still had work for him to do. In this verse, Paul expressed confidence that this imprisonment, at least, would not end in his death. Paul would remain alive, return to Philippi (Philemon 22), and work among them so they would grow and experience the joy of their faith. Perhaps Paul wrote these words thinking that if he was released, their joy would know no bounds (1:26) and their faith would certainly be strengthened.

1:26 Paul's return would reassure the Philippians as they saw God answering their prayers for Paul's safety (1:19). They could have even more reason to boast about what Christ had done for Paul. Paul's safe return would cause the congregation that loved him so much to boast in Christ Jesus because of answered prayer.

LIVE AS CITIZENS OF HEAVEN / 1:27-30

While Paul focused his letter to the Philippians on his thankfulness for their partnership and gifts to him, he also focused on problems that were brewing in the congregation. Paul encouraged the believers to be unified and to always remember that Christ is their example. We must follow Christ because of who he is and what he has done for us.

1:27-28 While Paul felt confident that God still had work for him on earth, he did not know for sure the outcome of his trial. So he urged the Philippians that whether he would return to them or whether he would be martyred, they would live in a manner worthy of the Good News. Paul called them citizens of heaven, and said they should live that way. Philippi was a Roman colony, and its citizens were proud of all the privileges gained by their Roman citizenship (see Acts 16:20-21). While the Philippians enjoyed the privileges and fulfilled the responsibilities of their Roman citizenship, Paul asked the Philippian Christians to remember that they were also citizens of another Kingdom and that they ought to live as citizens of heaven, with all the responsibilities their status entailed.

Being a believer is indeed a high calling. To live worthy of the Good News does not mean that one must live perfectly before being accepted into God's family—for such a life is impossible outside of the Holy Spirit's help. Instead, believers ought to live differently because of the grace they have received. When we believe, we become God's children, heirs of his promises, and members of Christ's body. And this privilege was bought at a price—the precious blood of Jesus Christ. Believers ought to reflect humility, gentleness, patience, understanding, peacefulness, strength, endurance, and gratitude to God in every aspect of their lives on earth.

News got around. Whether by letter or personal contact through key people (such as Timothy, Silas, Epaphroditus, and Luke), Paul knew what was happening in the churches. Thus, even though Paul hoped to return to the Philippian church, if he didn't, he would inevitably hear about the believers there, and he wanted to hear that they were standing side by side. The Holy Spirit unites Christians into one spiritual group. If they can stand side by side in the Spirit, they can overcome small differences among individual members and work forcefully toward a common goal—to withstand external persecution.

Paul also wanted to hear that the believers were fighting together for the Good News. Like athletes on a team, they were to work together with one mind focused on one goal—to help advance the faith that comes through the preaching of the gospel. In order to face opposition, they needed to be unhindered by internal dissension, jealousies, and rivalries (2:1-18).

Finally, he told them not to be intimidated by their enemies. Paul had faced severe opposition in many cities, including Philippi. If he was persecuted for his faith, the Christians ought to expect similar treatment. Christianity's enemies included the Roman Empire, the pagan Philippian populace (whom Paul had encountered, Acts 16:16-24), and false teachers who had infiltrated many Christian circles and whom Paul blasted in many of his letters. The church would need to be strong within the fellowship in order to live out these three attributes. How sad that much time and effort are lost in some churches by people's fighting against one another instead of uniting against the real opposition! It takes a courageous church to resist infighting and to maintain the common purpose of serving Christ.

The opposition the believers faced at that time and would face in the future gave them proof of two things: (1) the destruction of their opponents and (2) the salvation of the believers (see 2 Thessalonians 1:5-10). Doom would be sealed for those who persecuted the believers; salvation is assured for God's people. Like Paul, whether the believers witnessed through their lives or through their deaths, they would ultimately be saved because of God's control of the entire situation. Again Paul focused on the assurance of eternal salvation for those who believe.

1:29 The believers had received a high calling (1:27-28). By God's grace alone and by the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, they had been given the privilege of trusting in Christ. They also had another privilege: that of suffering for him. Paul considered it a privilege to suffer for Christ. Paul wanted the believers in Philippi to understand that suffering persecution was not punishment for their sins, nor was it accidental (that somehow God had gotten sidetracked and had forgotten to protect them). Instead, suffering for the faith was to be considered a high honor.

1:30 Paul and the Philippians faced the same great struggle—suffering for spreading the gospel. The Philippian believers had encouraged Paul through his suffering; Paul wanted to encourage them in the same manner. Paul had faced that struggle in Philippi on his first visit there (Acts 16:12, 19; 1 Thessalonians 2:2), and he still faced it in his imprisonment. Like the Philippians, we are in conflict with anyone who would discredit the saving message of Christ. All true believers are in this fight together, uniting against the same enemy for a common cause.

PHILIPPIANS 2

UNITY THROUGH HUMILITY / 2:1-4

Verses 1-18 continue the thought from 1:27-28. Paul wanted unity in the Philippian church so they could carry on the ministry of the gospel; but such unity would only be possible by being united with Christ so that there would be harmonious relationships among the believers themselves.

2:1 Paul asked four rhetorical questions. These conditions already existed in the Philippian church. It had some problems to deal with, but the church had proven itself to be strong and unified. Paul asked if there was any encouragement from belonging to Christ. The word translated “encouragement” is the same word when he spoke of the Holy Spirit as the Counselor or Comforter (John 14:16). Every believer has received encouragement, exhortation, and comfort from Christ. That common experience ought to unite the Philippians.

The Philippian believers had comfort from his love. The common experience of Christ’s love should unite them (Ephesians 5:25). In turn, their common love for Christ should cause them to love one another. They had fellowship together in the Spirit. When a person believes in Jesus Christ as Savior, he or she receives the Holy Spirit. Each believer has personal fellowship with the Holy Spirit in his or her private life; all the believers are united by the same Spirit in times of fellowship. Because there is only one Spirit, there can be only one body (Ephesians 4:4); factions or divisiveness have no place in the body of Christ. (See also 2 Corinthians 13:14.)

They also had hearts that were tender and sympathetic. When the Holy Spirit works in believers’ lives, fruit is produced (Galatians 5:22-23). “Tenderness” refers to sensitivity to others’ needs or feelings; “sympathy” means feeling the sorrow of another person and desiring to help alleviate it. Such concern for one another unifies a body of believers.

2:2 The four results of unity listed above are here joined by four goals for harmony in the church. The Philippians had given Paul great joy (1:4). Yet Paul was aware of a lack of unity in the Philippian church. For example, believers were demonstrating a false sense of spiritual superiority over others (2:3), and some were not working harmoniously with others (4:2). Paul knew that even the beginnings of divisiveness could cause major problems unless the “cracks” were repaired quickly.

Because of their common experience in Christ and their common fellowship with the Holy Spirit, they should be agreeing wholeheartedly with each other. This does not mean that the believers have to agree on everything; instead, each believer should have the mind (or attitude) of Christ, which Paul describes at length in 2:5-11.

Paul also wanted the church to be loving one another. Christ's love sent him from heaven, into humble humanity, to death on a cross on behalf of sinners. Although believers cannot do what Christ did, they follow Christ's example when they express the same love in their dealings with others (see Galatians 5:22).

Jesus had prayed for future believers, "that they may be one" (John 17:22). The church ought to be working together with one heart. Paul's thought was the same as he wrote in 1:27. The Holy Spirit should unite the believers into one body.

As they stand firm in the Spirit, they overcome small differences and work forcefully toward one purpose—a common goal (3:14-15). The church's goal was to spread the gospel.

A unified church is a formidable fortress against any enemy. The very unity of the Philippian church would ensure that it could stand against any persecution or false teaching that might come its way.

2:3 Members in the Philippian church were causing discord by their attitudes or actions. They desired recognition or distinction, not from pure motives, but merely from being selfish (see also 1:17). Those kind of people cannot work with others in the church in like-mindedness and love (2:2). When people are selfishly ambitious and trying only to make a good impression, they ruin a church's unity.

While selfish ambition and conceit can ruin unity, genuine humility can build it. Being humble involves having a true perspective about ourselves in relation to God (see Romans 12:3), which in turn gives us a correct perspective on our relationships with others. Being humble does not mean that we should put ourselves down. Instead, humility is a healthy respect for who God is, and then a healthy respect for ourselves because of what God did on our behalf. Thinking of others as better than ourselves means that we are aware of our own failings and are thus willing to accept failings in others without looking down on them.

2:4 Each believer should not be completely absorbed in his or her own affairs, but should also be interested in others, noting their good points and qualities. A sure cure for selfish ambition is appreciative recognition of others' good qualities and their walk with the Lord. It is easy to get caught up in competition, aggressive acquiring, and vying for our own rights and needs. But compared to knowing Christ, those interests seem shallow. We need Christ's attitude of self-sacrifice to look beyond ourselves to the needs of others.

CHRIST'S HUMILITY AND EXALTATION / 2:5-11

If anyone didn't understand what Paul meant by acting out of humility (2:3) and looking first to others' concerns (2:4), then Paul made it clear by giving an example to follow. The believers should adopt the same attitude or frame of mind that was found in Jesus Christ, their Lord.

2:5 Many people feel that they can't control their moods or attitudes. But Paul doesn't accept the fact that Spirit-filled Christians are slaves to their attitudes. Christ Jesus had a particular attitude; so must we. One of the great myths of popular psychology that has drifted into the church today deals with impulsive behavior based on emotions. Those who accept Jesus Christ as Savior enter a community of believers, the church. Believers are to obey their Savior because of who he is and what he has done on their behalf. Paul eloquently describes this in the following verses.

2:6 Most scholars believe that verses 6-11 are from a hymn sung by the early Christian church. Paul was using this hymn to show Jesus as a model of servanthood. The passage holds many parallels to the prophecy of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53. As a hymn, it was not meant to be a complete statement about the nature and work of Christ. It is not known if Paul wrote it or merely quoted it.

This verse describes the status of Christ as he existed before the creation of the world—that is, his preincarnate state. Jesus Christ was God. Everything God is, Christ is; the equality is in essential characteristics and divine attributes. But Jesus did not demand and cling to his rights as God, but set them aside for a time in order to become human. When Christ was born, God became a man. Jesus was not part man and part God; he was completely human and completely divine. Christ is the perfect expression of God in human form. As a man, Jesus was subject to place, time, and other human limitations. What made Jesus' humanity unique was his freedom from sin. He did not give up his eternal power when he became human, but he did set aside his glory and his rights. In his full humanity, we can see everything about God's character that can be conveyed in human terms.

2:7 Christ voluntarily gave of himself, making himself nothing. The Incarnation was the act of the preexistent Son of God voluntarily assuming a human body and human nature. He did not give up his deity to become human. Yet upon his birth as a human being, he took the humble position of a slave. What appeared on earth was not a prince in a palace, or a royal king, or a wealthy and scholarly teacher; instead, Jesus' entire life was devoted to serving others (Isaiah 53:2; Mark 10:45). Jesus' glory and divinity were veiled by his humanity and mortality.

2:8 When Jesus took on a human form, he then humbled himself to accomplish that task for which he had come—to die for sinful humanity in order that they might have eternal life. He died a criminal's death, but he was not a criminal. He took on that humiliation so that we might be saved. He died by the worst possible torture—death by crucifixion. Death on a cross was the form of capital punishment that Romans used for notorious criminals. It was excruciatingly painful and humiliating. Prisoners were nailed or tied to a cross and left to die. Death might not come for several days, and it usually came by suffocation when the weight of the weakened body made breathing more and more difficult. Jesus died as one who was cursed (Galatians 3:13).

But why did Jesus have to become human and have to die? A holy God cannot overlook sin. The sinfulness of humanity had to be punished. In the Old Testament, God required his people to sacrifice animals (“perfect” animals, healthy and whole) to atone for their sins. The costly sacrifice of an animal's life impressed upon the sinner the seriousness of his or her sin before God. When animals' blood was shed, God regarded the people's faith and obedience, cleansed them, and made them ceremonially clean.

Why blood? There is no greater symbol of life than blood; blood keeps us alive. Instead of sending all humanity to eternal punishment, God took the punishment himself (Romans 8:3). Jesus shed his blood—gave his life—for our sins so that we wouldn't have to experience spiritual death and eternal separation from God.

2:9 Because Christ willingly set aside his glory to totally obey the Father's will, God raised him up to the heights of heaven. God did not leave Christ in the grave but raised him from the dead, brought him back up to heaven, and glorified him (see Acts 2:33; Ephesians 1:20-22; Hebrews 1:3). God gave Jesus all authority (Matthew 28:18; John 5:27) and made him the Lord of both the dead and the living (Romans 14:9).

That Jesus' name is above every other name refers not to Jesus' title, but instead to his name that signifies his person. In the Bible, names often reveal a person's character. Jesus' dignity and honor are above all others. Because Jesus did not cling to his equality with God (2:6) but willingly obeyed God in order to carry out the plan of salvation, God honored that obedience by giving Jesus this name above all names.

2:10 In keeping with Jesus' exaltation and power, one day every knee will bow before him. In heaven refers to the angels; on earth means all humanity; under the earth refers to the underworld—possibly to unsaved people who have died or to demons. Those who love Jesus will bow in adoration and worship; those who refused to acknowledge him will bow in submission and fear (see also Ephesians 4:9-10; Revelation 5:13). This will take place at Jesus' second coming when the forces of evil will be completely defeated and God will form a new heaven and a new earth (Revelation 19:20-21; 21:1).

Paul purposely quoted Isaiah 45:23 here and in Romans 14:11. In so doing, he applied those powerful words to Jesus Christ. Isaiah, proclaiming the unique greatness of God, had said that the same God who would not share his glory with another would receive the homage of every living being. Paul equated that position of God with Jesus' preeminent lordship. John 5:22-23 says that all should honor the Son just as they honor the Father. Again Jesus' true deity and oneness with the Father are revealed.

2:11 Every tongue will confess the basic truth of Christianity: Jesus Christ is Lord. This does not mean that eventually everyone will be saved. Every tongue in heaven, on earth, and under the earth will recognize Jesus as Lord, either because of belief or because of mere acknowledgment of the undisputable fact. No tongue will be silent; no knee will remain unbowed. All of creation will recognize Jesus Christ as Lord.

SHINE BRIGHTLY FOR CHRIST / 2:12-18

Believers ought to follow Christ's example not only to bring unity and peace to the church, but also so that no one in the outside world would be able to find any fault with them. Philippi was a pagan city; Paul wanted these believers to be unified, morally pure, and filled with good works so that they could bring the light of Christ into their dark world. Is your light shining for Christ?

2:12-13 The Philippian church was dear to Paul's heart. He didn't want his absence from them to be a detriment to their spiritual growth. So he requested that they always be careful to follow his instructions, even while he was away. They must put into action God's saving work by obeying God with deep reverence and fear. Paul was calling the entire church to work together to rid themselves of divisions and discord. Although believers are saved once for all when they accept Jesus Christ as Lord, it is in the grind of everyday life that salvation is put into action. Paul wanted the Philippians to put their salvation into practice for the health of the church. As they did so, they would not do it on their own. Through his Holy Spirit, God would be working in them for the tasks he wanted them to do (1 Corinthians 12:4-7). He would give the Philippians the desire to obey him and the power to do what pleases him to bring true unity to the church. God works in believers; believers do God's work. Believers are partners with God.

2:14-15 Paul had advice for how they could go about acting out their faith—they should stay away from complaining and arguing. Paul returned to the basic problem described in 2:1-4, the arrogance that leads to dissension. Complaining translates from a word that describes a bad attitude which expresses itself in constant grumbling. The word for arguing has a legal connotation and may refer to the Philippian Christians going to civil courts to settle their differences, an action Paul condemned elsewhere (1 Corinthians 6:1-11).

Complaining and arguing are completely opposite to Christ's attitude (2:5-8), which believers are to emulate. They also give people a bad impression of the church, and no one should be able to speak a word of blame against the believers. If all that people know about a church is that its members constantly argue, complain, and gossip, they get a bad impression of Christ and the gospel. Unbelievers then feel justified in criticizing the Christians. Probably more churches have split from causes related to arguing and complaining than from heresy.

Instead, believers' lives ought to be clean, meaning beyond reproach, incurring no justifiable criticism. This does not mean sinless perfection; instead, the church was to be beyond the criticism of the unbelieving world. Their lives also ought to be innocent. There ought to be nothing within the church that would weaken its strength or contaminate the truth. The church's members then could be children of God in a dark world full of crooked and perverse people. Without a doubt, the Philippian believers lived in a generation filled with dishonesty and perversion. While believers are rescued out of the present evil age (Galatians 1:4) and are no longer of the world (John 17:16), they are not taken out of the world (John 17:15). They are "in" the world and have been given a commission to go "into" the world with the Good News (John 17:18). The church of Philippi needed to fulfill its mission in the world, and it could best do so by being clean and innocent children of God right in the middle of the depraved culture. The contrast with their culture would be so stark that the believers would shine brightly. They bring the light of truth into the darkness of depravity, as stars light up the darkness of the night.

2:16 The Philippian church should hold tightly to the word of life by spreading the truth of the gospel beyond the doors of the church. To do this, they must be grounded in the truth, refusing to compromise. When Paul saw the church remaining clean and innocent and holding tightly to the truth as they reached out to a depraved world, he would be proud that his work among them was not useless. Paul had been the first to bring the gospel to Philippi; the church existed because of his preaching. Paul's boasting was not prideful, as if he had built the church with his own hands. Instead, his boasting would be like that of a parent over a child who has done well.

2:17-18 Paul's reference to being poured out like a drink offering was an allegory for martyrdom. The drink offering was an important part of the Jewish sacrificial system. It involved wine being poured out on an altar as a sacrifice to God (see Genesis 35:14; Exodus 29:40-41; Numbers 28:24). Because the Philippian church had little Jewish background, Paul may have been referring to the wine poured out to pagan deities prior to important public events. Paul regarded his life as a suitable offering to complete the Philippians' sacrifice of faithful service, and he willingly offered it for the sake of Christ's gospel and for the many who had believed in Christ because of his preaching.

Yet even through these somber words a ray of light was shining. If Paul were indeed to die, he would rejoice and desire that they would share his joy. Paul was content, knowing that he had helped the Philippians live for Christ. Paul was able to have joy, even though he faced possible execution. When you are totally committed to serving Christ, sacrificing to build the faith of others brings a joyous reward. Paul considered it a privilege to die for the faith, and he wanted the Philippians to take the same attitude in the case of his death.

PAUL COMMENDS TIMOTHY / 2:19-24

Paul had nothing but praise for two of his coworkers—Timothy and Epaphroditus (2:25-30). Both had proven themselves to be faithful in the ministry and sincere in their love for fellow believers. Because he could not go to Philippi, Paul would soon send Timothy.

2:19 Timothy was with Paul in Rome when Paul wrote this letter, although Timothy was not imprisoned. He had traveled with Paul on his second missionary journey when the church at Philippi was begun, so the Philippians knew Timothy. Paul could not visit the Philippians, thus he hoped to send Timothy on his behalf. Timothy had traveled to various churches as Paul's representative at other times (see 1 Corinthians 4:17; 16:10; 1 Thessalonians 3:2). Epaphroditus would leave immediately and deliver Paul's letter (2:25-30); then Timothy would arrive later after Paul learned the verdict of his trial (2:23). Paul hoped that in the meantime the Philippians would take to heart his call to unity in their church and would iron out their difficulties. Timothy would be able to see their progress and then could come back to Rome with news that would bring Paul good cheer.

2:20 Timothy genuinely cared about the Philippian believers because he had traveled with Paul on his second missionary journey when the church at Philippi had been begun (Acts 16:1-3, 10-12). The phrase no one else like him literally means "no one of equal soul." These words of praise reveal that Timothy had become a dependable coworker and friend.

2:21 This sentence could mean that Paul had spoken to others about possibly taking this trip to Philippi on his behalf, but all of them were more concerned for themselves than for what matters to Jesus Christ. Or Paul may not have been indicting his fellow Christians; rather, he may have been reflecting on the state of a selfish world where few truly selfless people can be found. More likely, Paul was using hyperbole. He could not have meant that Luke, Titus, and other disciples cared only for themselves. Rather, he meant that Timothy cared so deeply that the concern of others paled by comparison. While many believers might express concern, too often they are too preoccupied with their own activities to act on that concern. Timothy was concerned for the Philippians' welfare, and he was willing to act on the concern by dropping what he was doing in Rome to make the lengthy and tiring trip to Philippi. Once in Philippi, he might have to deal with problems in the church—certainly not an enviable task. Timothy's willingness to go to Philippi reveals a spirit of selfless service. Here was a man who exemplified what it meant to put others' interests ahead of his own (2:4).

2:22 Timothy had been with Paul during Paul's ministry in Philippi. The Philippian church well knew Timothy's value, sound character, and worthiness. The church knew that Timothy's coming would be equal to that of the arrival of Paul himself, for Timothy had served with Paul like a son with his father. Paul and Timothy had developed a special bond; Paul had led Timothy to Christ during his first missionary journey. In the first century, the Greeks valued highly the service a son gave to his father. Yet Paul realized that both he and Timothy were servants of Jesus Christ; thus he wrote that Timothy had helped him in preaching the Good News across the empire.

2:23-24 Paul was in prison (awaiting his verdict) for preaching about Christ. He planned to send Timothy to Philippi (2:19) and hoped to do so when he learned of the court's decision. Even if Paul were to be released from prison, he would send Timothy to Philippi with the news, and then Paul would come to see them soon after.

PAUL COMMENDS EPAPHRODITUS / 2:25-30

Timothy would come after Paul found out the verdict of his trial; but Paul thought it was necessary to send Epaphroditus along immediately. Paul explained that Epaphroditus had fulfilled the mission for which the Philippian church had sent him. While in Rome, he had become extremely ill (2:27, 30). After his recovery, Paul sent him back to Philippi, carrying this thank-you letter and news of Paul to share with them.

2:25 Epaphroditus had come from Philippi to Rome, acting as their messenger to deliver a financial gift from the Philippians to Paul and to care for Paul on the Philippians' behalf. Epaphroditus may have been an elder in Philippi (2:25-30; 4:18).

Epaphroditus had come not just to deliver money, but to minister to Paul's spiritual needs. He may have been sent to Rome to remain with Paul indefinitely, ministering to and encouraging the imprisoned apostle. Like Timothy, he put another's need ahead of his own (see 2:4). Epaphroditus came to serve Paul, but Paul felt it necessary to send Epaphroditus back to Philippi with this letter to assure the Philippians of Paul's well-being after his severe illness (see 2:26)

Paul wanted the Philippians to know how highly he regarded Epaphroditus, so he characterized him with three names: (1) true brother, meaning fellow believer; (2) faithful worker, which means he too was working for God's Kingdom; (3) courageous soldier, referring to the solidarity among believers who are fighting the same battle.

2:26 Communication happens so quickly in our world, but Epaphroditus couldn't just pick up the phone or send an e-mail saying all was well. The Philippians had heard that Epaphroditus was ill, and word of their concern about him had gotten back to Rome (again, weeks elapsed as the news traveled the forty-day journey between the two cities). When he recovered, Epaphroditus was longing to see his friends and family in Philippi so they would know he was well. So Paul figured the best way to do that would be to send him home again.

2:27 The Philippians' concern about Epaphroditus's illness had been well founded, for he had been so ill that he almost died. While the apostles had been given the ability to heal, it was not a permanent gift to be used at will, otherwise, Paul would surely have healed his friend. Instead, Paul could do nothing but pray. Epaphroditus recovered because God had mercy on him as well as on Paul, who would have faced unbearable sorrow at the death of his friend. What illness Epaphroditus had and how he regained his health are unknown. To Paul, these details were less important than the significance of the healing. God had mercy on both his servants—on Epaphroditus by healing him and returning him to ministry; on Paul by not adding the sorrow of bereaving a friend's death on top of other sorrows rendered by his imprisonment.

2:28 With Epaphroditus's unexpected return, the church might think that his mission to minister to Paul had failed. They might be concerned that Epaphroditus was leaving Paul alone in Paul's most desperate time of need. Instead, Paul took full responsibility for Epaphroditus's return to Philippi and encouraged the believers to rejoice that he had come back to them. As he planned to do with Timothy (2:19), Paul willingly sent away those closest to him, if their ministry were required elsewhere. Epaphroditus had certainly been an encouragement to Paul, as Paul's description of this brother indicates (2:25). Yet Paul knew that the Philippians needed to see Epaphroditus for themselves. This would ease Epaphroditus's distress (2:26) and lighten Paul's cares.

2:29-30 While Epaphroditus had not been able to remain in Rome to encourage Paul as the Philippian church had hoped, Paul wanted the believers to welcome him back and give him great honor for what he had done. Paul let the Philippians know that Epaphroditus had not failed in his mission, and that he should be given great honor. Epaphroditus had risked his life for the work of Christ by helping Paul on behalf of the Philippian church. Paul needed personal encouragement; the church couldn't give it because they were far away. But Epaphroditus had taken that responsibility and had risked his life to help the apostle in his time of need. Epaphroditus had done his work so well that he could report back to Philippi and bring Paul's letter of thanks and encouragement along with him.

PHILIPPIANS 3:1–4:1

THE PRICELESS GAIN OF KNOWING CHRIST / 3:1-11

Paul warned the Philippian believers to stay clear of the false teachers who taught that what people did (like being circumcised), rather than the free gift of grace provided through Christ, made them believers. Are you depending on Christian parents or church affiliation, or are you just being good to make you right with God?

3:1 The tone of Paul's letter to the Philippians is joyous—and as he prepared his final words to them, he exhorted them to let the Lord give them joy. He would say this again at the real end of his letter (see 4:4). In this short epistle, a form of the word joy occurs twelve times. What is true joy? Often happiness is mistaken for joy, but the two are very different. Inward joy comes from knowing and trusting God; happiness comes as a result of pleasant circumstances. Inward joy is lasting; we can feel joy in spite of our deepest troubles; happiness is temporary because it is based on external circumstances.

Paul was able to rejoice in spite of his suffering because he knew and trusted God. He did not let his circumstances discourage him. To remain joyful, we should remind ourselves daily of God's love for us and our ultimate life with him in heaven. The joy of knowing Christ kept Paul levelheaded, no matter how high or low his circumstances (see also 4:12). Paul never got tired of telling the believers this, because it was for their own good. An attitude of joy would help the believers safeguard against the practices Paul so vehemently warned against: dissension, grumbling, and attitudes of superiority. If we lose the joy of the Lord, we are susceptible to these attitudes. Joy acts as a barrier against them. It guarantees the safety of our Christian hope.

3:2 Paul warned the believers to watch out for a particular group of people he described using three different derogatory terms. (1) Dogs were regarded by Jews as despised and unclean creatures; it was common for orthodox Jews to refer to Gentiles as “dogs”; however, here Paul switched the designation to refer not to Gentiles but to an extreme faction of Jews. (2) He also called them wicked men. The Jews regarded themselves as holy, not evil, because they kept the law. But their reliance on the law lessened their reliance on God. (3) Finally, he called them mutilators. Some Jewish Christians wrongly believed that it was essential for Gentiles to follow all the Old Testament Jewish laws, saying that the Gentile believers had to be circumcised to be saved. Those who taught this wrong doctrine were called Judaizers; they were a severe problem for Paul. The Judaizers' main argument was that Gentiles had to first become Jews before they could become Christians.

Circumcision was an important covenant for the Jews—God had established it with Abraham (Genesis 17:9-14). While there was nothing wrong with circumcision itself, Paul maintained that it was wrong to teach circumcision as a requirement for salvation. Paul criticized the Judaizers because they looked at Christianity backwards—thinking that what they did (especially circumcision) made them believers rather than the free gift of grace given by Christ. What believers do is a result of faith, not a prerequisite to faith. The teaching of these Judaizers threatened the new churches and had to be countered. Paul was concerned that nothing get in the way of the simple truth of his message—that salvation, for Jews and Gentiles alike, comes through faith in Jesus Christ alone.

The early church had already confirmed Paul's teaching at the Jerusalem Council eleven years earlier (see Acts 15). However, this didn't stop many of the Judaizers, who were motivated by spiritual pride. Because they had invested so much time and effort in keeping their laws, they couldn't accept the fact that all their efforts couldn't bring them a step closer to salvation. And the age-old hatred of Gentile "dogs" didn't make it any easier for them to accept Gentiles as brothers in the faith. Whether or not they had come to Philippi as yet, Paul knew it was only a matter of time, and he wanted the Philippians to be forewarned.

3:3 Circumcision had been a requirement under the old covenant God had made with Abraham—a physical sign to God's people of their relationship with him. It also had spiritual application, for the physical mark was to be a sign of a spiritual relationship with God (Deuteronomy 30:6). At one time the physical sign of circumcision had set God's people, the Jews, apart from the Gentiles. After Jesus Christ, all people could become part of God's family by believing in Jesus as Savior. True believers are the only ones who are truly circumcised. They have three common characteristics that prove their standing before God:

First, they worship God in the Spirit. Believers worship by means of God's Spirit and in God's Spirit. The Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, is vital to all aspects of our Christian life. Whatever outward forms may or may not be used, worship is always inspired by the Holy Spirit.

Second, they put no confidence in human effort. The Judaizers depended on their obedience to the Jewish law, and especially the covenant of circumcision, to make them acceptable to God. By contrast, true believers did not place their confidence in anything they did or didn't do, but in what God through Jesus Christ had done for them.

Finally, they boast about what Christ Jesus has done. The word translated “boast” could better be translated “exult.” Paul explained that true believers exult, not in their works as if they somehow saved themselves, but in Christ Jesus alone. Only because of Christ’s sacrifice on the cross are believers saved. Any believer who understands the incredible significance of Christ’s death cannot help but respond with exultation.

3:4 The Judaizers believed that their accomplishments would earn their salvation, thus giving them reason for having confidence in their own efforts. Paul challenged any false teachers to a credentials “showdown.” If anyone could have confidence in worldly achievements, Paul could; in fact, he probably had even more than any of those Judaizers who so adamantly opposed Paul’s teaching of salvation by faith alone.

3:5 The Judaizers focused on circumcision as the way to be right with God. The first item on Paul’s list of credentials in which he at one time placed confidence was the fact that he, too, had been circumcised when he was eight days old. If anyone would have known about the true value of circumcision, Paul would. But Paul knew that his being circumcised could not give him salvation. Next Paul’s list included his membership among God’s elect race, the chosen people. Paul’s parents were both true Jews, and Paul could trace his heritage back to Abraham (see Romans 11:1; 2 Corinthians 11:22). He was pure-blooded. As part of the people of Israel, Paul described his membership in one of Israel’s twelve tribes—Benjamin—a heritage greatly esteemed among the Jews. Though the tribe of Benjamin was one of the smaller tribes, it had a special place of honor throughout its history. The patriarch of the tribe, Benjamin, was the only one of Joseph’s brothers born in the Promised Land. Along with the largest tribe, Judah, the tribe of Benjamin remained loyal to David’s line when the monarchy split. Paul was an Israelite by birth, a genuine Jew through and through—a real Jew if there ever was one!

These were Paul’s qualifications by birth and heredity. Next he turned to his qualifications gained by study and zeal for his faith. Paul was also a member of the Pharisees, the most devout and orthodox Jewish sect. Pharisees demanded the strictest obedience to the Jewish law—the Old Testament laws as well as their own numerous rules and traditions thought to be the revealed oral law of God (see Acts 5:34; 22:3; 23:6; 26:5). At one time, Paul had believed, like the Judaizers, that salvation came from perfect obedience to the law.

3:6 How much more zealous could anyone be than to outright persecute the church? No Judaizer could boast of traveling hundreds of miles in order to find Christians, bring them back in chains to Jerusalem, and cast a vote for their deaths (Acts 9:1-2; 22:3-5; 26:9-11). No Judaizer had stood by holding the coats of those who stoned an early Christian leader (Acts 7:59–8:1). Paul persecuted the church because he thought that Christianity was heretical and blasphemous. Jesus did not meet the expectations of what the Messiah would be like, so Paul and many Jews with him had assumed that Jesus' claims were false—and therefore wicked (Acts 26:9).

As a Pharisee, Paul had to follow the Old Testament law in addition to hundreds of rules and traditions. Paul had obeyed the laws so carefully that no one could find any fault. He took his position as a Pharisee seriously—whether it included detailed law-keeping or zealous persecution of heretics.

Any of the Judaizers would have loved to have had Paul's qualifications. Such a list would have given certain confidence in salvation according to their teachings. But Paul, who seemingly had it all, listed his advantages and then set them aside as disadvantages.

3:7-9 Paul had once thought those great qualifications listed above were so very important for his salvation; now, however, he considered them worthless. All the qualifications no longer mattered because of what Christ has done. Paul had learned that nothing he could do would earn him salvation—all his hard work and meticulous law-keeping and zeal for the Jewish faith had gained him nothing. Doubtless Paul's meeting with Christ on the road to Damascus had sealed this change in Paul. When Paul understood the priceless gain of knowing Christ Jesus, his accomplishments became nothing more than garbage by comparison. The Greek word for “knowing” here speaks of a personal, experiential, and progressive knowledge. The Judaizers might have their rituals and rules, but Paul (and all true believers) had a wonderful personal relationship and fellowship with Christ Jesus himself (Colossians 2:2-3). Such a relationship far surpasses the value of anything else.

When Christ returned or when Paul died, Paul wanted to become one with Christ, that is, living in union with Christ. But his own goodness or ability to obey God's law would not be enough to save him. Not even Paul, with all his credentials and accomplishments, could have been good enough. The only way for people to be made right with God is through faith. Believers are made righteous by their faith in Christ's sacrifice on the cross on their behalf. Being made right with God is his gift to us; it cannot be earned. God secured the gift and then offered it to us. Because of Jesus' death on the cross, God can exchange our sin and shortcomings for his complete righteousness. Believers are offered a gift; all we have to do is accept it. We are considered righteous at the moment we believe, and we gradually work out the fruit of our righteous life on a day-to-day basis as we live in Christ and he lives through us.

3:10 The word for know here is the same form used in 3:8, referring to personal, experiential knowledge. To know Christ is more than merely to know facts or doctrine about him. It should be the goal of every believer to know Christ more fully and personally, and that can be a lifelong process.

Paul also wanted to experience the mighty power that raised him from the dead. The power of the Holy Spirit that brought Jesus back from the dead is available to all believers to raise them from spiritual death now (Ephesians 1:19-20) and from their physical death in the future (Romans 8:11). Paul wanted to know this power, personally and experientially, for that power assures Christians of their justification (Romans 4:25; 1 Corinthians 15:17) and of their regeneration as they identify with Christ in resurrection (Romans 6:4; Colossians 2:12; 3:1, 10).

Paul also wanted to learn what it means to suffer with him, sharing his death. Paul was not referring to sharing Christ's death on the cross; that suffering could not be shared because it was Christ's alone. But Paul wanted to participate with Christ, as a believer, in suffering for the gospel (1:29). Even as Paul had already suffered greatly for the gospel and was suffering in prison at the writing of this letter, he still wanted to know, firsthand, what it meant to suffer for Christ. He was willing to experience more in order to serve Christ, who had suffered so much for him (Colossians 1:24). Believers share his death as they "die" to sin and to the old nature. In a transaction we cannot completely understand, when Jesus died on the cross, we died to our former life. Christ took our punishment on himself, so God looks at us as though we have died to sin and then have been raised, along with Christ, to newness of life.

When we are united with Christ by trusting in him, we experience the power that raised him from the dead. That same mighty power will help us live morally renewed and regenerated lives. But before we can walk in newness of life, we must also die to sin. Just as Christ's resurrection gives us his power to live for him, his crucifixion marks the death of our old sinful nature. We can't know the victory of the Resurrection without personally applying the Crucifixion.

3:11 When Paul wrote, "so that, somehow, I can experience the resurrection," he was not implying uncertainty or doubt that he would be resurrected. Rather, this was a way of humbly stating that he trusted in God for his complete salvation—from regeneration to resurrection. Paul did not doubt the fact that he would be raised, but how he would experience the resurrection was within God's plan and power and not his own. Confident of God's care and blessing, Paul runs toward salvation as if he is in a marathon. He wanted to attain the finish line without quitting. Paul was not making a point about eternal security in his wording; rather, he was announcing his dramatic and full commitment to persevere in the footrace of spirituality, never giving up until the finish line, where Jesus stands ready with a crown.

PRESSING TOWARD THE GOAL / 3:12–4:1

Paul's goal was to know Christ, to be like Christ, and to be all Christ had in mind for him. This goal absorbed all his energy. This provides a helpful example. We should not let anything take our eyes off our goal—knowing Christ. With the single-mindedness of an athlete in training, we must lay aside everything harmful and forsake anything that may distract us from being effective Christians. What is holding you back?

3:12 Paul saw the Christian life as a process. While believers are considered righteous when they accept salvation, their entire lives are marked by growth toward Christlikeness. Complete perfection will not be obtained until Christ's second coming, when he will take his people with him. While Paul may have seemed like a nearly perfect Christian to his Philippian friends, he emphasized that he had not achieved perfect knowledge of Christ, the power of his resurrection, or the sharing of his suffering and death (3:10). All of these were part of the process of sanctification—of working toward that day when we can be all that Christ Jesus saved us to be and wants us to be.

3:13 Unlike the Judaizers, Paul did not consider that he had achieved spiritual maturity; he was not all that he knew he should be, but he lived in absolute confidence of his ultimate salvation. Christians know they will be saved, yet they must have perfection as their goal (Matthew 5:48) while not pretending that sin does not exist (1 John 1:8). Like Paul, they should be focusing on one goal: forgetting the past and looking forward to what lies ahead. The past should not be used as a barrier to the future, as an excuse for dropping out, or for avoiding proper spiritual conduct in their relationship with God. Paul would forget his past with all its credentials and accomplishments (and sins) and, like a runner in a race with his whole body reaching for the finish line, would press on toward the goal (3:14).

3:14 As a runner straining toward the finish line, Paul pressed on to reach the end of the race and receive the prize. While Paul didn't identify the prize, it seems from his writing above that the prize refers to gaining full knowledge of Jesus Christ (see also 1 Corinthians 9:24; 2 Timothy 4:7-8). Paul aimed to win the prize, but all who finish the race win it as well. The full knowledge of Christ is the final prize for which believers gladly lay aside all else.

For this prize, Christ Jesus is calling us up to heaven. Some think this refers to the rapture; others say that it means the call to be saved; still others connect it to the high purpose or high vocation of Paul as apostle. Yet because of Paul's use of the metaphor of athletic games, it seems more natural to understand the "call" as the calling of athletes up to the winner's stand. Thus, the heavenly call is the summons to win the victor's prize of salvation.

3:15 After Paul described his spiritual goals, he explained to the Philippians that all mature Christians should agree on these things. That is, they too ought to be pressing on toward the goal. Mature believers would understand that they could not, in their own humanity, gain perfection and acceptance by God (as opposed to the teachings of the Judaizers). Yet because of their love for Christ, they willingly pressed on to follow his example in order to become more like him in life, all the while knowing that they were promised to know him fully upon their death (or his return).

The phrase, if you disagree on some point, betrays some of the problems that faced the Philippian church. Paul made clear that those who were truly mature were those who realized their dependence on God. They pressed on, not to make themselves good enough or to gain credentials by their accomplishments; rather, they pressed on to know their Savior better. Whatever problem of pride may have threatened to divide the Philippian church, Paul stopped it. This was the final word on the matter; Paul invoked the illumination of God himself to make plain the truth of his words.

3:16 Christian maturity involves acting on the guidance that we have already received. The believers were in different stages, but everyone needed to obey the truth they had learned already. As they pressed on toward the goal, they should not use their lack of complete knowledge as an excuse for taking lightly what they knew or for getting sidetracked. They should continue to learn and grow, while at the same time governing their lives by the light they had already received.

3:17 Paul used these two key words for discipleship: pattern and example. Paul challenged the Philippians to pursue Christlikeness by following Paul's own example and the examples of others whose lives were based on his (those “mature” believers in 3:15). This was not egotism on Paul’s part, for Paul always focused on Jesus Christ and urged the believers to also follow the example of others who followed Christ. They should not follow false teachers or the enemies of the cross (3:18). Instead, as Paul focused his life on being like Christ, so should they. The Gospels may not yet have been in circulation, so Paul could not tell them to read the Bible to see what Christ was like. Therefore he urged them to imitate him as a practical guide for conduct. That Paul could tell people to follow his example is a testimony to his character. Can you do the same? What kind of follower would a new Christian become if he or she imitated you?

3:18 The reason for Paul’s admonition to follow his example was to turn the believers away from following the bad examples of the false teachers, the Judaizers, and any others who claimed to be believers but refused to live up to Christ’s model of servanthood and self-sacrifice. These people focused on their own attainments, thus making them enemies of the cross of Christ. Paul had warned the Philippians about false teachings, and he continued to do so with tears.

3:19 Four characteristics were true of these “enemies of the cross” (3:18). (1) Because they refused to accept Christ’s sacrifice on their behalf, they could not be saved. Their only alternative was eternal destruction—separation from God. (2) Their god is their appetite, meaning they worshiped those temporal elements that satisfy only physical desires. (3) They brag about shameful things. They gloried in themselves, when they should have been ashamed so that they could turn to God for salvation. (4) All they think about is this life here on earth. They depended on credentials, accomplishments, law-keeping, etc., for salvation.

3:20 While the false teachers had their minds on earthly matters (3:19), believers ought to be yearning for their home. Paul’s speaking of being citizens of heaven struck a chord with the Philippians. Philippi was a Roman colony; those who lived in Philippi had their citizenship in far-off Rome, although most of the Philippians had never been there. Roman citizenship was highly prized during Paul’s time. The Christians in Philippi, as proud as they had been of their Roman citizenship (Acts 16:20-21), should have valued even more highly their citizenship in heaven where the Lord Jesus Christ lives. The believers should have thought of themselves as “resident aliens” living temporarily in a foreign country with their home elsewhere. One day they would experience all the special privileges of their heavenly citizenship because Christ would return as their Savior. Believers are expecting the Savior to return from heaven to earth at his second coming. While on earth, believers were citizens of their country (the Philippians were citizens of Rome itself and thus under Caesar's rule), yet absolute loyalty was to the one and only true Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who rules in heaven, where all believers hold their ultimate citizenship.

3:21 When Christ returns, he will conquer everything, everywhere. There will be no more sin, no more evil rulers, no more persecution of believers. Christ will be King of kings and Lord of lords, ruler over all (Revelation 19:11-16; 21:22-27; see also Psalm 8:6; 1 Corinthians 15:24-28; Hebrews 2:8-9). With that same power, he will transform all believers' weak mortal bodies into glorious bodies like Christ's resurrected body. Our identities will not change, but our bodies will be like Jesus' glorified body. This won't be an external resemblance, but we will share his nature and life. (For a more detailed discussion of our new bodies, see 1 Corinthians 15:35-55 and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10.)

4:1 Because of these amazing and certain promises, the believers in Philippi ought to stay true to the Lord—standing against false teaching or divisiveness from within and persecution from without. Paul referred to the Philippians as his joy and reward, proof that his labor had not been in vain (2:16). This congregation was dear to his heart. His words to them were of vital importance, for he cared about their very souls. How he longed to see them again; but during this time of his imprisonment, the yearning words of his letter, carried to them by a mutual friend, would have to suffice.

PHILIPPIANS 4:2-23

PAUL'S FINAL THOUGHTS / 4:2-9

In 4:1, Paul had urged the Philippian believers to “stay true to the Lord.” In order to stay true against false teaching, divisiveness, and persecution, the believers needed to develop certain attitudes in their lives.

4:2 Paul not only warned the Philippian church of doctrinal errors (3:1–4:1), he also addressed some relational problems. Two women, Euodia and Syntychē, had been workers for Christ in the church—perhaps deacons. Their broken relationship was no small matter: Many had become believers through their efforts (see 4:3), but their quarrel was causing dissension in the church. We do not know the reason for the disagreement, but Paul pled with them to settle it. He expected them to work it out themselves. The unity of the church was to be their highest concern.

4:3 The identity of this true teammate remains a mystery. The reference may have been obvious to the Philippian believers. Paul knew that he could count on this man to help these women work out their disagreement so they could once again fellowship with one another and be good examples in the church.

Euodia and Syntyche had worked hard with Paul in telling others the Good News. In many of the churches Paul visited, men were the key players, but women played a key role in founding the churches of Macedonia (see Acts 16:14, 40; 17:4, 12). At Philippi, women were the first to hear the gospel, and Lydia was the first convert. Those who were among the first to understand the gospel would be asked to teach. Thus, Euodia and Syntyche were to take an active part in teaching. Their quarrel was highly visible and threatened to disrupt the unity of the church. This intermediary was asked to help.

The mention of the women's help reminded Paul of Clement and other coworkers who had also labored along with Paul. While the names of the rest of the coworkers are not listed, we can be sure that each person's name is in the Book of Life. The names of all believers are registered there. In the Old Testament this referred to a register of God's covenant people (see Exodus 32:32-33; Psalm 69:28; 139:16). The “book” symbolizes God's knowledge of who belongs to him (see Luke 10:17-20; 12:8-9; Hebrews 12:22-23; Revelation 3:5; 20:11-15).

4:4 Paul returned to writing to the church at large: Be full of joy . . . rejoice! It seems strange that a man in prison would be telling a church to keep on rejoicing. But Paul's attitude teaches us an important lesson: Our inner attitudes do not have to reflect our outward circumstances. Paul was full of joy because he knew that no matter what happened to him, Jesus Christ was with him. While believers often will encounter situations in which they cannot be happy, they can always rejoice and delight in the Lord.

4:5 Joy isn't always visible to others, but acts toward others are readily seen. So Paul encouraged the Philippians to let everyone see that they were considerate. They should have a spirit that is reasonable, fair-minded, and charitable. Believers are motivated to joy and consideration of others by remembering that their Lord is coming soon. The promise of the Lord's second coming encourages careful conduct by his followers.

4:6 Attitudes of joy and gentleness, combined with constant awareness of Christ's return, should dispel any worry. Believers should not set aside life's responsibilities so as not to worry about them; Paul was focusing on believers' attitudes in daily life and as they faced opposition and persecution. Christians are to be responsible for their needs and their families and to care about and be concerned for others, but they are not to worry (Matthew 6:25-34).

Worrying is bad because it is a subtle form of distrust in God. When believers worry, they are saying that they don't trust that God will provide and they doubt that he cares or that he can handle their situation. Paul offered prayer as an antidote to worry. Instead, pray about everything. Prayer combats worry by allowing us catharsis. We can off-load our stress onto God. Paul said to take all the energy that is used in worrying and put it into prayer. This includes praying about everything. No request is too small, difficult, or inconsequential to God. Paul encouraged the believers to pray about what they need and then to thank God for all he has done. It may seem impossible not to worry about anything, but Paul explained that this can happen if believers truly give their worries to God. Worry and prayer cannot coexist.

4:7 If the Philippians would take to heart Paul's words in 4:4-6, then they will turn from anxiety to prayer and be filled with God's peace. This peace is different from the world's peace. It is peace that Jesus promised his disciples and all those who would follow him (John 14:27). True peace is not found in positive thinking, in absence of conflict, or in good feelings; it comes from knowing that God is in control. Believers are given peace with God when they believe (Romans 5:1), and they have the inner quiet of the peace of God as they daily walk with him.

God's peace is far more wonderful than the human mind can understand. Such peace cannot be self-generated; it comes from God alone; it is his gift to us in a difficult world. As with so much of God's dealings with humanity, we cannot understand it, but we can accept and experience God's peace because of his great love for us.

Why does God give his people peace? Because it will guard their hearts and minds. The Greek word for "guard" is a military term that means to surround and protect a garrison or city. The Philippians, living in a garrison town, were familiar with the Roman guards who maintained watch, guarding the city from any outside attack. God's peace is like soldiers surrounding believers' hearts and minds (that is, emotions and thoughts), securing them against threatening and harmful outside forces.

4:8 If one is to have this inner peace from God and maintain a life free of worry, then certain steps must be taken, notably in his or her thoughts. This list describes what should pervade believers' minds. Believers should fix their thoughts on things that are:

True. Truth includes facts and statements that are in accordance with reality (not lies, rumors, or embellishments), sincere (not deceitful or with evil motives), and loyal, faithful, proper, reliable, and genuine. Truth is a characteristic of God.

Honorable. These matters are worthy of respect, dignified, and exalted in character or excellence.

Right. Thoughts and plans that meet God's standards of rightness. They are in keeping with the truth; they are righteous.

Pure. Free from contamination or blemish; unmixed and unmodified; wholesome. Paul probably was speaking of moral purity, often very difficult to maintain in thoughts.

Lovely. Thoughts of great moral and spiritual beauty, not of evil.

Admirable. Things that speak well of the thinker—thoughts that recommend, give confidence in, afford approval or praise, reveal positive and constructive thinking. A believer's thoughts, if heard by others, should be admirable, not embarrassing.

Excellent. Moral excellence; nothing of substandard quality.

Worthy of praise. This phrase may be restated as "anything that deserves the thinker's praise" or "anything that God deems praiseworthy."

4:9 Paul had lived out and was continuing to live out his words, so he could urge the believers to put into practice what they had learned from him (from his teaching and training). The Scriptures were not compiled into a Bible until later, so the standards of belief and behavior were embodied in the teachings and example of those in authority. Paul could speak confidently; people could follow his example because he was following Christ's example (1 Corinthians 11:1). If the believers would keep on practicing the virtues that Paul cited above, they would experience the God of peace. God is the source of peace for all believers.

PAUL'S THANKS FOR THEIR GIFTS / 4:10-20

Although Paul had already thanked the Philippians for their partnership with him in spreading the gospel (1:5), in this section he specifically thanked them for their monetary gift. Paul never asked any of the churches to support him, yet the believers in Philippi had sincerely wanted to give, so Paul accepted.

4:10 Epaphroditus had been sent to Rome from Philippi with a generous financial gift for Paul, and it had come during a time of need. Paul's words sound harsh, but that harshness is absent in Greek. The second phrase explains that the church had always been concerned for Paul, but didn't have the chance to help. Whatever the reason for that lack of opportunity, Paul rejoiced not only at the gift and God's wondrous provision for his needs, but also for the church who cared so much about him and had not forgotten him.

Though Paul never asked for money for himself, he accepted the Philippians' gift because they gave it willingly and because he was in need. In 1 Corinthians 9:11-18, Paul wrote that he didn't accept gifts from the Corinthian church because he didn't want to be accused of preaching only to get money. But Paul maintained that it was a church's responsibility to support God's ministers (1 Corinthians 9:14).

4:11 At this point, Paul took pains to make sure that his words were not misunderstood. The fact that the Philippians had not sent help sooner did not mean that Paul had been disappointed in them or that he had been put in desperate straits at that time. Instead, he had learned an important secret to the Christian life—that he could get along happily with whatever he had, whether much or little. Paul had learned this—such contentment is not a natural human response. Paul explained that his sufficiency was in Christ alone, who provides strength to cope with all circumstances.

How do we get to that lofty goal of contentment? It is important for believers to realize that biblical "contentment" is not fatalism or acquiescence to one's lot in life. Such thinking would smother God's ongoing guidance. Rather, contentment involves one's perspective on life. To have real contentment, remember that everything belongs to God and what we have is a gift from him. Be thankful for what we have, not coveting what others have. Ask for wisdom to use wisely what we do have. Pray for grace to let go of the desire for what we don't have. Trust in God to meet our needs.

4:12 The following verses give a bit of Paul's personal testimony. Paul knew what it was like to live on almost nothing (see also 1 Corinthians 4:11-13; 2 Corinthians 6:4-10). Although he taught that the churches should support their leaders, Paul himself did not demand salaries from the churches that he had planted. This kept him above criticism (see 2 Corinthians 11:7). Thus with travel and food costs, Paul probably had very little to live on. Paul also knew how to live with everything. Literally, the meaning of the Greek word is "to overflow." This might refer to Paul's pre-Christian days as a fairly wealthy and influential Pharisee.

Whether Paul had plenty or little, he could keep life on an even keel because of contentment. What an important lesson for all believers to learn! No wonder Paul called it a secret.

4:13 Paul's contentment was not gained through stoic self-discipline. Instead, it was through Christ alone. In context, the word everything refers to the list in 4:11-12. In every possible circumstance, Paul could truly be content because he did not let outward circumstances determine his attitude. Christ was giving him the strength to continue with his ministry and the work of spreading the gospel whether he had plenty or was in need. Paul had complete confidence that, no matter what the circumstance, Christ would give him the strength to meet it.

This verse can be divided into two halves. The first half is, "I can do everything." To stop there and pull the words out of context would imply the idea of self-reliance, cocky self-assuredness. That's the kind of message we often hear from motivational speakers: "You can do anything you want if you put your mind to it." But that's not what the verse says. The last half reveals the source of our strength: Christ. God wants us to accomplish much for him in this world, but only through Christ. Instead of trusting our own strength and abilities, we must rely on Christ and his power.

Paul's confident words can be spoken by every Christian. The power we receive in union with Christ is sufficient to do his will and to face the challenges that arise from our commitment to doing it.

4:14 The Philippians shared in Paul's financial support while he was in prison, thus communicating their sympathy with him. The sense of this phrase, lost in the English translation, is a closeness between the apostle and the Philippian believers. That they had been willing to share in his present difficulty refers to having fellowship in them, identifying with the apostle on behalf of his work for the gospel. Paul commended them for this.

4:15-16 The “sharing” the Philippians had done with Paul refers to their partnership with him, revealed in the practical expression of financial support (see 4:10). Only the Philippian church had been ready to give financial help to Paul while he was ministering to them, and then when he traveled on from Macedonia to minister in other places. It seems that other churches did support Paul’s ministry later (see 2 Corinthians 11:8) but that the Philippians had been especially attentive and generous, sending gifts not only while Paul was in Thessalonica, but later when he was in Corinth (2 Corinthians 11:9).

4:17 Paul made it clear that his thankfulness for the Philippians’ generosity was not a veiled request for more. Instead, Paul focused on what their good works on his behalf were benefiting them in heaven. He knew that they would receive a well-earned reward because of their kindness. When we give to those in need, we benefit as well as the receiver, as we grow in the grace of giving (2 Corinthians 8:1, 6-7; 9:14). Paul appreciated the Philippians’ spirit of love and devotion more than their gifts.

4:18 This was Paul’s acknowledgment that he had received the Philippians’ most recent gifts and that Epaphroditus had faithfully fulfilled his mission (see 2:25). Their generous gift was more than Paul needed. Surely the Philippian church rejoiced that they had been able to meet Paul’s needs.

Paul described the Philippians’ gift as a sweet-smelling sacrifice. Their very gifts were acts of worship, and God was the true recipient. They had given in faith, not so much to Paul as to God. That should be the ultimate goal of every act of love, care, concern, and charity—to help, but also to please God (see 2 Corinthians 5:9; Hebrews 13:16).

4:19 The same God who had taken care of Paul would also supply all their needs. The Philippian church was not wealthy. God had met Paul’s need through the generosity of the Philippian church. God would more than repay that generosity by supplying the need of the Philippian church. Not only would God supply all their needs, but he would do it from his glorious riches. Believers cannot begin to comprehend God’s riches in glory—his riches are limitless, infinite. If it is from that storehouse that believers' needs are met, then the Philippian believers could rest assured that God would indeed meet every need, no matter how large, desperate, or hopeless it seemed.

4:20 God the Father was both Paul's God and the Philippians' God—and he is also our God. God who supplied Paul's needs and met the Philippians' needs is the same yesterday, today, and forever, and he promises to meet our needs. To God belongs all glory forever and ever. Paul broke into a doxology of praise as he remembered God's great love and provision. God alone deserves all glory from his creation. Amen, so be it.

PAUL'S FINAL GREETINGS / 4:21-23

Paul closed his letter by sending greetings from Rome and the Christians there to the believers in Philippi. The gospel had spread to all strata of society, linking people who had no other bond but Christ.

4:21 Paul sent his personal greetings to all the Christians in the Philippian church; he probably knew each by name. In addition, the brothers with Paul in Rome (his coworkers, such as Timothy) also sent their greetings to the Philippians.

4:22 Paul expanded his message to include a greeting from all the other Christians—that is, all the believers in the Roman church, some of whom are probably listed in Romans 16:1-15.

The mention of those who work Caesar's palace offers an interesting sidelight. There were many Christians in Rome; some were even in Caesar's palace. This probably did not refer to Emperor Nero's family or members of his court, but rather to Christians in civil service (perhaps some soldiers—especially those who guarded Paul!) or on the imperial staff as slaves or servants. Because Philippi was a Roman colony, there may have been a link between some on the imperial staff in Rome and those in some civil capacity in Philippi. Paul rejoiced because the gospel had infiltrated even into the emperor's household.

4:23 This letter to the Philippians begins and ends with grace (see 1:2). Paul had experienced God's undeserved favor, and he never tired of praying that others would also experience that grace.

In many ways the Philippian church was a model congregation. It was made up of many different kinds of people who were learning to work together. Paul recognized, however, that problems could arise, so in this thank-you letter, he prepared the Philippians for potential difficulties they might encounter. Though a prisoner in Rome, Paul had learned the true secret of joy and peace—imitating Christ and serving others. By focusing our minds on Christ we will learn unity, humility, joy, and peace. We will also be motivated to live for him.

COLOSSIANS

INTRODUCTION

The human brain is amazing. God has created us with the ability to think, react, reason, consider, meditate, learn, imagine, understand, philosophize, know, perceive, evaluate, theorize, reflect, predict, and communicate. Enamored with the incredible power of our minds, however, we can become complacent in our wisdom, proud of our mental abilities, and reliant on ourselves.

To be complimented as “smart,” “a genius,” or “very intelligent” feels great. Beyond this, to have special knowledge feels even better. We like to be seen as experts and sought out, as though we have a secret formula or inside information.

The philosophical system of Gnosticism emphasized the mind and taught that salvation could be obtained through knowledge (gnosis) instead of faith. This “knowledge” was esoteric and could only be acquired by those who had been initiated into the mysteries of the Gnostic system, not by study or the normal process of learning. With a strong appeal to human pride (who wouldn’t want to be on the “inside,” the recipient and owner of secrets and mysteries?), Gnosticism distorted Christian theology and twisted biblical truths in order to support its concepts. Perhaps the most foundational of these false teachings was that matter is inherently evil and only the spiritual or non-material is good. This led to denying the doctrines of Creation and the Incarnation (“How could God take on an ‘evil’ body?”), elevating the role of angels, and reducing Christianity to just one of many religions (Gnosticism sought to combine the “best” of all religions).

A kind of proto-Gnosticism was gaining popularity in Colosse; it was a combination of Gnostic concepts and Judaism. Full-fledged Gnosticism did not appear until the second century. In any event, Paul wrote to refute the error and to get the believers back on track. To do so, Paul highlighted the preeminence of Christ and the importance of godly living.

As you read Paul’s letter to the Colossian believers, use your God-given mind to evaluate your own belief system. Is it based on God’s word and centered on Christ? Or do you rely on human philosophy and your ability to think?

AUTHOR

Paul

Colossians identifies both the sender and receiver of this letter (1:1-2). This opening line also mentions Timothy, but in the rest of the epistle Paul often writes in the first person. As with Philippians, Paul's authorship was affirmed by the early church fathers and has not been seriously disputed through the centuries.

One of the strongest arguments for Paul as the author of Colossians is this letter's relation to Philemon. Both letters, sent to the same city, probably by the same messenger, contain many of the same names: Paul, Timothy, Onesimus, Archippus, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from a Roman prison in approximately ^{A.D.} 60. Colossians was written in the same year as Ephesians and Philemon. According to the reference in 4:3 to being in chains, in 4:10 to fellow prisoner Aristarchus, and in 4:18 to his chains, clearly Paul was in prison when he wrote this letter. Evidently Epaphras, who was visiting Paul or was imprisoned with him (Philemon 23), told him of the problems in Colosse (1:7).

AUDIENCE

The believers in Colosse.

Colosse lay about one hundred miles east of Ephesus, in the Lycus River valley in Phrygia, a district of Asia Minor (Turkey) that had been incorporated into the Roman province of Asia in the second century ^{B.C.} Located on the great east-west trade route linking the Aegean Sea and the Euphrates River, Colosse thrived as a center of commerce. At one point the city also may have been a military base. Colosse was known for the distinctive, glossy, deep purple wool from the sheep that grazed in the surrounding hills. By the time of Paul's missionary journeys, the trade route had changed, placing Colosse off the beaten path. Thus, Colosse had been surpassed in power and importance by Laodicea and Hierapolis (see 4:13), neighboring towns in the Lycus Valley. Colosse was further reduced by an earthquake at about the same time this letter was written.

The population of Colosse was diverse, including native Phrygians, Greek settlers, and Jews descended from Jewish families who had fled to the area during the persecutions of Antiochus the Great (223–187 ^{B.C.}).

Although Paul had traveled through Phrygia on his second and third missionary journeys (Acts 16:6; 18:23) and had lived for three years in Ephesus (Acts 19:1–20:1), it seems that he had never visited Colosse (see 1:9; 2:1–5). Yet Paul considered Colosse, as well as Laodicea and Hierapolis, to be in his area of responsibility, probably because the churches in these cities had been indirectly founded by him during his powerful ministry in Ephesus (see Acts 19:10, 26).

Quite possibly both Epaphras and Philemon had been converted to Christ during that time (see Philemon 19, 23).

The church may have been started by Epaphras who had been sent by Paul to preach to the Colossians (1:7). Epaphras probably began the work in Laodicea and Hierapolis as well (see 4:12-13). The church in Colosse was comprised mainly of Gentiles (including Apphia—Philemon 2). Archippus may have been the church's pastor (4:17). Philemon and his slave Onesimus lived there. In fact, the church met in Philemon's home (Philemon 2). Another group met in Nympha's house (4:15).

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

Word had come to Paul of false teaching in Colosse, so Paul wrote to encourage the believers in Colosse and to combat errors in the church.

Although Paul was a Roman prisoner, his prison was a rented house (Acts 28:16, 30-31). He was allowed to entertain many visitors and to preach and teach. One of Paul's visitors was Epaphras (although he may have been a prisoner as well—Philemon 23). Epaphras reported on the situation in Colosse, including word of false teaching that was threatening the church (1:8; 4:12). Paul wrote quickly to warn the believers of the dangers of this heresy. Paul also wanted to send a letter to Philemon, along with his runaway slave, Onesimus. He was able to send both letters with Tychicus (4:7-9). Paul had learned from Epaphras that the church at Colosse was threatened by false teaching, partly pagan and partly Jewish (2:8, 16, 18, 20). In fact, it seems to have been a mixture of Jewish and pagan religions.

The Jewish element asserted that true believers had to observe certain days, deny themselves certain foods, and follow certain rituals. The pagan element emphasized self-denial, the worship of angels, and a mystical "wisdom." This probably was an early form of Gnosticism, a complex belief system that would become very prevalent in the second century. Gnosticism emphasized the supremacy of knowledge and that salvation came through knowledge, not by faith. This knowledge was attained through astrology and magic and was available only to those who had been initiated into the Gnostic system. Another Gnostic belief, that all matter is inherently evil and only the spiritual and nonmaterial is of itself good, led to the idea that God could not have created the world and would have no contact with it. Therefore they taught that God, in Christ, never could have become a human person. If matter is evil, how could God ever be united with a human body? Thus they denied either the humanity or the divinity of Christ (in their view, he couldn't have been both).

The heretical poison in Colosse was a deadly Judaic-Gnostic combination.

So Paul wrote to warn the Colossian Christians of these errors of doctrine and practice:

- He warned against ritualism that had strict rules about permissible food and drink, religious festivals (2:16-17), and circumcision (2:11; 3:11).
- He warned against asceticism—the idea that the body is evil and that through self-torture or self-denial a person can attain exalted spirituality (1:22; 2:20-23).
- He warned against relying on human philosophy, knowledge, and tradition (2:4, 8).
- He warned against trying to obtain secret knowledge (2:18; see also 2:2-3).
- He warned against the worship of angels (2:18-19).
- He warned against making Christ any less than the divine Son of God, Lord of the universe, and Head of the church (1:13-20; 2:2-3, 9-10, 17).

Paul recognized that the most dangerous element of this heresy was the deprecation of Christ, so he focused much of his attention on Christ's supremacy. In fact, Colossians is the most Christ-centered book in the Bible.

Today we don't hear much about Gnosticism, but this heresy's false doctrines still abound: secret knowledge, mysticism, human philosophy, and syncretism. In fact, Jesus is seen as just one of many great historical religious leaders, not the unique Son of God and the only way to heaven (John 14:6).

Don't be deceived. These ideas may be popular, but they are wrong. Keep Christ, God's only Son and your Savior, at the center of your life. Follow only him, the God-man, your crucified and risen Lord.

MESSAGE

Paul's introduction to the Colossians includes a greeting, a note of thanksgiving, and a prayer for spiritual wisdom and strength for these brothers and sisters in Christ (1:1-12). He then moves into a doctrinal discussion of the person and work of Christ (1:13-23), stating that Christ is "the visible image of the invisible God" (1:15), the Creator (1:16), "head of the church" (1:18), and "the first of all who will rise from the dead" (1:18). His death on the cross makes it possible for us to stand in the presence of God (1:22).

Paul then explains how the world's teachings are totally empty when compared with God's plan, and he challenges the Colossians to reject shallow answers and to live in union with Christ (1:24-2:23).

Against this theological backdrop, Paul turns to practical considerations—what the divinity, death, and resurrection of Jesus should mean to all believers

(3:1–4:6). Because our eternal destiny is sure, heaven should fill our thoughts (3:1-4), sexual impurity and other worldly lusts should not be named among us (3:5-8), and truth, love, and peace should mark our life (3:9-15). Our love for Christ should also translate into love for others—friends, fellow believers, spouses, children, parents, slaves, and masters (3:16–4:1). We should constantly communicate with God through prayer (4:2-4), and we should take every opportunity to tell others the Good News (4:5-6). In Christ we have everything we need for salvation and for living the Christian life. Paul had probably never visited Colosse, so he concludes this letter with personal comments about their common Christian associations, providing a living lesson of the connectedness of the body of Christ.

The main themes in the book of Colossians include: Christ's Divinity, Christ as Head of the Church, Union with Christ, and Man-made Religion.

Christ's Divinity (1:15-20; 2:2, 9-12). Jesus Christ is God in the flesh, Lord of all creation, and Lord of the new creation. He is the expressed reflection of the invisible God. He is eternal, preexistent, omnipotent, and equal with the Father. He is supreme and complete. Jesus is God!

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Because Christ is divine and the Lord of all creation, our lives must be centered around him. We must honor him as our God and our Lord; we must not accept any substitutes, tolerate any additions, or entertain any thoughts of a diminished role. This means regarding our relationship with him as most vital and making his interests our top priority. Is Christ the number one priority, the Commander in chief, the Lord of your life? Do you honor and worship him as God?

Christ as Head of the Church (1:15-20; 3:15-17, 23-24). Because Christ is God, he is the head of the church. Christ is the founder, leader, and highest authority on earth. As such, he expects his followers to listen to him carefully and obey him completely. Christ requires first place in all of their thoughts and activities.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. To acknowledge Christ Jesus as our head, our Lord, we must welcome his leadership in all we do or think. No Christian individual, group, or church should regard any loyalty (to family, friends, country, employer, church, or denomination) more important than loyalty to Christ. Many voices vie for our attention and loyalty. We can feel pressure from peers and even from loved ones to think or act contrary to God's word. But only Christ should have our total allegiance. We should obey him regardless of what anyone else thinks or says. He is our head. In what ways are your loyalties divided? What can you do to better acknowledge Christ as your leader?

Union with Christ (1:13, 21-23; 2:6-15, 20; 3:1-4, 11, 15-17). Because believers' sins have been forgiven and they have been reconciled to God, they are united with Christ. That union can never be broken. Being united with Christ means being identified with his death, burial (2:20), and resurrection (3:1).

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. Because we have been united with Christ, we can have assurance of our salvation. Because we have been united with Christ, we should focus on heaven (3:2). And we should live as those who have been raised with Christ, ridding ourselves of all sinful habits related to life before Christ (3:8-11) and committing ourselves to good works (3:12-17).

Man-made Religion (2:8, 16-23). False teachers were promoting a heresy that stressed keeping rituals and rules (legalism). They also taught that spiritual growth was attained by discipline of the body (asceticism) and visions (mysticism). Emphasizing human knowledge, they missed God's wisdom; focusing on human philosophy, they didn't understand God; attempting to combine a variety of religious viewpoints, they lost sight of Christ.

IMPORTANCE FOR TODAY. We must not hold on to our own theories and ideas and try to blend them into Christianity. Nor should we allow our hunger for a more fulfilling Christian experience to cause us to trust in a teacher, group, or system of thought more than in Christ and in God's word. Don't be swayed or moved away from Christ by smooth-talking teachers, and don't be confused by attractive arguments and sophisticated philosophies. Keep your focus on Christ, and live by God's word.

OUTLINE OF COLOSSIANS

I. What Christ Has Done (1:1–2:23)

II. What Christians Should Do (3:1–4:18)

Paul had no doubt been through Laodicea on his third missionary journey, as it lay on the main route to Ephesus, but he had never been to Colosse. Though a large city with a significant population, Colosse was smaller and less important than the nearby cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis.

COLOSSIANS 1:1-23

GREETINGS FROM PAUL / 1:1-2

Colosse had early been a stopover along the main road from the east on the way to Ephesus. However, under the Roman Empire, the preferred route was through Laodicea, so Colosse declined in importance although it was still a large and busy city. As a trading center it was a crossroads for ideas and religions. Colosse had become the home of many Jews who had fled there when they were forced out of Jerusalem under the persecutions of Antiochus III and IV, almost two hundred years before Christ. The church in Colosse had been founded by Epaphras (1:7), one of Paul's converts. Although Paul had not yet visited this church, he wanted to write this letter to refute heretical teachings about Christ that were confusing many of the Christians there.

1:1 As at the beginning of all of his letters, Paul identified himself by name. But because Paul did not know the Colossian believers and because he needed to write to them about some specific doctrinal issues, he identified himself as an apostle of Christ Jesus. The word "apostle" means "one who is sent." Because Paul was not one of the original twelve disciples (who were called apostles after Jesus' resurrection), some doubted his credentials; yet Jesus had appeared to Paul personally and had commissioned him (Acts 9:1-6; 26:12-18). Thus, he was an apostle chosen by God. Paul's apostleship was not a matter of his own personal aspirations.

Timothy was the young man Paul had met in Lystra on the second missionary journey. Paul wanted Timothy to accompany him (Acts 16:1-3). Timothy probably came to believe in Christ through Paul, for Paul later calls him his son in the faith (1 Timothy 1:2). Timothy became Paul's assistant and emissary—traveling with him and sometimes for him. Timothy was not imprisoned with Paul, but he stayed in Rome to encourage Paul and to help with ministry needs. Thus, Paul's letter to the church in Colosse includes greetings from Timothy, a brother in the faith.

1:2 God's holy people were the believers. The city of Colosse was one hundred miles east of Ephesus on the Lycus River, and over one thousand miles from Rome, from which Paul was writing this letter. Paul often began his letters with greetings of grace and peace. Grace means God's unmerited favor; peace refers to the peace that Christ made between us and God through his death on the cross. Only God our Father can grant such wonderful gifts. Paul wanted his readers to experience God's grace and peace in their daily living.

PAUL'S THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER / 1:3-14

Paul made it a habit to pray for the churches—some he had visited, some he had not. He knew that the churches had to withstand difficulties from without and within. Paul wasn't able to go to the churches, and his letters would take weeks to arrive, but he could pray—regularly and persistently—for the strength and growth of the believers. Never underestimate the power of intercessory prayer. Who prays regularly for you? For whom do you regularly pray?

1:3 One characteristic of Paul was his constant prayers for the churches—those he knew well and those he did not. The word always could modify give thanks, or it could modify pray, referring to Paul always praying for the churches (and specifically the Colossian church) during his regular prayer times (see also 1:9). Picture Paul and Timothy (and others who might have joined with them) regularly kneeling in fervent prayer on behalf of specific congregations and even individual believers who sought to grow in their faith, sometimes in hostile environments. In those prayers, the believers thanked God—Paul explained what they gave thanks for in the following verses.

1:4-5 Paul had not been to Colosse; he had heard of their trust in Christ Jesus from Epaphras (1:7). He had also heard that they loved all of God's people and acted upon that love. Trust in Jesus refers to the vertical component of the Christian life; love refers to the horizontal relationships with other believers. The Colossians' trust in Christ Jesus and love for others had reason: they were looking forward to the joys of heaven. Why have faith in Jesus Christ if there is no hope for a glorious future? Why love others if it doesn't matter in the end? But looking forward to heaven makes all the difference. These believers have been looking forward to heaven since they first heard the truth of the Good News. Paul brought them the "truth" of the gospel as opposed to the heresy of the false teachers. No matter what interesting teaching or ideas they heard, the believers must hold on to the truth as it was taught to them, rejecting anything that contradicted that truth. They could trust Paul's teaching because they could trust the truth of the gospel.

1:6 Paul spoke of the Good News as an entity unto itself—something alive, growing, spreading, bearing fruit, and spreading some more. Paul was not exaggerating when he wrote the words, all over the world. He did not mean that every location on earth had been evangelized, but that the gospel was making headway across racial, national, and geographical barriers throughout the Roman Empire. Indeed, nothing could stop it from changing lives everywhere. Not only was the gospel growing and bearing fruit across the known world, it was doing the same right in the city of Colosse. When Epaphras first brought them the Good News of the gospel (1:7; 4:12-13), the Colossians heard and understood the truth about God's great kindness to sinners.

Here, in short summary, Paul emphasized what makes the Christian gospel so wonderfully helpful to us and so different from every other religion in the world. Through that gospel, God enabled us human beings to understand, with our limited ability, his grace upon us—his unmerited favor to his lowly creation. Of all the world religions, Christianity alone offers salvation without demands for pious works. Followers of Christ set down their load of sin and guilt at the cross and begin a life of pleasing God, who lovingly guides and directs them. Who can resist such an opportunity? Who can say no to such a God? Who would desire something other?

1:7 Epaphras had founded the church at Colosse while Paul was living in Ephesus (Acts 19:10). Epaphras may have been converted in Ephesus and then had returned to Colosse, his hometown. Paul called Epaphras a much loved coworker, a faithful servant, and a “fellow prisoner” (Philemon 23). The letter to the Colossians and the personal letter to Philemon were written at about the same time and sent to the same destination (the Colossian church met in Philemon's house). It is unclear from this verse whether Epaphras was actually in prison with Paul, or if Paul's words were metaphors of warfare or “captivity to Christ.” It is more likely that Epaphras was with Paul voluntarily and would return to Colosse. The Colossian believers could trust Epaphras, and they could trust his message. Paul was saying that Epaphras was speaking on behalf of the apostle himself. Epaphras's authority gave them good reason to not accept teachings that had come to them later and which were contradictory to Epaphras's teaching.

1:8 Undoubtedly, Epaphras had told Paul all about the church in Colosse. Some concern from Epaphras about the false teaching that had come into Colosse prompted Paul's response through this letter. But Epaphras had also told Paul about the character of the church—they had great love for one another, they showed love outside the fellowship, and they loved the well-known Paul as a brother in Christ, even though they had never met him. Such love comes from our relationship with Christ and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit because this love is a fruit of the Spirit. Christian love comes from the Holy Spirit (see Galatians 5:22). The Bible speaks of it as an action and attitude, not just an emotion. Love is a by-product of our new life in Christ (see Romans 5:5; 15:30; 1 Corinthians 13).

1:9 In 1:3, Paul had already mentioned that he continued praying for these believers (as he did for all the churches; see for example Romans 1:8-9 and Philippians 1:3-6, 9-11). Paul didn't know about a church in Colosse until he had heard about it from Epaphras, and Paul rejoiced to be able to pray for another growing church. Paul did not stop at saying that he prayed constantly for the Colossian believers; he went on to explain exactly what he prayed for them. He asked God that they have complete understanding of God's will for their lives. He asked that they be made wise with spiritual wisdom. These are not abstract concepts; instead, Paul was referring to the true wisdom and understanding made available by God's Holy Spirit. The Colossians needed to be filled with this type of spiritual wisdom and knowledge, leaving no room for any other type of false "knowledge" advocated by Gnostic heretics. Wisdom and understanding refer to discretion and discernment. When believers possess those, they will be able to discern the truth from false teaching.

1:10 True understanding and wisdom of God's will is inseparable from living in harmony with it. True knowledge leads to obedience; complete obedience cannot occur without the knowledge of God's will given by the Holy Spirit. The Colossian believers should live always to honor and please the Lord. By so doing, they will continually do good, kind things for others. Their behavior should match their status as God's holy people. They ought to be following God closely—their lives being transformed to Christlikeness. A Christian must be active in order to grow spiritually and to live worthy of the Lord.

Is it possible for Christians to please God? Apparently so, for Paul prayed exactly that for the Colossian believers. Perfection will not be achieved in this life, yet believers press on toward the goal of God's high calling (Philippians 3:12-14). In the meantime, believers can be fully pleasing to God by virtue of their relationship with him and their attempts to "live in order to please" him in all areas of life (1 Thessalonians 4:1).

1:11-12 The Colossians' growth in the knowledge of God and the resultant fruit would help to strengthen them. Paul continued his prayer for the believers, asking God that they be strengthened with his glorious power. One can hardly pray a more wonderful prayer. To be made strong with God's power is to be given incredible strength—it was God's glorious power that created the universe and that brought Jesus back to life. One can hardly imagine more power. In fact, Paul's words here show the inadequacy of describing God's power—it is beyond our words or our human minds to comprehend. Yet that power is available to believers and to the church so they can fulfill their mission in the world. Paul wanted the Colossian believers to be strengthened with God's power so they would not be pulled away from their faith and their witness to the world.

This power would give them all the patience and endurance they would need. Patience is the ability to stand firm against opposition without giving up; it is often used in describing one's dealings with difficult people. Endurance is the ability to continue toward a goal regardless of the obstacles; it is often used in relation to difficult circumstances. Both would be needed by the believers in Colosse, and both come from the empowerment of God's glorious strength. Paul reminded the Colossians that even when they were surrounded by persecution and false teaching, they had the strength to continue toward the goal of their faith and to stand firm against the opposition. It is God's power that helps believers endure and be patient even as they are filled with joy that overflows in always thanking the Father.

Why? Because Jesus Christ made it possible for the believers to share the inheritance that belongs to God's holy people. By using the word inheritance, Paul was alluding to the inheritance of the Promised Land, first promised to Abram for his faithfulness to God (Genesis 13:14-17). God's people, the Old Testament saints, inherited a portion of a bountiful land (Numbers 26:52-56; 34:2, 13). God's people in the New Testament are the very sons of God, and as such they have the right to inherit Christ and a glorious eternity in the light. The promise of land is broadened to include the whole creation (Romans 4:14; 8:17-25). Paul was most likely setting up the contrast between the state of "light" that the believers have been transferred to from their previous state of "darkness" as described in 1:13.

1:13 This verse continues the thought from 1:12; Paul still had in mind the analogy of Israel inheriting the Promised Land. The book of Exodus tells the story of how God rescued (or delivered) his people from Egypt (typifying Satan's kingdom of darkness) and took them to the Promised Land (typifying the Kingdom of his dear Son). (See Exodus 6:6; 12:27; 14:30.) Jesus referred to the kingdom of darkness at his arrest in the Garden of Gethsemane (Luke 22:53), describing the forces of evil that he had to combat in his final hours. In Scripture, "darkness" is a metaphor for evil; it is the dominion of those who are without God. True believers, however, have been transferred from darkness to light, from slavery to freedom, from guilt to forgiveness, and from the power of Satan to the power of God. We have been rescued from a rebel kingdom to serve the true King. That King, the Son God loves, is described in the following verses (1:15-20).

1:14 Believers are able to be in Christ's Kingdom because through Jesus Christ, God has purchased our freedom with his blood and has forgiven all our sins. That is the way God chose to buy sinful people back—he offered his Son in exchange for us. Paul was reminding the Colossian believers that they were not saved by knowledge or by good works or by inclusion in some sort of secret religious cult; they were saved by the blood of Jesus Christ. Through him alone had they received the forgiveness of sins.

If we want to be freed from the deadly consequences of our sins, a tremendous price must be paid. But we don't have to pay it. Jesus Christ, our substitute, has already redeemed us by his death on the cross. Our part is to trust him and accept his gift of eternal life. Our sins have been paid for, and the way has been cleared for us to begin a relationship with God.

CHRIST IS SUPREME / 1:15-23

In the Colossian church there were several misconceptions about Christ that Paul directly refuted in this section:

- Believing that matter is evil, false teachers argued that God would not have come to earth as a true human being in bodily form. Paul stated that Christ is the image—the exact likeness—of God and is himself God, and yet he died on the cross as a human being.
- They believed that God did not create the world because he would not have created evil. Paul proclaimed that Jesus Christ, who was also God in the flesh, participated in the creation of the universe.
- They said that Christ was not the unique Son of God but rather one of many intermediaries between God and people. Paul explained that Christ existed before anything else and is the firstborn of those resurrected.
- They refused to see Christ as the source of salvation, insisting that people could find God only through special and secret knowledge. In contrast Paul openly proclaimed the way of salvation to be through Christ alone. Paul continued to bring the argument back to Christ.

1:15 Many New Testament scholars believe that this section was based on a hymn written before Paul wrote his letter to the Colossians. If this was a hymn, we can assume that it was known to the church at Colosse and to other Christians. Paul would not have quoted something unknown to them. However,

Paul was very capable of writing such poetic lines, as demonstrated in passages such as Romans 8:37-39 and 1 Corinthians 13:4-8. These verses are regarded as some of the most important verses in the New Testament establishing the deity of Jesus Christ.

Christ is the visible image of the invisible God—the verb is present tense, describing Jesus' position now and forever (John 10:30, 38; 12:45; 14:1-11). God as Spirit is invisible and always will be (1 Timothy 6:16). God's Son is his visible expression. He not only reflects God, but, as God, he reveals God to us (John 1:18; 14:9; Hebrews 1:1-2).

Christ existed before God made anything at all. Thus he is supreme over all creation. He has all the priority and authority of the firstborn prince in a king's household (Hebrews 1:2). He came from heaven, not from the dust of the earth (1 Corinthians 15:47), and he is Lord of all (Romans 9:5; 10:12; Revelation 1:5; 17:14). Christ is supreme over all creation, including the spirit world.

Paul explained in no uncertain terms that the Colossian believers had to focus on the deity of Jesus Christ (that Jesus is God) or their Christian faith would fall prey to false teaching. To put Jesus any lower is to lose the central truth of Christianity.

1:16 All things were created through Christ (John 1:3). Just as all the fullness of Deity is in him (1:19), so in him are all the creative powers that make him the supreme Lord. Because the false teachers believed that the physical world was evil, they thought that God himself could not have created it. If Christ were God, they reasoned, he would be in charge only of the spiritual world. But Paul explained that everything in heaven and earth was created by Christ, things we can see and the things we can't see, the visible and invisible world (physical government and spiritual forces). Christ has no equal and no rival. Because Christ is the Creator of the world, all powers, whether the spiritual forces the Colossians wished to study or any material force, were under Christ's final authority.

Paul's words here refuted the false teaching that Christ was one of many intermediaries and that the angels were to be worshiped. All angelic and celestial powers in heaven and on earth are subject to Christ. He is the Lord of all.

1:17 Christ existed before everything else began. He is not only the Creator of the world, he is also its Sustainer. By him everything came to be, and by him everything holds together. In him, everything is held together, protected, and prevented from disintegrating into chaos (see Acts 17:28). Because Christ is the Sustainer of all life, nothing in creation is independent from him. In him alone and by his word, we find the unifying principle of all of life (Hebrews 1:2-3). The Colossians, and all believers, are his servants who must daily trust him for protection, care, and sustenance.

1:18 While 1:15-17 unveiled the Son's relationship to the "old creation" (the world), this verse describes his relationship to the "new creation"—that is, the church. The church (meaning the body of believers) existed because Christ was its beginning, its source, its head. Just as the parts of the body function under the direction of the brain, so Christians are to work together under the command and authority of Jesus Christ.

Paul repeated that Christ is the first of all who will rise from the dead. He was the first to die and come back to life. He was "first" both in time and rank; there will be many more who will live forever after physical death (1 Corinthians 15:20). All who trust in Christ will also defeat death and rise again to live eternally with him (1 Corinthians 15:20; 1 Thessalonians 4:14). This makes him first in everything.

Jesus' resurrection is the cornerstone of the Christian faith, the reason that the church even exists. Only Christianity has a God who became human, died for his people, and was raised again in power and glory to rule the old creation and the new creation (the church) forever. The Resurrection assures believers that Christ is not a legend; he is alive and ruling his Kingdom. Because Christ is spiritually supreme in the universe, surely we should give him first place in all our thoughts and activities.

1:19-20 The little word for explains why Christ will have first place in everything. God wanted his fullness (meaning "completeness" or "totality") to live (meaning "live permanently") in Christ. Paul wanted to explain to the Colossians that Christ is God's dwelling place; therefore, Christ is divine, sovereign, and preeminent. Christ perfectly displays all the attributes and activities of God: Spirit, Word, wisdom, glory.

By this statement, Paul was refuting the Greek idea that Jesus could not be human and divine at the same time. Christ is fully human; he is also fully divine. Nor is there more than one God; this one God, in all his fullness, resides in Christ. Christ has always been God and always will be God. All of God (including his attributes, characteristics, nature, and being) indwells the Son. When we have Christ we have all of God in human form. Any teaching that diminishes any aspect of Christ—either his humanity or his divinity—is false teaching.

God's fullness dwells in Christ and in that fullness he reconciled everything to himself. This reconciliation was accomplished through Christ's blood on the cross. "Reconciliation" means reestablishing a relationship, causing a relationship to become friendly and peaceable when it had not been so. Because Christ is Creator and Sustainer of everything (1:17), his death on the cross provided reconciliation for everything. But what did Paul mean by "everything"?

First, consider what this reconciliation means for humanity. There can be no peace between sinful humans and a holy God. Because people are born into sin, they cannot become good enough to be acceptable to God. In Old Testament times, God accepted symbolic offerings. Jesus had not yet been sacrificed, so God accepted the life of an animal in place of the life of the sinner. When Jesus came, he substituted his perfect life for our sinful lives, taking the penalty for sin that we deserve. The penalty for sin is death. We are guilty and culpable, but Jesus took the punishment. Thus, he redeemed us from the power of sin and reconciled us to God.

Second, does this reconciliation of "everything" mean that everyone will be saved? From other passages, we know that Paul understood salvation to be something accepted or rejected by humans, who are given the choice (for example, see 2 Thessalonians 1:5-10). The scope of God's reconciliation is universal—it is offered to all people. But reconciliation is accomplished only for those who accept Christ as Savior (2 Corinthians 5:17-18).

Third, what does this reconciliation mean for "everything" (besides humans)? Just as all of creation fell when Adam sinned, so all of creation will be reconciled. Sin has caused all creation to fall from the perfect state in which God created it. Thus, the world is subject to decay so that it cannot fulfill its intended purpose. One day, all creation will be liberated and transformed (Romans 8:19-21).

In addition, Paul's reference to things in heaven and on earth was meant to be another blow to the false teachers. Nothing in the universe escapes Christ's reach. There is no neutral ground; everything falls under his power. No alien force of darkness can undermine his work or his church. Satan and demons will not be reconciled to God; instead, their end is certain (see Revelation 20:7-10).

1:21-22 Paul gave the reason why we need reconciliation. The believers in Colosse had, at one time, been far away (separated, estranged) from God and they were his enemies. Their thoughts and behaviors had revealed, not apathy or ignorance, but hostility toward God because of sin. They were strangers to God's way of thinking. Wrong thinking leads to sin, which further perverts and destroys thoughts about him. When people are out of harmony with God, their natural condition is to be totally hostile to his standards.

God made peace by his death on the cross in his own human body (1:20). In order to answer the false teaching that Jesus was only a spirit and not a true human being, Paul explained that Jesus' fleshly, physical body actually died. Jesus suffered death fully as a human; thus, we can be assured that he died in our place. Since Jesus, as perfect God, faced death, we can be assured that his sacrifice was complete and that he truly removed our sin.

What is the goal of this reconciliation? He wants to bring his people into the very presence of God, holy and blameless, without a single fault. Believers can be called holy and blameless because they have been acquitted of all charges (Ephesians 5:27; Jude 24). Christ's act of reconciliation put believers in perfect standing with God. By Christ's death on the cross, God already dealt with sin. His goal is to make believers his holy people, to transform their character so they can live consistent with their faith. The pattern is the perfect life lived by Jesus Christ. The process of living the Christian life will end with the resurrection and will result in believers being presented to God as his dear and beloved children.

1:23 The certainty of believers' present and future status with God should not be an excuse for careless living or dabbling in heresy. Paul warned the Colossian believers to continue to believe this truth and stand in it firmly. As they built their lives upon the foundation laid by the gospel, they ought to build carefully through obedience. Then their "building" would stand firm. The Colossians should not wander off into false teaching that contradicted the gospel they had heard and the hope they had believed for salvation.

As Paul closed his introductory section, he made one final stab at the doctrine of the false teachers by proclaiming that the gospel has been preached all over the world. Spiritual reality was not, as the false teachers claimed, available only to a select group of intellectually elite people. The hope of the gospel is available to the whole world. And the writer, Paul, had been appointed by God to proclaim that message. This was the gospel to which Paul had become a servant; this was the only true gospel. This was what the Colossians had heard and believed. There ought to be no excuse for wandering away into false teaching.

COLOSSIANS 1:24–2:23

PAUL'S WORK FOR THE CHURCH / 1:24–2:5

Paul was combating a false teaching in the Colossian church similar to Gnosticism (from gnosis, the Greek word for knowledge). Though Gnosticism did not become fashionable until the second century, even in Paul's day these ideas sounded attractive to many, and exposure to such teachings could easily seduce a church that didn't know Christian doctrine well. We combat heresy by becoming thoroughly acquainted with God's word through personal study and sound Bible teaching. In this chapter, Paul wanted to help the Colossian believers guard against those who would undermine the simple faith and sufficiency they had found in Christ.

1:24 Sitting in his prison in Rome and suffering for his faith, Paul was able to say I am glad even as he suffered. Paul was honored to be suffering, and he rejoiced at what God was doing in the churches and in the believers who were gaining courage and faith by watching Paul's example. Perhaps the false teachers had pointed to Paul's imprisonment as proof that his leadership and his teachings were in question. Paul explained that, instead, his imprisonment proved the truth of his words, and he could rejoice in that imprisonment knowing that it was all part of God's plan, for his body, the church.

Paul's words, "I am completing what remains of Christ's sufferings," did not mean that Christ's suffering was inadequate to save people. Paul believed that Christ's suffering on the cross alone paid for believers' salvation from sin (Romans 3:23-25). (See also 1 Corinthians 1:18-31; 2 Corinthians 5:16-21; Galatians 1:4; Colossians 2:13-14.)

While we know what Paul did not mean by these words, we must consider several interpretations regarding what he did mean. There are three main views:

1. One view comes from the Jewish belief that an anointed ruler would come and God's people would be called upon to suffer (Daniel 12:1). However, God would set a limit to these sufferings. Paul saw himself as suffering on behalf of the church, thereby completing what remained of that set amount of suffering. Some commentators consider that Paul thought that by his suffering he actually was saving others from suffering. This view seems unlikely, however, because Paul was tying suffering to the spread of the gospel, not to preparation for the end times.
2. Referring to Paul's words in Philippians 3:10 where Paul wanted to suffer with Christ, he may have meant that he wanted to complete in himself what was lacking in his understanding of Christ's suffering. This also seems unlikely in this context, however, because Paul was emphasizing the believers' completeness in Christ.

3. Another view refers to the mystical union between Paul and Christ and between Christ and the church. What Paul suffered, Christ suffered, because Paul was a member of Christ's body on earth. What Christ began as suffering with his persecution and rejection on earth, all believers complete in his continuing body on earth. This view seems most likely because it stresses that the cause of the suffering would be the extension of the gospel to all the world. Paul shared the suffering of the Messiah as he brought the Messiah's message to the world.

Jesus had warned his followers to expect affliction (John 15:20-21). This suffering would not be limited to Paul. By identifying themselves with Christ, all believers would face affliction. Not all would face imprisonment, as Paul did, but all would have varying degrees and kinds of suffering simply because they have allied themselves with Christ in a world hostile to Christ. But this suffering should be cause for rejoicing. Suffering does not mean that Christ is losing ground, but that he is gaining it and that the present age is passing away to eventually herald in the age to come when Christ will reign.

1:25-26 Paul explained that God had given him the responsibility of serving his church by proclaiming his message in all its fullness to you Gentiles. When Paul was commissioned by God, the focus of his ministry was made clear—he would go to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15). Paul was keenly aware of who had commissioned him, to whom he had been commissioned, and what he had been called to do. Paul's ministry among the Gentiles was to fully make known the word of God and to bring the preaching of the word of God to completion. Without Paul's ministry concerning God's plan for Christ and the church, God's word, the revelation of his will, would be unfinished. The heresy in Colosse focused on mystical knowledge, and only a few could find the "fullness of knowledge" needed for inclusion in their special group. Thus, when Paul wrote of making God's word fully known to all the believers, he was pointing out once again that God's word is for all people. They could have all the wisdom they needed to be saved and to grow in Christ.

Making God's word fully known meant revealing a message that had been kept secret for centuries and generations past. This message was hidden, not because only a few could understand it, but because it was hidden until Christ came. With Christ's coming and the beginning of Christianity, that message is no longer hidden; it has been revealed to those who believe, that is, his holy people. God's plan was hidden from previous generations, not because God wanted to keep something from his people, but because he was going to reveal it in his perfect timing. Paul was explaining that God's time for action was then and there.

What is that hidden message? Paul wrote the answer in Ephesians 3:1-6. The mystery hidden throughout the ages was that one day Jews and Gentiles would be joined together in one body because of their common belief in Jesus Christ as Savior. The Old Testament revealed that the Gentiles would receive salvation (Isaiah 49:6), but it was never explained that Gentile and Jewish believers would become equal in the body of Christ, with no divisions between them. In the Old Testament, Gentiles could convert to Judaism but would always be considered "second-class" Jews, not pure Jews. With the coming of Christ, however, and the new union he created through his church, all believers were joined together in Christ's body.

1:27 God's hidden message is not a puzzle to solve; instead, it is like a treasure chest filled with the riches and glory of Christ, and the message is that the riches are available to the Gentiles. These words would have been joyful to Paul's Gentile audience, that God was pleased to offer salvation to them. They did not need to acquire some secret knowledge in order to find God; God had reached down to them because he wanted to save them.

God made the secret available to Jews and Gentiles alike, and the secret is Christ lives in you. Jews and Gentiles will have that oneness in Christ's body because God had planned from the beginning of time to have Christ live in the heart of each person who believes in him. The indwelling Christ gives believers assurance that they will share in his glory in his eternal Kingdom. Believers are in Christ; Christ is in them; therefore, believers can look forward to sharing Christ's glory.

1:28-29 The word we includes Paul and his coworkers, particularly Epaphras and Tychicus who served the Colossian church. Paul and his coworkers were telling the Good News about Christ, who at present was dwelling in them as well as in the Colossian believers, making all of them one body awaiting a glorious future.

Their proclaiming of Jesus Christ included both warning and teaching. The word warn (also translated "admonishing") connects with repentance and refers to a person's conduct and heart attitude. Teach is connected to faith and doctrine and refers to a person's intellect. Paul needed both, and all the wisdom God had given him, especially when dealing with false teachers.

The warning and teaching always had one goal in mind: we want to present the believers to God, perfect in their relationship to Christ. This "presentation" would be when Christ returned. Believers are not to remain like babies in the faith, easily led away by something new (see also 1 Corinthians 3:1-2). Instead, they are to grow up into spiritual maturity so that they cannot be enticed by false teachings. God makes this possible only through a personal relationship with Christ. This relationship with Christ, empowered by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, helps believers grow in faith and maturity until the day when Christ returns. Paul worked very hard for this goal. His task was not simple. He struggled against false teaching, persecution, and questions about his qualifications. He bore heartache and concern on behalf of the churches because he had his goal always before him. Not only did he want people to accept the gospel, but he also wanted them to mature in their faith. Thus he wrote letters, prayed constantly, traveled to many churches, stayed and worked and taught in some places, sent emissaries on his behalf, wrote more letters upon the reports of these emissaries in order to deal with specific situations facing some churches, and sent emissaries back for reports.

Paul did not struggle with his own strength alone, however. He depended on Christ's mighty power that worked within him. Paul needed God's supernatural power, and God supplied it.

2:1 Paul's labor and struggle were not limited to those churches he had planted or even to people he knew personally. Paul also worked on behalf of those who had never met him. He agonized for the Colossians in prayer and with the concern that had prompted the writing of this letter. Paul struggled, knowing that the false teaching threatened to keep the Colossian believers from maturing in their faith.

Laodicea was located a few miles northwest of Colosse. Like the church at Colosse, the Laodicean church was probably founded by one of Paul's converts while Paul was staying in Ephesus (Acts 19:10), perhaps even Epaphras, who had founded the Colossian church. The city was a wealthy center of trade and commerce, but later Christ would criticize the believers at Laodicea for their lukewarm commitment (Revelation 3:14-22). The fact that Paul mentioned this city and either wanted this letter to be passed on to the church there or wrote a separate one (4:16), indicates that false teaching may have spread there as well.

2:2-3 Paul wanted those he had not been able to visit to know that he was interested in them and was praying diligently for them. He simply prayed that the Colossians would be encouraged and that they would be knit together by strong ties of love. These two characteristics would help them resist false teaching.

Paul also wanted these churches to have full confidence because they have complete understanding of God's secret plan, which is Christ himself. Christ is the secret, yet he is a secret revealed to those who believe. This complete understanding obtained through a personal relationship with Christ himself assures believers of the truth and helps them recognize and avoid heresy. Everything anyone wants to know about God and his purposes in the world is answered in the person of Christ. The secret is revealed because it is Christ in whom lie hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. True wisdom is found only in Christ; true knowledge is found only in Christ. Knowledge is often described as good judgment, wisdom as application of that good judgment in the form of good actions. The false teachers claimed to have a higher knowledge than what ordinary believers possessed. Against this, Paul argued that all wisdom and knowledge were in Christ and that Christ's treasures were accessible to every believer. Hidden does not mean concealed but rather that they were laid up or stored away to be made available to those who desire a relationship with Christ.

Certainly these words greatly comforted the Colossian believers who did not have to look any farther for wisdom and knowledge than to their Savior, Jesus Christ. The believers already possessed all wisdom and knowledge, yet they had a long way to go to attain maturity and complete understanding.

2:4 The believers in Colosse already knew what they needed to know to be saved; they already knew the One they needed to know to have eternal life. But they needed to grow to maturity in the faith they had received. That way no one would be able to deceive them with persuasive arguments. The false teachers did a good job of making their teachings sound plausible and of using persuasive tactics to cause the believers to question their faith. When believers are fully committed to the truth in Jesus, they will not be easily deluded.

2:5 Paul couldn't go to Colosse due to his imprisonment, but his heart was with them. He knew that they were living as they should and had strong faith in Christ. These two characteristics caused Paul to be happy, for they meant that the Colossians had not succumbed to the false teaching. They were a unified body, steadfast in their faith.

FREEDOM FROM RULES AND NEW LIFE IN CHRIST / 2:6-23

Paul rejoiced in the Colossians' unity and steadfast faith because these proved they had not given ground to the heresy. But Paul wanted to insure that they wouldn't give in and believe the lies of the false teachers. So he launched into a full-scale rebuttal of the false teaching.

2:6 The Colossians had not merely accepted the doctrines of Christ, they had accepted Christ himself as Lord. The verb accepted means more than the moment a person asks Christ into his or her heart. Paul most likely used the word, taken from Judaism, to describe the transmitting and safeguarding of traditions and teachings from one person or generation to another. Thus when Paul reminded the Colossians of when they received Christ Jesus, he was reminding them of their receiving the proclamation and teaching, and their confession of faith, their baptism, and their new status as members of Christ's body.

Because Christ dwells within all believers through the Holy Spirit, they should live in obedience to him. The past event of receiving Christ should be a present reality in the believers' daily lives.

2:7 Paul used several metaphors in these verses. Each metaphor has a specific and profound point for Christian living. First, the Colossians were to let their roots grow down into Christ. Just as plants draw nourishment from the soil through their roots, so the believers should draw up nourishment from Christ. The more they would draw strength from Christ, the less they would be fooled by those who falsely claimed to have life's answers.

Second, the Colossians were to grow in faith. Like a plant, they were "rooted" once and for all, but they had to grow continuously. Or like a building, they had a solid foundation, but had to keep on building with solid materials in order to be strong.

Third, the Colossians were to be strong and vigorous in the truth. This too is continuous action, an ongoing process. The truth which these Colossian believers had been taught should be a source of abundant thanksgiving. True understanding of what Christ has done on behalf of believers can lead to no other response than gratefulness.

2:8 Paul strongly warned about the heresy's effect on those who believed it. They would be led astray. According to Paul, the heresy amounted to nothing more than empty philosophy and high-sounding nonsense. The word translated "philosophy" occurs only here in the New Testament, so this may have been a significant feature of this heresy. In Greek, the word “philosophy” means “love of wisdom.” Paul was a gifted philosopher, so he was not condemning education or the study of philosophy. Instead, he was condemning false philosophy, the kind that is deceptive because it keeps people from seeing the truth.

Paul was so disparaging toward this heresy because it came from human thinking and from the evil powers of this world. No man-made religion can lead to the truth, for truth can be found only in Christ. True philosophy will focus on Jesus Christ—it will not put Christ in any lower position, nor will it focus on human endeavor.

2:9 Again Paul asserted Christ’s divine nature (see 1:19). In Christ designates a local or spatial relationship rather than a mystical relationship. God’s saving action happens in the person of Jesus Christ. In 2:9-15, every verse contains the word “Christ,” showing that Christ is the center of God’s saving activity. The fullness of God refers to all the divine attributes. God’s nature and person are in Christ’s human body. The false teaching said that Christ could not have been both man and God. But Paul clearly stated that this was indeed the case. Paul made two significant points in this sentence: (1) Christ was not another deity along with God; instead, God’s fullness was dwelling uniquely and supremely in Christ. (2) Christ was not less than God.

2:10 Not only does all the fullness of the Deity dwell in Christ, but all believers have been given fullness (been made complete) through their union with Christ. The Colossians lacked nothing outside of Christ; in him they had everything they needed for salvation and right living. But what does this “completeness” mean? It means that there is nothing lacking in a believer’s relationship with God. God pours his love and power into believers, giving them fullness for this life and readying them for the life to come. Believers need not look anywhere else. Christ is the unique source of knowledge and power for the Christian life.

Christ is not just one of many intermediaries or angels who must be worshiped, as the heresy maintained. Instead, he is the Lord over every ruler and authority in the universe. Because Christ is the head and is superior to any angel or archangel, it would be absurd to worship or venerate any angel. Again this countered the false teaching.

2:11 Jewish males were circumcised as a sign of the Jews’ covenant with God (Genesis 17:9-14). Circumcision was an expression of Israel’s national identity and was a requirement for all Jewish men. Circumcision (cutting off the foreskin of the penis) was a physical reminder to Jews of their national heritage and privilege. It symbolized “cutting off” the old life of sin, purifying one’s heart, and dedicating oneself to God (Deuteronomy 10:16; Jeremiah 4:4; Ezekiel 44:7). Bodily circumcision was no longer necessary to be identified as God’s people. Paul explained that all believers were circumcised, but not by a physical procedure. Instead, their circumcision involved cutting away the sinful nature. The Colossian believers had become God’s children. The sign of their new life was not a cutting of the flesh, but a cutting away of the sinful nature. Their commitment to God had been written on their hearts, not on their bodies. Only Christ could perform this spiritual procedure, for only by accepting him as Savior can people be saved.

2:12 Baptism parallels the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, and it also portrays the death and burial of the believer’s sinful way of life. In the church of Paul’s day, many people were baptized by immersion—that is, new Christians were completely “buried” in water. They understood this form of baptism to symbolize being buried with Christ, thus the death and burial of the old way of life. When Christ died, our old nature died with him also. This was a spiritual circumcision (2:11). Baptism also portrays the death of our old nature.

Coming up out of the water symbolized being raised to a new life with Christ. It also symbolized the future bodily resurrection. Believers’ faith is in the mighty power of God that raised Christ from the dead, and thus it is faith in the power that will one day raise us from the dead.

2:13 The Colossians were Gentiles, so they were uncircumcised, but that was not the cause of their spiritual death. It was their uncircumcised sinful nature that made them dead in their sins (see 2:11-12). In Deuteronomy 10:16, Moses told the people of Israel to circumcise their hearts. He wanted the people to go beyond physical surgery; they needed to submit to God in their hearts as well as in their bodies. Jeremiah echoed that teaching in Jeremiah 4:4. In Romans 2:29, Paul taught, “true circumcision is not a cutting of the body but a change of heart produced by God’s Spirit.” The Colossians, as Gentiles, had been dead in sin and outside the scope of God’s mercy.

To defeat death, God made us alive; to deliver us from sin, he made us alive with Christ. Because God raised Christ, those who belong to Christ are raised as well. The penalty of sin and its power over believers were miraculously destroyed by Christ on the cross. Through faith in Christ, believers are acquitted, or found not guilty, before God, their judge. How did this happen? The answer is simple: He forgave all our sins. If our sinful nature caused us to be dead, then that sinful nature had to be dealt with before God could make us alive. The word “forgave” is in the past tense, referring to Christ’s work on the cross. God’s forgiveness opens the way for believers to experience new life in Christ.

2:14 In forgiving all our sins, Christ canceled the record that contained the charges against us. This record was like a handwritten ledger of our trespasses against the law. Humanity could not pay the debt for these offenses, so God wiped out the record of our sin for us by nailing it to Christ’s cross. In so doing, our debts were canceled; what stood against us can no longer hinder us. Christ set us free by his sacrificial death on the cross.

2:15 Not only did Christ’s death on the cross pay humanity’s debt to God, his death also meant his triumph over the evil rulers and authorities. Who are these? Several suggestions have been made, including (1) demonic powers, (2) the gods of the powerful nations, (3) the government of Rome, or even (4) angels (highly regarded by the heretical teachers). Since Paul did not identify who these powers and authorities were, it could be any one of them, or all four. What Christ disarmed on the cross was any embodiment of rebellion in the world—whether that be Satan and his demons, false idols of pagan religions (as in 2:16), evil world governments, or even God’s good angels when they become the object of worship (as in the Colossian heresy).

This “disarming” occurred when Jesus died on the cross. The word for “disarmed” is literally “stripped,” as in stripping a defeated enemy of armor on the battlefield. The powers and authorities of this evil world stripped Christ of his clothing and popularity, made a public spectacle of him on the cross, and triumphed over him by putting him to death. Ironically, the victory belonged to Christ. Actually he shamed them publicly by his victory.

2:16 Because Christ had canceled the written code (2:14) and had disarmed evil powers (2:15), believers have been set free from legalistic rules about what they eat or drink or what festivals they observe. Although it is most likely that Paul was referring to Jewish laws about diet and festival observances, pagan food laws and celebrations, or a combination of the two, cannot be excluded as a possibility. Paul’s point was that the believers should not give up their freedom for legalism. They must not let anyone condemn them by saying that certain actions would exclude them from God’s people. If the Colossians submitted to any of the regulations imposed by the false teachers, they would be saying that evil powers still held authority over them. They needed to remember that Christ had set them free.

2:17 Paul did not condemn the keeping of some Old Testament dietary laws or observing some of the celebrations. Instead, he condemned doing so in order to somehow earn credit with God. The Old Testament laws, holidays, and feasts were shadows of the real thing. The law pointed to the future—to Christ himself. Anything that is not Christ or found in Christ is, by contrast, a shadow or unreal. At one time these laws were needed as God prepared a nation for himself. These people would be keepers of his laws and ancestors of his Son. The ceremonial and civil regulations of Judaism set God's people apart from the world. Through Christ, however, God was preparing a new people for himself—a worldwide family. What the Old Testament promised, Christ fulfilled. If we have Christ, we have what we need in order to know and please God.

2:18 By turning the Colossian believers away from the reality back to the shadow, the false teachers served only to condemn the believers. Paul did not mean that the believers would lose their salvation, but that they would lose their prize (that is, their rewards; see also 1 Corinthians 3:10-15).

The false teachers were insisting on self-denial, meaning that not only did they enjoy their pretense of humility, but they also attempted to impose it on the Colossian believers. The false humility, revealed by self-abasement and self-denial, came from observances of rituals and regulations that had no bearing on salvation. This sort of humility was self-absorbing and self-gratifying, a kind of pretentious piety.

In addition, these teachers' false humility said that the people could not approach God directly—he could be approached only through various levels of angels. They taught, therefore, that people had to worship angels in order to eventually reach God. This is unscriptural; the Bible teaches that angels are God's servants, and it forbids worshiping them (Exodus 20:3-4; Revelation 19:9-10; 22:8-9). The false teachers took great pride in what they had seen in visions—most likely these were part of an initiation rite that climaxed in some sort of vision that supposedly revealed great secrets of the universe. While the false teachers may have thought that they had a “corner on God,” their thoughts and actions betrayed a mere human origin. Their desire for attention from others showed that, in reality, they were proud. They were putting their confidence in their visions and rule keeping, and not in Christ.

2:19 The fundamental problem with the false teachers was that they were not connected to Christ, the head of the body of believers. If they had been joined to him, they would not have taught false doctrine or lived immorally. Just as a limb that is detached from the body loses life, so these false teachers, detached from the body of Christ and no longer under his headship, had lost the most vital connection. The sinews, by connecting all the members of the body to one another, allow body to get nourishment and strength and thus to grow. The body of Christ can only grow when the believers are connected to one another under Christ.

2:20-22 Believers have died with Christ and are no longer under the power of the evil powers of this world—the evil spirits and demonic powers that work against Christ. Their “death” released them from their previous slavery. Paul wondered, somewhat incredulously, why these Colossian believers would even think about submitting themselves to the regulations of a conquered power. These rules about what to handle, eat, or touch had nothing to do with God’s holy laws. The focus was on how well a person could keep the rules and then congratulate himself or herself for rule keeping. There were two problems with this: (1) These were mere human teaching and (2) they were about things that are gone as soon as they are used. In these words we hear an echo of Christ when he explained himself to the Pharisees (Matthew 15:11, 17).

2:23 To the Colossians, the discipline demanded by the false teachers seemed good. Actually, forms of legalism still attract many people today. Following a long list of religious rules requires strong devotion, humility, and severe bodily discipline. But such people are empty shells, only seeming wise. True wisdom is found only in Christ, the source of all wisdom. But all this piety and asceticism was worthless. No amount of religious rules can change a person’s heart; they have no value in conquering a person’s evil thoughts and desires. Only the Holy Spirit can do that. Therefore, all human attempts at religion are worthless. By extension, then, the heresy with all its positive-sounding rules was also worthless.

COLOSSIANS 3:1–4:1

LIVING THE NEW LIFE / 3:1-17

Whereas chapter 2 was mostly a criticism of false teachers, this section affirms the Christian's new position in Christ. In chapter 2, Paul exposed the wrong reasons for self-denial. In chapter 3, Paul explains true Christian behavior—putting on the new self by accepting Christ and regarding the earthly nature as dead. We change our moral and ethical behavior by letting Christ live within us, so that he can shape us into what we should be.

3:1 The Greek words in the phrase, since you have been raised, express certainty. Once dead in their sins, these believers had been raised from death, just as Christ had been raised from the dead by God's power. They had received new life from God through the power of the Holy Spirit. They did not need to struggle and work to attain that life, as the false teachers were trying to tell them; they already had new life! What remained was to work out its implications in daily life. Because they had been raised, they had a clear responsibility to Christ, who had raised them.

First, they must set their sights on the realities of heaven. The Greek word for "set" means to seek something out with a desire to possess it. The other religious teachers stressed "heavenly things" also, but Paul was appealing to the highest reality of all, the exalted Christ. The believers must take their focus off the world and turn it to Christ, who sits at God's right hand in the place of honor and power. Christ's seat at God's right hand reveals his power, authority, and position as both judge and advocate. The Colossian believers already had experienced this exaltation; they needed to set their sights there so that they would live out their lives on earth as citizens of heaven.

3:2 Letting heaven fill their thoughts meant concentrating on the eternal rather than the temporal, letting their thoughts dwell in the realm of Christ. They were to focus on the Lord Jesus. Thoughts can influence actions, so if the believers would place their thoughts above and not only here on earth, their actions would please God. The things on earth refers to the legalistic rituals, the false methods used to achieve holiness, and even to the basic principles of the world described in chapter 2. But how were they to fill their thoughts with heaven? Paul had explained this in another letter: "Fix your thoughts on what is true and honorable and right . . . pure and lovely and admirable . . . excellent and worthy of praise" (Philippians 4:8; see also Colossians 3:12). They were not to live as ascetics in some mystical, visionary realm; rather, Paul was saying that, by setting their thoughts above, their lives on this earth would be pleasing to God and would help accomplish Christ's work.

3:3-4 The Greek aorist tense in the phrase, for you died connotes that we died when Christ died. It happened at a point in history. In Christ's death, all believers died (2:20). Then, like a seed buried in the earth, a believer's real life is hidden from the world, just as Christ's glory is hidden, only to be revealed when he returns (3:3-4). The spiritual lives of believers are hidden inner lives that are in union with Christ who has brought them to be with him in God.

One day, when Christ is revealed in his glory, believers will also share in all his glory. The divine life of Christ will be revealed fully and will glorify us (reveal our true potential as children of God). Christians look forward to the new heaven and new earth that God has promised, and they wait for God's new order that will free the world of sin, sickness, and evil. In the meantime, they go with Christ into the world, where they heal people's bodies and souls and fight the evil effects of sin. Christ gives us power to live for him now, and he gives us hope for the future—he will return. In the rest of this chapter Paul explains how Christians should act now in order to be prepared for Christ's return.

3:5 While Paul opposed the false teachers' asceticism and regulations, he still forbade certain activities that had no part in believers' lives. If the Colossian believers were to live as examples of Christ, they had to put to death certain aspects of the sinful earthly things lurking within them—the sinful nature, the old self. Again, Paul was describing the “already” and “not yet” of believers' lives. Although they had died with Christ and had been raised with him, they were still susceptible to temptation and the evils of the sinful nature.

Two sets of sins are listed. The first five refer to sexual sin; the second five to sins of speech. These first five were related to the cultural background of the Colossians and were particularly deadly to the life of the church:

Sexual sin. Any form of illicit sexual relationship. The term serves to spotlight forbidden sexual behavior between people or indirect participation as an audience. We derive our term “pornography” from this Greek word. In contrast to the loose morals of the ancient Greek world, believers ought to show self-discipline and obedience to God in this area.

Impurity. Moral uncleanness. Perhaps no sexual act has taken place, but the person exhibits a crudeness or insensitivity in sexual matters.

Lust. Evil sexual passion that leads to excessive sexual immorality and perversion. (See Romans 1:26; 1 Thessalonians 4:5.)

Shameful desires. Wanting something that is sinister and vile in order to satisfy one's desires (see also Galatians 5:16).

Greed for the good things of this life, for that is idolatry. Relentless urge to get more for oneself. In this context, Paul may have been focusing on greed for satisfying evil desires and for sexual immorality. The greed is described as idolatry because its focus is on filling desires rather than on God.

3:6 God's terrible anger refers to God's judgment on these kinds of behavior. God does not reveal his wrath arbitrarily; his perfect moral nature will not permit sin and wickedness to go unpunished. While wrath occurs at present in the natural consequences of sinful behavior, the final culmination of God's will comes with future and final punishment of evil. People may try to get around it, but there is punishment for evil for those who have not believed in Christ as Savior.

3:7-8 The Colossian believers used to do the actions described above. They had been dead in their sins (2:13), but that all changed when they came to know Christ. Because of their new life in Christ, the believers were to get rid of those things listed above and others listed below. "Get rid of" means to put off or disrobe. The old, filthy clothes must be taken off before the new clothes can be put on. The believer "removes" the old life of sin and "puts on" the new life of Christ. The Colossian believers had experienced this; Paul asked that they act it out in their lives.

Not only did they need to deal with sexual immorality in all its variations, they also needed to deal with misused anger that often spilled over into evil speech.

Anger. A continuous attitude of hatred that remains bottled up within. This could refer to what is under the surface, while "rage" (below) refers to what bursts out. Anger would destroy the harmony and unity Paul called for among the believers.

Rage. Outbursts of anger or quick temper for selfish reasons. This could mean continual and uncontrolled behavior.

Malicious behavior. Doing evil despite the good that has been received. This word is a general term referring to an evil force that destroys relationships. It can mean anything from trouble to wickedness. It is a deliberate attempt to harm another person.

Slander. Destroying another person's good reputation by lies, gossip, spreading rumors, etc. Malice often manifests itself through slander.

Dirty language. Crude talk, abrasive language, expletives. Paul admonished the believers that such language must be caught and stopped before it escapes their mouths.

These behaviors have no place in any Christian or in any church. These are part of the “old life” before knowing Christ. Christians must resolutely “put off” these repulsive sins of anger and speech so that they can “put on” Christ’s attitudes and actions.

3:9-10 Because Jesus Christ is “the truth” (John 14:6), believers ought to practice truth in all areas of life. They should not lie to each other. Lying to others disrupts unity by destroying trust. It tears down relationships and may lead to serious conflict in a church. Lying can take place in words said as well as words left unsaid. Believers should not exaggerate statistics, pass on rumors or gossip, or say things to build up their own image at others’ expense. Instead, because they have stripped off the old evil nature and all its wicked deeds, they should be committed to telling the truth.

The “old nature” was each person before he or she came to know Christ. The person was enslaved to sin, bound to the earth, without hope. But believers have clothed themselves with a brand-new nature that is continually being renewed. The “new nature” from Christ frees us from sin, sets our hearts on “things above” (3:1), and gives us the hope of eternity. Paul was appealing to the commitment the believers had made, urging them to remain true to their confession of faith. Every Christian is in a continuing education program. Renewal is constantly needed in the believer’s battle against sin and the old nature. What we learn is personal knowledge of Christ who created this new nature within us. The goal of the learning is Christlikeness. The more believers know of Christ and his work, the more they are being changed to be like him. Because this process is lifelong, we must never stop learning and obeying.

3:11 There should be no barriers of nationality, race, education level, social standing, wealth, gender, religion, or power (see also Galatians 3:26-28; 6:15). Paul pointed out four groupings that were of particular importance in the Greek culture:

1. Racial or national distinctions, such as between Jew and Gentile. The spread of the Greek culture and civilization meant that a Greek person (regardless of his or her country of origin) could feel pride in a privileged position and would look down on the Jews and their persistent clinging to an ancient culture. The Jews, meanwhile, would look down on Greeks as heathen, immoral, and outside of God's grace for the chosen nation.

2. Religious distinctions, such as between those who have been circumcised (Jews) and those who are uncircumcised (Gentiles). Circumcision, the physical mark of the male Jew, was prized as part of the covenant of God with his chosen people. If practiced at all by Gentiles, it was as part of a heathen cult; most often, the Gentiles were uncircumcised, and they mocked the seriousness of the rite for the Jews.
3. Cultural distinctions, such as between barbaric or uncivilized peoples (contemptuous names used for people unfamiliar with Greek language and culture) and cultured peoples.
4. Economic or social distinctions, such as between a slave and a free person. Slavery was common in the ancient world. Paul would have special words for the relationships between masters and slaves (3:22–4:1).

How could these barriers possibly be removed? Paul's answer: because Christ is all that matters, and he lives in all of us. The Colossian church was probably made up of all kinds of people. No believer should allow prejudices from pre-Christian days to be carried into the church. Christ broke down all barriers; he accepts all who come to him. Believers, as Christ's body, must do the same. Nothing should divide believers; nothing should keep them from experiencing unity. Each believer is responsible to get rid of the sinful practices of whatever life he or she led and become a new person in Christ. Then, as part of God's body of believers on earth, each person should work as part of the whole to advance God's Kingdom.

3:12 In the Bible, God's holy people are chosen by God for a specific purpose or destiny. No one can claim to be chosen by God because of his or her heritage or good works. God freely chooses to save whomever he wills. The doctrine of election teaches that it is God's sovereign choice to save us by his goodness and mercy and not by our own merit. To have received such incredible grace from God ought to cause all believers to gladly lay aside their sinful desires in order to clothe themselves with a nature that pleases God. In contrast to the vices listed above, Paul offered a list of virtues to be adopted as believers' strategy to live for God day by day in the social activities of life. These include:

Tenderhearted mercy. Genuine sensitivity and heartfelt sympathy for the needs of others. This is an attribute of God, who is described as compassionate and who acted so on our behalf.

Kindness. Acting charitably, benevolently toward others, as God has done toward us. God's kindness is a continual theme in the Psalms and Prophets.

Kindness takes the initiative in responding generously to others' needs. Because believers have received kindness, we ought to act that way toward others. This does not come naturally; it is a fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5:22-23).

Humility. An attitude of self-esteem that is neither puffed up with pride, nor self-depreciating. It is a true understanding of one's position with God. As Christ humbled himself (Philippians 2:6-11), so believers ought to humble themselves in service to the Lord and Savior.

Gentleness. Humble, considerate of others, submissive to God and his Word. Gentleness is not to be confused with weakness; instead, it means consideration for others and a willingness to give up one's rights for the sake of another. Again, Christ is our example.

Patience. Long-suffering, or putting up with people who irritate. The person might have the right to retaliate, but chooses patience instead. The Holy Spirit's work in us increases our endurance.

3:13 Clothing ourselves with the new nature affects how we treat others. Paul called the believers to make allowance for each other's faults. To forgive implies continual, mutual forgiveness of the problems, irritations, and grievances that occur in the congregation. The church had enough enemies and troubles dealing with the outside world; they didn't need infighting or energy wasted on grievances or grudges (either held over from pre-Christian days or arising in the church) that could be worked out with forbearing and forgiving. The key to forgiving others was for the believers to (1) remember how much the Lord forgave them, and (2) realize the presumption in refusing to forgive someone God had already forgiven. Remembering God's infinite love and forgiveness should help the Colossian believers love and forgive one another.

3:14 All the virtues that Paul encouraged the believers in Colosse to develop were perfectly bound together by love. As they clothed themselves with these virtues, the last garment to put on was love, which, like a belt, binds all of the others in place. Love pulls together the other graces in perfect, unified action. To practice any list of virtues without practicing love will lead to distortion, fragmentation, and stagnation. In any congregation, love must be used to unify the people and build them up. Those who would desire to be mature in Christ must make love a top priority.

3:15 Putting on all the virtues, with love binding them together (3:14), would lead to peace between individuals and among the members of the body of believers. The Colossian Christians should let the peace that comes from Christ rule in their hearts. To live in peace would not mean that suddenly all differences of opinion would be eliminated, but it would require that they work together despite their differences. This kind of tranquility and cooperation can't come from mere human effort. It requires God's help to arbitrate and enable people to get along.

The word rule comes from the language of athletics: Paul wanted the believers to let Christ's peace be umpire or referee in their hearts. Peace would arbitrate, decide any argument, and thereby restrain any of the passions of the old nature that might threaten. Peace would settle any friction and strife so the believers could remain strong and unified.

When believers have an overriding attitude of thankfulness and when they have constant gratitude in their hearts for all that God has done for them in giving salvation and making them part of Christ's body, then other virtues to which Paul called them would be much easier to live out. Being thankful would also make other relationships easier, as Paul explained in the following verses (3:18–4:6).

3:16 The words of Christ referred to the message proclaimed by Christ (the gospel). For us, this means the Bible. This teaching should live (reside permanently) in believers' hearts by their study and knowledge of God's word, making them wise. To teach and counsel refers to the whole congregation and their responsibility to teach the Word—including the life, ministry, and teachings of Jesus Christ—as a means to warn and correct one another.

The psalms, hymns and spiritual songs were a vital part of this teaching and admonition. Although the early Christians had access to the Old Testament and freely used it (thus, Paul's reference to "psalms"), they did not yet have the New Testament or any other Christian books to study. Their stories and teachings about Christ were sometimes set to music to make them easier to memorize and pass on from person to person. Grounded in God's word and correct doctrine, music can be an important part of Christian worship and education.

While music can teach, its primary function may be to praise God. As believers sing, they ought to do so with thankful hearts (see 4:2). Again, the word "heart" refers to a person's entire being. Gratitude to God overflows in praise.

3:17 Earlier Paul listed a few vices and virtues to give the Colossian believers an idea of what was expected of them in their attitudes toward one another, but he did not want to regulate every area of life with a list of rules. So Paul gave this general command to cover every area of life.

Everything the believers said and everything they did should be done as a representative of the Lord Jesus, realizing his constant presence and bringing honor and glory to him in every aspect and activity of daily living (see also 1 Corinthians 10:31). To act in someone's name is to act on his authority; believers act as Christ's representatives.

Paul echoed the need for giving thanks, as he had in 3:15 and 3:16. All we do for Christ should be done with the spirit of thankfulness for all he has done for us. Believers are not enslaved to rules about every word they speak or deed they do; instead, they freely put themselves under the Lord's guidance because they love him, have accepted his salvation, and live to glorify him.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR CHRISTIAN HOUSEHOLDS / 3:18–4:1

In Paul's day, women, children, and slaves were to submit to the head of the family—slaves would submit until they were freed, male children until they grew up, and women and girls for their whole lives. Paul emphasized the equality of all believers in Christ (Galatians 3:28), but he did not suggest overthrowing Roman society to achieve it. Instead, he counseled all believers to submit to authority by choice. Paul gave rules for three sets of household relationships: (1) husbands and wives, (2) parents and children, and (3) masters and slaves. In each case, there is mutual responsibility to submit and love, to obey and encourage, to work hard and be fair. Examine your family and work relationships. Do you relate to others as God intended?

3:18-19 Why must wives submit to their husbands—and why is that fitting for those who belong to the Lord? This may have been good advice for Christian women, newly freed in Christ, who found submission difficult. Paul told them that they should willingly follow their husbands' leadership in Christ. But Paul had words for husbands as well: husbands must love their wives and never treat them harshly. It may also have been true that Christian men, used to the Roman custom of giving unlimited power to the head of the family, were not used to treating their wives with respect and love. Real spiritual leadership involves service. Just as Christ served the disciples, even to the point of washing their feet, so the husband is to serve his wife. This means putting aside his own interests in order to care for his wife. A wise and Christ-honoring husband will not abuse his leadership role. At the same time, a wise and Christ-honoring wife will not try to undermine her husband's leadership. There must be mutual love and respect. Husband and wife must accept mutual subordination in God's hierarchy. The Lord Jesus is the criterion for our duty. He, not society, defines what is “fitting.”

Although some people have distorted Paul’s teaching on submission by giving unlimited authority to husbands, we cannot get around it. The fact is, Paul wrote that wives should submit to their husbands. The fact that a teaching is not popular is no reason to discard it. According to the Bible, the man is the spiritual head of the family, and his wife should acknowledge his leadership. There should not be a constant battle for power in the relationship. Our concept of submission must come from the Bible, demonstrated by the church to Christ (as Christ loved the church and submitted to God, 1 Corinthians 15:28; Ephesians 5:21). We must not base it on either a feminist or chauvinist view. Christian marriage involves mutual submission (Ephesians 5:21), subordinating our personal desires for the good of the loved one, and submitting ourselves to Christ as Lord. Submission is rarely a problem in homes where both partners have a strong relationship with Christ and where each is concerned for the happiness of the other.

Submitting to another person is an often misunderstood concept. It does not mean becoming a doormat. Christ submitted his will to the Father; we honor Christ by following his example.

3:20-21 God’s design for family relationships continues in this verse. Children (tekna, “young children living at home”) are to obey their parents. While all young children will at times be disobedient and test their limits with their parents, as they get older and understand what they are told, God wants them to obey. Such obedience reveals an understanding of authority that can carry over into understanding God’s authority and all believers’ responsibility to obey him. A child’s obedience to his or her parents pleases the Lord.

Children’s obedience is balanced by Paul’s next command: Fathers, don’t aggravate your children, or they will become discouraged. The command for children to obey does not give parents license for harsh treatment. Children must be handled with care. They need firm discipline administered in love. Fathers refers to both parents. Parents must not discourage their children by nagging and deriding. Belittling children, or showing by words or actions that they are unimportant to the parents, should have no place in Christian families. Discipline administered in derision ultimately discourages children, destroys their self-respect, and causes them to quit trying.

The purpose of parental discipline is to help children grow, not to exasperate and provoke them to anger or discouragement. Parenting is not easy—it takes lots of patience to raise children in a loving, Christ-honoring manner. But frustration and anger should not be causes for discipline. Instead, parents should act in love, treating their children as Jesus treats the people he loves. This is vital to children's development and to their understanding of what Christ is like.

3:22 Paul used the same word for obey here as he used in 3:20 for children to obey their parents. Slaves were also to obey the commands and desires of their masters, not just when they were being watched and hoping for a reward, but at all times. They should no longer merely work for human approval, they should work hard and well because of their reverent fear of the Lord. Believers who were slaves were not set free from serving their masters, but they were set free from slavery to sin. Their ultimate Master was God himself. Paul explained that God wanted the slaves to fulfill their responsibilities in this world even as they looked forward to the next.

Slaves played a significant part in this society, with several million in the Roman Empire at this time. Slavery was sanctioned by law and was part of the empire's social makeup. Because many slaves and slave owners had become Christians, the early church had to deal straightforwardly with the question of master/slave relations. While neither condemning nor condoning slavery, Paul told masters and slaves how to live together in Christian households. In Paul's day, women, children, and slaves had few rights. In the church, however, they had freedoms that society denied them. Paul tells husbands, parents, and masters to be caring.

3:23-24 Slaves had a variety of tasks—running errands, caring for or teaching children, cleaning, preparing meals, or doing menial work. Yet Paul gave their jobs a new dignity because these slaves would do their work for the Lord, serving the Lord Christ. Slaves had little, if any, opportunity to get out of slavery, and they received little, if any, monetary compensation for their work. Obviously, they had no inheritance in this world, but Paul reminded the Christian slaves that they would ultimately be rewarded by Christ with their deserved inheritance as children of the true, eternal King. (See Luke 6:35 and Ephesians 6:7-8 for more on the Lord's reward.)

3:25 Echoing his words in 3:6, Paul once again explained that judgment would be coming. Whether master or slave, the wrongdoer will be paid back, and those who do right will receive the inheritance as their reward (3:24). At the Judgment, God will judge without partiality. Paul explained the responsibilities of the believers. Both the Christian slave with the harsh and ruthless master and the Christian master with the lazy and untrustworthy slave knew how they were to act as believers. They also knew that God would judge wrongdoing without favoritism.

4:1 Whether the master's slaves were believers or not, Christian masters were responsible to be just and fair to all their slaves. Without attempting to overturn the social structure of a worldwide empire, Paul applied Christ's inward transforming principles to the system (see the discussion on 3:22). Paul did not say that Christian masters should free all slaves; in fact, in some cases, setting them free might not have been humane. Instead, Paul explained that Christian masters should do what is just and fair, treating their slaves as human beings. To some masters, this would mean freeing their slaves; to others, it would mean treating the slaves better in terms of living quarters, remuneration, time to rest, and tone of voice.

Why should Paul command this of Christian slave masters? Because the slave masters themselves had someone to report to—their Master in heaven. The slave masters could hardly expect to be treated rightly and fairly by God if they refused right and fair treatment to those in their charge.

Masters and slaves who followed Paul's advice would be able to serve or be served in their daily routines, and yet come together to worship as brothers and sisters in the Lord without any disruption.

COLOSSIANS 4:2-18

AN ENCOURAGEMENT FOR PRAYER / 4:2-6

As he began to draw his letter to a close, Paul turned his focus back to the church as a whole, reminding the Colossians of their corporate responsibilities.

4:2 The believers were responsible to pray; prayer was their lifeline to God. To devote themselves to prayer meant that they should be persistent and unwilling to give up even though their prayers may seem to go unanswered. Paul's advice to "keep on praying" (1 Thessalonians 5:17) has the same meaning. Their devotion to prayer did not mean that they should spend all their time on their knees, but that they should have a prayerful attitude at all times. This attitude would be built upon acknowledging their dependence on God, realizing his presence within them, and determining to obey him fully. Then they would find it natural to pray frequent, spontaneous, short prayers. A prayerful attitude is not a substitute for regular times of prayer but should be an outgrowth of those times.

Having an alert mind may have been referring to not dozing off, to being alert in their devotion, or to being alert for God's answers and then thankful when they came. More likely, he was focusing on the anticipation of the Lord's coming. The Lord could return at any time, so believers should be found alert and waiting.

As Paul had mentioned several times (in 1:3, 12; 2:7; 3:15-17), the believers ought always to be thankful. Thankfulness implies understanding all that God has done and anticipating what he promises.

4:3 The Colossian believers could have a part in Paul's worldwide ministry by praying for him and his coworkers. Paul requested prayer for opportunities to preach in spite of his imprisonment, so that he could continue to proclaim God's secret plan—that the message is also for the Gentiles. Although Paul was in chains for preaching the gospel, the chains could not stop the message.

4:4 Paul asked for the ability to proclaim the message clearly. In other words, Paul wanted to be able to "reveal" the mystery so that many could hear and believe. This was his compulsion; he had been called (Acts 9:15; 26:17-20).

4:5 Paul reminded the believers of their responsibility to be wise in the way they acted toward those who are not Christians. Paul was observing that while the Christian fellowship does (and should) make some allowances for the mistakes of its own, the world will not. Christians' behavior toward unbelievers should be above reproach. The believers were not to hide from the world in a secret organization; instead, they were to live in the world. They were to make the most of every opportunity to share the gospel with unbelievers. Paul was communicating a sense of urgency (see Galatians 6:10; Ephesians 5:15-16).

4:6 The spoken word would be the communication method; therefore, the believers should be wise in how they spoke. Speech that is gracious is kind and courteous. Speech that is effective is interesting (as opposed to dull), invites interaction (as opposed to refusing to listen and discuss), adds "spice" to a discussion (by penetrating to deeper levels), and is pure and wholesome (as opposed to "filthy language," 3:8). Believers should always be ready to answer questions about their faith and be ready to share words of personal testimony (see also 1 Peter 3:15-16).

No Christian should have a dull, tiresome, know-it-all monologue of his faith. Instead, Christians, who have the most exciting news in the world to share, should be able to share that message with excitement, ability to invoke interest, an understanding of the basics, a willingness to listen and discuss, and a desire to answer everyone's questions graciously.

PAUL'S FINAL INSTRUCTIONS AND GREETINGS / 4:7-18

Paul often closed his letters by sending personal greetings from himself and others with him to individuals in the church to whom he wrote.

4:7 Tychicus had accompanied Paul to Jerusalem with the collection for the church there (Acts 20:4). He later became one of Paul's personal representatives. Paul sent him to Ephesus a couple of times (Ephesians 6:21-22; 2 Timothy 4:12), and he sent him to Colosse with this letter for the Colossian church. Tychicus also may have been sent to Crete (Titus 3:12). Tychicus would give the believers news about Paul that Paul did not include in this letter. Paul trusted Tychicus, making good use of his freedom and faithfulness to continue the ministry of the gospel while Paul was imprisoned.

4:8 In spite of the fact that Paul had never been to Colosse, he and the believers there had a bond because of their unity in Christ. This letter, bearing important information needed by the church in Colosse, was entrusted to a brother who would be sure to deliver it and ensure that its contents were understood. Paul also sent Tychicus to tell the believers how he was doing in prison and to encourage them. This personal letter and Paul's continued faithfulness to spread the gospel in spite of his imprisonment would encourage and strengthen the Colossian believers.

4:9 Onesimus was a native of Colosse. He was a slave who had run away from his master, Philemon (an elder in the church at Colosse), and was saved through Paul in prison. The letter to the Colossians and the letter to Philemon were written at the same time and carried by these men back to Colosse. Paul referred to Onesimus as a much loved brother both here and in Philemon 16. Onesimus would accompany Tychicus and also bring news of Paul's circumstances. Tychicus probably provided moral support to Onesimus as Onesimus returned to his master in hopes of being restored. He was also returning to the church, not merely as a fellow Colossian, but also as a fellow Christian.

4:10 Aristarchus was from Thessalonica and had accompanied Paul on his third missionary journey. He had been arrested, along with Gaius, during the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29). He and Tychicus were with Paul in Greece (Acts 20:4); Aristarchus had traveled to Rome with Paul (Acts 27:2).

Mark (also called John Mark) was not yet well known among the churches, although apparently Barnabas was (see, for example, 1 Corinthians 9:6; Galatians 2:1, 9, 13), for Mark is noted as Barnabas's cousin. Mark wrote the Gospel of Mark (see the Author section there for more information). Apparently Paul wanted the Colossians to know that he had confidence in Mark; instructions concerning Mark had already been conveyed by someone. Apparently Mark was making good efforts to show himself to be an effective and productive worker. In any case, the Colossians were to welcome Mark if he were to arrive at their church.

4:11 Jesus was a common Jewish name, as was the name Justus (which means "righteous"). Apparently Aristarchus, Mark, and Justus were the only ones among Paul's fellow workers who were Jewish Christians. These men had proven to be a comfort to Paul. Paul had been called as a missionary to the Gentiles, yet he had kept his concern for the lost of his own nation, Israel. Yet Paul's very mission to the Gentiles had alienated him from many of his fellow Jews; thus, the hard work on behalf of the gospel by these faithful Jewish Christians was especially comforting to Paul.

4:12 Like Onesimus (4:9), Epaphras was from Colosse. He may have been converted in Ephesus under Paul's teaching, for Paul had stayed in Ephesus for three years, teaching and preaching (Acts 20:31). Epaphras, then, had returned to Colosse, his hometown, where he had founded the church there, and probably the churches in Hierapolis and Laodicea as well (1:7; Acts 19:10). Later, he apparently visited Paul in Rome, perhaps to get the apostle's advice on dealing with the false teachers. His report to Paul caused Paul to write this letter. Like Paul (1:23) and Tychicus (4:7), Epaphras was a servant of Christ Jesus, who had been responsible for the missionary outreach to these cities.

Epaphras was a hero of the Colossian church, one of the believers who had helped keep the church together despite growing troubles. His earnest prayers for the believers show his deep love and concern for them. Epaphras's prayers focused on the Colossian believers' growth in the faith—that they would become strong spiritually (as in 1:28; 2:2; 3:14) and be perfect, fully confident of the whole will of God (filled with everything that is God's will). We have already been filled with Christ, but we must go on to fulfill what has been given us. Such strength and assurance of faith will help believers of any time period stand against false teaching.

4:13 Epaphras agonized in prayer, not only for the believers in Colosse, but also for those in the other cities in the Lycus Valley. Laodicea was located a few miles northwest of Colosse, also on the Lycus River, and was a stopover along the main road from the East to Ephesus. The city was named for Laodice, queen of Antiochus II. Hierapolis was about five miles north of Laodicea. Epaphras was truly a zealous missionary in this particular portion of the Roman Empire.

4:14 Doctor Luke had spent much time with Paul. He had accompanied Paul on most of the third missionary journey. He also remained beside Paul through this imprisonment, as well as Paul's final imprisonment (see 2 Timothy 4:11). The good doctor certainly had helped with Paul's health (especially after the beatings Paul received during his travels, as well as other ailments that plagued Paul in prison). Luke was also a prolific writer, authoring the Gospel of Luke and the book of Acts. Since Paul had explained that the only three Jewish Christians with him were Aristarchus, Mark, and Justus, it has been assumed that Luke was a Gentile or a Greek-speaking Jew. Apparently, Demas was faithful at this time (see also Philemon 24), but later he deserted Paul (2 Timothy 4:10).

4:15 Paul turned his attention from sending everyone else's greetings to sending his own. He asked that the Colossian church relay his greetings to the church (that is, to the brothers and sisters) in Laodicea (ten miles to the west). This gives an interesting sidelight to church life in the first century—it seems that the churches had fellowship with one another, as the sending of greetings and sharing of letters would indicate (4:16; 1 Thessalonians 5:27). Another sidelight is the picture of believers meeting in private homes. It wasn't until the middle of the third century that churches began to own property and build public places of worship. So during this time, individual believers opened their homes for worship services. Here Paul greeted those who met in Nympha's home. In Colosse, the believers met in Philemon's house (Philemon 2). Lydia opened her home to the believers in Philippi (Acts 16:40). Gaius offered his home to the believers in Corinth (Romans 16:23). Aquila and Priscilla, a husband and wife team, opened their home while they lived in Rome (Romans 16:5) and in Ephesus (1 Corinthians 16:19).

4:16 After this letter had been read to all the believers in Colosse in a worship service, they were to send it on to Laodicea. Apparently the heresy was a problem for that church as well, and they needed Paul's advice and encouragement. At this time, no New Testament had been assembled—indeed, most of the New Testament books were still being written. So the churches circulated these letters from Paul (1 Thessalonians 5:27), Peter (1 Peter 1:1), James (James 1:1), and other key Christian leaders.

The Colossians, in turn, were to read the letter Paul had written to the church in Laodicea. Most scholars suggest that the letter may have been the book of Ephesians because the letter to the Ephesians was to be circulated to all the churches in Asia Minor. It is also possible that there was a special letter to the Laodiceans, which we do not have.

4:17 Paul's letter to Philemon is also addressed to Archippus (Philemon 2), where Paul called him a "fellow soldier." Archippus may have been a Roman soldier who had become a member of the Colossian church, or he may have been Philemon's son. In any case, Paul called upon the members of the church to encourage Archippus to carry out some work that the Lord gave him. Paul singled out Archippus for making sure his job was completed. Paul saw nothing wrong in challenging believers to attempt more in ministry and to go beyond their current level of achievement.

4:18 Paul usually dictated his letters to a scribe, and he often ended with a short greeting in his own handwriting (see also 1 Corinthians 16:21; Galatians 6:11; 2 Thessalonians 3:17; Philemon 19). This assured the recipients that false teachers were not writing letters in Paul's name (as apparently had been a problem, see 2 Thessalonians 2:2; 3:17). It also gave the letters a personal touch, especially to this congregation Paul had never visited.

Paul asked that the believers continue to pray for him during his imprisonment (see also 4:3, 10). This reference to his chains also reminded the believers that the letter had been written to them while he was in prison. Paul had been remembering them; he wanted them to remember that he was a prisoner for the gospel's sake, a gospel he would not stop preaching regardless of his chains. Paul was in prison because he refused to set aside one iota of his faith; he hoped that the Colossian believers would remember that when they encountered the false teachings.

Just as Paul had begun his letter with grace (1:2), so he ended it with the benediction that the believers would continue to experience God's unmerited favor. Ultimately, God's grace would strengthen and defend the church.

To understand the letter to the Colossians, we need to realize that the church was facing pressure from a heresy that promised deeper spiritual life through secret knowledge. The false teachers were destroying faith in Christ by undermining Christ's humanity and divinity. Paul makes it clear in this letter to the Colossian believers that Christ alone is the source of our spiritual life, the Head of the body of believers. Christ is Lord of both the physical and spiritual worlds. The path to deeper spiritual life is not through religious duties, special knowledge, or secrets; it is only through a clear connection with the Lord Jesus Christ. We must never let anything come between us and our Savior.

1 THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

“You won’t learn unless you ask questions!” Countless teachers and parents have explained that truth to children as they begin their educational experience. Those who desire to train others and impart knowledge don’t mind responding to queries. Questions help them know what students are thinking and learning. Those who don’t verbalize their doubts, voice their concerns, or seek to clarify what they have heard often harbor misunderstanding, go the wrong way, or live in ignorance.

Paul wrote this epistle, his first to the church at Thessalonica, to answer believers’ questions and to commend them on their faith and commitment to Christ. The Thessalonians had questions . . . and they asked them. As you read this short, personal letter, look for answers for yourself. Also, think of questions that you will ask your spiritual mentor . . . and then learn.

AUTHOR

Paul (Saul of Tarsus): apostle of Christ, missionary, church planter, and gifted teacher.

The first verse of this letter identifies Paul as the author. Paul’s traveling companions—Silas and Timothy—are mentioned as well, but Paul is clearly the primary author because the pronoun “I” is used so often.

As he had done on other occasions, Paul most likely dictated this letter to a scribe. Timothy, Paul’s trusted assistant, may have been the one who actually transcribed the words. Also, Silas, who assisted Paul in founding the Thessalonian church, would have been very interested in this letter and may have offered suggestions on what to say.

Because Paul’s time in Thessalonica had been so limited, he was concerned that he hadn’t been able to teach the young believers the details of Christian doctrine and to adequately model the Christian faith. Later, when Timothy returned from Thessalonica with the believers’ questions, Paul wrote to encourage and instruct them.

For more about Paul, see the Author section in the Introduction to the book of Romans.

DATE AND SETTING

Written from Corinth around A.D. 51.

Paul and Silas's nighttime escape from Thessalonica inaugurated their quick tour of Macedonia and Achaia (northern and southern Greece, respectively). Their next stop was Berea, where Timothy rejoined them. When Paul's enemies from Thessalonica followed him there, he was quietly escorted to Athens. At this intellectual center of the Greek world, Paul was allowed to present the gospel to the philosophers who had gathered at Mars Hill (Acts 17:19-34). Although most of his audience rejected and even mocked his message, a few were persuaded and became believers (Acts 17:32-34).

Silas and Timothy soon joined Paul there (Acts 17:15). While at Athens, Paul probably sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to see how the believers were doing (see Paul's reference to this in 3:1-4). Paul then traveled to Corinth, where he spent a full year and a half establishing a church. During that time, Timothy returned from Thessalonica (Acts 18:5) with a favorable report on the Thessalonian believers and with their questions. In response to Timothy's report, Paul dictated 1 Thessalonians.

AUDIENCE

The believers in Thessalonica.

The city of Thessalonica. Thessalonica was a bustling seaport on the Aegean Sea. The Roman road that connected the major cities of Macedonia—the Egnatian Way—was the main road through Thessalonica. The Arch of Galerius, which spanned the Egnatian Way in Paul's day, still stands today.

In 315 B.C. Cassander, a military commander of Alexander the Great, founded the city and named it after his wife, Thessalonica, the half sister of Alexander the Great. The strategic location of the city allowed it to grow rapidly in wealth and influence. By 146 B.C., Thessalonica had been named the capital of Macedonia. The Romans even allowed the Thessalonians to govern themselves (in 42 B.C., Anthony and Octavia rewarded the city for supporting them in the Battle of Philippi by making it a free city). During Augustus's reign, Thessalonica was the most populous town in Macedonia. Thus, when Paul entered the city, it was the commercial and political center of Macedonia.

The church. As was his custom, Paul first went to the Jews in Thessalonica. For three Sabbaths he taught in the synagogue, explaining the gospel and showing that Jesus was the Christ, the Messiah—the one about whom the prophets had foretold. Some were persuaded (Acts 17:1-4). Among these was Jason, who offered his home to the missionaries, and Aristarchus, who later became Paul's traveling companion (see Acts 19:29; 20:4; 27:2). A number of God-fearing Greeks (Greeks who attended the synagogue services) and prominent women of Thessalonica were also persuaded.

But the Jewish leaders of the synagogue grew jealous of Paul's success and thought he was stealing the prominent members of their congregation. In attempting to stop him, they rounded up some rough characters in the marketplace and started a riot in the city. The mob broke into Jason's house, looking for Paul and Silas. When they couldn't find them, they brought Jason before the city officials (Acts 17:6). They accused Jason of housing preachers who had been asserting that Jesus, instead of Caesar, was king (Acts 17:7). Treason was a serious charge. The Romans didn't tolerate any sign of defiance to their rule. Moreover, the city officials probably had heard of Claudius's recent expulsion of the Jews from Rome (around A.D. 49). The historian Suetonius wrote that Claudius threw the Jews out of Rome because of the "tumults instigated by Chrestus" (see also Acts 18:1-2). Some scholars believe that "Chrestus" is a misspelling of Christ; if so, the Jewish riots would have occurred in response to the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Although the city officials of Thessalonica probably didn't understand why the Jews were rioting or whose fault it was, they certainly had been apprised of the Jewish rioting that had occurred throughout the Roman Empire and didn't want their city to be thrown into turmoil.

Given the social instability of Thessalonica, the believers decided to send Paul and Silas to nearby Berea. Paul's opponents in Thessalonica were not so easily deterred and soon followed Paul and Silas there, stirring up a riot against them in that city as well (Acts 17:13). Once again Paul had to flee. This time, he went to Athens—the center of Greek culture (Acts 17:15).
